The ghetto was liquidated in the last days of August 1942, when all of its residents were transferred to Szydłowiec. From there, on September 23, together with others, the Jews of Wolanów were deported to the extermination camp in Treblinka.⁷ The prisoners of the labor camp in Garno faced a similar tragic fate when this camp was liquidated in August 1943.⁸ During the war, material evidence of the Jewish presence in Wolanów was destroyed, including the tombstones from the Jewish cemetery, which the Germans used to pave roads in the area.

SOURCES Published sources regarding the Wolanów ghetto include Sebastian Piątkowski, "Pomoc społeczna i działalność charytatywna w gettach dystryktu radomskiego (1939–1942)," in Marek Przeniosło, ed., Dobroczynność i pomoc społeczna na ziemiach polskich w XIX, XX i na początku XXI wieku (Kielce, 2008), pp. 172–177; Jacek Andrzej Młynarczyk, Judenmord in Zentralpolen: Der Distrikt Radom im Generalgouvernement 1939–1945 (Darmstadt: WBG, 2007), p. 122; and Czesław Pilichowski et al., eds., Obozy hitlerowskie na ziemiach polskich 1939–1945: Informator encyklopedyczny (Warsaw: PWN, 1979), p. 569.

Relevant documentation can be found in the following archives: APR; AŻIH (211/430 [JSS]; NMO, nos. 60 and 63; and ITS.

Sebastian Piątkowski
trans. Jolanta Kraemer

NOTES

1. Adam Rutkowski, "Martyrologia, walka i zagłada ludności żydowskiej dystryktu radomskiego podczas okupacji hitlerowskiej," BŻIH, nos. 15–16 (1955): 160, however, states—based on a witness account—that there were 800 Jews living in Wolanów at the outbreak of the war. This number is probably too high.

2. Piątkowski, "Pomoc społeczna," pp. 172–177.

3. AŻIH, 211/430; Krzysztof Urbański, Zagłada Żydów w dystrykcie radomskim (Kraków, 2004), p. 141; Adam Rutkowski, "The War and the Destruction of the Jewish Population in the Radom Region" (trans. Jerrold Landau), in Przytyk Memorial Book (translation of David Shtokfish, ed., Sefer Przytyk [Tel Aviv: Przytyk Societies in Israel, France, and the USA, 1973]), p. 257.

4. In Polish publications the camp in the village of Garno is often referred to as being located in Wolanów. This is incorrect. See, for example, Pilichowski et al., Obozy hitlerowskie, p. 569; and Młynarczyk, Judenmord in Zentralpolen, p. 152. Also see "Jerachmiel (Rachmil) Pikier, about his family during and after World War II in Warka, Wolanów, and Stara-chowice," available at www.sztetl.org.pl. Pikier was subsequently transferred to the labor camp after the evacuation of Wolanów's Jews in August 1942.

5. Młynarczyk, Judenmord in Zentralpolen, p. 122, citing AŻIH, NMO, nos. 60 and 63, from late December 1942.

6. AŻIH, 211/430.

7. Sebastian Piątkowski, “Żydzi w Szydłowcu w latach wojny i okupacji (1939–1945),” in Jacek Wijaczka, ed., Żydzi szydlowieccy. Materiały sesji popularnonaukowej 22 lutego 1997 roku (Szydłowiec, 1997), p. 128.

8. Pilichowski et al., Obozy hitlerowskie, p. 569.

WOLBÓRZ

Pre-1939: Wolbórz, village, Łódź województwo, Poland; 1939–1945: Wolborz, Kreis Petrikau, Distrikt Radom, Generalgouvernement; post-1998: Wolbórz, Łódź województwo, Poland

Wolbórz is located about 39 kilometers (24 miles) southeast of Łódź. In 1939, there were 254 Jews living in Wolbórz.

A significant part of the village was razed in the course of the September Campaign; the Jewish community estimated that 75 percent of its houses were destroyed.¹ There were some German forces encamped in the village; the Jews of Wolbórz were forced to clean their quarters and perform other tasks at their behest. This labor was unpaid.

H. Młynarski was the first Judenrat chairman. Młynarski's deputy, the dentist Icchok Rosenblat, later replaced him. Rosenblat was most likely succeeded by the tailor Abram Kirszbaum. Kirszbaum was shot on Modrzewski Street by the Tomaszów Mazowiecki Gestapo and German Gendarmerie on July 23, 1942. A Jewish police force was also established in the village; Rosenblat served in this force. The police commander was shot by SS men shortly before the liquidation of the Wolbórz ghetto.

By the end of 1939, numerous refugee and deportee families from Łódź and Tuszyn had settled in the village.

In 1940, 19 local youths were sent to a labor camp in Cieszanów in Distrikt Lublin. Meanwhile in Wolbórz, approximately 30 unpaid laborers were regulating the Wolbórka River, deepening it to improve the functioning of a local mill. Work was suspended briefly in January 1941 for the remainder of the winter. At that time, on the order of the Kreis doctor, the community was forced to open a public bath. There were reportedly 427 Jews living in the village at this time.²

By May 1941, a local branch of the Jewish Social Self-Help (JSS) had been established, with pre-war community leader Jozek Szajnfarder as its chairman and Judenrat chairman Rosenblat serving as his deputy; another member of the pre-war leadership, the tradesman Moszek Baum, was also on the committee. The JSS committee's services were limited to the distribution of very small quantities of potatoes and sugar.³

By mid-1941, the number of locals was almost equal to the number of newcomers. In July of that year, the local JSS committee reported 182 refugees living in the village. August 1941 statistics show that there were a total of 121 children and youths under 18.

In September 1941, a typhus epidemic broke out, which remained uncontained until November 1941. The JSS managed to open a soup kitchen on November 9, 1941, which fed 40 people who were still quarantined. By December 1941, the kitchen was feeding 63 people daily. As of February 1942, the

40 poorest children in the village were fed breakfast four times a week comprising 10 grams (0.4 ounce) of bread with marmalade and chicory coffee.⁴

In May 1942, there were 424 Jews in Wolbórz, including 188 refugees. In a report dated May 5, 1942, the local JSS stated that there was no ghetto in Wolbórz. However, it noted: “Caution: over 80 percent of the Jews are living in Jewish houses [owned or occupied by Jews]. This month some families were resettled to Jewish houses. On average, up to seven persons share a room.”⁵

This resettlement most likely indicates the ghetto's establishment. Two survivors and brothers of the Judenrat chairman, Herman and Samuel Rosenblat, testified that the ghetto was open. Samuel described it as follows: “The only plus was that the ghetto was not enclosed with barbed wire, it was like a few streets designated for a ghetto, and we somehow could survive by bringing in some food.” Neither of the brothers refers to any punishment being imposed for leaving the ghetto or whether guards were posted around the perimeter. Herman stated, however, “We were not allowed to leave the immediate main square of the town.” As the ghetto's mailman, he was the only Jew permitted to go to the local post office to pick up the community's mail. The ghetto was overcrowded, with four to five families sharing a house.⁶

The ghetto was liquidated at the beginning of October 1942. Its residents were transferred to the Piotrków Trybunalski ghetto, which was liquidated in turn on October 15–21, 1942. Many of its residents, including most of the Jews from Wolbórz, were sent to the Treblinka extermination camp.

SOURCES References to the Wolbórz ghetto can be found in Krzysztof Urbański, Zagłada Żydów w dystrykcie radomskim (Kraków: Wydawnictwo Naukowe AP, 2004), p. 185; and Adam Rutkowski, “Martyrologia, walka i zagłada ludności żydowskiej w dystrykcie radomskim podczas okupacji hitlerowskiej,” BŻIH, nos. 15–16 (1955): 102, 142 (table 4), 169–170.

Archival sources include USHMM (Acc.1999.A.0154 [AJDC], 210/732; Acc.1997.A.0124 [JSS], 211/798, 211/1127–1130) and VHF (# 00781 and 10740).

Jolanta Kraemer

NOTES

1. USHMM, Acc.1997.A.0124 (JSS), 211/1128 (Wolbórz), pp. 3–5; and 211/1130 (Wolbórz), p. 19.

2. Rejestr miejsc i faktów zbrodni popełnionych przez okupanta hitlerowskiego na ziemiach polskich w latach 1939–1945: Województwo piotrkowskie (Warsaw: Główna Komisja Badania Zbrodni Hitlerowskich w Polsce, 1983), p. 147; VHF, # 10740, testimony of Herman Rosenblat, 1996; # 00781, testimony of Samuel Rosenblat, 1995; USHMM, Acc.1999.A.0154 (AJDC), 210/732 (Wolbórz), p. 2; Acc.1997.A.0124 (JSS), 211/798 (Piotrków Trybunalski), pp. 4–5; 211/1128, pp. 3–5, 17–19; and 211/1130, p. 7.

3. USHMM, Acc.1997.A.0124 (JSS), 211/1127 (Wolbórz), p. 2; 211/798, pp. 4–5.

4. Ibid., Acc.1999.A.0154 (AJDC), 210/732, p. 2; 211/1128, p. 29; 211/1129 (Wolbórz), p. 19; 211/1130, pp. 14–15, 19.

5. Ibid., Acc.1997.A.0124 (JSS), 211/1130 (Wolbórz), p. 19.

6. VHF, # 00781; # 10740.

WYŚMIERZYCE

Pre-1939: Wyśmierzyce, town, Kielce województwo, Poland; 1939–1945: Wysmierzyce, Kreis Radom-Land, Generalgouvernement; post-1998: Wyśmierzyce, województwo mazowieckie, Poland

Wyśmierzyce is located 45 kilometers (28 miles) northwest of Radom, on the Pilica River. On the outbreak of World War II, approximately 150 Jews were residing in the town.¹

Soon after the start of the German occupation in September 1939, the Jews of Wyśmierzyce became subject to the anti-Jewish legislation enforced throughout the Generalgouvernement. A Judenrat was established to represent the local Jewish community. According to available sources, its activities were very modest, largely limited to relaying the orders of the occupiers to the community. In the spring of 1940, Wyśmierzyce was one of the few localities in Distrikt Radom where the Judenrat apparently was not engaged in running welfare activities.²

In 1940–1941, the number of Jews in Wyśmierzyce rose significantly. The Germans sent about 40 Jewish families from Przytyk to Wyśmierzyce when the Jews of Przytyk were resettled in March 1941 to make way for the construction of an airfield.³ In addition, numerous refugees from nearby localities in Distrikt Warschau (primarily Mogielnica and Przybyszewo) settled in the town. Their influx was due to the conviction among many Jews that Wyśmierzyce was a relatively “safe” place, as the German police visited the town only rarely. Local Jews were still able to sustain themselves by peddling, running retail stores and workshops, or selling their labor to local Poles in exchange for food.⁴ Available sources imply that by the end of 1941 the number of Jews in Wyśmierzyce had reached 500. At that time, a branch of the Jewish Social Self-Help (JSS) existed in Wyśmierzyce, most likely administered by Symcha Tenenbaum, Henoch Grynfarb, and Motek Bryner.⁵

A ghetto was established in Wyśmierzyce during the last days of May 1942. It included the following streets (present names): Zdrojowa, Wojska Polskiego, and Piotr Skarga, as well as the eastern side of the Market Square (Rynek), encompassing an area of approximately 2 hectares (5 acres). At that time there were 900 Jews in the ghetto, presumably including additional Jews brought in from the surrounding villages. Some of the Jews were forced to find shelter in cowsheds and barns. Sanitary conditions in the ghetto were simply disastrous, resulting in an outbreak of typhus.⁶ It is not known whether at the time of the ghetto’s establishment a Jewish police force was also organized. On June 15, the Jewish quarter was completely sealed: not a single Jew was permitted to leave the ghetto—not even temporarily. Poles were forbidden to enter the ghetto. A few days later the Germans took numerous able-bodied men from the ghetto to one of the labor camps in Distrikt Radom. As a result of this roundup, the number of people unable to sustain themselves rose to 700.⁷ Conditions in the ghetto continued to deteriorate until around August 20, when all of the ghetto’s residents were deported to the Białobrzegi ghetto.

From there, they were driven subsequently to the train station in Dobieszyn, from which they were sent to the extermination camp in Treblinka.⁸

Just before the transfer of the Jews from Wyśmierzyce to the Białobrzegi ghetto, Dr. Heling turned to the secretary of the municipality, Hieronim Sochaczewski, asking for help. A few days later, Sochaczewski provided Dr. Heling with Aryan papers for himself, his wife, and his daughter, with roughly the right ages for the family, but bearing the names of people who were deceased. Sochaczewski then hid the Helings for several days, before assisting them in their escape across the Pilica River to another town, where they survived until the arrival of the Red Army in September 1944. In 1986, Sochaczewski was recognized by Yad Vashem as Righteous Among the Nations.

SOURCES The main published source regarding conditions in the Wyśmierzyce ghetto is Sebastian Piątkowski, “Pomoc społeczna i działalność charytatywna w gettach dystryktu radomskiego (1939–1942),” in Marek Przeniosło, ed., Dobroczynność i pomoc społeczna na ziemiach polskich w XIX, XX i na początku XXI wieku (Kielce, 2008), pp. 172–177. The ghetto is also mentioned in Czesław Pilichowski et al., eds., Obozy hitlerowskie na ziemiach polskich 1939–1945: Informator encyklopedyczny (Warsaw: PWN, 1979), p. 578.

Relevant documentation can be found in the following archives: APR; AŻIH (211/430, 1138 [JSS]); IPN; and YVA.

Sebastian Piątkowski
trans. Jolanta Kraemer

NOTES

1. Adam Rutkowski, “Martyrologia, walka i zagłada ludności żydowskiej dystryktu radomskiego podczas okupacji hitlerowskiej,” BŻIH, nos 15–16 (1955): 160.

2. See Piątkowski, “Pomoc społeczna,” pp. 172–177.

3. Krzysztof Urbański, Zagłada Żydów w dystrykcie radomskim (Kraków, 2004), p. 141; Adam Rutkowski, “The War and the Destruction of the Jewish Population in the Radom Region” (trans. Jerrold Landau), in Przytyk Memorial Book (translation of Sefer Przytyk, ed. David Shtokfish [Tel Aviv: Przytyk Societies in Israel, France, and the USA, 1973]), p. 257.

4. AŻIH, 211/430.

5. Ibid.

6. Ibid.; Tadeusz Rostkowski, “Społeczeństwo Wyśmierzyce w latach 1939–1945,” in 650 lat Wyśmierzyce (Wyśmierzyce, 1988), p. 110.

7. AŻIH, 211/430.

8. Pilichowski et al., Obozy hitlerowskie, p. 578.

ŻARKI

Pre-1939: Żarki, town, Kielce województwo, Poland; 1940–1944: Żarki, Kreis Radomsko, Distrikt Radom, Generalgouvernement; post-1998: Żarki, województwo śląskie, Poland

Żarki is located on the Warta River, 26 kilometers (16 miles) southeast of Częstochowa. In 1939, 2,656 Jews lived in Żarki.

On the outbreak of World War II, many buildings in Żarki were destroyed by German bombardments. More than 150 people, including about 100 Jews, were killed. Many inhabitants tried to flee, but most were forced to return. Żarki was occupied on September 4. That day, about 1,000 Jews were ordered to gather on the central square where they were kept for hours, and some were subsequently shot. In the first weeks of occupation, a number of Jews were arrested as hostages, and one of the Jewish study centers was burned down.

Under German occupation, a known antisemite, Kovalik, became mayor of the town. Jewish houses had to be marked with the word “Jude” (Jew), Jews were not allowed to trade with non-Jews, and Jewish men were drafted for forced labor, especially to clean the streets of rubble.¹

By the end of April 1940, a Jewish Council (Judenrat) had been established in Żarki. The chairman was Yisrael Bornstein (who also was in charge of the Jewish Police), the secretary was I. Wolhendler,² and the chairman of the labor office was Moshe Rothstein. In April, the Judenrat reported on the situation of the Jews in Żarki. Of the 3,500 Jews there, most were craftsmen such as shoemakers or bootmakers. Many Jewish families had lost their homes, and there were only limited funds to help the homeless or hungry. A soup kitchen provided 300 meals per day. Jews performed forced labor, cleaning and repairing streets and squares, and Jews who owned horses had to work for local farmers. A Jewish physician, Dr. Margulies, took care of the sick and elderly.³ To ease the burden on the community, wealthier Jews were taxed, and the money was used as a relief fund, to pay “contributions” or to bribe German officials.

In May 1940, Żarki became part of Kreis Radomsko, in Distrikt Radom within the Generalgouvernement. The new Kreishauptmann imposed a “fine” of 40,000 złoty on the Jewish community, which stretched its financial reserves to the limit.⁴ On June 26, 1940, the Jewish Council reported to the

A group of Jewish men and youth from Żarki march to a forced labor site carrying shovels, June 20, 1940.

USHMM WS #16501, COURTESY OF LEAH HAMMERSTEIN SILVERSTEIN

American Jewish Joint Distribution Committee (AJDC) that due to lack of funds the soup kitchen had to be closed, and there was almost no money left to support the refugees. Almost all Jewish businesses had been liquidated, and unemployment was rising. Starvation increasingly became a problem. To help out, the AJDC sent food and clothing in August, including 100 kilograms (220 pounds) of rice, 192 kilos (423 pounds) of flour, and 200 cans of condensed milk.⁵

In the summer of 1940, about 200 Jews from Żarki were drafted for forced labor: about 50 of them on irrigation projects for the Water Regulation Company in Częstochowa.⁶ In October 1940, the labor office in Częstochowa sent 73 Jews to a forced labor camp in Przyrów and planned to send more. Some 50 Jews also worked for the chemical plant in Brieg; 50 more worked in town, cleaning rubble; and an unknown number worked in regulating the Leśniówka River. Some Jews received a regular salary and others did not, relying instead on support from the Judenrat, raised from Jews who paid for substitutes.⁷

The dire financial situation of the Żarki Jewish community was exacerbated by the constant influx of refugees. About 250 refugees arrived from Płock after being deported from there at the end of February 1941. The Jewish community had to provide them with food, housing, and clothing. The Judenrat and the local chapter of the Society for the Protection of the Health of the Jewish Population in Poland (TOZ) were also in charge of administering medical aid for forced laborers from Wodzisław kept in Żarki and for forced laborers from Żarki in the camp in Przyrów.⁸ Facing all these expenses, the Judenrat repeatedly turned to the AJDC for financial help to reopen the soup kitchen and to keep the outpatient hospital running.⁹

In the spring of 1941, a group of young Jews, probably all members of the Ha-Shomer Ha-Za'ir, established a farm on formerly Jewish-owned fields near Żarki. The 14-hectare (35-acre) farm was meant to provide unpaid vocational training in agriculture for about 25 adolescents; the instructor was a Jewish farmer. The Jewish Council requested financial support for the project, mainly to buy tools and livestock.¹⁰ The farm, run by H. Bradys and M. Margulies, provided supplementary food for the Jews of Żarki, producing a wide variety of vegetables and fruits. The farm had seven geese and two ponds with fish; fruit was harvested from 162 trees and 350 bushes. According to survivors' memoirs, even representatives of the German authorities who visited the farm were impressed by the Jews' obvious agricultural capabilities, which defied the Germans' antisemitic stereotypes. The farm continued to operate into 1942.¹¹

Information on the ghetto in Żarki is relatively sparse. Survivor accounts date the establishment of an open ghetto (Jewish residential area) on a few streets to the arrival of the Jews from Płock, which also led to overcrowding.¹² According to another account, following an outbreak of typhus in June 1941, local antisemites blamed the Jews for the disease and demanded the government isolate them. In response, the Kreishauptmann ordered that the “ghetto” in Żarki be enclosed by a fence and sealed off. However, with the aid of bribes, the Jewish Council managed to get this edict reversed. Nevertheless, by the fall of 1941, Jews were forbidden to leave their places of residence and were shot if caught outside the ghetto without permission. This shut down almost all Jewish trade, especially smuggling across the border with the Reich. Now only a few specialists received official passes to go to workplaces outside the ghetto. Hunger subsequently drove more Jews to ignore the prohibition, going to nearby villages in search of food. But many were caught and shot. On each occasion the Judenrat was informed and instructed to go and collect the body.¹³

At the end of 1941, there was a renewed typhus epidemic, resulting in a number of deaths. The small hospital the Jewish community had opened was unable to do much, as it lacked drugs and medical personnel. The German authorities' response was to order the Jewish community to improve sanitary conditions by erecting a public bathhouse.

In the late summer of 1942, the Żarki Jews were scared by rumors about the liquidation of ghettos in the area and the deportation of Jews to extermination camps. In their despair, they looked for alternatives like volunteering for forced labor camps, collecting money to bribe the German authorities, or erecting places to hide in town or outside in the forests around Żarki. In late September, news reached the community that Polish farmers with horses and wagons had been instructed to arrive in town on October 6, 1942. Based on reports from other communities, the Jews knew what this meant: the horse-drawn carriages would take them to a train station, and from there they would be sent to camps. Panic spread. Some Jews tried to flee to other towns and ghettos, but for many there was no escape. On October 6, about 800 Jews were assembled at the market square, while German SS and Police, Ukrainian auxiliaries, and Polish (Blue) Police searched the town for Jews in hiding; 23 were found and shot on the spot.¹⁴

Probably due to the specific situation in Żarki—the ghetto was unfenced—about 1,600 Jews were able to flee. Most of them fled to Pilica, where the expulsions had been completed. From the 800 Jews at the market square, about 30 were selected for labor. The others were driven to Żłoty Potok, the train station close to Żarki, and from there they were taken in freight cars to the Treblinka extermination camp.¹⁵

The 30 Jews held back were used to collect and sort Jewish property. Jews who had tried to escape the expulsion were caught and sent to ghettos in Pilica, Częstochowa, and Piotrków Trybunalski. The main collection ghetto for the area was in Radomsko, and many Żarki Jews were taken there. From all of these ghettos, the remaining Jews from Żarki were sent mainly to extermination camps in early 1943.¹⁶

SOURCES Relevant published sources concerning the fate of the Jewish community in Żarki during the Holocaust include the following: Y. Lador, ed., Kehilat Zarki; ayarah be-hayeha u-ve-kbilyonah (Tel Aviv: Former Residents of Zarki in Israel, 1959); Abraham Wein, Bracha Freundlich, and Wila Orbach, eds., Pinkas ha-kehillot. Encyclopaedia of Jewish Communities: Poland, vol. 7, Lublin and Kielce (Jerusalem: Yad Vashem, 1999), pp. 216–221; Krzysztof Urbański, Almanach gmin żydowskich województwa kieleckiego w latach 1918–1939 (Kielce: Muzeum Narodowe w Kielcach, 2007), pp. 172–175; and Krzysztof Urbański, Gminy żydowskie małe w województwie kieleckim w okresie międzywojennym (Kielce: Muzeum Narodowe w Kielcach, 2006), pp. 189–196. The Żarki ghetto is mentioned in Czesław Pilichowski et al., eds., Obozy hitlerowskie na ziemiach polskich 1939–1945: Informator encyklopedyczny (Warsaw: PWN, 1979), p. 597, no. 5812.

Relevant documentation on Żarki under German occupation can be found in AAN (202/III/7); AŻIH (210/752); BA-L (B 162/6221); USHMM (Acc.1999.A.0154 [AŻIH—AJDC], 210/752); VHF (e.g., # 9642, 28289, and 31493); and YVA.

Evelyn Zegenhagen and Samuel Fishman

NOTES

1. Lador, Kehilat Zarki, pp. 165, 231.
2. USHMM, Acc.1999.A.0154 (AŻIH—AJDC), 210/752, financial report of the Ältestenrat, 1940.
3. Ibid., report of Ältestenrat, April 1940.
4. Lador, Kehilat Zarki, p. 166.
5. USHMM, Acc.1999.A.0154, 210/752, various correspondence dated June 26 (Rechenschaftsbericht), July, and August 9, 1940.
6. Ibid., report for August and September 1940.
7. Ibid., report, October 1940.
8. Ibid., report of local TOŻ chapter for 1940.
9. Ibid., Ältestenrat to AJDC, January 29, 1941, and TOŻ chapter to AJDC in Kraków, February 5, 1941.
10. Lador, Kehilat Zarki, p. 169; USHMM, Acc.1999.A.0154, 210/752, correspondence of May 16 and June 12, 1941.
11. USHMM, Acc.1999.A.0154, 210/752; and Lador, Kehilat Zarki, p. 170.
12. VHF, # 28289, testimony of Joseph Dauman; # 9642, testimony of Eli Zborowski (uses the term “residential area”).
13. Lador, Kehilat Zarki, pp. 240–243.
14. Wein, Freundlich, and Orbach, Pinkas ha-kehillot: Poland, vol. 7, Lublin and Kielce, p. 219.
15. Jacek Andrzej Młynarczyk, Żudenmord in Zentralpolen: Der Distrikt Radom im Generalgouvernement 1939–1945 (Darmstadt: Wissenschaftliche Buchgesellschaft, 2007), pp. 269, 302; BA-L, B 162/6221, pp. 1612 ff.
16. Młynarczyk, Żudenmord in Zentralpolen, pp. 276–277; BA-L, B 162/6221, p. 1534; AAN, 202/III/7, vol. 2, p. 11.

ŻARNÓW

Pre-1939: Żarnów, village, Łódź województwo, Poland; 1939–1945: Żarnow, Kreis Tomaszów, Distrikt Radom, Generalgouvernement; post-1998: Żarnów, Łódź województwo, Poland

Żarnów is located 22 kilometers (14 miles) southwest of Opoczno. There were 919 Jews living in the village in 1921; by 1937 their number had risen to 1,129.

Established by the German authorities, the Jewish Council (Judenrat) included Abram Wajnberg (chairman), a shoemaker and former president of the Jewish community in Żarnów; Nuchym Lipling (deputy); and K. Nuemiller (office manager).

By January 1941, 1,494 refugees and deportees had settled in the village. A self-help committee was established on February 2, 1941, taking over the provision of social assistance by the Judenrat, including the operation of the soup kitchen, which was managed by a man named Dobraszklanka. The committee was chaired by the dentist Rachmil Klajnert and included Aron Turko (deputy), Jakub Zacharjasz (treasurer), Rubin Kuszer, and Chaim Husytowski. The three members of the committee's oversight commission were Rabbi Alter Gotszalk and the Judenrat leaders Wajnberg and Lipling.¹

The number of refugees rose to 1,643 following the arrival of 266 Jews from Płock on March 17, 1941. In April, a refugee from Płock with the first name of Felicja described her situation in Żarnów: "Very many people live like I do: for breakfast, black bread and coffee with saccharin, [and for] dinner 10 groszy [meal at the soup kitchen], for supper just like breakfast. . . . Sanitary conditions are calamitous, vermin is everywhere. The housing question is a headache only for those who have no money."

In May 1941, approximately 35 Jews were sent to a labor camp in Dęblin, where the Germans were expanding an airfield.²

In July 1941, out of an estimated 2,500 Jews residing in Żarnów, 1,500 were newcomers from Mława, Tomaszów Mazowiecki, Płock, and other localities. As diseases were already spreading, the head doctor for the Kreis ordered Żarnów's Jews to establish an epidemic hospital by the end of July. Doctor Jan Singer, responsible for sanitation, stated in October 1941, "Typhus is spreading amongst deportees living in utter indigence." Soon after, the order was given to outfit the hospital with a total of 20 beds. The soup kitchen was closed to make room for the hospital but was reopened on November 11, 1941, after the Germans closed the hospital. The sick were then sent to a hospital in Opoczno. Out of 200 people who contracted typhus, 30 died by the end of December 1941.³

A branch of the Jewish Social Self-Help (JSS) was organized in the village in November 1941, staffed by Hersz Bromberg as chairman, Rachmil Klajnert, and Jakub Zacharjasz.⁴

By the end of January 1942, the Jews living in Żarnów had been ghettoized. On January 27, the JSS wrote to its Kraków headquarters: "As you know, the Jews are banned from leaving town. Accordingly . . . it is presently impossible to manage all affairs of the soup kitchen. . . . [A]ll efforts to buy produce for the soup kitchen, or straw and shoes for the poor, encountered enormous obstacles . . . even more so since none of the JSS members has any special permission [to leave the ghetto]." In February there were 2,200 Jews in the ghetto. In April 1942, still no one had permission to leave the town.⁵

This restriction, however, was most likely poorly enforced until shortly before the ghetto's liquidation in October 1942. Two sisters, Helen and Halina Zimm, whose families found refuge in Żarnów in 1940, do not describe it as a ghetto. Helen even testified: "luckily it was not a ghetto."⁶ Pinkas ha-kehillot states that it was officially an unfenced area that was designated as Jewish; however, a number of Jews continued to live in other sections of the village. This lasted until September 1942, about one month before the liquidation.

The date the Jewish Police was organized is unknown; however, in February 1942, one of its tasks was to collect taxes—"often employing force"—imposed by the Judenrat. The monthly tax at the time ranged from 700 to 900 złoty. The kitchen continued its services (e.g., in April 1942 for 350 people), and some recipients were charged 10 groszy per meal.

On the orders of the Arbeitsamt (labor office), 50 of Żarnów's poorer Jews and refugees were daily performing public works in Opoczno in the spring of 1942. Jewish laborers reportedly also worked in agriculture, on road construction, and in workshops organized by the Judenrat.⁷

In May 1942, the German authorities arrested Judenrat head Wajnberg and several other community leaders. After an 11-day questioning they were shot in a forest near Opoczno. Hillel Zachariash (Zacharjasz) became the new Judenrat chairman. Among the victims was most likely Rachmil Klajnert, whom the JSS acknowledges at the time as being "deceased." As of June 1942, Chaim Husytowski was the JSS chairman. In the summer of 1942, a number of Jews from the ghetto were sent to the Janowska labor camp on the outskirts of Lwów.⁸

The last information about the ghetto comes from the JSS report for September 1942 (dated October 2, 1942). In a section referring to changes happening in the ghetto within the reporting period, the JSS noted: "Resettlement of Jews living until now in non-Jewish houses to Jewish-owned houses." The document reports 2,025 Jews in the Żarnów ghetto.⁹ Helen Zimm testified that at the end of September the community learned about the planned resettlement to labor camps.¹⁰

The ghetto was liquidated in the second half of October 1942. Prior to this, more Jews from surrounding villages were brought in (e.g., 300 Jews from Marcinków-Machory on October 5, 1942, and possibly 300 Jews from the Skórkowice ghetto) as well as a few families from Siucice (where most of the Jewish population had already been sent to the Skórkowice ghetto in January 1942).¹¹ According to Florian Mayerski, his family was marched to the Żarnów ghetto just one day before its Jews were deported to the Opoczno ghetto. The next morning at dawn, the Germans forcefully gathered Żarnów's Jews in the market. Many elderly and disabled Jews were shot either on their way there or in their apartments. In the course of a selection, the Germans asked those with professional backgrounds to identify themselves. Approximately 50 people, including the chairman of the Judenrat, were held back, while the remainder were taken to Opoczno on trucks. The Opoczno ghetto was liquidated on October 27, 1942, when its residents were deported to the Treblinka extermination camp.

Mayerski, who was a member of the cleanup Kommando, estimated that they buried about 30 corpses at the Jewish cemetery in Żarnów. The Kommando lived on the grounds of the ghetto. Some Jews escaped; others were most likely transferred to the Ujazd ghetto in December 1942 or January 1943.¹²

SOURCES The following publications make reference to the fate of the Jewish community of Żarnów during the Holocaust: Krzysztof Urbański, Zagłada Żydów w dystrykcie radomskim (Kraków: Wydawnictwo Naukowe AP, 2004), pp. 132, 185; Adam Rutkowski, "Martyrologia, walka i zagłada ludności żydowskiej w dystrykcie radomskim podczas okupacji hitlerowskiej,” BŻIH, nos. 15–16 (1955): 155 (table 10), 177–178; Krzysztof Urbański, Almanach gmin żydowskich województwa kieleckiego w latach 1918–1939 (Kielce: Muzeum Narodowe w Kielcach: FPHU “XYZ,” 2007), p. 177; and Danuta Dabrowska and Abraham Wein, eds., Pinkas ha-kehillot. Encyclopaedia of Jewish Communities: Poland, vol. 1, Lodz and Its Region (Jerusalem: Yad Vashem, 1976), pp. 104–105.

Relevant archival sources include AŻIH (210/754, 211/969, 211/1039, 211/1173–1175, Ring I/573); USHMM (Acc.1999.A.0154 [AJDC]; Acc.1997.A.0124 [JSS]; RG-15.079 [Ring I]); and VHF (# 19079, 19208, and 47850).

Jolanta Kraemer

NOTES

1. USHMM, Acc.1999.A.0154 (AJDC), 210/754 (Żarnów), pp. 3–5; Acc.1997.A.0124 (JSS), 211/1173 (Żarnów), pp. 3–4; 211/1174 (Żarnów), p. 2; and 211/1175 (Żarnów), pp. 9, 25.
2. Ibid., RG-15.079, Ring I/537, pp. 1–4; Acc.1999.A.0154 (AJDC), 210/754, pp. 9–10; Acc.1997.A.0124 (JSS), 211/1173, pp. 12, 14, 25.
3. Ibid., pp. 8, 29; 211/1174, pp. 1, 24, 26, 34, 38–39; and 211/1175, p. 1.
4. Ibid., 211/1174, p. 29.
5. Ibid., 211/1175, pp. 9–10, 12, 21.
6. VHF, # 19079, testimony of Helen Zimm, 1996; # 19208, testimony of Halina Zimm, 1996.
7. USHMM, Acc.1997.A.0124 (JSS), 211/1175, pp. 12, 30; VHF, # 19079.
8. USHMM, Acc.1997.A.0124 (JSS), 211/1039 (Tomaszów Mazowiecki), pp. 62–63; and 211/1175, pp. 46, 53.
9. Ibid., 211/1175, pp. 61–64.
10. VHF, # 19079.
11. Ibid., # 47850, testimony of Florian Mayerski, 1998; USHMM, Acc.1997.A.0124 (JSS), 211/969 (Skórkowice), pp. 31–32.
12. VHF, # 47850.

ZAWICHOST

Pre-1939: Zawichost, town, Kielce województwo, Poland; 1939–1945: Kreis Opatow, Distrikt Radom, Generalgouvernement; post-1998: województwo świętokrzyskie, Poland

The town of Zawichost is located on the left bank of the Vistula River, 17 kilometers (11 miles) northeast of Sandomierz.

When the Germans captured Zawichost on September 9, 1939, they found about 1,500 Jews in the town. The large-scale plunder of Jewish houses started immediately, and all Jewish stores were forced to close.

In early 1940, the Germans established a Jewish Council (Judenrat) in the town, nominating merchant Chaim Josef Kirszenbaum as chairman and Arnold Węgrzyn as his deputy. The Judenrat's main tasks were to organize forced labor and collect the “contributions” imposed by the Germans. As a first contribution, the Germans demanded 50,000 złoty, threatening to kill the entire community if the demand was not met. The successive contributions soon impoverished the Jews.

One day, Kirszenbaum tried to explain to the Gendarmes, who came frequently from Sandomierz, that the Jews had run out of money. They took him out of his house and beat him. Despite such episodes, the members of the Judenrat generally had a good relationship with the Gendarmes. Jewish merchants even traded with Wehrmacht soldiers returning from France to obtain items they could resell for a profit.¹

At the start, the Germans simply rounded up whomever they could catch for forced labor; later it was obligatory for all men aged between 16 and 60. The better-off Jews could avoid service by paying money to the Judenrat in return for a falsified document stating that they had performed such labor. Jews were forced to drain nearby fields and repair the levees on the banks of the Vistula River.

With the assistance of the American Jewish Joint Distribution Committee (AJDC) based in Kraków, the Judenrat sought to supply laborers with shoes and clothes. In August 1940, about 200 young and healthy Jews were sent to newly established labor camps in Distrikt Lublin, including one at Bełżec. There, they worked to fortify the banks of the Bug River (the border with the Soviet Union) and also improved highways as a part of the so-called Otto Program.²

In September 1939, approximately 200 Jews arrived in Zawichost, having fled from settlements to the west. In addition, about 130 Jews from Łódź, Kalisz, and Tarnobrzeg were resettled to Zawichost in November 1939. In December 1940, on German instructions, the Judenrat in Radom forced about 2,000 Jews to relocate to smaller towns. Approximately 100 were transferred to Zawichost without luggage or money. The Judenrat in Zawichost tried in vain to obtain money from Radom's Judenrat to assist these deportees. The Judenrat in Radom, which intentionally enlisted its own poor for resettlement, insisted that the Zawichost community treat these Jews like the other refugees and provide for them themselves.

The refugees and expellees received some assistance from the AJDC in Kraków; however, they claimed that due to the Judenrat's corruption, only a small fraction of the aid reached the intended recipients. Whenever Zawichost's indigent Jews spoke up for themselves, however, they were told “to eat stones” and “leave the Judenrat office.” In June 1940, desperate deportees described the situation to the AJDC, requesting that a special envoy be sent. The envoy inspected local conditions in December 1940. In March 1941, the Judenrat estimated there were 300 deportees in Zawichost; by April this number had risen to 400.³

To cope with the growing number of deportees, the Jewish Social Self-Help (JSS) organization was established in Kraków. The Kreis committee, with its headquarters in Opatów, was established on December 16, 1940. The Zawichost branch was founded in June 1941. The chairman of the Judenrat, Kirszenbaum, and his deputy Węgrzyn, proposed that they should also be in charge of the local JSS. The Kraków headquarters approved their appointment. Fajwel Szulman was the third member of the committee. After five months, in November 1941, the committee established a soup kitchen for the deportees and local poor that distributed 200 meals per day.

After their invasion of the Soviet Union in June 1941, the German military left the town. Authority was exercised by German Gendarmes, the SS, and collaborating Polish policemen. A 6:00 p.m. curfew was imposed on the Jews. At night, the Gendarmes enforced the blackout with raids. Whenever they found an open shutter, they arrested the inhabitants of the house and held them at the Gendarmerie station for the night. When the Germans demanded further contributions, they would take members of the Judenrat hostage and demand the goods be delivered within one or two hours.

In the summer of 1941, the Germans ordered the establishment of the Jewish Police (Jüdischer Ordnungsdienst). At first, it consisted of seven men charged with maintaining order in the Jewish neighborhood. They also collected fines demanded by the Judenrat from those who avoided forced labor or who refused to house deportees.

In November 1941, on German orders, the Judenrat collected all fur items from the town's Jews. A ghetto had not yet been established, but now Zawichost's Jews were not permitted to leave the town limits or ride in wagons. The German post office also started refusing to process Jewish shipments. A special department, affiliated with the regular post, was set up to manage the Jewish post.

In 1941, more men were sent to the labor camps in Distrikt Lublin. One of the prisoners from Zawichost escaped from the Bełżec labor camp after only six weeks. Physically broken, he weighed only 32 kilos (70.5 pounds). According to one testimony, pressured by the families of other youths sent there, Judenrat members went to Bełżec and successfully secured the return of the Jews from Zawichost. On their return in early 1942, the Judenrat enlisted the same men for work in the Hugo Schneider AG (HASAG) ammunition labor camp in Skarżysko-Kamienna. Jewish and Polish (Blue) Police conducted the roundup.⁴ A second group of Jews was sent to Skarżysko in the summer of 1942.

Overcrowding, combined with poor diet and hygiene, led to outbreaks of typhus, dysentery, and tuberculosis. Sanitation Commission records show that 25 Jews were treated for typhus in 1940 and 18 in 1941, resulting in the death of three patients. These numbers, however, do not reflect reality. According to health regulations, all cases of typhus had to be isolated immediately at the epidemic hospital in Sandomierz. Jews infected with typhus did not want to go to the hospital, asking to be left at home. Many of them did not receive any medical treatment. In the spring of 1942, the JSS in Zawichost requested 2,000 vaccinations for typhus and dysentery (but such a large amount could only be obtained on the black market).

Medical care in Zawichost was dispensed by Dr. Hugo Weiss, who treated Jews free of charge. In May 1942, a free dental clinic was also set up, run by Dr. Abraham Miller.

The JSS records show that 10 children were born in 1941 and 27 Jews died. In February 1942, 80 craftsmen were still running their own workshops—most of them as shoemakers and tailors. At this time there were 2,035 Jews living in Zawichost.

From January 20, 1942, the JSS fed breakfast to poor and orphaned children aged between 2 and 10. Initially, it served bread and sweetened chicory coffee to over 50 children a day.

In February 1942, the JSS reported that 829 kilograms (1,828 pounds) of potatoes had spoiled due to frost damage. The soup kitchen was unable to continue serving meals without potatoes. To illustrate the loss: in that month the kitchen issued almost 5,800 dinners using 2,040 kilograms (4,497 pounds) of potatoes. The next most common ingredients were sour cabbage (260 kilograms [573 pounds]) and beets (155 kilograms [342 pounds]). The remaining few products amounted to less than 100 kilograms (220 pounds). In February 1942, 600 poor Jews applied for social help—but only 495 received it.

In the same month, an agriculture club associated with the JSS was established to sow all empty plots and squares in the Jewish quarter with vegetables and flowers. The official aim was to decorate the town; but clearly this was to supplement their diet. The club asked Kraków for 5 kilograms (11 pounds) of beet, carrot, and onion seeds. It also requested some garlic, rhubarb, chives, and 1 kilogram (2.2 pounds) of various flower seeds. In March, with Kraków's approval, the JSS began registering laborers for agricultural work. This reflected an effort to reconnoiter nearby estates to obtain employment opportunities for Zawichost's Jews. There was also a plan to provide interest-free loans. However, these plans were never implemented.

In May 1942, Kreishauptmann Ritter in Opatów ordered the concentration of all Jews in the Kreis into only five towns (including Zawichost) and 12 settlements by the end of the month. All of these places were recognized as ghettos starting June 1, 1942. The order was in preparation for the total expulsion of Jews from the region.

The Jews who lived in the other parts of Zawichost were forced to resettle into the ghetto. It consisted of four small streets: Głęboka, Ostrowiec, Bóźnicza, and Berek Joleslewicz. The Judenrat supervised the transfer of the newcomers.⁵ A Jew with a Paraguayan passport was also forced into the ghetto with his family despite his objections. The penalty for leaving the ghetto was death. Right after the establishment of the ghetto, its Jewish population numbered 2,145, of which 692 were deportees (another source states that there were 3,000 inhabitants).⁶

The second stage of concentrating the Jews in Kreis Opatów began in August 1942. Jews from Vienna, Annopol, Modliborzyce, Zaklików, Janów Lubelski, and other settlements were now crammed into the ghetto. As a result, the number of the ghetto's inhabitants more than doubled, rising to 5,000.⁷

The Jews in Zawichost were aware of other towns in the region being cleared of their Jewish populations. Most believed that if they worked for the Germans, they would be spared from the deportation. Those who were not working sought employment. In anticipation of the forthcoming deportation, a considerable number of Jews hid in underground bunkers within the ghetto, with Polish farmers, or in the surrounding forests.

The Germans liquidated the Zawichost ghetto on October 29, 1942. According to a secondhand account, SS troops and Ukrainian auxiliaries surrounded the town at 4:00 A.M. Klaxons were sounded, and the town's Jews were ordered to gather at the market square, leaving their doors and windows opened. The dilatory, old, and sick were shot in their houses. Accompanied by beatings and shootings, the Germans and their collaborators drove approximately 5,000 Jews about 10 kilometers (6 miles) to the nearest train station in Dwikozy. About 40 Jews were killed during the march. The rest were loaded on railcars and sent to the Bełżec extermination camp.⁸

About 80 Jewish policemen and young men remained in Zawichost to clean up and bury the dead. The deserted ghetto was stripped of its most valuable objects, which were initially stored in the Zawichost synagogue and then later sent to Germany. During the looting, several people were discovered hiding, all of whom were murdered. Two days after the ghetto's liquidation, the members of the cleanup Kommando were attached to a transport of Jews deported from Sandomierz, Klimontów, and Koprzywnica.⁹

It is estimated that about 200 Jews were killed in Zawichost during the course of the ghetto's liquidation. Their bodies were buried at the Jewish cemetery. A few months later a special detachment arrived, dug out the corpses, and burned them.¹⁰

SOURCES Much information on the life and destruction of Zawichost's Jews can be found in Abraham Wein, Bracha Freundlich, and Wila Orbach, eds., Pinkas ha-kehillot. Encyclopaedia of Jewish Communities: Poland, vol. 7, Lublin and Kielce (Jerusalem: Yad Vashem, 1999), pp. 190–192. Additional information for this article comes mainly from two publications: Krzysztof Urbański, Zagłada Żydów w dystrykcie radomskim (Kraków: Wydawnictwo Naukowe AP, 2004); and Adam Rutkowski, “Martyrologia, walka i zagłada ludności żydowskiej w dystrykcie radomskim podczas okupacji hitlerowskiej,” BŻIH, nos. 16–17 (1955).

Documentation on the fate of the Jewish community of Zawichost during the Holocaust can be found in the following archives: AŻIH (211/1153–1154 [JSS]; 210/744 [AJDC]; and 301/2016 [Relacje]); IPN (ASG); USHMM (Acc.1999.A.0154 [AJDC]; Acc.1997.A.0124 [JSS]; and RG-15.019M [IPN, ASG]); VHF (# 6825 and 1843); and YVA.

Jolanta Kraemer

NOTES

1. AŻIH, 301/2016, testimony of Zofia Zysman, 1946.
2. Ibid.; USHMM, Acc.1997.A.0124 (JSS), reel 52.
3. USHMM, Acc.1997.A.0124 (JSS), reel 52; Acc.1999.A.0154 (AJDC), 210/744.
4. AŻIH, 301/2016.
5. Ibid.
6. USHMM, Acc.1997.A.0124 (JSS), reel 52; RG-15.019M.
7. AŻIH, 301/2016.
8. Ibid.
9. Ibid.
10. See IPN, SOWr 271, p. 621 and several secondary sources. According to USHMM, RG-15.019M, however, only 20 Jews were killed in the town.

ENCYCLOPEDIA OF CAMPS AND GHETTOS, 1933–1945

ZWOLEŃ

Pre-1939: Zwoleń, town, Kielce województwo, Poland; 1939–1945: Zwolen, Kreis Radom-Land, Distrikt Radom, Generalgouvernement; post-1998: Zwoleń, województwo mazowieckie, Poland

The town of Zwoleń is located 30 kilometers (19 miles) east-southeast of Radom. In 1921, there were 3,787 Jews living there (51.2 percent of the total population).

By 1939 Zwoleń had 4,500 Jewish residents. A large part of the town was destroyed in the course of the September Campaign, forcing many Jewish families to move into makeshift huts.¹

The German authorities immediately instituted a regime of forced labor and extortion, including demands for monetary contributions. Jewish hostages numbering 200 to 300 were taken to Radom and Kielce; all of them were released and allowed to return home after one month. The Jews in Zwoleń were at first randomly rounded up for work; later, the Jewish Council (Judenrat) was charged with delivering the demanded quota of laborers. Work tasks consisted of cleaning snow off roads and attending to the needs of the German army and the Gendarmerie post.

Nuchim Wolman chaired the Judenrat; its secretary was Huberman. By September 1940, W. Kirszenberg had replaced Wolman. At the end of 1939, the Germans razed the local synagogue; the Jewish cemetery was leveled in 1942. In June 1940, an estimated 3,000 Jews were living in Zwoleń.²

In June 1941, a typhus epidemic broke out. Two hospital attendants, Jakób Breslauer and Kofman Ropoport, treated the sick in a Jewish hospital that had opened by August 1941 and was outfitted with 20 beds. By May 1942, when the epidemic was contained and the hospital closed, a total of 389 Jews had been treated for the disease. Ropoport, serving also as the chief of the sanitation committee in Zwoleń, reported that many Jews were suffering from skin diseases, mostly from scabies and sores.

The Sharfa family at forced labor in Zwoleń clearing away rubble, September 23, 1940.

USHMM WS #67994, COURTESY OF YIVO

In August 1941, there were 1,034 Jewish minors living in Zwoleń. In this group there were 439 children aged 7 to 14 years, and 77 of them were under 3 years old. There was no organized help for them.³

According to survivor Lejwa Fuks, the first roundup of males for transfer to labor camps took place in August 1941. One night, the entire Judenrat was arrested, only to be released the next morning by the Gendarmerie. As a result, 36 men were sent to the Pustków labor camp. Married men were soon released, while others escaped; the 2 laborers who remained in the camp were later released due to poor health.

In October 1941, a branch of the Jewish Social Self-Help (JSS) was established to take over from the Judenrat the organization of welfare. Following its launch, the local soup kitchen served over 600 meals to poor Jews daily and 250 breakfasts to children.

Mordka Blajchman (Bichman), the pre-war chairman of the Jewish community, was appointed as the JSS chairman; Lewi Izrael and Josek Kirszenbaum were also included on the committee. During the first six months of the kitchen's existence, 328 impoverished families received 116,376 meals. For over 85,000 meals, the JSS charged 30 groszy; the remainder of the meals were distributed free of charge.

According to Lejwa Fuks, at some point in 1941, Zwoleń's Jews were forbidden to walk the main street and the market square. Fuks dates the organization of the Jewish Police under the command of Mendel Weintraub to the same year.⁴

On January 2, 1942, Zwoleń's Jews reported to the JSS in Kraków that based on the order of the Kreishauptmann in Radom issued on December 22, 1942, a ghetto had already been established, and Jews from the vicinity were being transferred there. The Zwoleń ghetto was unfenced, but its residents were forbidden to leave the limits of the town. This ban prevented Jewish traders and peddlers, as well as those offering day-labor services, from making a living. The ghetto encompassed approximately 2 square kilometers (0.8 square mile); it was centrally located in a quarter populated by Jews before the war. The local Gendarmerie post was in charge of ghetto affairs.

Apart from those Jews who already lived within the ghetto limits, 50 Jewish families from Zwoleń's peripheries (known as Praga and Szosa Puławska) and also Jews from surrounding communities were transferred into the ghetto. The latter included Klwatka in the administrative gmina of Kuczki (39 people), Lucin (15), Podgóra (24), Janów in gmina Terów (47), Sobale (7), Ulianów (13), and 1 family from each of the following settlements: Helenówka, Grabów, Sucha, Strykowice, Bartodzieje, and Zielonka. Among the new ghetto inhabitants were also 115 Jews (24 families) who were transferred from the town of Przytyk, which had been depopulated of Jews as early as March 1941.

The JSS inquired about the possibilities of organizing a bachshara (youth training) and growing vegetables on the 2 hectares (5 acres) of land within the ghetto perimeter (of which 0.6 hectare [1.5 acres] consisted of adjacent garden plots). The 5 acres, however, were taken away from its Jewish owner and given to "a Christian deportee."

The local JSS estimated that at the time of the ghetto's creation in January 1942, there were 400 to 500 Jews from the city of Warsaw and other places in Distrikt Warschau living in Zwoleń illegally. With time their situation grew more serious, as Jews unable to present their Kennkarte (identity card) in March 1942 were "subject to the most severe retribution." Such was the case for many refugees from Łódź and Łuck, who were unable to obtain IDs due to severed postal connections or the destruction of archives in their native towns.⁵

In March 1942, the JSS estimated that there were 150 Jewish workshops in Zwoleń, of which only very few received significant production orders from the Germans. Most of them were for cobblers and tailors. Many ghetto residents were laboring in drainage and regulation of the Zwoleńka River.

In April 1942, 4,500 Jews inhabited the still-open ghetto. The largest groups of newcomers were from Łódź, Warsaw, and the gminas of Kuczki, Terów, and Zwoleń. There were 239 houses in the ghetto, consisting of 676 inhabited rooms; on average, 7 people shared a room.

Between January and June 1942, the German authorities reduced the area of the ghetto on two occasions. Following the second reduction in June, the JSS reported that "hundreds of families are under a naked sky, soaked through for four days. There is no hope of finding accommodation for them, because the streets in the ghetto are mostly not built up." The JSS planned to build barracks for the homeless at an estimated cost of 30,000 złoty.⁶

According to Fuks, 200 men were sent to the Skarżysko-Kamienna labor camp in July 1942. On August 1, 1942, another 130 men and 10 women were sent to Skarżysko, 35 men were dispatched to Dęblin, and 40 went to Kurów. Another survivor, Perec Szapiro, stated that 200 men were sent to Dęblin in August 1942 to build a railroad for the Schultz (Szulc) Company and another 100 to the Stawy village, where a labor camp was set up on the grounds of an ammunition magazine.⁷

In the summer of 1942, Zwoleń became one of the centers for the concentration of Jews in Kreis Radom-Land, before their deportation to the Treblinka extermination camp. On August 3, 1942, 1,200 Jews from the Janowiec nad Wisłą ghetto arrived. On August 20, 1942, 488 Jews from the liquidated Pionki ghetto were likewise transferred. Furthermore, on September 18, 1942, Jews from the ghettos of Jedlnia Kościelna and Garbatka-Letnisko were concentrated there.⁸

The Zwoleń ghetto was liquidated either on September 29, 1942, or sometime in October 1942. According to survivor Isaac Engel, the deportation from Zwoleń was announced several days in advance. A siren signaled that the Jews had to gather in the marketplace. From there, in batches of 500 people each, they were escorted by the Ukrainian auxiliary forces to a barbed-wire enclosure that had been set up at the Garbatka train station. All were sent to Treblinka.

An estimated 200 Jews were murdered in the course of the liquidation and were buried at the Jewish cemetery. Afterwards (probably in 1943 or 1944), a German detachment destroyed the bodies using "unknown chemicals." A small cleanup Kommando of approximately 90 people, including the chief of the Jewish Police, was left in Zwoleń to sort out Jewish belongings and was subsequently sent to Skarżysko-Kamienna.⁹

Estimates of the number of Jews gathered in the Zwoleń ghetto prior to its liquidation vary, depending on the source. The addition of the numbers given above—taken from primary archival sources—gives a maximum number of 6,500 Jews. A court inquiry about executions and mass graves in districts, provinces, camps, and ghettos conducted in Zwoleń in 1945 states that the ghetto had approximately 6,000 residents.¹⁰

Secondary sources, namely, the historian of Distrikt Radom, Adam Rutkowski, and others, estimate that 10,000 Jews were deported to Treblinka from Zwoleń. Rutkowski's numbers, however, do not add up, as in addition to the communities mentioned above as transferred to Zwoleń, Rutkowski states that 5,000 Jews from Gniewoszów, 2,000 Jews from Oblassy, 400 from Policzna, and 6,500 from Sarnów were also sent to Zwoleń. But in the case of Oblas (located 1 to 2 kilometers [0.6 to 1.2 miles] south of Przytyk), it does not appear that any Jews were living there in the summer of 1942, as all Jews were removed from there in the spring of 1941—as they were from Przytyk. The figure for Sarnów is also implausible, as it was just a tiny settlement about 1.5 kilometers (1 mile) south of Gniewoszów.

SOURCES Information regarding the Zwoleń ghetto can be found in the following sources: Krzysztof Urbański, Zagłada Żydów w dystrykcie radomskim (Kraków: Wydawnictwo Naukowe AP, 2004), pp. 169–172; Adam Rutkowski, “Martyrologia, walka i zagłada ludności żydowskiej w dystrykcie radomskim podczas okupacji hitlerowskiej,” BŻIH, nos. 15–16 (1955): 101, 156–160, 179–180; and Felicja Karay, Death Comes in Yellow: Skarżysko-Kamienna Slave Labor Camp (Amsterdam: Harwood Academic Publishers, 1997), p. 36.

The following archival sources were used to prepare this entry: AŻIH (211/1163 [JSS]; 210/750 [AJDC]; 301/8, 301/2474 [Relacje]); and USHMM (Acc.1997.A.0124 [JSS]; RG-15.019M [ASG]; RG-15.084 [Relacje]; and Acc.1999.A.0154 [AJDC]).

Jolanta Kraemer

NOTES

1. USHMM, Acc.1997.A.0124 (JSS), 211/1163 (Zwoleń), pp. 1, 52–53; and 211/1164 (Zwoleń), p. 45.
2. AŻIH, 301/2474, testimony of Lejwa Fuks, 1947; USHMM, Acc.1999.A.0154 (AJDC), 210/750, pp. 1, 6; Acc.1997.A.0124 (JSS), 211/1163, p. 23.
3. USHMM, Acc.1997.A.0124 (JSS), 211/1163, pp. 32, 34; and 211/1164, pp. 37, 39, 45, 52–54.
4. Gazeta Żydowska, May 8, 1942; USHMM, Acc.1997.A.0124 (JSS), 211/1163, pp. 48, 52; AŻIH, 301/2474.
5. USHMM, RG-15.019M (ASG), file 47, p. 101; Acc.1997.A.0124 (JSS), 211/1164, pp. 1, 8–11, 17–18, 25–26, 36, 45.
6. Ibid., RG-15.019M (ASG), file 47, p. 101; Acc.1997.A.0124 (JSS), 211/1164, pp. 30, 36, 45, 49.
7. AŻIH, 301/8, testimony of Perec Szapiro, 1944; 301/2474.
8. USHMM, Acc.1997.A.0124 (JSS), 211/1164, pp. 61, 67.
9. AŻIH, 301/2474; according to Fuks, the Jews from the Zwoleń ghetto were sent to Dęblin and then to Treblinka. Also see USHMM, RG-15.019M (ASG), file 47, p. 101; Isaac Engel, 1989, available at www.holocaustcenter.org.
10. USHMM, RG-15.019M (ASG), file 47, p. 101.

WARSAW REGION

Jews are led through the streets on their way to the railroad station during a deportation Aktion from the Siedlce ghetto, August 22-24, 1942. This is one of a series of clandestine photographs taken by a member of the Polish Home Army (AK) underground.

USHMM WS #18787, COURTESY OF IPN

WARSAW REGION (DISTRIKT WARSCHAU)

Pre-1939: parts of the Warsaw, Lublin, and Łódź województwa, Poland; 1941–1945: Distrikt Warschau, Generalgouvernement; post-1998: parts of the Łódź, Lublin, and Mazowieckie województwa, Poland

The German authorities established more than 60 ghettos in Distrikt Warschau. After the first ghettos were established in the Kreise to the west of Warsaw in the late spring and summer of 1940, a large wave of ghettoization accompanied the establishment of the Warsaw ghetto in October and November. The ghettos established to the west and south of Warsaw remained only short-lived, as more than 50,000 Jews from these Kreise were then concentrated in the Warsaw ghetto by April 1941. Further ghettos were established during 1941 in the Kreise to the east of Warsaw. Then in the spring of 1942, there was a further wave of resettlement to the Warsaw ghetto. After the start of deportations to the Treblinka extermination camp in July 1942, most of the remaining ghettos were liquidated in just a few months up to October. The Warsaw ghetto was the last to be liquidated in April 1943, in the face of bitter organized resistance by armed Jews, which lasted for several weeks into May.

The German authorities created Distrikt Warschau on October 26, 1939, as one of the four initial Distrikte of the Generalgouvernement, all of which were composed of parts of occupied Poland. In Distrikt Warschau, the German authorities initially created 10 Kreise (counties): Garwolin, Grojec, Lowicz, Minsk Mazowiecki, Ostrow Mazowiecka, Siedlce, Skierniewice, Sochaczew, Sokolow, and Warschau-Land, each governed by a Kreishauptmann. A Stadthauptmann governed the city of Warsaw.

The Distrikt's territory, which consisted of 16,860 square kilometers (6,510 square miles), was populated by more than 3 million people. According to a German estimate from July 1940, there were 540,000 Jews residing in the Distrikt (18 percent of the total population). This figure probably included tens of thousands of refugees and deportees, mainly from the Polish territories incorporated into Germany, who reached the Distrikt from late 1939, especially from Reichsgau Wartheland.

The chief German civil authority in the Distrikt was Gouverneur Dr. Ludwig Fischer. The SS and Police Leader (SSPF) was the senior police official in the Distrikt, subordinated to the Higher SS and Police Leader (HSSPF) of the Generalgouvernement, Friedrich Wilhelm Krüger. The position of SSPF in Distrikt Warschau was held initially by Paul Moder; he was succeeded by Arpad Wigand in August 1941; then Dr. Ferdinand von Sammern-Frankenegg took over in an acting capacity in July 1942, to be succeeded by Jürgen Stroop from late April until September 1943. The SSPF oversaw the forces of the Sicherheitspolizei (Sipo), comprising the Gestapo, Kripo, and SD, and also those of the Ordnungspolizei (Orpo), composed of Schutzpolizei in the cities and Gendarmerie posts in the rural areas. The relevant local civil administrators, especially the Kreishauptmänner, were generally in charge of ghetto affairs. Surveillance and order were in the hands of the German Sipo and Orpo forces, with Polish and Jewish police forces performing auxiliary duties under the Germans. Jewish policemen maintained order in the ghettos and guarded their internal borders, whereas Orpo forces and Polish (Blue) Police patrolled the external boundaries.

Assuming authority from the military on October 26, 1939, the German civil administration introduced a series of antisemitic laws, which deprived the Jews of their economic, cultural, and social rights, as well as imposing forced labor. The Germans ordered the establishment of Jewish Councils (Judenräte), holding the members responsible for the implementation of the authorities’ orders, including the selection of Jews for forced labor, the collection of taxes and “contributions,” the enforcement of sanitary regulations, and the organization of welfare and medical services. From late 1939, Jews were obliged to wear white armbands bearing the Star of David.

A mid-1930s portrait of SS-Gruppenführer Paul Moder, the first SS- und Polizeiführer of the Warsaw District.

USHMM/PHOTOGRAPHED FROM ERNST KIENAST (ED.), DER DEUTSCHE REICHSTAG 1936: III. WAHLPERIODE NACH DEM 30. JANUAR 1933; MIT ZUSTIMMUNG DES HERRN REICHSTAGSPRÄSIDENTEN (BERLIN: R. V. DECKER'S VERLAG, G. SCHENCK, 1936), P. 411

An unidentified SS-Obersturmführer interrogates two Jewish resistance fighters during the suppression of the Warsaw Ghetto uprising, April 19–May 16, 1943. The original German caption reads, “Jewish traitors.” Pictured in the background are the SS- und Polizeiführer for the Warsaw district, SS-Brigadeführer Jürgen Stroop and, holding an automatic weapon at right, police captain Erich Steidtmann. USHMM WS #26549, COURTESY OF NARA

The first ghettos in the Distrikt were established in Kreis Lowicz by May 1940. According to the personal report of the Kreishauptmann, Dr. Schwender, to the Generalgouverneur, Hans Frank, a ghetto was established in Łowicz due to the large influx of Jews from the Polish territories incorporated into the Reich and the resulting high incidence of typhus—some 200 cases in Łowicz—as well as the accompanying threat to security.¹ Around this time, five ghettos were established in Kreis Lowicz, the other four being in Łyszkowice, Kiernozia, Bolimów, and Głowno.²

On July 1, 1940, in response to SS orders giving the Jews of Mińsk Mazowiecki only 14 days to create a ghetto, the Jewish community petitioned the authorities to annul or defer the order. The Jews stressed the ruinous economic effects the order would wreak on the town’s Jewish craftsmen, laborers, and shopkeepers and the inevitable threat to hygiene throughout the town. The Jews, supported by some non-Jewish residents, requested a deferral of several months so that the necessary sanitary infrastructure could be prepared in the ghetto area.³

It appears that Kreishauptmann Dr. Bittrich in Mińsk Mazowiecki put on hold creation of the ghetto for several months, but in October, Waldemar Schön, the head of the Resettlement Department for the Distrikt, visited Mińsk Mazowiecki to choose the location of the ghetto, which was then established on November 15, 1940, the same day that resettlement into the Warsaw ghetto was completed.⁴

Already in November 1939, the Germans made a first attempt to establish a ghetto in Warsaw, which, however, soon was abandoned. Then in January 1940, Schön began detailed planning for the Warsaw ghetto. In the summer of 1940, an exclusion zone (Sperrgebiet) for the Jews was established, to which no additional Jews were permitted to move.⁵ On October 2, 1940, Gouverneur Fischer issued an official decree on the establishment of the Warsaw ghetto by the end of the month. As the resettlement could not be completed on time, the deadline for completing the resettlement was later extended to November 15.⁶ The borders of the ghetto were changed several times subsequently.

A considerable wave of ghetto formation accompanied the establishment of the Warsaw ghetto. In Kreis Warschau-Land, the Kreishauptmann established a number of ghettos. A small ghetto was created in Łomianki for 300 local Jews to move into by September 15, but despite bribes, it was liquidated again in November. Sixty people departed for the Włochy ghetto established in Fort Solipse, and 25 went to the Legionowo ghetto, also established on November 15, 1940. Most others fled independently to the Warsaw ghetto. The Jews left everything behind—resulting in terrible need and poverty.⁷ A larger ghetto was established in Otwock, where resettlement was completed by November 30. All the Jews of the Kreis living west of the Vistula were then concentrated in just four ghettos: Piaseczno, Włochy, Jeziorna, and Pruszków. From there they were transferred to the Warsaw ghetto in December and January 1941, as were the Jews of the Karczew ghetto, just east of the Vistula. Several open ghettos were also established in Kreis Garwolin in the fall of 1940.

By the end of 1940, six open ghettos had been established in Kreis Grojec, in Błędów, Tarczyn, Mogielnica, Góra Kalwaria, and Warka, as well as the Kreis center, Grójec. Reports from the Jewish aid committees in December mention the establishment of the ghettos in Tarczyn and Błędów.⁸ According to survivor Jerry Lista, the relocation to the ghetto in Góra Kalwaria was announced in the papers and on loudspeakers, and the Jews were given two to three days to move into the designated area. The Jews could take with them only the most necessary items.⁹ Then in January 1941, the Grojec Kreishauptmann, Zimmermann, ordered that all the Jews of the Kreis be concentrated in the six ghettos and that any Jew caught outside of a ghetto after January 27, 1941, would face the death penalty.¹⁰ This is the first example of such a shooting order, predating the similar order issued for the entire Generalgouvernement by nine months. Fear of the spread of typhus was given as a reason for these harsh restrictions, but they also served to concentrate the Jews of the Kreis in preparation for their deportation to the Warsaw ghetto shortly afterwards. In Błędów the Jews paid a renewed hefty “contribution” of 100,000 złoty in the hope that their expulsion would be deferred. But then on February 11, 1941, the Błędów Jews were marched or taken on carts to the railway station and put on trains to the Warsaw ghetto.¹¹

For Kreis Sochaczew, the Germans prepared a detailed timetable for the transfers to the Warsaw ghetto. The Jews of the Żyrardów ghetto, as well as those from Wiskitki and Mszczonów (where probably no ghettos were established), were to be transferred on February 1–9, 1941; then on February 10–14, the Jews from the Grodzisk Mazowiecki ghetto; on February 15–16, from the Sochaczew ghetto; and from the ghetto in Błonie on February 17, 18, and 19, 1941. The Żyrardów Jews received only 48 hours' notice and were permitted only 25 kilograms (55 pounds) of belongings on the train.¹²

The transfers from Kreise Lowicz and Skierniewice were spread over a longer period, permitting some Jews to organize the transportation of their belongings into the Warsaw ghetto. A few Jews even managed to arrange an orderly transfer to other locations in the Generalgouvernement, where ghettos had not yet been established. On March 4, 1941, the Kreishauptmann in Skierniewice reported that most of the Jews from the Skierniewice and Jeżów ghettos had moved “voluntarily” to Warsaw. In Skierniewice, only some 180 Jews remained; the Jews' removal had created a marked shortage of labor.¹³ On arrival in the Warsaw ghetto, most Jews from Jeżów were put into improvised hostels for refugees, where they encountered difficulties with hygiene and medical care and experienced numerous deaths from hunger.¹⁴ Following these transfers, in April 1941, the Kreise of Sochaczew, Grojec, and Lowicz (in which Skierniewice was now incorporated) were declared to be free of Jews other than in a few labor camps.

Most of these initial ghettos in Distrikt Warschau were open ghettos, especially those that remained short-lived. For example, the ghetto in Mogielnica was not enclosed by a fence, a wall, or any barbed wire. It consisted of two or three streets near the synagogue and the Bet Midrash.¹⁵ The Włochy ghetto was established in a nineteenth-century fortress (Fort Solipse) and in Pustelnik in the Henryków and Osinki brickyard, in houses for former factory workers and barracks, completely isolated from the Polish population. The Pustelnik ghetto initially remained “open” (people left to work outside), but early in 1941, the ghetto was declared closed, and Jews could leave only with a special permit. According to the local Jewish Social Self-Help (JSS) branch, this left the Jews “on the edge of destruction.” The borders of a number of ghettos were marked by signs that read: “Jewish Area: Entrance Forbidden for Poles and Germans” (Jüdische Gegend: Polen und Deutschen Eintritt verboten).¹⁶ Among the relatively few ghettos enclosed by a fence were those in Radzymin, Siedlce, and Wołomin.

Initially, Jews were punished with heavy fines and/or imprisonment for leaving the ghettos without special permission. As mentioned, from early in 1941, more severe penalties were introduced in some Kreise, as they were being cleared of Jews. By November 1941, as elsewhere in the Generalgouvernement, the death penalty was applied throughout the Distrikt, and many Jews were shot when caught smuggling or in hiding on the Aryan side. For example, in Sarnaki the open ghetto was sealed on January 1, 1942, to prevent the spread of disease. Initially Jews did not take the posted death penalty threat seriously and continued to sneak out to barter items. But in February, a Jewish woman and her one-year-old child caught in a nearby village were arrested and shot.¹⁷

With the exception of the Warsaw ghetto, which at its peak probably held some 460,000 Jews, most of the ghettos established throughout the Distrikt were relatively small, holding from only a few hundred up to around 4,000 people. A few larger ghettos were established, for example, in Siedlce (13,000), Otwock (12,000), Węgrów (9,000), Falenica (6,000), Sokołów Podlaski (6,000), and Mińsk Mazowiecki (5,000–6,000). Generally these ghettos were among the last to be liquidated.

The administration of welfare was transferred from the Jewish Councils to the JSS to help newcomers and the local poor. Its branches opened soup kitchens, distributed food and clothing, and sought to provide for children and the elderly. The level of assistance, due to insufficient funds, was never able to meet the needs. Consequently, there was frequent friction between the JSS branches and the Jewish Councils. JSS officials were replaced as unsuitable, and some Jewish Councils were accused of corruption, favoritism, or excessive subservience to German demands.

Poverty, hunger, overcrowding, and disease were common to all of the ghettos, but access to food from outside was somewhat easier in the smaller rural ghettos or even some medium-sized ghettos in Kreis Warschau-Land. Kosher butchers from the ghettos of Miłosna, Okuniew, and Rembertów were the main source of meat for the Warsaw ghetto, supplying up to 2,000 kilograms (4,410 pounds) per month with the help of Polish smugglers.¹⁸ Whereas in the Warsaw ghetto more than 60,000 Jews (about 15 percent) died of starvation, death rates in the smaller ghettos generally were not on this scale. In Sarnaki, in the winter of 1941–1942, reportedly 100 Jews died out of 1,180 (almost 9 percent). Ration cards were issued to Jews, for example, in Żelechów, at the end of 1940, for small portions of bread, sugar, flour, meat, and jam, as well as in Warsaw.¹⁹ These meager rations were insufficient to survive and supplementary food had to be obtained wherever possible.

After the initial wave of deportations from the Warthegau at the end of 1939 and in early 1940, Distrikt Warschau was not a major destination for German resettlements. In the summer of 1940, a number of Jews were sent to forced labor camps in Distrikt Lublin, but many of these Jews returned after a few months. In the late spring or summer of 1941, several hundred Jews from Nowy Dwór Mazowiecki (Regierungsbezirk Zichenau) were driven into the Distrikt. In the spring of 1942, four transports, each of around 1,000 Jews, arrived from Berlin, Theresienstadt, Hannover, and other places in the Reich to the Warsaw ghetto, where there were also a number of Jews who had converted to Christianity. Also deported to Distrikt Warschau were Roma and Sinti from Cologne and its environs; they were put in the Siedlce ghetto in the summer of 1942, along with local Roma.²⁰ Finally between February and early May 1943, more than 20,000 Jewish workers were deported from the Warsaw ghetto to the Trawniki, Poniatowa, and other labor camps in Distrikt Lublin.²¹

The process of concentrating most of the remaining Jews in ghettos in the eastern Kreise of Distrikt Warschau began in early 1941 and was completed in 1942. In Kreis Sokolow, the planned establishment of six, initially open, ghettos was announced in January 1941, but implementation lagged behind. It was not until November 1941 that many of the Jews from the surrounding villages were concentrated in these six ghettos.

Similar concentrations of Jews were carried out in Kreise Garwolin, Siedlce, and Minsk Mazowiecki, which also signaled a final wave of ghetto establishment in places such as Latowicz.²²

In the spring of 1942, a further wave of deportations to the Warsaw ghetto and ghetto consolidations commenced. In March Jews arrived in Warsaw from the nearby ghettos of Pustelnik, Okuniew, Miłosna, and Wawer. These expulsions occurred with considerable brutality, and a number of Jews were killed. In May 1942, the expulsion of the Tłuszcz Jews saw about 70 Jews shot during the roundup and 300 shot on the road to Radzymin, where they were loaded onto trains headed to Warsaw.²³ In May the Jews of the Sarnaki ghetto were sent to the ghettos in Łosice and Mordy.

The organization of the deportations in Distrikt Warschau was in the hands of SSPF Dr. Ferdinand von Sammern-Frankenegg, assisted by a special deportation unit organized by Commanding Officer of the Security Police and SD (KdS) Warschau. Among the officers who played a leading role was SS-Untersturmführer Karl Brandt. These local forces had to work closely with Sonderkommando Höfle (led by SS-Sturmbannführer Hermann Höfle), which was assigned from Distrikt Lublin by SSPF Odilo Globocnik. The ghetto liquidations were implemented with the support of a number of Trawniki-trained auxiliaries (mostly from Ukraine or the Baltic states) and German Order Police units (battalions and stationary units of the Schutzpolizei and Gendarmerie). In some places units of the Polish (Blue) Police, ethnic German Sonderdienst, and Jewish Police (Jüdischer Ordnungsdienst) also assisted them.

The deportations were conducted more or less Kreis by Kreis. Deportations from the Warsaw ghetto commenced on July 22, 1942, and continued until September 21. In Warsaw there was a brief respite on August 19–21, while Jews from the ghettos in Otwock, Falenica, and Mińsk Mazowiecki were deported. In total, more than 250,000 Jews were deported to Treblinka, about 10,000 were sent to other camps for work via the so-called Dulag (Durchgangslager), and several thousand Jews were murdered in the city.

Due to the large forces assembled to clear the Warsaw ghetto, the liquidation of most other ghettos followed swiftly over just a few weeks in September and October. Jews from the ghettos of Kałuszyn, Dobrze, Mrozy, and others in Kreis Minsk Mazowiecki were deported from mid-September. The Jews from Kreis Sokolow were all deported between September 21 and 25. In late September and early October, the Jews from the ghettos of Parysów, Łaskarzew, Stoczek Łukowski, and Żelechów in Kreis Garwolin were deported via Sobolew before finally the Jews of Sobolew were dispatched in early October. Then in the first days of October, the ghettos of Radzymin, Wołomin, and Legionowo in Kreis Warschau-Land were liquidated together.

Especially in those ghettos close to Treblinka, news of the mass murders arrived from train escapees and Jews working at the camp. Many Jews tried to evade deportation by hiding in prepared bunkers. Due to the large numbers of escapees during the course of the deportations, the German authorities announced that Poles faced the death sentence for even the smallest assistance provided to Jews. As punishment for aiding Jewish escapees, it was often that entire families were gunned down and their households razed. News of such punitive actions terrified the Polish population, causing some to turn out Jews they had been helping.

Almost all the transports went to Treblinka. In a number of ghettos, a few Jews were retained to sort Jewish belongings or perform other labor tasks, in so-called small ghettos. On October 28, 1942, HSSPF Krüger ordered the recognition of six remnant ghettos within Distrikt Warschau in Warsaw, Kałuszyn, Sobolew, Kosów Lacki, Rembertów, and Siedlce.²⁴ Their main purpose was to lure out of hiding those who had evaded the deportations. Most of these remnant ghettos, apart from Warsaw, were liquidated between November 1942 and February 1943. The remnant ghetto or labor camp in Rembertów, which contained Jews from Warsaw brought to Rembertów after the liquidation of the original ghetto there, was liquidated at the end of June 1943.

After the suppression of the Warsaw Uprising, a number of Jews continued to live in a few labor camps, including that Laden with rounded-up Jews from Sobolew, this truck overturned shortly after the photo was taken, facilitating the Jews' escape, n.d.

USHMM WS #18822, COURTESY OF IPN

The family of Icek Fajerschejn is deported from Stoczek, while an unidentified auxiliary looks on in the foreground, May 5, 1942.
USHMM WS #29277, COURTESY OF MORRIS ROSEN

in Karczew, which existed until the fall of 1943. Estimates of the number of Jews who escaped onto the Aryan side and went into hiding or passed as non-Jews vary, but probably exceeded 30,000. Jews on the Aryan side had to live in constant fear of denunciation or extortion by so-called szmalcownicy (blackmailers).

SOURCES Secondary works including coverage of the history of the Jews in the Distrikt Warschau ghettos include T. Berenstein, “Deportacje i zagłada skupisk żydowskich w dystrykcie warszawskim,” BŻIH, no. 1 (1952): 83–125; Barbara Engelking, Jacek Leociak, and Dariusz Libionka, eds., Prowincja noc: Życie i zagłada Żydów w dystrykcie warszawskim (Warsaw: Wydawnictwo IFiS PAN, 2007); Barbara Engelking and Jacek Leociak, The Warsaw Ghetto: A Guide to the Perished City, trans. Emma Harris (New Haven, CT: Yale University Press, 2009); Samuel D. Kassow, Who Will Write Our History?: Emanuel Ringelblum, the Warsaw Ghetto, and the Oyneg Shabes Archive (Bloomington: Indiana University Press, 2007); Czesław Pilichowski et al., eds., Obozy hitlerowskie na ziemiach polskich 1939–1945: Informator encyklopedyczny (Warsaw: PWN, 1979); Gunnar S. Paulsson, Secret City: The Hidden Jews of Warsaw 1940–1945 (New Haven, CT: Yale University Press, 2002); Arnon Rubin, The Rise and Fall of the Jewish Communities in Poland and Their Relics Today, vol. 2, District Lublin (Tel Aviv: Tel Aviv University Press, 2007); and Abraham Wein, ed., Pinkas ha-kehillot. Encyclopaedia of Jewish Communities: Poland, vol. 4, Warsaw and Its Region (Jerusalem: Yad Vashem, 1989).

Published collections of documents include T. Berenstein et al., eds., Faschismus, Getto, Massenmord: Dokumentation über Ausrottung und Widerstand der Juden in Polen während des zweiten Weltkrieges (Berlin: Rütten & Loening, 1961); T. Berenstein, A. Eisenbach, and A. Rutkowski, eds., Eksterminacja Żydów na ziemiach polskich w okresie okupacji hitlerowskiej: Zbiór dokumentów (Warsaw: ŻIH, 1957); Helge Grabitz and Wolfgang Scheffler, Letzte Spuren: Fotos und Dokumente über Opfer des Endlösungswahns im Spiegel der historischen Ereignisse (Berlin: Hentrich, 1988); Joseph Kermish, ed., To Live with Honor and Die with Honor!: Selected Documents from the Warsaw Ghetto Underground Archives “O.S.” (“Oneg Shabbath”) (Jerusalem: Yad Vashem, 1986); and Ruta Sakowska et al., eds., Archiwum Ringelbluma: Konspiracyjne Archiwum Getta Warszawy, 3 vols. (Warsaw: PWN, 2000).

Relevant documentation can be found in the following archives: AAN; APO; APSi; APW (e.g., Der Obmann des Judenrates in Warschau; Amt des Gouverneurs des Distriktes Warschau—Der Kommissar für den Jüdischen Wohnbezirk in Warschau); AŻIH (e.g., sygn. 200; 210; 211; 301; 302; Ring); BA-BL; BA-L; BLH; CAHJP; IPN; MA; NARA; USHMM (e.g., Acc.1997.A.0124 [JSS]; Acc.1998.A.0241 [Trial of Ludwig Fischer]; Acc.1999.A.0154 [AJDC]; RG-02; RG-15.019M [IPN, ASG]; RG-15.077M [CENTOS]; RG-15.079M [Ring I]; RG-15.084 [Relacje]; RG-50); VHF; WL; YIVO; and YVA.

Martin Dean

NOTES

1. Werner Präg and Wolfgang Jacobmeyer, eds., Das Diensttagebuch des deutschen Generalgouverneurs in Polen 1939–1945 (Stuttgart: Deutsche Verlags-Anstalt, 1975), pp. 286–287, entry for October 10, 1940. See also the report of Schön, the head of the resettlement section in the office of the Governor of the Warsaw Distrikt, January 20, 1941, published in: Berenstein et al., Faschismus, Getto, Massenmord, pp. 108–109.

2. See Berenstein et al., Faschismus, Getto, Massenmord, p. 109, citing the report of the Łowicz Kreishauptmann, dated July 20, 1940. Some sources date the establishment of the Kiernozia ghetto in March 1940—see Gedaliah Shaiak, ed., Lovitsb—a shtetl in Mazovye un umgegent, seyfer zikorn (Melbourne and Sydney, Australia: Łowiczer Landsmanshaften, 1966), p. 364.

3. AŻIH, 211/702, pp. 1–4, Petition of the Jewish population of Mińsk Mazowiecki, unsigned, July 1, 1940.

4. Berenstein et al., Faschismus, Getto, Massenmord, p. 96; AŻIH, 211/702, p. 12, ghetto questionnaire, April 1, 1942.

5. USHMM, RG-15.073M, report on the activity of the Warsaw Jewish Council, from October 7, 1939, to December 31, 1940, p. 12.

6. Warschauer Zeitung, November 3–4, 1940. For an overview of events leading up to the establishment of the Warsaw ghetto, see Engelking and Leociak, The Warsaw Ghetto, pp. 52–76.

7. AŻIH, Ring I/847 [874.], “Geyrush Łomianki bay Varshe,” February 12, 1941.

8. Ibid., 210/680 (AJDC, Tarczyn); 210/266 (AJDC, Błędów), p. 35.

9. VHF, # 10410, testimony of Jerry Lista, 1995.

10. USHMM, RG-15.079M, Ring I/881.

11. VHF, # 2132, testimony of Ben Zion Guttman.

12. USHMM, RG-15.079M, Ring I/352, Kreishauptmann Sochaczew-Blonie, order concerning the clearing of the Kreis of Jews, January 31, 1941.

13. See Ibid., RG-14.052 (BA-BL), R 52III/29, pp. 88, 89, Kreishauptmann Skierniewice, monthly report, March 4, 1941.

14. AŻIH, Ring I/116.

15. USHMM, RG-15.019M (ASG), reel 18, sygn. 61, p. 95; VHF, # 1365, testimony of Ben Stern; # 17574, testimony of Aisic Hirsch.

16. AŻIH, 301/4805, testimony of Władysława Kruszczeńska (Kruszczewska), 1948; USHMM, Acc.1997.A.0124 (JSS), 211/846, pp. 3, 5–6, 15–18, 23–25; 211/1083, p. 18.

17. Dov Shuval, Sefer yizkor li-kehillat Sarnaki (Haifa: Ir-gun yots’e Sarnaki be-Yisrael, 1968), pp. 147–169.

18. Shimon Kanc, ed., Sefer zikaron le-kehillat Rembertow, Okuniew, Milosna (Tel Aviv: Rembertow, Okuniew and Milosna Societies in Israel, the USA, France, Mexico City, Canada, Chile, and Brazil, 1974), pp. 431–432.

19. USHMM, Acc.1997.A.0124 (JSS), 211/1176, p. 60.

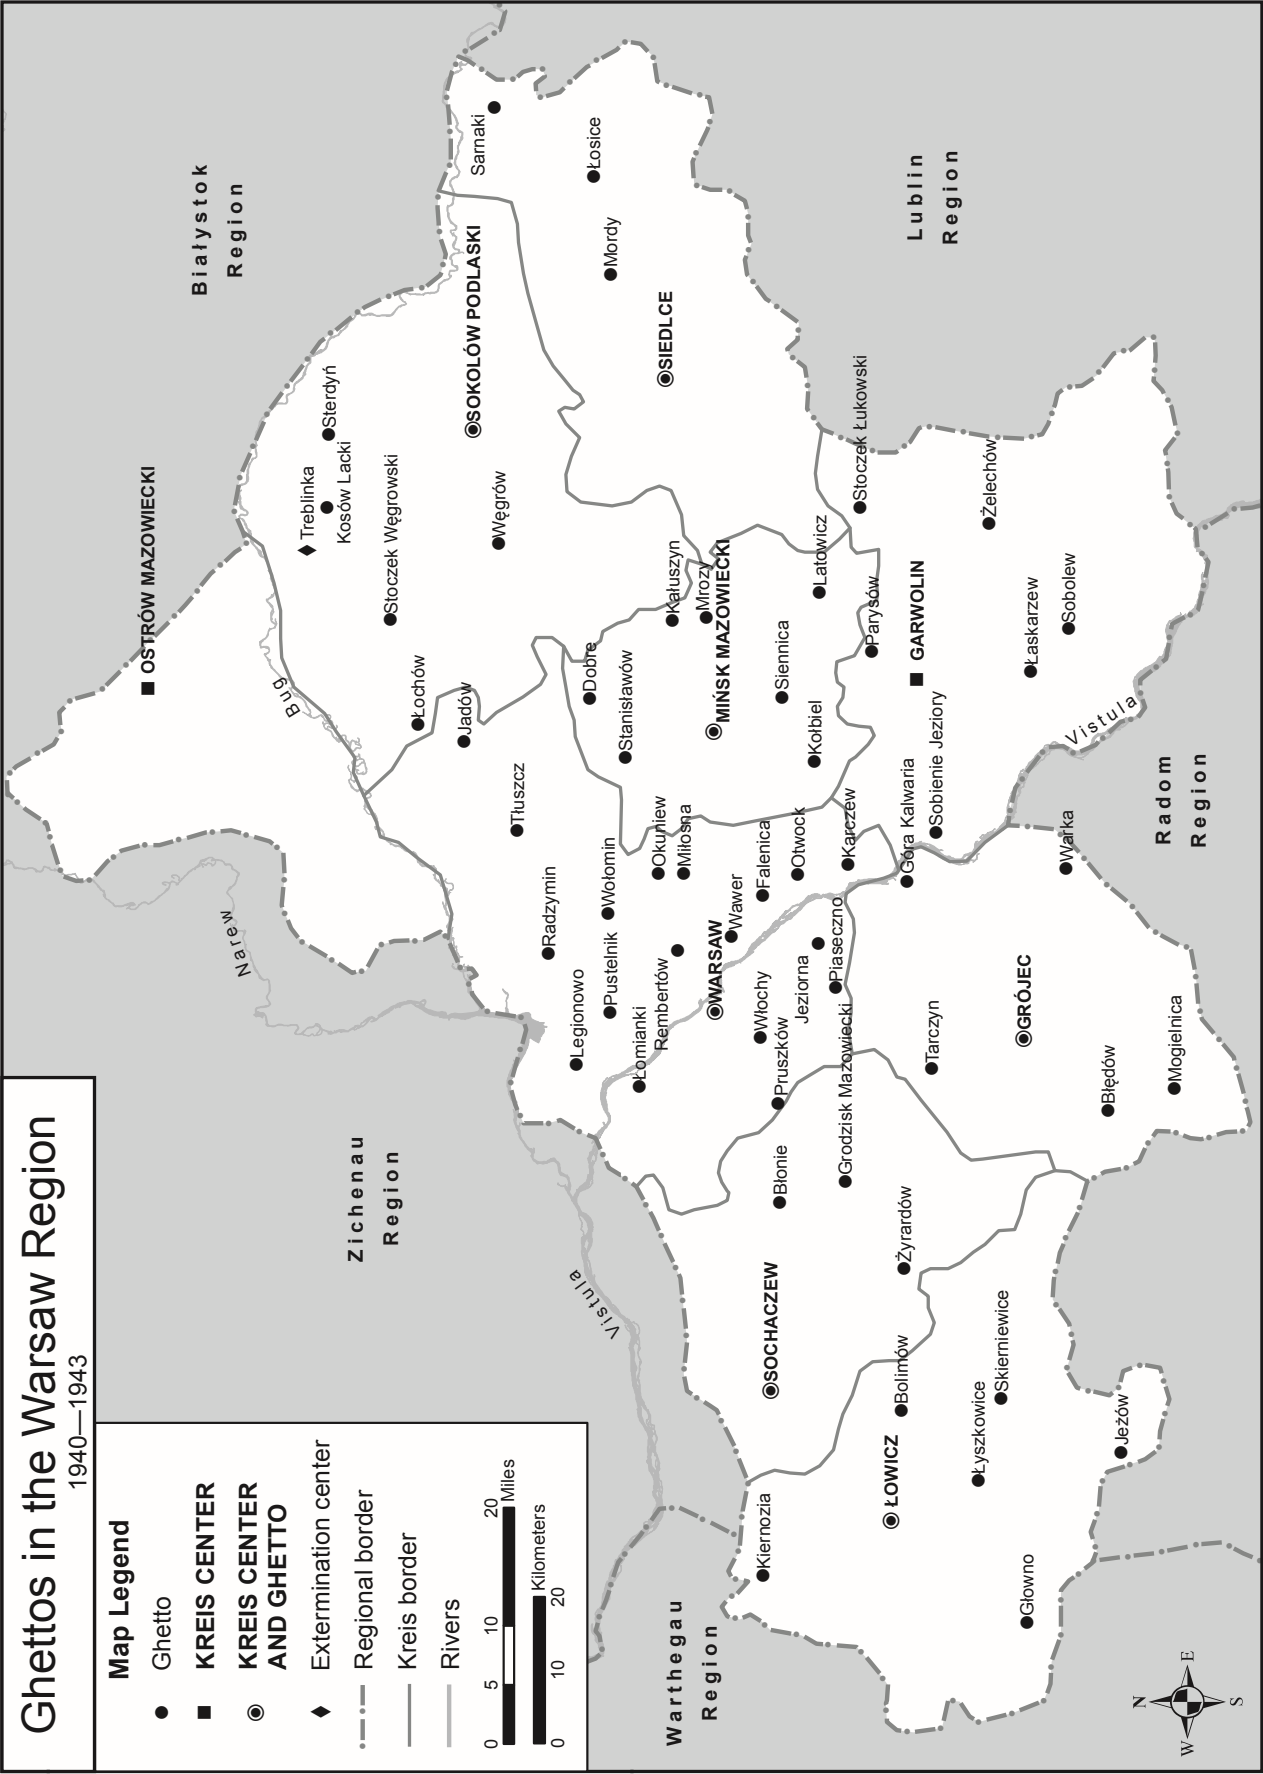

20. APSi, 1290, Zarządzenia, # A67/42 (May 23, 1942).

21. Grabitz and Scheffler, Letzte Spuren, pp. 181, 207, 318–319. Most of these Jews were murdered during Aktion Erntefest in November 1943.

22. Berenstein, Eisenbach, and Rutkowski, Eksterminacja Żydów, pp. 108–109, 278–279; USHMM, Acc.1997.A.0124 (JSS), 211/634, pp. 40–42.

23. Kermish, To Live with Honor, pp. 205–208.

24. Police Decree issued by HSSPF Krüger, October 28, 1942, in Berenstein et al., Faschismus, Getto, Massenmord, pp. 342–344.

BŁĘDÓW

Pre-1939: Błędów, town, Warsaw województwo, Poland; 1939–1945: Bledow, Kreis Grojec, Distrikt Warschau, General-gouvernement; post-1998: Błędów, województwo mazowieckie, Poland

Błędów is located 14 kilometers (9 miles) southwest of Grójec. Just before September 1, 1939, there were 957 Jews living in Błędów.¹

The Germans entered Błędów on September 8, 1939. Soon after their arrival, the German police began stealing property from Jewish homes and shops. The Jews were ordered to wear white armbands bearing a blue Star of David. On one occasion in the fall of 1939, the Germans rounded up the Jews and abused and beat them, causing the death of at least one person. The Germans also started to kidnap Jews for forced labor, requiring them to conduct humiliating work such as sweeping the streets or cleaning the houses of ethnic Germans.

In November or December 1939, a Jewish Council (Judenrat) was established in Błędów, chaired by Yaakov Arbuz. Soon the Jews were obliged to pay an 80,000 złoty fine, which was collected mainly from the more affluent members of the community. Local ethnic Germans were among the most active in abusing the Jews and seizing their property.

As of June 1940, 1,030 Jews were living in Błędów, including refugees from Łódź, Aleksandrów Łódzki, Zgierz, and other towns that had been incorporated into Reichsgau Wartheland. During 1940, the Jewish Aid Committee for Poor Jews in Błędów provided some financial aid and other support to the refugees and some local Jews; at least 47 different families received benefits, as reported to the American Jewish Joint Distribution Committee (AJDC) based in Warsaw.²

At the end of 1940 an open ghetto was established in Błędów, around the same time that the ghetto was also established in the Kreis center, Grójec.³ A report of the Jewish Aid Committee, dated December 3, 1940, noted that it had been unable to supply the requested information due to the recent resettlement of the Jews into the “Jewish quarter” (dzielnica żydowska), which was still continuing for a few days longer.⁴ The ghetto was unfenced, but initially any Jews caught outside it were severely beaten and could be punished further with a fine or a term of imprisonment.

On January 21, 1941, the Kreishauptmann in Grójec, Landrat Werner Zimmermann, issued the following order: “All Jews living outside of the towns of Błędów, Tarczyn, Mogielnica, Góra Kalwaria, Warka, and Grójec are to transfer immediately to the closest of these towns, all of which were to be considered as ghettos. The heads of the respective settlements were made personally responsible for ensuring that by January 27, 1941, no Jews still were residing on their territory.” The order also stipulated that any Jew caught outside these ghettos after January 27, 1941, would face the death penalty.⁵

In January 1941, the Jews of Błędów had to pay a further fine of 100,000 złoty. The Germans spread a rumor that if the Jews paid the fine, their expulsion to the Warsaw ghetto would be deferred. Therefore, the Judenrat delivered the money, but then, according to survivor Ben Zion Guttman, on February 11, 1941, the Jews of Błędów were expelled to Warsaw anyway. The Jews were ordered to assemble on the market square and then had to walk 5 kilometers (3 miles) to the railway station, where they were put on trains to the Warsaw ghetto. The elderly and infirm were transported to the station on horse-driven carts.⁶ Along the way some Jews managed to escape, but many of those who sought shelter in the area were betrayed to the Germans or even murdered by local Poles.

After the war, the Jewish community in Błędów was not reconstituted.

SOURCES Information on the fate of the Jews in Błędów during the Holocaust can be found in the following publications: Abraham Wein, ed., Pinkas ha-kehillot. Encyclopaedia of Jewish Communities: Poland, vol. 4, Warsaw and Its Region (Jerusalem: Yad Vashem, 1989), pp. 150–151; T. Berenstein, “Deportacje i zagłada skupisk żydowskich w dystrykcie warszawskim,” BŻIH, no. 1 (1952); Czesław Pilichowski et al., eds., Obozy hitlerowskie na ziemiach polskich 1939–1945: Informator encyklopedyczny (Warsaw: PWN, 1979), p. 109; Roman Mogilanski, The Ghetto Anthology: A Comprehensive Chronicle of the Extermination of Jewry in Nazi Death Camps and Ghettos in Poland (Los Angeles: American Congress of Jews from Poland and Survivors of Concentration Camps, 1985), p. 101. Additional information can be found in the yizkor book, Sefer yizkor Mogielnica-Bledow (Tel Aviv, 1972).

Relevant documentation can be found in the following archives: AŻIH (210/266 [AJDC]; Ring I/881); USHMM (Acc. 1999.A.0154 [AJDC]; RG-15.079 [Ring I]); VHF (# 2132); and YVA.

Monika Tomkiewicz and Martin Dean
trans. Steven Seegel

NOTES

1. Berenstein, “Deportacje i zagłada skupisk,” table 3.
2. AŻIH, 210/266.
3. Wein, Pinkas ha-kehillot: Poland, vol. 4, Warsaw and Its Region, p. 151, however, dates the ghetto’s establishment at the end of May 1940. Guy Miron, ed., The Yad Vashem Encyclopedia of the Ghettos during the Holocaust (Jerusalem: Yad Vashem, 2010), p. 59, dates it in late 1940.
4. AŻIH, 210/266, p. 35.
5. Ibid., Ring I/881.
6. VHF, # 2132, testimony of Ben Zion Guttman; Pilichowski et al., Obozy hitlerowskie, p. 109, and Barbara Engelking, Jacek Leociak, and Dariusz Libionka, eds., Prowincja noc: Życie i zagłada Żydów w dystrykcie warszawskim (Warsaw: Wydawnictwo IFiS PAN, 2007), p. 213, both date the ghetto’s liquidation in February 1941. After January 1941, there is no further correspondence between the Jewish Aid Committee for Poor Jews in Błędów and the AJDC; see AŻIH, 210/266.

BŁONIE

Pre-1939: Błonie (Yiddish: Bloyna), town, Warsaw województwo, Poland; 1939–1945: Blonie, Kreis Sochaczew, Distrikt Warschau,

Generalgouvernement; post-1998: Błonie, województwo mazowieckie, Poland

Błonie is located about 27 kilometers (17 miles) west-southwest of Warsaw. In 1939, about 2,800 Jews lived there.

After the German army occupied the town and the surrounding area, murders of the civilian population took place. Among the 750 people murdered in Błonie in September and October 1939, the majority were Jews.¹ On September 19 alone, 50 civilian prisoners were shot in Błonie.² A transit camp (Dulag) was created in the town for Polish prisoners of war (POWs). This camp was established in mid-September 1939 on the grounds of a former match factory.³

After the German army occupied the town, it started to seize Jews for forced labor, mainly for cleaning work.⁴ On the streets, German soldiers beat the Jews. Older, traditionally dressed Jews were kicked and humiliated. The beards of Jewish men were cut off. Jewish children were no longer permitted to go to school.⁵

In the fall of 1939, a Jewish Council (Judenrat) was established in Błonie. Avigdor Rosenberg stood at its head. Other members included Abram Gewer, Izrael Wajselfisz, and Lajb Rozenberg. Its tasks included the payment of forced “contributions” to the German authorities and participation in the selection of forced laborers. One survivor accuses members of the Judenrat, especially Wajselfisz, of cooperating with the Gendarmes in despoiling Jewish property for his own personal gain.⁶

With support from the American Jewish Joint Distribution Committee (AJDC), an aid committee was established in Błonie in March 1940 to assist those in need. It was headed by Izrael Wajcberg and included Izrael Wajselfisz and Abram Gewer of the Judenrat among its seven members. The committee provided aid to about 1,000 people under its care. It also operated a public kitchen, which prepared warm meals for 700 needy Jews, as well as organizing assistance for children.⁷

From the end of 1939, a large number of refugees and deportees arrived in Błonie in several waves. In May 1940, 617 Jews from Hów (Kreis Sochaczew), Łódź, Aleksandrów Łódzki, and other places arrived. Then in June, they were followed by another 926 expellees. Not all of these new arrivals remained in Błonie. Since these deportees were only permitted to bring with them a very limited amount of luggage, most arrived in a destitute condition, increasing the welfare burden on the Jewish Council.

On November 13, 1940, a placard posted by Kreishauptmann Karl Adolf Pott announced the imminent resettlement of the Jews from Błonie to Warsaw, while the Jews were forbidden, as of December, to leave an area in the center of town, which was to become a Jewish quarter or ghetto (Jüdisches Wohngebiet).⁸ Myer Glick recalls the announcement of the transfer to Warsaw and that a member of his family traveled to the Warsaw ghetto, which was still open, in preparation for the move, but could only find a single room there. However, before the move to Warsaw, Glick and his family were evicted from their apartment in Błonie, with the participation of the Germans, and had to move in with his uncle in three overcrowded rooms.⁹ This transfer within Błonie may reflect the establishment of a ghetto there in December 1940, which, according to one source, contained about 2,100 people.¹⁰

Since the ghetto in Błonie existed for only about two months, very little information is available concerning conditions there. One surviving document indicates that on January 28, 1941, the AJDC reported that 15 kilograms (33 pounds) of sugar had been donated to the child-care facility in Błonie, thanks to a charitable gift from Switzerland. A representative of the Aid Committee for Refugees and the Poor in Błonie could collect the sugar from the CENTOS (Central Organization for Orphan Care) food depot in Warsaw.¹¹ It is doubtful that this sugar was ever transported to Błonie.

At the start of 1941, the German authorities began deporting all the Jews from the western Kreise of Distrikt Warschau—Sochaczew, Grojec, Skierniewice, Lowicz, and parts of Kreis Warschau-Land—into the Warsaw ghetto. In total during this Aktion, from January to April 1941, some 72,000 Jews were relocated.¹² The deportation of the Jews was intended to free space for 62,000 Poles deported from Reichsgau Wartheland.¹³

As of January 31, 1941, Jews were no longer permitted to leave the Błonie ghetto. Their transfer to Warsaw was scheduled for February 17–19, 1941. The Jews were to be deloused beforehand, and each Jew was permitted to take only 25 kilograms (55 pounds) of luggage, as well as sufficient food for two days. Live animals could not be transported and were to be surrendered to the mayor. Property left behind was to be confiscated, and people plundering this property were to be strictly punished.¹⁴ The Błonie Jews went by road to the Warsaw ghetto, on foot or in horse-drawn wagons, which enabled some to take a little extra luggage. Myer Glick remembers taking turns with his brother to sit atop the pile of luggage on the cart.¹⁵

At this time, the Warsaw ghetto already was overcrowded, and hunger predominated. The lot of the expellees was particularly harsh, as many had already experienced prior deportation from the Warthegau into Distrikt Warschau. On arrival in the Warsaw ghetto, they were first put into quarantine for a period.¹⁶ From there, they were then in large part concentrated in public buildings within the ghetto, such as synagogues and schools, under conditions of poor sanitation and provisioning, which gave rise to sickness and hunger among them, resulting in a number of deaths.

The Jews driven from the Błonie to the Warsaw ghetto shared the fate of the remainder of Warsaw’s Jews. The majority were rounded up during the great liquidation Aktion, which began on July 22, 1942, and were deported to the Treblinka extermination camp, where they were murdered.

After the liquidation of the Błonie ghetto, the Germans destroyed the Jewish cemetery, leaving only several grave-stones in place. After the expulsion in February 1941, a few Jews who defied the resettlement order remained in Kreis Sochaczew, including in Błonie. Executions in Błonie attest to their presence. In May 1943, a Gendarme shot three Jews on the property of Aleksander Różycki, at 1 Szkolna Street.¹⁷

In February 1943, a Gendarme shot four Jews (two men, a woman, and a child).¹⁸ In June 1943, a Błonie woman, a member of the Polish underground, was arrested on the charge that she had sheltered Jews. A search conducted in her home revealed nothing. The search and arrest occurred most likely as the result of a denunciation.¹⁹ In the summer of 1944, Gendarmes shot three Jews who had been residents of Powązki village (in the former Radzików gmina) on Powstańców Street in Błonie. The bodies were buried at the site of the execution.²⁰ From 1942 to 1944, in Błonie there were numerous other executions in which people perished but for which there is no information about their specific ethnicity. Some of them may have been Jews.²¹

A large group of Jewish partisans, under the leadership of Miller, operated in the Błonie area.²² The group was composed of ghetto escapees who succeeded in securing arms and formed a partisan unit. The unit maintained good relations with a local unit of the Polish Home Army (Armia Krajowa), whose leader forewarned the Jewish group of threats to their security. In 1944, the group was subordinated to a Soviet partisan unit.²³

The number of Błonie Jews who survived the war and occupation is unknown. However, after the war Jews from Błonie and Leszno established a fraternal organization.²⁴ In Błonie and the surrounding area some Jews survived in hiding; among them was Dr. Chirsz, who received assistance from a Polish family.²⁵

SOURCES References to the fate of the Jews of Błonie during the Holocaust can be found in the following publications: Rejestr miejsc i faktów zbrodni popełnionych przez okupanta hitlerowskiego na ziemiach polskich w latach 1939–1945: Województwo stołeczne warszawskie (Warsaw: GKBZHWP, 1988); Barbara Engelking, Jacek Leociak, and Dariusz Libionka, eds., Prowincja noc: Życie i zagłada Żydów w dystrykcie warszawskim (Warsaw: Wydawnictwo IFiS PAN, 2007); Czesław Pilichowski et al., eds., Obozy hitlerowskie na ziemiach polskich 1939–1945: Informator encyklopedyczny (Warsaw: PWN, 1979), p. 109; and T. Berenstein, “Deportacje i zagłada skupisk żydowskich w dystrykcie warszawskim,” BŻIH, no. 1 (1952): 85, 115–116.

Relevant documentation can be found in the following archives: AŻIH (210/267 [AJDC]; 211/234 [JSS]; 301/4444; 302/150, 153; Ring I/352 [Ringelblum Archive]); USHMM (Acc.1999.A.0154 [AJDC]; Acc.1997.0124 [JSS]); VHF (# 27027, 29135, and 51287); and YVA (O-3/6909, 7754; M-49/E/5748).

Witold Mędykowski and Martin Dean
trans. Laura Crago

NOTES

1. Barbara Engelking, “Życie codzienne Żydów w miasteczkach dystryktu warszawskiego,” in Engelking, Leociak, and Libionka, Prowincja noc, p. 127.
2. Jochen Böhlér, Auftakt zum Vernichtungskrieg: Die Wehrmacht in Polen 1939 (Frankfurt: Fischer Taschenbuch Verlag, 2006), p. 224. AŻIH, 301/4444, p. 1, testimony of Rejla Sapot, mentions 40 Jews killed at the time of the Germans’ arrival.
3. Pilichowski et al., Obozy hitlerowskie, p. 109.

4. YVA, O-3/6909, p. 4.

5. Ibid., O-3/7754, p. 6; VHF, # 27027, testimony of Myer Glick.

6. AŻIH, 301/4444, p. 2.

7. Ibid., 210/267, p. 26, AJDC letter to Błonie, March 29, 1940; Engelking, “Życie codzienne,” p. 210.

8. Centrum Kultury w Grodzisku Mazowieckim, Resettlement announcement for Grodzisk, Żyrardów, Sochaczew, and Błonie, November 13, 1940.

9. VHF, # 27027. Glick, however, does not specifically mention the existence of a ghetto in Błonie.

10. Pilichowski et al., Obozy hitlerowskie, p. 109, report the existence of a ghetto in Błonie, but the only source given is to an unspecified reference in the ITS archives. A labor camp also existed in Błonie, but little information is available about this camp.

11. AŻIH, 210/267, p. 58, AJDC an Hilfskomitee für Flüchtlinge und arme Juden in Błonie, January 28, 1941.

12. Raporty Ludwiga Fischera gubernatora dystryktu warszawskiego 1939–1944 (Warsaw: Książka i Wiedza, 1987), p. 259.

13. Ibid., pp. 259, 277.

14. See AŻIH, Ring 1/352, Anordnung betreffend Freimachung des Kreises Sochaczew-Błonie von Juden, January 31, 1941; 301/4444, dates the transfer on February 17.

15. YVA, O-3/6909, p. 6; O-3/7754, p. 8; VHF, # 27027.

16. Raporty Ludwiga Fischera, p. 259 (Report, Warsaw Dystrykt Chief, February 10, 1941 [for January 1941]).

17. Rejestr miejsc i faktów . . . : Województwo stołeczne warszawskie, p. 23.

18. Ibid.

19. Raporty Ludwiga Fischera, p. 489.

20. Rejestr miejsc i faktów . . . : Województwo stołeczne warszawskie, p. 24.

21. Ibid., pp. 22–24.

22. YVA, O-3/2078, testimony of Tuvia Miller.

23. Engelking, “Życie codzienne,” p. 492.

24. Alina Skibińska, “Powroty ocalałych,” in Engelking, Leociak, and Libionka, Prowincja noc, pp. 546, 585.

25. YVA, M-49/E/5748, pp. 1–2.

BOLIMÓW

Pre-1939: Bolimów (Yiddish: Bolimov), town, Warsaw województwo, Poland; 1939–1945: Bolimow, Kreis Lowicz, Distrikt Warschau, Generalgouvernement; post-1998: Bolimów, województwo mazowieckie, Poland

Bolimów is located about 60 kilometers (37 miles) west-southwest of Warsaw. On the eve of World War II, in 1939, there were 235 Jews living in Bolimów.

In the fall of 1939, about 120 Jews from Łowicz were transferred by the Germans to Bolimów, where they were accommodated in the Bet Midrash. Among them was the family of David Flaum, who recalls that each family had its own corner.¹

Soon after the start of the occupation, the Jews of the town were subjected to forced labor. For example, in March 1940, the Forestry Office requested the use of 40 Jewish laborers from the mayor of Bolimów. The Jews were to receive two thirds of the normal wage if they performed the required work effectively. An account in the yizkor book confirms that a number of Jews worked in the forests around the town.²

The Bolimów ghetto was established in May or June of 1940 on the orders of the Łowicz Kreishauptmann, Regierungsrat Dr. Schwender. By this time a Jewish Council (Judenrat) had already been established in the town.³ The non-Jewish local inhabitants took over many former Jewish homes, and the Jews were concentrated in an area around Synagogue Alley (Shul Gas). David Flaum confirms that the refugee accommodation was located within the ghetto. The ghetto was surrounded by a wooden fence with barbed wire. There was also a Jewish police force, consisting of 25 men, including 5 refugees.⁴

Due to the hard work and inadequate food, many Jews suffered from hunger and exhaustion. This drove some Jews to risk leaving the ghetto to buy food from local farmers at extortionate prices.⁵

In December 1940, the Jewish Social Self-Help (JSS) in Łowicz reported that there were 460 Jews then living in Bolimów, of which 110 were receiving welfare support.⁶

In early January 1941, the head of the Jewish Council (Obmann des Jüdengebietes) in the Bolimów ghetto wrote to the Central Committee of the JSS in Kraków, reporting that the three members of the JSS branch in Bolimów had been dismissed, as they were too old and unsuited for their positions. He requested that three replacements be confirmed, as they were much better suited and had the confidence of the local Jewish population.⁷

In March 1941, the Jews of Bolimów were transferred to the Warsaw ghetto, as part of a large-scale plan to clear all the Jews from the Kreise of Distrikt Warschau to the west of the city. Due to a lack of transportation, many of the Jews had to travel on foot, leaving most of their possessions behind.⁸ It is likely that a small group of Jews remained in the empty ghetto in Bolimów for a short period after the transfer, to sort out remaining Jewish property.⁹

On arrival in the Warsaw ghetto, most of the Jews from Bolimów were put into improvised hostels designated for refugees. A report in the Ringelblum Archive from March 1941 noted the terrible conditions in one of these shelters based in a school building. Refugees from Bolimów were among 460 people being cared for in the facility. The report mentions difficulties encountered with hygiene and medical care and numerous deaths from hunger.¹⁰ A large number of the refugees from Bolimów died of starvation and contagious diseases in the course of their one-and-a-half-year stay in the Warsaw ghetto. Many of those who survived until the summer of 1942 were among those deported to the Treblinka extermination camp during the large-scale Aktion at that time.

Some Jews evaded deportation to Warsaw and attempted to survive in hiding in the area around Bolimów. However, they risked being betrayed by local Polish inhabitants who received a reward from the Germans for every Jew they denounced. In one instance, 21 Jews were uncovered hiding in a bunker in the forest, following a tip-off from a Polish peasant. The Jews were shot and buried on the spot. Only after the war were their bodies exhumed and reburied in a mass grave in the Jewish cemetery in Bolimów.¹¹

SOURCES Much of this entry is based on the Łowicz yizkor book, Gedaliah Shaiak, ed., Lovitsb—a shtet in Mazovye un umgegent, seyfer zikorn (Melbourne and Sydney, Australia: Łowicz Landsmanschaften, 1966), which contains some information regarding the fate of the Jews in Bolimów under the Nazi occupation. The ghetto in Bolimów is mentioned also in Guy Miron, ed., The Yad Vashem Encyclopedia of the Ghettos during the Holocaust (Jerusalem: Yad Vashem, 2010), p. 66; Czesław Pilichowski et al., eds., Obozy hitlerowskie na ziemiach polskich 1939–1945: Informator encyklopedyczny (Warsaw: PWN, 1979), p. 113; and Barbara Engelking, Jacek Leociak, and Dariusz Libionka, eds., Prowincja noc: Życie i zagłada Żydów w dystrykcie warszawskim (Warsaw: Wydawnictwo IFiS PAN, 2007), p. 212.

Relevant documentation can be found in the following archives: AŻIH (210/273; 211/250, 674; Ring I/116); BA-BL (R 52III/29); USHMM (Acc. 1997.A.0124 [JSS]; Acc.1999.A.0154 [AJDC]; RG-14.052; RG-15.079 [Ring]); VHF (# 6081); and YVA.

Martin Dean

NOTES

1. VHF, # 6081, testimony of David Flaum (born 1922), 1995; Shaiak, Lovitsb, pp. 368, 371.
2. USHMM, Acc. 1999.A.0154, 210/273, p. 5; Shaiak, Lovitsb, p. 371.
3. Pilichowski et al., Obozy hitlerowskie, p. 113, dates it in May 1940; Engelking, Leociak, and Libionka, Prowincja noc, p. 212, state June 11, 1940; Shaiak, Lovitsb, p. 370, gives the spring of 1940. See also Tatiana Berenstein et al., eds., Faschismus, Getto, Massenmord: Dokumentation über Ausrottung und Widerstand der Juden in Polen während des zweiten Weltkrieges (Berlin: Rütten & Loening, 1961), p. 109, which cites the report of the Kreishauptmann Łowicz, July 20, 1940.
4. VHF, # 6081; Shaiak, Lovitsb, p. 371.
5. Shaiak, Lovitsb, p. 371.
6. USHMM, Acc. 1997.A.0124, 211/674, pp. 37–38.
7. Ibid., pp. 43–44.
8. Shaiak, Lovitsb, p. 371.
9. See USHMM, RG-14.052 (BA-BL), R 52III/29, p. 57, Kreishauptmann Łowicz, situation report, March 13, 1941.
10. AŻIH, Ring I/116 [469.]
11. Shaiak, Lovitsb, p. 368.

DOBRE

Pre-1939: Dobre, village, Warsaw województwo, Poland; 1939–1944: Kreis Minsk Mazowiecki, Distrikt Warschau, Generalgouvernement; post-1998: województwo mazowieckie, Poland

Dobre is located 18 kilometers (11 miles) northeast of Mińsk Mazowiecki and 48 kilometers (30 miles) east of Warsaw. In 1921, 373 Jews were living in the village, making up 34 percent of the total population of 1,097. The Jewish population of Dobre was mainly Hasidic.¹

VOLUME II: PART A

The Germans occupied Dobre in early September 1939, immediately after which Jews were required to wear a yellow badge on their clothing and compelled to perform hard labor. Some Jewish families fled to the Soviet Union.² Conflicting information exists on when and even whether a ghetto was created in Dobre. According to one source, a ghetto was created in November 1940 and contained roughly 1,200 people.³ According to another (the testimony of Sonia Powonzek, a native of the village), Dobre did not have a ghetto; from June 1942, Jews were merely prohibited from leaving the village.⁴ According to yet another source, Dobre did indeed have a ghetto, which housed over 500 people, including Jews from Kałuszyn, Wyszaków, Mrozów, Mińsk Mazowiecki, and Pabianice.⁵ The testimony of Stanisław Słomkowski (aka Dawid Słoń) lends credence to the notion that Dobre functioned, at the very least, as a collection point for Jews from nearby towns, since he was deported there with his wife from Drobie in late 1941 or early 1942.⁶ At the same time, it appears that some Jews from Dobre were deported to the ghetto in Kałuszyn.⁷ Lejbka Fryd, for her part, was born in Dobre but hid in Drobie during the war.⁸

A four-member Judenrat was created in Dobre in 1941. J. Furmann served as its chairman and Sendrowicz as its secretary.⁹ In Powonzek's account, Jozek Nejman, the owner of a fashion accessories shop, is named as chairman of the Judenrat.¹⁰ The Judenrat supplied Germans with Jewish laborers to dig trenches, lay pavement, and perform other types of forced labor. Relations between the Judenrat and local Jews were generally hostile. A three-member Jewish police force, including one Chil Mejnener, from a Hasidic household, operated in Dobre, as did an aid committee. The aid committee cared for 200 to 250 individuals, including some 100 refugees.¹¹

Powonzek's testimony relates that living conditions in Dobre were extremely cramped, as the Germans took the best apartments for themselves. A Gestapo detachment consisting of six SS men was present in the village. Powonzek reports that life in Dobre otherwise continued more or less as normal under German occupation. There was neither hunger nor disease; religious life continued essentially uninterrupted under a man named Brotman, who served as both shochet and rabbi; Jewish children continued to go to a school, which was headed by Jan Zych; and the Germans did not undertake any special discriminatory measures towards Dobre's Jews. Jews maintained relations with local Poles, but the attitude of the latter towards the former was rather negative, with the Poles often betraying the hiding places of Jews to the German authorities.¹²

The ghetto in Dobre was liquidated on September 15, 1942. The details of the liquidation and deportation process as found in extant sources differ. One reports that the Jews of Dobre were compelled to travel by foot or by horse-driven cart to the closest railway station, in Mińsk Mazowiecki, where they were herded into railcars;¹³ another reports that they were taken to nearby Stanisławów, where some were massacred on the spot, while others managed to escape.¹⁴ The sources, however, agree that the final destination for Dobre's Jews was the Treblinka extermination camp, a fate that only a small number were able to escape, including two who were saved by Polish farmers.

SOURCES Articles on the Jewish community of Dobre can be found in the following publications: Abraham Wein, ed., Pinkas ha-kehillot. Encyclopaedia of Jewish Communities: Poland, vol. 4, Warsaw and Its Region (Jerusalem: Yad Vashem, 1989), pp. 178–179; and Shmuel Spector and Geoffrey Wigoder, eds., Encyclopedia of Jewish Life before and during the Holocaust (Jerusalem: Yad Vashem; New York: New York University Press, 2001), p. 316.

The book by Barbara Engelking, Jacek Leociak, and Dariusz Libionka, eds., Prowincja noc: Życie i zagłada Żydów w dystrykcie warszawskim (Warsaw: Wydawnictwo IFiS PAN, 2007) contains information on Dobre, pp. 64–66, 168–169, 215, 347.

Further information on Dobre can also be found in Tatiana Berenstein, "Deportacje i zagłada skupisk żydowskich w dystrykcie warszawskim," BŻIH, no. 1 (1952); and Czesław Pilichowski et al., eds., Obozy hitlerowskie na ziemiach polskich 1939–1945: Informator encyklopedyczny (Warsaw: PWN, 1979), pp. 159–160.

Documentation regarding the fate of the Jews of Dobre under German occupation can be found in the following archival collections: AŻIH (210/28, 30 [AJDC]; 211/59, 359 [JSS]; 301/2989, 5820 [Relacje]; and BA-L (B 162/6835).

Stephen Scala

NOTES

1. AŻIH, 301/4380, testimony of Sonia Powonzek.
2. Ibid.
3. BA-L, B 162/6835, pp. 149–150.
4. AŻIH, 301/4380.
5. Pilichowski et al., Obozy hitlerowskie, pp. 159–160.
6. AŻIH, 301/3338, testimony of Stanisław Słomkowski.
7. BA-L, B 162/6835, pp. 146–147.
8. AŻIH, 301/3501, testimony of Lejbka Fryd.
9. Ibid., 211/59.
10. Ibid., 301/4380.
11. Ibid., 210/28, Wykaz miejscowości Komitetów Pomocy, sprawozdanie z działalności V–XII 1940 r.
12. Ibid., 301/4380.
13. BA-L, B 162/6835, pp. 149–150.
14. AŻIH, 301/4380.

FALENICA

Pre-1939: Falenica, town, Warsaw województwo, Poland; 1939–1945: Kreis Warschau-Land, Distrikt Warschau, Generalgouvernement; post-1998: part of the city of Warsaw, województwo mazowieckie, Poland

Falenica is located about 16 kilometers (10 miles) southeast of the center of the city of Warsaw. In September 1939, the Jewish population was about 5,300.

On September 19, 1939, many houses and stores on the Jewish streets Handlowa and Długa burned down as a result of the fighting. At the start of the German occupation, only Wehrmacht troops were stationed in Falenica; later on some SS troops arrived to replace units sent to France. The SS commandant organized a group of ethnic Germans (Volksdeutsche) from Falenica, who posed a real threat, as they knew the Jewish inhabitants.¹ In December 1939, the German authorities imposed a “contribution” of 80,000 złoty on Falenica (affecting both the Polish and Jewish communities).²

A number of Jews forcibly evacuated from the territories annexed to the Third Reich arrived in Falenica over the following months. In January 1940, a group of 140 Jews arrived, but it is not clear where they came from. The population increased from 5,106 in 1940 to 6,500 in August 1941.³

It is not possible to establish the precise date on which the Judenrat in Falenica was established, but it was about the same time as in Otwock (December 1939). Some correspondence between the Judenrat and the American Jewish Joint Distribution Committee (AJDC) has been preserved, starting in January 1940. The first head of the Judenrat was H. Cukerman, an assimilated Jew. After a few weeks the members of the Judenrat were arrested and shot, following a denunciation made by the ethnic German Buchholz. Then the German authorities appointed Elias Finkel as head of the Judenrat—Finkel had already been a member of the Judenrat and served on the committee for social assistance. Finkel was a wealthy Jew from Warsaw and owned a farm in Miedzeszyn. The secretaries now were Mieczysław Chodźko from Łódź and H. Szancer. In 1940, other members of the Judenrat included David Goldberg, Pinkus Rozenberg, and Majer Rajner.⁴ Subsequently Szancer became the head of the Judenrat in 1942, although there is no information on precisely when he was appointed.⁵

In Falenica the commandant of the Jewish Police and the majority of the policemen were originally from Łódź. The Jewish Police also included some Jews who had been expelled from Germany in the fall of 1938 and who had settled in Falenica.⁶ The commandant of the Jewish Police was named Sziker (or Szejker). The size of the police force varied, but it was usually somewhere between 15 and 20 men. In the spring of 1942, Zimnawoda, a man who had arrived from Łódź, was appointed as commandant of the police and Sziker became his deputy. Under the new commandant, the Jewish Police showed its cruelty in rounding up people for work, as the Germans promised to spare the families of ghetto policemen if they delivered the required quota.⁷

On October 31, 1940, the Germans established a ghetto in Falenica. In terms of organizational structure, the Medem sanatorium for children in Miedzeszyn was also subordinated to the ghetto in Falenica. About 200 Jewish children resided there. Jews from Dobrze, Kałuszyn, Wyszaków, and Miedzeszyn lived in the Falenica ghetto. The Jews from Wiązowna were also compelled to move into the Falenica ghetto. The Germans did not establish a ghetto there because of the small number of Jewish inhabitants. In total, some 6,500 Jews passed through the ghetto. Approximately 1,500 died from hunger and disease.

The area of the ghetto was confined by Lawinowa, Mszańska, Chryzantemy, Hiacyntowa, and Bartoszycka Streets and also segments of Bystrzycka, Walcownicza, and Patriotów Streets on one side of the railway, excluding the power station. In Miedzeszyn the ghetto was located on the left side of the railway on the grounds of the Medem sanatorium. The ghetto was secured by a 2-meter-high (6.6-foot-high) barbed-wire fence, although it was only fenced on the side of the road and along the railway lines; the road through the forest to Radość remained open.⁸ The Polish (Blue) Police guarded the ghetto rather ineffectively on the outside. However, the Jewish Police also guarded the gates on the inside. Germans serving in a unit of 36 SS men stationed in Falenica only showed up sporadically. When they appeared, however, they would shoot anybody who attracted their attention.

The establishment of the ghetto did little to disturb the ongoing Polish-Jewish trade. To facilitate communications, the Jews took down the wire in some places, and it was never repaired. The Polish policemen tolerated this trade. Expelled Polish house owners went to examine their properties inside the ghetto. Some people even took a shortcut to the railway station in Miedzeszyn through the ghetto.⁹ Wheat was smuggled into the ghetto regularly, and a significant part of the bread made was sent to the Warsaw ghetto.

In March of 1940, due to the increasing number of people infected with typhus, the Judenrat was forced to establish a quarantine house.¹⁰ On January 10, 1941, the Falenica ghetto was sealed off so that Jews could no longer enter or leave. During the existence of the Falenica ghetto, Jews from a number of towns, such as Dobrze, Kałuszyn, Wyszaków, and Mrozy, were brought into the ghetto. Sporadically, also, some Jews from Warsaw and Łódź arrived.

In May 1941, more than half of the 6,500 residents were receiving social welfare. In 1941, the Judenrat opened a hospital for the contagiously sick on the orders of the Kreishauptmann, Dr. Hermann Rupprecht.¹¹ In January and February 1942, the death rate in the ghetto was double that recorded in December. In January alone, some 2 percent of the total ghetto population died. The main cause of death was extreme exhaustion caused by hunger and frost.¹²

In the summer of 1940, Jews from the ghetto were sent to work unloading coal from trains, serving the German military forces, cleaning the streets, and doing laundry. Jewish girls were forced to clean rooms using their own underwear as rags. Forced labor tasks also included work in the surrounding forests, digging up tree roots.¹³ Jews from Falenica were sent to work in Józefów near Lublin and also at the Karczew labor camp.

At the end of 1941, the Germans established a labor camp in Falenica for work at the sawmill and construction work at Podkowa Street on water and drainage works. Some 400 people worked at this camp.

When the Germans started to build the Treblinka extermination camp and also a labor camp in Wilanów (April–May 1942), for the first time the Jewish Police organized roundups for work. Some 50 people were sent to Treblinka and 70 to Wilanów. Some Jewish policemen were sent to keep an eye on the workers in Wilanów. Their commandant was a popular German Jew, Herman Kirschrot.¹⁴

At the end of May 1942, the head of the Arbeitsamt (labor office) in Otwock, Dietz; and Hartlof (the administrator of the confiscated Najwer sawmill in Falenica) arrived in the ghetto and selected about 80 to 100 men to work in the sawmill and at building huts for the military. They were promised that they would be spared if they performed their work well. The sawmill was outside the ghetto, and every day the Jewish Police escorted the Jewish workers to the site. In August, Hartlof told the workers that the ghetto would be liquidated, and he issued them work certificates (Arbeitscheine) to protect them. On August 17, 1942, Jews from the small remnant ghettos or labor camps in Miłosna, Zakręt, and Wiązowna were brought to Falenica. That same day the Gendarmes from Rembertów demanded 100,000 złoty, which they received, to leave the ghetto. At the beginning of July the Polish (Blue) Police who guarded the outside of the ghetto were replaced by Ukrainian and Lithuanian guard units.

The liquidation of the Falenica ghetto took place on August 20, 1942. The Aktion was expected, as only one day earlier the Otwock ghetto had been liquidated. Shortly before the ghetto liquidation in Falenica, the Jews from Radość were brought on foot to Falenica.¹⁵ Prior to the Aktion there were some 5,000 people in the ghetto. About 200 people were killed during the liquidation operation.

At 4:00 A.M., the Polish (Blue) Police surrounded the ghetto, and at dawn some SS troops joined them. The Ukrainian and Lithuanian guards killed everyone who was not able to walk or refused to leave their house. There were some cases of resistance and also of suicide. On the same day, the Jews from Rembertów were rounded up and chased on foot to Falenica. They arrived there around 2:00 P.M. Many of them were shot on the way. Between Miedzeszyn and Falenica, 200 people were killed and subsequently buried in two mass graves. All the people were gathered between the synagogue and the railways. Around 150 children from the Medem sanatorium joined the transport with their teacher.¹⁶ After loading up, the train traveled on to Otwock to pick up the rest of the Jews who had been hiding following the liquidation of the Otwock ghetto on the previous day.¹⁷ Thirty-five people were selected to work in Treblinka. The Germans ordered the owner of the sawmill, Najwer, to choose 100 men to remain working for him. On May 7, 1943, the commandant of the German Gendarmerie in Rembertów, Lüpsschau, with the Gendarmes from Rembertów and Otwock murdered all the men by throwing grenades among them and then shooting the remainder. They were buried in a mass grave behind the sawmill.¹⁸ In the ghetto about 24 Jewish policemen remained behind to guard and sort out the Jewish property that was to be sent back to Germany.

Thirty Jews from Falenica survived the war.¹⁹ No information is available concerning any postwar trials of the persons involved in the liquidation of the ghetto.

SOURCES The main published work is Sefer Falenits, edited by David Sztokfisz (Tel Aviv: Irgun yots'e Falenits be-Yisrael, 1967), and Khurbn Otwock-Falenits-Karczew (Bamberg: Far-valtung fun Otvotsker, Falenitser un Kartshever Landslayt in der Amerikaner Zone in Daytshland, 1948). Some information regarding the Falenica ghetto can also be found in the memoir written by Calel Perechodnik, Am I a Murderer? (Boulder, CO: Westview Press, 1996). The main secondary work is Jadwiga Dobrzyńska's Falenica moja miłość po raz drugi (Warsaw, 1996).

In the Archives of the Jewish Historical Institute (AŻIH) in Warsaw, there are preserved some rudimentary materials, including the correspondence between the Judenrat in Falenica and the American Jewish Joint Distribution Committee (210/14, AJDC) and also the Presidium of the Jewish Social Self-Help (211/383-384, JSS) in Kraków. There are also a few testimonies by survivors recorded after the war (e.g., 301/2207). One of the most important sources for the liquidation of the ghetto is the testimony of Sara Najwer (302/4496). The lack of other archival sources is due to the destruction of the building of the Falenica Jewish community in July 1943. In an operation organized by the underground Home Army, the building was set on fire to destroy any documents that could be used against the inhabitants of Falenica.

Sylvia Szymanska-Smolkin

NOTES

1. Baruch Goldstein, "In the Ghetto and on the Aryan Side," in Sztokfisz, Sefer Falenits, p. 249.
2. Ludwik Landau, The Chronicle of the Years of War and Occupation, vol. 1 (Warsaw, 1962), p. 146.
3. Tatiana Berenstein, "Deportacje i zagłada skupisk żydowskich w dystrykcie warszawskim," BŻIH, no. 1 (1952): 83-125.
4. AŻIH, JSS, 211/383, p. 4; AJDC, 210/14, p. 35.
5. Ibid., JSS, 211/383, p. 18.
6. Mieczysław Chodźko, "The Tragic Life of the Falenica Ghetto," in Sztokfisz, Sefer Falenits, p. 207.
7. Sztokfisz, Sefer Falenits, p. 253.
8. AŻIH, 301/5719, testimony of Danuta Dąbrowska, p. 1.
9. Sztokfisz, Sefer Falenits, p. 251; Dobrzyńska, Falenica moja miłość po raz drugi, pp. 116-117.
10. AŻIH, AJDC, 210/14, p. 10.
11. Ibid., JSS, 211/383, pp. 35, 52.
12. Ibid., JSS, 211/384, pp. 18, 25.
13. Ibid., 301/2207, testimony of Srulek Lang, p. 18.
14. Ibid., 301/4496, testimony of Sara Najwer, p. 1.
15. Sztokfisz, Sefer Falenits, p. 256.
16. Ryszard Zabłotniak, "Sanatorium Dziecka im. Włodzimierza Medema w Miedzeszynie," Archiwum Historii i Filozofii Medycyny 55:3-4 (1922): 322; Sztokfisz, Sefer Falenits, p. 212.
17. Perechodnik, Am I a Murderer? pp. 64-65; Dobrzyńska, Falenica moja miłość po raz drugi, pp. 121-122.
18. AŻIH, 301/4496, p. 10.
19. Ibid., p. 5.

GŁÓWNO

Pre-1939: Główno, town, Łódź województwo, Poland; 1939-1945: Główno, Kreis Lowicz, Distrikt Warschau, Generalgouvernement; post-1998: Główno, Łódź województwo, Poland

Głowno is located 29 kilometers (18 miles) northeast of Łódź. The 1921 census registered 1,430 Jews in residence. According to the community's estimates, there were 2,000 Jews in Głowno on the outbreak of World War II.¹

With the establishment of the Generalgouvernement in October 1939, Głowno became a town within Distrikt Warschau, which lay directly on the border with the Warthegau, that had been created out of Polish territory annexed to the Third Reich. By the end of 1939, the Jewish population of Głowno had more than doubled, due to the arrival of many deportees and refugees; for example, on December 29, 1939, approximately 1,600 Jews from Stryków were deported to Głowno. Documentation from the files of the American Jewish Joint Distribution Committee (AJDC) shows that the majority of the deportees were from Aleksandrów Łódzki, Łódź, Zgierz, and Stryków. Many of the newcomers soon were deported further to the east, for example, to Izbica Lubelska.²

Several times the German authorities ordered the expulsion of Głowno's Jews within 24 hours but then failed to proceed with the actual deportation; for instance, the December 6, 1939, deportation first was postponed until January 15, 1940, and then again until April. The local Jews of Głowno clashed with the newcomers, blaming them for increases in food prices and congestion. To avoid deportation, many newcomers moved to summer cottages in Głowno's suburbs of Nowy Otwock, Zakopane, and Warchałów. In January 1940, there were 2,700 newcomers in Głowno.

An Aid Committee for Poor Jews was organized in Głowno in December 1939, chaired by Juda Flamholz. The committee opened a soup kitchen that served at its peak 1,500 meals daily.

A 12-man Jewish Council (Judenrat) was established in February 1940, which was chaired by Abram Rosenberg. Other members included Leon Borensztajn (deputy), Fiszel Baum, Chaim Bursztyn, Josef Klecki, Maurycy Baumerder, and Juda Flamholz. With the exception of Borensztajn, a German Jew, it consisted solely of merchants. The anonymous author of "The Głowno Timetable," preserved in the Ringelblum Archive, noted: "The Judenrat was greatly hated by the Jewish population." The Judenrat was tasked with the provision of laborers and hygiene. It immediately tried to dissolve the Aid Committee but succeeded only in October 1940, when it took over the management of the soup kitchen. By April 1940, the conflict had reached the point where both parties requested that it be resolved by a representative of the AJDC from Kraków.³

The period preceding the ghetto's establishment is described in the "Głowno Timetable":

"The military leaves Głowno [in February 1940] and the Gendarmerie arrives. The conduct of the authorities towards the Jews becomes progressively worse. Jewish shops are shut down, searches are carried out, and . . . there is a good deal of looting. Instead of the odd two dozen Jewish workers demanded up till now, the labor authorities ask for 400 to work permanently, seven days a week. Volks-deutscher [ethnic German] Roger is in charge of labor."⁴

On April 5, 1940, an order was issued for all refugees to start leaving the town on April 8, at a rate of approximately 400 persons daily. The author of the "Głowno Timetable" noted: "The Judenrat decides that the first to leave will be the beneficiaries of the Aid Committee. None of the local Judenrat people or members of the Aid Committee are prepared to take any measures to intervene." To the great relief of the newcomers, this order was suddenly canceled.⁵

On April 18, 1940, sudden rumors spread that all deportees will be able to go to their hometowns the next day. That same day, an order for 2,000 Jews to report to the market square in the morning was issued. As most newcomers sought to avoid deportation, only several hundred of them reported to the square. The Jewish Police (created only shortly before) forced many to go to the collection point. The Germans took two Jewish policemen and one Judenrat member as hostages. A woman, who refers to herself as Nacia in her Ringelblum Archive memoir, wrote:

Furious Głownians, like raving madmen, were running from house to house. . . . [S]uddenly, through a side window of the attic, I can see that Głownians are running into a backyard next door. At the forefront, councillor [Judenrat member] Flamholz [running] with a knife. Terrible screams reverberate; chinks of broken glass can be heard. The Głowno Jews are dragging people to the market square! ". . . should we suffer because of you? People might be shot because of you. You have to go!"—that is what the Jews of Głowno are shouting.⁶

In the end, the Germans drove the 2,000 refugees to Stryków in carts. In the morning, the exhausted crowd was suddenly sent back to Głowno. At least 1 person was shot on the way back. The Germans imprisoned approximately half of those deported in a former factory building near Głowno, where they were guarded by ethnic Germans and eventually released, with only the poorest remaining there. After a while the Germans dispersed these last people as well.⁷

The ghetto in Głowno was established officially on May 12, 1940, on the orders of the Kreishauptmann in Łowicz. Despite an attempted bribe of 15,000 złoty, the Judenrat failed to prevent its establishment. The main initiator of the ghetto was an ethnic German brick factory owner by the name of Wolbert. Local Poles objected to the plan to establish the ghetto in the predominantly Polish neighborhoods of Swoboda and Cichorajka. Instead, a resort area called Nowy Otwock, beyond the southeastern border of the town, was chosen as the ghetto's location. It consisted of the following four streets: Kościusko, Cegielniana, Spacerowa, and Mościcki. Most of the buildings in the ghetto were summer houses.⁸ In July 1940, there were 5,602 Jews in the ghetto.

A wire fence surrounded the ghetto. A Jewish police force consisting of 40 to 45 members kept order within the ghetto. The Jewish Police was divided into three sections, one of which included responsibility for sanitation. Its commanders included the Judenrat chairman and his son, B. Rozencajg. "The [Jewish] police treated the population brutally. Extortion was a common and established practice," noted the author of the "Głowno Timetable." The Polish police guarded the single gate of the ghetto, but only during daytime. It did not interfere in internal ghetto affairs. The security of the ghetto was ultimately in the hands of the German Gendarmerie and its commander, Schwarz. Although Schwarz was unpredictable, there were no cases of ghetto residents being murdered.

An ethnic German, Lansky, was appointed as the ghetto commissar and "hygienist." He and his two assistants terrorized the Jews for five months, punishing them for excursions beyond the ghetto limits and its filthy conditions. Nacia names a man called "Ryt" as the commissar. As of May 1940, a German from Stryków named Sztzyller was Głowno's mayor (Bürgermeister). Along with other local ethnic Germans, he initiated the demolition of Jewish houses in Głowno. In October 1940, M. Nikolaj of Łowicz replaced Sztzyller.⁹

Living conditions in the ghetto were somewhat less harsh than in many others. On Rosh Hashanah in 1940, the authorities opened the synagogue for Jews to pray. For 0.50 złoty a week Jews could buy copies of the underground press. There were also soccer matches against Polish teams in the ghetto. On such occasions, the Landrat issued special permission for the Polish players to enter the ghetto. The Judenrat was in charge of issuing permits for ghetto residents to exit the ghetto, for which they had to pay. The regulations, however, were laxly enforced; the Jewish Police rarely checked the passes, as their relationship with the Germans was based on bribes.

The Jews continued to work in trade and crafts, and some even smuggled food to Warsaw. A number of Jews labored in workshops for tailoring and carpentry in Głowno. Survivor Halina Złotnik, a child at the time, remembers sneaking easily through the fence to visit farmers. Alternatively, farmers would bring their produce to the ghetto. Kosher butchers would bring cattle for slaughter through the ghetto gate or cut a hole in the fence to get them in. There was a constant war between the butchers and the Jewish Police, whom the butchers refused to bribe. The butchers also fought among themselves, denouncing each other to the Gendarmerie.¹⁰

The only Jewish doctor, Szmirgeld, managed a hospital housed in one of the ghetto's wooden cottages. Eventually, the Judenrat hired a Polish physician, Dr. Mierzejewski. Treatment conditions improved after Mierzejewski moved the hospital to a stone house, vaccinated the population against typhus, and ordered special food for the sick. Mierzejewski also improved sanitation in the ghetto: in the fall of 1940, all public toilets were closed, as they were overflowing, and German inspectors kept fining the ghetto residents for the consequent filth. The Jewish Police started to arrest those who did not keep themselves and their surroundings clean. The Judenrat hired an increasing number of cleaners to improve sanitation.

The first roundup for labor camps in Distrikt Lublin took place on August 14, 1940. These became so frequent that Jewish youths fled to the villages to hide. Few of the laborers returned to Głowno, as conditions in the camps were horrific.

The ghetto was suddenly closed after a fire razed several Jewish houses on Łowicz Street on September 27, 1940. On Schwarz's order, the ghetto gate was nailed shut. The Jews were accused of arson, and 20 people were arrested and sent to the Łowicz prison. All exit permits were temporarily canceled. The Głowno Jews were forbidden to leave the ghetto on pain of death. One of the Gendarmes, Karl Braun, shot a woman for leaving its boundaries on September 29. After the fire, the Germans began to watch the ghetto more closely. The largest house in the ghetto was excluded from it, to straighten its borders and make the ghetto rectangular. Trees that obscured the view of the ghetto's fences were cut down. The arrestees were released from the prison at the beginning of December 1940 because there was no proof that the Jews had anything to do with the fire.¹¹ At that time, reportedly 5,300 Jews were living in the ghetto.¹²

On February 8, 1941, the Germans ordered the Judenrat to collect all 600 exit passes. Four Judenrat members were held hostage briefly, while the Jewish Police searched nearby villages to find any Jews still outside the ghetto after the order was issued. The Jewish population realized that resettlement to the Warsaw ghetto, which had already been imposed on several nearby communities, could not now be avoided. The author of the "Timetable" wrote: "In the end, conflict erupts in the Judenrat, it splits into two camps which contend with one another, slinging mutual recriminations. A committee is formed to help the poorer element leave. . . . The committee extorted money from the poorest and did nothing for them."¹³

The deportation to Warsaw was announced on February 28, 1941, for the following day, March 1. A number of Jews remained in the ghetto until March 18, 1941. During that time the ghetto size was shrinking, and Jews were expelled repeatedly from one house to another. A small number of craftsmen were transferred to the Łowicz ghetto and, from there, on to Warsaw; others were picked up off the streets of the Głowno ghetto and then transferred.

SOURCES The following publications refer to the Głowno ghetto: Czesław Pilichowski et al., eds., Obozy hitlerowskie na ziemiach polskich 1939–1945: Informator encyklopedyczny (Warsaw: PWN, 1979), p. 179; Guy Miron, ed., The Yad Vashem Encyclopedia of the Ghettos during the Holocaust (Jerusalem: Yad Vashem, 2010), pp. 208–209; and Danuta Dabrowska and Abraham Wein, eds., Pinkas ha-kehillot. Encyclopaedia of Jewish Communities: Poland, vol. 1, Lodz and Its Region (Jerusalem: Yad Vashem, 1976), pp. 81–84, 164. Published sources include Joseph Kermish, ed., To Live with Honor and Die with Honor!: Selected Documents from the Warsaw Ghetto Underground Archives "O.S." ("Oneg Shabbath") (Jerusalem: Yad Vashem, 1986), pp. 120–123.

The following archival sources were used to prepare this entry: AŻIH (210/340 [AJDC]; 211/674 [JSS]; 302/93 [Memoirs]); USHMM (Acc.1999.A.0154 [AJDC]; Acc.1997.A.0124 [JSS]; RG-15.079M [Ring I]; RG-02.208M [Memoirs]); and VHF (e.g., # 9631, 42996, 48980).

Jolanta Kraemer

NOTES

1. Gazeta Żydowska, January 3, 1941.
2. USHMM, Acc.1999.A.0154 (AJDC), 210/340 (Głowno), pp. 3–19.
3. Ibid., pp. 1–2, 13–20, 35–37; Acc.1997.A.0124 (JSS), 211/674 (Łowicz), p. 40; RG-15.079M, Ring I/438 [743].
4. Translation of Ring I/804, “The Głowno Timetable,” in Kermish, To Live with Honor, pp. 120–123.
5. Ibid.
6. USHMM, RG-15.079M, Ring I/438 [743].
7. Ibid.; Acc.1999.A.0154, 210/340, p. 24; VHF, # 9631, testimony of Sara Boden, 1995.
8. USHMM, Acc.1999.A.0154, 210/340, pp. 3–19; Gazeta Żydowska, January 3, 1941; translation of Ring I/804, “The Głowno Timetable,” in Kermish, To Live with Honor, pp. 120–123.
9. USHMM, RG-02.208M (Memoirs), 302/93, memoir of Halina Złotnik; translation of Ring I/804, “The Głowno Timetable,” in Kermish, To Live with Honor, pp. 120–123; USHMM, RG-15.079M, Ring I/438 [743].
10. USHMM, RG-02.208M (Memoirs), 302/93, memoir of Halina Złotnik; VHF, # 48980, testimony of Emil Hecht, 1998.
11. Translation of Ring I/804, “The Głowno Timetable,” in Kermish, To Live with Honor, pp. 120–123.
12. USHMM, Acc.1997.A.0124, 211/674, p. 33.
13. Translation of Ring I/804, “The Głowno Timetable,” in Kermish, To Live with Honor, pp. 120–123.

GÓRA KALWARIA

Pre-1939: Góra Kalwaria (Yiddish: Ger), town, Warsaw województwo, Poland; 1939–1945: Gora Kalwaria, Kreis Grojec, Distrikt Warschau, Generalgouvernement; post-1998: Góra Kalwaria, województwo mazowieckie, Poland

Góra Kalwaria is located about 32 kilometers (20 miles) south-southeast of Warsaw. On the eve of World War II, the population of Góra Kalwaria was 7,000, including around 3,300 Jews. However, since the Ger rabbi, Abraham Mordecai Alter, resided in this shtetl, the number of Jews generally swelled to double this number between Rosh Hashanah and the Shavuot holiday each year. The town was a major center of prayer and study for the Ger Hasidim.

With the outbreak of war on September 1, 1939, the economy was ruined. The Ger rabbi left six days after war was declared, and the following day, a large proportion of the Jews fled hurriedly without their belongings. Some went to Warsaw, others across the Vistula. Góra Kalwaria was not severely damaged by the German bombardment.

On September 8, the Germans marched into Góra Kalwaria. On their arrival German soldiers plundered Jewish property, and soon they arrested the Jewish and Christian young men who remained. The Jewish prisoners were deported to forced labor camps in Germany and not released for a couple of months. After about one week, those Jews who had returned to the town found their homes standing but emptied by looters. The German authorities confiscated goods from Jewish businesses.¹

The Germans required that between 200 and 400 Jews report for forced labor each day. One Jew, Yankl Czarnaczapka, a tailor by trade, was instructed to organize these labor details for the Germans. He claimed to be protecting the Jews from random seizures off the streets, but it soon became clear that “he protected and looked out only for his own interests.”² German regulations soon forbade the Jews from carrying out most forms of business. Instead, a new business, smuggling food and life-sustaining needs from Warsaw, developed.

The Jewish Council (Judenrat) was established on the orders of the first Kreishauptmann, Regierungsrat Dr. Klein, on January 15, 1940 (he was replaced in March 1940). It consisted of six former members of the kehillah and six new members, including its head, Mr. M.K. Skrzypek. The Judenrat took over the organization of forced laborers. Forced labor tasks included agricultural work and road construction.

In January 1940, the Jews were assembled at the magistrate’s office and were issued with numbers. The Jews then had to sew the numbers onto their armbands which they had to carry with them at all times or face punishment. The numbers were used by the Judenrat to assist in assigning people for forced labor. Excluding the sick, all Jews were required to work two or three days per week. Work on certain details was paid, while the others remained unpaid, causing considerable resentment that threatened to undermine the Judenrat’s system of labor assignments, as Jews sought to get transferred to those jobs that were paid.

The Judenrat also was responsible for collecting funds needed to cover its expenses of some 5,000 złoty per month. Collecting this money became increasingly difficult over time, and the Judenrat employed the Jewish Police, led by Czarnaczapka, to impose sanctions on those unwilling to pay.

To assist the many needy Jews in Góra Kalwaria, contact was established with the American Jewish Joint Distribution Committee (AJDC) in Warsaw. By March 1940, with support received from the AJDC, a soup kitchen had been opened, organized under the supervision of the Judenrat. It provided up to 1,200 meals daily at a price of 10 groszy each. Those without means received the food for free. At Passover, monetary aid and matzot were supplied to needy Jews with the aid of some 15,000 złoty from the AJDC. The kitchen continued operations until June, when the AJDC ceased providing support.³

In the summer of 1940, to meet a quota of 170 people assigned by the Jewish Council for the Kreis based in Grójec, the Jewish Police and the Gendarmes rounded up 40 Jewish youths and sent them away to work at labor camps in Kreis Hrubieszow, Distrikt Lublin. Conditions in the camps were appalling, and a number of youths died from illness or were shot by the guards. The remainder returned home by the winter of 1940–1941, severely weakened by the ordeal.⁴

Due to concerns about the spread of typhus among both Christians and Jews, the local health authorities instructed the Jews to build a bathhouse and an isolation ward. A wall was constructed in the Bet Midrash to isolate the contagious. This work went on for a number of weeks and had to be paid for by additional taxes on the Jews. Ultimately not all of the required construction projects were completed, as they were interrupted by the expulsion of the Jews from the town.⁵

At the end of 1940, the Jews of Góra Kalwaria were confined to certain streets, including Czorny-Dwor Street, establishing an open ghetto. According to survivor Jerry Lista, the relocation was announced in the papers and on loudspeakers, and the Jews were given two to three days to move into the designated area. The Jews could take with them only the most necessary items.⁶ The Polish inhabitants had been removed from this area.⁷ Apartments were hard to come by, and the living quarters were very cramped, with about 10 people sharing one room. Jews were forbidden to leave the ghetto, and Christians were not allowed to enter. Smuggling stopped almost completely. Hygienic conditions were poor, and disease spread among the ghetto inhabitants.

In early January 1941, the Jewish Council reported that about 300 Jews had recently been resettled to Góra Kalwaria from nearby communities. In addition, there were about 100 Jewish refugees, mostly from towns in the Warthegau, living with the indigenous Jews in the Góra Kalwaria ghetto.⁸

On January 21, 1941, the Kreishauptmann in Grójec, Landrat Werner Zimmermann, issued the following order: “All Jews living outside of the towns of Błędów, Tarczyn, Mogielnica, Góra Kalwaria, Warka, and Grójec are to transfer immediately to the closest of these towns, all of which were to be considered as ghettos. The heads of the respective settlements were made personally responsible for ensuring that by January 27, 1941, no Jews still were residing on their territory.” The order also stipulated that any Jew caught outside these ghettos after January 27, 1941, would face the death penalty.⁹

As rumors spread of the transfer of the Jews to the Warsaw ghetto, Jews began to sell off their last possessions for whatever they could get. To prevent this, in early February 1941 the Kreishauptmann forbade Jews from selling their furniture to non-Jews and declared invalid all such sales after February 1, 1941. The police were instructed to prevent all attempts to transport furniture out of the ghettos of the Kreis.¹⁰

On February 25 and 26, 1941, the Jews of Góra Kalwaria were transferred to the Warsaw ghetto. As there was some warning, a few hundred managed to escape in time to other towns. Starting at 6:00 A.M., the Jews were assembled at a meeting point next to the magistrate’s office under armed guard. Each family could not take with them more than 30 kilograms (66 pounds) of luggage. They were escorted out of Góra Kalwaria to the railway station as the local Polish inhabitants watched them leave. From here they were transported in overcrowded carriages by rail to the Warsaw ghetto, being forced to change trains in Piaseczno on the way. On arrival they were required to shower and then placed the next day in quarters prepared for refugees, which included a synagogue and a disused hospital. In total some 3,000 Jews were transferred from Góra Kalwaria to the Warsaw ghetto.¹¹

The Judenrat remained in the town for another eight days to try to retrieve some property items that had been requisitioned by the German Gendarmes. They also attempted to transport remaining food supplies to the Warsaw ghetto but were only partially successful, salvaging 50 out of 400 cubic meters (65.4 out of 523.2 cubic yards) of potatoes, as the Polish Red Cross obstructed them.

Horrendous conditions of poverty and hunger faced the Jews of Góra Kalwaria in the Warsaw ghetto. Whatever they brought with them was stolen. Hundreds died in the first months and many more daily after that. Most of the remainder were deported to their deaths at the Treblinka extermination camp in the summer of 1942.

SOURCES Information on the fate of the Jews in Góra Kalwaria during the Holocaust can be found in the following publications: Gregorio Saposznikow, ed., “Meguilat Guer” (Buenos Aires: Residentes de Guer en Argentina, 1975); Joseph Kermish, ed., To Live with Honor and Die with Honor!: Selected Documents from the Warsaw Ghetto Underground Archives “O.S.” (“Oneg Shabbath”) (Jerusalem: Yad Vashem, 1986), pp. 188–197. The Góra Kalwaria ghetto is mentioned also in Czesław Pilichowski et al., eds., Obozy hitlerowskie na ziemiach polskich 1939–1945: Informator encyklopedyczny (Warsaw: PWN, 1979), p. 188; Barbara Engelking, Jacek Leociak, and Dariusz Libionka, eds., Prowincja noc: Życie i zagłada Żydów w dystrykcie warszawskim (Warsaw: Wydawnictwo IFiS PAN, 2007), p. 213; and Guy Miron, ed., The Yad Vashem Encyclopedia of the Ghettos during the Holocaust (Jerusalem: Yad Vashem, 2010), pp. 211–212.

Relevant documentation can be found in the following archives: AŻIH (210/349 [AJDC]; Ring I/809, 881, 1175); BA-L (Ord. Vers. XXI); USHMM (Acc.1999.A.0154 [AJDC]); VHF (e.g., # 10410, 29091); and YVA.

Martin Dean

NOTES

1. AŻIH, Ring I/809, cited here from the translation in Kermish, To Live with Honor, p. 191; Saposznikow, “Meguilat Guer,” p. 330.
2. AŻIH, Ring I/809, cited from Kermish, To Live with Honor, p. 191.
3. Ibid., pp. 192–193; AŻIH, 210/349.
4. AŻIH, Ring I/809; Saposznikow, “Meguilat Guer,” pp. 332–333.
5. AŻIH, Ring I/809; 210/349.
6. VHF, # 10410, testimony of Jerry Lista (born 1927), 1995; Saposznikow, “Meguilat Guer,” p. 333.
7. VHF, # 29091, testimony of Henryk Prajs (born 1916). This witness, however, dates the establishment of the ghetto in July 1940.
8. AŻIH, 210/349.
9. AŻIH, Ring I/881.

10. BA-L, Ordn. Vers. XXI, p. 364, Kreishauptmann Grojec an alle Bürgermeister und Gemeindevorsteher des Kreises Grojec, February 4, 1941.

11. AŻIH, Ring I/809; Saposznikow, “Meguilat Guer,” pp. 334–335.

GRODZISK MAZOWIECKI

Pre-1939: Grodzisk Mazowiecki (Yiddish: Grodzbisk), town, Warsaw województwo, Poland; 1939–1944: Kreis Sochaczew, Distrikt Warschau, Generalgouvernement; post-1998: województwo mazowieckie, Poland

Grodzisk Mazowiecki is located about 30 kilometers (19 miles) southwest of Warsaw. Before World War II, there were around 3,600 Jews living in Grodzisk, among a total population of about 17,500.

On the evening of September 8, 1939, Wehrmacht units occupied the town. The Germans first granted recognition to the Jewish group that had formed in early September to function as a social welfare committee and gave it the name “Jewish Council of Elders” (Ältestenrat der Juden). At first, the members were appointed by the Polish mayor, Edward Radgowski, drawing on a list provided by the former chairman of the Jewish community, Jakubowicz. Jakubowicz also headed the council, which had eight other members.¹

Antisemitic measures instituted by the authorities, originating with Kreishauptmann Karl Adolf Pott, who resided in Sochaczew, first affected the Jews’ food supply or, more specifically, that of the retailers. For instance, on November 8, 1939, by order of the Kreishauptmann, the first shops were closed, and other storefronts were painted with the word Jude (Jew) in red lettering.²

Soon the Jewish Council (Judenrat) was fully occupied with providing for the first refugees and deportees, who arrived in the town almost completely destitute. They included at least 1,103 persons who arrived on January 14, 1940, from the surrounding rural communities and from Łódź as well; in August 1940, an additional 543 refugees came to Grodzisk Mazowiecki, and in January 1941, there were more arrivals—around 1,200 persons, including some from Kraków. On the other hand, on October 10, 1940, around 100 inhabitants were deported to Łódź, amid great furor. Among the deportees were the chairman of the Jewish Council, Jakubowicz, and two other members of the council.³ Nonetheless, by 1941 the total number of Jews in Grodzisk had risen to approximately 6,000.⁴

The Jewish Council, under the new leadership of Bernard Kampelmacher and Samuel Lewkowicz,⁵ now had only six members, who tried rather vigorously to alleviate the Jews’ suffering. First and foremost, funds were essential for this purpose, and consequently a tax of 1 to 5 złoty per month, depending on financial capacity, was levied. In addition, a fee of 0.30 złoty for food ration cards was instituted. The council used the revenue primarily for support of the poor,⁶ a task it undertook jointly with the social welfare committee. Its members, Maks Hutt, Samuel Lewkowicz, Fiszal Płachta, Abram Wolanowski, and Bernard Kampelmacher, however, could not count on assistance from the Kraków-based organization Jewish Social Self-Help (JSS); such help continued to be denied them, despite numerous requests. No such assistance was provided in Grodzisk, unlike the Kreis capital Sochaczew, which had a JSS representative office, although the Jewish population there numbered only 3,000.⁷ Contacts with Jewish organizations existed primarily in the form of branch offices of the Society for the Protection of the Health of the Jewish Population in Poland (TOZ) and the Central Organization for Orphan Care (CENTOS).⁸ Nonetheless, the social welfare committee—which used its own funds to maintain disinfection equipment, an isolation ward, an outpatient clinic with two Jewish doctors, an orphanage for 40 children, and a school with seven grades, nine teachers, and 500 pupils—was largely forced to support itself. Not even the local public kitchen, which provided around 1,000 meals daily for the poorest members of the community, most of whom were refugees, could count on assistance from Kraków.⁹

Even so, the Jewish Council was able to place about 100 children in the care of the TOZ in Warsaw. Even the religious life of the Orthodox Mizrachim was fostered; the community maintained a rabbi and a house of study—admittedly, the latter housed the office of the Jewish Council.¹⁰

In Grodzisk, too, the German occupiers used the Jews as a labor force. The first work gangs had been in operation since 1939, cleaning streets and doing construction work;¹¹ 10 to 20 Jews were always at the permanent disposal of the town commandant’s office, the regimental command, the Heeresunterkunftsverwaltung (Army Billeting Administration), and the officers’ mess. Especially hard physical labor had to be performed by those who were deployed, for example, in the auto parts factory owned by the Kobylarski brothers. To forestall the arbitrary recruiting for labor that most German agencies carried out in the initial phase of the occupation, the Jewish Council soon set up a labor battalion, in which otherwise unemployed Jews could and had to participate. The Germans instructed the council where to send these workers; their payment was also handled by the council—if it had sufficient money for this purpose.¹²

The procurement of skilled workers and other qualified personnel was the responsibility of the Arbeitsamt (labor office) in Sochaczew, which made official requests for such workers and also took care of their weekly payment or, rather, arranged for the respective employers to pay their wages. Despite these measures, unemployment among the Jews of Grodzisk was high, and would-be workers frequently came to the council and asked to be placed in a job. A notable exception to this rule was the task of road construction near the town in the summer of 1940, which was pushed ahead under the harshest conditions. In view of the German pressure, the Judenrat could spare almost no one from the rigors of this work; a subsequent report described it as a “judgment from above.”¹³

After around 150 Jews who had been arbitrarily arrested were sent to labor camps in Distrikt Lublin in three transports in October 1940, a delegation of the Jewish Council succeeded, while visiting the site, in arranging for at least the workers who had fallen ill to be returned to Grodzisk.¹⁴ This accomplishment, probably the greatest success of the council under Bernard Kampelmacher, was soon followed by the shock of the ghettoization: on November 13, 1940, a placard posted by the Kreishauptmann announced the imminent resettlement from Grodzisk to Warsaw, while the Jews were forbidden, as of December, to leave an area in the center of town, the Jewish quarter or ghetto (Jüdisches Wohngebiet) that was surrounded by a barbed-wire fence.¹⁵

The resettlement to Warsaw, which took place between February 12 and 20, 1940, was handled with great brutality, though no mass killing occurred; after being deloused, the Jews were allowed to take with them 25 kilograms (55 pounds) of baggage and a two-day supply of food. The deportation process is described in detail in both Jewish¹⁶ and Polish¹⁷ sources. Because Lissberg, the head of the German Kripo outpost,¹⁸ had forbidden Jews to leave the town and ordered patrols to shoot any Jew found outside of the town, only a few Jews succeeded in escaping. Only a few craftsmen remained in Grodzisk itself until summer 1941, when they too were sent to Warsaw.¹⁹

Almost all the Jews of Grodzisk—initially organized in a kind of hometown association in the Warsaw ghetto, under the leadership of Kampelmacher²⁰—shared the fate of the other inmates of the Warsaw ghetto and were deported to the Treblinka extermination camp; Kampelmacher died earlier, of typhus, in 1942. As early as the end of February 1941, a member of the Polish underground movement remarked that Grodzisk was empty without the Jews—but that the economy was profiting from their disappearance. Nonetheless, 125 survivors returned for some length of time immediately after the war.²¹

SOURCES The most significant information on Grodzisk, based on research mainly in the ŻIH archives, is found in the following publication: Barbara Engelking, Jacek Leociak, and Dariusz Libionka, eds., Prowincja noc: Życie i zagłada Żydów w dystrykcie warszawskim (Warsaw: Wydawnictwo IFiS PAN, 2007); the book also takes into account the older study by Tatiana Berenstein, “Deportacje i zagłada skupisk Żydowskich w dystrykcie warszawskim,” BŻIH, no. 1 (1952): 83–125. Information about the fate of the town during the war, with occasional mention of the Jews, is found in the diary of the resistance fighter Stanisław Rembek, Dziennik okupacyjny (Warsaw: Agawa, 2000). Little light is shed, however, by Józef Kazimierski, ed., Dzieje Grodziska Mazowieckiego (Warsaw: Wydawnictwa Geologiczne, 1989), which almost entirely ignores the Jews of Grodzisk.

Documents regarding the fate of the Jews of Grodzisk are preserved most notably in AŻIH in Warsaw (e.g., Ring I/8, 9, 15, 21, 320, 352, 806; 210/28 [AJDC]; 211/431 [JSS]). Copies are also available in other archives: USHMM and YVA. Yad Vashem has several accounts by survivors from Grodzisk (YVA, O-3). Local German policy is reflected in the comprehensive records of the Kreishauptmannschaft Sochaczew (APW, Fond 492).

Stephan Lehnstaedt

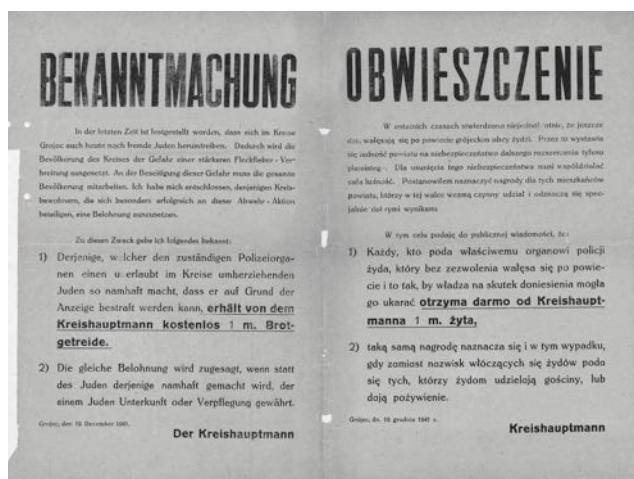

NOTES

1. AŻIH, Ring I/8, report by Bernard Kampelmacher.
2. Ibid.
3. Ibid.
4. See Berenstein, “Deportacje,” pp. 115–116.
5. On Lewkowicz, see the biographical sketch written by Kampelmacher, in AŻIH, Ring I/21, undated [summer 1941].
6. AŻIH, Ring I/8, report by Bernard Kampelmacher.
7. Ibid., 211/431, letters from Kraków JSS to Social Welfare Committee in Grodzisk, November 29, 1940, and December 7, 1940. In its letters, the JSS also pointed out that a representative office could be established only by the Kreishauptmannschaft.
8. Ibid., 210/28, AJDC index of places for Distrikt Warschau, May–December 1940.
9. Ibid., 211/431, telegram from Kampelmacher to Kraków JSS, February 1, 1941.
10. Ibid., Ring I/8, report by Bernard Kampelmacher.
11. See Rembek, Dziennik, pp. 16–17, diary entry for February 20, 1940.
12. AŻIH, Ring I/8, report by Bernard Kampelmacher.
13. Ibid.
14. Ibid. See also Rembek, Dziennik, pp. 123–124, diary entry for October 30, 1940.
15. Centrum Kultury w Grodzisku Mazowieckim, Resettlement announcement for Grodzisk, Żyrardów, Sochaczew, and Błonie, November 13, 1940.
16. AŻIH, Ring I/9, report by Bernard Kampelmacher on the resettlement of the Jews, undated [1942]. See also Ring I/806 and Ring I/352, Anordnung betreffend Freimachung des Kreises Sochaczew-Blonie von Juden, January 31, 1941.
17. See Rembek, Dziennik, pp. 163–170, diary entries for February 7–14, 1941.
18. See Jacek Młynarczyk, “‘Akcja Reinhard’ w gettach prowincjonalnych dystryktu warszawskiego 1942–1943,” in Engelking, Leociak, and Libionka, Prowincja noc, pp. 39–74, here p. 42.
19. See Berenstein, “Deportacje,” pp. 115–116.
20. AŻIH, Ring I/320, announcement of the Grodzisk Hometown Association in the Warsaw Ghetto, March 2, 1941.
21. See Alina Skibińska, “Powroty ocalałych,” in Engelking, Leociak, and Libionka, Prowincja noc, pp. 505–599, here pp. 586 and 591. In Grodzisk, there was also a regional Jewish committee, with which 77 survivors were registered.

GRÓJEC

Pre-1939: Grójec (Yiddish: Gritze), town, Warsaw województwo, Poland; 1939–1945: Grojec, Kreis center, Distrikt Warschau, Generalgouvernement; post-1998: Grójec, województwo mazowieckie, Poland

Grójec is located about 45 kilometers (28 miles) south of Warsaw. On June 23, 1939, Grójec had 9,752 residents, including 5,190 Jews.

Announcement in German and Polish issued by the Kreishauptmann of the Grójec district, Werner Zimmermann, offering a reward for turning in Jews, December 19, 1941. The original text reads: "It has been recently established that in the Grójec area foreign Jews are still moving about. The residents of the Grójec area are thereby exposed to the danger of a serious outbreak of typhus. The entire population must cooperate in the elimination of this danger. I have decided to reward those residents who are particularly successful in participating in this defensive action. To this end I make the following known:

1) He who provides to the responsible police organization the name of an illegal and transient Jew, in such a way that leads to his capture, will receive from the Kreishauptmann 1 m. [cubic meter] of wheat.

2) The same reward will be given if, instead of a Jew, the name of someone who gives shelter or aid to a Jew [is provided]."

USHMM WS #N09666, COURTESY OF IPN

German troops occupied the town on September 8, 1939. Shortly after the arrival of the Germans, they started to rob and persecute the Jews. Before the Germans arrived, many refugees arrived in Grójec; however, after hostilities ended, most returned home or moved on to other towns.

On September 12, the Germans assembled thousands of Polish and Jewish able-bodied men in Grójec and led them away on foot. Some of those who fell down were shot immediately along the way. The Poles were released shortly afterwards along with some Jews who paid bribes, but other Jews were taken away to places elsewhere in Poland or to Wrocław. The survivors returned to Grójec at the end of the month. In the first weeks of the occupation, the wooden synagogue was razed. Later, the Jewish cemetery was devastated, and broken tombstones were used to build a road to Kobylin, where the Kreishauptmann, Werner Zimmermann, had settled in a manor.

On January 24, 1940, a Jewish Council (Judenrat) was established in Grójec. The following became members: Chaium Amberg, Chaim Braun, Noah Bitter, Yaakov Aaron Rechtszajd, Itzhak Brumer, Gecel Rotbard, Elai Wasserman, Szymon Zylberminc, Szlama-Majer Rozental, Szoel Lachman, Fryd-Chil Motel, and Chaim-Szoel Groman. Noah Bitter became the chairman, and Yaakov Aaron Rechtszajd was his deputy. Later, J. Lewkowicz became the Judenrat chairman. Dr. Nathan Boim was in charge of welfare issues; Dr. F. Kotowski managed health. In the first months of 1940, the Gestapo arrested 100 Jews in Grójec, including four members of the Judenrat, demanding a ransom of 170,000 złoty. The prisoners were not released until this sum was paid.

Each day, a designated number of Jewish laborers had to gather at the market square to perform forced labor in Grójec. The most common jobs were cleaning the town, fixing roads, and clearing snow from the roads in the winter. Apart from these tasks, repairing the sewers and irrigation work were also conducted. More wealthy Jews were able to pay for substitutes via the Judenrat.

Approximately 400 persons worked in a labor camp in Częstów, established to support the Luftwaffe military airport in Słomczyn. Between 1940 and 1942, six small labor camps operated in the vicinity of Grójec, in which Jews were employed in drainage for the Water Regulation Office (Wasserwirtschaftamt) along the Jeziorka River and its inflows. The camps were in Grójec (400 inmates), Jasieniec (70 inmates), Boglewska Wola, Krobów (300 inmates), Częstów (70 inmates), Moczydłów (existed 1942–1943), and Słomczyn (200 inmates).¹ Labor camps of the Road Construction Office of the Governor of Distrikt Warschau operated in Kreis Grojec in the following localities: Gołków, Jeżewice, and Tarczyn.² Hilfspolizei and auxiliary police, consisting of Volksdeutsche (ethnic Germans) and Polish (Blue) Police, respectively, guarded Jewish workers in these labor camps.³

In June 1940, 4,889 Jews were living in Grójec. Due to the deportations of Jews from Polish territories incorporated into the Reich, a number of refugees had arrived from towns such as Łódź, Aleksandrów Kujawski, Lipno, Sierpc, and Włocławek. The influx of refugees and the resulting deterioration of living conditions for the Jewish residents necessitated the creation of a committee for refugee relief affiliated with the Judenrat. Chaim Margulis led the committee. The committee received financial help from the American Jewish Joint Distribution Committee (AJDC), which covered only a part of its necessities. Apart from financial help from the AJDC, the committee also received assistance with food and clothing. The committee opened a soup kitchen, which cared for approximately 1,000 people.

The first plans for the establishment of a ghetto in Grójec probably date from the summer of 1940. Around this time 94 Jewish families were evacuated from Piłsudski and Laskowa Streets, and other Jews were also evicted from their homes to make room for Germans. This may explain why the yizkor book dates the ghetto's creation in July 1940, although it states that the dating is uncertain.⁴ The Polish doctor, responsible for health in Kreis Gojec, however, claimed after the war that through his intervention he managed to postpone the establishment of the ghetto for several months.

On November 14, 1940, the Kreishauptmann ordered the creation of a residential district for the Jews in Grójec. Consequently, a ghetto was set up in Grójec on November 25–28, 1940, in the western part of the town. The plans for the ghetto included the following streets: Kościelna, Mszczonowska, Zatylna, Lewiczyńska, Mogielnicka, Stodolna, Stokowa,

Starostokowa, and Nowostokowa. According to a key letter from the Jewish Council addressed to the mayor, before the creation of the ghetto, some 2,685 Jews (in 808 rooms) and 1,027 Poles (in 414 rooms) were residing in the planned ghetto area, to which another 2,108 Jews from the eastern part of Grójec were now to be added. As a result the ghetto would become severely overcrowded, with about 6 people sharing each room. A further result of the ghetto's establishment would be the almost complete exclusion of the Jews from trade, as they would no longer have access to the market square. After November 28, any Jews still living outside the ghetto faced being severely punished.⁵ According to survivor testimony, the ghetto remained unfenced, but guards were posted at regular intervals around the perimeter.⁶

Just prior to the establishment of the ghetto, a unit of Jewish Police was organized, which was armed with wooden batons. Its duties included keeping order, collecting requisitions, and the mobilization of assigned workers for forced labor.

On January 21, 1941, the Kreishauptmann in Grójec, Zimmermann, ordered that all Jews living outside of the towns of Błędów, Tarczyn, Mogielnica, Góra Kalwaria, Warka, and Grójec were to move to these towns immediately, all of which were to be considered as ghettos. Any Jew caught elsewhere after January 27, 1941, would face the death penalty.⁷ The reason given for the transfer was that the Jews living in the countryside were not subject to necessary sanitary controls and were suspected, therefore, of spreading epidemics. However, the aim of concentrating the Jews in larger towns, such as Grójec, was to prepare for their deportation to the Warsaw ghetto.

The liquidation of the Grójec ghetto took place in the last days of February 1941. On February 25 and 26, all residents were gathered on the market square. After forming a column, they were directed to the Grójec train station. From there, they were transported to the Warsaw ghetto. The deported were allowed to take only a small amount of luggage. Cleaning squads were brought in to the deserted ghetto to collect any remaining items of value. The Jews from Grójec were resettled in the Warsaw ghetto and quarantined at 109 Leszno Street.⁸

To arrest any Jews that remained in the Kreis, an announcement, published by the Grojec Kreishauptmann on December 19, 1941, offered a reward of one cubic meter of wheat for information about Jews in hiding or persons providing them with help. To deter the population from providing help to hiding Jews, the Kreishauptmann warned that Jews were allegedly carriers of typhus.

In the course of the deportation to the Warsaw ghetto, about 100 young and healthy men were selected—craftsmen of different professions: carpenters, locksmiths, tailors, cobblers, and others—and employed to work for the German army. According to the yizkor book, in September 1942, these Jews were taken to the Warsaw ghetto and subjected to a selection. Of the group, 83 were then sent to Smolensk for forced labor as part of a larger group of men and women.

Only 3 of these men returned to Grójec after the war.⁹ Another group of Jews was quartered in a barracks near the airport in Słomczyn as forced laborers from 1942 until the summer of 1943. On July 14, vehicles transported them to a forest near Dębówka village, to ditches already dug by Soviet prisoners of war (POWs), where they were shot and buried.

There were numerous instances of local inhabitants helping and hiding Jews in Grójec and its vicinity. More than a dozen persons were honored with the title of Righteous Among the Nations by Yad Vashem.

After the war, in 1945, only about 30 pre-war Jewish residents returned to Grójec. Unfortunately, 2 of them, Dr. Jerzy Grus and his wife Jadwiga, were murdered by a Polish underground organization. Other Jews left Grójec and moved to Lower Silesia, where they set up the Committee of Grójec Jews in Wrocław. By 1947, there were 82 Grójec Jews living in Lower Silesia. They were scattered among different towns of the region, mainly in Wrocław, Dzierżonów, Legnica, and Wałbrzych.

SOURCES Relevant publications include Karolina Panz, “Losy żydowskich mieszkańców Grójca—historia Zagłady: Między pamięcią a zapomnieniem” (M.A. thesis, Warsaw University, 2006); I.B. Alterman, Megilat Gritse (Tel Aviv: Gritse Association in Israel, 1955); Barbara Engelking, Jacek Leociak, and Dariusz Libionka, eds., Prowincja noc: Życie i zagłada Żydów w dystrykcie warszawskim (Warsaw: Wydawnictwo IFiS PAN, 2007); Abraham Wein, ed., Pinkas ha-kehilot. Encyclopaedia of Jewish Communities: Poland, vol. 4, Warsaw and Its Region (Jerusalem: Yad Vashem, 1989), pp. 172–175; and Guy Miron, ed., The Yad Vashem Encyclopedia of the Ghettos during the Holocaust (Jerusalem: Yad Vashem, 2010), p. 228.

Documents on the persecution of the Jews of Grójec can be found in the following archives: APW (GM, sygn. 542, pp. 568–569); AŻIH (211/436 [JSS]; Ring I/881, 1054, and 1069; 301/4802, 5584 [Relacje]); BA-L (Ordn. Vers. XXI, p. 364); USHMM (Acc.1997.A.0124 [JSS]; RG-15.079 [Ring]; RG-15.084 [Relacje]); VHF (e.g., # 58, 17574, 26319); and YVA (e.g., M-10/Ring I/881, 1054, and 1069).

Witold Mędykowski and Martin Dean
trans. Jolanta Kraemer

NOTES

1. Engelking, Leociak, and Libionka, Prowincja noc, p. 317.
2. Ibid., pp. 276–277, 319.
3. Ibid., p. 297.
4. Alterman, Megilat Gritse, p. 281.
5. APW, GM, sygn. 542, pp. 568–569, as cited by Panz, “Losy żydowskich,” pp. 87–89. Panz also gives a more precise description of the ghetto boundaries actually implemented and cites also an interview with the Polish doctor.
6. VHF, # 17574, testimony of Aisic Hirsch; # 26319, testimony of David Drayer.
7. AŻIH, Ring I/881.
8. Engelking, Leociak, and Libionka, Prowincja noc, p. 252; YVA, M-10, Ring I/1069.
9. Alterman, Megilat Gritse, pp. 294–298; AŻIH, 301/4802, testimony of Adam Bitter, 1950.

JADÓW

Pre-1939: Jadów (Yiddish: Yadov), town, Warsaw województwo, Poland; 1939–1944: Jadów, Kreis Warschau-Land, Distrikt Warschau, Generalgouvernement; post-1998: Jadów, województwo mazowieckie, Poland

Jadów is located about 50 kilometers (31 miles) northeast of Warsaw. On the eve of World War II, around 1,800 Jews lived there.

Following the outbreak of war, waves of refugees began to pass through Jadów, believing they would be safer in a small town. Some were fleeing east to the territories that came under Soviet rule after September 17, 1939.

After the town's occupation by German forces, some Jews began returning to Jadów. German soldiers persecuted Orthodox Jews, shaving their beards in public. Hunger developed in the town due to the economy's collapse.

A Judenrat (Jewish Council), chaired by Mojsze Zabraniecki, was established in Jadów. One of the first assignments of the Judenrat was the collection of a 150,000 złoty "contribution" imposed by the German authorities. The Germans threatened to shoot 50 hostages if their demands were not met. With great effort, only 80,000 złoty was collected. Following negotiations assisted by the ethnic German mayor, Schroeder, the German authorities accepted this sum.¹ The Jews of Jadów were subjected to the same anti-Jewish laws as throughout the Generalgouvernement. In the autumn of 1939, 529 Jewish refugees arrived in Jadów: 448 from Wyszaków and 81 from Pułtusk, Gaworów, Stok, Długosiodło, and Radzyń. A self-help committee was established, which provided assistance to some 1,000 poor and displaced Jews.²

Among the refugees from Wyszaków was Ellen Karsh, whose family found shelter in an empty auditorium, along with 10 other families. Many refugees arrived with few possessions or money, having fled from severe fires caused by German bombardments. Karsh recalls that there was no school and that she had to stand in line for bread. Sometimes the bread ran out before she reached the front of the line.³ In 1940, there were 2,591 Jews living in Jadów; as of April 1940, 802 Jewish refugees were registered there.

The Jews were obliged to perform forced labor. Initially, the Polish (Blue) Police seized Jews off the street. However, the Judenrat subsequently organized labor recruitment. Some impoverished Jews volunteered for the labor detachments to obtain some bread. From the summer of 1940, Jews from Jadów were sent to forced labor camps.

A closed ghetto was established in Jadów, after the holiday of Sukkot (October 17) in 1940. The Jews were ordered to build the ghetto fence, which was topped with barbed wire. Because the Jews, constituting almost 90 percent of the town's residents, were concentrated in just one third of the town's area, there was severe overcrowding in the ghetto, with several families sharing each apartment. The Jews attempted to increase the ghetto area through bribery, without success. They were only permitted to take with them a small amount of personal possessions, leaving the remainder for the, mostly Polish, new occupants of their homes. The transfer was overseen by the German Gendarmerie and the Polish (Blue) Police, which also included ethnic Germans and Ukrainians. Once the ghetto was created, a unit of Jewish Police was established.⁴

In June 1941, there were 2,787 Jews in Jadów, including 2,085 local residents and 702 newcomers.⁵ Workshops for shoemakers and other trades were organized to meet the needs of the German army, police, and administration. In July 1942, 100 Jews were sent to a labor camp in Wilanów and 50 to another in Izabelin.⁶ The Jadów Judenrat sent clothing and food to these laborers.⁷

Fur garments, iron, and precious metals were collected from the Jews. The Jews also worked to build an airfield at Zawiszyń, 3 kilometers (1.9 miles) outside of Jadów. Each day a group of Jews left Jadów, returning to the ghetto after work. One day, five Jewish laborers were detained after work. On their release, equipped with special passes, they went on foot to Jadów. On the way, they met a car with Gendarmes from Tuszcz who, without listening to any explanation, shot the laborers near the bridge over the Osownica River.⁸

There were outbreaks of disease due to overcrowding and inadequate medical care in the ghetto. Dr. Goldberg, a Jewish doctor from Warsaw, was sent to establish a hospital, but he was unable to improve the health of Jadów's Jews. To relieve the suffering of the poor, a public kitchen was established, which in January 1941 was serving 500 meals daily.⁹

There were many cases of Jews being beaten during forced labor and being shot in the streets. In the summer of 1942, the killings of Jews caught outside the ghetto intensified. On May 5, 1942, German Gendarmes shot two Jewish men; two more men were shot on May 28, 1942. The Gendarmes shot another Jewish man on June 10. On August 19, 1942, Gendarmes shot four Jewish women, and another two on August 27.¹⁰

According to the yizkor book, in the summer of 1942, a group of Roma (Gypsies) was placed in the Jadów ghetto, including many children. The Jews were ordered to feed them and ensure that they remained in the ghetto. However, the Germans subsequently shot a number of them, including some children. Later, a second group arrived unannounced. These Gypsies did not enter the ghetto but were shot nearby, on the orders of Oberleutnant Lipsch. The Jews were ordered to fill in the graves.¹¹

It should be noted that the Warsaw-Małkinia Górna railway line leading to the Treblinka extermination camp passed only 3 kilometers (1.9 miles) from Jadów. As of July 1942, transports of Jews sent from the Warsaw ghetto and other localities for annihilation were passing by on this line. Many Jews managed to jump from those trains. The fugitives, who fell onto the railway tracks, were often wounded or killed by their fall. Gendarmes patrolled the vicinity and finished off the wounded. Ghetto residents heard about the trains passing by and of the Jews' attempts to escape.¹² The liquidation of the nearby Węgrów ghetto (on September 21, 1942) was especially bloody and was perceived as a warning that the liquidation of Jadów would soon follow.

The deportation Aktion in Jadów began on September 23, 1942 (the 13th day of Tishri, two days after Yom Kippur). On that day, all the Jews were ordered to gather near the cattle market. There was a warning that anyone who did not report would be shot. Armed Germans, Gendarmerie, Polish (Blue) Police, and other auxiliaries participated in the Aktion, commanded by Lipsch.¹³ Before the Aktion, the Gendarmes drank copious amounts of alcohol. Jews who did not report to the assembly point but sought to hide in their houses were shot on the spot. The conduct of the liquidation was especially bloody. The elderly, sick, and children were shot in and around the town.

Probably between 100¹⁴ and 200¹⁵ Jews were murdered in Jadów, although one witness estimated that there were up to 600 victims. The murdered Jews were buried at the Jewish cemetery. A few months later, the bodies were exhumed and transported to Węgrów, where they were burned.¹⁶

Jewelry and other valuables were taken from the Jews collected near the market square, and some Jews were tormented and shot while gathered there. After several hours, the ghetto residents were formed into a column and marched out of town; anyone who fell behind was shot.

The Jews were marched to the Łochów train station and from there deported to Treblinka, where they were gassed. During the march, the column stopped for about an hour near Zawiszyn, due to a lack of ammunition among the guards; a truck was sent to Tłuszcz to get more. Reportedly, fewer people were shot on the ensuing march from Zawiszyn to Łochów.¹⁷ After the ghetto's liquidation, some local inhabitants looted the deserted houses.

A group of 20 to 30 young men, including the chairman of the Judenrat, remained in the ghetto to sort out Jewish possessions. Upon finishing their assignment, the group was sent to the Warsaw ghetto.

Following the ghetto's liquidation, Jews discovered hiding in cellars and attics were shot by the Gendarmerie. One of the families who managed to escape at the time of the roundup was that of Finkelman. A partisan unit comprising Jadów ghetto fugitives under the leadership of Mosze Zieleniec was active subsequently in the forests surrounding Jadów.¹⁸

SOURCES Publications on the fate of the Jews of Jadów during the Holocaust include A.W. Jassni, Sefer Yadov (Jerusalem, 1966); Abraham Wein, ed., Pinkas ba-kebilot. Encyclopaedia of Jewish Communities: Poland, vol. 4, Warsaw and Its Region (Jerusalem: Yad Vashem, 1989), p. 241; T. Berenstein, "Deportacje i zagłada skupisk żydowskich w dystrykcie warszawskim," BŻIH, no. 1 (1952): 108; Rejestr miejsc i faktów zbrodni popełnionych przez okupanta hitlerowskiego na ziemiach polskich w latach 1939–1945: Województwo siedleckie (Warsaw: GKBZHWP, 1985), pp. 87–88. The Jadów ghetto is mentioned also in Czesław Pili-chowski et al., eds., Obozy hitlerowskie na ziemiach polskich 1939–1945: Informator encyklopedyczny (Warsaw: PWN, 1979), p. 201; Barbara Engelking, Jacek Leociak, and Dariusz Libionka, eds., Prowincja noc: Życie i zagłada Żydów w dystrykcie warszawskim (Warsaw: Wydawnictwo IFiS PAN, 2007), pp. 62, 207, 297; and Guy Miron, ed., The Yad Vashem Encyclopedia of the Ghettos during the Holocaust (Jerusalem: Yad Vashem, 2010), p. 896.

Relevant documentation can be found in the following archives: AŻIH (210/370 [AJDC]; 211/454–455 [JSS]; 301/5204; Ring I/222 and 599/35); BA-L (B 162/6852); USHMM (Acc.1999.A.0154 [AJDC]; Acc.1997.A.0124 [JSS]; RG-15.079 [Ring I]; RG-15.084 [Relacje]); VHF (e.g., # 27133); and YVA (e.g., O-3/2151).

Witold Mędykowski and Martin Dean
trans. Jolanta Kraemer

NOTES

1. Jassni, Sefer Yadov, p. 233.
2. Engelking, Leociak, and Libionka, Prowincja noc, p. 207.
3. VHF, # 27133, testimony of Ellen Karsh (born 1925), 1997; Jassni, Sefer Yadov, p. 234.
4. Jassni, Sefer Yadov, pp. 236–237.
5. Berenstein, "Deportacje i zagłada," p. 108.
6. Engelking, Leociak, and Libionka, Prowincja noc, p. 297.
7. Gazeta Żydowska, July 31, 1942.
8. YVA, O-3/2151, p. 1.
9. AŻIH, 211/455, as cited by Engelking, Leociak, and Libionka, Prowincja noc, p. 207.
10. Rejestr miejsc i faktów . . . : Województwo siedleckie, pp. 87–88.
11. Jassni, Sefer Yadov, pp. 247–248.
12. YVA, O-3/2151, p. 2.
13. BA-L, B 162/6852, pp. 88–90, as cited in Engelking, Leociak, and Libionka, Prowincja noc, p. 62.
14. Rejestr miejsc i faktów . . . : Województwo siedleckie, p. 88.
15. BA-L, B 162/6852, pp. 88–90, as cited in Engelking, Leociak, and Libionka, Prowincja noc, p. 62.
16. YVA, O-3/2151, p. 9.
17. Ibid., pp. 3–4.
18. Engelking, Leociak, and Libionka, Prowincja noc, p. 207.

JEZIORNA

Pre-1939: Jeziorna (Yiddish: Yeziora), town, Warsaw województwo, Poland; 1939–1944: Kreis Warschau-Land, Distrikt Warschau, Generalgouvernement; post-1998: Konstancin-Jeziorna, województwo mazowieckie, Poland

Jeziorna is located 19 kilometers (12 miles) south-southeast of Warsaw. As of September 1, 1939, there were around 655 Jews living in Jeziorna.

The Germans captured Jeziorna on September 14–16, 1939. Initially the 300 Jewish families residing in Jeziorna were permitted to remain in their homes and continued to lead more or less normal lives. The Jews were required to wear the Star of David, and Jewish children no longer attended Polish schools.

On the establishment of a German civil administration in October 1939, Jeziorna became part of Kreis Warschau-Land. The Kreishauptmann was Regierungsrat Dr. Hermann Rupprecht. The German authorities established a Jewish Council (Judenrat) in early 1940. Its members included men named Szumacher, Grinstein, Działowski, Freiman, and others. The Judenrat had to fulfill the demands of the Gestapo but tried as far as possible to protect the interests of the community.¹ The Judenrat organized Jewish forced laborers for the Germans; labor tasks included cutting down trees in a nearby wood. In June 1940, there were around 780 Jews residing in Jeziorna.

The German authorities established a ghetto in Jeziorna at some time in 1940.² Reliable information regarding the date of the ghetto's establishment is difficult to find. Jewish survivor Bella Pelcman recalled that pretty soon after the Germans' arrival, she and her family had to leave their homes and move to the ghetto. The ghetto was not enclosed by a fence, but it was not permitted to go out to the non-Jewish area, and non-Jews were not permitted to enter it. There was also a curfew until 9:00 A.M.³ Solomon Freiman's family did not have to relocate, as their house was located within the ghetto area. However, living conditions in the open ghetto were more crowded than before, due to the Jews that came in. He recalls also that one ethnic German family that owned a large property with a farm also remained in the area reserved for the Jews. The head of this household continued to sell milk to the Jews and was appointed mayor of Jeziorna by the German authorities.⁴

The ghetto in Jeziorna did not exist for long—according to Freiman's recollection, only a couple of months. Only one letter from the welfare committee of the Jews of Jeziorna has survived in the archives of the American Jewish Joint Distribution Committee (AJDC), dated January 16, 1941.⁵ In January 1941, the German authorities issued detailed instructions for the sealing of the Jeziorna ghetto.⁶ An internal document from the Department for Resettlement (Abteilung Umsiedlung) in the office of the Gouverneur of Distrikt Warschau, dated January 20, 1941, states that the remaining 700 Jews of Jeziorna were scheduled to be deported to the Warsaw ghetto on January 28.⁷

On January 24, 1941, the chief of the Polish (Blue) Police, Weclaw, warned Abram Konigstein, a former leader of the pre-war Jeziorna kehillah, that the Germans had issued an order to deport all the Jews on the following day. In response to this, Konigstein arranged for an ambulance to transport his family and also the town's rabbi in safety to the Warsaw ghetto before the resettlement.⁸

According to documents in the Ringelblum Archive, on January 25, 1941, the German police rounded up more than 600 Jews from the Jeziorna ghetto and transferred them to the Warsaw ghetto.⁹ Freiman recalls that "German soldiers" arrived and told the Jews to take what they could. Then all the Jews were put on trucks and transported to the Warsaw ghetto, where they were accommodated in synagogues. He notes that almost the entire town was sent to Warsaw, except for a few who managed to escape.¹⁰

On arrival in the Warsaw ghetto, the Jews from Jeziorna were quarantined at 109 Leszno Street. Here they were held for dozens of hours under unpleasant conditions. A critical account by one of the expellees from Jeziorna, preserved in the Ringelblum Archive, complains that in the quarantine center bribery, corruption, and theft were rife. The deportees had to pay to collect the parcels they were entitled to and could only be released from the quarantine center early in exchange for a bribe. A note attached to the account accuses the quarantine manager, Helber, of being a collaborator of the Gestapo.¹¹

In the Warsaw ghetto, most Jews from Jeziorna shared the fate of the other Jews concentrated there: many were deported to the Treblinka extermination camp in the summer of 1942.

SOURCES Information on the persecution of the Jewish population in Jeziorna during the Nazi occupation can be found in the following publications: T. Berenstein, "Deportacje i zagłada skupisk żydowskich w dystrykcie warszawskim," BŻIH, no. 1 (1952): 106; Czesław Pilichowski et al., eds., Obozy hitlerowskie na ziemiach polskich 1939–1945: Informator encyklopedyczny (Warsaw: PWN, 1979), p. 240; and Guy Miron, ed., The Yad Vashem Encyclopedia of the Ghettos during the Holocaust (Jerusalem: Yad Vashem, 2010), p. 270.

Relevant documentation can be found in the following archives: APW; AŻIH (Ring I/22 [488], 821 [780], 980 [781]; 210/383; 301/2980); IPN; USHMM (RG-15.079 [Ring I]; Acc. 1999.A.0154 [AJDC]; RG-15.084 [Relacje]); and VHF (e.g., # 30190, 47896).

Martin Dean

NOTES

1. AŻIH, 301/2980, testimony of Felicia Rotstein.
2. Ibid.
3. VHF, # 47896, testimony of Bella Pelcman (born 1923), 1998.
4. Ibid., # 30190, testimony of Solomon Freiman (born 1926), 1997. Freiman estimates that the ghetto may have been established as early as January 1940, but this contradicts his own testimony that it existed only for a couple of months, as he dates its liquidation in February 1941.
5. USHMM, Acc.1999.A.0154 (AŻIH), 210/383.
6. AŻIH, Ring I/980.
7. The order is partially reprinted in Josef Wulf, Das Dritte Reich und seine Vollstrecker: Die Liquidation von 500.000 Juden im Ghetto Warschau (Berlin: Arani, 1961), pp. 329–330.
8. AŻIH, 301/2980, pp. 1–3.
9. Ibid., Ring I/22 and 821.
10. VHF, # 30190.
11. AŻIH, Ring I/22.

JEŻÓW

Pre-1939: Jeżów (Yiddish: Yezhov), town, Łódź województwo, Poland; 1939–1945: Jezow, Kreis Skierniewice, Distrikt Warschau, Generalgouvernement; post-1998: Jeżów, village, Łódź województwo, Poland

Jeżów is located 13 kilometers (8 miles) southwest of Skierniewice. In 1921, there were 1,048 Jews living in Jeżów.

Following the occupation of the town by the Germans in September 1939, the German authorities introduced a series of anti-Jewish measures in the fall. Jews were forced to wear armbands bearing the Star of David, Jewish children were no longer permitted to go to school, and Jews were subjected to forced labor.

On September 9, 1940, the Kreishauptmann in Skierniewice, Regierungsrat Dr. Rupe, reported to Gouverneur Hans Frank in Kraków that there were 1,400 Jews living in Jeżów. In addition, he reported that in Jeżów the bathing facilities were being equipped with showers, and a hot-air disinfection apparatus was also being installed.¹

The Jeżów ghetto was probably established in the fall of 1940 around the same time as the ghetto in Skierniewice, which was closed on November 15.² According to the recollections of Jewish survivor Albert Sliwin, the ghetto was apparently set up over a period of time. The Germans divided the town; they moved the Poles into the better Jewish houses and then crammed the Jews together. Even some houses were divided, half with Poles and half with Jews. "It was crazy the way they did this. It was not a regular ghetto. It would go on like this for 3 or 4 months." At the end of 1940, Albert's family left Jeżów with several other families, taking some of their possessions with them on horses and carts. They moved first to a vacation home in Włodzimierz and later ended up in the Rawa Mazowiecka ghetto.³

In the fall of 1940, at least 400 Jews in Jeżów were receiving welfare support, which included subsidized meals from a public kitchen, financed with the support of the American Jewish Joint Distribution Committee (AJDC).⁴ A report dated January 21, 1941, noted that there were about 1,600 Jews residing in Jeżów, of which about 600 were refugees, mainly from Łódź, Stryków, Głowno, and Kraków. The last letter from the Jewish welfare committee in Jeżów is dated February 4, 1941: at this time there were 1,570 Jews, of which 552 were refugees. The welfare committee was supplying 200 meals to needy Jews each day.⁵

In late January 1941, the Jews of Jeżów were informed that they would soon be transferred to the Warsaw ghetto as part of a large-scale plan to clear all the Jews from the Kreise of Distrikt Warschau to the west of the city.

On March 4, 1941, the Kreishauptmann in Skierniewice reported that in view of the planned expulsion of all the Jews of the Kreis to the Warsaw ghetto in mid-March, most of the Jews in the Jewish residential areas (ghettos) in Skierniewice and Jeżów and at the Rogów railway station had voluntarily moved to Warsaw. In Skierniewice, there were now only about 180 Jews; in Jeżów, just over 40; and at the Rogów station, only 4. The same report noted that in the course of the departure of the Jews in February, 6,252 people had been deloused and 6,845 had been bathed. The sanitary facilities, which had been established for the Jews, remained operational and were to be used in the future for the Aryan population. The houses abandoned by the Jews were being cleaned and disinfected by work columns supervised by the disinfection staff. The removal of the Jews had resulted in a shortage both of agricultural laborers and of craftsmen.⁶

On arrival in the Warsaw ghetto, most of the Jews from Jeżów were put into improvised hostels designated for refugees. A report in the Ringelblum Archive from March 1941 noted the terrible conditions in one of these shelters based in a school building. Refugees from Jeżów were among 460 people being cared for in the facility. The report mentions difficulties encountered with hygiene and medical care and numerous deaths from hunger.⁷ A large number of the refugees from Jeżów died of starvation and contagious diseases in the Warsaw ghetto. Most of those who survived until the summer of 1942 were among those deported to the Treblinka extermination camp at that time.

SOURCES The ghetto in Jeżów is mentioned in Czesław Pili-chowski et al., eds., Obozy hitlerowskie na ziemiach polskich 1939–1945: Informator encyklopedyczny (Warsaw: PWN, 1979), p. 113; and Barbara Engelking, Jacek Leociak, and Dariusz Libionka, eds., Prowincja noc: Życie i zagłada Żydów w dystrykcie warszawskim (Warsaw: Wydawnictwo IFiS PAN, 2007), p. 212.

Relevant documentation can be found in the following archives: AŻIH (210/384; Ring I/116); BA-BL (R 52III/29); USHMM (Acc.1999.A.0154 [AJDC]; RG-14.052 [BA-BL, R 52]; RG-15.079 [Ring]); VHF (# 33609); and YVA.

Martin Dean

NOTES

1. USHMM, RG-14.052 (BA-BL), R 52III/23, p. 7, Kreishauptmann Skierniewice, monthly report, September 9, 1940.

2. Yitshak Perlov, ed., Seyfer Skernyevits: Le-zeykher der fartiliker kebileh kdosbeh (Tel Aviv: Irgun yots'e Skernivits be-Yisrael, 1955), pp. 636–637, dates the establishment of the Skierniewice ghetto in the fall, as does AŻIH, 301/2063. See also Erster Bekanntmachung über die Errichtung eines besonderen Wohngebiet für Juden in der Stadt Skierniewice, October 15, 1940, published in Guy Miron, ed., The Yad Vashem Encyclopedia of the Ghettos during the Holocaust (Jerusalem: Yad Vashem, 2010), p. 721.

3. VHF, # 33609, testimony of Albert Sliwin, 1997.

4. Engelking, Leociak, and Libionka, Prowincja noc, p. 212 USHMM, Acc. 1999.A.0154, 210/384, p. 17, indicates that in October 1940, more than 500 people were receiving support.

5. USHMM, Acc. 1999.A.0154, 210/384, p. 22.

6. See ibid., RG-14.052 (BA-BL), R 52III/29, pp. 96, 88, Kreishauptmann Skierniewice, monthly report, March 4, 1941. No further information could be found about the existence of a ghetto in Rogów.

7. AŻIH, Ring I/116.

KAŁUSZYN

Pre-1939: Kałuszyn, town, Warsaw województwo, Poland; 1939–1945: Kałuszyn, Kreis Minsk Mazowiecki, Distrikt Warschau, Generalgouvernement; post-1998: Kałuszyn, województwo mazowieckie, Poland

Kałuszyn is located 61 kilometers (38 miles) east of Warsaw. The 1921 census reported 5,033 Jews in Kałuszyn. Estimates of the number of Jews living there on the eve of World War II range from 5,200 up to 6,500.

German troops occupied Kałuszyn on September 11–12, 1939, after intense fighting. In the first weeks of occupation, the Germans executed 30 residents for having participated in the initial resistance and began to abuse and rob the town's Jews.¹ Following this initial round of persecution, hundreds of Jews fled east to the Soviet-occupied Polish territories. As much of the town had been destroyed, those who remained built shacks as shelter for the upcoming winter or repaired their damaged houses. Others moved into mass quarters in the remains of the Bet Midrash, the Bund meetinghouse, and other community buildings. As overcrowding led to the spread of disease, the German Gendarmerie was established in nearby Mrozy (instead of Kałuszyn). Nevertheless, Kałuszyn's Jews were charged with providing furniture for the Gendarmerie's offices. A jail and a unit of Polish (Blue) Police were set up in Kałuszyn. Both the Polish (Blue) Police and German Gendarmes were corrupt and treated the Jews badly.

Jews are rounded up for murder in the market square of Kałuszyn, ca. 1941–1942.

USHMM WS #18569, COURTESY OF IPN

In November 1939, the German authorities ordered the town mayor, Pliwaczewski, to establish a 12-man Jewish Council (Judenrat). The Judenrat included many pre-war community council members who were obligated to carry out German instructions. Initially, Rubin Michelson was the Judenrat chairman. After his death (before August 1940), local dentist Abram Gamze took over. The Judenrat also included Mojsze Kisielnicki (deputy), Mojsze Berman (who chaired the Judenrat in early 1941, to be replaced again by Gamze), Jidl Pięknawieś, Mojsze Alter Guzik, Lajzer Borensztajn, Aron Rapaport, Motel Aronson, Herszel Feldman, Mordka Rinwrot, and talles maker Lis. One of the Judenrat's first tasks was to collect 10,000 złoty; to ensure its payment the Germans arrested 10 wealthy Jews.

From the very beginning, Jews were seized for forced labor that included cleaning jobs, road construction, and drainage works. In early March 1940, the Kreishauptmann in Mińsk Mazowiecki, Dr. Bittrich, ordered the mayor of Kałuszyn to register all Jewish property by March 18. Some Jews were permitted to run their own businesses for a time.

At the turn of 1939–1940, approximately 1,000 deportees from Kalisz, Łódź, and Pabianice were transferred to Kałuszyn via Mińsk Mazowiecki. Some either were transferred back to Mińsk or departed on their own initiative shortly after. For example, 37 Jews from Pabianice settled in Kałuszyn.² Approximately 140 deportees from Mińsk Mazowiecki arrived in Kałuszyn in the autumn of 1940.³ On average, there were 210 refugees and deportees living in Kałuszyn in the second half of 1940.⁴

In the winter of 1939–1940, all Jewish males aged 18 to 45 years were registered for work in labor camps. In April 1940, 38 of those registered were taken to a labor camp in Biała Podlaska. In the summer of 1940, another group was sent to the vicinity of Janów Podlaski; many of these men returned after a few months in very bad health. At the end of that summer, German soldiers arrived in Kałuszyn to recruit Jews for the construction of the train station in Mrozy. As the work was poorly paid and nobody volunteered, the laborers were conscripted.

Opinions regarding the date of establishment and also the location of an open ghetto in Kałuszyn are divided, as the sources provide conflicting information: one reports the ghetto's delimitation in October 1940, with Kałuszyn's Jews remaining wherever they lived as the entire town was declared to be a ghetto; another dates it in September 1941, with only the northwest part of the town comprising the ghetto. Most sources, however, support the former assertion. At places where Jews lived, signs with the following inscription were posted: "Jewish Quarter—Kalushin Ghetto." Despite this, its residents were still permitted to leave the town during daylight hours, as the curfew and blackout were imposed only in the evening.

Similar discrepancies arise regarding the nature of the ghetto's enclosure and when this took place. According to Michael Kishel, the ghetto was declared closed a few months after its establishment but never fenced. Jews needed a permit to leave it safely.⁵ However, according to the Judenrat, the ghetto was still open in September 1941 and sometime afterwards surrounded by a barbed-wire fence.⁶

With the establishment of the ghetto, the Kreishauptmann ordered the Judenrat to organize a unit of Jewish Police (Jüdischer Ordnungsdienst) that included a sanitation unit. The following were its members: Goldwasser, Piasecki, Czapka, Radzyński, Gontarski, Berman, Kisielnicki, Wajnkranc, Dimentman, Gelbard, Kuska, Jaworski, Sadowski, Obronzka, Grodzicki, and Zylberman. A refugee from Łódź named Dembowicz commanded the unit.

Kałuszyn's Jewish Police was charged with maintaining order inside the ghetto. Its sanitary unit was responsible for cleanliness and also supervised an epidemic hospital that the Judenrat opened in the summer of 1941. According to Kishel: "Though the police had to obey the commands of the Germans, they did whatever they could to lighten the Jews' burden." With the ghetto's enclosure, Kałuszyn's police were ordered to prevent Jews from leaving it, but "people ignored them."⁷

In October 1940, refugees from Pabianice and Kalisz wrote to the Jewish Social Self-Help (JSS) that although the Judenrat had promised 9,000 złoty monthly for the soup kitchen, over the following months it not only withheld all incoming cash subsidies but even sold groceries that were supposed to be distributed free of charge. They did so to cover previous months' debts, thereby treating the initial "contributions" as loans that were to be paid back. The soup kitchen was closed a short time later. The same letter also quotes Judenrat members as saying: "There are no people in need in Kałuszyn, but debts must be paid." Other complaints include accusations of theft, waste, and discrimination against refugees in the provision of assistance.⁸

The situation did not improve with time. News of the political infighting, mainly due to the efforts of A. Gamze to chair welfare institutions not only in Kałuszyn but also in the Kreis center Minsk, finally reached Dr. Gamsej Wielikowski in Warsaw. In October 1941, Wielikowski addressed the Judenrat as follows: "The essence does not rest in paperwork or fiction, but in real work and help for the broad multitude of the Jewish people."⁹

In March 1941, approximately 1,000 of Kałuszyn's Jews were deported to Warsaw, but most of them returned within a week. The Judenrat reported only 3,000 Jews living in the ghetto at the end of April 1941.¹⁰ By September, their number had risen to 3,166.¹¹ Around December 1941, all Jews living in the vicinity, as well as groups from Dobre, Latowicz, and Stanisławów, were ordered to move to Kałuszyn. The number of ghetto residents increased to 4,000. During the winter of 1941–1942, 40 to 45 Jews were reportedly dying each month.¹²

In the months preceding the German invasion of the Soviet Union, forced labor was intensified, and more Jews were assigned to dig trenches, fell trees, and repair roads and bridges. Poles and Germans supervised the labor. These laborers were often beaten, even executed. When the Mińsk-based Wolfe and Goebel company arrived in the spring of 1941 (immediately following the deportation to the Warsaw ghetto), very few Jews resisted poorly paid job offers for fear of new deportations. In September 1941, 500 Jews were employed and paid 5 to 8 złoty per day. A small share of the Kałuszyn Jews' bread rations was withheld by the Judenrat for the benefit of the laborers and those in most need.

After the ghetto's closure, the situation for Kałuszyn's Jews worsened considerably, as almost all of them lived from trading with neighboring villages. Therefore, despite the risks, many Jews continued trading, sneaking out mostly at night. In the course of 1941, 12 Jews were executed at the Jewish cemetery.

According to Kishel, when Kałuszyn's Jews learned of the deportations from the Warsaw ghetto in July 1942, Judenrat member Kishelnitski (actually his father) brought a number of Kałuszyn Jews from that ghetto back to their hometown with the help of the Jewish Police.¹³ The community later became aware of the liquidation of the Mińsk ghetto on August 21, 1942, and believed that their turn would come soon. Despite assurances given by the German authorities that the Kałuszyn ghetto would remain intact throughout the winter, the town's Jews did not believe them. Around this time, the Gendarmes and Gestapo tripled their demands for money and various goods. Many young Jews began to flee to the forest or to nearby camps, including Kiflev (Kuflów estate), Jeziorek, Mienia, and Siedlce.

On September 19, 1942, the chief of the Mińsk Gestapo, Schmidt, came to Kałuszyn demanding 500 laborers to be ready for work in Jeziorek the following day, which happened to be the eve of Yom Kippur. As very few Jews appeared for work, since most men chose to hide, Kishelnitski was jailed, and in spite of attempts by the Judenrat to bribe the Germans for his release, he was shot.

The liquidation of the Kałuszyn ghetto took place on September 25, 1942. The Warsaw and Mińsk deportation commando, Mrozy Gendarmerie, and Polish (Blue) Police conducted the operation, possibly assisted by Ukrainian, Latvian, and Lithuanian auxiliaries.¹⁴ According to Kishel, the Jewish Police did not take part in the liquidation; its members could move freely, and many escaped from the town. When the Judenrat chairman, Abram Gamze, categorically rejected the Gestapo request to deliver Jews for "resettlement," he was shot in his home.

The ghetto's inhabitants were ordered to assemble at the market square. Several hundred to a thousand Jews were randomly selected and shot either there or at the Jewish cemetery, where they were taken in groups. The Polish manager of the Berman plant, Sheradzinsky, succeeded in getting permission for the 30 Jews employed there to stay and work at the plant, despite having already been detained.

That night, the Jews still remaining were led to the train station in Mrozy. Although women and children were taken on wagons, the men had to run to keep up with the Germans who rode horses. These Jews were loaded into freight trains and sent to the Treblinka extermination camp. Available sources give figures in the range of 2,000 to 3,000 for the number of deportees. These disparities probably reflect either the inclusion or exclusion of those executed in Kałuszyn prior to transportation.

In November 1942, the Germans began liquidating the small camps in the vicinity and moved the conscripted laborers into a newly created ghetto/labor camp in Kałuszyn. The underlying purpose was to attract out of hiding and contain those Jews who had managed to escape the deportations, as Kałuszyn was one of only six remnant ghettos announced by Higher SS and Police Leader (HSSPF) Krüger for Distrikt Warschau at the end of October 1942. By December, 2,000 to 2,500 Jews had been settled in the ghetto.

This ghetto was liquidated on December 9, 1942. The children were taken away first; however, they were not included in the transport (but killed on the spot). Then the adults were marched to the Mrozy train station; that evening they departed for Treblinka. A number of Jews were able to jump from the train.

Following the town's liberation by Soviet forces, three Jews allegedly were murdered in Kałuszyn: Szmuel Lew Stolarz, Nosyn Finkelsztajn, and a man named Kuski.

SOURCES The following publications include information on the fate of Kałuszyn's Jewish population: Aryeh Shamri et al., eds., Sefer Kalushin: Gebaylikt der borev gevorener kebile (Tel Aviv: Irgun yots'e Kalushin be-Yisrael, 1961), translated into Hebrew by Yitshak Shoshani as Kehilat Kalushin, 2 vols. (Tel Aviv: Y.L. Perets, 1977); Barbara Engelking, Jacek Leociak, and Dariusz Libionka, eds., Prowincja noc: Życie i zagłada Żydów w dystrykcie warszawskim (Warsaw: Wydawnictwo IFiS PAN, 2007); Abraham Wein, ed., Pinkas ha-kehillot. Encyclopaedia of Jewish Communities: Poland, vol. 4, Warsaw and Its Region (Jerusalem: Yad Vashem, 1989), pp. 399–404; and Joseph Berman, Autobiography of the Survivor (West Bloomfield, MI: J. Berman, 1994).

Most of the information in this article is derived from unpublished memoir material and documentation, which can be found at the following archives: AAN; APO (Oddział AP M. St. Warszawy, Akta Miasta Kałuszyna [zespół nr 52]); AŻIH (Ring I/822–823, 210/506–510, and 211/129); BA-BL (R 52 III/29); USHMM (RG-15.079M [Ring I], reel 38; Acc.1997.A.0124 [JSS], reels 8 and 27; Acc.1999.A.0154 [AJDC]; RG-02.067*01 [statement of Michael Kishel, born Majlech Kishelnitski [Kisielnicki], translated from Yiddish]; RG-02.066*01 [Michael Kishel Holocaust memoir]; VHF (e.g., # 6526, 12547, 20270); and YVA.

Jolanta Kraemer

NOTES

1. VHF, # 20270, testimony of Paula Popowski, 1996.
2. USHMM, Acc.1997.A.0124 (JSS), reel 27, 211/508; Barbara Engelking, “Życie codzienne Żydów w miasteczkach dystryktu warszawskiego,” in Engelking, Leociak, and Libionka, Prowincja noc, p. 141.
3. USHMM, Acc.1999.A.0154 (AJDC), 210/393, November 24, 1940, and December 4, 1940.
4. Engelking, “Życie codzienne,” pp. 216, 220.
5. VHF, # 6526, testimony of Michael Kishel, 1995.
6. USHMM, Acc.1997.A.0124, reel 8, 211/129, Sprawozdanie z podróży służbowej odbytej po Dystrykcie Warszawskim w dniach od 8-14 września 1941; Kałuszyn’s Judenrat delegation, while visiting Gamsej Wielikowski (a member of the JSS Presidium in Warsaw and an adviser to the head of Distrikt Warschau, Dr. Ludwig Fischer) in September 1941, reported the existence of “a Jewish quarter, but open”; J.A. Młynarczyk, “‘Akcja Reinhard,’” in Engelking, Leociak, and Libionka, Prowincja noc, p. 65; Berman, Autobiography, p. 36; VHF, # 12547, testimony of Carl Grushka, 1996.
7. USHMM, RG-02.067*01 (statement of Michael Kishel, born Majlech Kishelnitski, 1946 or 1947). It should be noted, however, that in this testimony Kishel did not reveal his own membership in the sanitation unit of the Jewish Police and also that deputy chair Kishelnitski was his father—facts subsequently revealed in his 1995 testimony, VHF, # 6526. See also USHMM, Acc.1997.A.0124, reel 27, 211/508.
8. USHMM, Acc.1997.A.0124, reel 27, 211/506–510; Acc.1999.A.0154, 210/393, October 30, 1940.
9. Ibid., Acc.1997.A.0124, reel 27, 211/506, October 5, 1941.
10. Ibid., 211/507, April 27, 1941; A. Żbikowski, “Żydowsky przesiedleńcy z dystryktu warszawskiego w getcie warszawskim 1939–1942 (z pogranicza opisu i interpretacji),” in Engelking, Leociak, and Libionka, Prowincja noc, p. 227; Młynarczyk, “‘Akcja Reinhard,’” p. 65, which erroneously dates the deportation as 1940. According to USHMM, RG-02.067*01, 2,000 Jews were deported, but half of them returned to Kałuszyn. See also BA-BL, R 52 III/29, p. 75, report of Kreishauptmann

Minsk Mazowiecki, March 5, 1941; and Dr. Josef Kermisz, “Martirologie, Viderstand un umkum fun der yiddisher kehilah in Kalushin,” in Shoshani, Kehilat Kalushin, pp. 324–325; both mention plans in early 1941 to resettle some Jews to the Warsaw ghetto because of overcrowding in the Kałuszyn ghetto.

11. USHMM, Acc.1997.A.0124, reel 8, 211/129, Sprawozdanie z podróży.

12. Młynarczyk, “‘Akcja Reinhard,’” p. 65; USHMM, Acc.1997.A.0124, reel 27, 211/510, January 2, 1942, and May 17, 1942.

13. USHMM, RG-02.067*01.

14. Berman, Autobiography, p. 37; USHMM, RG-02.067*01.

KARCZEW

Pre-1939: Karczew, town, Warsaw województwo, Poland; 1939–1944: Kreis Warschau-Land, Distrikt Warschau, Generalgouvernement; post-1998: województwo mazowieckie, Poland

Karczew is located about 27 kilometers (17 miles) southeast of Warsaw. On the eve of the war in August 1939, about 500 Jews were living in Karczew out of a total population of some 6,000.

On September 2, 1939, German planes bombed Karczew. Many younger people fled to eastern Poland. The town was occupied in mid-September, and shortly afterwards the Germans appointed a Jewish Council (Judenrat), which put some order into the daily recruitment of forced laborers. More well-to-do members of the community paid the Judenrat to keep them off the work assignments, and the poorer people were sent to work in their place. Skilled workers were sent to work in the German barracks and in local industrial enterprises set up by the Germans.

On December 1, 1940, the German authorities ordered the establishment of a ghetto in Karczew. About 700 Jews were confined within the “Jewish residential area.” At first it was an open ghetto, which made it possible for the inhabitants to barter goods for food with the local Polish population. After a short while the ghetto was closed and such commerce was forbidden.

The records of the Jewish aid committee subordinated to the Judenrat in Karczew do not make specific reference to the existence of a ghetto, but on December 26, 1940, the committee noted that the Jews of Karczew, who mostly lived from trading with Warsaw, were now unemployed and could not afford to buy peat to heat their homes.¹

The shortage of food brought on increased hunger. The malnutrition and overcrowded conditions, in turn, led to outbreaks of disease and increased mortality. Jewish communal assistance institutions opened soup kitchens for the destitute, but there were insufficient resources to help them, and the population grew weaker and weaker by the day.

In January 1941, only a few weeks after its establishment, the Germans liquidated the ghetto. The Jewish inhabitants of Karczew were transported to the Warsaw ghetto on trucks.

With the evacuation, the Jews of Karczew were left virtually destitute on entering the Warsaw ghetto. A few Jews who had relatives in Otwock escaped from the Warsaw ghetto to join their families in the Otwock ghetto. In April 1942, the Germans established a forced labor camp in Karczew; about 400 Jews from ghettos in the region, including some from the Otwock ghetto, were crowded into huts that were erected on the grounds of the camp.² They were put to work digging water channels, and many died in the camp. In May 1943 there was an escape from the camp, which continued to exist at least until September 1943. Only a few Jews from this camp survived to the end of the war.

The 1948 yizkor book notes that relations with the local Polish population did not improve during the war.³ However, one Pole from Karczew, Albin Szerepko, has been recognized by Yad Vashem as Righteous Among the Nations. He brought food and water to two Jewish boys, Yitzhak and Zvi Gontarski, who hid in the cowshed of the Szerepko family for more than a year. The two boys had fled to Kołbiel from the Karczew ghetto at the time of that ghetto's liquidation and returned to Karczew with their mother after the liquidation of the Kołbiel ghetto in September 1942. Szerepko's father had been employed by the boys' father, Zeev Gontarski, before the war.

SOURCES The yizkor book edited by Shimon Kanc, Sefer Zikaron: Otvotsk-Karchev (Tel Aviv: Former Residents of Otvotsk and Kartshev, 1968), is concerned primarily with Otwock but does include a small section on the pre-war history of Karczew. The earlier yizkor book edited by Benjamin Orenstein, Khurbn Otvotsk, Falenits, Kartshev (Bamberg: Former Residents of Otvotsk, Falenic and Kartshev in the American Zone in Germany, 1948), also includes a couple of pages on the fate of the Jews of Karczew under German occupation. There is also a brief article on the Jews of the town in Abraham Wein, ed., Pinkas ha-kehilot. Encyclopaedia of Jewish Communities: Poland, vol. 4, Warsaw and Its Region (Jerusalem: Yad Vashem, 1989), pp. 406–407. The Karczew ghetto is mentioned in Czesław Pilichowski et al., eds., Obozy hitlerowskie na ziemiach polskich 1939–1945: Informator encyklopedyczny (Warsaw: PWN, 1979), p. 218; and in BŻIH, no. 1 (1952): 106–107.

Documentation on the fate of the Jewish community of Karczew during the Holocaust can be found in the following archives: AŻIH (211/525 [JSS]); IPN (ASG, sygn. 62, k. 257); USHMM (Acc.1997.A.0124 [JSS]); and YVA.

Samuel Fishman and Martin Dean

NOTES

1. AŻIH, 211/525, Hilfskomitee beim Judenrat Karczew an Jüdisches Hilfskomitee Warschau, December 26, 1940.

2. Orenstein, Khurbn Otvotsk, Falenits, Kartshev, p. 43; Kanc, Sefer Zikaron: Otvotsk-Karchev, p. 843. The Karczew forced labor camp is mentioned in the report of a meeting on the forced labor of Warsaw Jews outside the ghetto, held in the office of the Kommissar of the Warsaw ghetto, Auerswald, on March 20, 1942; see Tatiana Berenstein et al., eds., Faschismus, Getto, Massenmord: Dokumentation über Ausrottung und Widerstand der Juden in Polen während des zweiten Weltkrieges (Frankfurt am Main: Röderberg, 1960), pp. 234–235.

3. Orenstein, Khurbn Otvotsk, Falenits, Kartshev, p. 43.

KIERNOZIA

Pre-1939: Kiernozia, town, Łódź województwo, Poland; 1939–1945: Kreis Lowicz, Distrikt Warschau, Generalgouvernement; post-1998: województwo mazowieckie, Poland

Kiernozia is located about 18 kilometers (11 miles) north-northwest of Łowicz. In 1921, there were 284 Jews living in the town out of a total population of 726.

On September 2, 1939, shortly after the start of the German invasion, Kiernozia was flooded with refugees fleeing from Włocławek, Toruń, and other places to the north and west. Then on September 15, 1939, the Germans started a heavy bombardment of Kiernozia. Most residents fled to nearby villages for safety. Only around 30 Jews remained, and 20 of them were killed in the synagogue on September 16 while praying. About half of the town was severely damaged by the bombing.¹

When the Germans arrived in the town, they rounded up the entire population and drove them all on foot to Żychlin, about 17 kilometers (10.6 miles) away. The column of people, which included women and children, arrived exhausted and hungry and were detained there overnight. On the next day the Germans segregated the Jews from the rest of the detainees, requesting that they go to one side. Those who did not react quickly enough were pointed out by local ethnic Germans and severely beaten by the German guards.

The Jews of Kiernozia were held in Żychlin for another four days, during which they were required to perform forced labor together with other Jews from Żychlin. When the Kiernozia Jews reported to the German military commandant's office (Ortskommandantur) to receive their passes to return home, the Germans humiliated them, shaving off the beards of elderly Jews. On returning home, in addition to the severe destruction, the Jews found that many Jewish shops and homes had been robbed. In these difficult circumstances, the Jews did their best to help each other out. Those who had lost their homes moved in with other Jewish families—two or three families shared each of the few houses that remained. As no Jewish stores were left operating, those Jews who still had a few possessions exchanged them with local farmers for food.²

According to the detailed account in the yizkor book, the Germans established a ghetto in Kiernozia in March 1940, which would make it perhaps the first ghetto in Distrikt Warschau.³ Other sources, however, date its establishment in May 1940, at the same time that Kreishauptmann Lowicz Regierungsrat Dr. Schwender established four other ghettos in the Kreis, including that in the Kreis center of Łowicz.⁴ The yizkor book notes that the Jews were given only five days to move into two small streets on the edge of town, where no Jews had been living previously. At the same time the Germans resettled the former Polish inhabitants of the ghetto area into the larger number of Jewish houses being vacated. The overcrowding in the ghetto created unhygienic conditions, and many Jews became sick.⁵

All Jewish men over the age of 15 were subjected to forced labor. When the ghetto was set up, some of the men were soon tasked with erecting a fence around the ghetto. German Gendarmes came to the ghetto every day and seized both young and old Jews for work. At the same time, they also stole the last few possessions from Jewish homes.⁶

Some secondary sources mention that in July 1940 about 240 Jews from the surrounding villages were brought into the Kiernozia ghetto.⁷ This seems likely, as in December 1940, the Jewish Social Self-Help (JSS) in Łowicz reported that there were 650 Jews then living in Kiernozia, of which 360 were receiving welfare support.⁸

In February 1941, the Jews of Kiernozia were informed by the German authorities that they had about four weeks to prepare for their transfer to the Warsaw ghetto. In response, some Jews moved voluntarily to Warsaw before the deadline, and others sought to arrange their transfer to other parts of the Generalgouvernement where ghettos had not yet been established. According to the yizkor book, with the assistance of paid non-Jewish intermediaries, one group of 36 Jews managed to organize their successful transfer by truck to the town of Ćmielów in Distrikt Radom.⁹

In March 1941, most of the remaining Jews in Kiernozia were transferred to the Warsaw ghetto. It is likely that a small group of Jews was retained in the empty ghetto in Kiernozia for a short period after the transfer to sort out Jewish property.¹⁰

On arrival in the Warsaw ghetto, many of the Jews from Kiernozia were put initially into improvised hostels designated for refugees. In the Warsaw ghetto, the Kiernozia Jews shared the harsh fates of the other Jews trapped there. Very few of them survived until the end of World War II.

SOURCES Much of this entry is based on the Łowicz yizkor book, Gedaliah Shaiak, ed., Lovitsb—a shtetl in Mazovye un umgegent, seyfer zikorn (Melbourne and Sydney, Australia: Łowicz Landsmanschaften, 1966), pp. 364–365, which contains one detailed account regarding the fate of the Jews of Kiernozia under the Nazi occupation. The ghetto in Kiernozia is mentioned also in Guy Miron, ed., The Yad Vashem Encyclopedia of the Ghettos during the Holocaust (Jerusalem: Yad Vashem, 2010), p. 313; Czesław Pilichowski et al., eds., Obozy hitlerowskie na ziemiach polskich 1939–1945: Informator encyklopedyczny (Warsaw: PWN, 1979), p. 231; and Barbara Engelking, Jacek Leociak, and Dariusz Libionka, eds., Prowincja noc: Życie i zagłada Żydów w dystrykcie warszawskim (Warsaw: Wydawnictwo IFiS PAN, 2007), p. 212.

Relevant documentation can be found in the following archives: AŻIH (211/674); BA-BL (R 52III/29); USHMM (Acc. 1997.A.0124 [JSS]; RG-14.052 [BA-BL R 52]); and YVA.

Martin Dean

NOTES

1. Shaiak, Lovitsb, p. 364.
2. Ibid.

3. Ibid.

4. Pilichowski et al., Obozy hitlerowskie, p. 231, date it in May 1940. Engelking, Leociak, and Libionka, Prowincja noc, p. 212, state March 1940. See also Tatiana Berenstein et al., eds., Faschismus, Getto, Massenmord: Dokumentation über Ausrottung und Widerstand der Juden in Polen während des zweiten Weltkrieges (Berlin: Rütten & Loening, 1961), p. 109, citing the report of Kreishauptmann Lowicz, dated July 20, 1940, which indicates that in May 1940 a ghetto existed in Kiernozia.

5. Shaiak, Lovitsb, p. 364.

6. Ibid.

7. Engelking, Leociak, and Libionka, Prowincja noc, p. 212; Miron, The Yad Vashem Encyclopedia of the Ghettos, p. 313.

8. USHMM, Acc. 1997.A.0124, 211/674, pp. 37–38.

9. Shaiak, Lovitsb, pp. 364–365.

10. See USHMM, RG-14.052 (BA-BL), R 52III/29, p. 57, Kreishauptmann Lowicz, situation report, March 13, 1941.

KOŁBIEL

Pre-1939: Kołbiel, town, Warsaw województwo, Poland; 1939–1944: Kolbiel, Kreis Minsk Mazowiecki, Distrikt Warschau, Generalgouvernement; post-1998: Kołbiel, województwo mazowieckie, Poland

Kołbiel is located 38 kilometers (24 miles) southeast of Warsaw and 14 kilometers (9 miles) southwest of Mińsk Mazowiecki. In September 1939, there were 704 Jewish inhabitants in Kołbiel.¹

German soldiers occupied the town on September 15, 1939. In the days immediately following the occupation, all the young men were ordered to gather in the local church. From there, they were sent to a military camp in Komorowo (near Ostrów Mazowiecka), where they were held for 10 days. During that time 13 of the men were shot. After that the Germans permitted them to return to Kołbiel. In November 1939, Jews over 10 years old were ordered to wear the Star of David. The German authorities ordered the establishment of a Jewish Council (Judenrat) in Kołbiel. A Jewish police force was formed in November 1939. Subsequently, a Jewish aid committee was organized, which provided assistance to more than 200 people. Among them there were 110 refugees from other localities.²

A labor camp was established in Kołbiel whose inmates were assigned to regulate the Świder River. This was one of many camps established as part of a major German program for the regulation of rivers and the irrigation of fields in the Generalgouvernement.³

The German authorities established a ghetto in Kołbiel in 1941.⁴ The Jewish population was resettled into a few houses located between two streets. The ghetto was very densely populated.⁵ Many refugees arrived in Kołbiel from other areas. Among them were 157 Jews from Jakubówka and Wielgolas who were moved into the Kołbiel ghetto in November 1941.⁶ Some of around 1,000 Jews who had escaped from the Mińsk Mazowiecki ghetto during its liquidation on August 22 and 23, 1942, sought refuge in Kołbiel. At this time, the population of the Kołbiel ghetto was around 1,100 Jews.⁷ Due to the overcrowding, the difficult sanitary conditions, and hunger, many diseases thrived in the ghetto, including an outbreak of typhus.

In August 1942, the Germans executed about 25 men from Kołbiel—15 Poles and 10 Jews—in the forest near the road to Mińsk Mazowiecki. The bodies were buried at the site of the execution. In the fall of 1942, another 30 Jewish men were murdered by the Germans.⁸

On September 27, 1942, the second day of the Sukkot holiday, German armed forces surrounded the ghetto. The Jews were taken from their homes and escorted to the train station in Pilawa. About 300 Jews—100 men, 80 women, and 120 children—were killed on the spot in Kołbiel or on the way to Pilawa.⁹

From Pilawa, the Jews were sent to the Treblinka extermination camp. The Germans retained a small group of about 50 Jews in Kołbiel to clear out the ghetto. Another 100 or so people had succeeded in evading the deportation. After a short time, many of these escapees returned to Kołbiel, where the Germans used them as forced laborers. After some time, the remaining Jews in Kołbiel were resettled to the Warsaw and other remaining ghettos. In November 1942, a large group of Jews was sent from the liquidated labor camps to Warsaw. Among these Jews were a number of Jews from Kołbiel. After Rabbi Landau from Kołbiel arrived in the Warsaw ghetto, he continued to establish yeshivot until the liquidation of the ghetto in April 1943.¹⁰

After the liquidation of the Kołbiel ghetto, many Jews were caught and killed in the area around Kołbiel. In January 1943, Gendarmes from the post in Nowa Wieś shot a Jewish family—6 children and their parents—at the cemetery in Kołbiel. In December 1943, Gendarmes killed 5 Jews—3 children and their parents—again at the Jewish cemetery in Kołbiel. In 1943, the Nazis murdered 80 Jews in the forest near Kołbiel. The bodies were buried at the site of the execution.¹¹ According to the testimony of Elijachu H., the wife of the chairman of the Judenrat in Kołbiel was hidden with her child in the forest, where they initially received aid from a Polish forester; eventually, the forester denounced her to the Polish (Blue) Police. The German Gendarme Liebscher arrived; he first shot the child, then the mother.¹²

Of the pre-war Jewish population of Kołbiel, only a few families survived.

SOURCES Articles on the Jewish community of Kołbiel can be found in the following publications: Abraham Wein, ed., Pinkas ha-kebilot. Encyclopaedia of Jewish Communities: Poland, vol. 4, Warsaw and Its Region (Jerusalem: Yad Vashem, 1989), pp. 409–411; Shmuel Spector and Geoffrey Wigoder, eds., The Encyclopedia of Jewish Life before and during the Holocaust (Jerusalem: Yad Vashem; New York: New York University Press, 2001), p. 645; and Roman Mogilanski, The Ghetto Anthology: A Comprehensive Chronicle of the Extermination of Jewry in Nazi Death Camps and Ghettos in Poland (Los Angeles: American Congress of Jews from Poland and Survivors of Concentration Camps, 1985), p. 142.

The book edited by Barbara Engelking, Jacek Leociak, and Dariusz Libionka, Prowincja noc: Życie i zagłada Żydów w dystrykcie warszawskim (Warsaw: Wydawnictwo IFiS PAN, 2007), contains brief information on the Kołbiel ghetto (pp. 15–16, 72, 230, 275–276, 317). Additional information on the ghetto and German crimes in Kołbiel can also be found in: BŻIH, no. 1 (1952): 120; Czesław Pilichowski et al., eds., Obozy hitlerowskie na ziemiach polskich 1939–1945: Informator encyklopedyczny (Warsaw: PWN, 1979), p. 238; and Rejestr miejsc i faktów zbrodni popełnionych przez okupanta hitlerowskiego na ziemiach polskich w latach 1939–1945: Województwo siedleckie (Warsaw: GKBZHWP, 1985), pp. 114–116.

Documentation regarding the fate of the Jews of Kołbiel under German occupation can be found in the following archives: AŻIH (210/28 [AJDC]); BA-L (B 162/6852); IPN (AGK, Kolekcja “Ob,” sygn. 177; AGK, Ankiety GK, woj. warszawskie, “Egzekucje,” Kołbiel pow. Otwock; AGK, Kolekcja “Z” sygn. 488/c.s. 32; AGK, Alert ZHP, t. XV, z. 13, k. 107; AGK, Ankiety OK, Warszawa “Represje na ludności żydowskiej przed utworzeniem gett,” “Inne represje stosowane przez okupanta hitlerowskiego,” “Egzekucje,” Kołbiel, pow. Otwock; ITS; and USHMM (Acc.1999.A.0154 [AJDC]).

Grzegorz Kołacz

NOTES

1. AŻIH, 310/A; Engelking, Leociak, and Libionka, Prowincja noc, p. 216.
2. AŻIH, 210/28 (AJDC, Wykaz Miejscowości, Komitetów Pomocy), pp. 1–6, May 6 and June 1, 1940.
3. Engelking, Leociak, and Libionka, Prowincja noc, p. 276.
4. AŻIH Web site, www.jhi.pl/pl/gminy/miasto/279.html.
5. Wein, Pinkas ha-kebilot: Poland, vol. 4, Warsaw and Its Region, pp. 409–411.
6. AGK (IPN), Kolekcja “Ob,” sygn. 177; IPN, GK, Zh III/31/35/68, o. pr. woj. warszawskie; AŻIH, 310/A; ITS; BŻIH, no. 1 (1952): 120; T. Berenstein et al., Eksterminacja Żydów na ziemiach polskich w okresie okupacji hitlerowskiej Zbiór dokumentów (Warsaw: ŻIH, 1957), p. 278; Engelking, Leociak, and Libionka, Prowincja noc, p. 216; Pilichowski et al., Obozy hitlerowskie, p. 238.
7. Engelking, Leociak, and Libionka, Prowincja noc, pp. 215–216.
8. IPN, AGK, Ankiety GK, woj. warszawskie, “Egzekucje,” Kołbiel pow. Otwock; AGK, Ankiety OK, Warszawa, “Egzekucje,” Kołbiel pow. Otwock; AGK, Kolekcja “Z” sygn. 488/c.s. 32; AGK, Alert ZHP, t. XV, z. 13, k. 107; Rejestr miejsc i faktów zbrodni, pp. 114–115.
9. IPN, AGK, Ankiety OK, Warszawa “Represje na ludności żydowskiej przed utworzeniem gett,” “Inne represje stosowane przez okupanta hitlerowskiego,” “Egzekucje,” Kołbiel, pow. Otwock; Rejestr miejsc i faktów zbrodni, p. 115; Wein, Pinkas ha-kebilot: Poland, vol. 4, Warsaw and Its Region, pp. 409–411.
10. AŻIH, Ring II/338, “Wiadomości no. 3”; Engelking, Leociak, and Libionka, Prowincja noc, p. 230; Wein, Pinkas ha-kebilot: Poland, vol. 4, Warsaw and Its Region, pp. 409–411.
11. IPN, AGK, Ankiety OK, Warszawa, “Represje na ludności żydowskiej przed utworzeniem gett,” “Inne represje stosowane przez okupanta hitlerowskiego,” “Egzekucje,” Kołbiel, pow. Otwock; AGK, Ankiety GK, woj. warszawskie; AGK, Alert ZHP, t. XV, z. 13, k. 107; Rejestr miejsc i faktów zbrodni, pp. 115–116.

12. BA-L, B 162/6852, testimony of Elijachu H., June 6, 1962, p. 70, as cited in Engelking, Leociak, and Libionka, Prowincja noc, p. 72.

KOSÓW LACKI

Pre-1939: Kosów Lacki, town, Lublin województwo, Poland; 1939–1944: Kosow Lacki, Kreis Sokolow, Distrikt Warschau, Generalgouvernement; post-1998: Kosów Lacki, województwo mazowieckie, Poland

Kosów Lacki is located about 89 kilometers (55 miles) northeast of Warsaw. On the eve of World War II, the town had approximately 1,400 Jewish residents, constituting 85 percent of the total.

In the opening weeks of World War II, Kosów Lacki's location, 10 kilometers (6.2 miles) west of the Bug River, enabled an unknown number of the town's Jews to escape German occupation. Although the Germans entered Kosów Lacki on September 11, 1939, with no resistance from the Polish army, they did not remain long. As Kosów Lacki was originally assigned to the Soviet occupation zone, the Germans evacuated Kosów Lacki only two days after their arrival. The Red Army's presence in Kosów Lacki, shortly after September 17, 1939, also proved brief. The Soviets in turn evacuated the town after a few days, retreating behind the Bug River, as subsequent negotiations had placed Kosów Lacki back in the German occupation sphere. Some of the town's Jews, particularly the young, decided to leave with the Red Army.

Among the greatest pressures in the first two years of German occupation, which began in Kosów Lacki at the end of September 1939, was the sharp increase in the Jewish population, which more than doubled, from 1,400 at the start of the German occupation to 3,800 by December 1941. Part of this influx came initially from Jews denied entrance at the Soviet border who found it impossible to survive hiding in nearby forests over the winter. Another part came from German forced resettlement to consolidate Jewish communities in the Warsaw region. Seventy Jews from Prostyn were relocated to Kosów Lacki, as were Jews from Wyszaków nad Bugiem, Pułtusk, and Ostrów Mazowiecka.¹

The largest part of forced Jewish resettlement into Kosów Lacki came from German efforts to render those territories annexed to the Reich cleansed of Jews (judenrein). On December 13, 1939, German authorities charged the town's rabbi, Jerrucham Fishl Don, with receiving and caring for 750 Jewish deportees who had arrived from Kalisz. Even though the Germans took some of the Kalisz Jews to Sterdyń in March 1940, the sudden influx created enormous pressure on Jewish families in Kosów Lacki. Approximately 15 Kalisz families, about 70 people, were given shelter in the synagogue. Don also expected every Jew to take in as many families as they had rooms. To resolve tensions over the resulting cramped housing situation, the rabbi established a committee composed of Jewish representatives from Kosów Lacki and Kalisz. The committee ordered Kosów Lacki's Jews to feed their Kalisz guests on Fridays and Saturdays. Don also established a kitchen and dining hall, which served hot meals free of charge to refugees and local Jews displaced by the deportees.

In the fall of 1939, the Germans ordered the creation of a Jewish Council (Judenrat) to act in the name of the town's Jewish population. In Kosów Lacki, the Judenrat, composed of pre-war kehillah functionaries, was initially chaired by Itzhak Liberman. Youth leaders from different political parties also organized, with permission from the official Judenrat, a parallel Judenrat. This youth Judenrat appears to have provided many of the ghetto's social services. It organized a sanitation committee, opened a small hospital for contagious diseases, and distributed food products to the weak, sick, and impoverished. It also created a social committee and arranged special passes enabling some, including the Jewish Police (Jüdischer Ordnungsdienst), to remain outside beyond the curfew. The date of the establishment of the Jewish Police is not known, but a 20-man force was headed by an officer named Enoch.²

Although the town's Jews were expected to meet German demands for money, furs, and exotic foodstuffs, the German insistence on forced labor posed the greatest challenge to the Judenrat. While organizing female work brigades for neighboring farms expropriated for German and Ukrainian use proved relatively easy, the Judenrat experienced difficulties finding 500 to 600 men willing to travel 145 kilometers (90 miles) by train to spend a week draining the swamp in Łęki. The main Judenrat turned to the youth Judenrat to fulfill the quota for workers in Łęki. They did so by establishing a Work Committee to assign forced labor duties. The youth Judenrat also organized a militia of Jewish youth to enforce the labor quotas. The main Judenrat also broke up a Sabbath strike of female farm laborers launched within the first weeks of their assignment. The Judenrat assisted the German police in arresting the protesters' mothers, which soon brought the strikers back to work to obtain their release.³

In his monthly report for February 1941, the Sokolow Kreishauptmann noted that the movement of Jews in the Kreis had been forbidden and that the establishment of six Jewish residential districts (Judenwohnbezirke), including one in Kosów Lacki, would be completed in March. Any Jews remaining in the villages were being moved to one of these six places.⁴ The same report indicated that the ghettos would be enclosed as soon as the weather permitted. However, most eyewitness testimony maintains that Kosów Lacki remained an "open ghetto," at least up until the main deportation Aktion in September 1942. It seems that as the bulk of the town's population was Jewish, the Germans designated Kosów Lacki a Judenstadt (Jewish town)—and rather than establish a separate ghetto within the town, they treated the entire town as a ghetto, refusing to allow Jews to cross the town's borders.⁵

In early 1941, the welfare expenditures of the Judenrat expanded considerably, from a monthly average in 1940 of about 800 złoty to around 6,500 złoty per month. This steep increase resulted primarily from the new orders preventing Jews from leaving the town, as previously trade and labor in the surrounding villages had been a major source of food and income for many Jews. The Judenrat responded by launching a Bread Action in which all ghetto residents received half a kilogram (1.1 pounds) of bread free of charge, subsidized with the help of the Kraków-based American Jewish Joint Distribution Committee (AJDC) in January and February 1941.⁶

As Germany began preparing for the invasion of the Soviet Union in the spring of 1941, Kosów Lacki's Jews were assigned the task of unloading German trains at the railroad station. Then on June 22, 1941, following the German invasion, Soviet planes bombarded Kosów Lacki, sparking a fire in which 42 people died.⁷ Jewish labor obligations were now increased, as a number of craftsmen formed the worker pool at the Treblinka labor camp, less than 12 kilometers (7.5 miles) away. In the fall of 1941, SS troops and Ukrainian guards surrounded Kosów Lacki and took local craftsmen, their assistants, and their equipment to the Treblinka labor camp on trucks. A second roundup of craftsmen took place in 1942. Because carpenter Yankel Kuklavka was not at home at this time, the Germans threatened to kill many of the town's Jews if he were not surrendered. Kuklavka subsequently managed the carpentry shop at the Treblinka labor camp.⁸

The labor camp roundups were accompanied by SS demands for material "contributions." Several weeks after a roundup, SS guards presented the Judenrat with lists of SS demands for a range of goods, from tools and building materials for the labor camp to luxury items and cash payments for the camp's German staff. To obtain the construction materials, the Jewish community disassembled buildings destroyed by Soviet bombing. The Judenrat imposed stiff taxes to meet the SS demands and resorted to harsh measures to extract exotic foodstuffs from local residents, locking up the head of the Cegal household for his refusal to turn over coffee sent from France.⁹

Some residents of Kosów Lacki's ghetto believed that the craftsmen's labor and the town's financial contributions had established a special relationship with the SS at the Treblinka labor camp. When in 1942 SS officers from the Treblinka extermination camp gave a similar list of demands to the Judenrat, it appealed directly to Theodor von Eupen, the commander of the labor camp, with some success. However, the increasing failure of bribes and ransoms to protect the Jews undermined the Judenrat's authority and provoked a leadership crisis. In early 1942, the SS murdered several craftsmen at the labor camp, including locksmith Mordechai Liberman, son of the Judenrat chairman. After losing his son, the Judenrat chairman began drinking heavily. He was found shot dead in the street. His successor, Alter Burstein, failed to secure the release from Warsaw's Pawiak Prison of three young Jewish leaders. The Judenrat's policy of levying heavy taxes to pay for ransoms came into question, particularly after the parents of Joshua Liberman received a letter telling them their son had died in the Auschwitz concentration camp.¹⁰

Jews in Kosów Lacki were relatively well informed about the terrible events unfolding around them. They had learned about the creation of the Warsaw ghetto from Jews who escaped from the capital in August 1941, seeking better conditions in Kosów Lacki's open ghetto. Polish traders who came to Kosów Lacki to hire Jewish middlemen to help them with illicit trading brought news of deportations from the Warsaw ghetto. The craftsmen at Treblinka, who continued to come home for weekends throughout 1942, reported on their construction work at Treblinka's extermination camp. Ghetto residents also gave assistance to at least three Jews who had jumped from transports headed there. The town offered similar protection and travel papers to four escapees from the extermination camp. Some younger Jews in Kosów Lacki began preparing hiding places in the early fall of 1942. The funeral for Joshua Liberman's grandfather, timber merchant Abraham Liberman, who had died naturally, provided an opportunity to mourn the impending extinction of the town's Jewish community: "Young and old, enemies and friends came to his funeral. . . . People wept bitterly and long for themselves." Survivors later recalled the funeral as "the last time that dignity and ritual accompanied the burial of a Kosów Lacki Jew."¹¹

The liquidation of the Jewish community in Kosów Lacki began on September 22, 1942. Early in the morning, Germans, Ukrainian guards, and the Polish fire department cordoned off the town. SS officers ordered the Judenrat and Jewish Police to gather all the Jews in the marketplace but separated off the families of the labor camp craftsmen in the building where the Judenrat met. SS and Ukrainian auxiliaries accompanied the Jewish Police on a house-to-house search for those in hiding, shooting those they found. Others, including a doctor, a female dentist, and at least two refugees from Warsaw, committed suicide. About 150 ghetto residents were killed trying to flee and were buried in a mass grave at the Jewish cemetery. The next day, the SS searched Polish houses throughout the town and in the surrounding countryside, killing Jews they discovered there.¹² Disagreement exists over how the 3,800 Jews from Kosów Lacki's ghetto were transported to the Treblinka death camp. In some accounts, they were escorted to the railway station and loaded into wagons; in another account, Kosów Lacki's Jews walked to Treblinka.¹³

The craftsmen's families were relocated to two narrow streets in an impoverished part of town and were ordered not to leave under penalty of death.¹⁴ Over the course of the next month, the Germans encouraged Jews who had escaped the previous roundups to return to Kosów Lacki, promising them they would not be deported. On October 28, 1942, Kosów Lacki was announced to be one of only six remaining Judenwohnbezirke in Distrikt Warschau.¹⁵ Between 50 and 100 people came out of hiding and joined the craftsmen's families. They were the target of further SS roundups in December 1942, which once again spared those families whose sons and husbands worked at the Treblinka labor camp.¹⁶ Ghetto residents became subjected to random SS violence. One evening, shortly after the second roundup, a group of SS arrived in town

“to have fun by shooting young Jewish men.” On what subsequently became remembered as “Yankel Evening,” the SS “caught several young Jewish men, including five named Yankel, and chopped their heads off with axes.”¹⁷ In February 1943, an SS unit took Kosów Lacki’s remaining Jews to the Treblinka labor camp, ostensibly to reunite them with their families.¹⁸

No more than 50 of Kosów Lacki’s Jews survived the war. Of those deported to the labor camp, only Szymon Cegiel is known to have escaped during the August 1943 uprising there. The other Jews from the ghetto who survived did so mainly thanks to acts of rescue from Poles in the countryside.¹⁹ Tragically, as many as 11 Jews who had survived the war were killed in its immediate aftermath, along with Poles, when the non-Communist underground blew up Kosów Lacki’s Citizen’s Militia building.²⁰

SOURCES The best source about the Jews of Kosów Lacki during the interwar and World War II eras is the yizkor book Kosow Lacki (San Francisco: Holocaust Center of Northern California, 1992), based largely on interviews with two survivors. Other survivor testimonies are from Jews who came from outside the town. The most valuable of these are the accounts of Hanna Lewkowicz, a deportee from Kalisz, who recounts her family’s unsuccessful attempt to cross into the Soviet Union along with some recollections of Kosów Lacki’s ghetto (USHMM, RG-15.079M [Ring I/478], “Podróż do Rosji. Kosów Lacki w październiku 1941 r.,” pp. 1–6, parts of which are published in “Podróż do Rosji,” in Andrzej Żbikowski et al., eds., Archiwum Ringelbluma. Konspiracyjne Archiwum Getta Warszawy, vol. 3, Relacje z Kresów [Warsaw: ŻIH, 2000], as well as in another partial publication in “Archiwum Ringelbluma,” Karta, no. 39 [2003]: 12–13). More valuable for its descriptions of day-to-day ghetto life and organization is Lewkowicz’s “Notatki o życiu przesiedleńców z Kalisza w Kosowie Lackim 1939/1941,” pp. 1–9 (USHMM, RG-15.079M, Ring I/479). Testimony of escapees from Warsaw who lived for at least a few days in the Kosów Lacki ghetto include the accounts of Józef “Jerzy” Himelblau (AŻIH, 301/3073 [in Polish] and 301/3615 [in Yiddish]), Heniek Ostrowicz (AŻIH, 301/3534), and also Aron Czechowicz (AŻIH, 301/688), who sought refuge in the Kosów Lacki ghetto after escaping from the Treblinka extermination camp.

Further documentation on the fate of the Jews in Kosów Lacki’s ghettos can be found in the following archival collections: APSi (Akta Gminy Kosów 98); BA-BL (R 52III/29); BA-L (e.g., B 162/6846); and USHMM (Acc. 1997.A.0124 [AŻIH, JSS], reel 30, 211/573-574; Acc.1999.A.0154 [AŻIH, AJDC], 210/422 and 425).

Edward Kopówka and Laura Crago

NOTES

1. T. Berenstein, “Deportacja i zagłada skupisk żydowskich w dystrykcie warszawskich,” BŻIH, no. 1 (1952), table 10; AŻIH, 301/2732, testimony of Rozalina Kozuchowicz, p. 1; USHMM, RG-15.079M, Ring I/479, p. 3, and Ring I/478, pp. 6–7; APSi, Akta Gminy Kosów, 98, “Pismo Przedwodniczącego Prezydium w Kosowie do Żydowskiego Instytutu Historycznego w Warszawie z dn. 3 kwietnia 1952 roku,” p. 1; and Kosow Lacki, p. 23.

2. Kosow Lacki, pp. 24–26; USHMM, Acc.1997.A.0124 (AŻIH, JSS), 211/573, p. 6; RG-15.079M, Ring I/479, pp. 6–8.

3. Kosow Lacki, pp. 24–27.

4. USHMM, RG-14.025M (BA-BL), R 52III/29, Lagebericht des Kreises Sokolow-Wengrow für den Monat Februar 1941, published in T. Berenstein, A. Eisenbach, and A. Rutkowski, eds., Eksterminacja Żydów na ziemiach polskich w okresie okupacji hitlerowskiej: Zbiór dokumentów (Warsaw: ŻIH, 1957), p. 106.

5. This interpretation of “Judenstadt” is in Kosow Lacki, p. 24. According to eyewitness testimony, the ghetto remained open at least until the first German liquidation in September 1942, as mentioned in AŻIH, 301/3073, p. 1, and 301/3534, testimony of Heniek Ostrowicz (aka Kuczowski), p. 1.

6. The Judenrat’s social welfare expenditures and discussions of various campaigns to provide nourishment after the creation of the ghetto are in AŻIH, JSS, 211/573; USHMM, RG-15.079M, Ring I/479, pp. 1–8. For AJDC assistance, see USHMM, Acc.1999.A.0154 (AŻIH, AJDC), 210/422, pp. 1–3, and 210/425, pp. 1–5.

7. See Krzysztof Dunin-Wąsowicz et al., eds., Raporty Ludwiga Fischera, gubernatora dystryktu warszawskiego, 1939–1944 (Warsaw: Książka i Wiedza, 1987), pp. 344–345; and Kosow Lacki, pp. 27–28.

8. Kosow Lacki, pp. 28–29, 35.

9. Ibid., pp. 28–30.

10. Ibid., pp. 30–33.

11. AŻIH, 301/3534, p. 1; 301/688, testimony of Aron Czechowicz, p. 14; and Kosow Lacki, pp. 33–37.

12. Kosow Lacki, p. 37; AŻIH, 301/3073, pp. 3–5; 301/3534, p. 1.

13. For disagreement over methods of transportation to Treblinka, compare Kosow Lacki, pp. 36–37, with AŻIH, 301/688, p. 14, and the “provinces” section of the report sent from the Warsaw ghetto to the London Polish government-in-exile, “Sprawozdanie zjednoczonych organizacji antyfaszystowskich getta warszawskiego z dnia 15 listopada 1942 roku,” in Berenstein, Eisenbach, and Rutkowski, Eksterminacja, p. 310.

14. Survivor H. Ostrowicz claimed that after the November 1942 deportations the Germans relocated the town’s remaining Jews to a ghetto “on the [town’s] square” and physically enclosed it. Other eyewitnesses, however, do not mention the smaller ghetto’s physical enclosure. Compare here AŻIH, 301/3534, p. 1, with Kosow Lacki, p. 38.

15. Police Decree issued by HSSPF Krüger of the Generalgouvernement, October 28, 1942, published in Tatiana Berenstein et al., eds., Faschismus, Getto, Massenmord: Dokumentation über Ausrottung und Widerstand der Juden in Polen während des zweiten Weltkrieges (Berlin: Rütten & Loening, 1961), pp. 342–344.

16. Kosow Lacki, pp. 38–40. BA-L, B 162/6846, p. 97, dates two roundups on December 9 and 19, 1942.

17. Kosow Lacki, p. 39.

18. Ibid.

19. See Israel Gutman and Sara Bender, eds., The Encyclopedia of the Righteous among the Nations: Rescuers of Jews during the Holocaust—Poland, vol. 1 (Jerusalem: Yad Vashem, 2004), pp. 61–62, 362–363.

20. Edward Kopówka, “Kosów Lacki,” Treblinka: unpub. draft, 2008, pp. 5–6.

ŁASKARZEW

*Pre-1939: Łaskarzew, village, Lublin województwo, Poland;
1939–1945: Łaskarzew, Kreis Garwolin, Distrikt Warschau, Generalgouvernement; post-1998: Łaskarzew, town, województwo
mazowieckie, Poland*

Łaskarzew is located about 75 kilometers (47 miles) southeast of Warsaw. In 1921, there were 1,252 Jews living in the village.

On September 17, 1939, the Wehrmacht shot 53 residents, of whom 30 were Jewish, in retaliation for their defense of the town. In addition, the Germans also razed 85 percent of the buildings in the village center, including the synagogue and the ritual bath. Another 27 Jews were shot on November 28, 1939.

At first, German Gendarmerie officials from the towns of Sobolew and Garwolin were in charge of affairs in Łaskarzew; a Schutzpolizei unit was later stationed in the village. A unit of Polish (Blue) Police, commanded by Kazimierz Smarzewski, was based in Łaskarzew. Smarzewski reportedly helped the local Jews, among them ghetto survivor Zygmunt (Srul) Warszawer.¹

A 12-man Judenrat was established in late 1939 with Yaakow Hersch Frimer (Jankiel Frymer) as its chairman. By January 1941, Chaim Goldberg chaired the Judenrat; tradesman Dawid Zelman was his deputy. Other Judenrat members included Mendel Zylbersztajn, A. Lerner, and S.B. Wakszal. A unit of Jewish Police was established later.

In March 1940, approximately 100 refugees from Garwolin settled in Łaskarzew. In November 1940, a second wave of Jews from Garwolin arrived, due to the partial deportation of the Jews from the Kreis center.

In April 1941, a branch of the Jewish Social Self-Help (JSS) was established in Łaskarzew. It was staffed mostly by members of the Judenrat; Zelman served as chairman, Zylbersztajn was his deputy, and Goldberg and Frimer were also members. The JSS committee opened a soup kitchen on May 20, 1941.²

An open ghetto was established in November 1941. The ghetto was located in the western part of the village and included the following streets: Dąbrowska, 11 Listopada, Wolska, Garbarska, and Alejowa. It housed between 1,300 and 1,500 Jews, including deportees from nearby Maciejowice, Wola Rębkowska, Górzno, and Pilawa. During its existence, approximately 200 Jews were rounded up for a nearby labor camp in Wilga. The labor consisted of digging drainage ditches along the Vistula River.³

On January 19, 1942, as reported in Gazeta Żydowska, it was announced that the ghetto was closed: "The Jews are not to leave the borders of the [Jewish] quarter on pain of retribution," warned the newspaper. The Poles who had property within the ghetto's perimeter were allowed access with special passes issued by the local authorities. The Jews and Poles were able to visit each other's quarters only with written permission. The Polish police were charged with checking the passes.⁴

According to survivor Warszawer, the ghetto was unguarded. Kazimierz Majewski, a teenage scout at the time, testified that although the ghetto was fenced, entering it was very easy for the Poles. Majewski's scout unit was charged with the delivery of food to ghetto residents and surveillance of the ghetto. In particular, they were to report whether there were Poles taking advantage of the Jews' situation. Warszawer, who was a ritual slaughterer, was still able to conduct some business by smuggling kosher meat into the Warsaw ghetto.⁵

By February 1942, a medical office for walk-in patients and a small hospital had been opened in the ghetto. At this time, the JSS tried to procure orders for craftsmen who still possessed their workshops (25 tailors, 25 cobblers, and three carpenters). Although the six pre-war manual tanneries were razed in 1939, the tanners were still able to produce Russian leather and were seeking employment.⁶

Survivor Estera Waldman testified that the Jews were aware of and frightened by deportations in the region. "The Bürgermeister . . . promises to keep holding back the deportation of the Jews, and for this they pay [him]." The Bürgermeister Madejski also took hostages and released them upon payment. Equally as hostile to the Poles, Madejski was sentenced to death by the Polish Underground State and executed after his transfer to Osiecko. In the course of the summer of 1942, local Jews were paving the Łaskarzew-Sobolew road. Estera Waldman has described the weeks prior to the ghetto's liquidation:

The men are escaping to the Wilga camp and pay to be admitted there, although before they were paying not to be taken to that camp. Women with children also want to be admitted to the camp, but they are not let in. They have been standing outside the "Lager" [camp] for two days begging to be let in, while their husbands remain inside advising them to run away. On the third day, the Gestapo comes and orders the surrender of all valuables, for which they promise good jobs on estates. When the women gave up everything they were walked into the forest and shot. . . . Sixty-seven women and children were murdered.⁷

The ghetto was liquidated on the morning of September 30, 1942. The Germans managed to round up only about 400 Jews and transport them to the Treblinka extermination camp via Sobolew. According to Waldman, as many as 900 Jews managed to escape the deportation and reach the forests, including the elderly rabbi. Another source, the Polish court inquiry (Ankieta Sądow Grodzkich), contradicts Waldman's estimates, reporting 900 deported, 200 escapees, and 200 sent to the Wilga camp.

Shortly after the ghetto's liquidation, the Germans announced that they were "establishing a second ghetto," reported Waldman. She further added: "The Jews are returning from the forests." This remnant ghetto existed for about six weeks, after which its residents were sent to Treblinka. Approximately 120 Jews were shot in the hunt for escapees of the first and final ghetto liquidations.⁸

SOURCES The following publications refer to the Łaskarzew ghetto: Czesław Pilichowski et al., eds., Obozy hitlerowskie na ziemiach polskich 1939–1945: Informator encyklopedyczny (Warsaw: PWN, 1979), p. 287; Barbara Engelking, Jacek Leociak, and Dariusz Libionka, eds., Prowincja noc: Życie i zagłada Żydów w dystrykcie warszawskim (Warsaw: Wydawnictwo IFiS PAN, 2007), pp. 214, 297.

Archival sources include the following: AŻIH (211/658 [JSS]; 211/393–394 [JSS]; 301/35 [Relacje]); USHMM (RG-15.019M [court inquiries about executions and mass graves in districts, provinces, camps, and ghettos], reels 13 and 18; Acc.1997.A.0124 [JSS]); and VHF (# 15795, 39015).

Jolanta Kraemer

NOTES

1. USHMM, RG-15.019M (court inquiries about executions and mass graves in districts, provinces, camps, and ghettos), reel 13, p. 234; Acc.1997.A.0124 (JSS), 211/658 (Łaskarzew), p. 1; Rejestr miejsc i faktów zbrodni popełnionych przez okupanta hitlerowskiego na ziemiach polskich w latach 1939–1945: Województwo siedleckie (Warsaw: GKBZHP, 1985), p. 136; VHF, # 39015, testimony of Kazimierz Majek, 1997; # 15795, testimony of Zygmunt (Srul) Warszawer, 1996; free.of.pl/l/laskare/historia_laskarzew_1939-1945_3.html.

2. USHMM, Acc.1997.A.0124 (JSS), 211/393 (Garwolin), pp. 4, 19–20; 211/394 (Garwolin), p. 32; 211/658, pp. 4, 6.

3. Ibid., RG-15.019M, reel 18, file 52; free.of.pl/l/laskare/historia_laskarzew_1939-1945_3.html.

4. Gazeta Żydowska, January 24, 1942.

5. VHF, # 39015; # 15795.

6. USHMM, Acc.1997.A.0124 (JSS), 211/658, pp. 24–26.

7. AŻIH, 301/35, testimony of Estera Waldman, undated; free.of.pl/l/laskare/historia_laskarzew_1939-1945_3.html.

8. AŻIH, 310/35; Rejestr miejsc, p. 137; USHMM, RG-15.019M, reel 18, file 52.

LATOWICZ

Pre-1939: Latowicz, village, Warsaw województwo, Poland; 1939–1945: Kreis Minsk Mazowiecki, Distrikt Warschau, Generalgouvernement; post-1998: województwo mazowieckie, Poland

Latowicz is located approximately 40 kilometers (25 miles) southwest of Siedlce. According to the 1921 census, Latowicz had 416 Jewish residents.

Ninety percent of the town's Jewish buildings, including a synagogue and ritual bath, were razed in the initial days of World War II. The Germans established a Jewish Council (Judenrat), which included the following members: Chaim Płatek, Majer Piaskowski, Majer Akierman, Chajm Zysman, Wolf Zabielski, Mendel Szlechter, Aron Winograd, Gerszon Warszaw, Abram Berger, and Munysz Aizenberg. All were also members of the Committee for Help to Poor Jews established to assist local homeless and refugees. Płatek was the committee's president, and Piaskowski was his deputy. According to the committee's register, there were 418 Jews living in Latowicz in April 1940. Of that number, 110 people (23 families) had lost their dwellings.¹

Latowicz's Jewish organizations were also to take care of more than 130 Jews living in three-neighboring gminy at the time: 105 Jews living in gmina Jeruzal (Waliska, 3 families; Jeruzal, 5; Dębówce, 4; Lipiny, 1; Borki, 1; Płomieniec, 2; Łukowiec, 2; Wężyczyn, 1); 18 Jews living in Wielgolas (Dęby Małe, 3 families; Kamionka, 1); and 11 people from Iwowe (Iwowe, 2 families; Oleksianka, 1).²

The community began restoration of both the synagogue and the ritual bath in 1939 but was short 8,000 złoty needed to finish the project. The plan was to use the bath also as a location for the soup kitchen. In July 1940, the committee reported that Latowicz's Jews were occupying 10 percent of the pre-war households, with two to three families sharing an apartment, adding: "As regards accommodation: we would like to mention that the local authorities are clearing the Jewish families from Polish-owned buildings." By that time several dozen families had been removed already. The letter ended: "All our interventions were futile and so the Judenrat was forced to crowd those [removed families] in with other Jews." Nine additional Jewish families occupying one house were given until August 11, 1941, to move out.

Due to a few cases of typhus among the Jews, the Kreis doctor ordered the immediate establishment of a quarantine facility for 32 persons. The doctor also forced the Judenrat to finish renovation of the bath for this purpose. The severely ill were sent to a hospital in Mińsk Mazowiecki. Dr. Eliaasz Piętroń treated local patients.³

By mid-September 1941, there were 600 Jews living in Latowicz. Dr. Wielikowski of the Jewish Social Self-Help (JSS) in Warsaw, who inspected the village at the time, stated that there was no Jewish quarter in the village. Fifty Jews labored in the Chyżyn labor camp located 4 kilometers (2.5 miles) outside of Latowicz. The Judenrat provided them with half a kilogram (1.1 pounds) of bread daily and 10 złoty.⁴

A ghetto was established in November 1941. A German report on the concentration of Jews in Kreis Minsk Mazowiecki of March 3, 1942, states that in November 1941 "120 Jews from Jeruzal were resettled to the Jewish quarter in Latowicz."⁵

According to the Latowicz JSS branch, the relocation from Jeruzal took place a little later, at the beginning of December 1941. The number of newcomers was in fact twice that given in the above-cited German report. The registration of Jeruzal's Jews conducted on January 4, 1942, after their arrival in Latowicz, revealed 226 newcomers, of which only 118 were previously registered officially as living in the Jeruzal gmina and therefore included in the German statistics.

With the resettlement of the Jews from Jeruzal, the ghetto was declared closed. One Judenrat member lamented: "One is unable to trade at all because one cannot leave our locality as it is 'Closed for the Jews' [forbidden for the Jews to leave]."

The typhus outbreak reached epidemic proportions. At the beginning of January 1942, five infected people were transported to the Mińsk Mazowiecki hospital. The community struggled to pay hospital bills, feed the sick, maintain quarantine, and pay its guards.

In April 1942, there were 700 Jews in Latowicz. As of April 20, 27 Jews from Latowicz were conscripted to work at a labor camp in Kuflew (7 kilometers [4.4 miles] away), to which they had to walk daily. Those laborers were compensated with 20 grams (0.7 ounces) of bread and a bowl of rutabaga soup.⁶

According to J.A. Młynarczyk, a number of Jews from Latowicz were ordered to move to Kałuszyn; the date of this resettlement is unknown.

Secondary sources report that the ghetto was liquidated on October 14, 1942, when the Latowicz community was sent to the Treblinka extermination camp.

SOURCES Publications that include references to the Latowicz ghetto include Czesław Pilichowski et al., eds., Obozy hitlerowskie na ziemiach polskich 1939–1945: Informator encyklopedyczny (Warsaw: PWN, 1979), p. 265; and Jacek A. Młynarczyk, “Akcja Reinhard w gettach prowincjonalnych dystryktu warszawskiego 1942–1943,” in Barbara Engelking, Jacek Leociak, and Dariusz Libionka, eds., Prowincja noc: życie i zagłada Żydów w dystrykcie warszawskim (Warsaw: Wydawn. IFiS PAN, 2007), p. 65.

The following archival sources were used in the preparation of this entry: AŻIH (210/445 [AJDC]; 211/129 and 634 [JSS]); and USHMM (Acc.1997.A.0124 [JSS]; Acc.1999.A.0154 [AJDC]).

Jolanta Kraemer

NOTES

1. USHMM, Acc.1999.A.0154 (AJDC), 210/445 (Latowicz), pp. 6–9, 18, 23; Acc.1997.A.0124 (JSS), 211/634 (Latowicz), pp. 10–11.

2. Ibid., Acc.1999.A.0154, 210/445, p. 19.

3. Ibid., Acc.1997.A.0124, 211/634, pp. 10–11, 13.

4. Ibid., 211/634, p. 22, and 211/129 (Korespondencja Prezydium ŻSS z Gemisem Wielikowskim—członkiem Prezydium ŻSS i Doradcą przy Szefie dystryktu warszawskiego, 2 IX 1941–30 X 1941), “Sprawozdanie z podróży służbowej odbytej po dystrykcie warszawskim w dniach od 8–14 września 1941,” p. 57.

5. T. Berenstein, A. Eisenbach, and A. Rutkowski, eds., Eksterminacja Żydów na ziemiach polskich w okresie okupacji hitlerowskiej: Zbiór dokumentów (Warsaw: ŻIH, 1957), Document 145, pp. 278–279; USHMM, Acc.1997.A.0124, 211/634, pp. 40–42.

6. USHMM, Acc.1997.A.0124, 211/634, pp. 26, 40–42.

LEGIONOWO

Pre-1939: Legionowo, village, Warsaw województwo, Poland; 1939–1945: Kreis Warschau-Land, Distrikt Warschau, Generalgouvernement; post-1998: town, województwo mazowieckie, Poland

Legionowo is located 22 kilometers (14 miles) north of Warsaw. Ludwisin, where the ghetto was located, is a southwestern neighborhood of Legionowo that borders the gmina of Jabłonna. The number of Jewish residents before the war is unknown, but it is unlikely that it exceeded 400.

A 12-man Judenrat was established in February 1940. In December of that year its members included Chil Rozenberg (chairman), Chaim Rozenberg, Abram Rozen (secretary and in charge of Jewish labor), Dr. Abraham Finkelsztejn, Hersz Finkelsztejn, Efraim Szafraniec, Szlama Sterdyner, Moszek Horowicz, Lejb Brzoza, and Motel Nizki.¹ Chana Ruta Magied wrote about the chairman Rozenberg: “I know of one incident when he acted with impropriety. It was shortly before the ghetto liquidation. The son of the Judenrat chairman was caught outside of the ghetto. Rozenberg gave the Germans some other Jew, because he wanted to save his son.”²

In January 1940, the Judenrat reported to the American Jewish Joint Distribution Committee (AJDC) that there were approximately 1,000 refugees in Legionowo benefiting from the local soup kitchen, which was financed primarily by the AJDC. The AJDC conducted an inspection and requested a list of Jews, which was conducted by the Judenrat in March 1940. It showed that there were only 588 Jews in Legionowo, and no more than 300 of them were refugees. The inspector established that a “fictitious register” had been made, falsely inflating the number of family members. The Judenrat was ordered to decrease the number of kitchen meals it delivered accordingly and reconstitute the composition of its self-help committee, led by the Judenrat chairman Rozenberg. At this time, there were refugees from the following localities in Legionowo: Nowy Dwór Mazowiecki, Serock, Nasielsk, Żuromin, Biezuń, Sierpc, Chorzele, Nowe Miasto, Włocławek, Bukowiec, Wieliszew, Lipno, Pomiechówek, Ciechanów, Różany, and Pułtusk.

Legionowo’s head (wójt) stated that based on a register dated April 4, 1940, there were 981 Jews living in Legionowo. That same month, the Judenrat stated there were 1,667 Jews living in the village.³

On November 19, 1940, the Judenrat wrote to the AJDC in Warsaw: “We are reporting that on November 15 [1940] a Jewish quarter was established on the territory of Legionowo; it includes [the Jewish] population of three gminas: Legionowo, Jabłonna-Henryków, and Nieporęt”—the latter having already been resettled.⁴ There is little information as to how many Jews were transferred from each of these localities, but it is known that Henryków and Płudy had no more than 200 residents—including 88 refugees—in August 1940.⁵

The ghetto was located on the periphery of Legionowo in a neighborhood called Ludwisin; some sources refer to it only by this name. Other names include Ludwisin-Legionowo, Legionowo, but also Jabłonna, due to the ghetto’s proximity to that town’s border. Hence Magied’s description: “They created [the ghetto] on Pola Ludwisińskie [Ludwisin Fields], between Jabłonna and Legionowo. . . . It was a pretty neighborhood, practically half-rural, green, full of orchards. The only reason the Germans picked it for a ghetto was probably because it was so isolated. All the time they had us as if in the palm of their hand, as they could easily surround and shell [the ghetto].”⁶ The following streets delineated the ghetto’s borders: Sobieski, Mieszko I, Prymasowska, Kozietulski, Pomorska, and Zygmuntowska. The Judenrat was located at 77 Chrobry Street and the soup kitchen at 55 Sobieski Street. The ghetto remained unfenced. The streets leading into the ghetto had signs posted at the ghetto border with the following inscription: “Jüdische Gegend. Polen und Wehrmacht Eintritt verboten”—Jewish Area: Entrance Forbidden for Poles and German Army Personnel.⁷

Jewish policeman and ghetto survivor Nachman Józef Kazimierski testified that a Jewish police force was established in December 1940 on the orders of the Kreishauptmann Warschau-Land, Regierungsrat Dr. Hermann Rupprecht. The selection of candidates for the Jewish Police was left to the Judenrat chairman. According to Kazimierski, Rozenberg chose “serious citizens, so there were no underhanded tricks.” Feldmann was the commander of the Jewish Police; the police wore special armbands and badges, as well as navy blue hats. The Jewish Police set up a jail but “allowed the incarcerated Jews to leave [the jail] during the day and trade,” reporting back to the jail at night. Because the policemen enjoyed certain privileges and were excused from forced labor, wealthier Jews paid Rozenberg money to get their sons into the force. Every day Legionowo’s Jewish Police was required to provide 150 laborers for the Germans and collect them from their workplace in the evening. There was also an arbitration court in the ghetto, conducted by a lawyer named Federman and two other citizens.⁸

Apart from the localities mentioned above, Jews from the following villages were ordered to move into the Legionowo ghetto: Dąbrówka, Łomianki, Białoleka Dworska, and Wiśniewo. In December 1940, the Judenrat reported around 2,500 Jews living in the ghetto. Almost half of the residents (1,200) were in need of support. Nonetheless, the soup kitchen was now closed for several months. “They live in accommodations under construction . . . which are located on a wide-open field and exposed to terrible winds,” the Judenrat reported in January 1941, asking for money to buy fuel. One month later (February 1941), the ghetto was declared closed.⁹

Kazimierski wrote of life in the ghetto:

We lived well in the town. Officially, we received 210 kilograms (463 pounds) of bread and 100 grams (3.5 ounces) of sugar [a week], but nobody ever paid attention to the ration coupons. In the ghetto we had 50 small bakeries and two large [ones]. One of them baked rationed bread; the other was mine. . . . There were 50 ritual slaughterers. People were taking a risk by going to villages, buying cattle, and then herding it to Warsaw for ritual slaughter, [where it was] supervised by two slaughterers and a rabbi from Henryków.¹⁰

In April 1941, 10 Jews with typhus were sent to a hospital in Wołomin. Despite the danger of an epidemic developing, 400 deportees from Nowy Dwór Mazowiecki were sent to Legionowo on May 14, 1941. Initially they were housed in the ghetto’s isolation ward, consisting of five rooms, equipped with only two beds. Sixty of them left for Warsaw the next day. The local committee had no resources to help these newcomers aside from distributing some coffee to the elderly and children. As of June 1941, the committee was ordered to feed dinners to 300 laborers working for the German army in Legionowo. In July 1941, 3,000 Jews, of which 1,300 were refugees, were reported to be living in the ghetto. The soup kitchen was closed.¹¹

A typhus epidemic eventually broke out in October 1941. By that time, the ghetto had its own epidemic hospital with 30 beds. The soup kitchen reopened only on December 8, 1941, serving a mere 400 meals daily. By February 1942, the epidemic was dying out.

A number of Jews from the ghetto worked in nearby labor camps, including those at Piekiełko and Żerań. There was also a camp in Jabłonna, where approximately 400 Jews from the ghetto were taken in the summer of 1942 to work on the embankment of the Vistula River.

The first reports of Jews being shot for leaving the ghetto appeared in the summer of 1942—for example, a man and a woman were murdered on August 4, 1942; two Jews were shot on August 11; a Jewish woman was shot on August 22.¹²

Following the deportations from the Warsaw ghetto in the summer of 1942, many escapees from those roundups started arriving in Legionowo. Kazimierski testified that the Jewish Police would take bribes of 5,000 złoty per head to legalize the fugitives in Legionowo. He also recalls how the Jews tried to save themselves by joining the Jewish Police. There were 40 policemen in the ghetto at the time of its liquidation.

The ghetto’s destruction, on October 4, 1942, was unannounced, although the Polish (Blue) Police had warned some residents that it was coming. A German named Brandt, arriving with his unit from Warsaw, supervised the Aktion. Upon arrival at the Judenrat’s office, the Germans announced that the Jews would be resettled to the east, where they would get land and work in agriculture. Following this, all but 10 policemen were dismissed. The Judenrat chairman was included in this group after he handed over “a sack of gold,” recalled Kazimierski, who was selected as 1 of the 10 policemen. These policemen were ordered to go around the ghetto and call for all the residents to assemble on Chrobry Street, in front of the Judenrat. The 400 laborers regulating the Vistula remained in their barracks. Approximately 70 people, including the Judenrat chairman Rozenberg and the police chief Feldmann, were killed.

From the assembly point, Legionowo’s Jews were taken to the Radzymin train station via Struga village. The community was deported to the Treblinka extermination camp, together with most of the remaining Jews from Wołomin and Radzymin.¹³

SOURCES Publications on the fate of the Jewish communities in the Legionowo ghetto include Jacek A. Młynarczyk, "Akcja Reinhard w gettach prowincjonalnych dystryktu warszawskiego 1942–1943," p. 63; Barbara Engelking, "Życie codzienne Żydów w miasteczkach dystryktu warszawskiego," pp. 206, 209; and Marta Janczewska, "Aneks," pp. 275, 297, 304—all in Barbara Engelking, Jacek Leociak, and Dariusz Libionka, eds., Prowincja noc: Życie i zagłada Żydów w dystrykcie warszawskim (Warsaw: Wydawnictwo IFiS PAN, 2007); and Czesław Pilichowski et al., eds., Obozy hitlerowskie na ziemiach polskich 1939–1945: Informator encyklopedyczny (Warsaw: PWN, 1979), pp. 200, 265.

The following archival sources were used to prepare this entry: AŻIH (210/360, 210/466 [AJDC]; 211/635, 211/655, 211/1081–1083 [JSS]; 301/23 [Relacje]); USHMM (Acc.1999.A.0154 [AJDC]; Acc.1997.A.0124 [JSS]; RG-15.079M [Ring I]; RG-15.084M [Relacje]); and YVA (e.g., O-3/1570).

Jolanta Kraemer

NOTES

1. AŻIH, 301/23 (Relacje), testimony of Nachman Józef Kazimierski; USHMM, Acc.1999.A.0154 (AJDC), 210/446 (Legionowo), pp. 5, 53.

2. Testimony of Chana Ruta Magied (YVA, O-3/1570), as cited by Engelking, "Życie codzienne Żydów," p. 135.

3. USHMM, Acc.1999.A.0154 (AJDC), 210/446, pp. 6–8, 11, 15–24.

4. Ibid., p. 51.

5. Ibid., 210/360 (Henryków), p. 42.

6. Testimony of Chana Ruta Magied, as cited by Engelking, "Życie codzienne Żydów," p. 170.

7. Krzysztof Kołodziejczyk, "Zagłada w Dniu Radości," Mazowieckie To i Owo, June 6, 2008; AŻIH, 301/23; USHMM, Acc.1997.A.0124 (JSS), 211/1081 (Warszawa), p. 5.

8. AŻIH, 301/23.

9. USHMM, Acc.1999.A.0154 (AJDC), 210/466, pp. 62–63; Acc.1997.A.0124 (JSS), 211/635 (Legionowo), p. 1.

10. AŻIH, 301/23, p. 53.

11. USHMM, Acc.1997.A.0124 (JSS), 211/655 (Ludwisin), p. 3; 211/1081, p. 52; 211/1082 (Warszawa), pp. 15–16; 211/1083 (Warszawa), p. 18.

12. Rejestr miejsc i faktów zbrodni popełnionych przez okupanta hitlerowskiego na ziemiach polskich w latach 1939–1945: Województwo stołeczne warszawskie (Warsaw: GKBZHP, 1985), p. 115; USHMM, Acc.1997.A.0124 (JSS), 211/635, pp. 2, 4, 6–7; AŻIH, 301/23.

13. AŻIH, 301/23.

ŁOCHÓW

Pre-1939: Łochów (Yiddish: Lochov), village, Lublin województwo, (later Warsaw województwo), Poland; 1939–1944: Lochow, Kreis Sokolow, Distrikt Warschau, Generalgouvernement; post-1998: Łochów, town, województwo mazowieckie, Poland

The civil parish of Łochów, on the northwestern border of the Węgrów powiat, abuts the Bug (River) National Park (Nadbużański Park Krajobrazowy). The civil parish's administrative seat, a town also named Łochów, lies about 55 kilometers (34 miles) north-northeast of Warsaw and 30 kilometers (19 miles) west-northwest of Węgrów. Judel Jakowlewicz Perlis (d. 1893), a Jewish merchant from Grodno, contributed to the establishment of a Jewish settlement there. In 1876, in the forest of Baczki, an estate east of Łochów, he built a factory for manufacturing steel farm implements. On clearings north and northwest of his factory, Perlis created several villages including in Jasiorówka (1875), Ostrówek (1882), and Łopianka (1883). He encouraged Jews to build homes there.¹ Important too was the 1882 purchase of the Łochów estate by Zdzisław Zamoyski (1842–1925). He welcomed Jews to Budziska village, on his estate's western edge, to develop trade and handicrafts.²

In 1921, Jews constituted 133 (27 percent) of Baczki's 486 inhabitants, 119 (28 percent) of Budziska's 425 residents, 224 (53.2 percent) of Łopianka's 421 residents, 92 of Jasiorówka's residents, and 56 of Ostrówek's inhabitants. By 1939, Łochów's Jewish population (800) had grown by almost 40 percent. That year, 90 of Łochów's Jews worked in commerce, mostly as small traders, 260 worked in handicrafts, 41 were industrial workers, and 38 were professionals. They belonged to the Jewish council of Stok (Polish: Stoczek-Węgrowski), 11 kilometers (about 7 miles) north.³

On September 10, 1939, the German army occupied Łochów. Fearing the Germans' arrival, the Perlis and Loewenstein families joined many Jews from Łochów fleeing to territories occupied after September 17 by the Soviet Union.⁴ From October 1, the command of a German artillery unit was billeted at Perlis's factory. The Germans also seized the Zamoyski estate. They established a German Gendarmerie post there of between 10 and 15 policemen, under Karl Tetzen's command. Regional military authorities ordered the registration of Jewish property in the county and closed all Jewish enterprises on October 14, 1939. With these orders, the Germans formally expropriated Perlis's and Loewenstein's factories and placed them under German administration when they reopened in late November. (In the fall of 1941, the Germans turned half of the Loewenstein factory into the Stammlager [Stalag] 333 Soviet prisoner-of-war [POW] camp.) The Germans also expropriated vacation homes in the Urle Forest, between Łochów and Jadów. These homes were moved to Łochów for offices, housing, and other venues for German military and civil administrators.⁵

On November 28, 1939, the county's new Kreishauptmann, Landrat Friedrich Schultz, ordered Łochów's Jews to nominate a Judenrat. The Judenrat's chair, Mojżesz Goldsztejn, a blacksmith, was a pre-war supervisor at Perlis's factory. A resident of Baczki, he was an activist from Poale Zion-Left. The Judenrat's assistant chair, P. Płater, was a Zionist. The Judenrat established its headquarters in Łopianka. It placed medical services under the direction of the Perlis factory physician, Zofia Kirchen. Much later, it organized a six-member Jewish police force.⁶

Local German policies towards Łochów's Jews, at first uneven, became more uniform and violent by the fall of 1940.

Soldiers quartered at the Perlis factory in Baczki treated the factory's Jews well, as did a military unit that replaced them. Jews employed there and at the Loewenstein factory, both of which operated with expanded labor forces of 500 and 300 workers, respectively, received such high wages that Distrikt Warschau administrators sent several delegations to the Baczki factory to threaten its German administrator and Jewish technical director with prison terms if workers' earnings were not cut. Jews were not ordered to wear white armbands with a blue Star of David, mandated in Kreis Sokolow in December 1939, until the fall of 1940.⁷ Outside of Baczki, Gendarmes harassed Jews, forcing those in Łopianka, Budziska, and Jasiorówka to engage in menial day labor, seizing animals and carts, and stripping stores of merchandise. In Jasiorówka, they repeatedly searched the homes of Jews with pre-war firearm permits. From September 1940, the Gendarmes unleashed several violent attacks against Jews, murdering three and raping adolescent girls in Łopianka. These attacks, almost always associated with Gendarme Hartmann, may have led the Judenrat to try to reduce violence with bribes.⁸

Migration also challenged Łochów's Jews. From November 1939 through 1940, Jewish refugees flooded Łochów, seeking refuge there while arranging to cross into the Soviet Union.⁹ In the winter of 1939–1940, the Germans deported to Łochów Jews from Kalisz and Wyszaków. By August 1, 1940, Jews comprised 1,200 of Łochów's 14,015 residents.¹⁰ By May 1941, 1,400 Jews, including 756 refugees, lived there. Local Jews blamed the refugees for a 1940 typhus outbreak. The Judenrat created an old-age home for refugees from Kalisz. It ordered Łochów's Jews to house the remaining refugees. It extended free medical care and provided 240 free meals daily in April 1941 to the refugees.¹¹

Appointed on June 10, 1940, the new Kreishauptmann Sokolow, Reichslandwirtschaftsrat Ernst Grams, took steps in 1941 to ghettoize Łochów's Jews. In February 1941, he forbade Jews from leaving villages where they lived without special permission. This order transformed many of Łochów's villages into open ghettos. In a February 1, 1941, report, Grams stated that Łochów was one of six places in his county in which Jews had been concentrated and promised to close the ghettos in these places as soon as the weather permitted.¹² Grams never implemented this plan fully. Łochów's Jews were ordered to be more tightly concentrated. In the fall of 1941, the Germans deported to Baczki the Jews of Ostrówek, Budziska, and Jasiorówka. The Kreishauptmann's office also ordered 359 Jews from Sadowne to Baczki by December 15, 1941.¹³ Only the Jews of Łopianka were not transferred there. The ghettos in Baczki and Łopianka were never closed. Jews moved freely around these two villages.¹⁴

The creation of open ghettos in Baczki and Łopianka pushed a large number of Jews into poverty. In May 1942, unemployment had risen by 30 percent.¹⁵ By August 1942, more than 700 Jews qualified for reduced-cost or free meals every second day. On September 10, 1942, the Judenrat chair reported his organization's financial bankruptcy. He warned that Łochów's 1,640 Jews stood on the brink of tragedy.¹⁶

By then, the Jews of Łochów realized that they would not be spared deportation to the Treblinka extermination camp. Living near the railroad leading to Małkinia, they had heard trains traveling to Treblinka, located about 34 kilometers (21 miles) northeast, throughout August 1942. They had aided several Jews who had jumped from those transports. News about the Germans murdering Jews at Treblinka also had arrived from Kosów Lacki's Jews and from local Poles. Survivors in Jadów of a July 1942 deportation there detailed how the Germans had shot hundreds of that town's Jews.¹⁷

The liquidation of Łochów's ghettos began on September 25, 1942. A large number of Baczki's and Łopianka's Jews refused to assemble for the deportation, choosing instead to hide. In Łopianka, intoxicated Gendarmes and members of the SS, assisted by Polish (Blue) Police and Ukrainian SS auxiliaries, shot Jews every few steps on the way to Łochów's train station. After selecting between 18 and 20 people for a postliquidation ghetto, the Germans ordered the Jews into wagons. The train, which departed Baczki at 3:05 p.m., stopped 25 minutes later in Sadowne to load Jews assembled there from Stoczek's ghetto. Once the train departed there at 4:48 p.m., several Jews opened one of the train wagons, about 10 minutes later. Scores were mowed down by armed guards as they jumped from the train. At 5:37 p.m., the train carrying the remainder of the Jews of Łochów and Stoczek arrived at Treblinka.¹⁸

A postliquidation ghetto was created in Budziska in a building near the Gendarmerie. When 50 survivors reported there, the Gendarmes executed 30 people who had not been issued residency permits. The postliquidation ghetto's 18 to 20 residents, tailors and shoemakers from two extended families, made boots and clothing, including leather coats, for the Gendarmes. On December 11, the Gendarmes surrounded the building that housed the ghetto. About 6 Jews managed to escape. The Gendarmes took the remaining 14 Jews to the forest, ordered them to undress, and then shot them.¹⁹

The Germans also continued to search for Jews in hiding. The day after the liquidation of the Baczki and Łopianka ghettos, Gendarmes shot more than 50 Jews found at the Perlis factory. In Budziska that day, Gendarme Hartmann shot another 30 Jews. The Germans also found and murdered Zofia Kirchen, the Judenrat physician. In September 1943, the Gendarmes shot 16 Jews in Łopianka.²⁰ They also killed Jews found hiding in Budziska and Jasiorówka. In May 1944, the Gendarmes shot 25 Jews in Kamionna village, south of Baczki.²¹ The Germans murdered the largest number of Jewish survivors in the forest areas north of Łochów, in neighboring Sadowne. There between January and February 1943, they killed about 300 Jews and escaped Soviet POWs.²² In the winter of 1942–1943, the Germans also attempted to extricate hidden Jews by taking punitive measures against Poles thought to be assisting them. These Aktions included an execution on January 13, 1943, of 2 Jewish women, outside of Sadowne, along with the baker Leon Lubkiewicz, his wife, and son, for having given the women bread.²³ From March 16 to 31, 1943, the SS tortured and then executed 16 farmers from around Zarzетка (Sadowne parish), arrested about 150 others suspected of aiding Jews and escaped Soviet prisoners, stripped villagers of their livestock and agricultural stores, and then set fire to a part of Zarzетка. The number of Jews who perished in this reprisal is unknown.²⁴

Less than 25 of Budziska's Jews survived the German occupation. Most did so with aid from Poles. The Lesiński family in Ostrówek gave refuge to Rozalia Kalecka, a supervisor at Perlis's factory, her sister Tzivia, brother-in-law Menashe, and nephew Bolesław. The Grzesiak family sheltered nine-year-old Natan Najman, from Łopianka, who had jumped from the Treblinka deportation train. The Zduński family in Józefów, near Warsaw, hid 10 members of the Brzostek family, from Jasiorówka, including several survivors of Budziska's postliquidation ghetto. The Roguszewski family in Łochów hid Ida and Chana Dzierzbowicz and also Najman and his brother for a time. They also helped the Najman brothers find escaped Soviet POWs, who agreed to arrange forest hiding places for them.²⁵

Łochów's Jewish community, which numbered about 70 with returnees from the Soviet Union, was not reconstituted. After nationalist partisans attacked the Brzostek family, on March 20, 1945, fatally injuring two, the survivors in Łochów joined others already in Łódź.²⁶ The majority later immigrated to Israel, Canada, and England.

SOURCES Useful secondary accounts on the Jews of Łochów include Abraham Wein, Bracha Freundlich, and Wila Orbach, eds., Pinkas ha-kehillot. Encyclopaedia of Jewish Communities: Poland, vol. 7, Lublin and Kielce (Jerusalem: Yad Vashem, 1999), p. 81 (Budziska), pp. 115–116 (Baczki), p. 275 (Łopianka), and p. 321 (Sadowne); as well as the more general history of the Łochów region (including a detailed chapter on the Perlis and Loewenstein families) by Stanisław Sęczyk, "Dzieje Łochowa i okolic," ed. Tadeusz Krupa (unpub. MSS, available on the Web site of the Łochów gmina at www.gminalochow.pl/historia.htm).

Documentary evidence on the history of the Jews of Łochów's ghettos can be found in the following archives: AŻIH (e.g., 211/660-661, 211/938, 301/4238, 301/4390); IPN (e.g., ASG); USHMM (e.g., Acc.1997.A.0124 [JSS], reel 33, 211/660-661 (Łochów), and reel 45, 211/938 [Sadowne]; RG-15.019M [ASG], reel 14, vol. 45 [Warsaw woj.: Warszawa and Węgrów], 932-933 [Budziska], 936 [Jasiorówka], 938 [Kamionna], 939-941 [Łojki], 942 [Łopianka], 954 [Sadowne gmina, forest in Sadowne]); and VHF (e.g., # 04663, 14739).

Laura Crago

NOTES

1. Sęczyk, "Dzieje Łochowa," pp. 44–84, 87–91.
2. Ibid., pp. 21–34, 44–82.
3. Wein, Freundlich, and Orbach, Pinkas ha-kehillot: Poland, vol. 7, Lublin and Kielce, pp. 81, 115–116, 275; and occupational statistics from a 1939 Łochów kehillah survey cited in USHMM, Acc.1997.A.0124 (JSS), reel 33, 211/660, p. 21 (report for the period from September 1, 1939, to July 1, 1941).

4. Sęczyk, "Dzieje Łochowa," p. 80; and VHF, # 04663, testimony of Genofewa Minor.

5. AŻIH, 301/4390, testimony of Abram Flug, p. 1; Tomasz Szczuchura, "Terror okupanta w powiecie węgrowskim w latach 1939–1944," Biuletyn Głównej Komisji Badania Zbrodni Hitlerowskich w Polsce 27 (1977): 60; Tomasz Szczuchura, "Życie i zagłada społeczności żydowskiej w powiecie węgrowskim w latach 1939–1944," BŻIH no. 1 (105) (January–March 1978): 39–44; and Sęczyk, "Dzieje Łochowa," p. 33.

6. AŻIH, 301/4238, testimony of Helena Brzostek, pp. 1, 3–4; and Sęczyk, "Dzieje Łochowa," p. 63.

7. AŻIH, 301/4390, pp. 1–3; and Szczuchura, "Życie i zagłada," p. 44.

8. VHF, # 14739, testimony of Natan Najman; AŻIH, 301/4238, pp. 2–3; Rejestr miejsc i faktów zbrodni popełnionych przez okupanta hitlerowskiego na ziemiach polskich w latach 1939–1945: Województwo siedleckie (Warsaw: GKBZHWP, 1985), p. 146; and Szczuchura, "Życie i zagłada," p. 60.

9. AŻIH, 301/4238, p. 2.

10. August 1940 German census figures cited in Szczuchura, "Życie i zagłada," p. 41.

11. USHMM, Acc.1997.A.0124, reel 33, 211/660, p. 15; 211/661, p. 6; and AŻIH, 301/4238, p. 2.

12. On the creation of six regional concentration points for the Jews in Kreis Sokolow, see document # 45, under the heading "Początek marca 1941. Ze sprawozdania starosty powiatu sokołowsko-węgrowskiego, Gramsa, za luty 1941," in T. Berenstein, A. Eisenbach, and A. Rutkowski, eds., Eksterminacja Żydów na ziemiach polskich w okresie okupacji hitlerowskiej: Zbiór dokumentów (Warsaw: ŻIH, 1957), p. 108.

13. Wein, Freundlich, and Orbach, Pinkas ha-kehillot: Poland, vol. 7, Lublin and Kielce, pp. 81, 275; VHF, # 14739; and USHMM, Acc.1997.A.0124, reel 33, 211/661, pp. 1, 9, and reel 45, 211/938, pp. 49–50, 52.

14. AŻIH, 301/4238, p. 3; and VHF, # 14739.

15. USHMM, Acc.1997.A.0124, reel 33, 211/661, p. 30.

16. Ibid., pp. 48–52.

17. AŻIH, 301/4238, p. 2; and VHF, # 14739.

18. Eyewitness accounts include AŻIH, 301/4238, pp. 4–5; and VHF, # 14739. The train schedule for the Łochów and Stoczek deportations appears as document # 46, under the heading "Rozkład jazdy z dnia 21.9.1942 r. pociągów transportowych do Treblinki," in "Zagłada Żydów w obozach na ziemiach polskich," Biuletyn Głównej Komisji Badania Zbrodni Hitlerowskich w Polsce 13 (1960): 105–106 (Polish translation); on p. 65 F there, see photograph of original German document.

19. AŻIH, 301/4238, pp. 5–6.

20. VHF, # 14739; Sęczyk, "Dzieje Łochowa," p. 63; and USHMM, RG-15.019M (ASG), reel 14, vol. 45 (Warsaw woj.: Warszawa and Węgrów), 944, pp. 1–2.

21. USHMM, RG-15.019M, reel 14, vol. 45, 932-933 (Budziska village, Łochów gmina), and 936 (Jasiorówka), and 938 (Kamionna), pp. 1–2; and see as well 940-941 (Łojki).

22. Ibid., reel 14, vol. 45, 955 (Sadowne civil parish, forest in Sadowne), pp. 1–2.

23. Wacław Zajęczkowski, Martyrs of Charity, vol. 1 (Washington, DC: St. Maximilian Kolbe Foundation, 1987), p. 217; and Israel Gutman and Sara Bender, eds., The Encyclopedia of the Righteous among the Nations: Rescuers of Jews during the Holocaust, vol. 2, Poland, 2 pts. (Jerusalem: Yad Vashem, 2004), pt. 1, p. 467.

24. Waław Piekarski, Obwód Armii Krajowej Sokółów Podlaski 'Sęp' 'Proso,' 1930–1944 (Warsaw, 1991), pp. 25–27; Tadeusz Piotrowski, Poland's Holocaust. Ethnic Strife, Collaboration with Occupying Forces and Genocide in the Second Republic, 1918–1947 (Jefferson, NC: McFarland & Company, 1997), p. 121; Zajączkowski, Martyrs, vol. 1, pp. 279–280; and Głos Pracy, May 13, 1943 (no. 20), reprinted in Paweł Szapiro, ed., Wojna żydowsko-niemiecka. Polska prasa konspiracyjna 1943–1944 o powstaniu getcie Warszawy (London: Aneks, 1992), p. 163. On these events, see also Dariusz Libionka, “Polska konspiracja wobec eksterminacji Żydów w dystrykcie warszawskim,” in Barbara Engelking, Jacek Leociak, and Dariusz Libionka, eds., Prowincja noc. Życie i zagłada Żydów w dystrykcie warszawskim (Warsaw: Wydawnictwo IFiS PAN, 2007), pp. 498–502.

25. Gutman and Bender, The Encyclopedia of the Righteous, vol. 2, pt. 1, pp. 259, 451, and pt. 2, pp. 933, 672; AŻIH, 301/4238, pp. 7–19; VHF, # 04663; # 14739.

26. AŻIH, 301/4238, pp. 6, 14.

ŁOMIANKI

Pre-1939: Łomianki (Yiddish: Lomianki), village, Warsaw województwo, Poland; 1939–1945: Lomianki, Kreis Warschau-Land, Distrikt Warschau, Generalgouvernement; post-1998: Łomianki, województwo mazowieckie, Poland

Łomianki is located about 15 kilometers (9 miles) north-northwest of the center of Warsaw. In 1921, the Jewish population of Łomianki was 89, with another 130 Jews residing in Łomianki Górne nearby.

German forces occupied Łomianki in September 1939. In October 1939, Łomianki became part of Kreis Warschau-Land; the Kreishauptmann was Regierungsrat Dr. Hermann Rupprecht.

Information about the Jewish community of Łomianki under German occupation is very sparse. The existence of a ghetto in the village is documented in an anonymous account preserved in the Ringelblum Archive, dated February 12, 1941, titled “Expulsion from Łomianki near Warsaw.” An annotated translation of this account is included below, as it contains most of what is known about the ghetto:

In September 1940, it became known to the Jewish community in Łomianki from a secret source that the Jewish population faced the dangers of an expulsion. We immediately contacted the “Ortsleiter” Sturmführer “K” about obtaining an easement [of this order]. He received 1,200 złoty for this task. After great efforts, he succeeded in transforming the expulsion order into the establishment of a ghetto [in Łomianki]. When the ghetto began to be implemented, the number of houses assigned to the Jews was so small that there was no way they could accommodate the entire Jewish population. We were again forced to give to the same Ortsleiter an additional 1,000 złoty to give us another few houses. The final date for the transfer into the ghetto was September 15, 1940. Into this very small ghetto were also driven the Jews from the surrounding communities.

This situation only lasted until November [1940]. Then an order was issued that all the Jews had until November 10, to leave Łomianki and to depart for [Fort] Solipse and to settle into military quarters [an old fortress]. Between November 3 and November 10, we again contacted the Ortsleiter about intervening, to allow us to remain in our location. He demanded 3,000 guilders, and even if his efforts were to fail, he would still get 500 złoty. We agreed. His efforts did not succeed and we were obliged to pay the 500 złoty. In the last days, several “Volksdeutsche” [ethnic Germans] secretly informed us not to go to [Fort] Solipse, but to leave immediately for Warsaw. The ghetto in Warsaw was at that time functioning, and so some 300 people sold the possessions and provisions they had accumulated for winter, with [the expectation] that in Łomianki there would be an enclosed ghetto.

They sold [everything] at the cheapest prices and paid from 500 to 2,000 złoty to be able to get transportation to Warsaw. Some 60 people departed for [Fort] Solipse and 25 to [the ghetto] in Legionowo [also established on November 15, 1940], where they remain till today. In January, the Jews who lived in [Fort] Solipse were within a half hour, put in cars and brought to Warsaw, not permitted to take along anything other than a few bedding items. The entire Łomianki population—those who were in Warsaw, as well as those who were shipped from [Fort] Solipse to Warsaw and left everything behind—lives now in terrible need and poverty.¹

Confirmation of the arrival in the Włochy ghetto, also known as Fort Solipse, of a group of Jews from Łomianki can be found in an official Polish postwar questionnaire, signed by the deputy mayor of Włochy. According to this report, the Włochy ghetto was established on November 15, 1940. Among its roughly 300 Jewish inhabitants were many brought in from the surrounding area, including 67 from Łomianki (gmina Młociny).² Personal details of 296 Jews registered in the Włochy ghetto, including the town from which they came, were recorded by the town administration of Włochy and added to the postwar report on the ghetto as an appendix.³

The committee of the Jewish Social Self-Help (JSS) for Kreis Warschau-Land, headed by Dr. Ignaz Schiper, reported on February 25, 1941, that among the Jews recently resettled to Warsaw were also Jews from Łomianki and Włochy.⁴ Another report dated March 25, 1941, recorded 317 Jews from Łomianki among more than 40,000 Jews recently resettled in groups into the Warsaw ghetto.⁵

SOURCES The existence of a ghetto in Łomianki is mentioned in Robert Moses Shapiro and Tadeusz Epsztein, eds., The Warsaw Ghetto Oyneg Shabes-Ringelblum Archive: Catalog and Guide (Bloomington: Indiana University Press, 2009), p. 189. The transfer of Jews from Łomianki to Fort Solipse is mentioned in Barbara Engelking, Jacek Leociak, and Dariusz Libionka, eds., Prowincja noc: Życie i zagłada Żydów w dystrykcie warszawskim (Warsaw: Wydawnictwo IFiS PAN, 2007), p. 208, but dated, probably erroneously, in December 1940.

Relevant documentation can be found in the following archives: AŻIH (Ring I/847; 211/1075, 1080 [JSS]); IPN (ASG); and USHMM (Acc.1997.A.0124 [JSS]; RG-15.079M [Ring]).

Martin Dean

NOTES

1. AŻIH, Ring I/847 [874.], "Geyrush Lomianki bay Varshe," February 12, 1941.

2. USHMM, RG-15.019M (IPN, ASG), reel 19, sygn. 62, pp. 299–312.

3. The list includes the name and surname, names of parents, profession, date of birth, and place from which each person arrived; see ibid., pp. 301–312.

4. Ibid., Acc.1997.A.0124, 211/1080, p. 38, Protocol of meeting of JSS committee for Kreis Warschau-Land, February 25, 1941.

5. Ibid., 211/1075, pp. 28–29.

ŁOSICE

Pre-1939: Łosice (Yiddish: Losbits), town, Lublin województwo, Poland; 1939–1944: Łosice, Kreis Siedlce, Distrikt Warschau, Generalgouvernement; post-1998: Łosice, województwo mazowieckie, Poland

Łosice is located 30 kilometers (19 miles) east-northeast of Siedlce. Approximately 2,900 Jews lived in the town on the eve of the German invasion of Poland.

The Germans occupied Łosice on September 12, 1939. On September 29, control of Łosice was transferred from the Germans to the Soviets, who, however, only stayed briefly. As the Soviets subsequently pulled out in accord with the provisions of the Molotov-Ribbentrop Pact, many Jews left town with them. In early October, the Germans returned and reoccupied Łosice, this time permanently. The initial period of occupation was marked by general abuse of the Jews, not only by German forces but also by local Poles. The high point of early persecution came on November 29, 1939, when seven Jews were taken to the outskirts of town and executed on the pretext that they were Communists.¹

A 10-member Judenrat (Jewish Council) was created in Łosice in March 1940. The Judenrat was headed by Gershon Lewin as chairman and also included Yehoszua (Szyja) Rozen-cwajg as his deputy,² as well as Elihau Rewicz. A unit of Jewish Police, "outfitted with ridiculous blue hats and truncheons,"³ was established under the authority of the Judenrat, as was a post office. One of the most significant functions of the Judenrat was providing the Germans with workers to perform forced labor in and around Łosice. Some of the projects on which Jews worked included the construction of barracks outside of town and various jobs in Siedlce, the largest railway hub in the area, in anticipation of the German invasion of the Soviet Union in June 1941.⁴ The provision of social services was another central area of activity for the Judenrat, which included the distribution of clothing and medicine and the operation of a soup kitchen. Starting in January 1940, adult Jews received 1 kilogram (2.2 pounds) of bread and children 0.5 kilogram (1.1 pounds) per day. The quality of meals provided by the soup kitchen varied, sometimes consisting of soup made from only water and mashed potatoes.

The demands on the Judenrat continually grew as the number of Jewish refugees in Łosice from other areas steadily increased. In March 1940, more than 200 Jewish families (numbering some 900 individuals, 70 percent of whom were children) arrived from Łódź and Poznań and the small towns of Błaszki, Kalisz, Aleksandrów Łódzki, and Ciechocinek. The result of the influx was that by December 1940 Łosice counted around 4,000 Jewish residents and, by September 1941, around 4,600.⁵ In March 1940, a letter of protest signed by both local Jews and newly arrived refugees was sent to the American Jewish Joint Distribution Committee (AJDC) in Warsaw to complain that the Judenrat was only acting in its own narrow interests. The letter-writers reported that Jews were dying of hunger and cold and lacked basic medical care.⁶ The memoirs of one former resident of Łosice portray the members of the Judenrat in a similarly negative light, though not without acknowledgment of the complex circumstances, which shaped their situation: "In our town those on the Judenrat were considered mere stooges, incurring less hatred than contempt and ridicule. . . . In time they acquired blank faces and false smiles, became isolated and dehumanized, and it was a measure of their fitness for the job that they could endure the ostracism of a closely knit small town. We sneered at them openly."⁷

In April 1940, the refugees from Kalisz appealed to the AJDC in Warsaw for a new supply of underwear and clothing. In the same month, the Judenrat received approximately 2,200 kilograms (4,850 pounds) of matzot from the AJDC for distribution to refugees and others in need. In June 1940, the number of those receiving assistance from the Judenrat rose to approximately 1,300 persons, including 900 refugees. On July 20, 1940, an aid committee was constituted under the authority of the Judenrat. The chairman of the committee was Abram Wajman, a refugee from Pułtusk, and the deputy chairman was Aron Szejnkloper, a member of the Judenrat.⁸ In September 1940, the committee provided meals, warm clothing, and medicine to nearly 1,600 individuals, including approximately 1,100 refugees. On September 21, 1940, Dr. D. Seid, who had been in Łosice for two months, wrote a petition to the AJDC in Warsaw calling for immediate assistance for Łosice's Jews. In response to his letter, more than 1,500 people in the town's infirmary and in private homes received medical treatment, sometimes for a small fee but often for free. The Judenrat continued to receive monetary and material aid on a fairly regular basis from the AJDC in Warsaw, as in April 1941 when the sum of 500 złoty was provided.⁹

A ghetto was created in Łosice in late 1941.¹⁰ One native of Łosice, who dates the creation of a ghetto on December 1, 1941, describes Jews' initial reactions as "curious": "There was a deceptive feeling of strength, an illusion of safety, in living in a purely Jewish community."¹¹ At its peak (in the spring of 1942), the ghetto held upwards of 5,500 Jews, including both locals and refugees and deportees from other areas. Jews in the ghetto were compelled to perform various types of forced labor, including road repair and construction, snow removal, and agricultural work. There was no well located within the boundaries of the ghetto, and special passes were required to exit to fetch water. One Holocaust survivor from Łosice relates that Jews sometimes left the ghetto without passes (to collect water or for other reasons, such as obtaining provisions) and, if caught, were shot by the Germans on the spot,¹² as on November 16, 1941, when 7 Jews were caught outside the ghetto and executed.¹³ With people clothed in filthy rags and living in cramped accommodations in old wooden homes that stank of putrefaction and were overrun by insects, typhus and tuberculosis were rampant. To alleviate the situation, Seid, one of the ghetto's doctors, planned to create a bathing and disinfection station.¹⁴ People sometimes congregated in a rabbi's house for common prayer. The Germans became aware of this and amused themselves from time to time by abusing those they found there.¹⁵ The relationship between Jews in Łosice and nearby Sarnaki was a peculiar one, as Jews from the latter were occasionally granted permission to visit relatives in the former as well as to buy food and supplies at the market there.¹⁶ In the winter of 1941–1942, German authorities ordered the Jews of Łosice to relinquish their furs; 6 Jews who chose instead to burn theirs were executed. Around 500 Jews from the Sarnaki ghetto were transferred to Łosice in May 1942,¹⁷ exacerbating what was already a very strained situation in respect to provisions and space. The Łosice Judenrat received 1,000 złoty from the Jewish Social Self-Help (JSS) in Kraków in July 1942 and in turn requested a greater amount of aid to care for the newly arrived refugees.¹⁸

In the spring of 1942, some Jews who had escaped the deportations from Lublin and other towns arrived in Łosice. The Germans conducted searches throughout the ghetto and executed all the escapees they found. Rumors then began swirling that the Łosice ghetto itself would soon be liquidated and its inhabitants deported. At approximately the same time, the Judenrat was obliged to collect a "contribution" of 600,000 złoty imposed by the Germans on the town's Jews. The designated amount was paid, which led some to believe that liquidation and deportation might be staved off or even avoided altogether.

This belief was proven tragically wrong on August 22, 1942,¹⁹ when the SS, together with Ukrainian police detachments, sealed the ghetto, marking the start of the liquidation and deportation process. Jews were rounded up in the town square in preparation for a forced march to the railway station in Siedlce, although some managed to avoid the German dragnet.²⁰ A number of Jews were executed both in and around Łosice and during the march to Siedlce.²¹ The Jews from the Łosice ghetto who reached Siedlce (likely around 5,000 in total) were subsequently deported to the Treblinka extermination camp.

Following the August deportation, the ghetto was reconstituted as a "small ghetto" or remnant ghetto, which housed between 200 and 300 Jews who had avoided deportation. The reconstituted ghetto was also intended to lure any remaining Jews in hiding out into the open, as the German authorities announced that anyone returning to the ghetto would not be punished. Gathering and sorting the possessions of those who had already been deported represented the primary occupation of Jews in the remnant ghetto. On November 27, 1942, the small ghetto was liquidated, and its inhabitants were deported to Siedlce and on to Treblinka.

Despite the Nazis' efforts, some Jews from Łosice were able to avoid deportation and the near-certain death it entailed. The family of one Renée G., who was 10 years old at the time, escaped the small ghetto with the help of a family friend and was hidden by a Polish farmer in a small pit under a pile of manure for 18 months before being liberated by the Red Army.²² Chaya Gitla Zylbersztajn and her daughter Stella escaped during the liquidation of the ghetto in August 1942, and although Chaya was killed, Stella was given shelter by a number of different Polish families and ultimately survived.²³ Sara Riwner (née Weiman), who was 9 years old in 1942, likewise survived, thanks to the refuge provided for 2 years by Roman and Maria Perycz.²⁴

SOURCES Extensive information on Łosice and its inhabitants before and during World War II can be found in the personal testimonies of Łosice natives in the yizkor book Łoshits: Le-zeykber an umgebrakhter kehile (Tel Aviv: Farband fun Loshits'er landsleyt in Yishroel un in di tfutses, 1963). Personal accounts of life in Łosice during World War II can also be found in Oscar Pinkus, The House of Ashes (Cleveland, OH: World Publishing Company, 1964); Abrachah, Je n'oublie pas, Natantchik (Paris: Le Sycomore, 1979); Eddi Weinstein, 17 Days in Treblinka: Daring to Resist, and Refusing to Die (Jerusalem: Yad Vashem, 2008); and Joshua M. Greene and Shiva Kumar, eds., Witness: Voices from the Holocaust (New York: Free Press, 2000), pp. 46, 57–65.

Secondary sources containing information on the ghetto in Łosice include Abraham Wein, Bracha Freundlich, and Wila Orbach, eds., Pinkas ha-kehillot. Encyclopaedia of Jewish Communities: Poland, vol. 7, Lublin and Kielce (Jerusalem: Yad Vashem, 1999), pp. 280–284; Shmuel Spector and Geoffrey Wigoder, eds., Encyclopedia of Jewish Life before and during the Holocaust (Jerusalem: Yad Vashem; New York: New York University Press, 2001), pp. 748–749; Tatiana Berenstein, "Deportacje i zagłada skupisk żydowskich w dystrykcie warszawskim," BŻIH, no. 1 (1952): 122–123; Czesław Pilichowski et al., eds., Obozy hitlerowskie na ziemiach polskich 1939–1945: Informator encyklopedyczny (Warsaw: PWN, 1979), p. 291; Guy Miron, ed., The Yad Vashem Encyclopedia of the Ghettos during the Holocaust, vol. 1 (Jerusalem: Yad Vashem, 2009), pp. 415–416; Rejestr miejsc i faktów zbrodni popełnionych przez okupanta hitlerowskiego na ziemiach polskich w latach 1939–1945: Województwo białkopodlaskie (Warsaw: GKBZHWP, 1984), pp. 108–113; Fred Skolnik, ed., Encyclopaedia Judaica, 2nd ed., vol. 13 (Detroit: Macmillan Reference USA in association with Keter Publishing House Ltd., 2007), p. 211; and Barbara Engelking, Jacek Leociak, and Dariusz Libionka, eds., Prowincja noc: Życie i zagłada Żydów w dystrykcie warszawskim (Warsaw: Wydawnictwo IFIS PAN, 2007), pp. 21, 52, 56–59, 67, 69, 124–125, 128, 139, 169, 217, 297, 302, 528, 533, 546, 566, 587, 591, 598.

Relevant documentation can be found in the following archival collections: AŻIH (210/472 [AJDC]; 211/673 [JSS]; Ring II/304); BA-L (B 162/6876); IPN (163/6 sygn. 17 and 163/15 sygn. 49 [ASG]); USHMM (Acc.1997.A.0124 [JSS]; Acc.1999.A.0154 [AJDC]; RG-15.019M [Court inquiries about executions and mass graves in districts, provinces, camps, and ghettos]); and VHF (e.g., # 2417, 11582).

Elżbieta Rojowska and Stephen Scala
trans. Steven Seegel

NOTES

1. The incident may have occurred in December 1939 and may have involved six Jews and one Pole.

2. Some sources identify Rozencajg as head of the Judenrat and Lewin as his deputy. In one such source, Oskar Pinkus, a native of Łosice, describes Rozencajg as “a rosy-cheeked, tiny, and clever Jew.” Pinkus, The House of Ashes, p. 31.

3. Ibid., p. 52.

4. For a firsthand account of forced labor in and around Łosice, see ibid., pp. 37–42.

5. Berenstein, “Deportacje i zagłada,” pp. 122–123.

6. AŻIH, 210/472 (AJDC).

7. Pinkus, The House of Ashes, p. 32.

8. AŻIH, 210/472.

9. Ibid., 211/673 (JSS).

10. Extant sources provide conflicting data on exactly when the ghetto was established. Several claim that a ghetto was established as early as 1940, but, if correct, this was likely an open ghetto, which may have preceded the closed ghetto created towards the end of 1941.

11. Pinkus, The House of Ashes, p. 52.

12. Greene and Kumar, Witness: Voices from the Holocaust, p. 46.

13. IPN, 163/6 sygn. 17, Kwestionariusz o egzekucjach masowych i grobach masowych.

14. AŻIH, 210/472.

15. Moyshe Smolazh, “Peynen in geto,” in Losbits: Le-zeykber an umgebrakhter kehile, pp. 249–255.

16. Pesah Perlman, “Elef yamim bageto ube-mahteret,” in Dov Shual, ed., Sefer yizkor li-kebilat Sarnaki (Haifa: Irgun yots’e Sarnaki be-Yisrael, 1968), pp. 147–194.

17. Berenstein, “Deportacje i zagłada.”

18. AŻIH, 211/673.

19. The liquidation process may have begun as early as August 19.

20. Pinkus hid with a number of other Jews in an attic and subsequently fled Łosice with the help of a Polish policeman. Pinkus, The House of Ashes, pp. 75–88.

21. One roughly contemporaneous source speaks of more than 50 dead (IPN, 163/6 sygn. 17, Kwestionariusz o egzekucjach masowych i grobach masowych), but the total number killed during deportation was likely larger by several degrees of magnitude. VHF, # 2417, testimony of Dave Gewitzman, reports seeing several people shot in the town at the start of the roundup.

22. Greene and Kumar, Witness: Voices from the Holocaust, pp. 57–65.

23. Israel Gutman, ed., Encyclopedia of the Righteous among the Nations: Rescuers of Jews during the Holocaust, vol. 2, Poland (Jerusalem: Yad Vashem, 2004), pt. 1, p. 326.

24. Ibid., pt. 2, pp. 598–599.

ŁÓWICZ

Pre-1939: Łowicz (Yiddish: Lovitsh), town, Łódź województwo, Poland; 1939–1945: Łowicz, Kreis center, Distrikt Warschau, Generalgouvernement; post-1998: Łowicz, województwo mazowieckie, Poland

Łowicz is located 50 kilometers (31 miles) north-northeast of Łódź on the Bzura River, a tributary of the Vistula. In 1931, the Jewish population of Łowicz numbered 4,339—25 percent of the total. At the start of World War II, 1,300 Jewish families were living in Łowicz (about 5,000 people).¹

Łowicz was bombarded by the Germans on September 3, 5, and 6, 1939. A large part of the population, mostly its younger members, fled towards Warsaw. When the German forces first entered the town on September 9, 1939, the remaining male Jews were gathered in the synagogue and held there for three days without food. There were beatings and shootings. The Germans then retreated, and the Jews joyfully received the Polish forces that reentered the town. The battle for Łowicz lasted for eight days in total. More than half of the city was destroyed. When the Germans reoccupied Łowicz after September 13, their torture and humiliation of the Jews soon started again.²

On November 11, 1939, the synagogue was destroyed by fire (the Torahs were hidden previously in private homes). In December 1939, hundreds of Jewish refugees arrived from Łódź and its surroundings. The Jewish community tried to find accommodation for them, placing some in the homes of wealthier Jewish families, and it organized a soup kitchen to aid the needy. By 1940, the Jewish population in Łowicz exceeded 8,000 people, including some 3,500 refugees.

The Łowicz ghetto was created in May 1940. According to the personal report of the Kreishauptmann, Regierungsrat Dr. Schwender, to the Generalgouverneur, Hans Frank, he initiated this first ghetto in Distrikt Warschau because of the large influx of Jews from the Polish territories incorporated into the Reich and the resulting high incidence of typhus—some 200 cases having been registered in Łowicz—as well as the accompanying threat to security.³ Around this time, a total of five ghettos were established in Kreis Łowicz, the other four being in Łyszkowice, Kiernożia, Bolimów, and Głowno.⁴

Some secondary sources also report a ghetto existing in Sobota, which had a Jewish population of 356 in 1921. However, no primary sources could be found to confirm this. The absence of Sobota from the list of ghettos reported by the Kreishauptmann in July 1940, as well as its absence from a similar list of Jewish communities recommended for the establishment of Jewish Social Self-Help (JSS) branches in December 1940, appears to indicate that no ghetto existed there.⁵

In the Łowicz ghetto there was a Jewish Council (Judenrat), which controlled a sanitary commission, a housing committee, a Jewish hospital, a Jewish artisans' house, and a bathhouse intended to serve as a delousing facility.⁶ Baruch Shapiro (Szapiro) was chairman of the Judenrat. The ghetto was located in the center of town and initially was composed of four sections. At certain times of the day the Jews were allowed to cross from one part of the ghetto to the others. The ghetto gates were guarded externally by the Polish (Blue) Police. The Polish population demanded that the ghetto be moved outside the city. The ghetto was successively reduced in size until it only occupied one and a half streets, including Zduńska Street. A high fence enclosed the reduced ghetto. Jews managed to leave the ghetto and smuggle in some food. After two months, Jews were able to purchase permits to go outside the ghetto (in exchange for a large bribe to the German authorities).⁷

There was also a Jewish police force armed with whips, which was commanded by Josef Weinshtok. Members of the police were handpicked, and most reports about the Jewish Police are quite positive, but there was some corruption due to the nature of the times. For example, there is a report that some refugees on arrival in Łowicz were required to pay an entrance fee by the Jewish Police before being allowed through the ghetto gates.⁸ On October 8, 1940, Hans Frank visited the Łowicz ghetto, and the Jewish policemen in the ghetto were provided with police hats for the occasion.

Shortly after the establishment of the ghetto, 300 Jewish workers were sent daily on the four-month project to divert the Bzura River away from town. For their work they received 200 grams (7 ounces) of bread and a thin soup. Many died, weakened and exhausted from this hard physical work. However, the Jewish Police had to ensure that the quota was filled every day. Other forced labor tasks for Jews included road construction work and cleaning sewers.⁹

There were also Jewish workshops and shops within the ghetto. The Germans supplied the ghetto with a certain amount of flour, and the Jewish Council was able to smuggle in more illegally with the aid of the Jewish Police. This was used to bake bread, which was distributed generously to aid the poor. Nevertheless, the extreme overcrowding and poor sanitary conditions led to the spread of disease. According to witness accounts, Baruch Shapiro, chairman of the Judenrat, carried out the Germans' orders but personally tried with all his might to ameliorate suffering and related to everyone with friendliness and understanding. He did all he could to accommodate the many refugees and to provide them with minimal living conditions, given the very small budget of only some 3,000 złoty per month available to the Jewish Council.¹⁰

At the end of 1940, efforts were made to establish a branch of the JSS for Kreis Łowicz to obtain extra resources to assist with welfare efforts. Under the chairmanship of Ignacy Dąb, the JSS Kreis committee held a meeting on February 17, 1941. However, the committee was soon disbanded in March due to the resettlement of the Jews to Warsaw.¹¹

On January 22, 1941, the Jews of the Łowicz ghetto were ordered to transfer 300 Jews per day from Łowicz to the Warsaw ghetto. They were to travel on their own, but only from Łowicz to Warsaw. Some were attacked and robbed on the way, but there were few restrictions on what property they could take with them. Indeed, according to some reports, the elderly German official in charge, Meister Shans, advised them to take as much as they could.¹² Subsequently transportation and even blankets were provided for the deportations, which proceeded without the brutality usually associated with such events. Some Jews were even permitted to return on special passes to collect possessions they had left behind. By March 15, very few Jews remained in Łowicz.¹³ About 7,000 Jews had been transferred to Warsaw.¹⁴ The JSS committee in Warsaw reported in April that it was holding funds in reserve for the last remaining 3,000 Jews expected from Kreis Łowicz, but probably most of these people had managed to flee to other places within the Generalgouvernement.¹⁵

A "remnant ghetto" of 150 craftsmen who worked for the Germans and their families remained in Łowicz for another year, located in the former primary school building on Bet Midrash Street. Among their tasks was clearing up the area of the ghetto. A Jew who sneaked back to Łowicz from Warsaw at the end of 1941 noted that "the walls of the former Łowicz ghetto had been pulled down and the old Jewish stores were filled with strange non-Jewish faces." Nevertheless, he received assistance from non-Jewish former acquaintances who mailed food packages to his family in Warsaw, and he was even aided rather than betrayed by two Polish policemen he had known from before the war.¹⁶

In the Warsaw ghetto the Jews of Łowicz occupied places designated for refugees. The largest percentage of these refugees died of starvation and contagious diseases in the course of their one-and-a-half-year stay in the Warsaw ghetto. Some were recruited as laborers for various work camps. In the summer of 1942, the first transports of Jews to the Treblinka extermination camp included many of these refugees.

SOURCES Much of this entry is based on the yizkor book, Gedaliah Shaiak, ed., Lovitsb—a shtet in Mazovye un umgegent, seyfer zikorn (Melbourne and Sydney, Australia: Łowicz Landsmanschaften, 1966), which contains a number of articles related to the fate of the Jews in Łowicz under the Nazi occupation.

Additional Jewish testimonies and documentation concerning the Łowicz ghetto can be found, for example, in the following archives: AŻIH (210/473–475; 211/674; Ring I/789); BA-BL (R 52III/29); USHMM (Acc. 1997.A.0124 [JSS]; Acc.1999.A.0154 [AJDC]; RG-02.178; RG-14.052 [BA-BL R 52]; RG-15.079 [Ring]); VHF; and YVA.

Samuel Schalkowsky and Martin Dean

NOTES

1. Shaiak, Lovitsb, seyfer zikorn, pp. 65–87.
2. Ibid., pp. 223–225.
3. Werner Präg and Wolfgang Jacobmeyer, eds., Das Diensttagebuch des deutschen Generalgouverneurs in Polen 1939–1945 (Stuttgart: Deutsche Verlags-Anstalt, 1975), pp. 286–287, entry for October 10, 1940; see also the report of Schön, the head of the resettlement section of the Governor of the Warsaw Distrikt, January 20, 1941, published in Tatiana Berenstein et al., eds., Faschismus, Getto, Massenmord: Dokumentation über Ausrottung und Widerstand der Juden in Polen während des zweiten Weltkrieges (Frankfurt am Main: Röderberg, 1960), pp. 108–109.
4. See Berenstein et al., Faschismus, Getto, Massenmord, p. 109, citing the report of Kreishauptmann Lowicz, dated July 20, 1940. Some sources, however, date the establishment of the Kiernozia ghetto in March 1940; see Shaiak, Lovitsb, seyfer zikorn, p. 364.
5. Berenstein et al., Faschismus, Getto, Massenmord, p. 109. Czesław Pilichowski et al., eds., Obozy hitlerowskie na ziemiach polskich 1939–1945: Informator encyklopedyczny (Warsaw: PWN, 1979), p. 462, indicate a ghetto existed in Sobota from 1940 to 1942, which is unlikely given the clearance of the Kreis by March 1941, and cite only unspecified documentation in ITS Arolsen as the source. See also USHMM, Acc. 1997.A.0124, 211/674, pp. 37–38, JSS Łowicz to JSS Kraków, December 27, 1940.
6. Präg and Jacobmeyer, Das Diensttagebuch, p. 287.
7. Shaiak, Lovitsb, seyfer zikorn, pp. 220–233; USHMM, Acc.1999.A.0154, 210/475, pp. 33–37.
8. AŻIH, Ring I/789, Report by Daniel Fligelman; USHMM, RG-02.178; Shaiak, Lovitsb, seyfer zikorn, p. xv, “Saved from the Gas Chamber,” as told by Joseph Szemkura to G. Shaiak.
9. Shaiak, Lovitsb, seyfer zikorn, pp. xiv–xv, G. Tcharneson-Shaiak, “A River Disappeared and with It—A Jewish Community”; USHMM, RG-02.178.
10. Shaiak, Lovitsb, seyfer zikorn, p. xv, “Saved from the Gas Chamber,” as told by Joseph Szemkura to G. Shaiak; Gazeta Żydowska, no. 12, August 1, 1940.
11. USHMM, Acc.1999.A.0154, 210/475, p. 46; Acc. 1997.A.0124, 211/674, pp. 37–38, 75.
12. Shaiak, Lovitsb, seyfer zikorn, pp. xv–xvi.
13. Report of the Lowicz Kreishauptmann for February 1941, dated March 15, 1941, published in Berenstein et al., Faschismus, Getto, Massenmord, p. 63.
14. Shaiak, Lovitsb, seyfer zikorn, p. 229.
15. Ibid., p. 230. The yizkor book contains a facsimile of the document, which presumably comes from the archives of the Jewish Social Self-Help (JSS) in AŻIH; see also USHMM, Acc. 1997.A.0124.
16. Shaiak, Lovitsb, seyfer zikorn, p. xvi, “Saved from the Gas Chamber,” as told by Joseph Szemkura to G. Shaiak.

ŁYSZKOWICE

Pre-1939: Łyszkowice (Yiddish: Lishkovits), town, Łódź województwo, Poland; 1939–1945: Łyszkowice, Kreis Lowicz, Distrikt Warschau, Generalgouvernement; post-1998: Łyszkowice, województwo mazowieckie, Poland

Łyszkowice is located about 80 kilometers (50 miles) west-southwest of Warsaw. In 1921, there were 545 Jews living in the town. According to the Łowicz yizkor book, there were more than 1,000 Jews living in the town on the eve of World War II, but this number may be too high.¹

German forces occupied the town in mid-September 1939. In the first months of the occupation, the German authorities introduced a series of anti-Jewish measures: the Jews of the town were subjected to forced labor; they were required to wear armbands bearing the Star of David; and a Jewish Council (Judenrat) was established.

A number of Jews from Łyszkowice fled to the east, probably towards Warsaw, during the first days of the war. In their place, up to 300 Jewish refugees from Aleksandrów Łódzki, Brzeziny, Łódź, Zgierz, and other places arrived in the fall and the winter of 1939–1940.²

The Łyszkowice ghetto was established in May 1940 on the orders of Kreishauptmann Lowicz, Regierungsrat Dr. Schwender.³ A report on the situation of the Jews in Łyszkowice was published in the official Polish-language newspaper for Jews, the Gazeta Żydowska, in September 1940: “From the moment a special Jewish quarter [dzielnica żydowska] was established, our work was adjusted to reflect the new situation.” A labor section (Arbeitsabteilung) was created within the Judenrat, which managed to employ about 60 percent of the men. They worked on bridge construction, in agriculture and forestry, and at the local sugar factory, “Irena.” In the late summer of 1940, a group of workers was sent to Distrikt Lublin to participate in drainage work. The Judenrat also directed its attention towards sanitation in the ghetto: it appointed a sanitation committee composed of 10 men and a nurse. There was also a unit of Jewish Police (Jüdischer Ordnungsdienst) formed in the ghetto.⁴

In late December 1940, the Jewish Social Self-Help (JSS) in Łowicz reported that there were around 500 Jews then living in Łyszkowice, of which some 40 percent were receiving welfare support. At this time 3 people were proposed to form a local committee of the JSS in Łyszkowice: Jakub-Dawid Kacnelbogen (a member of the Judenrat); Mojsze Nasielski (a former member of the Judenrat); and Chil-Majer Grosman (a former member of the Judenrat).⁵

However, plans for the establishment of JSS branches in Kreis Lowicz, including in Łyszkowice, were soon cut short. The Generalgouverneur’s Office for Internal Administration, Section for Population and Welfare, instructed the JSS headquarters in Kraków on March 15, 1941: “Since the resettlement of the Jews from Kreis Lowicz to Warsaw has been ordered, the establishment of a Jewish aid committee in Łowicz is no longer necessary.”⁶

In March 1941, the Jews in the Łyszkowice ghetto were transferred to the Warsaw ghetto as part of a large-scale plan to clear all the Jews from the Kreise of Distrikt Warschau to the west of the city. According to the Łowicz yizkor book, only about 300 Jews remained at this time to be resettled.⁷ On March 13, the Łowicz Kreishauptmann reported that most of the Jews had now left the Kreis, with only small groups of Jews retained in the empty ghettos for a short period after the transfer to Warsaw, to sort out Jewish property. After being cleaned and disinfected, the remaining houses in the ghetto areas were to be used to alleviate the housing shortage among the rest of the population.⁸

On arrival in the Warsaw ghetto, most of the Jews from Łyszkowice were put into improvised hostels designated for refugees. Many of the refugees from Łyszkowice died of starvation and disease in the Warsaw ghetto. Most of the others were among those deported to the Treblinka extermination camp during the large-scale Aktion in the summer of 1942.

SOURCES The ghetto in Łyszkowice is mentioned in Guy Miron, ed., The Yad Vashem Encyclopedia of the Ghettos during the Holocaust (Jerusalem: Yad Vashem, 2010), p. 445; Czesław Pilichowski et al., eds., Obozy hitlerowskie na ziemiach polskich 1939–1945: Informator encyklopedyczny (Warsaw: PWN, 1979), p. 302; and Barbara Engelking, Jacek Leociak, and Dariusz Libionka, eds., Prowincja noc: Życie i zagłada Żydów w dystrykcie warszawskim (Warsaw: Wydawnictwo IFiS PAN, 2007), p. 212.

Relevant documentation can be found in the following archives: AŻIH (211/674); BA-BL (R 52III/29); USHMM (Acc. 1997.A.0124 [JSS]; RG-14.052 [BA-BL R 52]); and YVA.

Martin Dean

NOTES

1. Gedaliah Shaiak, ed., Lovitsb—a shtet in Mazovye un umgegent, seyfer zikorn (Melbourne and Sydney, Australia: Łowiczer Landsmanschaften, 1966), p. 366.

2. Engelking, Leociak, and Libionka, Prowincja noc, p. 212.

3. Pilichowski et al., Obozy hitlerowskie, p. 231, date it in May 1940; Engelking, Leociak, and Libionka, Prowincja noc, p. 212, state March 1940. See also Tatiana Berenstein et al., eds., Faschismus, Getto, Massenmord: Dokumentation über Ausrottung und Widerstand der Juden in Polen während des zweiten Weltkrieges (Berlin: Rütten & Loening, 1961), p. 109, which cites the report of Kreishauptmann Łowicz, July 20, 1940.

4. Gazeta Żydowska, September 20, 1940, p. 4.

5. USHMM, Acc. 1997.A.0124, 211/674, pp. 37–38.

6. Ibid., p. 75.

7. Shaiak, Lovitsb, seyfer zikorn, p. 366.

8. See USHMM, RG-14.052 (BA-BL), R 52III/29, p. 57, Kreishauptmann Łowicz, situation report, March 13, 1941.

MIŁOSNA

Pre-1939: Miłosna, village, Warsaw województwo, Poland; 1939–1945: Miłosna, Kreis Warschau-Land, Distrikt Warschau, Generalgouvernement; post-1998: Miłosna, województwo mazowieckie, Poland

Miłosna is located about 20 kilometers (12.5 miles) to the east of Warsaw. In 1921, the Jewish population was 143 out of a total of 792 inhabitants. By 1939, the number of Jews in Miłosna had declined to around 100.

Miłosna was occupied on September 16, 1939. When German troops entered Miłosna, they dragged Polish and Jewish men from their homes and drove them on foot to the village of Morawiec, about 8 kilometers (5 miles) away. After being held there overnight without food or water, the men were released to go home. The Germans confiscated Jewish merchandise and stole items of value from Jewish homes. At the end of 1939, Jews were compelled to wear white armbands bearing blue Stars of David on their sleeves.

According to Hirsh Noshevski, a survivor from Miłosna, the Okuniew and Miłosna Jews shared a common Jewish Council (Judenrat), which was based in Miłosna. The council was headed initially by two Jews named Fridman and Spekman, appointed on the recommendation to the Germans of the Polish local council (gmina). These men had little aptitude or inclination for the task. Therefore, they sent an offer to a former Polish officer, Kh. Lubliner, then living in Warsaw to return to Miłosna and become head of the Judenrat. In return for a good salary, Lubliner accepted the task and is described in the yizkor book as having been an energetic and upstanding leader, who “did much to benefit the ghetto inhabitants of Miłosna and Okuniew.”¹

Information regarding the establishment of a ghetto in Miłosna is scant and somewhat contradictory. Pinkas ha-kehillot dates it in early 1940, but this is most likely too early. The Noshevski account states that in early 1941 the Germans ordered the establishment of a ghetto. The Jews attempted to postpone or cancel this order by appealing to the police or the mayor (wójt). Noshevski then states that as a result “no ghetto was formed,” but the Jews were moved into a separate quarter consisting of a number of houses, from which the Christians had been removed—in effect an open ghetto.² There was considerable overcrowding in the ghetto, with about four families sharing each small dwelling.

According to the yizkor book, the Jewish butchers of Miłosna, Okuniew, and Rembertów were the main source of meat for the Warsaw ghetto, supplying up to 2,000 kilograms (4,410 pounds) per month with the help of Polish smugglers. At great personal risk, they acquired cows and chickens from the local farmers, which they then slaughtered.³ At the beginning of 1942, there were about 500 people in the ghetto, including a number of families of refugees from Łódź, Kalisz, and Pabianice.

A branch of the Jewish Social Self-Help (JSS) existed in Miłosna, which received small subsidies from the JSS headquarters in Kraków to provide assistance to impoverished members of the community. The correspondence concerning this support came to an end on March 20, 1942.⁴

On March 26, 1942, the Germans liquidated the Miłosna ghetto and deported the inhabitants to the Warsaw ghetto.⁵ To carry out the deportation, an SS officer came to Miłosna. As the Jewish Council received some warning, a number of Jews fled the ghetto on the eve of the deportation Aktion. The remainder was assembled early in the morning in the courtyard of a lumber company. Here the Germans ordered the Jews to surrender their valuables. One man, who was found to have concealed some money in his pockets, was shot.⁶ Betty Horne also recalls that at least one child was killed while the Jews were assembled in the lumberyard.⁷

Horse-drawn wagons from surrounding villages arrived to transport children, the elderly, and the infirm. The other Jews were made to march behind the wagons, sometimes being urged to hurry up; those people who fell behind or collapsed were shot by the guards. On arrival in the Warsaw ghetto, the Jews of Miłosna were put in a quarantine building for three days, where they also received some food.⁸

The deportees shared the fate of the Jews of Warsaw and perished at the Treblinka extermination camp. A small number were saved by Poles who provided them with hiding places.

SOURCES Relevant publications include the following: Shimon Kanc, ed., Sefer zikaron le-kebilat Rembertow, Okuniew, Milosna (Tel Aviv: Rembertow, Okuniew and Milosna Societies in Israel, the USA, France, Mexico City, Canada, Chile, and Brazil, 1974); Abraham Wein, ed., Pinkas ha-kebilot. Encyclopaedia of Jewish Communities: Poland, vol. 4., Warsaw and Its Region (Jerusalem: Yad Vashem, 1989), pp. 273–274. The ghetto is mentioned in Czesław Pilichowski et al., eds., Obozy hitlerowskie na ziemiach polskich 1939–1945: Informator encyklopedyczny (Warsaw: PWN, 1979), p. 480.

Relevant documentation can be found in the following archives: AŻIH (211/701 [JSS]; Ring I/501 and 875); USHMM (Acc.1997.A.0124 [JSS]; RG-15.079M [Ring I/501 and 875]); VHF (# 10879); and YVA.

Martin Dean

NOTES

1. Shimon Ahronson, “Der ayfkum un umkum fun yidishn yishuv,” pp. 411–412; and Hirsh Noshevski, “Der veg fun peyn un greyl,” p. 435—both in Kanc, Sefer zikaron le-kebilat . . . Milosna.

2. Noshevski, “Der veg,” p. 435.

3. Zvi Noshevski, “Der shmugl in geto,” in Kanc, Sefer zikaron le-kebilat . . . Milosna, pp. 431–432.

4. AŻIH, 211/701.

5. Ibid., Ring I/875; Ring I/501.

6. Noshevski, “Der veg,” p. 436.

7. VHF, # 10879, testimony of Betty Horne.

8. Ibid.

MIŃSK MAZOWIECKI

Pre-1939: Mińsk Mazowiecki, town, Warsaw województwo, Poland; 1939–1944: Minsk Mazowiecki, Kreis center, Distrikt Warschau, Generalgouvernement; post-1998: Mińsk Mazowiecki, województwo mazowieckie, Poland

Mińsk Mazowiecki is located about 40 kilometers (25 miles) east of Warsaw. In 1921, there were 4,130 Jews living there out of a total population of 10,518. On the eve of World War II, almost 5,000 Jews lived there.

A Jewish policeman poses with his young cousin, Guta (now Genevieve) Tyrangiel, in the Mińsk Mazowiecki ghetto, 1942.

USHMM WS #09373, COURTESY OF GENEVIEVE TYRANGIEL-BENEZRA

During the first days of the war, thousands of refugees from Warsaw arrived in Mińsk Mazowiecki. The Germans captured the town on September 13, 1939. On the pretext of searching for Polish soldiers in hiding, German troops broke into Jewish apartments to steal money and valuables. A few days later they began to confiscate Jewish property and kidnap Jews for forced labor. Under these circumstances, about 200 Jews fled eastward into the area occupied by the Soviet Union after September 17.¹ At the same time, refugees from other towns in western Poland that had been incorporated into the Reich arrived in Mińsk Mazowiecki, including from Łódź, Pabianice, Lipno, Kalisz, Kutno, Włocławek, and elsewhere. These movements of people continued for an entire year.

The Germans appointed a Jewish Council (Judenrat), which consisted of men from differing political backgrounds. The head of the Judenrat was Moshe Kramarz, and his deputy was Leon Wajnberg. The Judenrat had to meet German demands for various items to be delivered within a certain time. A 15-man Jewish police force was also established to assist the Judenrat, headed by Izydor (Icek) Lipczinsky, who subsequently cooperated with the underground.

In the summer of 1940, several dozen young men were sent to various labor camps in Distrikt Lublin, including those at Tomaszów Lubelski and Bełżec. When word of the horrendous conditions in the camps reached Mińsk Mazowiecki, Judenrat chair Kramarz and his deputy undertook efforts to rescue them. They succeeded in having the men released in the winter of 1940–1941.²

On July 1, 1940, in response to orders from the SS that the Jews of Mińsk Mazowiecki create a ghetto within 14 days, the Jewish community wrote a petition, with the aim of reversing or at least deferring the order. The petition stressed the order's ruinous economic effects and especially the danger to hygiene of squeezing some 6,000 Jews into the poorest section of the whole town, without an adequate water supply. The letter stressed that so far not a single case of typhus had emerged among the Jewish population and had appended to it letters from the senior medical officials in the town and also other Polish citizens, which stressed the dangers of spreading disease if such a ghetto were to be set up. The letters requested at least a deferral of several months, to give the Jews time to establish the necessary sanitary infrastructure, such as an isolation hospital, within the designated ghetto area.³

On July 5, Adam Czerniaków, the head of the Jewish Council in the Warsaw ghetto, noted in his diary: "In Mińsk Mazowiecki, the ghetto is at hand." A few days later, however, on July 15, Czerniaków wrote: "It is rumored that there will be no ghetto in Mińsk Mazowiecki. It seems that a meeting was held yesterday in Warsaw to reach a decision on the subject of the ghetto. The verdict—no ghetto."⁴

On October 11, 1940, Kreishauptmann Dr. Bittrich confirmed that in July 1940 initial efforts to establish a ghetto had been put on hold, due to instructions from his superiors. However, in the next few days, Reichsamtsleiter Schön, the head of the Resettlement Department, was expected to visit Mińsk Mazowiecki and to make a decision on the projected location of the ghetto on the basis of the prepared plans.⁵

It appears that the Jews of Mińsk Mazowiecki gained only a few months with their protest. According to the ghetto questionnaire submitted to the Jewish Social Self-Help (JSS) headquarters in Kraków in April 1942, the ghetto was established on November 15, 1940.⁶ The testimony of Mojsze and Brajndla Siekierka also dates the ghetto's formation at the end of 1940. Regarding overcrowding in the ghetto, they reported that 14 people lived in their small two-room flat with a kitchen. They also indicate that a barbed-wire fence surrounded the ghetto.⁷

The area of the ghetto included Siennicka Street, where most of the houses had burned, as well as part of the marketplace (Rynek), Mostowa, Nadrzeczna, Błonie, Warszaw, and other streets. A total of more than 5,000 Jews were packed into the ghetto, including local Jews, refugees, and people expelled from other towns. As a result of overcrowding and poor sanitary conditions, a typhus epidemic broke out in the winter of 1940–1941. To relieve hunger, Jews would sneak out of the ghetto to buy potatoes and bread from Polish farmers.⁸

In addition to its obligation to obey German orders, the Judenrat also had to handle the affairs of the imprisoned Jewish community. Members of the Judenrat sought to protect it to the best of their ability. They provided care for refugees and people expelled from other towns. They established a department of sanitation to maintain cleanliness and to manage the Jewish hospital. The hospital director was Dr. Shimon Grynberg, the only doctor in the ghetto (himself a refugee from Łódź). The Judenrat organized a public kitchen to distribute meals on a daily basis to hundreds of impoverished people. Every day a certain number of Jews had to perform forced labor. People who still had some means were able to pay for a substitute.⁹

Some members of the Judenrat maintained ties and provided assistance to the Jewish underground, which was organized in the ghetto in 1941. Kramarz gave them 10,000 złoty to acquire arms. There were four underground groups, each with five to six members. Some were from the ranks of Ha-Shomer Ha-Za'ir or the Communist Party, and others were nonaffiliated, but the groups worked together in cooperation. The overall commander was Asher Grabownik, an activist with the Communist Party in Mińsk Mazowiecki. He had escaped to the Soviet side when war broke out but returned to Mińsk Mazowiecki after the German invasion of the Soviet Union. After some time, a link was established between the Jewish underground in Mińsk Mazowiecki and underground units of the Polish Communists.¹⁰

In November 1941 an order was issued for remaining Jews from the villages to be moved into the Mińsk Mazowiecki ghetto by December 1. Ita Gartenkranz was among the Jews transferred from the village of Stojadła at this time.¹¹ In February 1942, the Kreishauptmann reported another outbreak of typhus in the Mińsk Mazowiecki ghetto. A public bath and a delousing facility were opened inside the ghetto to combat the outbreak.¹²

In the summer of 1942, rumors spread that the ghettos would be liquidated. The Judenrat hoped that they would be able to avert this by bribing German officials, but on August 21, the Germans began the liquidation.¹³ The ghetto was encircled by hundreds of German Gendarmes, Polish (Blue) Police, Sonderdienst, and Lithuanian, Latvian, and Ukrainian (Trawniki-trained) auxiliaries. On that day around 4,000 Jews were rounded up from their homes and assembled in the market square. After the Germans and their helpers had robbed them of their valuables, the Jews were deported to the Treblinka extermination camp. About 1,000 Jews refused to leave their houses and were shot on the spot. By evening, "Mińsk looked like a battlefield. There were dead bodies, puddles of blood."¹⁴

At the time of the roundup, two Gestapo men, Brandt and Handtke, arrived from Warsaw during a brief pause in the deportations from the Warsaw ghetto. In Mińsk Mazowiecki, they presented the chairman of the Judenrat, Moshe Kramarz, with a document stating that the council hereby delivered the Jews of their own free will. Kramarz tore it into small pieces and warned those around him of the real meaning of the impending "resettlement." The Gestapo men beat him and dragged him, with three other Judenrat members—Leon Weinberg, Meir-Sholem Briks, and Jacob Popowski—and several Jewish policemen, first to a camp in town, then to the Gestapo building, where they were shot.¹⁵

Only a small number of Jews were able to break out of the encircled ghetto and escape into the nearby forests. Thirteen organized into a partisan group commanded by former Polish army sergeant Yosef Wiszniewski. They acquired three rifles, two revolvers, and some hand grenades. After several months of bold actions against the Germans and their helpers, they were surrounded in their hiding place in the Łuków Forest. All but one of them was killed. Other escapees from the ghetto joined a partisan unit of the People's Guard (Gwardia Ludowa, GL).¹⁶ worked in facilities run by the German army at the Rudzki Factory, for the Wolfer und Goebel Company engaged on road construction, or in other places. Another 220 were put into a labor camp housed in the three-story Mikołaj Kopernik School on Siennicka Street. Over time, they were joined by several hundred others, including women and children, who had fled into the forest or other hiding places during the roundup. When the men were taken each morning to forced labor, these “illegals” hid in the camp. There were frequent searches, during which unregistered inhabitants were shot.

After the ghetto's liquidation, about 370 Jews, whose skills the Germans needed, remained in the ghetto. About 150 men

In the closing months of 1942, the Germans began a “selection” process at the Kopernik camp. At the end of November, about 100 men were removed to Kałuszyn. They were then deported from there to Treblinka in December. On December 24, another 218 were taken out, brought to the Jewish cemetery, forced to dig a mass grave, and shot. On January 10, 1943, the rest of the Kopernik prisoners, about 300 in all, were marked for liquidation, but they chose to resist. A group of 30 men being taken to the cemetery attacked their German escorts. Almost all were killed, but during the confusion 3 managed to escape. Those still in the school building were also determined to resist. They barricaded themselves in and resisted the attackers with whatever was at hand: stones, scrap iron, and Molotov cocktails.¹⁷

The Germans attacked the building with flamethrowers and met those who jumped out of the burning building with gunfire. Almost all were killed. According to reports, Moshe Goldstein, one of the rebels, died with a Torah scroll in his arms. The only Jews left in Mińsk Mazowiecki were the 104 workers at the Rudzki factory. They were killed on June 5, 1943.¹⁸

According to a document in the Jewish Historical Institute in Warsaw, at least 46 Jews from Mińsk Mazowiecki are known to have survived the German occupation.¹⁹ Several Jewish children were hidden in Mińsk Mazowiecki with Polish families. For example, a priest helped to transfer the infant child Guta Tyrangiel to Józef and Bronisława Jaszczuk, who defied blackmailers to preserve the child's life.²⁰

SOURCES Publications discussing the ghetto in Mińsk Mazowiecki include the following: Ephraim Shedletzky, ed., Sefer Minsk-Mazowiecki (Jerusalem: Minsk-Mazowiecki Societies in Israel and Abroad, 1977); Abraham Wein, ed., Pinkas ha-kehillot. Encyclopaedia of Jewish Communities: Poland, vol. 4, Warsaw and Its Region (Jerusalem: Yad Vashem, 1989), pp. 274–279; “Minsk Mazowiecki,” in Encyclopaedia Judaica, vol. 12 (Jerusalem: Keter, 1972), pp. 59–60; and Guy Miron, ed., The Yad Vashem Encyclopedia of the Ghettos during the Holocaust (Jerusalem: Yad Vashem, 2010), pp. 482–484.

Published sources concerning the Holocaust in Mińsk Mazowiecki include the following: Leyb Rokhman, The Pit and the Trap: A Chronicle of Survival (New York: Holocaust Library, 1983); Tatiana Berenstein et al., eds., Faschismus, Getto, Massenmord: Dokumentation über Ausrottung und Widerstand der Juden in Polen während des zweiten Weltkrieges (Berlin: Rütten & Loening, 1961), p. 96.

Relevant documentation can be found in the following archives: AŻIH (211/702; 301/1010, 1680, 3335, 4072, 4093, 4098, 4103, 4158, 4324, 4629, 4761, 5088, 5874; 302/101, 123, 297); BA-BL (R 52III/29); IPN (ASG, sygn. 61, p. 1118); USHMM (e.g., Acc.1997.A.0124 [JSS]; RG-15.019M [ASG]); VHF (e.g., # 21519, 38132); and YVA.

Samuel Fishman and Martin Dean

NOTES

1. AŻIH, 301/4098, testimony of Mojsze and Brajndla Siekierka (née Fiszbajn).
2. Wein, Pinkas ha-kehillot: Poland, vol. 4, Warsaw and Its Region, p. 278.
3. AŻIH, 211/702, pp. 1–4, Petition of the Jewish population of Mińsk Mazowiecki, unsigned, July 1, 1940, letters of the Town Doctor and the Kreis Doctor, July 1, 1940, letter from citizens of Polish ethnicity in Mińsk Mazowiecki, July 2, 1940.
4. Raul Hilberg, Stanisław Staron, and Josef Kerr, eds., The Warsaw Diary of Adam Czerniakow: Prelude to Doom (New York: Stein and Day, 1979), pp. 170, 174.
5. Berenstein et al., Faschismus, Getto, Massenmord, p. 96.
6. AŻIH, 211/702, p. 12, ghetto questionnaire, April 1, 1942.
7. Ibid., 301/4098.
8. VHF, # 995, testimony of Michael Sien.
9. AŻIH, 302/123, testimony of Brandla (Bronka) Siekierka (née Fiszbajn).
10. Wein, Pinkas ha-kehillot: Poland, vol. 4, Warsaw and Its Region, p. 278.
11. AŻIH, 301/4103, testimony of Ita Gartenkranz.
12. BA-BL, R 52III/29, monthly report of the Minsk Mazowiecki Kreishauptmann, March 5, 1942.
13. AŻIH, 301/4229, testimony of Diana Kagan; VHF, # 21519, testimony of Ralph Jorden.
14. Wein, Pinkas ha-kehillot: Poland, vol. 4, Warsaw and Its Region, p. 278; AŻIH, 301/4229.
15. Isaiah Trunk, Judenrat: The Jewish Councils in Eastern Europe under Nazi Occupation (Lincoln: University of Nebraska Press, 1996), p. 441.
16. Wein, Pinkas ha-kehillot: Poland, vol. 4, Warsaw and Its Region, p. 278.
17. AŻIH, 301/1680, testimony of Efraim Siedlecki; 301/5088, testimony of Boruch Gartenkranc, Aleksander Walewski, Ludwik Michalski, and Icek Lipczyński; Wein, Pinkas ha-kehillot: Poland, vol. 4, Warsaw and Its Region, p. 278; VHF, # 38132, testimony of Genevieve Benezra (born October 26, 1940); # 995.
18. AŻIH, 301/1680; Wein, Pinkas ha-kehillot: Poland, vol. 4, Warsaw and Its Region, p. 278.
19. AŻIH, 301/4072, list of 46 Jews from Mińsk Mazowiecki who managed to survive the German occupation.
20. Shmuel Krakowski and Sara Bender, eds., The Encyclopedia of the Righteous among the Nations: Rescuers of Jews during the Holocaust—Poland (Jerusalem: Yad Vashem, 2004), p. 308; VHF, # 38132.

MOGIELNICA

Pre-1939: Mogielnica (Yiddish: Mogelnitsa), town, Warsaw województwo, Poland; 1939–1944: Kreis Grojec, Distrikt Warschau, Generalgouvernement; post-1998: województwo mazowieckie, Poland

Mogielnica is located 68 kilometers (42 miles) southwest of Warsaw. In 1921, 2,722 Jews were living in Mogielnica, comprising 51.1 percent of the town's total population of 5,321 people. On the eve of the German invasion in 1939, there were 3,050 Jewish inhabitants.

German mobile forces occupied Mogielnica on September 8, 1939. The town was not seriously damaged in the fighting, but on the first day, Germans set fire to the old wooden synagogue. The Germans soon began to steal Jewish property and torment Jews they caught on the streets, kidnapping them for forced labor.¹

On September 14, 1939 (Rosh Hashanah), the Germans dragged Hasidim and Orthodox Jews out of the Bet Midrash, including Rabbi Pinchas Osełka (Osalka) and another rabbi. They took them to the market square and pulled out their beards and side locks. They compelled them to sing holiday songs and dance. According to one testimony, a majority of the Poles, who observed this, clapped their hands and laughed. Some Poles even helped the Germans and beat the Jews. In the fall of 1939, the Germans converted the Bet Midrash into a stable for horses. Torah scrolls and other holy books were burned in the market square.²

The German authorities banned Jewish children from attending primary schools and ordered Jews to wear the Star of David.³ In October 1939, the German authorities ordered the establishment of a Jewish Council (Judenrat) and a Jewish police force. Józef Falc was appointed as chairman of the Judenrat. Other Judenrat members included Abraham Milsztajn and Chaim Danner. Majlech Osełka, Rabbi Osełka's son, was head of the Jewish Police, which reportedly had a good reputation.⁴

On the establishment of a German civil administration in October 1939, Mogielnica became part of Kreis Grojec. Initially there was little German presence in Mogielnica. German officials from Grójec visited occasionally to rob the Jews and make demands. To contain the damage, the Judenrat in Mogielnica negotiated with the Kreishauptmann to pay a weekly "contribution" of butter, eggs, and other items. As a result, the Jews in Mogielnica remained largely unmolested for a time.⁵

In December 1939, on the initiative of Sara Skotnicka and Majlech Osełka, the Jews of Mogielnica established an Aid Committee for Refugees and Indigent Jews. Fajwel Rajnbenbach was its chairman. An audit commission oversaw its operations.⁶ In 1940, the aid committee provided assistance to more than 700 people, including 500 refugees and 150 children.⁷

In the first six months of 1940, 23 percent of the aid committee's funds (7,215 złoty) came from private donations. Additional funds came from the American Jewish Joint Distribution Committee (AJDC), which provided 21,000 złoty (68 percent), and from the Society for the Protection of Health (TOZ). In addition, a small fee was charged for some meals. A public soup kitchen was opened on February 7, 1940, and until June 1940, 73 percent (30,000 złoty) of all aid committee funds went to the soup kitchen. The remainder was used for medical assistance (doctors visits, free baths, vaccines against typhus, and sugar or milk for sick people, children, and pregnant women), for building repairs, or for buying fuel. The soup kitchen distributed three quarters of a liter of soup (about 3 cups) and 200 grams (7 ounces) of bread on every day except Saturdays to needy Jews.⁸

In April 1940, there were 2,774 Jews residing in Mogielnica. Among them there were 500 refugees, mainly from Łódź and other towns in the Warthegau. Refugees were placed in private houses and in Jewish community buildings, including two small prayer houses. In June 1940, some Jewish businesses were still operating, including four bakeries, five groceries, three ironmongers, two restaurants, and a pharmacy.⁹

Probably in the summer or fall of 1940, a German Gendarmerie post was established in Mogielnica.¹⁰ Then at some time before January 20, 1941, probably in late November 1940 (as was the case in Grójec), the German authorities established an open ghetto in Mogielnica. According to one survivor's recollection, it was at the beginning of 1940, but this appears to be too early.¹¹ The ghetto was not enclosed by a fence, a wall, or any barbed wire. It consisted of two or three streets near the synagogue and the Bet Midrash.¹²

According to Jakov Rotbart, after the creation of the ghetto, life became more difficult for the Jews. Bribery still served to weaken the effects of some German regulations. For example, the full quota of forced laborers for clearing snow was not always sent. However, by this time the Judenrat had imposed a progressive tax on the community, to pay forced laborers recruited from among the unemployed Jews 4 złoty per day and to meet the German "contributions."¹³

On January 21, 1941, the German authorities decreed that in Kreis Grojec the Jews could live only in the following towns designated as ghettos: Błędów, Tarczyn, Mogielnica, Góra Kalwaria, Warka, and Grójec. In addition, all Jewish families from nearby villages and towns had to move into one of these ghettos. Any Jew caught outside the ghettos after January 27, 1941, would face the death penalty.¹⁴ As a result of this decree and the previous influx of Jews from the Warthegau, the Jewish population of Mogielnica had risen to 4,000 people by February 1941.

The ghetto was very densely populated. According to one survivor, her 5-person family had to share cramped quarters with another 10 Jews, and people slept on the floor.¹⁵ Due to the overcrowding, poor sanitary conditions, and hunger, many diseases spread within the ghetto, including typhus. Those infected were removed from their homes and placed in the hospital, which had two or three rooms for quarantine purposes.¹⁶

On February 27–28, 1941, about 4,000 Jews from the Mogielnica ghetto were resettled to the Warsaw ghetto. At 4:00 or 5:00 A.M., the Germans arrived with dogs and started to drive people from their houses. Most Jews could take with them only the clothes they hastily put on and some food. They were transported on military trucks to the Mogielnica railway station. From there, the Jews were sent in cattle wagons to the Warsaw ghetto.¹⁷ On February 27, 950 Jews were sent to Warsaw; the rest were transported the next day. Some people of means paid large sums to hire trucks to move some of their remaining belongings. The Judenrat also secured a few trucks,

410 WARSAW REGION

by bribery, to move food supplies into the Warsaw ghetto. Since the Judenrat did receive some advance warning of the transfer, a number of Jews were able to flee to nearby towns in Distrikt Radom, including Białobrzegi, Opoczno, Nowe Miasto nad Pilicą, and Klwów, where ghettos had not yet been formed.¹⁸

In Warsaw, most of the Jews from Mogielnica were accommodated in so-called refugee shelters—that is, they were placed in schools, synagogues, and prayer houses. Hundreds of people lived in each shelter. Conditions there were very bad. People slept on military beds or on the floor. Usually they received only (one cup) of soup per day. People died from starvation and disease, especially typhus.¹⁹ The Jews of Mogielnica expelled to the Warsaw ghetto shared the fate of the rest of the ghetto's population. Most were deported and killed in the first major deportation Aktion, which started in July 1942, when Jews from the refugee shelters were among the first to be sent to the Treblinka extermination camp.

Following the deportation of the Jews to Warsaw, a few Jews went into hiding in and around Mogielnica for at least part of the remaining period of German occupation: among them were Aisic Hirsch and Szmul Cyrkiel.²⁰ In August 1943, 3 Jews were caught near Mogielnica and shot in the Mogielnica Forest.²¹ From June 9, 1944, until the end of the occupation, Maria Kisielnicka in Mogielnica helped to conceal Jerzy Sowa on false documents (as Jerzy Kulesza), and later she also provided similar aid to Sonia Blum and Jadzia Sztikie.²² After World War II, only about 30 Jewish survivors returned to live, at least for a time, in Mogielnica.

SOURCES Articles on the Jewish community of Mogielnica can be found in the following publications: Abraham Wein, ed., Pinkas ha-kehillot. Encyclopaedia of Jewish Communities: Poland, vol. 4, Warsaw and Its Region (Jerusalem: Yad Vashem, 1989), pp. 269–273; and Shmuel Spector and Geoffrey Wigoder, eds., The Encyclopedia of Jewish Life before and during the Holocaust (Jerusalem: Yad Vashem; New York: New York University Press, 2001), p. 839. Additional information can be found in the yizkor book, Sefer yizkor Mogielnica-Bledow (Tel Aviv, 1972).

The book by Barbara Engelking, Jacek Leociak, and Dariusz Libionka, eds., Prowincja noc: Życie i zagłada Żydów w dystrykcie warszawskim (Warsaw: Wydawnictwo IFiS PAN, 2007), contains brief information on Mogielnica (pp. 213, 256, 339, 587).

Additional information on the ghetto and German crimes in Mogielnica can also be found in Tatiana Berenstein, “Deportacje i zagłada skupisk żydowskich w Dystrykcie Warszawskim,” BŻIH, no. 1 (1952); Czesław Pilichowski et al., eds., Obozy hitlerowskie na ziemiach polskich 1939–1945: Informator encyklopedyczny (Warsaw: PWN, 1979), p. 325; and Rejestr miejsc i faktów zbrodni popełnionych przez okupanta hitlerowskiego na ziemiach polskich w latach 1939–1945: Województwo radomskie (Warsaw: Główna Komisja Badania Zbrodni Hitlerowskich w Polsce, 1985), pp. 110–111.

Documentation regarding the fate of the Jews of Mogielnica under German occupation can be found in the following archives: AŻIH (210/280 [AJDC]; Ring I/116; Ring I/881; 301/2564, 5176 [Relacje]); IPN (ASG, sygn. 43-45 and sygn.

61, k. 95; Kolekcja “Ob,” sygn. 177; Zb. zesp. szcz., sygn. 145); USHMM (RG-15.019M [ASG], reels 13 and 18, sygn. 43-45 and sygn. 61, p. 95; Acc.1996.A.0028); and VHF (# 01365, 17574).

Grzegorz Kołacz

NOTES

1. VHF, # 01365, testimony of Ben (Bieniek) Stern; # 17574, testimony of Aisic Hirsch.
2. VHF, # 17574; Wein, Pinkas ha-kehillot: Poland, vol. 4, Warsaw and Its Region, pp. 269–273.
3. VHF, # 17574; # 01365.
4. AŻIH, 210/280 (AJDC), Sprawozdanie z pobytu w Mogielnicy k. Grójca, June 7, 1940, p. 1 (9); USHMM, Acc.1996.A.0028, Bulletin no. 5 (September 14, 1947), pp. 6–8, a report on Jewish life in Mogielnica from September 1939 to February 1941 by Jakov Rotbart—this source includes a more extensive list of Judenrat members.
5. USHMM, Acc.1996.A.0028, Bulletin no. 5, pp. 6–8.
6. AŻIH, 210/280, Sprawozdanie, June 7, 1940, p. 1 (9).
7. Ibid., letter of June 1, 1940, p. 6.
8. Ibid., 210/280, Sprawozdanie, June 7, 1940, pp. 1–6 (9-14).
9. Ibid., p. 2 (10).
10. USHMM, Acc.1996.A.0028, Bulletin no. 5, pp. 6–8.
11. VHF, # 01365.
12. USHMM, RG-15.019M (ASG), reel 18, sygn. 61, p. 95; VHF, # 01365; # 17574; Wein, Pinkas ha-kehillot: Poland, vol. 4, Warsaw and Its Region, pp. 269–273.
13. USHMM, Acc.1996.A.0028, Bulletin no. 5, pp. 6–8.
14. AŻIH, Ring I/881.
15. VHF, # 17574.
16. Ibid., # 01365; Wein, Pinkas ha-kehillot: Poland, vol. 4, Warsaw and Its Region, pp. 269–273.
17. VHF, # 17574.
18. USHMM, Acc.1996.A.0028, Bulletin no. 5, pp. 6–8.
19. AŻIH, Ring I/116; VHF, # 17574.
20. VHF, # 17574; AŻIH, 301/2564, testimony of Szmul Cyrkiel.
21. USHMM, RG-15.019M (ASG), reel 13, sygn. 43-45.
22. AŻIH, 301/5176, testimony of Maria Kisielnicka.

MORDY

Pre-1939: Mordy, town, Lublin województwo, Poland; 1939–1944: Kreis Siedlce, Distrikt Warschau, Generalgouvernement; post-1998: województwo mazowieckie, Poland

Mordy is located 108 kilometers (67 miles) east of Warsaw and 18 kilometers (11 miles) east-northeast of Siedlce. The Jews were mainly Hasidim who were petty agricultural merchants, traders, and craftsmen. The Jewish community of about 1,750 residents comprised about half the town's residents on the eve of World War II.¹

In the first weeks of World War II, a fire, sparked by German aerial bombardment, destroyed a part of Mordy. German soldiers who occupied the town shot Mordechai Laski, a disabled World War I veteran. The Germans evacuated Mordy two days later, under the territorial provisions outlined in the secret protocols of the Molotov-Ribbentrop Pact. A new Soviet-German agreement on borders and friendship, signed on September 28, 1939, returned Mordy, and all other Soviet-occupied territories west of the Bug River, to German hegemony. In Mordy, the Germans appointed a local ethnic German named Eckhart as the local police chief. Otherwise, the direct assertion of German authority remained limited through 1941.²

A Jewish Council (Judenrat) was established in Mordy, possibly in September though more likely in November 1939. In March 1940, its chair was Moszko (or Mosze) Waga. Waga was succeeded perhaps by Moshe Gershon Lewenberg, head of the pre-war kehillah. Other Judenrat members included Aaron Fajnzilber and Mordechaj (Mordko) Furman, both of whom had represented the Revisionists in the pre-war kehillah.³

Initially lightly guarded and located about 23 kilometers (14 miles) south of a Bug River crossing, Mordy served as a way station for Jewish refugees fleeing to the Soviet Union. Local Jews and Poles joined together to form smuggling networks to bring refugees to the border. Those turned away often ended up staying in Mordy until they succeeded in crossing the Bug. Some gave up and settled in the town.⁴

Mordy also became a center of forced Jewish migration, with 172 refugees, largely from Łódź, deported there by May 1940. In June, another 259 Jews from Łódź, Kalisz, and Poznań were expelled there. By July 1940, 512 deportees were living in the town.⁵ Several dozen more Jews from Mława were deported there in the summer of 1940. Two thousand Jews resided in Mordy in January 1941.⁶

Initially, the Judenrat's main tasks were to assist refugees and expellees and to respond to demands from German authorities in Siedlce. In June 1940, the Judenrat provided free daily meals in a community kitchen for 180 adult and 250 child refugees as well as 50 meals for impoverished local Jews.⁷ In the spring of 1941, it also distributed packages sent from Warsaw to 500 laborers draining swamps at a forced labor camp established on the Przebłucki estate, just outside Mordy.⁸ That same year, the Judenrat responded to German demands for a monetary "contribution," collected by representatives sent from Siedlce.⁹ From the summer of 1941, the Judenrat also filled quotas for the forced labor camp located on the Przebłucki estate.¹⁰ Beginning in the spring of 1942, Jews from Mordy were sent for similar water melioration work at another forced labor camp at Bartków Nowy, about 3 kilometers (2 miles) from Korczew. This camp conscripted between 400 and 600 Jews, with Mordy's Jews comprising a significant part of the labor force.¹¹

An open ghetto was established in Mordy shortly after Germany's June 22, 1941, invasion of the Soviet Union. Jews, particularly refugees, were concentrated in the southern part of the town in the pre-war Jewish neighborhood. In November 1941, Mordy's Jews were confined to a ghetto, located on a few streets, in the southern section of town. The ghetto was not fenced. Signs were posted there, listing punishments for Jews and non-Jews found leaving or entering the ghetto.¹² Placed in charge of the ghetto, Eckhart, the local police chief, demonstrated flexibility in his interactions with the Judenrat, responding positively, for instance, to requests to exempt certain Jews from forced labor.¹³

The ghetto's population significantly increased in this period. At the end of December 1941, the Germans deported to the Mordy ghetto Jews from local villages surrounding the town, including from Królowa Niwa, Przesmyki, Stok Ruski, and Tarków. That month, 3,195 Jews were concentrated in the Mordy ghetto. In May 1942, the Germans deported 500 Jews from Sarnaki to Mordy. By August 1942, 3,817 Jews were living in the ghetto.¹⁴

In 1942, Germans exercised more direct authority over Mordy. After 15 of the town's Jews escaped from the nearby forced labor camp, a group of SS arrived in Mordy and threatened to punish collectively the ghetto's Jews if the escapees were not turned over. The Judenrat yielded to the German demand. The escapees were not seen again. A new police chief, Pulfer, more stringently enforced the restrictions that confined Mordy's Jews to the ghetto. That year, Gendarmes executed several Jews caught outside the ghetto, smuggling food.¹⁵

The extermination of Mordy's Jews began on Saturday, August 22, 1942. That day, the Germans executed as many as 100 Jews in Mordy.¹⁶ The remaining Jews, including the refugees, about 3,500 people, were marched to Siedlce's market square to join Jews from the ghettos in Siedlce and Łosice. While awaiting deportation, the Jews were subjected to increasingly random shootings by the SS guards. Deprived of water in sweltering heat, the Jews gathered in Siedlce were marched to the train station there on Monday, August 23, and then loaded into railroad wagons destined for the Treblinka extermination camp. The Germans liquidated the labor camp at Bartków Nowy on October 22, 1942. Its inmates were shot and buried in a mass grave on the grounds of the camp. The Germans liquidated the forced labor camp at Mordy in about March 1943. Its inmates also were shot at the camp.¹⁷

About 20 Jewish survivors returned to Mordy after the war. However, in May 1945, partisans, believed to have been from the anti-Communist underground, murdered between 2 and 12 of the town's Jews.¹⁸ After the murders, the remaining Jews left Mordy, moving first to Warsaw and later emigrating from Poland.

SOURCES Useful published sources include the account in Abraham Wein, Bracha Freundlich, and Wila Orbach, eds., Pinkas ha-kehillot. Encyclopaedia of Jewish Communities: Poland, vol. 7, Lublin and Kielce (Jerusalem: Yad Vashem, 1999), pp. 295–297, available in two different English translations, the first by Adv. Meir Garbarz Gover, available at jewishgen.org, and the second in Arnon Rubin, ed., The Rise and Fall of Jewish Communities in Poland and Their Relics Today, vol. 2, District Lublin (Tel Aviv: Tel Aviv University Press, 2007), pp. 203–204.

A number of eyewitness testimonies by Jewish survivors from Mordy can be found at AJA (e.g., Institute of Jewish Affairs, 1918–1979, series C, subseries 3, C214/3). Other relevant archival documentation on the fate of the Jews in Mordy during the Holocaust include the following: USHMM (e.g., Acc.1999.A.0154 [AJDC, 210/501]; RG-15.019M [ASG, reel 6, 17/959, and reel 15, 49/143]; and RG-15.079M [reel 14, Ring I/389]); VHF (e.g., # 01851, 4407, 9317, and 13697); and YVA.

Laura Crago

NOTES

1. VHF, # 4407, testimony of Bronia Golstadt; and # 01851, testimony of Arthur File; and Gitel Donath, My Bones Don't Rest in Auschwitz: A Lonely Battle to Survive German Tyranny (Montreal: Kaplan Publishing, 1999), p. 10.

2. "Mordy," in Rubin, The Rise and Fall, vol. 2, p. 203.

3. In Polish-language documentation, Moshe Gershon Lewenberg's name appears as Moszko Gerszon Lebenberg. Mordy's Judenrat membership can be found at USHMM, Acc.1999.A.0154 (AJDC), 210/501 (Mordy), p. 3. In the 1940 filing with AJDC, Lewenberg is listed only as a Judenrat member, although subsequently he may have become the Judenrat chair.

4. VHF, # 4407; # 27150, testimony of Leopold Zylberman; # 01851; # 20620, testimony of Rachela Malinger.

5. USHMM, Acc.1999.A.0154 (AJDC), 210/501, p. 13.

6. Ibid., Acc.1997.A.0124 (JSS), reel # 45, 211/949 (Siedlce), p. 14; "Mordy," in Rubin, The Rise and Fall, vol. 2, pp. 203–204; Abraham Wein, ed., Pinkas ha-kehillot. Encyclopaedia of Jewish Communities: Poland, vol. 4, Warsaw and Its Region (Jerusalem: Yad Vashem, 1989), pp. 280–287, available in an English translation by Gil Levy, at jewishgen.org. Jews expelled from Mława are reported in Mordy's AJDC correspondence as early as July 15, 1940; see USHMM, Acc.1999.A.0154, 210/501, p. 13. Postwar Polish court documentation claims that 4,500 Jews passed through the ghetto in total; see RG-15.019M (ASG), reel # 15, 49 (Lublin), 143 (miasto Mordy), Kwestionariusz o obozach, p. 1.

7. USHMM, Acc.1999.A.0154, 210/501, p. 4.

8. "Mordy," Gazeta Żydowska, May 23, 1941, no. 41, p. 6; USHMM, RG-15.079M, reel 14, Ring I/389, Relacja Abrama Erlicha z obozu pracy przymusowej w Mordach koło Siedlec, p. 2; Acc.1997.A.0124 (JSS), reel # 8, 211/127, Korespondencja Prezydium ŻSS z Gamsejem Wielikowskim—członkiem Prezydium Ż.S.S. i Doradcą przy Szeffie Dystryktu Warszawskiego, 1 IV 1941–30 V 1941, pp. 27–28.

9. "Mordy," in Rubin, The Rise and Fall, vol. 2, p. 203.

10. Marta Janczewska, "Obozy pracy przymusowej dla Żydów na terenie dystryktu warszawskiego," in Barbara Engelking, Jacek Leociak, and Dariusz Libionka, eds., Provincia noc. Życie i zagłada Żydów w dystrykcie warszawskim (Warsaw: Wydawnictwo IFiS PAN, 2007), pp. 296–297.

11. Edward Kopówka, "Obozy pracy przymusowej w Szczegłacinie i Bartkowie Nowym k. Siedlec," Kwartalnik Historii Żydów, no. 4 (2002): 518–519. The largest part of this camp's labor force came from Sokołów Podlaski's ghetto.

12. USHMM, RG-15.019M (ASG), reel # 15, 49 (Lublin), 143 (miasto Mordy), p. 1.

13. "Mordy," in Rubin, The Rise and Fall, vol. 2, pp. 203–204.

14. See the document labeled no. 145, under the heading "3 marca 1942, Warszawa—Zastępca komisarza dzielnic żydowskiej w Warszawie, Grassler, do Wydziału 'Raumordnung' w dystrykcie warszawskim w sprawie koncentracji Żydów w poszczególnych powiatach," in T. Berenstein, A. Eisenbach, and A. Rutkowski, eds., Eksterminacja Żydów na ziemiach polskich w okresie okupacji hitlerowskiej: Zbiór dokumentów (Warsaw: ŻIH, 1957), p. 277 (in German) and p. 279 (in Polish); and T. Berenstein, "Deportacje i zagłada skupisk żydowskich w dystrykcie warszawskim," BŻIH, no. 1 (1952): 277.

15. USHMM, RG-15.019M, reel # 15, 49/143, p. 2; and "Mordy," in Rubin, The Rise and Fall, vol. 2, p. 204.

16. USHMM, RG-15.019M, reel # 6, 17 (Lublin Districts: Radzyń and Siedlce), 959 (m. Mordy), Kwestionariusz o egzekucjach masowych i grobach masowych, pp. 1–2; Rejestr miejsc i faktów zbrodni popełnionych przez okupanta hitlerowskiego na ziemiach polskich w latach 1939–1945: Województwo siedleckie (Warsaw: GKBZHWP, 1985), p. 173; and Edi Weinstein, Quenched Steel. The Story of an Escape from Treblinka, ed. Noah Lasman (Jerusalem: Yad Vashem, 2002), pp. 30–31. The precise number of Jews who were killed in Mordy during the ghetto's liquidation is unknown. Postwar Polish court documentation gives the figure of 200 Jews killed, but this is probably for the entire period from 1942 to 1944.

17. VHF, # 13697, testimony of Renia Lipska-Micznik.

18. For differences in the number of Jews murdered, compare "Mordy," in Rubin, The Rise and Fall, vol. 2, p. 204, with the account found under "Mordy" on the Cmentarze żydowskie w Polsce (Jewish cemeteries in Poland) Web site at kirkuty.xip.pl/mordy.htm.

MROZY

Pre-1939: Mrozy, village, Warsaw województwo, Poland; 1939–1945: Kreis Minsk Mazowiecki, Distrikt Warschau, Generalgouvernement; post-1998: województwo mazowieckie, Poland

Mrozy is located about 50 kilometers (31 miles) east of Mińsk Mazowiecki. In 1921 there were 306 Jews living in the village; the total population stood at 508.

The village and its train station were heavily bombed during the initial days of the September 1939 campaign. Thirty-two Jews, including some refugees, lost their lives in the course of these air raids. Many residents were left homeless. The Germans established a Gendarmerie post in the village.

Only a few names of the German-established Judenrat are known, including its chairman Bencjon Rozenblitt, Joel Cieszyński, and A. Sztejn (secretary). Despite accommodation shortages, 150 refugees had settled in Mrozy by January 1940. A self-help committee was established to care for the newcomers, as well as locals whose dwellings were destroyed. In July 1940, the committee comprised chairman Chaim Alter Jakubowicz of Pabianice, Chaim Mendlewicz of Pabianice, and four locals: Josek Tenenbaum, Joel Cieszyński, Bencjon Rozenblitt, and Szlama Turyn. With support from the American Jewish Joint Distribution Committee (AJDC), the committee managed to open a short-lived soup kitchen. Mrozy alderman Schulc transferred the building to the Polish Red Cross on August 15, 1940.¹

Although the AJDC help was completely inadequate (e.g., 25 kilograms [55 pounds] of vegetable fat rationed out between May and September 1940), its distribution divided the community into two camps—locals and newcomers. One of Mrozy's native committee members wrote to the AJDC in August 1940: "Nowhere are there such barbarous and heartless people as in Mrozy. Those who should give assistance [because they can afford it] are crying and complaining about our committee [asking] why we put refugees before [locals]?" He requested more help for the refugees than for the locals, ending the letter: "Let the locals understand what it is to be a refugee—that he is a human that needs to live. They [locals] do not understand this."

That same month, there were 507 Jews in Mrozy, according to the committee. There were also newcomers from Kalisz, Pabianice, Ostrzeszów, and Puławy. In November 1940, out of the total of 555 Jews, 243 were refugees and 312 were locals. The committee reportedly distributed 100 grams (3.5 ounces) of bread daily for the needy, doubling that amount on Saturdays. The committee was dissolved by the Judenrat in January 1941 and subsequently replaced by a similar body that was affiliated with the Judenrat.²

The Germans established a number of ghettos in Kreis Minsk Mazowiecki in the autumn of 1940. Based on correspondence dated December 13, 1940, the self-help committee reported that there was no plan to establish a ghetto in Mrozy: "This week we had a terrible worry that they were going to deport us. But somehow, as it seems to us, we will succeed in prolonging the deadline for deportation."

Instead of deportation, an open ghetto was established in Mrozy one year later, in November 1941. A German report on the concentration of the Jews in Kreis Minsk Mazowiecki of March 3, 1942, states that in November 1941, "138 Jews from Cegłów were resettled to a Jewish quarter in Mrozy."³ A native Cegłów family, which included Teresa Körner (Chaja Esterstein), was among those resettled. Körner recalls Jews from the vicinity also being forced to move to Mrozy.⁴

With the resettlement of Jews from smaller settlements in the autumn of 1941, the Mrozy ghetto was closed. It was never fenced; rather, placards proclaiming the death penalty for leaving the ghetto without special permission were posted at its borders. A number of the ghetto's residents performed forced labor at the local train station, while others were assigned to drainage works.

Secondary sources report that the number of the ghetto's inhabitants rose to approximately 1,000 before its liquidation, which is dated as September 1942 or "autumn" of that year by those sources available.

The ghetto's liquidation was conducted by the local Gendarmerie. Mrozy's Jews were gathered in the ghetto and then sent by train to the Treblinka extermination camp. The Germans likely left behind a number of Jews for conscription to a small labor camp nearby. A. Kamiński—who escaped deportation from Kałuszyn—testified that some of the escapees were looking for jobs in a labor camp in Mrozy. Rejestr miejsc states that several dozen Jews laboring in nearby drainage works were shot in the autumn of 1943; however, this date may be inaccurate by as much as one year, as those laborers were likely shot as soon as it was too cold to continue working (i.e., in late 1942).⁵

SOURCES The Mrozy ghetto is briefly mentioned by Czesław Pilichowski et al., eds., Obozy hitlerowskie na ziemiach polskich 1939–1945: Informator encyklopedyczny (Warsaw: PWN, 1979), p. 327; and Jacek A. Młynarczyk, "Akcja Reinhard w gettach prowincjonalnych dystryktu warszawskiego 1942–1943," in Barbara Engelking, Jacek Leociak, and Dariusz Libionka, eds., Prowincja noc: Życie i zagłada Żydów w dystrykcie warszawskim (Warsaw: Wydawn. IFiS PAN, 2007), p. 66; and Guy Miron, ed., The Yad Vashem Encyclopedia of the Ghettos during the Holocaust (Jerusalem: Yad Vashem, 2010), p. 501.

Archival sources include AŻIH (210/502 [AJDC]); USHMM (Acc.1999.A.0154 [AJDC]); VHF (# 19794); and YVA (e.g., O-3/2824).

Jolanta Kraemer

NOTES

1. USHMM, Acc.1999.A.0154 (AJDC), 210/502 (Mrozy), pp. 8, 14–15, 32, 38.

2. Ibid., pp. 10, 18–19, 25, 27, 32–33, 38.

3. Ibid., p. 37; T. Berenstein, A. Eisenbach, and A. Rutkowski, eds., Eksterminacja Żydów na ziemiach polskich w okresie okupacji hitlerowskiej: Zbiór dokumentów (Warsaw: ŻIH, 1957), Document 145, pp. 278–279.

4. See M. Melchior, "Uciekinierzy z gett po 'stronie aryjskiej' na prowincji dystryktu warszawskiego—sposoby przetrwania," in Engelking, Leociak, and Libionka, Prowincja noc, p. 328, for a summary of YVA, O-3/2824, T. Körner's testimony; VHF, # 19794, testimony of Teresa Körner (born 1929), 1996. Here Körner dates the resettlement to Mrozy in approximately the spring of 1941 and believes it was at that time most likely an open ghetto.

5. Rejestr miejsc i faktów zbrodni popełnionych przez okupanta hitlerowskiego na ziemiach polskich w latach 1939–1945: Województwo siedleckie (Warsaw: GKBZHP, 1985), p. 175; summary of YVA, O-3/842, A. Kamiński's testimony, as cited by M. Janczewska, "Obozy pracy dla Żydów na terenie dystryktu warszawskiego," in Engelking, Leociak, and Libionka, Prowincja noc, pp. 303–304.

OKUNIEW

Pre-1939: Okuniew, town, Warsaw województwo, Poland; 1939–1945: Kreis Warschau-Land, Distrikt Warschau, Generalgouvernement; post-1998: województwo mazowieckie, Poland

Okuniew is located about 20 kilometers (12.5 miles) to the east-northeast of Warsaw. In 1921, the Jewish population was 489 out of a total of 1,891 inhabitants. Under German occupation, there were reportedly 84 Jewish families living in Okuniew.

Okuniew fell to the Germans on September 28, 1939. Within the first days of the occupation the Germans murdered two Jews. Various decrees and restrictions were soon imposed on the Jews, especially the performance of forced labor. Jews were required to wear special armbands, and Jewish children were forbidden to attend school. Maria Segal, however, recalls that Jewish children attended school secretly at night, to continue with their education.¹

VOLUME II: PART A

In October 1939, a German civil administration was established, and Okuniew became part of Kreis Warschau-Land. The Kreishauptmann was Dr. Rupprecht.

Little information is available concerning the fate of the Jews of Okuniew under German occupation. For example, the yizkor book contains no survivor testimonies. According to the accounts of Zvi and Hirsh Noshevski, survivors from nearby Miłosna, the Okuniew and Miłosna Jews shared a common Jewish Council (Judenrat), which was based in Miłosna. The council was headed initially by two Jews named Fridman and Spekman, who had been recommended to the Germans by the Polish local council (gmina). These men had little aptitude or inclination for the task. Therefore, they sent an offer to a former Polish officer, Kh. Lubliner, then living in Warsaw, to return to Miłosna and become head of the Judenrat. In return for a good salary, Lubliner accepted the task and is described in the yizkor book as having been an energetic and upstanding leader who “did much to benefit the ghetto inhabitants of Miłosna and Okuniew.”²

The standard Polish reference work by Czesław Pilichowski indicates that a ghetto existed for about 500 Jews in Okuniew. This was likely established in early 1941, at the same time as that in nearby Miłosna, and was probably an open ghetto.³ According to contemporary Jewish Social Self-Help (JSS) records, about 450 Jews were residing in Okuniew in mid-January 1941 under difficult conditions and in need of aid. On May 8, 1941, the American Jewish Joint Distribution Committee (AJDC) sent 250 złoty to the Jews of Okuniew for social relief, which had been received there by mid-June.⁴

According to documents preserved in the Ringelblum Archive, the Jews of Okuniew were expelled on March 25, 1942, and resettled into the Warsaw ghetto. During the expulsion, at least 15 named Jews are known to have been killed.⁵

Maria Segal, who was only six years old at the time, recalled that there was a great commotion and screams in the night on the eve of the expulsion. Her parents were very concerned about what was going to happen and tried to reassure her. They made name tags for the children to wear round their necks during the journey, lest they become separated. In the early morning hours, “rasping German voices shouted through loudspeakers for all Jews to leave their homes and congregate on the town plaza.” The Jews were then escorted to Warsaw, with most men driven on foot, while children and the elderly were put on horse-pulled carts. The Jews could only take a very limited amount of luggage with them. Maria, with her sister, was separated from her parents, being placed on a cart for the journey. She heard shots in the distance as the carts drove away. It took the whole day to reach Warsaw. Some of those marching on foot, who could not keep up, were shot by the guards on the journey. On arrival in the Warsaw ghetto, everyone was forced to take communal showers.⁶

From the Warsaw ghetto, nearly all of the remaining Jews were subsequently deported to the Treblinka extermination camp. Maria Segal was smuggled out of the Warsaw ghetto with the help of a Polish family from Okuniew, for whom she then minded cows. While living there on the Aryan side, she learned that two other Jews, who were hiding in Okuniew, had been denounced and shot at the local cemetery.⁷

SOURCES Publications regarding the fate of the Jews of Okuniew during the Holocaust include the following: Shimon Kanc, ed., Sefer zikaron le-kebilat Rembertow, Okuniew, Miłosna (Tel Aviv: Rembertow, Okuniew and Miłosna Societies in Israel, the USA, France, Mexico City, Canada, Chile, and Brazil, 1974); Abraham Wein, ed., Pinkas ha-kebilot. Encyclopaedia of Jewish Communities: Poland, vol. 4, Warsaw and Its Region (Jerusalem: Yad Vashem, 1989), p. 139; and Maria Segal, Maria's Story: Childhood Memories of the Holocaust (Santa Barbara, CA: Boehm Group, 2009). The ghetto is mentioned in Czesław Pilichowski et al., eds., Obozy hitlerowskie na ziemiach polskich 1939–1945: Informator encyklopedyczny (Warsaw: PWN, 1979), p. 345.

Relevant documentation can be found in the following archives: AŻIH (211/750 [JSS]; Ring I/501 and 875); USHMM (Acc.1997.A.0124 [JSS]; RG-15.079M [Ring I/501 and 875]; RG-15.084M [Relacje]; RG-50.060*0069); VHF (# 43650); and YVA.

Martin Dean

NOTES

1. Segal, Maria's Story, pp. 11–12; VHF, # 43650, testimony of Maria Segal.
2. Shimon Ahronson, “Der ayfkum un umkum fun yidishn yishuv,” pp. 411–412; and Hirsh Noshevski, “Der veg fun peyn un greyl,” 435—both in Kanc, Sefer zikaron.
3. Regarding the establishment of the Miłosna ghetto, see Noshevski, “Der veg fun peyn un greyl,” p. 435.
4. AŻIH, 211/750.
5. Ibid., Ring I/875; Ring I/501.
6. Segal, Maria's Story, pp. 11–12; VHF, # 43650. Understandably, the dating in Maria's accounts is inaccurate regarding certain details.
7. Segal, Maria's Story, pp. 21–22.

OTWOCK

Pre-1939: Otwock, town, Warsaw województwo, Poland; 1939–1944: Kreis Warschau-Land, Distrikt Warschau, Generalgouvernement; post-1998: województwo mazowieckie, Poland

Ottock is located about 22 kilometers (14 miles) southeast of Warsaw. By September 1, 1939, the Jewish population had reached 10,689 out of a total 19,916. In November 1941 the Jewish population was 12,634, and in 1942, 12,030.¹

The German army entered Ottock on September 14, 1939. The military administration lasted until October 25, 1939, when Ottock became part of Distrikt Warschau. Based in Ottock were units of the Gendarmerie, the Schutzpolizei, an outpost of the Kripo (Criminal Police), and the Gestapo. The pre-war mayor of the city, Jan Gadomski, was reinstated in his position. The Polish police was reactivated, with Captain Bronisław Marchlewicz as its chief.

Immediately after entering the town, the Germans started to persecute the Jews. They forcibly cut off the beards of Jewish men, looted Jewish houses and stores, and arbitrarily arrested Jews for forced labor. The head of the Arbeitsamt (labor office), Hugo Dietz, dragged Jews from the synagogue on Aleksander Street on Saturdays. The Jews were forced to dig ditches and clean the villas of German officers. In October 1939, Germans burned down several synagogues in Otwock. Two other synagogues, one of them the Wajnberg synagogue, were destroyed later, in 1940.

The first murder took place on November 11, 1939, in the Śródborów Forest. The Germans shot three Jewish men for alleged illegal activities. In December 1939, the Kreishauptmann Warschau-Land, Dr. Hermann Rupprecht, imposed a contribution of 100,000 złoty on Otwock's Jewish community.

According to Calel Perechodnik, a Jewish policeman, the relationship between Poles and Jews, "except [for] sporadic events, was correct, although condescending."² One problem was the difficulty many Jews encountered in retrieving household goods given to Poles for safekeeping, as well as deteriorating relations in those cases where Jews had signed over their businesses to Poles. The general attitude of the German authorities towards Jews, apart from the occasional repressive actions, was initially tolerable. Gadowski, the wartime mayor of Otwock, earned a bad reputation in the Jewish community, as he signed off on all the anti-Jewish directives issued by the Kreishauptmann.

The Jewish Council (Judenrat) in Otwock was elected at the end of December 1939. It consisted of 24 people, including the most prominent Jews. The head was Izaak Lesman; his deputy was Mojżesz Kagan.³ Four of the members had been on the pre-war Community Council. Rabbis Rubin Zejman and Berysz Lejzor Janowski and 12 doctors also worked for the Judenrat.⁴

The Judenrat was responsible for delivering workers for forced labor, collecting valuables for the Germans, and organizing food supplies and social welfare services. Very soon the Judenrat was officiously fulfilling all German orders. The attitude of the German authorities and the local administration towards the Judenrat was initially not so stringent, but by the second half of 1942 it had become more hostile.

In July 1941, the German authorities dismissed Lesman as head of the Judenrat and dissolved the entire council for reasons that are unclear. The new head was Szymon Górewicz, and his deputy was Borys Chorażycki. Six members had also served on the first Judenrat.⁵ Guta Kac-Kucyk recalled that members of the Judenrat were unable to satisfy the increasingly cruel German demands. Emanuel Ringelblum noted in May 1941: "In Otwock, 100 employees of the Jewish community were taken to labor camps, because they did not deliver the appointed number of [workers]."⁶

The ghetto in Otwock was established in the fall of 1940. It was the second largest ghetto in Distrikt Warschau. Throughout the two years of its existence, more than 12,000 people were incarcerated there altogether. The first steps to create the ghetto in Otwock were taken in September–October 1940, when Jews had to leave the areas of Sopliców and part of Śródborów and move to the center of town.⁷ On November 4, 1940, the Kreishauptmann established two Jewish quarters in Otwock: a health resort area and a residential area.⁸ The residential area consisted of "The Little Town" (also called "Shtetl") and the "Central ghetto," separated by the railway. From the Central ghetto to the Shtetl there was access across the railway track (near Samorządowa Street).⁹

The health resort ghetto did not have restricted borders. It contained Jewish medical institutions: hospitals, sanatoriums, and pensions (small hotels). The existence of these institutions and the resort character of Otwock were probably the reasons for the creation of a health resort ghetto. On the orders of the German authorities the sanatorium "Brijus" became the only place accepting Jewish tuberculosis patients in the General-gouvernement. "Zofiówka" became the only place for nervous and mentally ill Jews. CENTOS (the Central Organization for Orphan Care) maintained in the health resort ghetto a shelter for child refugees, an Educational-Therapeutic Institute, and a ward for children in Zofiówka.¹⁰

The move into the ghetto was completed on November 30, 1940. The relative freedom that persisted inside the ghetto even induced some people to come to Otwock. For example, some Jews from Karczew, who were expelled to Warsaw in 1941, moved into the Otwock ghetto. Initially the ghetto was not sealed, so it was possible to leave it. As a result, the smuggling of food was not very difficult. The craftsmen sold their products to the people of the town and the surrounding area. Some ghetto inmates received food packages from relatives in the Soviet Union. Later the ghetto was partly fenced in, and Jews could not leave the ghetto under penalty of death. The Germans sealed the ghetto on January 15, 1941. To leave the ghetto one had to have a special permit. The columns of workers were allowed to leave for work under escort. Later orders were issued for the erection of wooden or wire fences. Still, the ghetto was only poorly fenced off, and Jews often left it, especially at night. As a result, the Kreishauptmann demanded from the Polish (Blue) Police that they guard the borders on a regular basis. Six policemen were assigned to control it from July 16, 1941.

After that date, several Jews were killed almost every day for leaving the ghetto, shot by Germans on the spot and buried in the fields. When conditions in the ghetto became worse, more people tried to leave. Very often they were caught by Poles, who, after robbing them, handed them over to the Polish (Blue) Police. They were reported to the Gendarmerie in Rembertów, which sent a unit to shoot them once a few people had been collected together.¹¹

The strict closing off of the ghetto and the lack of contact between its three sections forced the Judenrat to form separate branches: members of the Judenrat and clerks working for the Judenrat lived in each section. Contact was maintained by phone or by special delegates.

In the fall of 1941 there was a typhus epidemic in Otwock, which became the official reason for fencing both sides of the railway along the length of the Central ghetto and Shtetl ghetto.¹² There was no longer any connection between the health resort, the Central ghetto, and the Shtetl.

The Jewish Police in Otwock was organized in November 1940 to help facilitate the transfer of Jews into the ghetto. At first it consisted of the commandant Bernard Kronenberg, his deputy Efroim Rykner, and 30 policemen. Formally, but not actually, it was subordinated to the Polish (Blue) Police in the Generalgouvernement. In May 1941, there were 100 policemen and a commandant.¹³ The police were divided into different sections: patrol, administrative, hospital, and sanitary. The Jewish Police was not popular due to corruption. The police selected people for forced labor and took them to the Arbeitsamt. Those who had money bought themselves out, and the poor were sent to work.

The Judenrat was obliged to supply a specific number of workers to German units stationed in Otwock, on average some 85 to 100 workers per day. They worked cleaning the town and the ghetto. Most people tried to avoid being sent to work, and very often the Jewish Police employed force to round them up, even killing some who resisted. In the summer of 1940, the German authorities sent young men to forced labor camps in Distrikt Lublin. The wealthy paid money, and the poor were sent to the camps. Some 300 Otwock Jews were sent to the labor camps in Józefów, Biała Podlaska, Bełżec, Tyszowce, and Zamość.¹⁴ In August 1940, 50 Jewish men from Otwock were sent to the Tyszowce labor camp. They worked on construction projects regulating the Huczwa River. In December the camp was liquidated, and people were released back to their ghettos.¹⁵

In April 1942, some 400 Jewish men from Otwock were sent to the labor camp in Karczew. The inmates worked on a land reclamation scheme. The close proximity to the ghetto played a key role in the life of inmates, who could receive support from their families and for the first few months the workers were even able to go to the ghetto for Shabbat.

In July 1942, the Jewish commandant of the Karczew camp, Welwel Kolkowicz, had to pay a large bribe to Inspector Frank for the camp to continue operating. Otherwise the workers were to be killed.¹⁶ The workers in the camp stayed in contact with a Polish policeman, whose sons belonged to the underground Home Army. There were plans for resistance, but these were not realized due to the lack of any arms.

In January 1942, some 150 to 200 men were sent to the Treblinka forced labor camp to work on the construction of the Treblinka extermination camp. Postwar documents indicate that 175 men were sent there in January and dozens more in February. They were among the first victims of the gas chambers.¹⁷ Three men from Otwock survived the liquidation of the camp.

Only a very small percentage of the Jews in the ghetto conducted any form of paid work. Some of these worked in the hospitals and sanatoriums. In 1941, there were 436 businesses in the ghetto: mainly engaged in trade and handicrafts or garret-craftsmen.¹⁸ Among the craftsmen were tailors, shoemakers, and blacksmiths.

Most people earned money selling their belongings to the Poles. Those who did not have anything left took their food to the Warsaw ghetto to sell, especially 10- to 12-year-old children. Until the closing of the Shtetl ghetto, Poles and Jews traded regularly there.

There were six communal kitchens operating in the summer of 1941. Sickness and hunger increased considerably at the end of that year after the closing of the ghetto.

At first Jewish patients were treated in the Polish hospitals, but soon they had to be moved to separate Jewish wards. Because of the typhus epidemic and dysentery, the Judenrat had to organize an isolation hospital. Starting in August 1941, death rates increased due to the spread of contagious diseases. The winter of 1941–1942 brought the highest rates of sickness due to typhus. In December 1941 the mortality rate was 3.6 percent, and over the next two months it increased to 10 percent.¹⁹

The health resort ghetto became the center of cultural life, because a lot of Jewish intellectuals were receiving treatment there. A literature group was established, and lectures on history and literature were presented. There were some forms of conspiratorial learning in the ghetto. There were underground classes and also a cheder. Observant Jews studied the Talmud regularly. The meat from Otwock was ritually slaughtered and smuggled into the Warsaw ghetto by young, non-Jewish-looking girls. The meat had certificates of kashruth signed by shochtim.

In July 1942 the commandant of the Gendarmerie in Rembertów, Lüppschau, came to Otwock. He demanded from the commandant of the Jewish Police expensive gifts and in return gave assurances that the Otwock ghetto would be spared. On August 18, 1942, Major Karl Brandt, a Gestapo officer and one of the organizers of the liquidation of the Warsaw ghetto, came to Otwock with a few officers and ordered the ghetto area to be surrounded by a wall. He also dismissed the chairman of the Jewish Council in Otwock, Szymon Górewicz, appointing Bernard Kronenberg, the chief of the Jewish Police, to replace him.²⁰ According to Calel Perechodnik's memoirs, Kronenberg received a warning letter from a former commander of the Otwock Jewish Police—Efroim Rykner, who wrote about the threat of deportation. The news spread rapidly around the ghetto.

Part of the staff of Zofiówka received warnings from a Polish policeman about an upcoming Aktion, and the staff of the sanatoriums and hospitals escaped to Warsaw, using an ambulance. Some of the orderlies bleached their hair to disguise themselves as "Aryans." Many doctors committed suicide.

The liquidation Aktion began on August 19, 1942; it was carried out by Ukrainian auxiliaries and other SS troops. The Germans ordered people to leave their houses and gather in the main ghetto, and from there the Germans led them to the loading platform. The place for the final concentration of Otwock's Jews was on the site where a new workshop was planned. There, Jewish workers cut down trees and enclosed the square with a barbed-wire fence.²¹ The commandant of the Rembertów Gendarmerie, Lüppschau, the Inspector of the Karczew camp, Frank, and the chief of the Arbeitsamt, Dietz, all came to Otwock to supervise the loading of the trains. Some 8,000 Jews were deported from Otwock during this Aktion.

The liquidation Aktion in the resort ghetto was particularly brutal. In the sanatoriums “Brijus” and “Zofiówka,” everyone who was unable to move or who was mentally ill was shot on the spot. Children from the sanatoriums were not shot, as the Germans did not want to waste bullets. Instead, they smashed children’s heads against the walls. On Reymont Street, 600 people were shot.

Abraham Willendorf, a Jewish policeman, publicly renounced his police insignia and joined his family. Two men escaped from the train—Jurek Grandowski and Berek Kejzman.

The Aktion was repeated on the following day. The Jewish policemen stayed behind to clean up the ghetto. Some of them were sent to the hospital Zofiówka to bury the corpses of the murdered Jews. In December 1942, after finishing the work, the policemen were sent to the labor camp in Karczew. From there some of the policemen and 200 workers unfit to work were sent to the Warsaw ghetto. In May 1943, the head prisoner of the Karczew camp, Welwel Kolkowicz, decided to escape and advised his fellow workers to do the same. The camp existed until at least September 1943. Some of the policemen worked in camps in Rembertów and Piekiełko.

After the ghetto’s liquidation, the hunt for hidden Jews and their murder continued for four weeks. Germans and Ukrainian auxiliaries searched houses and cellars. In the mass graves located between Reymont and Słowacki Streets, 1,500 people were buried. Similar graves were dug also in the woods surrounding the town and in air-raid shelters. About 3,000 people were captured and shot in the course of the operation.²² Some children from CENTOS remained in the woods in hiding until the spring of 1943. Poles denounced most of them. Some children had prepared hideouts in the woods. Even those children who were deliberately given to Poles by their parents were mostly abandoned or left in Catholic convents. Otwock nuns from the congregation of Saint Elizabeth, who led the orphanage “Promyk,” saved about 20 to 30 Jewish children. The chief of the Polish (Blue) Police, Captain Bronisław Marchlewicz, and Ludwik Wolski, a priest from the Wincenty à Paulo parish, forged baptismal certificates to save Jewish children. Meanwhile, ordinary Poles together with Germans busied themselves in looting Jewish goods.

Some 400 former Jewish inhabitants of Otwock returned to the town at the end of the war. Some of them had spent the war in the Soviet Union. Nobody from that group remained in Poland.

SOURCES There are two yizkor books published by the survivors: Benjamin Orenstein, ed., Khurbn Otvotsk, Falenits, Kartshev (Bamberg: Former Residents of Otvotsk, Falenic and Kartshev in the American Zone in Germany, 1948); and Shimon Kanc, ed., Sefer Zikaron: Otvotsk-Karchev (Tel Aviv: Former Residents of Otvotsk and Kartshev, 1968). One of the most important sources on the history of the Otwock ghetto and its liquidation is a memoir written by a Jewish policeman in the ghetto, Calel Perechodnik, Am I a Murderer? (Westview Press, 1996). A secondary source focused on the Otwock ghetto is a book written by this author, The Jewish Population of Otwock during the Second World War (Warsaw: Jewish Historical Institute, 2002).

The main archival sources are located in the State Archive of the Capital City of Warsaw (APW), Otwock Branch, where many documents produced by the Judenrat and the Jewish Social Self-Help (JSS) are preserved. These documents can be found in the file Records of the City of Otwock, 1939–1942 (Akta miasta Otwocka, 643, 861, 896, 898, 925, 934, 1010, 1022, 1023, 1053, 1057, 1060, 1062, 1063, 1068). Some useful documents can be found in the records of the State Archive of the Capital City of Warsaw: Kreishauptmannschaft Warschau-Land and Amt des Gouverners des Distrikts Warschau. Other materials were obtained from the Archives of the Jewish Historical Institute (e.g., AŻIH, 313/46, 87; Ring I/373). These include documents of the American Jewish Joint Distribution Committee (210, AJDC) and the Jewish Social Self-Help (211/771 [JSS]), which give an insight into the economic situation in the Otwock ghetto. There are also several testimonies written by survivors (e.g., 301/4064, 4121, 5913 [Relacje]).

Sylwia Szymanska-Smolkin

NOTES

1. APW, Akta miasta Otwocka, 643, p. 60; 896, p. 27; 898, p. 1; 934, p. 38; 1022, p. 2.
2. Ibid., p. 6.
3. Ibid., 1053, pp. 282–283.
4. Ibid., p. 250.
5. Ibid., 1060, p. 124.
6. Emanuel Ringelblum, The Chronicle of the Warsaw Ghetto (Warsaw, 1983), p. 284.
7. APW, 861, p. 1; Ludwik Landau, Chronicles of the Years of War and Occupation, vol. 1 (Warsaw, 1962), p. 744.
8. APW, 1057, p. 74.
9. Kanc, Sefer Zikaron, p. 876; APW, 1057, p. 74.
10. APW, 1022, pp. 8–9.
11. Lucjan Chojczyk, “Komisariat przy Sienkiewicza,” in Mówią wieki (1996), p. 17.
12. APW, 1010, pp. 192, 195–196; Ringelblum, The Chronicle, p. 343.
13. APW, 925, p. 73.
14. Gazeta Żydowska, no. 28, November 23, 1940.
15. AŻIH, Ring I/373, pp. 1–10; Orenstein, Khurbn Otvotsk, Falenits, Kartshev, pp. 8–10.
16. Orenstein, Khurbn Otvotsk, Falenits, Kartshev, p. 23.
17. AŻIH, 313/87, Nissenszal; 313/46, Zygmunt Herzig’s case, p. 5; Z. Łukasiewicz, “Obóz pracy w Treblince,” Bulletin of the Main Commission for Investigation of German Crimes in Poland 3 (1947): 113, 121; Perechodnik, Am I a Murderer?, p. 12.
18. APW, 1023, pp. 1–9.
19. R. Zabłotniak, “Sanatorium Towarzystwa Opieki nad Biednymi Gruźliczo Chorymi Żydami ‘Marpe’ (1907–1924–1942),” BŻIH, nos. 1–2 (165–166) (1993): 106–109; “Sanatoria żydowskie w Otwocku (1939–1942) w pięćdziesiątą rocznicę zagłady,” Zdrowie Publiczne 55:3–4 (1992): 551–553; Gazeta Żydowska, no. 81, September 5, 1941.
20. Kanc, Sefer Zikaron, p. 940; Perechodnik, Am I a Murderer?, pp. 20, 27.
21. Perechodnik, Am I a Murderer?, p. 20; AŻIH, 301/4064, p. 6.

22. AŻIH, 301/4064, pp. 7–8; 301/4326, testimony of Zalmen Cwi Golden, p. 8; T. Berenstein, “Deportacje i zagłada skupisk żydowskich w dystrykcie warszawskim,” BŻIH, no. 1 (1952): 93.

PARYSÓW

Pre-1939: Parysów, village, Lublin województwo, Poland; 1939–1945: Parysow, Kreis Garwolin, Distrikt Warschau, Generalgouvernement; post-1998: Parysów, town, województwo mazowieckie, Poland

Parysów is located about 53 kilometers (33 miles) southeast of Warsaw. In 1921, there were 1,906 Jews in Parysów; the village's total population stood at 3,388. By 1939, there were 300 Jewish families living in Parysów.

Unlike many other localities in the Kreis, Parysów was not damaged in the course of the September 1939 campaign and so was subsequently flooded with refugees, including many Jews from Garwolin.

The Germans established a 12-man Judenrat, chaired by the tradesman Aharon Glatstein, with another tradesman, Jankiel Cymlich (Yaakov Zimlich), as his deputy. Other members of the Judenrat included Icek Goldman, Chil Borowski, Berek Drzewnowski, Moshe Chaim Poskolinski, and Aron Chełmer as secretary.¹ The Germans soon withdrew from the village, placing Polish (Blue) Police in charge of maintaining order. A Jewish police force was also later formed to enforce German orders, including labor conscription.

On May 17, 1940, 149 Jews who had been forced out of Garwolin arrived in Parysów. Another 202 deportees from Górzno, Wola Rębkowska, and Pilawa arrived on October 20, 1940. A survey conducted that same month reported 3,115 Jews in Parysów.²

An open ghetto was established in Parysów in November 1940, consisting of three streets in the southeastern part of the village and including Borowska Street (on which the synagogue stood) and one side of Garwolin Street. Poles who owned property within the ghetto boundaries could remain there, on request. The Jews were allowed to take their belongings with them, including artisan tools, despite the lack of space to set up their workshops. Owners of horses and wagons faced the same difficulty.³

There are no reports of the ghetto being guarded or closed or its inhabitants being executed for leaving its borders; however, Gestapo agents would sometimes come to the ghetto and beat up Jews in the streets.

On December 10, 1940, about 70 deportee families from Garwolin—by then almost entirely depleted of Jews—were transferred to Parysów. The Judenrat estimated the number of Jews at 3,500. In a letter to the Jewish Social Self-Help (JSS) office in Warsaw, it reported that the “overcrowding cannot be described.”⁴

The Germans ordered the organization of a Jewish police force with Judenrat member Moshe Chaim Poskolinski as its commander. It consisted of approximately 12 men from Parysów and Garwolin. The jail, due to lack of space, was set up in a windowless corridor of the synagogue. An inner wall was built to separate it from the remainder of the space, where the refugees were quartered. Later a fire brigade, commanded by Tuvia Miller, was organized in the ghetto. There were many volunteers, as the work guaranteed exemption from forced labor.

A cooperative of Jewish and Polish artisans was organized in the ghetto. The Jewish craftsmen produced the goods, while Poles, who were not barred from traveling, sold them. Yet the majority of the ghetto's residents lacked any paid employment and suffered from hunger. In addition, the community was forced to pay three large “contributions” to the German authorities; jewelry and money for the last two had to be extorted by the Jewish Police.

Impoverishment within the Jewish community forced many to resort to theft. Local farmers complained to the Polish police that their produce was being stolen from the fields. The local Jews in turn accused the refugees, who then claimed that the thefts were committed by the locals. The Polish police and the Judenrat warned the Jewish Police to restore order. Despite the hunger, pious Jews maintained religious practices including eating kosher meat, Sabbath prayers, and celebrating the High Holidays.⁵

On April 26, 1941, a local branch of the JSS was established in Parysów. The merchant Abraham Lejzer Raplański of Garwolin served as the chairman, and Izak Fajgenbaum was his deputy. The committee also included Icek Goldman, Jankiel Cymlech, Lejb Rolfus, and Aron Chełmer. The JSS was able to provide very little help. In February 1942, out of 2,078 Jews applying for meals from the soup kitchen, only 105 were recipients.

In the autumn of 1941, after an outbreak of typhus, the German authorities ordered a hospital opened. Despite the epidemic, more Jews from Garwolin, which by this time had been made judenrein (cleansed of Jews), were to be relocated to Parysów by November 20, 1941. Tuvia Miller was the hospital's administrator. The only doctor—a woman named Warchower—was its director. The hospital inspection conducted by the Garwolin JSS in January 1942 described it as “neglected.” The inspectors recommended that “the arrival of a male Jewish doctor, who would organize the work at the hospital, is desirable.” The report summed up the situation in the ghetto: “Terrible misery prevails in Parysów in every way.”⁶

In 1942, the ghetto's Jews worked in two nearby labor camps. A 50-man labor brigade worked in Chyżyn, where they were straightening the Świder River channel. On reports that laborers were beaten while working knee deep in water, the Judenrat refused to send the Jews there the next day but later gave in, after the Germans issued a warning. Those who were assigned for labor in the Wilga camp—possibly as many as 100 Jews—demanded that the Judenrat provide transport. The 20-kilometer (12-mile) exhausting march to Wilga left the workers too weak to work, thereby resulting in severe beatings. Although a vehicle was eventually provided, the physical violence continued. Once barracks were built on the camp's grounds, the Parysów Jews refused to go to work, for fear of being detained there. The Jewish police force was unable to compel them to go to work; as a last resort, it would lock up the designated laborers in the middle of the night and then send them off to the camp in the morning. All of Parysów's Jews were desperately trying to avoid work in both camps.

A number of Jews were also working on road construction, 3 kilometers (2 miles) from Parysów, in the village of Wilchta. "The Jewish Police drove us to labor," testified one of the ghetto's survivors, Meier Herc.⁷

In May 1942, the Germans arrested three members of the Judenrat, including the police chief Poskolinski. All were shot near the road to Garwolin. In June 1942, the Judenrat chairman, Glatstein, and his father, a slaughterer, were charged with the illegal killing of a cow. Arrested and taken to Garwolin, they never returned. Jankiel Cymlich was appointed as the new chairman. Tuvia Miller took charge of the police force.

At the beginning of September 1942, the Germans requested larger numbers of laborers to be sent to Chyżyn and for road construction. Approximately 600 Jews at that time worked to meet the deadline for the paving of the Parysów-Głusków road, including the elderly Rabbi Morgenstern. The deadline was met after some Poles with road-paving equipment helped to finish the job.⁸

Shortly before the ghetto's liquidation, the Germans changed the Judenrat chairman for the last time, replacing Cymlich with Moshe Munk, who was immediately tasked with collecting the last large contribution. In anticipation of the ghetto's liquidation, many Jews tried to save themselves by running to the Chyżyn camp.

In mid-September 1942 (possibly September 18), without notice, 3,000 Jews from the liquidated Stoczek Łukowski ghetto were brought into the Parysów ghetto. The Germans demanded that the Judenrat provide them with housing.

The destruction of the Parysów ghetto was also unannounced. The streets leading from the ghetto were blocked off on September 27, 1942, by Germans and Polish police. Residents of the ghetto were then chased to the market square. Meier Herc described the liquidation: "The Jews set off from the market square towards the train station in Pilawa, such that they had to cover 9 kilometers [5.6 miles] on foot. Recorded music was played from an automobile. Women and children were seated on wagons. The sick and weak were shot on the spot—on the square. And in this manner 150 persons were killed." From Pilawa, the community was sent to the Treblinka extermination camp by train.⁹

Thirty Jews were registered as being shot by the German Gendarmerie from October 2–4, 1942, in a hunt for ghetto survivors. Among the victims were 3 members of the Morski family and 11 of the Borucki family.¹⁰

SOURCES Information on the fate of the Jews of Parysów under German occupation can be found in the following publications: Y. Granatstein, ed., Sefer Parisov (Tel Aviv: Former Residents of Parysów in Israel, 1971); Abraham Wein, Bracha Freundlich, and Wila Orbach, eds., Pinkas ha-kehillot. Encyclopaedia of Jewish Communities: Poland, vol. 7, Lublin and Kielce (Jerusalem: Yad Vashem, 1999), pp. 405–406.

The following archival sources were used to prepare this entry: AŻIH (210/541 [AJDC]; 211/393-95, 211/784 [JSS]; 301/4104 [Relacje]); and USHMM (Acc.1997.A.0124 [JSS]; Acc.1999.A.0154 [AJDC]; RG-15.019M [Court inquiries about executions and mass graves in districts, provinces, camps, and ghettos]).

Jolanta Kraemer

NOTES

1. USHMM, Acc.1999.A.0154 (AJDC), 210/541 (Parysów), pp. 47–48; Acc.1997.A.0124 (JSS), 211/ 393 (Garwolin), pp. 33, 45.
2. Ibid., Acc.1999.A.0154, 210/541, pp. 24–30, 47–48.
3. Wein, Freundlich, and Orbach, Pinkas ha-kehillot: Poland, vol. 7, Lublin and Kielce, p. 405; Granatstein, Sefer Parisov, p. 332.
4. USHMM, Acc.1999.A.0154, 210/541, pp. 47–49.
5. Wein, Freundlich, and Orbach, Pinkas ha-kehillot: Poland, vol. 7, Lublin and Kielce, p. 405; Granatstein, Sefer Parisov, pp. 332–333, 337, 340–341.
6. USHMM, Acc.1997.A.0124, 211/394 (Garwolin), pp. 24–25, 45, 49; 211/395 (Garwolin), pp. 36–37; and 211/784 (Parysów), p. 5; Granatstein, Sefer Parisov, pp. 333, 336–337, 339.
7. Granatstein, Sefer Parisov, p. 334; USHMM, RG-15.019M (Court inquiries about executions and mass graves in districts, provinces, camps, and ghettos), reel 18, file 55; testimony of Meier Herc, AŻIH, 301/4104 (Relacje), as quoted in Barbara Engelking "Życie codzienne w miasteczkach dystryktu warszawskiego," in B. Engelking, J. Leociak, and D. Libionka, eds., Prowincja noc: Życie i zagłada Żydów w dystrykcie warszawskim (Warsaw: Wydawnictwo IFiS PAN, 2007), pp. 203–204.
8. Wein, Freundlich, and Orbach, Pinkas ha-kehillot: Poland, vol. 7, Lublin and Kielce, p. 406; Granatstein, Sefer Parisov, pp. 340–341.
9. Testimony of Meier Herc, AŻIH, 301/4104, as quoted in Engelking, "Życie codzienne," pp. 203–204; Wein, Freundlich, and Orbach, Pinkas ha-kehillot: Poland, vol. 7, Lublin and Kielce, p. 406; Granatstein, Sefer Parisov, pp. 340–342.
10. Rejestr miejsc i faktów zbrodni popełnionych przez okupanta hitlerowskiego na ziemiach polskich w latach 1939–1945: Województwo siedleckie (Warsaw: GKBZHW, IPN, 1985), pp. 193–194.

PIASECZNO

Pre-1939: Piaseczno, town, Warsaw województwo, Poland; 1939–1944: Kreis Warschau-Land, Distrikt Warschau, Generalgouvernement; post-1998: województwo mazowieckie, Poland

Piaseczno is located 18 kilometers (11 miles) south of Warsaw. In 1921, 2,256 Jews were living in Piaseczno, representing 40.2 percent of the town's total population (5,615 people). In the interwar period, numerous Jewish political organizations and professional bodies existed, which took an active part in the social and political life of the town.

German mobile forces entered Piaseczno on September 6, 1939. From the first day of the occupation, Wehrmacht soldiers executed inhabitants of Piaseczno, both Polish and Jewish. On September 9, 1939, 22 Polish prisoners of war (POWs) and

Jews were shot in Piaseczno; one day later, Wehrmacht soldiers killed 2 young Jews on Chilickowskiej Street.¹ In response, many Piaseczno Jews fled to Warsaw and to Soviet-occupied eastern Poland; at the same time though, approximately 1,000 Jewish refugees from various parts of the country arrived in the town, raising the number of Jewish inhabitants to approximately 3,500.²

On the establishment of a German civil administration on October 26, 1939, Piaseczno became part of Kreis Warschau-Land. In December 1939, the Ortskommandantur in Piaseczno ordered the Jews to wear the Star of David, marked the doors of Jewish homes and enterprises with yellow paint, and forced the Jewish community to pay a “contribution” of 30,000 złoty.³

In January 1940, the German authorities ordered the establishment of a Jewish Council (Judenrat), consisting of 12 persons. The Judenrat established a welfare committee under the direction of Boruch Higier. The welfare committee was responsible both for the distribution of food provided with support from the American Jewish Joint Distribution Committee (AJDC) and for the collection of funds to help the poorest members of the Jewish community. In the period from February 4 to July 25, 1940, the Welfare Committee distributed 1,764 meals and 1,500 kilograms (3,307 pounds) of bread.⁴

In the spring of 1940 the Jews of Piaseczno were apparently struck by excessive violence that was perpetrated by the local Polish population with tacit approval of the German administration.⁵

The Jews of Piaseczno had to serve as unpaid workers for the German army and local farmers in the area surrounding Piaseczno. On March 15, 1940, 61 Jews resettled from Łódź and Garwolin arrived in Piaseczno, followed by another 185 deportees in June 1940.⁶

In the summer of 1940, the Kreishauptmann Warschau-Land ordered the German mayor of Piaseczno to present a proposal for the establishment of a ghetto in Piaseczno by August 1, 1940. On July 23, 1940, the Judenrat, however, forwarded a memorandum to the Kreishauptmann, trying to convince him of the impractical nature of German plans to establish a ghetto in the town.⁷ Nevertheless, in November 1940, the Jews of Piaseczno were forced to move into the ghetto, which was established in the southern part of the town, along Świętojańska, Jerozolima, Topolowa, Czajewicz, and Krótka Streets.⁸

The ghetto existed for only around three months. In two waves the Jewish community of Piaseczno was deported to the Warsaw ghetto. On December 4, 1940, approximately 1,000 Jews were expelled from Piaseczno and forced into the Warsaw ghetto. The Jews were either herded on trucks or had to walk the entire distance of 18 kilometers (11 miles) to Warsaw on foot, carrying bundles with their possessions on their backs. On their arrival in the Warsaw ghetto, some Jews were placed into quarantine facilities and the others simply dispersed.⁹ In a second wave, between January 22 and January 27, 1941, on the orders of the Department for Resettlement (Abteilung Umsiedlung) in the office of the Gouverneur of Distrikt Warschau, the remaining Jews of Piaseczno (about 1,000 people) were deported to the Warsaw ghetto. In Warsaw, these Jews were housed initially in a reception camp at 46 Grzybowska Street and were reported to be in desperate need of assistance.¹⁰ Among them was also Kelman Szapiro, who would become the last rabbi of the Warsaw ghetto. His handwritten manuscripts survived the destruction of the Warsaw ghetto as part of the Ringelblum Archive and represent a unique Orthodox response to the Holocaust.¹¹

The homes of the Jews in Piaseczno were taken over in the spring of 1941 by Polish citizens from the Bydgoszcz area, who themselves had been expelled from their homes to make way for ethnic Germans who had arrived from the Baltic states.

The Jews of Piaseczno shared the fate of the other Jews in the Warsaw ghetto. Many of them were deported to the Treblinka extermination camp and murdered there in the summer of 1942.

SOURCES Articles on the fate of the Jewish community of Piaseczno during the Holocaust can be found in the following publications: Abraham Wein, ed., Pinkas ha-kebilot. Encyclopaedia of Jewish Communities: Poland, vol. 4, Warsaw and Its Region (Jerusalem: Yad Vashem, 1989), pp. 346–347; Shmuel Spector and Geoffrey Wigoder, eds., The Encyclopedia of Jewish Life before and during the Holocaust (Jerusalem: Yad Vashem; New York: New York University Press, 2001), pp. 984–985; and Guy Miron, ed., The Yad Vashem Encyclopedia of the Ghettos during the Holocaust (Jerusalem: Yad Vashem, 2010), p. 583.

Additional relevant information can be found in Barbara Engelking, Jacek Leociak, and Dariusz Libionka, eds., Prowinia noc: Życie i zagłada Żydów w dystrykcie warszawskim (Warsaw: Wydawnictwo IFiS PAN, 2007); Tatiana Berenstein, “Deportacje i zagłada skupisk żydowskich w dystrykcie warszawskim,” BŻIH, no. 1 (1952); and Józef Kazimierski, “Miasto Piaseczno i powiat piaseczyński w latach wojny i okupacji hitlerowskiej,” in Jerzy Antoniewicz, ed., Studia i materiały do dziejów Piaseczna i powiatu piaseczyńskiego (Warsaw, 1973), pp. 253–268; and on the following Polish homepages: www.sztetl.org and www.studnia.org.

Documentation on the Jewish community of Piaseczno under German occupation can be found in the following archives: APW (877, k. 9); AŻIH (210/543 [AJDC]; 211/1071; Ring II); PAPP (3325 and 3312, k. 247–248); and USHMM (Acc.1997.A.0124 [JSS]; Acc.1999.A.0154 [AJDC]; RG-15.079M [Ring II]).

Daniel Brewing

NOTES

1. Rejestr miejsc i faktów zbrodni popełnionych przez okupanta hitlerowskiego na ziemiach polskich w latach 1939–1945: województwo stołeczne warszawskie (Warsaw: GKBZHWp, 1988), pp. 227–228.

2. APW, Starostwo Powiatowe Warszawskie (SPW), 877, k. 9; Kazimierski, “Miasto Piaseczno,” p. 263.

3. APW, SPW, 877, k. 9; Kazimierski, “Miasto Piaseczno,” p. 263.

4. USHMM, Acc.1999.A.0154, 210/543.

5. Tomasz Szarota, U progu zagłady: Zajścia antyżydowskie i pogromy w okupowanej Europie: Warszawa, Paryż, Amsterdam, Antwerpia, Kowno (Warsaw, 2000), p. 32.

6. Berenstein, "Deportacje," pp. 106–107.
7. PAPP, akta m. Piaseczna, 3325 and 3312, k. 247–248; Kazimierski, "Miasto Piaseczno," p. 263.
8. PAPP, 3213, k. 11; APW, SPW, 877, k. 9; Kazimierski, "Miasto Piaseczno," p. 263.
9. Raul Hilberg, Stanisław Staron, and Josef Kerr, eds., The Warsaw Diary of Adam Czerniakow: Prelude to Doom (New York: Stein and Day, 1979), p. 222.
10. The order is reprinted in Josef Wulf, Das Dritte Reich und seine Vollstrecker: Die Liquidation von 500.000 Juden im Ghetto Warschau (Berlin, 1961), pp. 329–330; see also AŻIH, 211/1071, p. 41, undated note in German about "Aussiedlungen im Distrikt Warschau," probably about February 10, 1941.
11. USHMM, RG-15.079M, reels 58 and 61 (Ring II/431, Ring II/370, Ring II/432).

PRUSZKÓW

Pre-1939: Pruszków (Yiddish: Prushkov), town, Warsaw województwo, Poland; 1939–1944: Pruszkow, Kreis Warschau-Land, Distrikt Warschau, Generalgouvernement; post-1998: Pruszków, województwo mazowieckie, Poland

Pruszków is an industrial town located about 17 kilometers (10.6 miles) southwest of Warsaw. In 1921, 971 of the town's 15,132 residents were Jews; by 1931, the Jewish community had increased to 1,288, in a total population of 23,647.

After a summer of rumors and speculation about the looming war, the Jews of Pruszków devised several plans of action, often marked by generational conflict. Following the outbreak of war, many men made their way to Warsaw, where they were caught in the three-week siege of the city. Young people with leftist or Communist leanings headed eastward towards Soviet territory. The women and the older members of the community generally stayed put.¹

The German army entered Pruszków after about one week of the German invasion of Poland and was welcomed by the local ethnic Germans (Völkdeutsche) with salt and flowers. Some believe this gesture saved the town from widespread damage and destruction.² Although many Jews had fled the town, thousands of others attempting to reach Warsaw did not get past Pruszków. The local Jews put them up in schools and private homes, but many slept on the streets. Soup kitchens were opened and blankets distributed. Many refugees moved on after the fall of Warsaw, whereas many local Jews who had fled to Warsaw or Soviet territory began to return. The Germans ordered the shops of Pruszków to reopen and normal routines to be resumed.³

Nevertheless, each day brought new demands and decrees from the German authorities. Jewish schools were closed. Jews could not use the trains, except for one car designated for their use.⁴ Jews over the age of 14 had to wear white armbands with a blue Star of David. In October 1939, the Judenrat was established, headed by a Jew from Łódź, Yitzhak Koenigstein. Each day, Jews up to the age of 60 had to report for forced labor, which was coordinated by the Judenrat. An exemption could be purchased by paying a fee, with unemployed youth sent as replacements.⁵ Jews worked without pay in workshops at the rail yards, loading ammunition boxes, and cleaning trains.⁶ Ration cards were distributed, but the available supplies were less than the allotment. Sickness was curtailed by strict attention to cleanliness. The local Jewish doctors had left, and the Polish doctors would not risk the danger of treating a Jew.⁷ Others, however, mention the presence of refugee doctors in Pruszków, who helped to contain an outbreak of typhus.⁸

Even with the relative stability of the first year of occupation, Jews suffered numerous acts of oppression. On the first Yom Kippur (September 23, 1939), Polish youth, at the instigation of the Germans, attacked Jewish worshippers. Mentally ill Jews at the psychiatric hospital in Tworki were removed and murdered. During the harsh winter of 1939–1940, the townspeople dismantled the wooden synagogue for firewood. The Torah scrolls, however, were rescued and hidden on the grounds of the cemetery.⁹

In the fall of 1940, the situation worsened considerably. A fine of 50,000 złoty was imposed on the community. On October 12–13, 1940, a ghetto was established in a tiny sector of town near the paint factory of a Jew named Ehrenreich. The ghetto was packed with at least 1,000 people (other sources say 1,300 to 1,600), with several families to a room. Those moving in had to leave behind most of their property.¹⁰ Despite the overcrowding and degradation, only one case of suicide was recorded.¹¹

At first the ghetto was an open one, and Jews were allowed to leave it from 8:00 A.M. to 6:00 P.M.¹² Jews earned a livelihood by petty trade and smuggling. Jewish youth established an underground elementary school and attempted to organize a library. There was a drama group, and the local branch of a Zionist youth group, "Dror," continued to meet. The young people began to build a school from the dismantled materials of a synagogue building outside the ghetto, but the project was never completed.¹³

Chiel Rajchman has described forced labor conditions in the ghetto: "Three times a week we were taken to the railroad labor camp, and we worked there without pay and we were harassed and beaten."¹⁴ A branch of the Jewish Social Self-Help (JSS) was operating in Pruszków by early January 1941; at this time about 300 Jews were receiving assistance.¹⁵

There were increasing rumors in the winter of 1940–1941 that the Jews were being transferred from the small ghettos around Warsaw to the Warsaw ghetto. Pruszków's turn came at the end of January 1941, when the Judenrat was informed that the ghetto would be eliminated and its inhabitants moved to Warsaw. The inhabitants of the Pruszków ghetto were surrounded and closed in for 10 days before being loaded onto a train for Warsaw.¹⁶ People were allowed to take their belongings, but most were limited to 20 kilograms (44 pounds).¹⁷

According to one contemporary report, 1,200 Jews were transferred from Pruszków to Warsaw. On arrival in Warsaw the Jews were quarantined. To expedite their release, the Pruszków Jews had to pay another large fee. Once they were released, the authorities still kept their baggage, linen, and bedding until the sum of 5,000 złoty was paid. “The collection of this sum took longer than 10 days, so the refugees of Pruszków had to go for two weeks without bedding and without underwear to change, until they managed to scrape together the ransom.”¹⁸

The fate of the Pruszków Jews was entwined with that of the Warsaw ghetto. A few young people from Pruszków participated in the April 1943 uprising of the Warsaw ghetto.¹⁹

About 180 men were left behind to continue as forced laborers in the workshops at the rail yards. They were housed in one building, which they called the “white house,”²⁰ surrounded by a high wall. A few managed to escape, but by the summer of 1942 the rest had been sent to the Warsaw ghetto. Many of them were soon deported from there to the Treblinka extermination camp.²¹

Only a few dozen Jews from Pruszków survived the war, mostly with the help of non-Jewish local acquaintances and a few sympathetic farmers.

SOURCES Information about the fate of the Jews of Pruszków can be found in the following publications: D. Brodsky, ed., Sefer Pruszkow, Nadzin ve-ha-sevivah (Tel Aviv: Former Residents of Pruszków in Israel, 1967); “Pruszkow,” in Abraham Wein, ed., Pinkas ha-kehillot. Encyclopaedia of Jewish Communities: Poland, vol. 4, Warsaw and Its Region (Jerusalem: Yad Vashem, 1989), pp. 372–376; and Czesław Pilichowski et al., eds., Obozy hitlerowskie na ziemiach polskich 1939–1945: Informator encyklopedyczny (Warsaw: PWN, 1979), p. 407.

Relevant documentation can be found in the following archives: AŻIH (e.g., 301/5563, 5630; Ring I/892; 211/827 [JSS]); IPN (ASG, sygn. 62, k. 279–280); USHMM (e.g., RG-50.030*0185; Acc.1997.0124 [JSS]); VHF (e.g., # 1829, 7464); and YVA.

Samuel Fishman and Martin Dean

NOTES

1. Wein, Pinkas ha-kehillot: Poland, vol. 4, Warsaw and Its Region, p. 375.
2. Brodsky, Sefer Pruszkow, p. 215.
3. Ibid., p. 216.
4. Ibid., p. 253.
5. Ibid., p. 217.
6. Wein, Pinkas ha-kehillot: Poland, vol. 4, Warsaw and Its Region, p. 375.
7. Brodsky, Sefer Pruszkow, p. 217.
8. Ibid., p. 251.
9. Wein, Pinkas ha-kehillot: Poland, vol. 4, Warsaw and Its Region, p. 375.
10. Bill Tammus, They Were Just People: Stories of Rescue in Poland during the Holocaust (Columbia: University of Missouri Press, 2009), p. 108; VHF, # 1829, testimony of Bella Elsa Thorn, 1995.
11. Brodsky, Sefer Pruszkow, p. 217.
12. VHF, # 7464, testimony of Jerry Koenig, 1995.
13. Wein, Pinkas ha-kehillot: Poland, vol. 4, Warsaw and Its Region, p. 375; Brodsky, Sefer Pruszkow, p. 218.
14. USHMM, RG-50.030*0185, interview with Chiel Rajchman, December 7, 1988.
15. AŻIH, 211/827 (JSS), p. 6.
16. Brodsky, Sefer Pruszkow, p. 218.

17. Ibid., p. 219.

18. Joseph Kermish, ed., To Live with Honor and Die with Honor!: Selected Documents from the Warsaw Ghetto Underground Archives “O.S.” (“Oneg Shabbath”) (Jerusalem: Yad Vashem, 1986), pp. 295, 297.

19. Wein, Pinkas ha-kehillot: Poland, vol. 4, Warsaw and Its Region, p. 376.

20. Brodsky, Sefer Pruszkow, p. 251.

21. USHMM, RG-50.030*0185; Wein, Pinkas ha-kehillot: Poland, vol. 4, Warsaw and Its Region, pp. 375–376.

PUSTELNIK (MARKI-PUSTELNIK OR MARKI)

Pre-1939: Pustelnik (village), Marki (village), Warsaw województwo, Poland; 1939–1945: Kreis Warschau-Land, Distrikt Warschau, Generalgouvernement; post-1998: Pustelnik (suburb of Marki), town, województwo mazowieckie, Poland

Prior to World War II, Pustelnik was a village in the Marki gmina. At that time, Marki was a larger village nearby. The Jewish communities of Pustelnik and Marki, residing along the Radzymin-Warsaw road, about 12 kilometers (7.5 miles) north-northeast of Warsaw, considered themselves as a single community. Marki was the center of community life, as it was the older Jewish settlement and the rabbi's seat. According to the 1921 census, there were 156 Jews living in Marki (total population 2,529) and 368 in Pustelnik (total population 1,956). The Germans established a ghetto in 1940 that was constructed for all the Jews of the Marki gmina.

According to survivor Szlama Kutnowski, the Germans established a system of labor conscription following the occupation of Marki in 1939. Under this regimen, local Jews were subjected to forced labor three days a week. Berek Jarzembski, a Pustelnik native, testified that the Germans also took some men from his village for labor; otherwise, the Germans did not bother the village's Jews much. There is more information on the pre-ghetto life of the Jews in Pustelnik, as the Judenrat (chaired by Litman) and its self-help committee (established in January 1940) were both located there.

On the outbreak of war, “a large number of trading firms were liquidated and factories immobilized,” as was reported by the Pustelnik self-help committee to Warsaw when asking for help. Until June 1940, with the assistance of the American Jewish Joint Distribution Committee (AJDC), the self-help committee operated a soup kitchen and provided medical assistance.¹

Pustelnik's ghetto—for which all the Jews of the Marki gmina were designated—was established at the end of 1940, most likely in December. The ghetto was located on Duża Street, approximately 2 to 4 kilometers (1.2 to 2.5 miles) north-east of Pustelnik. It was surrounded by barbed wire but unguarded. The Germans did not establish a Jewish police force, leaving the maintenance of order in the hands of the Judenrat.²

On January 7, 1941, the self-help committee described the situation: “Presently, due to the establishment of ghettos, our material situation is catastrophic.” The initial plan to establish a ghetto where the Jews already resided, “along the Warsaw-Radzymin road and the narrow gauge station went up in smoke. Consequently we were deported from our residences to a brickyard, Henryków and Osinki . . . far away from roads and contact. [We were placed] in houses for [former] factory workers and barracks, completely secluded and isolated from the Polish population.” The committee emphasized that relocation to the ghetto caused the remainder of Jewish businesses to close. The committee estimated that by January 1941, 75 percent of the Jews in the ghetto lacked any source of income. Seven hundred people were requesting assistance.³

Initially the Jews were still allowed to leave the ghetto. The then 12-year-old Kutnowski recalls going to Marki to work. Nearby was a forest, approximately 60 meters (197 feet) from the ghetto fence, where Jews would pick blueberries or gather wood for heating. Housing conditions in the ghetto were appalling. Kutnowski described his family’s living quarters as follows: “We were living in a garage. The floor was made of bricks. There was no roof, so we made one out of planks.”⁴

By April 1941, the ghetto was declared closed. The self-help committee’s report for January–April 1941 reads: “From the moment the ghetto was closed, the local population is on the edge of destruction.” By May 1941, there were 850 Jews in the ghetto, including 598 refugees. The committee added: “Jews employed in the ceramic works and on other German details are earning 3 to 4 złoty per day, which in present conditions amounts to nothing.” It is not clear whether the aforementioned “ceramic works” refers to the Henryków and Osinki brickyard or another factory outside of the ghetto’s borders. In the same report, the committee also cited recent rumors of the resettlement of the ghetto’s population to Warsaw, which were forcing Pustelnik’s Jews to sell off their remaining belongings.⁵

The ghetto was liquidated on March 26, 1942. Its inhabitants were deported to the Warsaw ghetto. Berek Jarzembski states that the community, which was permitted only to take personal baggage, was deported on wagons and trucks. Kutnowski, who at the time of the Aktion was on one of his smuggling trips, testified: “When I returned home as usual, I did not find anyone. The barracks were razed and many people were killed.”⁶ Gazeta Żydowska reported that the deportees arrived in the Warsaw ghetto in the last days of March and were sent for quarantine at 109 Leszno Street.⁷

Pinkas ha-kehillot, which does not mention the ghetto’s establishment, asserts that it was liquidated on April 6, 1942. In the course of its destruction, the SS reportedly riddled Torah scrolls with bullets and threw them into a fire. The Jews who rushed to save them—170 people—were shot, including the community rabbi Mendelsohn.

SOURCES The following publications make reference to the fate of the Jewish communities of Marki and Pustelnik: Czesław Pilichowski et al., eds., Obozy hitlerowskie na ziemiach polskich 1939–1945: Informator encyklopedyczny (Warsaw: PWN, 1979), p. 414; Abraham Wein, ed., Pinkas ha-kehillot. Encyclopaedia of Jewish Communities: Poland, vol. 4, Warsaw and Its Region (Jerusalem: Yad Vashem, 1989), pp. 268–269; and Barbara Engelking, “Życie codzienne Żydów w miasteczkach dystryktu warszawskiego,” in Barbara Engelking, Jacek Leociak, and Dariusz Libionka, eds., Prowincja noc: Życie i zagłada Żydów w dystrykcie warszawskim (Warsaw: Wydawnictwo IFiS PAN, 2007), pp. 168–169, 188, 206, 209.

Archival sources on the ghetto include AŻIH (211/846, 211/1080, 211/1083 [JSS]; 301/273, 301/4805 [Relacje]); USHMM (Acc.1997.A.0124 [JSS]; RG-15.019M [ASG]; and RG-15.084M [Relacje]); and VHF (# 27561).

Jolanta Kraemer

NOTES

1. USHMM, Acc.1997.A.0124 (JSS), 211/846 (Pustelnik), pp. 1, 3–5, 25; 211/1080 (Warszawa), p. 39; VHF, # 27561, testimony of Berek Jarzembski, 1997; AŻIH, 301/273, testimony of Szlama Kutnowski, 1945.

2. USHMM, RG-15.019M (ASG), reel 19, sygn. 62, file 260; VHF, # 27561; AŻIH, 301/273.

3. AŻIH, 301/4805, testimony of Władysława Kruszczevska (Kruszewska), 1948; USHMM, Acc.1997.A.0124 (JSS), 211/846, pp. 3, 5–6, 15–18, 23–24. Lists of food distribution, e.g., in April 1941, show addresses of the majority of ghetto residents as “Henryków” and a minority as “Osinki.”

4. VHF, # 27561; AŻIH, 301/4805; and 301/273.

5. USHMM, Acc.1997.A.0124, 211/1083 (Warszawa), p. 18; and 211/846, pp. 23–25. Secondary sources, e.g., Pilichowski et al., Obozy hitlerowskie, estimate 1,200 residents of the ghetto.

6. USHMM, RG-15.019M (ASG), reel 19, sygn. 62, file 260; VHF, # 27561; AŻIH, 301/4805.

7. Gazeta Żydowska, April 19, 1942.

RADZYMIN

Pre-1939: Radzymin, town, Warsaw województwo, Poland; 1939–1944: Kreis Warschau-Land, Distrikt Warschau, Generalgouvernement; post-1998: województwo mazowieckie, Poland

Radzymin is located about 20 kilometers (12 miles) north-northeast of Warsaw. In 1921, there were 2,209 Jews residing there, out of a total population of 4,201. In 1939, there were 3,867 Jews in Radzymin.¹

On September 3, 1939, German planes bombed Radzymin, killing 30 Jews. As the German forces drew near, many Jews fled towards the Soviet border. The German army entered the town on September 24, and assaults on the Jewish population commenced immediately—tearing off men’s beards, giving them physical beatings, and robbing them.² On October 26, a German civil administration took over from the German military: Radzymin became part of Distrikt Warschau. In November, 14 prominent members of the community were shot to death. In December, Jews were ordered to wear the Star of David, and a 7:00 P.M. curfew was imposed. Nevertheless, despite the harsh circumstances, most people maintained a relatively routine existence.³

From the start of the occupation, Germans and Poles carried out acts of robbery and looting against Jewish homes and businesses. On three occasions over the initial few months, fines amounting to thousands of złoty were imposed on the Jewish community. Soon after their arrival the German authorities forced the officials of the Jewish community to form a Jewish Council (Judenrat), which had to assist with the implementation of German orders, including the collection of fines. The head of the Judenrat was initially David Israelski, succeeded at the end of 1941 by Meir Winterman. Jews were pressed into forced labor and sent off to work in the forests and peat bogs. The Judenrat had to provide about 300 men per day for forced labor.⁴

At the end of 1940, the German Kreishauptmann for Kreis Warschau-Land, Regierungsrat Dr. Hermann Rupprecht, ordered the establishment of a ghetto in Radzymin, which was also to include 60 Jewish families from the ghetto in Wołomin. Despite some technical difficulties, the ghetto had been set up by December 25, 1940, and was surrounded with barbed wire. It was located at the junction of Warszawa and Zjawenna [Zjawienna] Streets, including 36 houses, mostly along these two streets. The Germans placed signs at the entrance reading: "Entry to the Ghetto Strictly Forbidden for Germans and Poles!"⁵ A unit of Jewish Police was also established under the command of Bunim Radzyminski to maintain order within the ghetto. The creation of the ghetto completed the liquidation of Jewish shops located outside the ghetto, and the empty shops now gave the former flourishing commercial quarter the appearance of a deserted cemetery.⁶

In addition to the local population, the Radzymin ghetto also contained refugees from Serock, Pułtusk, Wyszaków, and Konstantynów. In March 1941, refugees poured in from towns and villages in western Poland, including Mława, Przasnysz, Rypin, and other places. By July 1941, the ghetto population had reached 3,000, of whom about 800 were refugees.⁷ The restrictions and overcrowded conditions, alongside a significant jump in the cost of food, led to severe malnutrition and disease, including an outbreak of typhus. The poor, who quickly exhausted their limited resources, were the first to die. A soup kitchen was set up to distribute one meal a day to those most in need, but before long even the more well-to-do had sold off all their possessions and become destitute. The only ones who had a source of livelihood were the tailors and shoemakers who, at great risk, could smuggle their goods to peasants in exchange for food.⁸ On July 23, 1941, a ghetto inmate sent a postcard to his brother in Brooklyn. Its brief message encapsulates the dire straits in the ghetto: "We are eating as on Yom Kippur, clothed as at Purim, and dwelling as at Sukkot."⁹

In the fall of 1941, the situation in the ghetto continued to deteriorate. The death penalty was introduced for any Jews caught outside, making it even more dangerous for children and others to smuggle in urgently needed food in exchange for clothing and other items.¹⁰ In the winter of 1941–1942, the Germans confiscated furs and warm garments from a ghetto that was already stricken by hunger and epidemics.

In March 1942 the ghetto population numbered 2,800, including 550 refugees. In the period from July 1941 to March 1942 about 200 Jews died from starvation and typhus. Following the liquidation of the Tłuszcz ghetto on May 27, 1942, during which the Jews were sent via Radzymin to the Warsaw ghetto, some Jews from Tłuszcz found refuge in the Radzymin ghetto.¹¹ In the summer of 1942, about 100 men were taken to a work camp at Izabelin, where they put in 10 hours a day of backbreaking work in the peat bogs.¹²

The massive deportation from the Warsaw ghetto, which began in July 1942, was the start of the systematic liquidation of all the ghettos in the surrounding areas. Among the few ghettos that remained by September were those in Radzymin, Wołomin, and Legionowo.¹³ The end of the Jewish community of Radzymin came on October 3, which coincided with the holiday of Simchat Torah, celebrating the joy of Torah. All the Jews were brought to the train station. Several men danced with the Torahs at the adjoining synagogue, and quite remarkably, the German officer in command allowed them to continue. The Jews from Wołomin and Legionowo were brought to Radzymin for inclusion in the deportation to the Treblinka extermination camp. Altogether some 12,000 people were sent to their deaths.¹⁴

On the previous evening, before the trains rolled, about 200 young people broke through the ghetto fence and scattered into the nearby forests. Several young men from Radzymin who participated in the Warsaw Uprising were killed in the course of the revolt. After the trains left the station the local Poles and ethnic Germans swarmed over the Jewish houses, taking whatever possessions were left.¹⁵

About 70 men working at the forced labor camp at Izabelin were excluded from the deportation. They were taken out and shot on October 24, 1942, except for a few who escaped into the forests. Only a few Jews from Radzymin survived the war. Most who had escaped the final deportation were caught and killed, often betrayed by informers.¹⁶

SOURCES Publications on the history of the Jews of Radzymin and their fate during the Holocaust include the following: Gershon Hel, ed., Sefer zikaron le-kehillat Radzymin (Tel Aviv: Encyclopedia of the Jewish Diaspora, 1975); and Abraham Wein, ed., Pinkas ha-kehillot. Encyclopaedia of Jewish Communities: Poland, vol. 4, Warsaw and Its Region (Jerusalem: Yad Vashem, 1989), pp. 424–427. Additional information on the ghetto in Radzymin can be found in Czesław Pilichowski et al., eds., Obozy hitlerowskie na ziemiach polskich 1939–1945: Informator encyklopedyczny (Warsaw: PWN, 1979), p. 422.

Documentation regarding the fate of the Jews of Radzymin under German occupation can be found in the following archives: AŻIH (301/2910; 211/881–882; and Ring II, PH/41-1-5); IPN (OK Warszawa, Ds 66/67); USHMM (Acc.1997.A.0124 [JSS], reel 43; RG-15.084 [Relacje]; RG-15.079 [Ring]); VHF; and YVA.

Samuel Fishman and Martin Dean

NOTES

1. Hel, Sefer zikaron, p. 18.
2. Ibid., p. 20.
3. Ibid., p. 264; Wein, Pinkas ha-kehillot: Poland, vol. 4, Warsaw and Its Region, p. 426.
4. Hel, Sefer zikaron, p. 21.

5. Ibid., pp. 245–248. A sketch map of the ghetto can be found on these pages.

6. Michael Kossower, “La Destruction,” in ibid., p. 46.

7. Hel, Sefer zikaron, p. 21; and Wein, Pinkas ha-kehillot: Poland, vol. 4, Warsaw and Its Region, p. 426.

8. Hel, Sefer zikaron, p. 264.

9. Cited in Martin Gilbert, The Holocaust: The Jewish Tragedy (London: William Collins, 1986), p. 177.

10. AŻIH, 301/2910, testimony of Tomasz Lewinski. At the age of nine Tomasz participated in smuggling until he escaped from the ghetto in April 1942; Kossower, “La Destruction,” p. 48.

11. Hel, Sefer zikaron, pp. 20–21; and Wein, Pinkas ha-kehillot: Poland, vol. 4, Warsaw and Its Region, p. 426.

12. Hel, Sefer zikaron, p. 265; Pilichowski et al., Obozy hitlerowskie, p. 422.

13. Hel, Sefer zikaron, p. 264.

14. Ibid., p. 21.

15. Ibid., pp. 21, 268; Joseph Kermish, ed., To Live with Honor and Die with Honor!: Selected Documents from the Warsaw Ghetto Underground Archives “O.S.” (“Oneg Shabbath”) (Jerusalem: Yad Vashem, 1986), p. 587.

16. Hel, Sefer zikaron, pp. 270, 427.

REMBERTÓW

Pre-1939: Rembertów, town, Warsaw województwo, Poland; 1939–1945: Rembertow, Kreis Warschau-Land, Distrikt Warschau, Generalgouvernement; post-1998: Rembertów, województwo mazowieckie, Poland

Rembertów is located about 12 kilometers (7.5 miles) east of Warsaw. In 1921, there were 369 Jews living in Rembertów; the total population stood at 1,375.

Upon entering, the Germans established a system of forced labor with a daily quota of 50 workers. The labor was performed at various German military installations and at the ammunition factory “Pocisk.”

Meir Tenenbaum was appointed as chairman of the Jewish Council (Judenrat). At the end of 1939, the Judenrat established a Committee for Aid to Poor Jews, with 38-year-old Srul Bialer as president. Other members included A. Rozen-szajn (deputy), Lejb Witkowski (secretary), and Sz. Dorn. The committee established a soup kitchen located at 6 Okuniew Street, with its offices located next door at 8 Okuniew Street.

By July 1940, there were over 230 refugees in Rembertów; this number had risen to 274 by the following December. The majority of the refugees came from Kalisz and Sieradz. The total number of Jews in October 1940 stood at 1,380, increasing again after approximately 300 Jews arrived from Łódź in March 1941.¹

A ghetto was established in Rembertów in 1940. Survivor Stanisław Rudnicki (who escaped from Warsaw after establishment of the ghetto there) described Rembertów on his arrival as “not tight.” Although the ghetto was surrounded by barbed wire, it was fairly easy to leave. Irene Rubinstein, who arrived in Rembertów just days before the ghetto liquidation recalls that only parts of the ghetto were blocked off by barbed wire.² The ghetto borders were delineated by the following streets: Okuniew, Artyleryjska, Koliewuka, Mariańska, and Kościusko.

In January 1941, the committee for Jewish Social Self-Help (JSS) reported that it was caring for 750 Jews, of which 500 benefited from the soup kitchen, while the remainder received food and medical help from Dr. Artur Rajcher. The Kalisz deportees, unhappy with the level of support they were getting, desperately pleaded for help and an inspection by a representative from Warsaw’s JSS branch. The refugees reported:

Clothing and footwear, which was to be distributed primarily among deportees, had been given to Rembertów locals. Not one of us got anything. . . . They [the committee members] divide everything amongst themselves and sell the rest. Our “great lords” beg and plead on our behalf to Warsaw, while we, the refugees, live in wretched conditions. We get only a thin soup for 20 groszy.³

With the emergence of the first case of typhus in February or March 1941, the ghetto was closed, initially for two weeks. When the second case of typhus was registered, the closure was extended “for an indefinite period,” as reported by Dr. Rajcher and chairman Bialer on April 24, 1941. The closure meant that the majority of the ghetto inhabitants, employed by the Germans outside of the ghetto, lost their minimal income. Food prices in the ghetto increased, and the soup kitchen was closed. The letter summed up the situation as follows: “It is difficult to imagine the depression of the population, which is simply hungry. It [the situation] threatens to further spread disease and, what’s worse, [is likely to cause] the deportation of the Jewish population from Rembertów.” There are no statistics available on the typhus outbreak or whether an epidemic followed.⁴

In the spring of 1941, the Judenrat implemented a program sowing all plots of land in the ghetto with vegetables, hoping to use the crops to feed the community. In August 1941, the Judenrat requested 1,000 złoty from the JSS in Warsaw to sow the remaining plots with rutabaga.

Relations between the Judenrat and the welfare committee (reestablished in 1941 as a branch of the JSS) deteriorated with time. In October 1941, the Warsaw JSS informed the headquarters in Kraków of “the fierce conflict between Tenenbaum and Bialer,” after Tenenbaum intercepted money the JSS had sent for its branch in Rembertów. “Because the JSS encounters various obstacles [from the Judenrat] it is unable to continue its activity,” concluded the Warsaw office.⁵

In May 1942, the JSS reported that several hundred of Rembertów’s Jews (including women) were performing labor for the military at the following sites: “Sortierbetrieb [at ‘Pocisk’], Munitionslager [‘Pocisk’], Ostbahn, and Durchgangslager.” The laborers would leave the ghetto and come back from work under an escort assigned by the German authorities, assisted by the Jewish Police; the latter also “assisted the laborers during work.” The hourly rate of pay was between 26 and 48 groszy. At some work posts, laborers were also receiving a bowl of soup.⁶

The ghetto was liquidated on August 20, 1942.⁷ Survivor Stanisław Rudnicki recalls being woken up by screams and the sounds of shots. Tadeusz Łomankiewicz, who had permission to enter the ghetto as an employee of the local power station, testified that the Pocisk workers were not allowed to leave the ghetto for work that day. All the Jews were collected in front of the Judenrat building. Those who did not leave their dwellings were shot inside by the German Gendarmerie. The same day the Germans ordered the burial of their bodies in a ditch near the Judenrat.

The remainder of the ghetto inmates was then driven to Falenica. From there, the community was deported to the Treblinka extermination camp.⁸

On October 28, 1942, Friedrich Wilhelm Krüger, the SS and Police Leader in the Generalgouvernement, ordered the establishment of six remnant ghettos in Distrikt Warsaw. Rembertów was announced as one of the locations. According to Rembertów native Łomankiewicz, as early as mid-September the Germans began fencing off parts of the former ghetto. “The fence was tight, and one could not compare it to the fence of the first ghetto. At the end of September—or in early October—approximately 300 Jews from Warsaw arrived in cars,” testified Łomankiewicz. He also estimated that “90 percent of them were members of the intelligentsia—doctors, dentists, lawyers and merchants.”

The ghetto laborers were escorted daily to the Pocisk factory by two or three soldiers stationed at the airfield. The ghetto’s sole gate was guarded by two Germans. The Jewish Police still functioned. Łomankiewicz estimates that this (remnant) ghetto (or forced labor camp) was liquidated at the end of May or the beginning of June 1943, when its residents were suddenly deported by railway cars to Treblinka.⁹

Some secondary sources do not mention the remnant ghetto (e.g., Pinkas ha-kehillot), or they state that although ordered, it was never actually established (e.g., Ruta Sakowska). Both report that two labor camps were established after the August 1942 liquidation. The Ringelblum Archives also include evidence on the existence of a labor camp located at 6 Kościuszko Street. According to Pinkas ha-kehillot, in June 1943 the Gestapo murdered about 1,000 inmates. The last 50 Jews in Rembertów were murdered in August 1943.¹⁰

SOURCES For references on the fate of the Jewish community of Rembertów, see the following: Jacek A. Młynarczyk, “Akcja Reinhard w gettach prowincjonalnych dystryktu warszawskiego 1942–1943,” p. 69; Barbara Engelking, “Życie codzienne Żydów w miasteczkach dystryktu warszawskiego,” pp. 206, 209; and Marta Janczewska, “Aneks,” pp. 318—all in Barbara Engelking, Jacek Leociak, and Dariusz Libionka, eds., Prowincja noc: Życie i zagłada Żydów w dystrykcie warszawskim (Warsaw: Wydawnictwo IFiS PAN, 2007); Czesław Pilichowski et al., eds., Obozy hitlerowskie na ziemiach polskich 1939–1945: Informa- tor encyklopedyczny (Warsaw: PWN, 1979), pp. 255–256; Ruta Sakowska et al., eds., Archiwum Ringelbluma: Konspiracyjne Archiwum Getta Warszawy, vol. 3 (Warsaw: PWN, 1997), p. 279; and Abraham Wein, ed., Pinkas ha-kehillot. Encyclopaedia of Jewish Communities: Poland, vol. 4, Warsaw and Its Region (Jerusalem: Yad Vashem, 1989), pp. 433–434.

The following archival sources were used to prepare this entry: AŻIH (210/594 [AJDC]; 211/904, 211/1081-1084 [JSS]; 301/5636, 301/4742, 301/4817 [Relacje]); USHMM (Acc.1999.A.0154 [AJDC]; Acc.1997.A.0124 [JSS]; RG-15.079M [Ring II/270/4, 5, and 7]; and RG-15.084M [Relacje]); and VHF (# 43738).

Jolanta Kraemer

NOTES

1. USHMM, Acc.1999.A.0154 (AJDC), 210/594 (Rembertów), pp. 21, 24, 27–28, 38; Acc.1997.A.0124 (JSS), 211/901 (Rembertów), p. 6; 211/1082 (Warszawa), p. 19; and 211/1084 (Warszawa), p. 63.
2. VHF, # 43738, testimony of Irene Rubinstein, 1998; AŻIH, 301/5636 (Relacje), testimony of Stanisław Rudnicki, 1959.
3. USHMM, Acc.1997.A.0124, 211/901, pp. 1–2, 4–5.
4. Ibid., 211/1081 (Warszawa), p. 34.
5. Ibid., 211/1083 (Warszawa), p. 44; and 211/1084, pp. 49, 69–70, 86.
6. Ibid., 211/901, p. 14; AŻIH, 301/5636.
7. AŻIH, 301/4742, testimony of Adolf Fingrut, 1950.
8. Ibid., 301/4817, testimony of Tadeusz Łomankiewicz, 1950; and 301/5636.
9. Ibid., 301/4817.
10. Ibid., Ring II/270/4, 5, and 7.

SARNAKI

Pre-1939: Sarnaki, town, Lublin województwo, Poland; 1939–1944: Kreis Siedlce, Distrikt Warschau, Generalgouvernement; post-1998: województwo mazowieckie, Poland

Sarnaki is located about 130 kilometers (81 miles) east of Warsaw. In 1921, the Jewish population was 1,198 out of a total population of 1,588. Estimates of the Jewish population in 1939 range from 1,400 to 2,000.

Following the German invasion of Poland in September 1939, the Bug River became the new border between the Generalgouvernement and the Soviet Union, according to the secret Soviet-German agreement that divided the country. Sarnaki is located just a few miles to the west of the river. Many of Sarnaki’s Jewish residents had relatives residing in Siemiatycze, on the other side of the Bug. Therefore, about half of the Jewish population escaped Sarnaki to the Soviet-administered area. Some Jews escaped after the Germans entered the town and started harassing the Jews. On one occasion, Rabbi Abraham Kac and other Jews were forced to remove horse excrement from a stable with their bare hands.

The German authorities expelled thousands of Jews from the Reichsgau Wartheland (part of Poland that Germany an-nexed) at the end of 1939. As a result, in the winter of 1939–1940, more than 800 Jewish deportees from Błaszki, near Kalisz, arrived in Sarnaki. A Jewish Council (Judenrat) was established to take care of the many issues that arose because of the presence of so many refugees. In March 1941, the chairman of the Jewish Council, Zajf, sent a letter to the headquarters of the Jewish Social Self-Help (JSS) organization in Kraków, asking for assistance. In his letter he described the efforts of the local Jewish population to help the new arrivals. The number of refugees in need of help exceeded the size of the indigenous Jewish population.¹

The Jewish Council received financial help from the American Jewish Joint Distribution Committee (AJDC), which enabled them to purchase bread and distribute it among the poor. A few slices of bread a day per person was all that could be distributed. A newly established soup kitchen distributed approximately 5,500 portions in May 1941.²

In early 1941, the Germans used Jewish forced laborers from Sarnaki for building strategic roads in preparation for the June invasion of the Soviet Union. The wall surrounding the Jewish cemetery was taken apart, and the stones were used for road construction. That same winter, the forced laborers were used to install a phone line between Sarnaki and Zabuże. The local peasants provided horse-drawn carts to transport the laborers.³ Many Jewish women had to work on Polish farms; this was considered a fortunate assignment, as it allowed them to obtain additional food for their families.

The Germans destroyed the great synagogue in Sarnaki soon after the invasion in September 1939. In the winter of 1940–1941, the wooden boards disappeared into the ovens of Polish deportees, who had arrived from Pomerania. The remains of the synagogue burned down as a result of a Soviet air raid on June 22, 1941, the first day of the German invasion of the USSR.

In the fall of 1941, the German authorities established a “separate Jewish quarter,” or open ghetto, in Sarnaki, although the announcement that it would be set up was probably made some time in advance.⁴ Jews from several nearby villages, including Górki, Łysów, and Kornica, were brought into the Sarnaki ghetto in November 1941, bringing the total population up to 1,180.⁵ These Jews were compressed within a small area, so that at least 10 or 15 people had to share a single room. Those moving into the ghetto were only permitted to take with them what they could carry in their arms. The ghetto was located near the marketplace between the streets of May 3rd, Szkolna, Berek Joselewicz, and Kolejowa. Many of the houses within the ghetto had been burned down in September 1939.

In December 1941, the Germans declared that soon the ghetto would be sealed to prevent the spread of disease. The deadline for sealing the ghetto was January 1, 1942. The authorities posted signs on the streets leading to the ghetto, proclaiming that anyone leaving or entering it without permission faced the death penalty. The ghetto remained unfenced, however, and only loosely guarded by the Polish (Blue) Police.

Initially, the Sarnaki Jews did not take the warning about the death penalty too seriously. Some Jews still left the ghetto at night to barter items for food, and Poles also came to the ghetto to order work from Jewish tailors and shoemakers.⁶

Jews working outside the ghetto received permits to go to their workplaces, which included the railway station and cutting wood in the forest. The Jewish Police escorted them every day. This work provided the main connection with the outside world. The new, more stringent restrictions caused hunger to intensify among the Jews, and according to Pesach Perlman, about 100 Jews died in the winter of 1941–1942. No Jews were shot for leaving the ghetto in January 1942, but in February, a Jewish woman and her one-year-old infant were arrested by the Polish (Blue) Police in a neighboring village. Despite appeals for their release, an official of the German police arrived and shot them at the Jewish cemetery.⁷

The Germans allowed a Polish man, Władysław Panczerski, to take out the dead from the ghetto and bury them at the Jewish cemetery. This was against the Jewish tradition, and Rabbi Kac received permission for one Jew to accompany Panczerski and be present during the burials.

The most powerful man on the Sarnaki Jewish Council was Gabriel Zucker, who reportedly took advantage of his position. He and his family did not suffer from hunger like the other Jews in the ghetto and ignored appeals from the poor for assistance.⁸

On May 15, 1942, the Germans ordered the transfer of most of the Jews in the Sarnaki ghetto to the ghettos in Łosice and Mordy, with probably around 500 going to each. The Jews had to hire local Poles with their carts to transfer them to their destination. The Judenrat paid for the transfer of the poorer Jews to the Mordy ghetto.

Eighty young men were selected to stay behind and clear out the ghetto. Their families were taken to the Łosice ghetto, and they were able to visit them once a week.⁹ The Sarnaki ghetto was turned into a labor camp, which existed for a few more months. Accounts as to the fate of the group of Jewish workers in Sarnaki differ. According to one source, officers of the Gestapo and the German police shot most of the laborers, although a few young men escaped and survived in hiding. Another source reports that the men were transferred to Plateków and were then deported by train to the Treblinka extermination camp from there.¹⁰

On August 19–20, 1942, the Jews from the Łosice and Mordy ghettos were marched to the marketplace in Siedlce. On Saturday, August 22, 1942, almost all the Jews were deported from the Siedlce railroad station to Treblinka.

According to the account of Jakub Chaszkieś, about 50 or 60 Jews escaped to the surrounding villages and forests at the time of the final roundups in August. The German and Polish (Blue) Police conducted intensive searches for them over the ensuing weeks and months. Local Poles were reluctant to assist Jews, as the Germans also threatened them with the death penalty. Nevertheless, about 20 Jews managed to survive until July 1944, when the Red Army drove the Germans from the area. These Jews left Poland for Israel and other countries after the war.¹¹

SOURCES The main published source on the Sarnaki ghetto is the yizkor book, edited by Dov Shuval, Sefer yizkor li-kehillat Sarnaki (Haifa: Irgun yots'e Sarnaki be-Yisrael, 1968). Secondary sources containing information on the ghetto in Sarnaki include Guy Miron, ed., The Yad Vashem Encyclopedia of the Ghettos during the Holocaust (Jerusalem: Yad Vashem, 2010), p. 691; Czesław Pilichowski et al., eds., Obozy hitlerowskie na ziemiach polskich 1939–1945: Informator encyklopedyczny (Warsaw: PWN, 1979), p. 445; and T. Berenstein, “Deportacje i zagłada skupisk żydowskich w dystrykcie warszawskim,” BŻIH, no. 1 (1952). In addition, there is a short article by Rafał Zubkowicz, “Okupacyjne losy Żydów w Sarnakach,” available at www.nawschodzie.pl.

Relevant documentation can be found in the following archives: AŻIH (210/942, 211/619, 211/942, 301/2591 and 301/2271); IPN (ASG, sygn. 49, p. 147); USHMM (e.g., Acc.1997.A.0124 [JSS]; Acc.1999.A.0154 [AJDC]; RG-15.019M [ASG]); VHF (# 41835); and YVA.

Teresa Pollin and Martin Dean

NOTES

1. AŻIH, 211/942.
2. Ibid., 210/619.
3. Testimony of Wincenty Cybulski, as cited in Zubkowicz, “Okupacyjne losy Żydów w Sarnakach.”
4. AŻIH, 301/2591, testimony of Jakub Chaszkieś, dates it in the fall of 1941. Miron, The Yad Vashem Encyclopedia of the Ghettos, p. 691, dates it in September 1941.
5. T. Berenstein, A. Eisenbach, and A. Rutkowski, eds., Eksterminacja Żydów na ziemiach polskich w okresie okupacji hitlerowskiej: Zbiór dokumentów (Warsaw: ŻIH, 1957), Document 145, p. 277.
6. Testimony of Pesach Perlman, in Shuval, Sefer yizkor li-kehillat Sarnaki, pp. 147–169; VHF, # 41835, testimony of Leon Rosenberg.
7. Testimony of Pesach Perlman, in Shuval, Sefer yizkor li-kehillat Sarnaki, pp. 147–169.
8. Ibid.
9. Ibid.
10. The respective sources are Miron, The Yad Vashem Encyclopedia of the Ghettos, p. 691; and Jacek Andrzej Młynarczyk, “‘Akcja Reinhard’ w gettach prowincjonalnych dystryktu warszawskiego 1942–1943,” in Barbara Engelking, Jacek Leociak, and Dariusz Libionka, eds., Prowincja noc: Życie i zagłada Żydów w dystrykcie warszawskim (Warsaw: Wydawnictwo IFiS PAN, 2007), pp. 39–74, here pp. 58–59.
11. AŻIH, 301/2591.

SIEDLCE

Pre-1939: Siedlce (Yiddish: Shedlits), city, Lublin województwo, Poland; 1939–1944: Kreis Siedlce, Distrikt Warschau, General-gouvernement; post-1998: województwo mazowieckie, Poland

Siedlce lies 90 kilometers (56 miles) east of Warsaw. On the eve of World War II, its 17,000 Jewish residents formed about half the population.

ENCYCLOPEDIA OF CAMPS AND GHETTOS, 1933–1945

A unit of German soldiers views the burning of the synagogue in Siedlce, December 24, 1939.

USHMM WS #09534, COURTESY OF IPN

In 1939, from September 1 to September 9, German air attacks and attendant fires devastated Siedlce. Jews lived in 80 percent of homes destroyed, constituted 75 percent of the 2,000 city residents made homeless, and comprised the majority of the 600 civilians who died.¹ The Germans occupied Siedlce on September 11. On September 15, they rounded up more than 1,000 men (Christians and Jews). They shot dead 56 of them during a forced march to a prison in Węgrów and a labor camp in Ostrołęka. At the labor camp, Siedlce's Jews were beaten, starved, and humiliated by having their beards torn off.²

On September 29, 1939, the Germans evacuated Siedlce to make way for a brief Soviet occupation. When the Red Army withdrew behind the Bug River in early October, as many as 2,000 Jews accompanied them.

Upon reoccupying Siedlce on October 9, 1939, German soldiers broke into the synagogue, beat Jews praying there, and fired at those attempting escape. On Christmas Eve, the Germans set the synagogue on fire. They also plundered Jewish homes and stores and rounded up Jews for forced labor. In November, the Germans arrested the most prominent Jewish intellectuals, professionals, and businessmen and demanded 100,000 złoty for their release.³

After receiving the ransom, the Germans ordered a Jewish Council established. The 25-person body officially was led by Icchak Nachem Weintraub, head of the Zionist movement and religious community since 1926. Owing to Weintraub's advanced age, its acting leader was physician Henryk Loebel, chair of the Jewish Council's health division. Avraham Bressler commanded the 50-person unit of Jewish Police (Jüdischer Ordnungsdienst).

The Jewish Council's Social Welfare Division struggled to care for the impoverished. Aid from the American Jewish Joint Distribution Committee (AJDC) was insufficient to support 3,500 of the neediest Jews and about 1,000 refugees, many from nearby localities, including Kosów Lacki, Łosice, Mordy, Sokołów Podlaski, and Węgrów. A kitchen opened in October 1940 to feed the hungry closed by December.

The Jewish Council's labor department, led by Izrael Friedman, organized compulsory forced labor conscription. From January 1940, about 500 Siedlce Jews unloaded shipments of food at the military base outside town. From the spring of 1940, another 1,500 reported daily to reclaim land on the Liwiec River. Siedlce Jews also filled labor quotas at the Reckman Construction Company, which from January 1941 used 500 to 1,000 Jewish laborers to improve rail lines; at Kiesgrube, a labor camp established in the fall of 1941 near a gravel pit on the Siedlce-Łuków rail line; at the Gęsi Borek glassworks; and at the Wolfe and Goebel Construction Company. From early 1941, this last firm conscripted 2,000 local Jews to improve the Trakt Brzeski. Women worked mainly in agricultural labor.

In response to German demands, the Jewish Council paid 20,000 złoty in December 1939 and 100,000 złoty in November 1940. It offered money to ameliorate violence, as occurred on March 23, 1941, after the Germans avenged a soldier's death. In what became known as Siedlce's "German pogrom," they ransacked Jewish houses, murdered at least 6 Jews, injured more than 100, and arrested countless others. When the Germans threatened to shoot the arrested Jews, the Jewish Council bought their freedom for 100,000 złoty.⁴

Small, underground self-defense groups formed. Before the Germans expropriated their printing business, the Goldberg family shared German military and administrative orders they published, with a pre-war Polish friend, the head of the Peasant Battalion for Independence, a populist wing of the underground Polish Armed Organization. The Goldbergs also printed falsified documents for the organization. More violent forms of protest included the November 1939 murder of a Pole for collaborating with two German soldiers in expropriating goods from the Goldstein brothers' tailoring shops. In November 1940, some Jewish blacksmiths led by Chaim Mejer, working with Polish Socialist Party (PPS) activist Władysław Makarek, planted charges along the rail lines. In the winter of 1941–1942, acting Jewish Council chair Henryk Loebel asked Zionist youth to form an underground opposition group. This effort collapsed when the Polish contact, "Tadeusz" Żelazowski, was killed by the Gestapo.⁵

Following the April 1940 registration of all Jewish men aged 16 to 60 for labor conscription and a street-by-street census that November, the Germans moved, on August 2, 1941, to create a ghetto. The plan involved crowding 13,000 Jews into an area where 3,589 Jews and 369 Christians had lived. The ghetto was bordered in the east by Błonie Street and in the south by Piłsudski Street. Its southwesternmost tip was on Kochanowski Avenue. It followed an irregular pattern everywhere else. The neighborhood included portions of 11 streets, including parts of Jatkowa, Asłanowicz, Browarna, and May 1 Streets. On October 1, the ghetto was surrounded with barbed wire. Those without special permission were forbidden from entering or exiting the ghetto. Some 500 to 1,500 people evaded ghettoization by fleeing to other towns without ghettos, such as Międzyrzec Podlaski.⁶

In November 1941, the Germans ordered all the Jews from nearby villages to report to the ghetto. Among the villages covered in the order were those in the following pre-war gminy: Czuryły, Domanice, Krześlin, Niwiski, Skórzec, Skupie, Stara Wieś, Suchożebry, Wiśniew, Wodynie, Zbuczyn, and Żeliszew. Late that year, Roma (Gypsies) and Sinti from Cologne and its environs, including Hürth, were deported to the ghetto. On May 23, 1942, Roma from Kreis Siedlce were given until June 15 to report to the ghetto.⁷

Such crowding provoked disease and starvation. Rooms of 10 square meters (108 square feet) housed as many as 15 people. Residents spilled into hallways, and some camped outside. In the winter of 1941–1942, a typhus epidemic daily claimed 18 to 25 lives.⁸

At first, many ghetto residents, particularly craftsmen, were able to sneak from the ghetto to take orders from their former Polish customers. Poles also entered the ghetto to trade, putting on armbands with the Jewish Star, required of all Siedlce Jews from December 1940. In January 1942, the Germans cracked down by executing 10 Jews they caught outside the ghetto.⁹

With the ghetto's enclosure, the Jewish administration appeared increasingly complicit in German policies. Jewish Police and sanitation forces violently enforced orders, encouraged by German promises that such compliance would save their members' lives. Sanitation force members beat women for not adequately clearing snow and assaulted others for refusing to accept more boarders in overcrowded homes.¹⁰ When, on March 3, 1942, 10 Jews, accused of shirking work obligations, were executed, the Jewish Council, under pressure from German authorities, issued a statement supporting the authorities' actions.¹¹

Survivors' accounts uniformly describe the moral deterioration of ghetto residents. To escape forced labor, the rich bribed officials or paid poorer Jews to fill their places. Residents fought over limited material resources. Notable exceptions were the Hassidic followers of the tzaddik of Radzyń who maintained their religious faith, devoted hours to collecting and organizing Jewish religious works, and assisted anyone who asked. "They formed an island in a sea of inhuman behavior, where it was considered normal to strip a corpse of everything that might be useful," one survivor later recalled.¹²

Under these conditions, self-defense proved difficult and came mainly from those with outside connections. Jan Emil Karpiński (Emanuel Alberg), a pre-war law student at Wilno University, received passes from the Jewish Council chair to teach illicitly non-Jewish children outside the ghetto. Through connections with one of his student's fathers, he met pharmacist Olszakowski, an underground PPS leader in Siedlce. Olszakowski provided Karpiński with underground newspapers to distribute in the ghetto. Abram Halber worked at the garage of the Criminal Police, where Junuszkiewicz (pseudonym Kornaga), a member of the underground Polish Home Army (AK), provided him with news of planned German arrests, forced labor roundups, and executions. Halber then warned the ghetto residents. Halber also distributed newspapers, arms, and ammunition to AK members.¹³

Jewish Council members clung to the hope the German need for laborers would save the Siedlce Jews. The Germans fostered this misconception by portraying the liquidation of the nearby Mińsk Mazowiecki ghetto as retribution for the refusal of its residents to meet their labor obligations.¹⁴ Other Jews feared the worst, particularly from August 20, 1942, the day on which members of a Jewish work brigade reported they had unloaded a stalled freight car (en route to the Treblinka killing center). The workers found the wagon filled with the bodies of more than 100 Jews from Radom who had suffocated when a fire engulfed their train's locomotive. No one believed the Germans' claim that the dead were prisoners being moved to another jail, particularly after someone recognized family members among the victims.¹⁵

At dawn, on Saturday, August 22, 1942, Germans, mainly from the local offices of the SS and Sonderdienst, assisted by the Polish (Blue) Police, surrounded the ghetto. Also participating in the four-day liquidation were a detachment of Border Police (Grenzpolizei) from Platerów and a force of Ukrainian SS auxiliaries, probably part of Commanding Officer of the Security Police and SD (KdS) Warsaw or Sonderkommando Höfle. SS-Obersturmführer Erhard Schulz directed the Aktion. Schulz gave the 10,000 ghetto residents until 10:00 A.M. to report to the square by the Jewish cemetery. Ukrainian auxiliaries and Sonderdienst patrols drove Jews from the ghetto, shooting dead those who refused to leave or were too infirm to comply. At the square, the doomed were forced to sit in a crouched position for at least 30 hours in unbearable heat. The German head of the local Labor Office pleaded with Schulz to spare craftsmen and laborers from expulsion. At about 2:00 P.M., Schulz ordered Jewish men, aged 15 to 40, to line up at the Jewish cemetery. Over the next 5 hours, he chose 600 men to retain for labor.

As the heat in the square grew intense, the Germans resorted to violence to enforce order. When Jewish Council member Furman rose to his feet around 11:00 A.M., to ask for a delivery of water, he was shot dead. The Germans then deployed machine guns, aiming at those who defied the orders to remain crouched. By midafternoon, as the Germans began quenching their thirst with beer, the violence became more random, with intoxicated policemen, led by KdS commander Julius Dube, indiscriminately firing into the crowd. When the Polish fire department finally sprayed water on the assembled Jews in the evening, more than 2,000 had been killed by gunshots. Shots also rang from the cemetery, where the Germans were executing those found hiding in the ghetto as well as Jews from some work details.¹⁶

Violence continued on Sunday, August 23, 1942. During the late-afternoon march to the train station, of approximately 17,000 Jews, including around 8,000 newly arrived from the ghettos of Mordy and Łosice (among them the Jews from Sarnaki, resettled in May in Mordy and Łosice), the Germans shot dead those who fled the march. At the station, several German soldiers sprayed bullets into the crowd and into already loaded railway wagons. In the ghetto, the Germans and Ukrainian auxiliaries continued to uncover and shoot Jews in hiding. On this day, about 200 to 300 Jews perished. In addition, on August 24, a group of local SS, led by Albert Fabisch, the Stadtkommissar of Siedlce, murdered at the Jewish hospital 60 patients and 40 personnel, including Jewish Council chair Loebel.¹⁷

The 600 men retained for labor were ordered to the northwestern part of the old ghetto. Within a week, an additional 1,500 to 2,000 survivors from Siedlce, including many Roma, as well as Jewish women and children, filled this "small" or "triangular" ghetto bounded by Sokołowski, Asłanowicz, and November 11 Streets. An October 28, 1942, order by Friedrich Wilhelm Krüger, head of the SS and Police (Höherer SS- und Polizeiführer, HSSPF) in the Generalgouvernement, further increased the population in the reconstituted ghetto. The order announced that Siedlce would be one of six remaining "Jewish residential areas" in Distrikt Warschau and promised safety to Jews there. The order drew another 1,500 to 2,500 Jews to the ghetto, including fugitives from ghetto liquidations in Łosice, Węgrów, Kałuszyn, Sokołów Podlaski, Międzyrzec Podlaski, and Łuków.¹⁸

The final liquidation of the Siedlce ghetto began on November 25, 1942. That day, the Germans moved the residents of the triangular ghetto to the Gęsi Borek encampment, about 3 kilometers (2 miles) away. The transfer was allegedly to control a typhus outbreak in the small ghetto. The Germans gave the appearance that Gęsi Borek would be its residents' permanent and peaceful home by issuing Jewish Council members three-month residence passes, looking aside as ghetto inhabitants violated orders to bring in only what they could carry, and allowing the Jews and Roma to barter freely with Polish peasants.

Some remember that the final liquidation of the Gęsi Borek ghetto occurred three days later, on November 28, when the Germans, assisted by Polish (Blue) Police, rounded up the residents, including some Roma, and marched them to the Niwiski railway station (in Brzozzków village). The elderly Icchak Nachem Weintraub, titular head of the Jewish Council, led the procession.¹⁹ Another account places the ghetto liquidation on December 3. It holds that when no railway cars were waiting at Niwiski, the procession was marched back to Gęsi Borek. There, the Jews and Roma were packed into a closely guarded building. German Gendarmes then called people out by name, including all those with Jewish Council connections, and executed them. The Polish (Blue) Police commander shot Avraham Bressler, chief of the Jewish Police. The next morning, on December 4, the remaining Jews and Roma were marched again to the railway station.²⁰

Although a number of those in the procession donned prayer garments, a larger group, including craftsmen and members of the Jewish Police, resisted deportation. Master locksmith Symcha Wilk, Meloch Halber, and several other men smuggled tools onto the transport and forced open the doors to their wagons, permitting a large number of individuals, including Rabbi Aria Nejman, to jump from the train. The guards on the train murdered those who remained behind. When the train arrived at the Treblinka extermination camp, Jewish prisoners unloading the transport discovered the wagons full of thousands of naked, beaten, bullet-ridden corpses.²¹

As many as 200 to 300 people survived the German extermination of the Jewish and Roma communities of Siedlce. Emil Karpiński, Dawid and Ida Tenenbojm, and a few others arranged for false identity papers, enabling them to pass as Poles. Others, such as Herzel Kave, joined by friends Kiwerant and Nelkienbojm, stowed away on trains they believed to be taking men or materials beyond the borders of the Generalgouvernement or the Reich. Another group of agricultural laborers, originally from Siedlce, assigned to an estate in Dru-pia, fled to the woods in November 1942 after the Polish overseer warned them he had received orders to turn them over to the Gestapo. The laborers formed a 30-person armed partisan unit, which conducted operations around Łuków.²²

A number of Poles sheltered Jews. Four pre-war friends of Cypora Jabłoń-Zonszajn took care of her one-year-old daughter Rachela.²³ The family of postal worker Witold Kozłowski found hiding places for another 8 Jews, including former neighbors Rachel and Izrael Halberstadt and Rabbi Aria Neiman.²⁴ In (Stare) Opole-Sabinka, the family of Czesław Osiński, a pre-war secondary school director and PPS leader, hid 17 Jews, including E. Landau, a nurse wounded during the liquidation of the Jewish hospital.²⁵

However, far fewer survived to see the war's end. Some, including Abram Halber, died of illnesses contracted in the ghetto. Twenty-one of the 30 partisans perished in combat operations. The Germans killed Jews they found hiding during routine patrols. Still others, including several Jews who jumped from the train heading towards Treblinka and 16 of the 17 Jews hidden by Osiński, are believed to have been killed by Poles.²⁶

Of the fewer than 150 Jewish survivors, only Rachel and Izrael Halberstadt remained in Siedlce after the war. At post-war trials in East Germany, Willi Richter and Edmund Langer, two former members of the Grenzpolizei detachment in Plate-rów, were convicted of numerous crimes, including murders committed during the Siedlce ghetto liquidations. They received life sentences.

SOURCES Coauthor Edward Kopówka has written Żydzi Siedleccy (Siedlce, 2001), which discusses the experiences of Jews, Roma, and Sinti in the Siedlce ghetto. The book's bibliography and detailed footnotes including references in a number of languages offer an important departure point for those interested in researching the Siedlce ghetto. The yizkor books, Elimelekh Faynzilber, ed., Af di burves fun mayn beym: Hurbn Shedlets (Tel Aviv: 1952) and Sefer yizkor li-kehillat Shedlets (Buenos Aires: ha-Irgunim shel yots'e Shedlits be-Yisrael uve-Argentīnah, 1956), also contain substantial secondary coverage and testimonies from survivors. The second book has been cited here in a partial, unpublished Polish translation, by Adam Bielecki, titled "Księgi pamięci," available at APSi, used by author Kopówka in his research.

Published memoirs by survivors discussing the fate of the Siedlce Jewish community include Gitel Donath, My Bones Don't Rest in Auschwitz: A Lonely Battle to Survive German Tyranny (Montreal: Kaplan Publishing, 1999); the testimony of Gedali Niewiadomski, in Henryk Grynberg, Children of Zion, trans. Jacqueline Mitchell (Evanston, IL: Northwestern University Press, 1998); Nelli Rotbart, A Long Journey: A Holocaust Memoir and After: Poland, Soviet Union, Canada (Montreal: Concordia University Chair in Canadian Jewish Studies, 2002); Edi Weinstein, Quenched Steel: The Story of an Escape from Treblinka, ed. Noah Lasman (Jerusalem: Yad Vashem, 2002); Samuel Willenberg, Revolt in Treblinka (Warsaw: ŻIH, 1992); and Eta Wróbel, My Life, My Way: The Extraordinary Memoir of a Jewish Partisan in World War II Poland (New York: Yivo Institute for Jewish Research, 2006).

Among the more important witness statements are Noah Lasman, Pięćdziesiąt kilometrów od Treblinki (Warsaw: Borgin, 1994), available in an earlier Hebrew-language edition; Emil Karpiński, "Wspomnienia z okresu okupacji," BŻIH, no. 1 (1989): 65–89; and Agata Dąbrowska, ed., "Pamiętnik Cypory Jabłoń-Zonszajn ur. w 1915 r. i zamieszkałej w Siedlcach do 1942 r.," in Szkice podlaskie, no. 9 (2000): 228–244, with the last available in a partial English translation, "Siedlce Memoirs," at the Aktion Reinhard Death Camps Web site. The USHMM is the repository for the original manuscripts of Karpiński and Jabłoń-Zonszajn and in the latter case additional materials from Zofia (Olszakowska) Glazer and Irena Zawadzka, two of the aid givers of Rachela Jabłoń-Zonszajn. For this reason, the memoirs are cited in the entry as USHMM, 2003.84.1, and USHMM, 1.2002.3, respectively.

Secondary accounts in Polish considered important include for the March 1941 "German pogrom" Wanda Więchtchorzewska, "Zróżdła do dziejów okupacji hitlerowskiej na Podlasiu południowo-zachodnim," in Władysław Ważniewski, ed., Podlasie w czasie II wojny światowej (Siedlce: Wyższa Szkoła Rolniczo-Pedagogiczna w Siedlcach, 1997); and the unpublished manuscript, held at the Ossolineum (i.e., ZNiO), by Lucjan Koć, "Pomóc i współpraca z ludnością żydowską ludności wiejskiej powiatu siedleckiego z uwzględnieniem sytuacji zagadnień żydowskich innych powiatach Podlasia—w okresie okupacji hitlerowskiej w Polsce," also covering Jewish self-defense before, during, and after the ghetto's establishment, discussing efforts to develop and maintain communication between Jewish Socialists in Warsaw and Siedlce, and describing Polish-Christian assistance. In addition to Koć, Jewish resistance is covered by Emil Karpiński, Eta Wróbel, and Stanisława Lewandowska, Ruch oporu na Podlasiu (Warsaw: Ministerstwo Obrony Narodowej, 1976).

Also considered of primary importance are the testimonies and historical materials collected by Jontel (Jankiel) Goldman for the Siedlce branch of the State Commission for Historical Preservation (Państwowa Służba Ochrony Zabytków, Województwo mazowieckie, Oddział terenowy w Siedlcach) in conjunction with plans (only some realized) to establish several monuments to commemorate the Jewish community, available in an unpublished manuscript, W. Sobczyk, ed., "Cmentarz-pomnik męczeństwa narodu żydowskiego w Siedlcach" (Unpub. MMS, Siedlce, 1961), at the organization's Siedlce archives. Contemporary press coverage includes "Siedlce," Gazeta Żydowska, no. 1, January 3, 1941, p. 5.

Coverage of the Roma and Sinti in the Siedlce ghetto can be found in the aforementioned memoirs of Jewish survivors Weinstein and Karpiński and in the more scholarly Michael Zimmerman, Rassenutopie und Genozid: Die nationalsozialistische Lösung der Zigeunerfrage (Hamburg, 1996), pp. 278–283; and Karola Fings and Frank Sparing, Rassismus-Lager-Völkermord: Die nationalsozialistische Zigeunerverfolgung in Köln (Cologne: Emons, 2005), pp. 219–222.

German orders pertaining to the Siedlce ghetto and documentation related to the efforts of Leon Feiner, Jan Karski, and the Polish London government-in-exile to make known its liquidation in the West appear in Tatiana Berenstein et al., eds., Eksterminacja Żydów na ziemiach polskich w okresie okupacji hitlerowskiej. Zbiór dokumentów (Warsaw, 1957), pp. 277–279, 310–314. Also important is Rejestr miejsc i faktów zbrodni popełnionych przez okupanta hitlerowskiego na ziemiach polskich w latach 1939–1945: Województwo siedleckie (Warsaw: GKB-ZHwP, 1985); and DDR-Justiz und NS-Verbrechen, vol. 2 (Amsterdam: Amsterdam University Press, 2002), Lfd. Nr. 1035 and Lfd. Nr. 1038, respectively, for the postwar trials of Willi Richter and Edmund Langer.

Photographs taken for the Karski report are available at APSi; the visual iconography and diary of Hubert Pfoch, a German soldier, are discussed in Gitta Sereny, Into that Darkness: From Mercy Killing to Mass Murder, a Study of Franz Stangl (London, 1974), p. 158–159.

A large amount of documentation exists on the Poles who aided Jewish fugitives, with the most significant in English Israel Gutman and Sara Bender, eds., The Encyclopedia of the Righteous among the Nations: Rescuers of Jews during the Holocaust, vol. 2, Poland, 2 pts. (Jerusalem: Yad Vashem, 2004), pp. 87–88, 166, 326, 390, 568, 789, 862, 927–928. An important testimony by Zofia Olszakowska-Glazer is located on the Web site of the Centrum Edukacji Obywatelskiej at www.ceo.org.pl/portal/b_wiadomosci_doc?docId=37891.

Unpublished documentation relating to the Siedlce ghetto can be found in the following archives: AAN; APSi (e.g., 36 [2362, 2364, 2368], 62 [334/2], 334/2, 1290); AŻIH (e.g., 210/621–622; 211 [126, p. 9; 949–950]; 301 [5758, 5867, 6307, 6383, 6436, 6517]; 313/41); BA-L (e.g., B 162/6873 and 6878); FVA; IPN (e.g., ASG, GKBZHwP [OKBZH-Si, 26/30]); USHMM (Acc.1996.A.0223 [AŻIH 313]; Acc.1997.A.0124 [AŻIH 211]; Acc.1999.A.0154 [AŻIH 210]; RG-10.114; RG-15.019M [IPN, ASG] [49/151–159]; RG-50.488*0171); VHF (e.g., # 2828, 24291, 30396, 35649, 39119, 42698, 42918); and YVA (e.g., O-16 [1589, 2555, 3303, 4178]). The Muzeum Walki i Męczeństwa w Treblince (Museum of Struggle and Martyrdom in Treblinka), directed by Edward Kopówka, also has unique holdings pertaining to the Siedlce ghetto.

Edward Kopówka and Laura Crago

NOTES

1. IPN, GKBZHwP, OKBZH-Si, 26/30; USHMM, Acc. 1999.A.0154 (AŻIH), 210/622, p. 18.
2. Testimony of Herzel Kawe (Kawe), in “Księga pamięci,” p. 635.
3. Donath, My Bones, pp. 8–9, 19–20.
4. BA-L, B 162/6873, pp. 322–323; ZNiO, Koć, “Pomoc i współpraca,” p. 120; “Księga pamięci,” pp. 706–707; Donath, My Bones, pp. 56–57.
5. USHMM, 2003.84.1, pp. 5–6.
6. APSi, 36 (Akta miasta Siedlce), 2362 (Wykaz ludności getta siedleckiego 7.11.1941), 2364 (Zniszczenia wojenne 1939), 2368 (Stan ludności 1940), and 1290 (Zbiór afiszy okupacyjnych powiatu siedleckiego), Ogłoszenie # 1 (August 2, 1941); Donath, My Bones, pp. 67–69.
7. APSi, 1290, Zarządzenia, # 1 (November 25, 1941), # A67/42 (May 23, 1942).

8. USHMM, Acc.1996.A.0223, 313/41, p. 80.
9. Ibid., p. 95; RG-50.488*0171, interview with Henryk Maliszewski; Rejestr miejsc i faktów, p. 236.
10. USHMM, Acc.1996.A.0223, 313/41, pp. 40–45, 80–81, 85–90, 94.
11. Ibid., 2003.84.1, pp. 3, 7; VHF, # 24291, testimony of Aria Leib (Nejman) Newman.
12. Lasman, Pięćdziesiąt kilometrów, pp. 7–9.
13. USHMM, 2003.84.1, pp. 8–9; AŻIH, 301/6307, testimony of Izaak Halber, pp. 1–3.
14. USHMM, 1.2002.3, “Pamiętnik,” p. 1, 2003.84.1, p. 9.
15. Ida Jomtov-Tenenbojm testimony, in “Księga pamięci,” p. 650; Faynzilber, Hurbn Sheddlets, pp. 34–35.
16. USHMM, 2003.84.1, pp. 12–13; Kawe, in “Księga pamięci,” pp. 635–636.
17. Weinstein, Quenched Steel, pp. 29–35; BA-L, B 162/6873, p. 323; USHMM, 2003.84.1, pp. 7–15, 1.2002.3, pp. 1–4, 7; Lasman, Pięćdziesiąt kilometrów, pp. 22–24.
18. USHMM, 1.2002.3, pp. 5–6, 2003.84.1, pp. 12–18; Weinstein, Quenched Steel, p. 110.
19. Goldman, “Materiał historyczny,” in Sobczyk, “Cmentarz-pomnik,” p. 23; Jomtov-Tenenbojm, in “Księga pamięci,” pp. 670–671.
20. Weinstein, Quenched Steel, pp. 110–113.
21. USHMM, RG-10.114; VHF, # 24291; Willenberg, Revolt, pp. 46–47.
22. AŻIH, 301/6383, testimony of Ela Gorzeliński.
23. USHMM, 1.2002.3, Szymon Jabłoń and Rachel Zonszajn letters.
24. AŻIH, 301/5758, testimony of Witold Kowalski, pp. 1–2; 301/6436, Rachel and Israel Halberstadt declaration, pp. 1–4; VHF, # 24291; # 35649, testimony of Janusz Kowalski.
25. VHF, # 39119, testimony of Bogdan Osiński.
26. Weinstein, Quenched Steel, p. 113; VHF, # 24291; # 39119.

SIENNICA

Pre-1939: Siennica, town, Warsaw województwo, Poland; 1939–1944: Kreis Minsk Mazowiecki, Distrikt Warschau, Generalgouvernement; post-1998: województwo mazowieckie, Poland

Siennica is located 50 kilometers (31 miles) east-southeast of Warsaw and 10 kilometers (6 miles) south of Mińsk Mazowiecki. In 1921, 560 Jews were living in Siennica, comprising 56.7 percent of the town's total population. In September 1939, there were 704 Jewish inhabitants in Siennica.

German soldiers occupied the town on September 13, 1939. All inhabitants of Siennica, Jews and Poles, were rounded up and held in the church of the local monastery. According to one testimony, a German officer ordered the priest to send one man with a message for the Polish army, which had established a defense line 3 kilometers (2 miles) from Siennica. The man had to present the Polish officer with an ultimatum—that if they did not retreat or surrender, the Germans would burn alive all the hostages in the church. The Polish forces soon retreated, and the Germans released the hostages.¹

The same day, the Germans set fire to the town. Around 80 percent of the buildings in Siennica were burned to the ground, including 43 of the 46 Jewish homes.² On that day, Wehrmacht soldiers killed 24 people, Poles and Jews from Siennica and the surrounding area. These murders were probably a reprisal Aktion, following the killing of a German soldier in the vicinity.³

From the first months of the occupation, the Jews were required to perform forced labor. In October 1939, the German authorities sent to Garwolin a group of Jewish men, all aged over 13 years, where they lived in barracks and worked. After one month there they returned.⁴ Jews from Siennica also worked on the construction of roads for the German firm of Schmidt.⁵ A group of Jewish men from Siennica was taken to the labor camp in Jozefów and worked on the regulation of the Vistula River and on the irrigation of the fields.⁶

There were not any German soldiers or German police based directly in Siennica, but German Gendarmes visited Siennica regularly from Mińsk Mazowiecki, once or twice per day.⁷

The German authorities ordered the establishment of a Jewish Council (Judenrat), a Jewish police force, and later a Jewish Social-Self Help (JSS) organization in Siennica. The Judenrat and the Jewish police force each had 12 members.⁸ Lejb Kózka was appointed as the chairman of the Judenrat in Siennica. Aron Lubelski was the secretary of the Judenrat. Also among the members of the Judenrat were L. Goldsztejn, Sz. Jablonka, and A. Stokfisz (their signatures can be found on Judenrat documentation from 1941).⁹

The JSS and its aid committee provided assistance to more than 200 people.¹⁰ Among them there were mostly inhabitants of Siennica, whose houses and property had been burned (296 Jews in January 1941), and refugees from other localities (48 people in January 1941).¹¹

The aid committee was able to provide assistance, thanks to donations from members of the Jewish community in Siennica, which provided about 25 percent of the necessary funds.¹² Additional funds for social assistance came from the American Jewish Joint Distribution Committee (AJDC) and the central offices of the JSS in Kraków. These funds were mainly used to buy food and fuel (wood and coal). The support received from the AJDC in February, March, and April 1940 enabled the aid committee to open a public soup kitchen.¹³

The JSS organization in Siennica received between 400 and 600 złoty of support from the AJDC and the JSS every two months in 1941. Half of this came from the AJDC and half from the JSS. All of these donations were applied to the provision of material support (mainly food).¹⁴

The German authorities established a ghetto in Siennica in November 1941. Throughout November, the Judenrat in Siennica tried to convince the Germans to permit the Jews to remain in Siennica and not to resettle them into a ghetto in another town. On November 23, the Germans decided that the Jews could stay in Siennica and that a ghetto would be set up there. In addition, all Jewish families from the nearby villages had to move into the ghetto. As a result of this decision, around 30 Jewish families were moved into the Siennica ghetto, leading to a deterioration of living conditions in the ghetto.¹⁵

The ghetto was not enclosed by a fence or a wall or even any barbed wire. There were only signs posted that Jews were not permitted to leave the ghetto area.¹⁶

According to some testimonies, a major event in the Siennica ghetto was the short visit of a rabbi from Otwock in 1942. He went into hiding during the liquidation of the Otwock ghetto and was then denounced. When the Germans caught him, he told them that he would give them a large amount of gold if they would let him go to a camp where Jews were still living. Apparently the Germans agreed to this. On his way to the camp, he stopped in Siennica to pray in the synagogue. All of the town's Jews were waiting for him and the message he would give them. After the prayer, he told them: "If you are still staying in the town, it means that God has chosen you to stay and that you will go back to work and you will survive."¹⁷

The Siennica ghetto was liquidated on October 18, 1942. According to the testimonies of survivors, four German soldiers arrived in the town on the day prior to the liquidation. They ordered the Judenrat members to assemble in the pharmacy. The Germans told them that at 8:00 A.M. on the following day all the Jews of Siennica would have to go to the town of Mrozy and no Jews would be permitted to stay in Siennica. According to survivor testimony, the Judenrat was given the choice that either the Jews themselves could organize the resettlement to Mrozy or the Germans would send armed units to implement it. The members of the Judenrat were aware that the deployment of German forces would doubtless entail considerable brutality and the killing of Jews on the spot. Therefore, the Judenrat decided to organize and implement the transfer itself.¹⁸

On the following day, October 18, 1942, at 5:00 A.M.,¹⁹ the column of Jews with horse wagons carrying the old and the sick traveled the 16 kilometers (10 miles) to the town of Mrozy, where the railway station was located. The column was escorted by the Jewish Police, and survivors maintain that they did not see any German or Polish police involved. After several hours, at 4:00 P.M., the column arrived at the Mrozy railway station, and from here they were sent on to the extermination camp at Treblinka.²⁰

Some of the Jews from Siennica, after arriving in Mrozy, organized themselves and escaped to the village of Mienia, where there was a farm on which the Germans had created a labor camp for Jews. Some of these Jews managed to survive the war.²¹

SOURCES Articles on the Jewish community of Siennica can be found in Abraham Wein, ed., Pinkas ha-kehillot. Encyclopaedia of Jewish Communities: Poland, vol. 4, Warsaw and Its Region (Jerusalem: Yad Vashem, 1989), p. 437; and in Shmuel Spector and Geoffrey Wigoder, eds., The Encyclopedia of Jewish Life before and during the Holocaust (Jerusalem: Yad Vashem; New York: New York University Press, 2001), p. 1180.

The book by Barbara Engelking, Jacek Leociak, and Dariusz Libionka, eds., Prowincja noc: Życie i zagłada Żydów w dystrykcie warszawskim (Warsaw: Wydawnictwo IFiS PAN, 2007)

434 WARSAW REGION

contains brief information on the Siennica ghetto, pp. 168, 169, 216.

Additional information on the ghetto and German crimes in Siennica can also be found in BŻIH, no. 1 (1952), 120; Czesław Pilichowski et al., eds., Obozy hitlerowskie na ziemiach polskich 1939–1945: Informator encyklopedyczny (Warsaw: PWN, 1979), p. 451; and Rejestr miejsc i faktów zbrodni popełnionych przez okupanta hitlerowskiego na ziemiach polskich w latach 1939–1945: Województwo siedleckie (Warsaw: GKBZHWP, 1985), p. 347.

Documentation regarding the fate of the Jews of Siennica under German occupation can be found in the following archives: AŻIH (210/624 [AJDC Siennica]; 211/953 [JSS Siennica]); IPN (AGK, Kolekcja “Ob,” sygn. 177); USHMM (RG-15.019M, reel 13); and VHF (# 398, 3813, 39094).

Grzegorz Kołacz

NOTES

1. VHF, # 3813, testimony of George Shedletzky.
2. AŻIH, 210/624 (AJDC Siennica), p. 3, report of February 13, 1941.
3. USHMM (RG-15.019M, reel 13); Rejestr miejsc . . . : Województwo siedleckie, p. 347.
4. VHF, # 3813.
5. Ibid.
6. Ibid.
7. Ibid.
8. Ibid.
9. AŻIH, 210/624, pp. 1–3; 211/953 (JSS Siennica, 1941–1942), pp. 1–29.
10. Ibid., 210/28 (AJDC), p. 6, report of June 1, 1940.
11. Ibid., 210/624, p. 1.
12. Ibid.; 211/953.
13. Ibid., 210/624, p. 3.
14. Ibid., 211/953.
15. Ibid.
16. VHF, # 3813.
17. Ibid., # 398, testimony of Ben Shedletzky.
18. Ibid.
19. The ghetto was liquidated on October 18, 1942, but Ben Shedletzky, who provides this description, dates it in July 1942.
20. VHF, # 398; and # 3813.
21. Ibid., # 398; and # 3813.

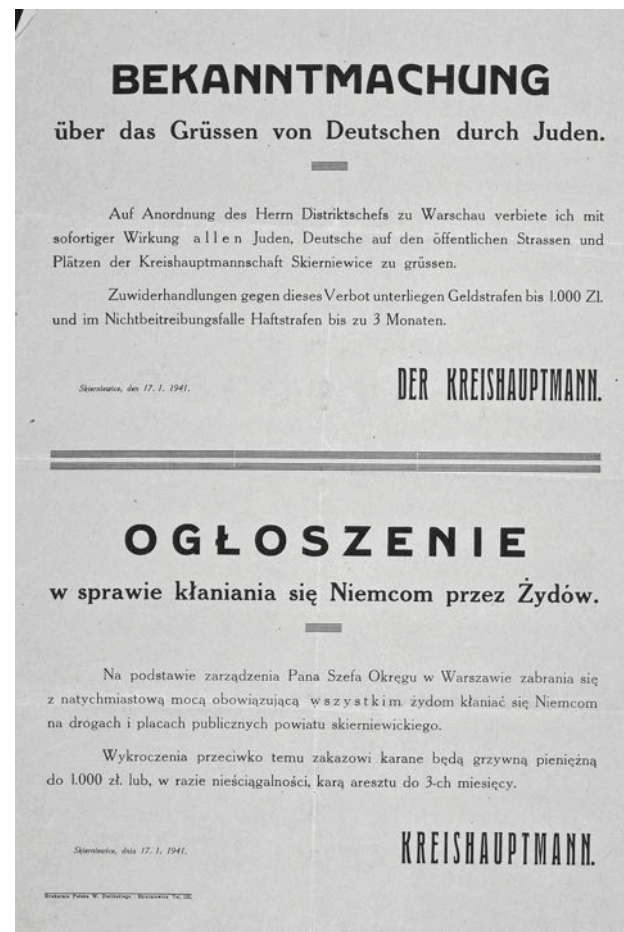

SKIERNIEWICE

Pre-1939: Skierniewice (Yiddish: Skernyevits), town, Łódź województwo, Poland; 1939–1945: center of Kreis Skierniewice, Distrikt Warschau, Generalgouvernement; post-1998: Łódź województwo, Poland

Skierniewice is located 66 kilometers (41 miles) southwest of Warsaw. In 1921, there were 4,333 Jews living in the town. A similar number of Jews were residing there on the eve of World War II.

Following the capture of the town on September 9, 1939, the Germans seized Jews and humiliated them at the market square, violently plucking out their beards. Jewish property was plundered during the first days of the occupation.

ENCYCLOPEDIA OF CAMPS AND GHETTOS, 1933–1945

Announcement in German and Polish issued by the Kreishauptmann of Skierniewice on January 17, 1941, proclaiming a new regulation that prohibits Jews from greeting Germans on the streets or in public places. The announcement reads: “Announcement about the greeting of Germans by Jews.

By the command of the District Chief of Warsaw, I prohibit all Jews from greeting Germans on the streets and public places in the city of Skierniewice. This is effective immediately.

Resistance to this prohibition will result in a fine of up to 1,000 złoty. If the person cannot afford to pay this fine, he will be punished with a jail sentence no longer than 3 months.

Skierniewice, January 17, 1941.

The Kreishauptmann”

USHMM WS #N64834, COURTESY OF MUZEUM NIEPODLEGŁOŚCI

At the end of October 1939, the Kreishauptmann in Skierniewice, Regierungsrat Dr. Rupe, ordered Jews to wear armbands bearing the Star of David and established a Jewish Council (Judenrat), which was headed by the teacher Herman Guzik. His deputy was Alter Lewkowicz. The Judenrat was required to deliver a specific number of Jewish forced laborers aged 12 to 60 each day. Soon the Judenrat permitted better-off Jews to pay for substitutes, who received 5 złoty per day. The Jews worked at the military barracks, at the train station, and for the town authority. At the end of 1939, the Germans burned down the main synagogue and also desecrated the Torah scrolls in the shtetlekh (prayer house) of the Ger Hasidim.¹

In the last months of 1939 and in 1940, some 2,500 Jewish refugees arrived in Skierniewice, almost all of them after fleeing or being expelled from those parts of Poland that had been annexed to the Reich, including from Łódź, Zgierz, Aleksandrów Łódzki, Brzeziny, and Włocławek. They arrived in a weary and impoverished condition, and the Jews of Skierniewice appealed to the American Jewish Joint Distribution Committee (AJDC) for financial assistance. The Judenrat used the money they received to supply beds and heating stoves for the refugees; it also opened an infirmary and a public kitchen for them. Subsequently these welfare services came to benefit the native Jews of Skierniewice as well, when conditions in the town deteriorated further.² By the fall of 1940, at least 1,300 Jews in Skierniewice were receiving welfare support.³

On September 9, 1940, the Skierniewice Kreishauptmann reported to Generalgouverneur Hans Frank in Kraków that 200 Jews from his Kreis had been sent to the collection point in Warsaw, for transfer to labor camps in Distrikt Lublin.⁴

On October 15, 1940, the Kreishauptmann published an announcement (Bekanntmachung) about the establishment of a special residential area for Jews in the town of Skierniewice. The announcement included a map, which marked the area of the ghetto. The Jews were given until November 15 to move into the ghetto, and all non-Jews also had to be evacuated by this date. The chairman of the Jewish Council was made responsible for the allocation of apartments within the ghetto. The ghetto was to be surrounded with walls, but only fences were to block those streets that formed part of the ghetto boundary.⁵

The ghetto was located in the most dilapidated neighborhood of the town. Its streets included Batory (Piotrków), Stryków, Raweska, Jawia, the alley of the rabbi's house, and the alley of the mikveh. Soon it was enclosed by a high fence with just one gate to either exit or enter, on Raweska Street. Piotrków Street, which passed through the ghetto, was out of bounds for the Jews; they had to cross it on a wooden bridge.⁶

Living conditions in the ghetto were very overcrowded, with three or four families sharing a house. Some houses had no heating or indoor plumbing. One survivor recalls that the outhouses were overflowing due to the lack of a proper sewage system, but the human excrement was then sold to the local farmers as fertilizer.⁷ In the ghetto there was also a unit of Jewish Police, a post office, and a Jewish hospital directed by Dr. Rosenthal.

In January or February 1941, the more than 6,000 Jews in the Skierniewice ghetto were informed that they would have to transfer to the Warsaw ghetto by March. This was part of a large-scale plan to clear all the Jews from the Kreise of Distrikt Warschau to the west of the city. Some Jews were able to transport some of their possessions with them to Warsaw on wagons rented from non-Jews. The departure took place in an orderly fashion without aggressive intervention by the German police.

On March 4, 1941, the Kreishauptmann in Skierniewice reported that in view of the planned expulsion of all the Jews of the Kreis to the Warsaw ghetto by mid-March, most of the Jews in the Jewish residential areas (ghettos) in Skierniewice, in Jeżów, and at the Rogów railway station had voluntarily moved to Warsaw. In Skierniewice, there were now only about 180 Jews. The same report noted that in the course of the departure of the Jews in February, 6,252 people had been deloused and 6,845 had been bathed. The sanitary facilities, which had been established for the Jews, remained operational and were to be used in the future for the Aryan population. The houses abandoned by the Jews were being cleaned and disinfected by work columns supervised by the disinfection staff. The removal of the Jews had resulted in a shortage both of agricultural laborers and of craftsmen.⁸

At the time of the Jews' departure from the town, Zenon Drzewiecki, a Pole, who worked for the town's welfare administration but also had links to the Polish underground, gave temporary shelter in an Old People's Home to a number of Jews who had gone into hiding. However, it was too dangerous for them to stay there for long, and they had to be moved to safer locations.⁹

On arrival in the Warsaw ghetto, most of the Jews from Skierniewice were put into improvised hostels designated for refugees. It appears that not all of the Jews from Skierniewice were registered in the group hostels, and some are known to have gone to other towns in the Generalgouvernement, such as Rawa Mazowiecka, Biała Rawska, and Przygłów, where they had relatives or contacts. A JSS report dated March 21, 1940, noted that 3,300 Jews from Skierniewice were among the more than 40,000 Jews recently arrived in the Warsaw ghetto as part of organized groups.¹⁰

A large number of the refugees from Skierniewice died of starvation and contagious diseases in the Warsaw ghetto. Some left for other places in the Generalgouvernement, and a few even returned to Skierniewice to live on the Aryan side. Many of the Skierniewice Jews in the Warsaw ghetto who survived until the summer of 1942 were among those deported to the Treblinka extermination camp at that time.

Only 43 Jews are known to have returned to Skierniewice in 1945.

SOURCES Publications concerning the fate of the Jews of Skierniewice during the Holocaust include the following: Yitshak Perlov, ed., Seyfer Skernyevits: Le-zykber der fartiliktter kebileh kdosheh (Tel Aviv: Irgun yots'e Skernivits be-Yisrael, 1955); Danuta Dabrowska and Abraham Wein, eds., Pinkas ha-kehillot. Encyclopaedia of Jewish Communities: Poland, vol. 1, Lodz and Its Region (Jerusalem: Yad Vashem, 1976), pp. 166–171; and Guy Miron, ed., The Yad Vashem Encyclopedia of the Ghettos during the Holocaust (Jerusalem: Yad Vashem, 2010), pp. 720–722.

The ghetto in Skierniewice is mentioned also in Czesław Pilichowski et al., eds., Obozy hitlerowskie na ziemiach polskich 1939–1945: Informator encyklopedyczny (Warsaw: PWN, 1979), p. 113; and Barbara Engelking, Jacek Leociak, and Dariusz Libionka, eds., Prowincja noc: Życie i zagłada Żydów w dystrykcie warszawskim (Warsaw: Wydawnictwo IFiS PAN, 2007), p. 212.

Relevant documentation can be found in the following archives: AŻIH (210/633; 211/967, 1075; 301/2063; 302/213; Ring I/908); BA-BL (R 52III/29); USHMM (Acc.1997.A.0124 [JSS]; Acc.1999.A.0154 [AJDC]; RG-14.052 [BA-BL, R 52]; RG-15.079 [Ring]); VHF (e.g., # 214, 10031, 32285); and YVA (e.g., O-3/2933, O-3/3186; O-6/21).

Martin Dean

NOTES

1. AŻIH, 301/2063, testimony of Zenon Drzewiecki; 302/213, testimony of Zenon Drzewiecki; USHMM, Acc.1997.A.0124 (JSS), 211/967, p. 2; Dabrowska and Wein, Pinkas ha-kebilot: Poland, vol. 1, Lodz and Its Region, pp. 166–171.

2. Dabrowska and Wein, Pinkas ha-kebilot: Poland, vol. 1, Lodz and Its Region, pp. 166–171.

3. USHMM, Acc.1997.A.0124 (JSS), 211/967, p. 8. Engelking, Leociak, and Libionka, Prowincja noc, p. 212, give the figure of 1,500.

4. USHMM, RG-14.052 (BA-BL), R 52III/23, p. 18, Kreishauptmann Skierniewice, monthly report, September 9, 1941.

5. See Erster Bekanntmachung über die Errichtung eines besonderen Wohngebiet für Juden in der Stadt Skierniewice, October 15, 1940 (YVA, O-6/21), published in Miron, The Yad Vashem Encyclopedia of the Ghettos, p. 721. The accompanying text, however, states only that the ghetto was established in October 1940.

6. Dabrowska and Wein, Pinkas ha-kebilot: Poland, vol. 1, Lodz and Its Region, pp. 166–171. VHF, # 214, testimony of Anna Fischer, 1994, also mentions the bridge. See also Perlov, Seyfer Skernyevits, pp. 456–457.

7. VHF, # 214; and # 32285, testimony of Adam Sulkowicz, 1997.

8. See USHMM, RG-14.052 (BA-BL), R 52III/29, pp. 88, 96, Kreishauptmann Skierniewice, monthly report, March 4, 1941.

9. AŻIH, 301/2063; 302/213.

10. Perlov, Seyfer Skernyevits, p. 431; USHMM, Acc.1997.A.0124 (JSS), 211/1075, pp. 28–29.

SOBIENIE JEZIORY

Pre-1939: Sobienie Jeziory, village, Lublin województwo, Poland; 1939–1944: Kreis Garwolin, Distrikt Warschau, Generalgouvernement; post-1998: województwo mazowieckie, Poland

Sobienie Jeziory is located 42 kilometers (26 miles) south-east of Warsaw. In 1921, there were 1,439 Jews in Sobienie Jeziory. They comprised just over 76 percent of the village's population.

The Germans established a ghetto in the village in September 1941, 11 months after Distrikt Warschau chief Ludwig Fischer's October 2, 1940, order to establish ghettos for the region's Jews.¹ The ghetto, which spanned about 75 percent of the town, covered the territory bordered by Warszawska, Piwońska, and Garwolińska Streets. Little is known about the ghetto's subsequent administration. A Jewish Council (Judenrat) was established, headed by A. Friedsohn, a metal goods store owner and political activist in the interwar period. The date of its establishment is unclear. Friedsohn also headed the town's Jewish Social Self-Help (JSS) committee.² The existence of a Jewish police force is not mentioned in known accounts of ghetto life.

The ghetto experienced population growth, as the Germans used it as a regional concentration point for Jews from neighboring towns and villages en route to extermination camps. In February 1941, 2,250 Jews were living in the village. By October 1941, a month after the ghetto's establishment, the population had expanded to 3,680. Some accounts claim the ghetto's population in the fall of 1941 was much greater, with some 6,000 residents. Greater consensus exists over the ghetto's overall population peaking at the beginning of September 1942, though here, too, population statistics differ. According to some estimates, at the end of that month, on the eve of the ghetto's liquidation, more than 8,000 people were confined there, but these figures are likely too high. Other evidence suggests that by then Sobienie Jeziory's ghetto population may have been reduced considerably, with a part of the village's Jews deported earlier. Although Sobienie Jeziory's ghetto contained escapees from larger ghettos, including the Warsaw ghetto, the overwhelming majority of its population came from the surrounding area, especially nearby villages and towns. In January 1941, Jewish residents of Sobienie Jeziory included deportees and refugees from Falenica, Wilga, Osieck, Piaseczno, Karczew, Górzno, Pilawa, Otwock, Góra Kalwaria, Garwolin, and Huta Dąbrowa.³

The 17 German policemen assigned to the local Gendarmerie post, under the leadership of Kreis commander Roedel, engaged in antisemitic acts and violence against the Jewish population and limited the access of ghetto residents to illicit food supplies. Local police officials desecrated the Jewish cemetery, ordering the removal of its headstones for the construction of a walkway and a patio at the Gendarmerie post in the pre-war Catholic parish rectory. Some eyewitnesses later attested that the local Gendarmes gathered daily "to hunt Jews on the ghetto's streets." Officers Gatzke, an ethnic German from Silesia, and Lentz gained reputations as "notorious Jew hunters," who "competed over the number they killed."⁴ As the German police unleashed random violence, they also curtailed efforts by some local Christians to supplement the ghetto's food resources. On June 15, 1942, the Germans halted the most regular of these actions, biweekly deliveries of carts of potatoes from Sobienie Szlacheckie, the estate of Sobienie Jeziory's original founder. They arrested the estate's owner, widow Countess Zofia Jezierska, and her fiancé Michał Jaczyński.⁵

Under these conditions, starvation and illness became widespread among the Jews by the summer of 1942. A young Christian observer, who crossed regularly into the ghetto to play with a Jewish school friend, reported that by mid-1942 the ghetto's streets were "littered with living corpses of bone," dying of starvation and typhus. In his opinion, hunger and disease claimed the lives of between 15 and 20 ghetto residents daily. Official post-World War II court documentation sets the figure a bit lower, claiming that between 4 and 15 residents perished each day in the ghetto.⁶

The Judenrat responded by organizing social relief. It established a hospital to accommodate the sick. It also distributed free daily dinners in a small community kitchen. The Judenrat, though, appears to have been unable to raise levies or even secure some form of loan from the town's Jews to finance an expansion of social services. At the end of March 1941, for instance, the community kitchen could provide meals for no more than 700 residents, whereas the Judenrat saw a need to offer 1,000 such meals. In a funding request that month to the American Jewish Joint Distribution Committee (AJDC) for an expanded kitchen facility, Friedsohn explained that his village's poverty made it impossible to consider taxing the town's Jewish inhabitants. The transfer of some of the Jews to the Wilga forced labor camp, on the outskirts of Sobienie Jeziory, did reduce the number of hungry mouths in the town. But when 8 men perished there from beatings at the end of April 1941, the Judenrat communicated with an underground commission of doctors from the Warsaw ghetto, investigating conditions in forced labor camps in the region.⁷

An unknown, though relatively large, number of Jews responded to starvation either by moving to other ghettos or by leaving temporarily in search for food. In mid-1941, Jacob Epstein, an arrival from the Warsaw ghetto, quickly realized that conditions in Sobienie Jeziory—with its vigilant police force seemingly oblivious to bribes and its starving population—could not sustain the illicit activities had helped him survive in Warsaw. After just two days in the town, he arranged a pass, through his uncle, chair of the Judenrat, to stay with an aunt in Garwolin, about 22 kilometers (14 miles) east of Sobienie Jeziory.⁸ A larger portion of Sobienie Jeziory's residents who left the ghetto appear to have done so temporarily and more illicitly, usually at night, with some risking denunciation by knocking on the doors of the town's Christians to ask for food.⁹

Efforts to seek food outside the ghetto sparked violent German police reprisals and ultimately had consequences for the treatment of Jews found living outside of ghettos in the Warsaw region as a whole. In a December 22, 1941, letter to Dr. Jan Wielikowski, Warsaw-based adviser for the JSS, Friedsohn explained that "day after day" in Sobienie Jeziory "the Germans shoot Jews for having left the ghetto." Friedsohn inquired about whether the JSS could intervene with the local police in Sobienie Jeziory so that in the future the Germans would notify the town's Judenrat of the names of the Jews they had killed and where they had buried them.¹⁰ German officials apparently exploited Friedsohn's letter to escalate violence against Jews living outside ghettos throughout the Warsaw region. On January 9, 1942, Heinz Auerswald, from April 1941 to November 1942, the commissioner for "Jewish residential districts" (ghettos) in Distrikt Warschau, circulated Friedsohn's letter as part of a longer memo in which he demanded police officials throughout the Distrikt take "effective action" against Jews found outside the ghettos.¹¹

As Friedsohn's note indicates, in Sobienie Jeziory local police rigidly enforced the shoot-to-kill orders that applied to Jews found outside of ghettos from the end of 1941. Although the list is far from complete, Poland's Institute of National Memory has documented more than 110 cases in which German police in Sobienie Jeziory murdered Jews for being outside the ghetto. In the largest single incident, village police officials executed more than 25 Jews from the ghetto in Otwock, 22.5 kilometers (14 miles) to the north, found hidden in underbrush outside of Sobienie Jeziory. The remaining documented executions tend to be of individuals caught searching for food beyond the ghetto's confines. Police from the local Gendarmerie, for instance, executed 4 men and 3 women in the Jewish cemetery at the end of 1941. They killed another 5 Jews—2 of them women—in the first half of 1942. In August 1942, the Germans shot 50 more Jews, including a pregnant woman, for being outside the ghetto without permission.¹²

The liquidation of Sobienie Jeziory's ghetto occurred on Sunday, September 27, 1942. At dawn, German SS surrounded the town. Police from the Gendarmerie, again supported by the SS, ordered the entire ghetto population to the main square at 9:00 A.M. Those who refused to comply were shot in their homes. At the square, one of the policemen explained that the town's Jews were to be sent to Ukraine "to work the land." The police next collected the Jews' money and valuables. The old and infirm were then placed on wagons. From the town square, the Jews were marched to the train station in Pilawa. Guards brutally beat them along the way. Those who were unable to keep up with the column were shot, "with the entire path of the march strewn with corpses." At the Pilawa railway station, the Germans shot Judenrat chair Friedsohn in the midst of a farewell speech "full of dramatic overtones." Sobienie Jeziory's Jews were then loaded into trains and sent to the Treblinka extermination camp.¹³

After the ghetto's liquidation, members of the police searched for and killed Jews they found remaining in the town. In the first week, they executed at least 25 more Jews, including 11 members of the family of Wigdor Kleiman, a pre-war store owner, and 4 abandoned children. As late as January 1943, the police were still uncovering survivors in fields adjoining the village. In November 1943, a fire of suspicious origins destroyed the former ghetto. Still unknown is whether the fire was set by German police trying to root out Jewish escapees, by Poles looting the empty ghetto, or accidentally by Jews still in hiding.¹⁴

No more than 20 of Sobienie Jeziory's Jews are thought to have survived the war. Jacob Epstein, who had come from Garwolin, survived the liquidation of the region's ghettos at the home of an ethnic German on a nearby farm. Bolesław Wójcik, another Jew from Sobienie Jeziory, hid with the Polish Legat family, residents of Pilawa.¹⁵ Abram and Felicia Gwiazda, a married couple, survived the war in Sobienie Jeziory hidden by the Grzędas, local Polish farmers. In 1941, Felicia gave birth to another survivor, their daughter, who was rescued by the family of her Polish midwife. Monko's son Mieczysław also interceded after the war to reunite the child with her parents.¹⁶ A sixth survivor, also an infant when she was surrendered by her mother to a local Polish woman, was not reunited with her family until almost 60 years after the war's conclusion. Because her parents had both perished in the Holocaust, the Polish family who had rescued the child refused to return her to a surviving aunt, Aliza Kuperman-Nachmany.

Inspired by her mother's determination to find the girl, Kuperman-Nachmany's daughter Emmunah ultimately reunited the family.¹⁷

SOURCES The largest number of eyewitness testimonies remain in the private possession of Father Jerzy Marion Cygan, who recorded them for his book Dzieje parafii Sobienie Jeziory (Biała Podlaska, 2001).

Documentation on Sobienie Jeziory's ghetto can be found in the following archives: AŻIH (210/641, 211/978, 301/5490); USHMM (Acc.1997.A.0124 [JSS], reel 47, 211/978; RG-15.019M [ASG], reel 18, 61 [Warsaw woj.], 59, pp. 1–2; Acc.1999.A.0154 [AŻIH, AJDC], 210/641; and RG-15.079M, reel 3, Ring I/25, reel 14, I/409, and reel 22, Ring I/546); VHF (# 14342, 18718, 30190, and 43653); and YVA.

Edward Kopówka and Laura Crago

NOTES

1. See T. Berenstein et al., eds., Eksterminacja Żydów na ziemiach polskich w okresie okupacji hitlerowskiej. Zbiór dokumentów (Warsaw: ŻIH, 1957), pp. 100–102 (in German) and p. 106 (in Polish trans.).

2. Czesław Pilichowski et al., eds., Obozy hitlerowskie na ziemiach polskich 1939–1945: Informator encyklopedyczny (Warsaw: PWN, 1979), p. 461; and USHMM, Acc.1997.A.0124 (JSS), reel 47, 211/978, “Korespondencja Prezydium ŻSS z Delegaturą ŻSS w Sobieniach Jeziorach,” pp. 1–4.

3. See T. Berenstein, “Deportacja i zagłada skupisk żydowskich w dystrykcie warszawskich,” BŻIH, no. 1 (1952): 118–119. The high figure of 9,380 people comes from the 1945 questionnaire on ghettos filled out by regional administrators in Poland. This questionnaire lists the “average” number of ghetto residents in Sobienie Jeziory as 4,453 people; see USHMM, RG-15.019M (ASG), reel 18, 61 (Warsaw woj.), 59 (Sobienie Jeziory), pp. 1–2. The 3,680 population figure is cited in Yitzhak Arad, Belzec, Sobibor, Treblinka: The Operation Reinhard Death Camps (Bloomington: Indiana University Press, 1987), p. 392.

4. USHMM, RG-15.019M (ASG), reel 18, 61/59, p. 1; Maja Jaszewska, “Trzecie pokolenie sprawiedliwych,” Tygodnik Powszechny, July 27, 2003; Cygan, Dzieje parafii, p. 231.

5. Anna Poray, “Polish Righteous” (unpub. MSS, PALC).

6. H. Kowalczyk, “Wspomnienia” (unpub. MSS, PAEK), pp. 4–5; and USHMM, RG-15.019M (ASG), reel 18, 61/59, p. 1.

7. USHMM, RG-15.019M (ASG), reel 18, 61/59, p. 1; Acc.1999.A.0154 (AJDC), 210/641 (Sobienie Jeziory), pp. 1–5; RG-15.079M, reel 14, Ring I/409, “A barikht fun a lager in Sobin,” and reel 3, Ring I/26, “Relacja—wyciągi z protokołów oględzin lekarskich i zeznań w sprawie bicia i rozstrzeliwania więźniów w obozach pracy przymusowej: Piekło, Nakło, Wilga, Garwolin, Mordy, Łąki, Stok Ruski, Drewnica, Sobienie-Jeziory, Kałuszyn, Roztok,” p. 14.

8. VHF, # 14342, testimony of Jacob Epstein. See also USHMM, RG-15.079M, reel 22, Ring I/546.

9. Examples of individual Christian material aid to Jews who sought food outside the ghetto can be found in A. Mońka-Staniakowa, “Tajne nauczanie w Sobieniach Jeziorach,” Szkice podlaskie (1996): 102; and Cygan, Dzieje parafii, pp. 231–233.

10. The document can be found under the heading “Komisarz dzielnic żydowskiej w Warszawie, Auerswald, do sta-rostów powiatowych o sankcjach karnych wobec Żydów za opuszczanie gett,” in Berenstein et al., eds., Eksterminacja Żydów, pp. 124–125.

11. Ibid., p. 124 (in Polish) and p. 125 (in German).

12. Rejestr miejsc i faktów zbrodni popełnionych przez okupanta hitlerowskiego na ziemiach polskich w latach 1939–1943: województwo siedleckie (Warsaw: GKBZHP, 1985), pp. 250–254. The execution of the Otwock escapees is covered also in J. Lempkowski, “Ród (wspomnienia)” (unpub. MSS, PAEK), pp. 219–220.

13. Kowalczyk, “Wspomnienia,” p. 5; Cygan, Dzieje parafii, p. 233; Mońka-Staniakowa, “Tajne nauczanie,” p. 102; B. Wójcik, “Wspomnienia lat wojny i konspiracji” (unpub. MSS, PAEK, 1973), pp. 12–13; Lempkowski, “Ród,” pp. 219–220; AŻIH, 301/5490, testimony of Drożdżasz Sura, p. 1; and USHMM, RG-15.019M (ASG), reel 18, 61/59, p. 1.

14. Rejestr miejsc, pp. 251, 254; Lempkowski, “Ród,” pp. 219–220; Cygan, Dzieje parafii, p. 233; and Mońka-Staniakowa, “Tajne nauczanie,” p. 103.

15. VHF, # 14342; and testimony of Mrs. Przychalska (Sobienie Jeziory: unpub. testimonies in the possession of Jerzy Marion Cygan). According to Przychalska, Wójcik assumed the surname of his Polish rescuers and served as head of Wilga powiat after the war.

16. Mieczysław Monko identifies the village in which he, his wife, and his mother saved the child as Sobienie Jeziory, in VHF, # 43653, testimony of Mieczysław Monko. The town is not specified in the entry in Israel Gutman and Sara Bender, eds., The Encyclopedia of the Righteous among the Nations: Rescuers of Jews during the Holocaust, vol. 2, Poland (Jerusalem: Yad Vashem, 2004), pt. 1, p. 526.

17. Kuperman-Nachmany immigrated to Israel after the war but returned regularly to Poland, with her daughter, in an unsuccessful search for her niece. The Nachmanys' story is retold in Aleksander Klugman, “Podwójna ofiara polskich Sprawiedliwych,” Więź, no. 7 (July 2007): 58–59; and presented in a larger historical context of the war and immediate post-war periods by Emmunah Nachmany-Gafney, Levavot hat-suyim: Hotsaat yeladim Yehudim mi-bate Notsrim be-Folan le-ahar ba-Sho'ah (Jerusalem: Yad Vashem, 2005).

SOBOLEW

Pre-1939: Sobolew, village, Warsaw województwo, Poland; 1939–1944: Kreis Garwolin, Distrikt Warschau, Generalgouvernement; post-1998: województwo mazowieckie, Poland

Sobolew is located 18 kilometers (11 miles) south of Garwolin and 71 kilometers (44 miles) southeast of Warsaw. At the start of World War II, approximately 840 Jews were living in Sobolew, making up more than half of the village's population.

Sobolew was occupied by the Germans on September 17, 1939. Very early on in the occupation of the town, the Jews of Sobolew were summoned to the train station to hear an address from the local SS commandant in which he insulted and threatened them and stated that all of Sobolew's Jews would be dead before the Soviets would arrive to save them.¹ Following the speech, the Germans humiliated 3 esteemed Jews by chasing them through town and keeping them locked up for 10 days in a stable. Soon afterwards, a curfew was imposed on the Jewish residents of Sobolew, who were forbidden to be on the street after 6:00 P.M. Near the end of 1939, a 12-member Jewish Council (Judenrat) was established under the leadership of Yisrael Farber, which was responsible mainly for providing the Germans with laborers. The laborers broke stones on the road between Lublin and Warsaw and cleared away snow, among other activities.² The Judenrat included 5 Jewish policemen.

A young woman wears an armband in the Sobolew ghetto, December 1942.

USHMM WS #23230, COURTESY OF KALMAN HOROWITZ

During the war, Sobolew's Jewish population grew to roughly 1,600 people, approximately 600 of whom were refugees from other towns.³ A group of over 100 Jewish families deported from Maciejowice to Sobolew on October 23, 1940,⁴ formed the largest group of refugees in the village. A letter from November 4, 1940, described the difficult conditions facing the new arrivals: "Their situation is simply desperate. They're being accommodated in attics, they're living five to six families per room. We're at a loss since all of our local aid sources have been exhausted. We remain without clothing, without shoes, and without any possibility of getting even a small piece of bread."⁵ An aid committee operated in Sobolew under the auspices of the Jewish Council and was responsible for the care of approximately 500 individuals.⁶ The committee ran a soup kitchen and a clinic.

A ghetto was created in Sobolew in the course of 1941⁷ and may have been preceded by an open ghetto established in the fall of 1940. The ghetto housed approximately 2,000 individuals, including many Jews from nearby towns, and saw at least one outbreak of typhus.⁸ Pesakh Kuperman reports that he was able to leave the ghetto at night to sell his possessions to local Poles and to buy potatoes, flour, and bread.⁹ Moyshe Grinkorn relates that Poles smuggled bread and other food into the ghetto to sell to Jews who could afford to buy such items.¹⁰ In the summer of 1942, 17 Jews were caught while trying to cross the border of the ghetto. On the orders of Dr. Freudenthal, the head of Kreis Garwolin, the 17 fugitives were executed.¹¹ During the German occupation, an estimated 150 Jews and Poles from Sobolew and surrounding localities were executed in Sobolew and their corpses buried in a mass grave in a nearby forest.¹²

The deportation of Jews from Kreis Garwolin began in September 1942, at which time Sobolew, as the only town in the immediate area with a railway link, became a collection and transportation center. Jews from ghettos in the vicinity were brought to Sobolew and then loaded onto trains headed for the Treblinka extermination camp. Halina Cymbrowicz (née Gedanken) relates that Jews from her hometown of Żelechów were either taken by cart or, if they were able, forced to travel by foot to Sobolew.¹³ Between September 27 and 30, Jews who had been brought to Sobolew from the ghettos in Parysów, Łaskarzew, Stoczek Łukowski, and Żelechów were herded into freight cars and taken to the Treblinka extermination camp. The deportees were ordered to hand over their gold, money, and other valuables and were informed through an interpreter that noncompliance would be punished by death. As they were being loaded into the cars, "they were bludgeoned and beaten with sticks for so long that the last four didn't make it in. The doors were then closed from the outside. Barbed wire had been affixed to the upper windows beforehand."¹⁴ The liquidation of the Sobolew ghetto itself followed in October 1942, with its inhabitants likewise sent to Treblinka. It was approximately at this time as well that Jewish labor units in and around Sobolew were liquidated. Some of the prisoners who made up the labor units were killed on the spot; some were sent to Treblinka.¹⁵

In October–November 1942, following the liquidation of the ghetto, a separate remnant ghetto was established in Sobolew as a "collection point" in a German attempt to coax the remaining Jews in the area out of their hiding places. The German authorities announced that Jews who came to the ghetto would be able to live and work as normal. Estera Borensztain, a native of Sobolew hiding in the countryside at the time, returned with her mother and two younger brothers to the re-established ghetto, where they lived together with two other families in a single room: "[T]his did not, however, last very long."¹⁶ The second ghetto was liquidated in January 1943, at which time a "selection" was made: the elderly were killed immediately, while the young and able-bodied were loaded onto railcars and transported to Treblinka.

SOURCES Extensive information on Sobolew and its inhabitants before and during World War II can be found in the personal testimonies of Sobolew natives in the yizkor book, Mosheh Levani, ed., Sefer Laskazshev un Sobolev (Paris: Di Gezelshaft Laskazshev-Sobolev in Frankraykh, 1960).

The book by Barbara Engelking, Jacek Leociak, and Dariusz Libionka, eds., Prowincja noc: Życie i zagłada Żydów w dystrykcie warszawskim (Warsaw: Wydawnictwo IFiS PAN, 2007), contains information on Sobolew, pp. 52–53, 59–60, 68–69, 168, 206, 214.

Further information on Sobolew can also be found in Tatiana Berenstein, “Deportacje i zagłada skupisk żydowskich w dystrykcie warszawskim,” BŻIH, no. 1 (1952); and Guy Miron, ed., The Yad Vashem Encyclopedia of the Ghettos during the Holocaust, vol. 2 (Jerusalem: Yad Vashem, 2009), pp. 732–733.

Documentation regarding the fate of the Jews of Sobolew under German occupation can be found in the following archival collections: AŻIH (210/28, 30 [AJDC]; 211/980 [JSS]; 301/2989, 5820 [Relacje]; 310/A; Ring I/851); BA-L (B 162/6820, 6822, 6876); and IPN (163/18 sygn. 42 and sygn. 61 [ASG]).

Stephen Scala

NOTES

1. See multiple accounts in Levani, Sefer Laskazshev un Sobolev.
2. IPN, 163/18, sygn. 61, Kwestionariusz o obozach.
3. AŻIH, 210/28 (AJDC), Wykaz miejscowości Komitetów Pomocy, sprawozdanie z działalności V–XII 1940 r.
4. Ibid., 210/30 (AJDC), Dystrykt warszawski, różne wykazy, b.d.
5. Ibid.
6. Ibid.
7. The date named in various sources ranges from February to December 1941.
8. IPN, 163/18, sygn. 61, Kwestionariusz o obozach.
9. Pesakh Kuperman, “Mayne iberlebungen in di gehenem-tsaytn,” in Levani, Sefer Laskazshev un Sobolev, pp. 563–569.
10. Moyshe Grinkorn, “A sobolever yid ratevet zikh,” in Levani, Sefer Laskazshev un Sobolev, pp. 574–598.
11. BA-L, B 162/6820, p. 62.
12. IPN, 163/18 sygn. 42, Kwestionariusz o egzekucjach masowych i grobach masowych.
13. AŻIH, 301/5820, testimony of Halina Cymbrowicz.
14. BA-L, B 162/6822, pp. 10 ff, testimony of Stanisław W., November 13, 1967.
15. Ibid., B 162/6876, p. 562.
16. AŻIH, 301/2989, testimony of Estera Borensztain.

SOCHACZEW

Pre-1939: Sochaczew (Yiddish: Sokhatshev), town, Warsaw województwo, Poland; 1939–1944: center of Kreis Sochaczew Distrikt Warschau, Generalgouvernement; post-1998: województwo mazowieckie, Poland

Sochaczew is located 56 kilometers (35 miles) west of Warsaw. The Jewish population of the town was 2,419 (48 percent) in 1921. On the eve of World War II, the Jewish population numbered about 4,000.

As awareness of the impending invasion and German occupation increased, local Poles affixed crosses and icons to their houses. During the first week of the war, before the German army reached Sochaczew, many Jews fled eastward towards Warsaw and beyond. About 200 made it into areas occupied by the Soviets after September 17, 1939, enabling many of them to survive the war. Sochaczew was the center of bitter fighting from September 9 to 17, 1939, in the Battle of the Bzura, as the Germans encountered stiffening resistance near Warsaw. Once the town was secured, the first victims of the occupation were elderly and sick Jews, pulled from their houses by German soldiers and murdered in cold blood. About 100 houses belonging to Jews who had fled were set on fire. At the end of September, during the festival of the Sukkot holiday, several hundred Hasidic Jews were forced onto the streets, harassed, beaten, and made to dance to the music of a band. Their beards and side locks were cut off. As the battles subsided, many who had fled returned to Sochaczew. They found their homes occupied by Poles or burned to the ground. They were forced to find shelter in cellars, attics, and storage sheds. In January 1940, 400 refugees from other towns arrived and were taken in by the Jews of Sochaczew.¹

A local ethnic German (Volksdeutscher), Julian Prouze, was appointed mayor of the town. An auxiliary police force (Sonderdienst) was recruited to assist him. Jews were kidnapped for forced labor on a daily basis. They were put to work rebuilding the damaged bridge over the Bzura River, digging canals, draining marshes, and clearing the rubble of bombed buildings (including the 700-year-old church). Some were sent to fortify an airfield at Bielice, using gravestones stolen from the Jewish cemetery. Mayor Prouze also made a profit by selling the bricks from damaged Jewish houses.² In January 1940, Prouze announced the creation of an 18-member Judenrat, drawn from a list of prominent local figures. The chairman was a merchant, Yaakov Biederman. A Jewish police unit was also established, headed by Menashe Knott.³ The Judenrat was ordered to organize the daily work assignments, but anyone who could pay 1 złoty a day to the Judenrat was left off the work roster. Tensions within the Judenrat led Biederman to resign and be replaced by Yitzhak Gelbstein, a tailor who had ingratiated himself with the Germans. Under his leadership the Judenrat extorted valuables from the Jews, supposedly to bribe the authorities, but allegedly much ended up in their own pockets.⁴

One night in January 1941, the Sonderdienst conducted a search of Jewish houses. They took whatever they wanted and beat the Jews brutally. They also arrested two Jews, Aharon Zelig Marienfeld and Aryeh Szmec. According to one account, Szmec and Marienfeld had worked together with local ethnic Germans in trading on the black market. The German police now tortured and murdered them, as they knew too much. At dawn, the German authorities ordered the Judenrat to bury their mutilated corpses in the Jewish cemetery.⁵

By mid-January 1941, plans were made to establish a ghetto in Sochaczew, following the establishment of a ghetto in Żyrardów in mid-December 1940. Since it would be too small for the entire population, about 900 Jews were rounded up and, on January 18, 1941, sent to the Żyrardów ghetto.⁶ The Jews living in the villages of Kreis Sochaczew were also instructed by Kreishauptmann Pott to move to the ghetto in Żyrardów at this time.⁷ In Sochaczew, those who could pay the Judenrat were allowed to remain. On the next day they were resettled into the ghetto. Each person was permitted to bring along only 3 kilograms (6.6 pounds) of personal possessions.⁸ Jewish houses outside the ghetto area were burned. On January 24, the ghetto area was slightly enlarged and then enclosed with a high barbed-wire fence. It was guarded by German police on the outside and by Jewish Police within. Poles were also strictly forbidden to enter the ghetto, which covered the areas of Staszic, Toruńska, and Farnej Streets, as well as Kościuszko Square. The narrow confines of the ghetto caused overcrowding, with five people to a room and every available space put to use—storage sheds, attics, and cellars. Food was scarce and hunger widespread. The American Jewish Joint Distribution Committee (AJDC) operated a free kitchen, which provided one warm meal a day to about half of the ghetto inhabitants. The AJDC also distributed packages of clothing, food, and money.⁹

On January 31, 1941, the German authorities informed the remaining Jews that soon the ghetto would be liquidated and that they were forbidden to leave the ghetto area. The date scheduled for the expulsion from the Sochaczew ghetto was February 15–16, 1941.¹⁰ At that time, the Germans instructed all the remaining Jews in Sochaczew, about 1,800 people, to move to the Warsaw ghetto. They were permitted to take with them 25 kilograms (55 pounds) of luggage and food for two days. A few, including the Judenrat leaders and their families, were transported on wagons. The rest went on foot. In the ensuing confusion the captain of the Jewish Police, Menashe Knott, was shot by Priwer, the Gestapo commander, after a quarrel about boots that were ordered but not delivered.¹¹ In his report for February 1941, Kreishauptmann Pott noted that the Jewish real estate properties were being registered.¹²

Julian Prouze demanded that 150 Jews be brought back from Warsaw as laborers. All but 21 were sent back when the work was finished. Those who stayed worked a little longer and then were taken to the nearby forest and murdered. A number of Jews who escaped during the expulsions tried to hide in smaller towns or in the countryside. Many were children who wandered about in search of food and shelter. A bounty of liquor or sugar was offered to anyone who caught or turned in a Jew. Pits were dug in the Jewish cemetery, where they threw the bodies of those who were caught and killed. Only very few survived.¹³ The fate of the Jews sent from Sochaczew to Warsaw was the same as the others in the capital city.

The accounts in the yizkor book mention two non-Jews who sought to protect the Jews during the early months of the occupation. They were a pharmacist, Jan Silwa, who helped some to hide, and the daughter of the butcher, Balcarska, who used her influence with the German commander, Blashchik, to ease some of the restrictive conditions.¹⁴

A handful of survivors returned to Sochaczew after the war to erect a memorial on the grounds of the cemetery.

SOURCES The yizkor book, edited by A.S. Stein and Gavriel Weisman, Pinkas Sochaczew (Jerusalem: Former Residents of Sochaczew in Israel, 1962) in Hebrew and Yiddish, contains a number of personal accounts by survivors from the town. There is also a short article on the Jewish community of Sochaczew in Abraham Wein, ed., Pinkas ha-kehillot. Encyclopaedia of Jewish Communities: Poland, vol. 4, Warsaw and Its Region (Jerusalem: Yad Vashem, 1989), pp. 311–318. The book by Paweł Fijałkowski, Żydzi sochaczewscy (Sochaczew: Muzeum Ziemi Sochaczewskiej i Pola Bitwy nad Bzurą, 1989), has information on the ghetto on pages 22–23 and also contains a very brief summary in English. Additional information on the ghetto can also be found in the BŻIH, no. 1 (1952); 85, 115–116; and in Czesław Pilichowski et al., eds., Obozy hitlerowskie na ziemiach polskich 1939–1945: Informator encyklopedyczny (Warsaw: PWN, 1979), p. 462.

Documentation regarding the fate of the Jews of Sochaczew under German occupation can be found in the following archives: AŻIH (e.g., Ring I/352, 914); BA-BL (R 52III/29); IPN; USHMM (e.g., RG-14.025M; RG-15.019M; RG-15.079M [Ring I]; RG-50.120*0140); VHF; and YVA.

Samuel Fishman and Martin Dean

NOTES

1. Stein and Weisman, Pinkas Sochaczew, p. 729.
2. USHMM, RG-15.079M (AŻIH), Ring I/914.
3. Stein and Weisman, Pinkas Sochaczew, p. 730.
4. Ibid., p. 478.
5. Ibid., p. 414; USHMM, RG-15.079M (AŻIH), Ring I/914.
6. Mardechai V. Bernshteyn, ed., Pinkes Zshirardov, Amshinov un Viskit: Yizker-bukh tsu der gesbikhte fun di kebiles . . . (Buenos Aires: Dilandlayt-faraynen in Amerike, Yisroel, Frankraykh, Argentine, 1961), p. 454, mentions the arrival of 900 Jewish refugees from Sochaczew at this time.
7. Gazeta Żydowska, no. 11, February 7, 1941.
8. Stein and Weisman, Pinkas Sochaczew, p. 730. According to another account by Chaim Weisz, “Dates to Remember,” from the same book, pp. 450–451, an “open ghetto” was established on November 1, 1941, and the Jews were expelled to Żyrardów on November 15, 1941. Most sources, however, seem to support the dating of these events in January and February 1941.
9. Stein and Weisman, Pinkas Sochaczew, p. 731.
10. USHMM, RG-15.079M (AŻIH), Ring I/352, Kreishauptmann Sochaczew-Blonie, order concerning the clearing of the Kreis of Jews, January 31, 1941; RG-50.120*0140, Oral History interview with Zeev Sheinvald, May 20, 1993, tape IV, confirms the deportation took place on February 15, 1941.
11. Ibid., RG-15.079M (AŻIH), Ring I/352; Stein and Weisman, Pinkas Sochaczew, pp. 732, 744.
12. USHMM, RG-14.025M (BA-BL), R 52III/29, p. 95, Kreishauptmann Sochaczew-Blonie, monthly report for February 1941.
13. Stein and Weisman, Pinkas Sochaczew, p. 733.
14. Ibid., p. 730.

SOKOŁÓW PODLASKI

Pre-1939: Sokołów Podlaski, town, initially Lublin województwo (later Warsaw województwo) Poland; 1939–1944: Sokolow, Kreis center, Distrikt Warschau, Generalgouvernement; post-1998: Sokołów Podlaski, województwo mazowieckie, Poland

Sokołów Podlaski is located 102 kilometers (about 63 miles) east-northeast of Warsaw. The town was home to nearly 6,000 Jews on the eve of World War II.¹

In the first weeks of World War II, German military operations inflicted significant damage on the town, particularly on its Jewish community. On September 7, 1939, German airplanes bombarded Długa Street, killing seven or eight people. On Thursday, September 7, a larger German attack destroyed part of the town's center, killing many people, primarily Jews living on Mały Rynek, Rogowski, and Piękna Streets.

The Germans retreated from the town in the third week of September, and the Red Army briefly took over Sokołów Podlaski on September 27. A new Soviet-German agreement, however, soon returned Sokołów to German hegemony. About

1,000 of the town's Jews evacuated with the Red Army. Throughout 1940, Jews continued to cross the Bug River illegally.²

The German military returned to Sokołów on October 11, 1939, and embarked on a series of antisemitic attacks. German soldiers harassed Jews, cutting off their beards with knives. When groups of Polish youth also beat several Jews, the Germans arrested the offenders and sentenced them to six months in jail.³ German soldiers conducted numerous seizures of property in Jewish stores in November 1939, forcing many to close down.⁴ German soldiers also arbitrarily conscripted Jews for labor.⁵

German civil administrators continued in the footsteps of their military predecessors. Landrat Friedrich Schultz was appointed Kreishauptmann for Kreis Sokolow on November 11, 1939. A week later, he ordered Sokołów's mayor to arrest 15 prominent Jews and demanded the Jewish community pay a ransom of 15,000 złoty. After succeeding Schultz on June 10, 1940, the new Kreishauptmann, Reichslandwirtschaftsrat Ernst Grams, ordered city officials to dismantle the town's largest Jewish cemetery.⁶

At the end of November 1939, the town's mayor ordered the creation of a Jewish Council (Judenrat). Its first chairman, Chaim Jakob Szpadel, died soon after being nominated. Nuchym Lewin then became the Judenrat's chair. The Judenrat's labor office was headed by Icko Szlachme and Kalman Rosen. The Judenrat also created a Jewish police force, composed of about 30 officers. It was headed first by Josel Rozenswaig and later by Schwartzbard. The police also established a Jewish jail in the Bet Midrash, mainly to incarcerate those who did not pay dues demanded by the Judenrat.⁷

With the formation of the Judenrat, the Germans demanded a series of payments from Sokołów Podlaski's Jewish community. These included another contribution of 80,000 złoty in December 1939 and a third payment in January 1940 of 100,000 złoty. To secure money for these payments, the Judenrat ordered that men pay monthly dues, ranging from 700 up to 1,200 złoty.⁸

From mid-1940, the Germans undertook a series of measures that gradually established an open ghetto in Sokołów Podlaski. In the fall of 1940, to create a separate Christian neighborhood for German officials, Grams ordered the expulsion of Jews from pre-war Christian neighborhoods. Jews who lived and worked there were moved onto two streets surrounding the main synagogue, in the center of town, where most Jews had lived before the war. The order initiated the period of the so-called open ghetto. Jews were still allowed to move freely about the town, but they could not live or operate stores in Sokołów Podlaski's Christian neighborhoods. Christians who lived in the so-called Jewish neighborhood were not expelled from it.⁹

In the last days of July 1941, or perhaps on August 1, the Germans created a closed ghetto in Sokołów Podlaski. Because the town's pre-war Jewish neighborhood contained Długa Street, a major northwest-to-southeast thoroughfare connecting the town's two main non-Jewish neighborhoods, German plans might have called originally for the expulsion of Jews from a large part of the pre-war Jewish neighborhood and their concentration in only one of the neighborhoods divided by the street. Negotiations between the Judenrat and German officials and another round of bribes supposedly forestalled these German plans.¹⁰ Instead, to make Długa Street accessible to non-Jewish traffic, the Germans created two ghettos in Sokołów Podlaski, one of which ran east of Długa Street and the other west of the same street to the Cetynia River. The houses on both sides of Długa Street were enclosed behind barbed wire. Jews who resided in homes there were ordered to brick over windows and doors facing that street. In both ghettos, roads that formerly had intersected with Długa Street were blocked off by 3-meter-high (almost 10-foot-high) brick walls, topped with shards of broken glass.

Jewish survivors watch as Poles exhume a mass grave in Sokołów Podlaski, 1945.

USHMM WS #15077, COURTESY OF HYMAN KAWER

The first ghetto, located on a large part of the western side of the pre-war Jewish neighborhood, formed a rough diamond-like shape territorially. Its extreme eastern edge was bounded by Długa Street and one side of Siedlecka Street. Its western edge was at the intersection of Bóźnicza Street and the eastern side of Winnice Street. This ghetto contained five additional streets: Szeroka, Nowa, Niecała, Szkolna, and Próżna Streets. The entrance to this first ghetto was on Bóźnicza Street. The town's second, or eastern ghetto, roughly followed the streets found within it. These included Długa, Szewski Rynek, a part of Wilczyński, Krótka, Piękna, and Przechodnia Streets. It also included Mały Rynek Street. The entrance to this second ghetto was at the intersection of Szewski Rynek and Wilczyński Streets. This ghetto was surrounded mostly by barbed wire, with a wooden fence erected around its southernmost tip. Residents could cross between the two ghettos through a passageway in the Bet Midrash, which also housed the ghetto's jail.

Jews could leave the two ghettos only with special permission. A few Poles who continued to live in the ghetto were issued special passes. Otherwise, Poles also were forbidden from entering the ghetto. Under the control of Dr. Hermann, from the Kreishauptmann's office, the ghetto was heavily guarded. Barriers were erected in front of the entrances to both ghettos. Polish (Blue) Police and German Gendarmes guarded the exterior of the ghettos' gates. Jewish policemen guarded the ghetto internally, including the passage between the two ghettos.¹¹

In September 1941, 5,080 Jews were confined to the ghetto.¹² These numbers included 684 Jews who had settled in Sokołów Podlaski by December 29, 1939, and an additional 915 Jews who had arrived there before June 1, 1940. The majority of these new arrivals had been forcibly expelled by the Germans from Kalisz, Pułtusk, Kałuszyn, and Aleksandrów Łódzki.¹³ In November 1941, the Germans also began ordering 316 Jews from villages and agricultural settlements located east and south of Sokołów Podlaski, including from Kudelczyn, Korczew, Repki, Wyrozęby, and Kowiesy, to move to the ghetto. This transfer was to be completed by December 15, 1941.¹⁴

The Judenrat faced great difficulties in finding homes for these expellees. By September 1941, rooms in the ghetto housed an average of six people.¹⁵ As the ghetto was established around the Jewish neighborhood, most Jewish businesses continued to operate, with only a handful, including a bakery, being forced to close preexisting facilities and reopen in the ghetto. Children were sent to illicit schools, some with classes in Hebrew, others in Polish.¹⁶

Forced labor became more structured with the ghetto's closure. Six hundred residents left the ghetto daily to work at a number of Luftwaffe facilities. Another 200 Jews, employed as craftsmen at these facilities, lived there.¹⁷ In the summer and fall of 1941, town officials also conscripted 50 Jewish workers to construct walkways in the town using headstones from the Jewish cemetery on Bóźnicza Street. Another team of conscripts worked to level the cemetery.¹⁸

From the fall of 1941, an increasing number of ghetto residents, ultimately several hundred, were assigned to water irrigation work at two forced labor camps near Korczew, the first located in Szczeglacin and the second in Bartków Nowy. Initially the workers reported only for monthlong stints, receiving 10 złoty per day for their families. A supplementary bread ration was also paid for by the Judenrat from fees paid by people to be exempted from forced labor.¹⁹

The ghetto's closure nonetheless provoked unemployment, particularly among craftsmen. Two hundred tailors and 400 shoemakers lost their former Polish clientele. In September 1941, these craftsmen sought permission to establish cooperative workshops in the ghetto to fill orders from German firms and the Luftwaffe. However, the central authorities in Distrikt Warschau denied their request, and no workshops were ever established inside the ghetto.²⁰

Draconian food distribution and rationing policies pursued by Kreishauptmann Grams provoked hunger within weeks of the ghetto's closure. Because Grams had constricted deliveries of vegetables to the ghetto to 10 cartloads daily, the Judenrat could not supply ghetto residents with their full rations. Equally disconcerting was Grams's refusal in September 1941 to make available winter food rations to either Jews or Poles. Nor were the Judenrat's charity institutions able to respond to the crisis. Unable to afford to purchase food at market rates, the Judenrat's community kitchen did not reopen. Charity assistance to orphans and children continued but was circumscribed, with only orphans being fed daily. Grams did agree in late September 1941 to allow the Judenrat to bring 30 carts of vegetables daily into the ghetto and also authorized the release of food to Jewish charity organizations. But these promises were too little, too late. Large parts of the promised food remained in government and Judenrat storehouses as the onset of winter made roads impassible, preventing deliveries to the ghetto.²¹

As these policies combined to provoke hunger and a typhus epidemic in the fall and winter of 1941, scores of Jews began leaving the ghetto illicitly in search of food. A few Poles threw food items over the ghetto fence. Others agreed to receive packages sent by Jewish family members living abroad.²² Far more frequently, store owners and traders sneaked out with light industrial goods to trade for food to stock the ghetto's stores. They relied on bribes and payments—to Jewish, Polish, and German police—to get out and back into the ghetto safely. Unable to afford bribes, Jewish craftsmen took more risks when engaging in barter, as the penalty for leaving the ghetto was death. In the fall of 1941, for instance, Gendarme Edward Poppe shot a Jewish shoemaker for being outside the ghetto.²³

The Judenrat's inability to provide basic social services, its increasing corruption, and its insistence on filling forced labor quotas made it appear increasingly complicit to many ghetto residents. In the spring of 1942, Jews called up for work in the Szczegłacin labor camp discovered that the Judenrat had cut supplemental bread rations to 200 grams (7 ounces) and had opened a special store only for Judenrat employees. Feeling betrayed, the conscripts assigned to the camp refused to assemble. The Jewish Police went from house to house, beating those participating in the protest.²⁴ In December 1941, moreover, the Judenrat had assigned 15 young workers to labor duties at the Treblinka labor camp, located just 34 kilometers (21 miles) north of Sokołów Podlaski. About half of them perished at the camp. When most of the survivors returned home as invalids, wounded by frostbite, it seemed unthinkable that the Judenrat would continue to draft workers for labor assignments there. Then, in early June, workers from Sokołów Podlaski were called up to construct the Treblinka extermination camp. The men sent there failed to return home.²⁵

By the summer of 1942, the ghetto's Jews, fearing a larger roundup, began formulating strategies to avoid deportation to Treblinka. A number started building hiding places in their homes. Others either paid the Judenrat premiums to secure agricultural work or voluntarily signed up for work at Szczegłacin, believing it was safer than remaining in the ghetto.²⁶ On August 24, 1942, posters appeared in the ghetto containing orders, signed by Grams, limiting entry there to registered residents and voiding all Jewish travel passes.²⁷ Some ghetto residents opted to remain at the estates where they had been working, and others decided to surrender their children to Polish Christians.²⁸

The extermination of Sokołów Podlaski's Jews began early on September 22. That day, local German police and security forces (Gestapo and Kripo), an auxiliary SS Ukrainian detachment, and Polish (Blue) Police surrounded the ghetto. As elsewhere in Kreis Sokolow, the roundup of the ghetto's Jews was bloody, because many residents—about 2,000 out of 6,000 people—did not assemble at the market square, choosing instead to hide. In the searches that followed, between 1,500 and 2,000 Jews found in hiding places were shot. The Germans selected between 100 and 120 Jews from those at the square to form a postliquidation labor force. The remainder of the town's Jews, between 4,000 and 5,000 people, were marched to the train station and deported to the Treblinka extermination camp.²⁹

The Germans exterminated the surviving remnants of Sokołów Podlaski's Jewish community over the next two months. Six days after the ghetto's liquidation, German officers rounded up Jews who worked and lived at the town's military facilities, with only those who labored at the military hospital escaping death. That same evening, on September 26, 1942, the head of the Distrikt Warschau Sonderkommando shot 4 members of the Judenrat, including its chair, Lewin.³⁰ The Germans liquidated the two forced labor camps in Szczegłacin and at Bartków Nowy on October 22, 1942. The Jews conscripted there at the time of the liquidation were shot and buried in a mass grave.³¹ Those Jews who worked at Sokołów's German military hospital were shot on November 7.³² Before the end of November, the Germans assembled the about 100 Jews from the ghetto's postliquidation labor force and shot almost all of them. A few surviving members of the Judenrat and of the Jewish Police are thought to have been sent to the Treblinka labor camp. The last remaining groups of Jewish forced laborers from Sokołów were murdered in March 1943.³³ In March 1944, a Sonderkommando 1005 unit exhumed the bodies of the Jews killed in Sokołów Podlaski during the ghetto's liquidation. They were transported to Węgrów and burned there in a makeshift crematorium.³⁴

Not more than 50 of the ghetto's residents are thought to have survived the ghetto's liquidation. Two of them, Reuven Rozenberg and Anszel (Antshel) Fabiarz, had joined the partisans operating in the forests outside of Sokołów.³⁵ Hersh Biderman, his young son, and two sisters were hidden by the Jaworski family, Biderman's pre-war friends.³⁶ The Pietraszko family, overseers of the Czekanów estate in Jabłonna Lacka civil parish, hid 16 Jews from the Sokołów ghetto, many of whom had been working in agriculture during the ghetto's liquidation.³⁷ Shaindla Lender, Golda Hochberg, and Perl Morgenshtern, who had survived the liquidation of the Szczegłacin forced labor camp, secured Polish work papers from Kazimierz Miłobędzki.³⁸

Sokołów Podlaski's Jewish community was not reconstituted. After several postwar incidents during the Polish Home Army's insurgency against the postwar Communist government, including the deaths of 10 Jews in Kosów Lacki, survivors began leaving the country, immigrating to France, Israel, Argentina, Nicaragua, and the United States.

SOURCES Published primary sources include memoirs by Marian Pietrzak, Sokołów Podlaski dawniej i dziś (Sokołów Podlaski: Czar-Media, 2002); and Zdzisław Rozbici, "To widziały oczy moje," in Wiktoria Liwowska, ed., Czarny rok . . . czarne lata (Warsaw: Stowarzyszenie Dzieci Holocaustu w Polsce, 1996). A number of yizkor books commemorate the town's Jewish past: Yoyvl-bukh: Gevidmet dem ondenken fun di kdoysbim un martirer fun Sokolov (New York: Di Sosayeti, 1946); Mayn borev shtetl Sokolov: Shilderungen, bilder un portretn fun a shtot umgekumene Yidn (Buenos Aires: Tsentral-Farband fun Poylishe Yidn in Argentine, 1946); In shotn fun Treblinka (kburbn Sokolov-Podliaski) (Tel Aviv: Irgun Yots'e Sokolov-Podliaski be-Yisrael, 1957); Sefer ha-zikaron. Sokolov-Podliask (Tel Aviv: Yots'e Sokolov-Podliask be-Yisrael, Sokolover Landsmanshaft in Amerike, 1962); as well as the account in Abraham Wein, Bracha Freundlich, and Wila Orbach, eds., Pinkas ha-kehillot. Encyclopaedia of Jewish Communities: Poland, vol. 7, Lublin and Kielce (Jerusalem: Yad Vashem, 1999), pp. 339–342, available in two different English translations in Arnon Rubin, ed., The Rise and Fall of Jewish Communities in Poland and Their Relics

Today, vol. 2, District Lublin (Tel Aviv: Tel Aviv University Press, 2007), pp. 260–264; and a second version online on the Jewishgen Web site at www.jewishgen.org/yizkor/pinkas_poland/pol7_00339.html.

Documentation on the Jewish community of Sokołów Podlaski during the Holocaust can be found at APSi; AŻIH (e.g., 301/1186, 301/2505, 301/3079, 301/3979, 301/4085, 301/4507); BA-L (e.g., B 162/6843); FVA (e.g., # HVT-2318); USHMM (e.g., Acc.1999.A.0154 [AJDC], 210/646; Acc.1997.A.0124 [ŻSS], reel 8, 211/129, pp. 40–47; RG-15.019M [ASG], reel 19, 45 [Warsaw woj.], 244 [Sokołów Podlaski]; Acc.1998.A.0017 [e.g., Aaron Elster Memoir]; and RG-50.488*0171 [e.g., Polish Witnesses to the Holocaust Project—Kazimierz Miłobędzki interview]); and VHF (e.g., # 08257, 10131, 23494).

Edward Kopówka and Laura Crago

NOTES

1. AŻIH, 301/3979, testimony of Szepsel Grynberg, p. 1 (typescript).
2. Ibid. See also VHF, # 08527, testimony of Aaron Elster; # 23494, testimony of Pearl (Morgenstern) Newman; and # 10131, testimony of Fay (Rothstein) Kief.
3. AŻIH, 301/4085, testimony of Josek (also Josef or Józef) Kopytko, pp. 10–12.
4. Ibid., 301/3979, p. 3.
5. Ibid., 301/4085, pp. 6–7.
6. Ibid., 301/3979, pp. 2–3; and Pietrzak, Sokołów, pp. 34–35.
7. “Sokołów Podlaski,” in Rubin, The Rise and Fall, vol. 2, p. 263; and AŻIH, 301/3979, pp. 2–5; and 301/4085, pp. 1–2.
8. AŻIH, 301/4085, pp. 7–8; 301/3979, p. 5; and VHF, # 10131.
9. The period of the so-called open ghetto is covered in “Sokołów Podlaski,” in Rubin, The Rise and Fall, vol. 2, p. 263; and Edward Kopówka, “Getto w Sokołowie Podlaskim,” Kwartalnik Historii Żydów, no. 3 (2005): 376–377.
10. AŻIH, 301/3979, pp. 3–4. This source states that the Germans later decreased the ghetto’s size several times.
11. Physical descriptions of the shape of the ghetto can be found in VHF, # 10131; AŻIH, 301/3979, pp. 3–4; 301/4085, pp. 50–51; Pietrzak, Sokołów, pp. 20–23; and Kopówka, “Getto,” pp. 376–377. Regarding the date of the ghetto’s enclosure, see USHMM, Acc.1997.A.0124, reel # 8, 211/129, p. 40.
12. USHMM, Acc.1997.A.0124, reel # 8, 211/129, p. 40.
13. T. Berenstein, “Deportacja i zagłada skupisk żydowskich w dystrykcie warszawskim,” BŻIH, no. 1 (1952): 124–125. See also USHMM, Acc.1999.A.0154, 210/646 (Sokołów Podlaski), pp. 1–13.
14. For the local deportations, see Tatiana Berenstein, et al., eds., Eksterminacja Żydów na ziemiach polskich w okresie okupacji hitlerowskiej. Zbiór dokumentów (Warsaw: ŻIH, 1957), p. 278 (in German) and p. 279 (in Polish); and APSi, Akta Miasta Węgrów, 46, Korespondencja ogólna. Rok 1941, Okólnik nr. 50 z dn. 9 grudnia 1941, signed by Dr. Hermann, p. 45.
15. USHMM, Acc.1997.A.0124, reel # 8, 211/129, p. 41.
16. VHF, # 10131; and Pietrzak, Sokołów, pp. 22–23.
17. USHMM, Acc.1997.A.0124, reel # 8, 211/129, pp. 40–41.
18. Pietrzak, Sokołów, pp. 34–35. See also AŻIH, 301/3979, p. 3.

19. USHMM, Acc.1997.A.0124, reel # 8, 211/129, p. 43. See also, for example, Edward Kopówka, “Obozy pracy przymusowej w Szczegłacinie i Bartkowie Nowym k. Siedlec,” Kwartalnik Historii Żydów, no. 4 (2002): 515–519.

20. USHMM, Acc.1997.A.0124, reel # 8, 211/129, pp. 41–44, 46.

21. Ibid., pp. 41–42, and reel # 45, 211/950 (Siedlce), pp. 13, 30–46.

22. On the typhus epidemic, see K. Witt, “Sokołów Podlaski w latach 1939–1950,” in Józef Kazimierski, ed., Dzieje Sokołowa Podlaskiego i jego regionu (Warsaw: PWN, 1982), p. 219. Christian assistance to Jews is covered in the eyewitness account by Zdzisław Rozbici, “To widziały oczy moje,” in Wiktoria Liwowska, ed., Czarny rok . . . czarne lata (Warsaw: Stowarzyszenie Dzieci Holocaustu w Polsce, 1996), p. 392.

23. Pietrzak, Sokołów, pp. 19–20; VHF, # 08257, and FVA, # HVT-2318, Irene B. Holocaust testimony.

24. AŻIH, 301/4085, pp. 13–14.

25. Ibid., pp. 4, 50; and 301/1186, testimony of Szmul Miedziński, pp. 1–3.

26. VHF, # 08257; # 23494; and FVA, # HVT-2318. See also AŻIH, 301/2505, testimony of Józef Kopytko, p. 1 (Polish typescript).

27. APSi, 48, Zbiór afiszów okupacyjnych pow. Sokołów Podlaski.

28. VHF, # 08257; FVA, # HVT-2318; and AŻIH, 301/4085, pp. 22–23.

29. Eyewitness accounts of the liquidation of Sokołów Podlaski’s ghetto include AŻIH, 301/4085, pp. 22–49, 53; 301/3979, p. 5; 301/4507, testimony of Alek Hamburger, pp. 1–4; USHMM, Acc.1998.A.0017, Aaron Elster memoir, pp. 2–3; VHF, # 08257; # 10131; BA-L, B 162/6843, Deposition of Smicha P., March 13, 1962, p. 24, and Deposition of Szabtaj G., March 28, 1962, p. 32; and Rozbici, “To widziały,” pp. 393–394. See, as well, USHMM, RG-15.019M, (ASG), reel 19, 45/244, pp. 1–2.

30. AŻIH, 301/3979, p. 4; VHF, # 10131; and the controversial memoir, parts of which have been republished in Józef Górski, “Na przełomie dziejów,” Zagłada Żydów. Studia i materiały, no. 2 (2006): 288–291.

31. AŻIH, 301/4085, pp. 39–40; and VHF, # 23494.

32. AŻIH, 301/4507, p. 2.

33. For brief discussions of the fates of Jews in the postliquidation ghetto, see VHF, # 08257; # 23494; USHMM, Acc.1998.A.0017, p. 4; and FVA, # HVT-2318.

34. Pietrzak, Sokołów, pp. 42–43, 45–46.

35. “Sokołów Podlaski,” in Rubin, The Rise and Fall, vol. 2, p. 264; and AŻIH, 301/3079, testimony of Abraham (or Antshel) Fabiarz, pp. 6–8 (typescript).

36. VHF, # 08257; USHMM, Acc.1998.A.0017, pp. 3–4; and Israel Gutman and Sara Bender, eds., The Encyclopedia of the Righteous among the Nations: Rescuers of Jews during the Holocaust, vol. 2, Poland, 2 pts. (Jerusalem: Yad Vashem, 2004), pt. 1, pp. 309–310. See also VHF, # 10131.

37. AŻIH, 301/4085, pp. 75–114.

38. For Miłobędzki, see USHMM, RG-50.488*0171, Polish Witnesses to the Holocaust Project, testimony of Kazimierz Miłobędzki; VHF, # 23494; Joanna Lenart, “Sprawiedliwy z Sokołowa,” Przegląd, no. 48 (102) (November 26, 2001): 30–31; and Gutman and Bender, The Encyclopedia of the Righteous, vol. 2, pt. 1, pp. 518–519, and pp. 83–84, for Bednarz.

STANISŁAWÓW (MAZOWIECKI)

Pre-1939: Stanisławów, village, Warsaw województwo, Poland; 1939–1944: Stanisławów, Kreis Minsk Mazowiecki, Distrikt Warschau, Generalgouvernement; post-1998: Stanisławów, województwo mazowieckie, Poland

Stanisławów is located 12 kilometers (7.5 miles) north of Mińsk Mazowiecki. According to the 1921 census, there were 495 Jews living in Stanisławów, representing approximately one quarter of the village population.

In May 1940, the self-help committee, which was affiliated with the Jewish Council (Judenrat), reported the arrival of several refugee families from Tłuszcz and Warsaw. The committee opened a soup kitchen, which, due to financial problems, closed soon afterwards.

That same month, the Judenrat dismissed three non-Judenrat members of the committee (A. Miodowski, I. Żółty, and M. Berger), “due to misunderstandings existing between members of the committee.” The trio was replaced by Benjamin Kaufman, Rafał Stokowski, and Chaim Płatkiewicz, all of whom were members of the Judenrat. Menachem Gelbard chaired the committee. Other members of the committee included Jankiel Warszawski (deputy), Pejsach Jakubowski, and Szlama Zylbernagel. The last four committee members were likely Judenrat members as well; Gelbard was possibly the Judenrat chairman.¹

The existence of a ghetto in Stanisławów is mentioned for the first time in a German report of March 3, 1942, on the concentration of Jews in Kreis Minsk Mazowiecki, which states that in November 1941, 32 Jews from Glinianki and 33 from Dęby Wielkie “were resettled to a Jewish quarter in Stanisławów.”² Secondary sources report that there were either 400 or 700 Jews assembled in the Stanisławów ghetto.

There are no details available about life in the ghetto. Its survivors do not mention any physical enclosure or penalty for leaving it—for example, the memoir of Brandla Bronka Siekierkowa (Siekierka). Three members of the Siekierka family, who reached Stanisławów at the beginning of September 1942, never refer to it as a ghetto but describe it as a place where Jews were concentrated after the liquidation of the ghettos in Mińsk Mazowiecki and other nearby towns: “The Germans announced to all corners that in Stanisławów the Jews will remain alive, [and therefore] they should come out of their hiding places, that they will get a job, and will be able to live.”³

In the first part of September 1942, approximately 500 Jews from the nearby Dobrze ghetto were ordered to be transferred to Stanisławów. Sonia Powronzek described the living conditions there upon her arrival: “There was a terrible crush in Stanisławów because the Jews from surrounding towns and villages were deported there. Several families shared two rooms.”⁴ A number of the ghetto residents were selected for labor at the Rokman (or Rekman) Company in Siedlce, where they worked on the railway tracks.⁵

The liquidation of the Stanisławów ghetto was unannounced; nonetheless, as Mojsze Siekierka testified, the Jews sensed it coming after laborers were released by the Rokman Company. The town was surrounded at night by the German Gendarmerie and Polish (Blue) Police. The Siekierka family, whose house bordered the Aryan side, managed to flee after being warned by a Pole.⁶

A number of the ghetto survivors (e.g., Brandla Siekierkowa, Fala Róża, and Berek Róża) date the liquidation on the first day of the Sukkot holiday, September 25, 1942. It was on that day that the community was deported to the Treblinka extermination camp.⁷

SOURCES The fate of the Jews of Stanisławów during the Holocaust is mentioned briefly in Czesław Pilichowski et al., eds., Obozy hitlerowskie na ziemiach polskich 1939–1945: Informator encyklopedyczny (Warsaw: PWN, 1979), p. 467; and Barbara Engelking, “Życie codzienne Żydów w miasteczkach dystryktu warszawskiego,” in Barbara Engelking, Jacek Leociak, and Dariusz Libionka, eds., Prowincja noc: Życie i zagłada Żydów w dystrykcie warszawskim (Warsaw: Wydawnictwo IFiS PAN, 2007), pp. 215–216.

The following archival sources were used to prepare this entry: AŻIH (210/651 [AJDC]; 211/987 [JSS]; 301/3338, 301/3681, 301/4098, 301/4380, 301/5108 [Relacje]; 302/123 [Pamiętniki]); and USHMM (Acc.1997.A.0124 [AŻIH, JSS]; Acc.1999.A.0154 [AŻIH, AJDC]; RG-02.208 [AŻIH, Pamiętniki]; RG-15.084 [AŻIH, Relacje]).

Jolanta Kraemer

NOTES

1. USHMM, Acc.1999.A.0154 (AJDC), 210/651 (Stanisławów), pp. 1, 3–4.
2. T. Berenstein, A. Eisenbach, and A. Rutkowski, eds., Eksterminacja Żydów na ziemiach polskich w okresie okupacji hitlerowskiej: Zbiór dokumentów (Warsaw: ŻIH, 1957), Document 145, pp. 278–279.
3. AŻIH, 302/123 (Pamiętniki), Brandla Bronka Siekierkowa (Siekierka), III zeszyt, pp. 47–56; 301/4098 (Relacje), testimony of Mojsze Siekierka, 1949; 301/3681 (Relacje), Władysław Siekierka, 1948.
4. Ibid., 301/3338 (Relacje), testimony of Stanisław Słomkowski aka Dawid Słoń, 1948; and 301/4380 (Relacje), testimony of Sonia Powronzek, 1949 (note that Powronzek testified that there was no ghetto in Dobrze).
5. Ibid., 301/4098.
6. Ibid.; 301/3338; 301/3681; 302/123; and 301/4158, testimony of Brandla Siekierka, 1949.
7. Ibid., 301/5108 (Relacje), testimony of Fala Róża and Berek Róża, undated; 302/123; 301/4158.

STERDYŃ

Pre-1939: Sterdyń (Yiddish: Sterdin or Esterdin), village, initially Lublin województwo (later Warsaw województwo) Poland; 1939–1944: Sterdyn, Kreis Sokolow, Distrikt Warschau, Generalgouvernement; post-1998: Sterdyń, województwo mazowieckie, Poland

Sterdyń (or Sterdyń-Osada, as it was formally known) is located 21 kilometers (13 miles) north of Sokołów Podlaski and

9.7 kilometers (6 miles) east of Kosów Lacki. On the eve of World War II, 686 Jews lived in Sterdyń. They comprised 87.5 percent of the village population.¹

The Germans occupied Sterdyń on September 14, 1939, the evening of Rosh Hashanah. They immediately began breaking into the town's Jewish stores to rob them of their merchandise. German military authorities also closed the village's synagogue. The German occupation left the village without its rabbi. In Otwock at a sanitarium caring for his dying father when the war broke out, Rabbi Morgenstern did not return to Sterdyń after the Germans closed its synagogue. Instead, he moved to Warsaw, probably to attend to his father's burial. In November 1939, the Germans ordered Sterdyń's Jews to nominate a Judenrat. The six- to eight-person Judenrat, composed of the Jewish community's elders, included Shaja Winograd. The Judenrat created a 10- to 12-member Jewish police force, led by Trębacz.²

During the war, voluntary and forced Jewish migration doubled Sterdyń's Jewish community. In September and November 1939, many families with ties to Sterdyń flocked there from larger cities, including Warsaw, believing it would be easier in wartime to find food in a small agricultural village. During the winter of 1939–1940, the Germans forcibly deported to Sterdyń about 800 Jews, mostly from Kalisz.³ In December 1941 and January 1942, the Germans expelled to Sterdyń another 103 Jews from the nearby civil parish of Jabłonna Lacka and from the settlement at Chruszczewka.⁴ The Judenrat found housing for the refugees. In January 1940, it also provided more than 300 subsidized meals and organized a shoe drive for them.⁵

The Germans also ordered the Judenrat to fill regular forced labor quotas. The village's Jews were conscripted for agricultural labor at several nearby estates expropriated by the Germans. Some also worked draining swamps in Łęki.⁶

Appointed Kreishauptmann Sokolow, Reichslandwirtschaftsrat Ernst Grams, on June 10, 1940, created an open ghetto in Sterdyń. From January 1941, Jews living there were forbidden to leave the village without special permission. Grams appears to have intended for the ghetto to be enclosed. In a February 1, 1941, report, he stated that Sterdyń was one of six places in his county in which Jews had been concentrated and promised to close the ghettos in all of these places as soon as weather permitted.⁷ Grams never implemented this plan fully. In Sterdyń, the ghetto remained unfenced, with Jews there confined to the village.⁸

Forewarned by local Poles several days before Yom Kippur 1942 about German plans to liquidate Sterdyń's ghetto, the Judenrat announced the impending liquidation of their community on September 22. About 700 of the village's 1,200 Jews found hiding places in forests, villages, and estates surrounding Sterdyń. When the Germans arrived the next morning to liquidate the ghetto, they found only 500 of the village's Jews there. Those who did not seek shelter were marched, on foot by some accounts, to their deaths at the Treblinka extermination camp, located 26.3 kilometers (16 miles) northwest of Sterdyń. Over the next two days, the Germans extricated between 270 and 300 Jews from hiding places. These Jews were shot in Sterdyń and buried in a mass grave there.⁹

Beginning in the winter of 1942–1943, the Germans embarked on a series of measures to find Jews from Sterdyń still in hiding. To discern where Jews were sheltered, the Germans planted at least one agent in the forest surrounding part of the town. Based on his information, the Germans began rounding up and executing Jews who had survived the ghetto's liquidation. In March and April 1943, for instance, the Germans murdered 1 Jewish woman and 3 Jewish children. In the autumn, German Gendarmes executed 40 Jewish men, women, and children.¹⁰ The Germans simultaneously took punitive measures against Poles known to be hiding Jews from Sterdyń. The best documented of these reprisal Aktions was on February 24, 1943, at the Paulinów estate just south of Sterdyń. There the Germans shot 10 Poles suspected of providing food and shelter to Jews from Sterdyń.¹¹ From March 25 to April 23, 1943, the Germans executed as many as 47 other Poles and may have arrested 140 others suspected of rendering assistance to Sterdyń's Jews.¹² These reprisals, coupled as they were with similar punitive actions in Sądowne, near the Łochów and Stoczek Węgrowski ghettos, provoked many Polish villagers to renege on promises of assistance they had extended to Sterdyń's Jews. Following the reprisals, some Poles purportedly murdered Jews they had agreed initially to protect.¹³

Under these conditions, fewer than 30 of Sterdyń's Jews survived the war. These included Regina "Rivka" Rosenberg, born in Wyszaków, whose family had moved in with the family of her uncle and aunt in Sterdyń at the end of September 1939. Also counted among the survivors are 5 members of Zila Fuchs's family, escapees of the ghetto at Kosów Lacki, who sought shelter in their pre-war village of Nowe Mersy, 2.5 kilometers (1.5 miles) northwest of Sterdyń, with the family of Erazm "Razek" Augustyniak, a former employee of Zila's father.¹⁴ Twenty partisans led by Pinchas Lerman, from Sterdyń, survived the war in the nearby forest. This group also included escapees from the August 1943 Treblinka uprising.¹⁵

Sterdyń's Jewish community was not reconstituted after the war. About 20 survivors gathered initially in the home of Rosenberg's uncle in Sterdyń. They dispersed within a month of liberation in August 1944, moving to other towns, before leaving Poland mainly for Israel and the United States.

SOURCES A number of important published sources are available, including "Sterdyń Sokołowski," Gazeta Żydowska, no. 14, February 18, 1941, p. 7; Abraham Wein, Bracha Freundlich, and Wila Orbach, eds., Pinkas ha-kehillot. Encyclopaedia of Jewish Communities: Poland, vol. 7, Lublin and Kielce (Jerusalem: Yad Vashem, 1999), p. 350, available in English translation in Arnon Rubin, ed., The Rise and Fall of Jewish Communities in Poland and Their Relics Today, vol. 2, District Lublin (Tel Aviv: Tel Aviv University Press, 2007), pp. 264–265; and Zila Fuks, Ze'akot lelo kol (Tel Aviv: I.L. Peretz Publishing, 1988), a chapter of which appears in English translation as "Life in Hiding: Razek's Barn. An Excerpt from Silent Screams," in Esther Fuchs, ed., Women and the Holocaust: Narrative and Representa- tion (Lanham, MD: University of America Press, 1999), pp. 127–134.

Documentary evidence for the Jewish community of Sterdyń during the Holocaust can be found at AŻIH (e.g., 301/4174 and 4771); USHMM (e.g., RG-15.019M [ASG, reel 13, vol. 44, pp. 736–737]; RG-15.084 [Relacje]); and VHF (e.g., # 33494, 41841).

Laura Crago

NOTES

1. AŻIH, 301/4174, testimony of Abraham Sukno, pp. 1–2.
2. Ibid.; VHF, # 33494, testimony of Perl (Morgenstern) Newman; # 41841, testimony of Regina “Rivka” Rosenberg.
3. AŻIH, 301/4174, pp. 2–3, 6; and VHF, # 41841.
4. See T. Berenstein et al., eds., Eksterminacja Żydów na ziemiach polskich w okresie okupacji hitlerowskiej: Zbiór dokumentów (Warsaw: ŻIH, 1957), p. 278 (in German) and p. 279 (in Polish).
5. “Sterdyń Sokołowski,” p. 7.
6. AŻIH, 301/4174, pp. 3–4; and VHF, # 41841.
7. On the creation of six regional concentration points for the Jews in Kreis Sokolow, see Document # 45 in Berenstein et al., Eksterminacja Żydów, p. 108. This report also includes mention of the provisions that prohibited Jews from leaving the towns to which they had been confined.
8. VHF, # 41841.
9. Ibid.; AŻIH, 301/4174, pp. 8–9; and USHMM, RG-15.019M (ASG), reel # 13, vol. 44 (Warsaw woj.), pp. 736–737 (Sterdyń-Osada). The postwar Polish court documentation for Sterdyń claims that between September 23 and 24, 1942, the Germans murdered 393 Jews, Poles, and Soviet POWs in and around Sterdyń-Osada. However, some of the Poles and Soviet POWs probably were murdered in subsequent German punitive actions. The figure cited here for the number of Jews killed in Sterdyń during the ghetto liquidation comes from AŻIH documentation.
10. Rejestr miejsc i faktów zbrodni popełnionych przez okupanta hitlerowskiego na ziemiach polskich w latach 1939–1945: Województwo siedleckie (Warsaw: GKBZHWp, 1985), p. 268.
11. More information on the Paulinów pacification is provided in Waclaw Piekarski, Obwód Armii Krajowej Sokółów Podlaski ‘Sęp’ Proso, 1930–1944 (Warsaw, 1991), pp. 26–27; the article in the nationalist Głos Pracy, May 13, 1943 (no. 20), reprinted in Paweł Szapiro, ed., Wojna żydowsko-niemiecka. Polska prasa konspiracyjna 1943–1944 o powstaniu w getcie Warszawy (London: Aneks, 1992), p. 163; Waclaw Zajaczkowski, Martyrs of Charity, vol. 1 (Washington, DC: St. Maximilian Kolbe Foundation, 1987), pp. 199–200, 228; and The Main Commission for the Investigation of Crimes against the Polish Nation, IPN, and the Polish Society for the Righteous Among Nations, Those Who Helped. Polish Rescuers during the Holocaust, 2 pts. (Warsaw, 1996), pt. 2, pp. 79, 102, 124–125.
12. The figure of 47 is from Mariusz Bechta, Rewolucja—mit-bandytyzm (Warsaw and Biała Podlaska, 2000), p. 83; and Piekarski, Obwód, p. 37. See also Zajaczkowski, Martyrs of Charity, p. 228.
13. VHF, # 41841.
14. Fuks, “Life in Hiding: Razek’s Barn,” pp. 127–134; and Israel Gutman and Sara Bender, eds., The Encyclopedia of the Righteous among the Nations: Rescuers of Jews during the Holocaust, vol. 2, Poland, 2 pts. (Jerusalem: Yad Vashem, 2004), pt. 1, pp. 61–62. Also useful is the account by Fuchs’s daughter Esther Fuchs, “Exile, Daughterhood, and Writing. Representing the Shoah as a Personal Memory,” in Ronit Lentin, ed., Re-presenting the Shoah for the Twenty-First Century (New York: Berghahn Books, 2004), pp. 253–268.

15. AŻIH, 301/4771, testimony of Pinchas Lerman, pp. 1–3. See also Shmuel Krakowski, The War of the Doomed. Jewish Armed Resistance in Poland, 1942–1944 (New York: Holmes & Meier Publishers, 1984), p. 244.

STOCZEK ŁUKOWSKI

Pre-1939: Stoczek Łukowski, town, Lublin województwo, Poland; 1939–1944: Stoczek Łukowski, Kreis Garwolin, Distrikt Warschau, Generalgouvernement; post-1998: Stoczek Łukowski, Lublin województwo, Poland

Stoczek Łukowski is located about 75 kilometers (47 miles) southeast of Warsaw, on the Świder River. In 1939, the population figure was 4,118, with around 60 percent being Jews.

Stoczek felt the first effects of the war as early as September 10, 1939, when the Germans began bombing the town. With the arrival of the Wehrmacht two days later, a catastrophic fire broke out in which 80 percent of the predominantly wooden buildings, including the synagogue, burned to the ground. In the following two years, these structures were replaced by barrackslike buildings.¹

One of the first steps taken by the new holders of power was to change the administrative affiliation of the town; previously part of the Lublin województwo, it now was assigned to Kreis Garwolin within Distrikt Warschau.² Until April 1941, the Kreishauptmann—and therefore the person with local responsibility for Jewish policy in the first years of the war—was Dr. Hans Klein. He was succeeded by Dr. Carl Freudenthal, who was notable for his especially radical policy regarding the local inhabitants.³

The burned-out Jewish quarter in Stoczek Łukowski, after September 12, 1939.

USHMM WS #49699, COURTESY OF TOM SALMON

In the very first months of the occupation, the Jews were subjected to persecution by the National Socialists, including not only registration but also seizure of assets and robbery. In addition, a curfew was introduced.⁴ In 1939, there were about 2,200 Jews living in Stoczek, and by November 1940 that number had declined to 1,956, as many took flight, mainly heading eastward towards the Soviet-occupied regions of Poland. At the same time, there were already 225 Jewish expellees living in the town, most of whom had been forced out of the neighboring village of Prawda and were compelled to resettle resulting from an Aktion that took place on December 13, 1940.⁵ Even in late January 1941, the figure of approximately 2,000 Jews in Stoczek still remained valid.⁶ Because the Nazi holders of power sought to concentrate the Jewish population still further, however, new refugees from other places in Kreis Garwolin soon arrived. By July 1941, the number of Jews in Stoczek had risen to 2,450, and in April 1942, it reached 2,950⁷ (by other estimates, 3,300), around 15 percent of all the Jews in Kreis Garwolin.⁸

In the fall of 1940, the Jews in Stoczek were moved into an open, unfenced ghetto; they were not allowed to leave this area, however.⁹ More precise information regarding the date on which the ghetto was established is not available, as is quite frequently the case in Distrikt Warschau.¹⁰ Nonetheless, certain particulars of Jewish life under the occupation can be provided. For example, it is known that the Judenrat, which was created by the Germans in late 1939 or early 1940, soon set up a Jewish social welfare relief committee, which organized distributions of goods to 600 needy people, thanks to support from the American Jewish Joint Distribution Committee (AJDC), and also issued 500 daily food rations through a distribution office.¹¹

The relief committee was headed by Aron Heller, the chairman of the Judenrat, a 60-year-old businessman who had played a role in Stoczek's public life as a juror before the war.¹² Heller also represented Stoczek as the official Jewish Social Self-Help (JSS) delegate in Kreis Garwolin, where he was assisted by Wolf Tykociński. At the municipal level, the JSS committee, which also organized special collections in winter, included other Judenrat members as well: Heller's deputy, Szmuel Nachtlaifer, who was a shoemaker, and the trader Lejb Perkal and baker Majer Szulim Goldschmidt, who had been town councilmen in Stoczek before the war and thus were among the local notables.¹³

Stoczek Łukowski was the first ghetto in Kreis Garwolin to be liquidated in the course of Aktion Reinhard. Around September 18, 1942, the Jews, in a brutal Aktion, were driven on foot by German, Ukrainian, and Polish policemen and SS units towards the ghetto of Parysów, a good 20 kilometers (12.5 miles) to the west. Around 200 of them were shot before leaving Stoczek or along the route of their march. From Parysów, a few days later, the Germans deported the Jews to the Treblinka extermination camp.¹⁴

SOURCES Relevant facts and sparse details on Stoczek can be found in Barbara Engelking, Jacek Leociak, and Dariusz

Libionka, eds., Prowincja noc: Życie i zagłada Żydów w dystrykcie warszawskim (Warsaw: Wydawnictwo IFiS PAN, 2007), and T. Berenstein, "Deportacje i zagłada skupisk Żydowskich w dystrykcie warszawskim," BŻIH, no. 3 (1952): 83–125. Further information, based on survivor testimonies at Yad Vashem, is available in Arnon Rubin, The Rise and Fall of the Jewish Communities in Poland and Their Relics Today, vol. 2, District Lublin (Tel Aviv: Tel Aviv University Press, 2007). A book on the town's history widely ignores its Jewish inhabitants: Adam Budzyński and Józef Filipczuk, Stoczek Łukowski. Z dziejów miasta (Stoczek Łukowski: Towarzystwo Przyjaciół Stoczka, 1996), but it is useful for a general assessment.

Documentation regarding the fate of the Jews of Stoczek can be found in the following archives: AŻIH (210/28, 211/399); BA-L (B 162/6816); USHMM (Acc.1999.A.0154 [AJDC]; Acc.1997.A.0124 [JSS]); and YVA (O-3 and O-93; O-4/334).

Stephan Lehnstaedt
trans. Kathleen Luft

NOTES

1. See Budzyński and Filipczuk, Stoczek, p. 119 ff.
2. See Berenstein, "Deportacje," p. 84.
3. See Markus Roth, Herrenmenschen. Die deutschen Kreisbauptleute im besetzten Polen—Karrierewege, Herrschaftspraxis und Nachgeschichte (Göttingen, 2009), pp. 146, 442.
4. See Rubin, Rise, p. 266.
5. See Jacek Andrzej Młynarczyk, "'Akcja Reinhard' w gettach prowincjonalnych dystryktu warszawskiego 1942–1943," in Engelking, Leociak, and Libionka, Prowincja noc, pp. 39–74, here p. 59.
6. AŻIH, 211/399, letter from the Stoczek Judenrat to JSS Kraków, January 26, 1941.
7. See Berenstein, "Deportacje," p. 118.
8. See Barbara Engelking, "Życie codzienne Żydów w miasteczkach dystryktu warszawskiego," in Engelking, Leociak, and Libionka, Prowincja noc, pp. 119–221, here p. 214. On the total number in the Kreis, see AŻIH, 211/399, Letter from the Stoczek Judenrat to JSS Kraków, January 26, 1941.
9. Engelking, "Życie codzienne Żydów," p. 214.
10. Ibid., pp. 168–169.
11. AŻIH, 210/28, AJDC index of places for Distrikt Warschau, May–December 1940.
12. Ibid., 211/399, Correspondence between the JSS Kraków and the Judenrat in Stoczek Łukowski from October 1940 to February 15, 1941.
13. Ibid., List of candidates for the JSS elections in Garwolin, February 1941.
14. BA-L, B 162/6816, p. 21, statement of Jakob F., May 30, 1962, as cited in Młynarczyk, "'Akcja Reinhard,'" p. 60; Berenstein, "Deportacje," p. 118.

STOCZEK WĘGROWSKI

Pre-1939: Stoczek Węgrowski (Yiddish: Stok bey Vengrov), village, Warsaw województwo, Poland; 1939–1944: Stoczek-Węgrowski, Kreis Sokolow, Distrikt Warschau, Generalgouvernement; post-1998: Stoczek, województwo mazowieckie, Poland

Stoczek Węgrowski is located about 70 kilometers (44 miles) northeast of Warsaw. In 1921, there were 1,221 Jews living there out of a total population of 1,636.

On September 10, 1939, German forces bombarded the town, setting on fire the synagogue and destroying most of the houses. Many Jews fled into the fields in panic and on their return discovered that their homes and possessions were lost. The Germans first entered Stoczek a few days later but soon retreated under the terms of the Molotov-Ribbentrop Pact; then the town was briefly occupied by the Red Army in the second half of September. A number of young Jewish men exploited this opportunity and escaped across the Soviet border, before the Germans returned again about two weeks later, after the Nazi-Soviet agreement had been revised. Subsequently, Jewish refugees from all over Poland also came to the region, with the aim of crossing into the Soviet Union. However, border security was considerably tightened by 1940, causing some of the refugees to settle in Stoczek.¹

In the first weeks of the occupation, Germans, assisted by some local hooligans, looted what remained in Jewish homes and stores. By early in 1940, the German authorities had established a Jewish Council (Judenrat) and a Jewish police force to assist with the enforcement of anti-Jewish decrees and demands. At least one account in the yizkor book speaks bitterly of the behavior of the members of these institutions, as they sometimes arrested fellow Jews and also extracted onerous taxes from them. The account's author refuses to mention their names.²

In a February 1, 1941, report, the Kreishauptmann Sokolow, Reichslandwirtschaftsrat Ernst Grams, stated that Stoczek was one of six concentration points for Jews (Judenwohnbezirke) in the Kreis. He intended to enclose these ghettos as soon as the weather permitted. Any Jews remaining in the villages were to be moved to one of these six concentration points. From February 1941, the Germans forbade Jews from leaving the towns' boundaries.³ It seems, however, that Grams never implemented this plan fully. In Stoczek, as was the case also, for example, in Węgrów and Kosów Lacki, the ghetto remained open up until September 1942.

The testimony of Jewish survivors is fairly consistent on this point. Chaim Kwiatek maintains that no ghetto was established in Stoczek ("keyn geto is in shtot nit gewen"). At the same time he notes that Jews from surrounding villages, including from Osówno, Prostyn, Korytnica, Grębków, Grochów (phonetic: Gerech), and other places, were concentrated in Stoczek, although at some point this process of concentration ceased. This resulted in three or four families residing in each home. Due to this overcrowding, an epidemic of typhus broke out in which about 20 percent of the Jews died.⁴

Heim Tshekhanovietski recalls that when the Germans set up the ghettos in the towns, they said that Stoczek was too small to have a ghetto. The result was that the Jews of Stoczek had to pay a large sum of money to the relevant German officials to be allowed to remain in place. A condition of their remaining in Stoczek was that they were not allowed to leave the town. Any Jew caught outside Stoczek was shot.⁵

Finally, Ali Yankl Teytelbaym notes that no closed or sealed ghetto existed in Stoczek, but Jews who left the town were shot without warning. However, Poles were still able to come into town, and they traded with the Jews, although under these conditions, they were able to dictate the prices, as the Jews still hoped somehow to survive.⁶

In November 1941, the Germans ordered that 302 additional Jews relocate to the open ghetto in Stoczek, including those from the villages of Prostyn, Stara Wieś, and Miedzna. At the same time, another 269 Jews from Korytnica, Ossówno, Sinołęka, and Borze were concentrated in the open ghetto in Grębków.⁷ If Kwiatek's testimony is correct, it is possible that the Jews concentrated in Grębków were subsequently consolidated, in 1942, in Stoczek. (Unfortunately, no detailed information could be found concerning the ghetto in Grębków, and therefore no separate entry for it has been included in this volume.) According to Czesław Pilichowski and others, some 2,000 Jews were collected in the Stoczek ghetto altogether.⁸

On May 15, 1942, the Judenrat in Stoczek was ordered to provide 35 (according to one source, 135) men for forced labor construction work at the Treblinka extermination camp. The families of these men remained behind in Stoczek. Some contact remained with the Jews of Stoczek for several more weeks, as the Germans permitted deliveries of food and washed clothes to the laborers, which also enabled messages to be passed between the two groups. In this way quite detailed information about the killings in Treblinka became known to the Jews of Stoczek, which was also confirmed by Jews who had jumped from the trains or escaped from Treblinka and sought refuge in Stoczek.⁹

Among the last communications from Stoczek Węgrowski is a short letter dated September 4, 1942, which was sent to the Warsaw ghetto and has been preserved in the Ringelblum Archive.¹⁰ According to one survivor account, most of the remaining men from Stoczek were deported on or around September 11, either to Treblinka or to labor camps in the region, leaving behind mostly women and children.¹¹

The Germans liquidated the Stoczek ghetto on September 24–25, 1942. According to Pilichowski and colleagues, 188 Jews were shot in and around the town, and the remainder were sent to the Sadowne train station.¹² On September 25, 1942, a train, which was carrying Jews from the ghettos of Baczki and Łopianka (near Łochów), stopped at 3:30 p.m. in Sadowne to load Jews assembled there from Stoczek's ghetto. Once the train departed there at 4:48 p.m., several Jews opened one of the train wagons, about 10 minutes later. Scores were mowed down by armed guards as the Jews jumped from the train. At 5:37 p.m., the train carrying the remainder of the Jews of Łochów and Stoczek arrived at the Treblinka extermination camp. Stoczek Jews working at Treblinka learned of the murder of their women and children just a few hours after their arrival in the camp, as some last messages of farewell were passed on by other prisoners.¹³

As they were aware of their likely fate, a number of Jews from Stoczek avoided the final roundups by hiding in prepared bunkers in and around the town. However, intensive searches for Jews continued in the region for many more months, and some Jews were betrayed by local peasants, who were rewarded by the Germans with material goods for denouncing Jews in hiding. Only a few Jews from the Stoczek ghetto survived until the Germans were driven from the region by the Red Army in the summer of 1944.

SOURCES The yizkor book Pinkas Stok (bey Vengrov) (Buenos Aires: Residentes de Stok en la Argentina, 1974) contains several accounts concerning the wartime period. The existence of a ghetto in Stoczek Węgrowski is mentioned in the following secondary sources: Guy Miron, ed., The Yad Vashem Encyclopedia of the Ghettos during the Holocaust (Jerusalem: Yad Vashem, 2010), pp. 759–760; Czesław Pilichowski et al., eds., Obozy hitlerowskie na ziemiach polskich 1939–1945: Informator encyklopedyczny (Warsaw: PWN, 1979), p. 473; and Arnon Rubin, The Rise and Fall of the Jewish Communities in Poland and Their Relics Today, vol. 2, District Lublin (Tel Aviv: Tel Aviv University Press, 2007), pp. 266–268.

Published documents making reference to the ghetto or Jewish residential area in Stoczek include T. Berenstein et al., Eksterminacja Żydów na ziemiach polskich w okresie okupacji hitlerowskiej. Zbiór dokumentów (Warsaw: ŻIH, 1957), pp. 106, 278, 279.

Documentary sources on the Jews of Stoczek during the Holocaust can be found in the following archives: AŻIH (301/668; Ring II/275 and 295); BA-BL (R 52III/29); USHMM (RG-14.052 [BA-BL, R 52]; RG-15.079M [Ring]; RG-15.084 [Relacje]); VHF, #14739; and YVA.

Martin Dean

NOTES

1. Ch. Frabish-Vardi, “Shnot ha’milchamah 1939–1945 bestock,” in Pinkas Stok, pp. 402–411; Rubin, The Rise and Fall, vol. 2, District Lublin, pp. 266–268.

2. Ali Yankl Teytelbaym, “Epes fun di natsishe tseitn in Stok bes der milhomah,” in Pinkas Stok, pp. 436–437.

3. USHMM, RG-14.025M (BA-BL), R 52III/29, Lagebericht des Kreises Sokolow für den Monat Februar 1941, published in Berenstein et al., Eksterminacja Żydów, pp. 106–108.

4. AŻIH, 301/668, testimony of Chaim Kwiatek.

5. Heim Tshekhanovietski, “Fun Stok keyn Treblinke un di dervartete bafreyung,” in Pinkas Stok, p. 423.

6. Teytelbaym, “Epes fun di natsishe tseitn,” p. 437.

7. Berenstein et al., Eksterminacja Żydów, p. 278 (in German) and p. 279 (in Polish).

8. Pilichowski et al., Obozy hitlerowskie, p. 473.

9. Tshekhanovietski, “Fun Stok keyn Treblinke,” pp. 423–425. See also Pinkas Stok, pp. 432, 438, which both give the figure of 35 Jews; and AŻIH, Ring II/295, published in translation in Joseph Kermish, ed., To Live with Honor and Die with Honor!: Selected Documents from the Warsaw Ghetto Underground Archives “O.S.” (“Oneg Shabbath”) (Jerusalem: Yad Vashem, 1986), pp. 710–716.

10. AŻIH, Ring II/275.

11. Pinkas Stok, p. 438.

12. Pilichowski et al., Obozy hitlerowskie, p. 473.

13. See AŻIH, 301/4238, pp. 4–5; and VHF, # 14739. The train schedule for the Łochów and Stoczek deportations appears as Document # 46, under the heading “Rozkład jazdy z dnia 21.9.1942 r. pociągów transportowych do Treblinki,” in the document collection “Zagłada Żydów w obozach na ziemiach polskich,” Biuletyn Głównej Komisji Badania Zbrodni Hitlerowskich w Polsce 13 (1960): 105–106 (Polish translation) and p. 65 F (photograph of original German document); see also Pinkas Stok, p. 426.

TARCZYN

Pre-1939: Tarczyn (Yiddish: Tartchin), town, Warsaw województwo, Poland; 1939–1945: Kreis Grojec, Distrikt Warschau, Generalgouvernement; post-1998: województwo mazowieckie, Poland

Tarczyn is located about 30 kilometers (19 miles) south-southwest of Warsaw. According to the 1921 census, there were 1,457 Jews living in the town, comprising 56.5 percent of the total population.

As the German army approached Tarczyn, many Jews escaped to the east. Tarczyn was occupied in mid-September 1939. According to reports in the Ringelblum Archive, there was a major fire in Tarczyn in September 1939 at the time of the German occupation. In addition, there was a temporary expulsion of male Poles and Jews from Tarczyn at this time.¹ When the Generalgouvernement was set up by the Germans in late October 1939, Tarczyn became a part of Kreis Grojec. The Kreishauptmann was initially Regierungsrat Dr. Klein; in March 1940, he was replaced by Landrat Werner Zimmermann.

From the period 1939 to 1941, the German authorities introduced a series of anti-Jewish measures in Tarczyn. They confiscated Jewish property, ordered the Jews to wear distinguishing armbands, and registered the population. The Jews were also required to perform forced labor. The Germans appointed a Jewish Council (Judenrat), which assisted with the provision of forced laborers. Hundreds of Jews were requisitioned daily for building roads and cutting down trees.

In early 1940, there were 1,540 Jews residing in Tarczyn, including refugees. The Jewish community established an aid committee, which included L. Najberg and P. Higer, who ran the public kitchen. It received financial support from the American Jewish Joint Distribution Committee (AJDC). These funds were used to provide aid to at least 400 needy Jews in the town, including the operation of the soup kitchen. The kitchen was temporarily closed in the summer of 1940; it reopened again on August 18 but was closed again in mid-October.² There were about 60 refugees from other towns living in Tarczyn.

On December 6, 1940, the aid committee in Tarczyn reported to the AJDC in Kraków that currently “we were busy with establishing a Jewish quarter [open ghetto] in Tarczyn.”³ The ghetto was guarded by the Polish (Blue) Police. According to survivor Sylvia Kolski, her family exchanged their apartment with a Christian family who lived within the designated ghetto area. There was no wall or fence around the ghetto, but the Jews were not permitted to go to the Catholic side.⁴ Nonetheless, illegal trade continued with the local Polish population who supplied food to the ghetto in exchange for valuables and personal belongings.

On January 21, 1941, the Kreishauptmann in Grójec, Landrat Zimmermann, issued the following order: “All Jews living outside of the towns of Błędów, Tarczyn, Mogielnica, Góra Kalwaria, Warka, and Grójec are to transfer immediately to the closest of these towns, all of which were to be considered as ghettos. The heads of the respective settlements were made personally responsible for ensuring that by January 27, 1941, no Jews still were residing on their territory.” The order also stipulated that any Jew caught outside these ghettos after January 27, 1941, would face the death penalty.⁵

The Tarczyn ghetto was liquidated on February 28, 1941, when all the Jews—around 1,600 people—were resettled into the Warsaw ghetto.⁶ According to Henry Leshno, who was 15 years old at the time, the Germans announced beforehand that all the Jews were to move to Warsaw. They were able to take with them only their own personal belongings.⁷ From the ghetto in Warsaw, most of the Tarczyn Jews were deported in July through September 1942 to the Treblinka extermination camp.

Only a handful of Jews from Tarczyn managed to survive the German occupation, some of them being hidden in the homes of local Polish inhabitants. In the village of Stefanówka, near Tarczyn, there was a man who was engaged in tracking down Jews in hiding. He uncovered two sisters, who were hiding in Stefanówka, but they managed to bribe him to avoid being denounced.⁸

SOURCES Publications on the fate of the Jews of Tarczyn during the Holocaust include Abraham Wein, ed., Pinkas ha-kehilot. Encyclopaedia of Jewish Communities: Poland, vol. 4, Warsaw and Its Region (Jerusalem: Yad Vashem, 1989), pp. 229–230. The Tarczyn ghetto is mentioned also in Czesław Pilichowski et al., eds., Obozy hitlerowskie na ziemiach polskich 1939–1945: Informator encyklopedyczny (Warsaw: PWN, 1979), p. 514; Barbara Engelking, Jacek Leociak, and Dariusz Libionka, eds., Provincia noc: Życie i zagłada Żydów w dystrykcie warszawskim (Warsaw: Wydawnictwo IFiS PAN, 2007), p. 213; and Guy Miron, ed., The Yad Vashem Encyclopedia of the Ghettos during the Holocaust (Jerusalem: Yad Vashem, 2010), p. 807.

Relevant documentation can be found in the following archives: AŻIH (210/680 [AJDC]; 301/2493 and 5340 [Relacje]; Ring I/809, 881, 920, 921, 1175); BA-L (Ord. Vers. XXI); USHMM (Acc.1999.A.0154 [AJDC]; RG-15.079M [Ring I]; RG-15.084M [Relacje]; RG-50.030*0114); VHF (e.g., # 26012, 49983); and YVA.

Alexander Kruglov and Martin Dean
trans. Steven Seegel

NOTES

1. AŻIH, Ring I/920 and 921.
2. Ibid., 210/680 (AJDC).
3. Ibid.; Ring I/920, however, dates the ghetto’s establishment in January 1941.

4. VHF, # 49983, testimony of Sylvia Kolski (born 1925); USHMM, RG-50.030*0114, interview with Sylvia Kolski.

5. AŻIH, Ring I/881.

6. Ibid., Ring I/920 and 921, date the ghetto’s liquidation on February 28, 1941. Pilichowski et al., Obozy hitlerowskie, p. 514, give the figure of 1,600 ghetto inhabitants but erroneously date its liquidation on February 28, 1942.

7. VHF, # 26012, testimony of Henry Leshno (born 1925).

8. AŻIH, 301/5340.

TŁUSZCZ

Pre-1939: Tłuszcz, town, Warsaw województwo, Poland; 1939–1944: Tłuszcz, initially center of Kreis Radzymin, then Kreis Warschau-Land, Distrikt Warschau, Generalgouvernement; post-1998: Tłuszcz, województwo mazowieckie, Poland

Tłuszcz is located 38 kilometers (24 miles) northeast of Warsaw. In 1921, the Jewish population was 437, out of a total population of 1,102.

On September 3, 1939, the Luftwaffe heavily bombarded Tłuszcz, as it lay on the main railroad from Warsaw to Białystok. Since they were constructed of wood, many Jewish houses burned down in the ensuing fire. Several Jews were killed in the bombardment, and many others fled to the surrounding villages. German forces occupied the town on September 14, 1939. When the Jews celebrated the High Holidays a few days later, many were still staying with peasant acquaintances in the surrounding villages.¹ Soon after their arrival, the Germans started to harass the Jews, impress them for forced labor, cut off their beards, and beat them. They seized Jewish property during searches and required requisitions.

In October 1939, the Germans ordered the establishment of a Jewish Council (Judenrat), chaired by Gutman Popowski. With the transfer to civilian rule on October 26, 1939, Tłuszcz initially became part of Kreis Radzymin in Distrikt Warschau; subsequently Kreis Radzymin was incorporated within Kreis Warschau-Land. In the town, the main German presence was a squad of 12 Gendarmes headed by Wachtmeister Stein. Popowski tried to ease the burden on the Jews by giving the Gendarmes gifts of boots, watches, or even silk stockings and diamond rings for their women. In the fall of 1939 and the ensuing winter, a number of Jews fled to the Soviet-occupied zone of Poland; then the Jewish population of the town, including refugees, was about 740.

In September 1940, the Germans established a ghetto in Tłuszcz. The Jews were forced to move out of their homes and were resettled into the homes of Polish peasants just outside of town. The peasants were moved into the houses vacated by the Jews. There was terrible overcrowding in the ghetto, where the Jews were packed together very tightly. There was no running water, and Jews were only permitted to go and collect water once per day.² In January 1941, 685 people living in the Tłuszcz ghetto were receiving potato rations with the aid of the local branch of the Jewish Social Self-Help (JSS).³

In the summer of 1941, a typhus epidemic broke out in the ghetto, causing the Germans to seal it off. The Jews were warned that they would be shot if they tried to leave. Since the Jews made a living primarily by selling clothing and other items to the Polish peasants in return for food products, some of which were resold in Warsaw, the new restrictions dealt a serious blow to the Jewish population. To overcome this, chairman Popowski paid Wachtmeister Stein 1,000 złoty per week and other bribes for the Gendarmerie to turn a blind eye and permit trading to continue. According to the deal, Jewish craftsmen (tailors, carpenters, and others) were permitted to sell their goods to the peasants. Within a short time, however, several Jews were caught and shot for being outside the ghetto. In response, the Judenrat increased the level of the bribes, but no real security existed, and the risks for smugglers were high, which also caused black market prices to rise.⁴

Since Popowski was the only Jew officially permitted to leave the ghetto, he went one day to collect a sum of money on behalf of a Jewish woman from the town's post office. When the German official refused to serve him, Popowski complained and nearly got shot for his pains. Two weeks later he was lured out to the post office on a false pretext and was arrested by the Gestapo. Having handed over the keys and accounts to the rest of the Judenrat, he was then taken to the Pawiak prison in Warsaw. From there he was transferred to the Auschwitz concentration camp, where he reportedly died after only a few weeks.⁵

Meir Taub succeeded Popowski as Judenrat chairman. Conditions in the ghetto deteriorated further during the winter of 1941–1942. Jews were dying every day from starvation and disease, and more Jews were shot for leaving the ghetto. Searches conducted inside the ghetto for illegal possession of fur, silk, or leather items resulted in hefty fines or extortionate demands from the Gendarmes. The Polish (Blue) Police also extorted money from the Jews.

By the spring of 1942 rumors spread about the imminent liquidation of the ghetto, following the expulsion of the Jews from other nearby towns, including Pustelnik and Wawer. The Jews learned that local Poles had appealed to the Landrat in Radzymin for the Jews to be driven out of Tłuszcz, merely out of spite.⁶

On Monday, May 25, 1942, a Polish policeman requested that a uniform he had ordered from a Jewish tailor be ready the same day, as all the Jews were soon to be driven out of town. This report soon spread panic among the Jews. Since an elderly Jew had just died, on May 26 Reb Yaakov Joseph Bruckman and the head of the Jewish Police, Berl Gelbard, decided themselves to take the body to be buried in the nearby town of Jadów to try to find out if there was any substance behind the rumors. They agreed in advance that if there was no danger they would both return, but if the rumor appeared to be true, Reb Bruckman would remain in Jadów.⁷

On the night of May 26, 1942, Berl Gelbard returned to Tłuszcz alone with news from the Jadów Judenrat that the liquidation of the Tłuszcz ghetto was planned for the next day. At 4:00 A.M. the next morning, German Border Police (Grenzpolizei), Polish (Blue) Police, and Gendarmerie forces under the command of Oberleutnant Lipsch (the Gendarmerie commander in Kreis Warschau-Land) surrounded the ghetto. The Jews were instructed to assemble on the market square, and here a selection took place. The men aged between 16 and 30 were sent to labor camps, including the one at Wilanów. A group of Jews was forced to remove the furniture from the Jewish houses and put it on the square. Most other possessions, including any valuables, were taken from the Jews before their departure, supposedly in payment for their transportation costs. About 70 Jews were shot in Tłuszcz at the time of the roundup. Among those killed was a family accused of hiding some leather, many of the Jews who had worked for the Gendarmerie, and a local Jewish woman who was shot by Wachtmeister Stein personally as he thought that she was too beautiful. The Germans loaded the women and children onto carts, which drove off towards Radzymin. About one hour later the remaining men were sent after the women and children on foot with instructions to run and catch up to them. The Germans shot another 300 or so people on the road to Radzymin, as they failed to keep up with the column. The corpses were buried quickly by Polish auxiliaries wearing red armbands who followed along behind.⁸

In Radzymin, the Gendarmerie and Border Police robbed and beat the Jews again. The Germans then loaded the remaining Jews onto railway cars, and, then closer to Warsaw, the Jews were loaded onto overcrowded trams and sent to the Warsaw ghetto. On arrival they were disinfected in a quarantine section before entering the ghetto.⁹

A note preserved in the files of the JSS in Kraków, recording a message sent by a representative of the JSS for Kreis Warschau-Land, reports that of more than 800 Jews resettled from Tłuszcz on May 27, 1942, only 582 people reached the quarantine section of the Warsaw ghetto, without any personal property or money. They arrived in a terrible state, many of the men barefoot. Unofficial information revealed that 65 people were selected at Marki along the way to perform agricultural work in Wilanów. Another 65 people were reportedly deported from Tłuszcz, who never arrived in quarantine nor were redirected to Wilanów.¹⁰

On the same day that the Jews were driven out of Tłuszcz, Oberleutnant Lipsch went to Jadów and demanded that the Judenrat there hand over Reb Bruckman or he would kill several of its members. On learning of this, the rabbi decided to give himself up. The Gendarmes forced him to dance, beat him, and then shot him. His body was thrown into a deep ditch in the center of the market.¹¹

SOURCES Publications on the history of the Jews of Tłuszcz and their fate during the Holocaust include Mendl Gelbart, ed., Sefer zikaron li-kebilat Tłushtsh (Tel Aviv, 1971); Joseph Kermish, ed., To Live with Honor and Die with Honor!: Selected Documents from the Warsaw Ghetto Underground Archives "O.S." ("Oneg Shabbath") (Jerusalem: Yad Vashem, 1986), pp. 201–208; and Abraham Wein, ed., Pinkas ha-kebilot. Encyclopaedia of Jewish Communities: Poland, vol. 4, Warsaw and Its Region (Jerusalem: Yad Vashem, 1989), pp. 233–235. Additional information on the ghetto in Tłuszcz can be found in Czesław Pilichowski et al., eds., Obozy hitlerowskie na ziemiach polskich 1939–1945: Informator encyklopedyczny (Warsaw: PWN, 1979), p. 519.

Documentation regarding the fate of the Jews of Tłuszcz under German occupation can be found in the following archives: AŻIH (211/1030 [JSS]; Ring I/222); IPN (ASG, sygn. 62, p. 221); USHMM (Acc.1997.A.0124 [JSS], reel 48; RG-15.079 [Ring I]); and YVA (e.g., O-21/4).

Martin Dean

NOTES

1. M. Perel, “Der anheyb fun suf fun shtetlekh Tlushtsh,” in Gelbart, Sefer zikaron li-kehillat Tlushtsh, pp. 134–137.
2. Dara Mozer-Shkalnik, “Meyne Melhomah Iberlebungen,” in Gelbart, Sefer zikaron li-kehillat Tlushtsh, p. 138.
3. USHMM, Acc.1997.A.0124, reel 48 (AŻIH, 211/1030), report of the JSS branch in Tłuszcz to the JSS central office in Kraków, January 31, 1941. The report also includes a list of family names and the number of persons in each family.
4. AŻIH, Ring I/222, published in Kermish, To Live with Honor, pp. 202–203.
5. Kermish, To Live with Honor, p. 203.
6. Ibid., pp. 203–204.
7. Ibid., pp. 204–205.
8. Ibid., pp. 205–208. Also see Michal Kossover, “Di lkvitatsie fun Tlushtsher geto,” pp. 125–126, and Dara Mozer-Shkalnik, “Meyne Melhomah Iberlebungen,” pp. 140–141—both in Gelbart, Sefer zikaron li-kehillat Tlushtsh.
9. Asher Seymon, “Melhomah Iberlebungen,” in Gelbart, Sefer zikaron li-kehillat Tlushtsh, pp. 182–183; Kermish, To Live with Honor, p. 208.
10. USHMM, Acc.1997.A.0124, 210/1085, p. 50.
11. Kermish, To Live with Honor, pp. 208–209; Kossover, “Di lkvitatsie fun Tlushtsher geto,” pp. 127–128. There are some discrepancies between these two accounts, but the gist is very similar.

WARKA

Pre-1939: Warka (Yiddish: Vurka), town, Warsaw województwo, Poland; 1939–1945: Kreis Grojec, Distrikt Warschau, General-gouvernement; post-1998: województwo mazowieckie, Poland

Warka is located on the left bank of the Pilica River about 53 kilometers (33 miles) south-southeast of Warsaw. In 1921, the Jewish population was 2,176, out of a total of 4,306. On the eve of World War II, there were approximately 3,000 Jews living in Warka.

The German occupation of Warka began in September 1939. One resident of Warka recalls that the Germans “came into town on Friday night, September 8, 1939. The next morning, they began to round up people to work on clearing the highway between Warka and Góra Kalwaria. The roundups continued daily. Jews were seized to clear the highway and the streets, to carry water, and to cook for the army. While at work, they were tortured and beaten terribly.”¹ Although some Jews remained in Warka at the time of German occupation, many had already fled to the east, into the area that came under Soviet occupation.

A wooden synagogue in Warka, ca. 1938.
USHMM WS #07084, COURTESY OF JERZY FICOWSKI

After the Germans occupied Warka, they began to search Jewish homes, seize Jewish property, and cut off the beards of Jewish men. The Germans banned the practice of kosher slaughter; however, Warka’s Jewish population continued it illegally. The Germans also appointed a new mayor of Warka—a woman called Kosmal, who was of ethnic German origin—and a new chief of police—a man called Weitknecht (also an ethnic German).²

In October 1939, after the holiday of Sukkot, the synagogue, Bet Midrash, and the mikveh were set on fire by the Germans and burned. Jewish residents attempted to extinguish the flames; however, a cordon of soldiers encircled the entire Jewish quarter and opened fire at the oncoming Jews, forcing them to return to their homes. Rabbi Yanovisky and his son attempted to save two Torah scrolls; however, German soldiers shot and killed them.³ The Germans also imposed monetary “contributions” on the Jewish population of Warka. In some accounts this was a ransom to release Jews taken hostage, and in others it was a punishment for failing to meet the quota of forced laborers. The Germans also threatened to increase the amount demanded if the sum was not delivered on time.⁴

In early 1940, the Germans ordered the establishment of a Jewish Council (Judenrat), which took over the task of supplying forced laborers. Members of the Warka Judenrat included Werchajzer Uszer (head), Dawid Mokotow, Moszek Chaim Lipszyc, Icek Putermilch, Berek Lander, Moszek Weber, Lejb Blatman, Lejb Zymler, Zurek Sztajbok, Chaim Feldman, and Aaron Kohn. Subsequently Icek Putermilch became chairman of the Judenrat.⁵ The Germans ordered all Jews over the age of 12 to wear the Star of David on their right sleeve.

During 1940, an aid committee was active in Warka, providing assistance to some 700 needy Jews. The committee corresponded initially with the American Jewish Joint Distribution Committee (AJDC) in Warsaw and subsequently also with the Jewish Social Self-Help (JSS) headquarters in Kraków.⁶

The Germans established a ghetto in Warka on November 28, 1940.⁷ The ghetto area covered several streets, with Santorski Street at its center. The entire Jewish population was forced to abandon their homes and move into the congested ghetto area.⁸

On December 8, 1940, the Jewish Council reported: "A Jewish district was introduced in Warka, this district numbers 400 households along with stores, it contains 2,200 Jews, in addition to this, in the last months a great number of displaced persons came to Warka from Głowaczów, Piaseczno, and Warsaw."⁹ Therefore, in total the Warka ghetto may have contained up to 2,800 Jews, including those brought in from neighboring villages.¹⁰

The ghetto population managed to survive by bartering their remaining possessions with Polish farmers from the surrounding area in exchange for food. Initially, it was possible for Jews to leave the ghetto in the morning and return in the evening. One survivor, Jack Berman, recalls going out of the ghetto to perform forced labor chopping wood. The lack of living space, poor hygiene, and inadequate medical care resulted in a high mortality rate among the Jews.¹¹

According to one account, on December 31, 1940, soldiers surrounded the entire town and ethnic Germans (Volksdeutsche) were dispatched to every Jewish home. They made a careful search of each household and collected all of the Jews' belongings in one place. The next day, officials came and registered all the Jews' possessions, informing them that they would be responsible for ensuring that nothing was missing.¹² On January 21, 1941, the Kreishauptmann in Grójec, Landrat Zimmermann, ordered that any Jew caught outside the ghettos in Kreis Grojec after January 27, 1941, would face the death penalty.¹³ Shortly afterwards, in early February 1941, the Kreishauptmann issued a further decree forbidding the Jews from selling their furniture to non-Jews.¹⁴ In preparation for the expulsion of the Jews from Warka, the German authorities wanted to ensure the complete confiscation of all Jewish property.

News of the liquidation of other ghettos in nearby towns and their deportation to the Warsaw ghetto had reached the Jews of Warka at this time, spreading fear among them. The liquidation of the Warka ghetto took place on February 20–21, 1941. The Jewish quarter was surrounded by armed policemen, ethnic Germans, and other auxiliary forces. The German authorities instructed the Jews to gather in front of the municipality. Each individual was allowed to take with them only 25 kilograms (55 pounds) of luggage. The assembled men, women, and children were beaten badly in front of the municipality building.¹⁵ Then the order was given to march in the direction of the railroad station, located a few kilometers outside the town. Those unable to walk and small children were loaded onto horse-driven carts. At the train station the Jews were loaded onto waiting cattle cars by SS guards. The cars were locked from the outside and then transported the Jews to the Warsaw ghetto. On arrival at the ghetto they were met by two German policemen on the outside and two Jewish policemen on the inside.¹⁶

The majority of the Jews of Warka shared the fate of most of the other Jews of the Warsaw ghetto: they were deported to the Treblinka extermination camp from the summer of 1942. Only a few Jews from Warka survived the Holocaust. Among them were several people who escaped from the Warka ghetto on the eve of its liquidation and fled to other towns in the Generalgouvernement. They then survived the remainder of the occupation on false papers, in hiding, or under harsh conditions in various camps.

SOURCES Information on the fate of the Jews of Warka during the Holocaust can be found in the following publications: Vurka; sefer zikaron (Tel Aviv: Vurka Society in Israel, 1976); Shimon Huberband, Kiddush Hashem: Jewish Religious and Cultural Life in Poland during the Holocaust (New York: Yeshiva University Press, 1987), pp. 310–313. The Warka ghetto is mentioned also in Czesław Pilichowski et al., eds., Obozy hitlerowskie na ziemiach polskich 1939–1945: Informator encyklopedyczny (Warsaw: PWN, 1979), p. 538; Barbara Engelking, Jacek Leociak, and Dariusz Libionka, eds., Prowincja noc: Życie i zagłada Żydów w dystrykcie warszawskim (Warsaw: Wydawnictwo IFiS PAN, 2007), p. 213; and Guy Miron, ed., The Yad Vashem Encyclopedia of the Ghettos during the Holocaust (Jerusalem: Yad Vashem, 2010), p. 896.

Relevant documentation can be found in the following archives: AŻIH (210/703 [AJDC]; 211/1066 [JSS]; 301/3003; 302/264; Ring I/809, 881, 1175); BA-L (Ord. Vers. XXI); USHMM (RG-15.084 [Relacje]; Acc.1997.A.0124 [JSS]; Acc.1999.A.0154); VHF (e.g., # 20954, 29086, 35130); and YVA.

Ania Borejsza-Wysocka and Martin Dean

NOTES

1. Huberband, Kiddush Hashem, p. 310.
2. Ibid.
3. Ibid., p. 312; David Gersht, "The Ghetto in Warka and Its Liquidation," in Vurka; sefer zikaron, pp. 361–379.
4. VHF, # 35130, testimony of Helen Sadik; Huberband, Kiddush Hashem, p. 311.
5. AŻIH, 211/1066, p. 4, report to the JSS in Kraków, January 7, 1941.
6. Ibid.; 210/703.
7. Pilichowski et al., Obozy hitlerowskie, p. 538.
8. Gersht, "The Ghetto in Warka," pp. 361–379; VHF, # 35130.
9. AŻIH, 210/703, p. 49.

10. Pilichowski et al., Obozy hitlerowskie, p. 538.
11. Gersht, "The Ghetto in Warka," pp. 361–379; VHF, # 20954, testimony of Jack Berman.
12. Huberband, Kiddush Hashem, p. 313.
13. AŻIH, Ring I/881.
14. BA-L, Ordn. Vers. XXI, p. 364, Kreishauptmann Grojec an alle Bürgermeister und Gemeindevorsteher des Kreises Grojec, February 4, 1941.
15. Huberband, Kiddush Hashem, p. 313.
16. Gersht, "The Ghetto in Warka," pp. 361–379.

WARSAW

Pre-1939: Warsaw (Polish: Warszawa), city, capital of Poland, and center; Warsaw województwo; 1939–1945: Warschau, Stadt, Distrikt Warschau, Generalgouvernement; post-1998: Warsaw, województwo mazowieckie, Poland

Warsaw is located 137 kilometers (85 miles) northeast of Łódź. In 1939, on the eve of war, the approximately 380,000 Jews living there comprised just less than one quarter of the city's total population of around 1.3 million.

Following the German invasion of Poland on September 1, 1939, Warsaw came under siege for three weeks. The continuous bombardment of the city during the siege killed and injured many people, including large numbers of Jews. A mass exodus of inhabitants and the Polish political leadership began. Among those who fled were the leaders of Polish Jewry, such as Maurycy Meisel, head of the Warsaw Jewish Community Council. The German army entered Warsaw on September 27, 1939. Both systematic and impromptu persecution, abuse, theft, forced labor, and murder began immediately. In February 1940, there were some 394,000 Jews in Warsaw, including tens of thousands of Jewish refugees.

In October 1940, Ludwig Fischer, the Gouverneur of Distrikt Warschau, decreed the establishment of a ghetto by the end of the month.¹ The Jewish community had to pay for the ghetto wall, and Jewish forced labor built it. It was 3 meters high (9.8 feet) and 18 kilometers (11 miles) long. Hundreds of thousands of Jews, carrying their possessions, moved into the area designated as the ghetto. As the resettlement could not be completed on time, the German authorities extended the deadline for the Jews to move into the ghetto to November 15.²

The establishment of the ghetto was a precipitating factor in the economic and physical liquidation of the Jewish population; because most inhabitants could no longer work, food supplies were grossly inadequate, and diseases soon ran rampant.

The ghetto stretched over only 2.4 percent of the city's area in one of the poorest districts of northern Warsaw. The number of ghetto inhabitants actually grew after it was established. More than 50,000 additional Jews from smaller Jewish communities around Warsaw were forcibly moved into the ghetto in the first three months of 1941, and other refugees and expellees entered the ghetto subsequently. These mostly impoverished newcomers were among the first to be stricken by epidemics and malnutrition, and many did not survive for long.³ By April 1941, due to the large influx, there were some 460,000 Jews living in the ghetto. Soon the population began to dwindle, however, because of overcrowding, sickness, and malnutrition. With the ghetto closed off, most of the inhabitants could no longer earn a living, a situation that accelerated the process of impoverishment and deprivation. From August 1941, about 4,000 to 5,000 people died per month, as a typhus epidemic peaked in the fall of that year. In total, more than 60,000 deaths were recorded between January 1941 and the end of July 1942.⁴

Young Jewish men conduct a business transaction over the Warsaw ghetto wall, n.d.

USHMM WS #05923, COURTESY OF JERZY TOMASZEWSKI

In October 1939, the Germans appointed Adam Czer-niaków to head the Jewish Council (Judenrat). From the start, the Judenrat served as the liaison between the Germans and the Jews. The Judenrat conducted population censuses, provided lists of those assigned to forced labor, and paid ransoms for people under arrest. The men Czerniaków selected to be members of the Judenrat had been, before the war, political activists and party members. Among them were some people whose main concern was the general welfare, but others appeared to be simple collaborators. Almost from the start, the public viewed the Judenrat as corrupt because some officials accepted bribes from people seeking help or information about kidnapped or missing persons.

The Judenrat tried to cope with the Jews' day-to-day needs while also fulfilling German demands. It numbered about 25 departments and 6,000 workers. Its responsibilities were varied: provision of food and drink, prevention of the spread of disease, removal of sewerage and garbage, maintaining public order, firefighting, allocation of accommodations, and tracking and registering the inhabitants. It oversaw the establishment of hospitals and clinics, cultural activities and education, welfare and mutual-aid institutions, and orphanages.

The Jewish Police, which the Judenrat supervised, was embroiled in controversy. German orders established it at the same time as the ghetto. Józef Szeryński, a convert to Christianity who had held a senior position in the Polish police, was its chief. Most policemen were educated and members of established, often assimilated families. More than a few police assisted in smuggling food or smuggled it themselves. They also helped distribute food and provide aid to the needy. Nevertheless, in the eyes of the Jewish public, the Jewish Police became the embodiment of evil and public corruption.⁵ They escorted the work details operating outside the ghetto, collected taxes, searched for absentees, and in the end, seized Jews for deportation.

Another entity in the ghetto was known as the "Thirteen," named after the address of its headquarters on Leszno Street; it was a kind of enforcement unit under the German Security Police. Its function was to keep an eye on whatever was happening in the ghetto. Abraham Gancwajch headed it. On the surface, the Thirteen ran the "Office to Combat Usury and Profiteering in the Jewish Quarter of Warsaw"; in practice, its task was to inform on all smugglers and secret economic activity to the Gestapo, frequently using this knowledge to blackmail those they uncovered.⁶

The official daily food ration in the ghetto was about 180 calories per person. Starvation led to incidents of violence and stealing food on the street. People lost their composure, women engaged in prostitution, and there were even incidents of cannibalism. Against this background, food smuggling was essential to the ghetto's survival. About 80 percent of the food that entered the ghetto was smuggled. Smuggling was done by individuals, by organized groups, and in large measure, by children. The smuggled goods kept various food programs and soup kitchens going. Many smugglers were caught, beaten, and shot, including young children. The professional smugglers became members of the ghetto elite, living it up on their profits, patronizing the more than 60 restaurants and clubs in the ghetto. By contrast, most of the population lived under conditions of terrible poverty. The Nazis exploited the appearance of prominent wealth next to abject poverty for anti-Jewish propaganda.

"Vendor of Jewish Stars," by Halina Olomucki, 1941.
USHMM WS #73574, COURTESY OF HALINA OLOMUCKI

Some goods were brought into the ghetto by means of the German Transfer Station (Transferstelle), and illegal industries and handicrafts quickly developed. Raw materials were brought into the ghetto and fashioned into various goods, such as brushes, garments, and electric products. Finished products were smuggled out of the ghetto and sold. In the spring of 1941, the Germans recognized the ghetto as a center of industry and commerce, and by summer German owners of wood, fur, and textile firms began to come in. The German industrialist Walther Többens set up a large textile firm. There was also a factory for brush manufacturing. The pay for work in these firms was poor, generally a daily food ration. Work also continued at many unofficial sites, arranged with the knowledge of the Germans or thanks to the bribery of the watchmen and the Jewish, German, or Polish police.

About a third of the ghetto population was children (about 150,000), many of whom were refugee children, who arrived in the ghetto with, or sometimes without, their parents. They roamed about barefoot, begging for charity. Many were involved in smuggling, as errand boys, or in peddling cigarettes, bread, and matches. Some sustained themselves as street performers.

Jewish society within the ghetto tried to maintain the activity of voluntary organizations helping the weak and the needy. Aside from the Judenrat and its departments, a number of bodies functioned under the aegis of the Jewish Social Self-Help–Coordinating Commission (JSS–CC, later renamed ŻTOS in October 1940, then JSS in November 1941). Initially some financial support for Jewish welfare efforts was provided directly by the American Jewish Joint Distribution Committee (AJDC). From February 1941, the JSS received AJDC funds and supervised their distribution in consultation with the Judenrat.

From early 1941, the Judenrat strengthened its influence over the welfare organizations, preferring to extend assistance to people working on various projects, as opposed to the destitute. For example, in the summer of 1941, the Judenrat clashed with welfare activists over proposals for wealthy inhabitants to surrender their ration cards or to be taxed more to support the poor. These initiatives were blocked by the Judenrat despite Czerniaków's initial support. Therefore, the ghetto inhabitants' attitude towards the various charitable organizations was more positive than their attitude towards the Judenrat, which they saw as a tool of the Germans.

Aid continued to be extended to incapacitated people as well as to children in orphanages, refugees, and the elderly. In the summer of 1941, the number of meals served daily by public kitchens increased to 100,000, as the Germans briefly sought to increase the productivity of the ghetto. As Emanuel Ringelblum commented, however: "It is the beggars and the corpses who have won us this small concession. Besides, typhus has done its part." The number of meals served declined again in the fall, once the Germans withdrew support for the feeding program.⁷

Other welfare agencies active within the ghetto included TOZ (Society for the Protection of the Health of the Jewish Population in Poland) and CENTOS (Central Organization for Orphan Care). After the United States entered the war in December 1941, the AJDC funds from abroad largely dried up, and the welfare organizations struggled to maintain their aid programs. Even then it continued to provide assistance for illicit activity, such as funding printing presses and educational institutions.

In all the large ghettos, including Warsaw, despite the official German ban on most educational activity, there were educational and cultural networks. In the Warsaw ghetto there were elementary schools, middle schools, and vocational courses, such as a nursing school. There were university-level lectures, literary creativity in Yiddish, Polish, and Hebrew, and theater and orchestra performances. There was also scholarly research, including historical studies. One of the most important of the cultural institutions was called "Oneg Shabbath," the underground archive of the Warsaw ghetto, which the historian Emanuel Ringelblum directed. The Ringelblum Archive documented whatever transpired in the ghetto. It also acquired written testimonies about the extermination camps and succeeded in transmitting the documents to the Polish government-in-exile in London. Eventually the archival material was hidden in metal containers and milk cans, which were buried in different places in the ghetto. Almost the entire archive team died in the Holocaust, but much of the material was recovered after the war.

The Germans quickly banned religious services, so Jews held services in secret. In the spring of 1941, the ban was lifted, and the synagogue on Tłomackie Street reopened with a festive ceremony. However, it was hard to maintain religious duties, observe holidays, and keep kosher under ghetto conditions. The Nazis were especially abusive towards observant Jews with side curls, beards, and head coverings. And inevitably, some lost their faith in the face of the suffering they experienced.⁸

Members of the Zionist and other youth movements (including Ha-Shomer Ha-Za'ir, with about 800 members) were prominent in the social and cultural activity of the large ghettos, as well as in smuggling food. In a period when most of the communal leaders escaped to the Soviet Union and the Jews of Warsaw remained without leadership, the members of these youth movements displayed great civic responsibility. Whereas the older people struggled to cope with dislocations in social frameworks and community life, the members of the youth movements adjusted more easily to ghetto life and quickly renewed organized group activity.

The youth movements developed study groups, schools, and soup kitchens and helped feed children and adults. They also sent emissaries to youth movements in other ghettos to establish links and share information. Couriers, both male and female, maintained these contacts at great personal risk. Other young people contributed to the underground press. Information about events in Poland and in the world appeared in the newspapers, which also covered life in the ghetto. With the start of the transports to the extermination camps, the publication of newspapers was temporarily interrupted. Later, the press resumed with a more limited scope, publishing information about the true character of the transports.

By January 1942, word had arrived in Warsaw about the murder of the Jews of Wilno at Ponary and the German mass killings in the cities of eastern Poland. Accounts of the murder of Jews at the Chełmno extermination camp also began to arrive in February.⁹ Couriers who traveled in eastern Poland also reported on the transports that started in March 1942, first to Bełżec and then to other extermination camps. Persistent rumors about deportations swirled around the ghetto in July 1942. Czerniaków tried to get information from the German officers with whom he had contact. Most of them denied the rumors. On July 21, however, all the other members of the Judenrat were arrested. On the next day Czerniaków wrote these words in his diary: "We were told that all the Jews irrespective of sex and age, with certain exceptions, will be deported to the East. By 4:00 P.M. today a contingent of 6,000 people must be provided. And this (at the minimum) will be the daily quota."¹⁰ On July 23, having unsuccessfully pleaded for the lives of orphaned children and unwilling to aid in killing his own people, Czerniaków committed suicide.

At the start of the deportations, the Germans persuaded the Jews to assemble at the Umschlagplatz, a freight yard, by promising to give everyone who reported three loaves of bread and a portion of jam. At first, most of the Jews who arrived at the Umschlagplatz did not understand that the transports to the east meant death at the Treblinka extermination camp. Later on, as they learned the truth, they hoped that their work documents from the firms operating in the ghetto would free them from the transports. But the Germans emptied streets and whole apartment buildings in the process of evacuation. The Jewish Police were forced to collect people until its size was drastically reduced, and then many of its members themselves were deported on September 21.

In the course of the first great deportation Aktion, which took place from the end of July until the middle of September 1942, more than 260,000 people were deported—almost all to be murdered at Treblinka—and the living area of the ghetto shrank. About 60,000 of the Jews who remained alive moved to dwellings in the center of the ghetto near the area of the workshops; many of these people were now living illegally.

Word of the extermination camps, which started reaching Warsaw early in 1942, convinced members of the youth groups to organize for armed self-defense. The Jewish Fighting Organization (ŻOB), which united members of Hechalutz, Ha-Shomer Ha-Za'ir, Dror, and Bnai Akiva, was established in July as the transports began. At first two key leaders of the ŻOB were Józef Kaplan and Szmuel Bresław of Ha-Shomer Ha-Za'ir. However, they were caught at the beginning of September, apparently because of informants, after they had succeeded in acquiring a few weapons. The underground collapsed but began to reorganize in October. At that time members of the Bund and representatives of Zionist organizations and parties joined the ŻOB. In the meantime, members of Betar formed an additional military structure in the ghetto, the Jewish Military Organization (ŻZW, known after January 1943 as the Jewish Military Union). This organization had good connections with the Polish underground (Armia Krajowa [Polish Home Army], AK) and apparently succeeded in obtaining more arms than the ŻOB. The two groups had their differences, but a short time before the great revolt, the ŻZW did agree to fight alongside the ŻOB, while not being absorbed into it.

The first attempt at an uprising took place in January 1943 in response to the second deportation Aktion, and sporadic attacks on German and Ukrainian personnel continued for the next three months. The January revolt convinced the Jews that the Germans would try to liquidate the ghetto, and therefore they began to prepare hiding places for the future. Hundreds of bunkers were built, some of them dug beneath buildings that had already been destroyed in September 1939. The headquarters of the revolt was based initially at 29 Miła Street and later in the bunker at 18 Miła Street.¹¹ The standing of the ŻOB grew stronger as a result of the January uprising, and it earned the support of many of the Jews who remained in the ghetto. A short time before the revolt there were about 800 fighters in the two underground groups.

In preparation for the liquidation of the ghetto, the Germans organized the transfer of more than 20,000 Jewish workers with their production units from the Warsaw ghetto to the Trawniki, Poniatowa, and other labor camps in Distrikt Lublin, starting in February and continuing into the uprising in early May 1943.¹² The Germans assumed that the Jews would forcefully oppose deportation, as they had in January. On the morning of April 19, 1943, they entered the ghetto with a force of 2,000 soldiers, accompanied by tanks. The Germans expected to make short work of the poorly armed fighters, but the main struggle went on for more than four weeks, with sporadic fighting afterwards. Eventually the Germans had to blast and burn the fighters out of their positions. The Germans discovered the headquarters of the ŻOB in the bunker at 18 Miła Street on May 8. After German forces blocked all exits and several hundred civilians emerged, the ŻOB commander Mordechai Anielewicz committed suicide along with some 120 Jewish fighters, as the Germans dropped in poison gas. In September 1943, the Germans destroyed the remaining buildings and the ghetto walls. Most of the Jews still in hiding were apparently killed in this action, but a few individuals survived in the area until the end of the war.

The Warsaw ghetto revolt became one of the most significant occurrences in the history of the Jewish people. At the beginning, no one gave the ghetto any chance to hold out. But this seemingly hopeless struggle showed that even the years of the Nazi terror regime and the passivity in the Polish surroundings were not enough to break the fighting spirit of the youth movement members and the ghetto dwellers. The revolt became a symbol of resistance and heroism.

At the end of the revolt more than 20,000 Jews were left in Warsaw, in hiding or on the Aryan side, but it is impossible to know how many survived the war. The Germans established a concentration camp in the ruins of the ghetto to salvage building materials.¹³

An identification tag issued to Gina Tabaczynska, when she was detained with other personnel of the Schultz & Co. factory in the Warsaw ghetto in the summer of 1942. Those who held these tags were presumed to be exempt from deportation.

USHMM WS #16638, COURTESY OF EUGENIA TABACZYNSKA STRUT

SOURCES Among the many publications on the Warsaw ghetto, the following titles in English can be recommended: Barbara Engelking and Jacek Leociak, The Warsaw Ghetto: A Guide to the Perished City, trans. Emma Harris (New Haven, CT: Yale University Press, 2009); Israel Gutman, The Jews of Warsaw, 1939–1943: Ghetto, Underground, Revolt, trans. Ina Friedman (Bloomington: Indiana University Press, 1982); Samuel D. Kassow, Who Will Write Our History?: Emanuel Ringelblum, the Warsaw Ghetto, and the Oyneg Shabes Archive (Bloomington: Indiana University Press, 2007); and Gunnar S. Paulsson, Secret City: The Hidden Jews of Warsaw 1940–1945 (New Haven, CT: Yale University Press, 2002). More extensive bibliographies can be found in these and other publications.

Published primary sources include the following: Tatiana Berenstein et al., eds., Faschismus, Getto, Massenmord: Dokumentation über Ausrottung und Widerstand der Juden in Polen während des zweiten Weltkrieges (Berlin: Rütten & Loening, 1961); Mary Berg, Warsaw Ghetto: A Diary by Mary Berg, ed. S.L. Schneiderman (New York: L.B. Fischer, 1945); Helge Grabitz and Wolfgang Scheffler, Letzte Spuren: Fotos und Dokumente über Opfer des Endlösungswahns im Spiegel der historischen Ereignisse (Berlin: Hentrich, 1988); Raul Hilberg, Stanislaw Staron, and Josef Kerr, eds., The Warsaw Diary of Adam Czerniakow: Prelude to Doom (New York: Stein and Day, 1979); J. Katsh, ed., Scroll of Agony: The Warsaw Diary of Chaim A. Kaplan (New York, 1965); Joseph Kermish, ed., To Live with Honor and Die with Honor!: Selected Documents from the Warsaw Ghetto Underground Archives “O.S.” (“Oneg Shabbath”) (Jerusalem: Yad Vashem, 1986); Abraham Lewin, A Cup of Tears: A Diary of the Warsaw Ghetto (Oxford: Blackwell, 1989); Report concerning the Uprising in the Ghetto of Warsaw and the Liquidation of the Jewish Residential Area, trans. D. Dąbrowska (Warsaw: ŻIH, 1958); Ruta Sakowska et al., eds., Archiwum Ringelbluma: Konspiracyjne Archiwum Gęty Warszawy, 3 vols. (Warsaw: PWN, 2000); and Jacob Sloan, ed. and trans., Notes from the Warsaw Ghetto: The Journal of Emanuel Ringelblum (1958; New York: Schocken, 1974).

Among the many memoirs by survivors, the following are worthy of mention: J. David, A Square of Sky: Recollections of My Childhood (New York, 1964); Janusz Korczak, The Warsaw Ghetto Memoirs of Janusz Korczak, trans. with an introduction by E.P. Kulawiec (Washington, DC: University Press of America, 1978); Zivia Lubetkin, In the Days of Destruction and Revolt (Tel Aviv: Hakibbutz Hameuchad Publishing House and Am Oved Publishing House, 1981); Vladka Meed, On Both Sides of the Wall: Memoirs from the Warsaw Ghetto, trans. Steven Meed (New York: Holocaust Library, 1993); and Władysław Szpilman, The Pianist: The Extraordinary Story of One Man’s Survival in Warsaw, 1939–1945 (New York: Picador USA, 1999).

The recent publication of The Warsaw Ghetto Oyneg Shabes Ringelblum Archive: Catalog and Guide, ed. Robert Moses Shapiro and Tadeusz Epsztein (Bloomington: Indiana University Press in association with the United States Holocaust Memorial Museum and the Jewish Historical Institute in Warsaw, 2009) and the digitization of these unique records have greatly increased their accessibility.

Relevant documentation can be found in the following archives: AAN (202/II 26-29); APW (e.g., Der Obmann des Judenrates in Warschau; Amt des Gouverneurs des Distriktes Warschau—Der Kommissar für den Jüdischen Wohnbezirk in Warschau); AŻIH (e.g., sygn. 200; 210; 211; 301; 302; Ring I); BA-BL; BA-L; BLH; CAHJP; IPN (e.g., ASG); MA; NARA;

USHMM (e.g., Acc. 1997.A.0124 [JSS]; Acc.1998.A.0241 [Trial of Ludwig Fischer]; RG-02; RG-15.019M [IPN, ASG]; RG-15.077M [CENTOS]; RG-15.079 [Ring]; RG-15.084 [Relacje]; RG-50); VHF; YIVO; and YVA (e.g., O-3; O-16; O-33).

Miri Freilich and Martin Dean trans. Samuel Fishman

NOTES

1. An English translation of the October decree establishing the ghetto is published in Engelking and Leociak, The Warsaw Ghetto, p. 102.
2. An overview of events leading up to the establishment of the ghetto can be found in ibid., pp. 52–76. Also see Warschauer Zeitung, November 3–4, 1940.
3. USHMM, Acc.1997.A.0124 (JSS), 211/1075, pp. 28–29; AŻIH, Ring I/116.
4. Engelking and Leociak, The Warsaw Ghetto, pp. 48–49; USHMM, RG-15.073M, Der Jüdische Wohnbezirk in Warschau (Zahlen und Tatsachen), Warschau, June 1942; see also Grabitz and Scheffler, Letzte Spuren, p. 177.
5. USHMM, RG-15.079, Ring I/115, published in Kermish, To Live with Honor, pp. 304–309.
6. See Engelking and Leociak, The Warsaw Ghetto, pp. 218–232.
7. Ibid., pp. 307–308; Sloan, Notes from the Warsaw Ghetto, p. 192.
8. Katsh, Scroll of Agony, p. 207; Engelking and Leociak, The Warsaw Ghetto, pp. 647–648.
9. USHMM, RG-15.079, Ring I/412 [1115].
10. Hilberg, Staron, and Kerr, The Warsaw Diary of Adam Czerniakow, pp. 383–384.
11. Engelking and Leociak, The Warsaw Ghetto, p. 786.
12. Grabitz and Scheffler, Letzte Spuren, pp. 181, 207, 318–319. Most of these Jews were murdered during Aktion Erntefest (Harvest Festival) in November 1943. See also the entries for Poniatowa and Trawniki—both in Lublin Main Camp—in volume I of the Encyclopedia of Camps and Ghettos.
13. See Warschau Main Camp entry in volume I of the Encyclopedia of Camps and Ghettos.

WAWER

Pre-1939: Wawer, village, Warsaw województwo, Poland;
1939–1945: Kreis Warschau-Land, Distrikt Warschau, Generalgouvernement; post-1998: województwo mazowieckie, Poland

Wawer is located about 10 kilometers (6 miles) east-southeast of the center of Warsaw. As of September 1, 1939, there were around 1,300 Jews living in Wawer.

German forces occupied Wawer in September 1939. In the fall of 1939, Jews were required to perform forced labor and to pay “contributions” imposed by the German authorities. Jews were forced to wear the Star of David, and a Jewish Council (Judenrat) was established, headed by Menachem Kestenber. In October 1939, Wawer became part of Kreis Warschau-Land; the Kreishauptmann was Regierungsrat Dr. Hermann Rupprecht.

On the night of December 26–27, 1939, on the orders of Unterleutnant Max Daume, the 2nd and 3rd Companies of the 6th Battalion of the 31st Regiment of the Order Police (Ordnungspolizei) carried out a special “pacification” Aktion in the area of Wawer and Anin, near Warsaw. The Aktion was a reprisal for the shooting on the previous day of two officers from the German 538th Construction Battalion, stationed in Wawer. The two men were killed in a town restaurant by Marian Prasuł and Stanisław Dąbek. The Germans then arrested 120 Polish, Jewish, and Russian men, aged 16 to 70, and sentenced 114 of them to death. The executioners used machine guns, and the killings took place publicly in the square between Błękitna and Spizowa Streets. The following Jews were among those shot: Elja Brajtman, Jankiel Czerwonka, Szachna Desau, Aron Fogelnest, Elias Nusselbaum, Lejbuś Płatkowski, Jankiel Rosenberg, Uszer Rosenberg, Herszek Szajman, and Lejbuś Szajman. The bodies of the victims first were buried in a provisional grave, then were exhumed on June 25–27, 1940, on the orders of the Kreishauptmann. The “Eternity” (Wieczność) Association sent the remains of 11 of the victims to the city of Warsaw.¹

After the events of December 27, 1939, in fear of further reprisals by the Germans, one Jewish man fled with his mother and two sisters to stay with his father in Opatów. His father was a painter, who had painted the local synagogue in Opatów.² By June 1, 1940, around 60 Jewish refugees had arrived in Wawer.³

Sources differ regarding the date on which the Wawer ghetto was established. The first documentary reference to the ghetto is a letter from the Kreishauptmann Warschau-Land to the Wawer Judenrat, dated November 30, 1940. In the letter, the Kreishauptmann issued various instructions concerning sanitary conditions in the recently established ghetto (Jüdisches Wohngebiet). This implies that the ghetto had been established just prior to this, some time in November 1940.⁴

Due to a shortage of apartments in the ghetto area, the Judenrat was permitted to erect special barracks, and also four adjoining buildings were to be added to the ghetto, to be used to house sick beds and a quarantine section. However, the Judenrat had to take down provisional wooden walls set up in the larger buildings for privacy, creating instead a corridor system with separate quarters, for sanitary reasons. In addition, a sanitation column was to be established to enforce sanitary regulations, and the Jews were to be vaccinated against typhus at the cost of 0.50 złoty per head. The Judenrat was also obliged to prepare a list of the Jews in each apartment and to establish a bathing facility by the end of the year.⁵

A postwar Polish report indicates that the ghetto was located in Czaplowizna, within the Wawer gmina, in an area known as “Kolonія Różyczka.” It encompassed an area of about 5 hectares (12.4 acres) on Klasztorna Street. On the grounds of the ghetto, there were no factories, but some Jews performed artisanal work in their own homes.⁶

In Wawer, a Jewish welfare committee was active to assist the refugees and local Jews in need. It received support from the Jewish Social Self-Help (JSS) committee for Kreis Warschau-Land, headed by Dr. Ignaz (Icchak) Schiper. On March 20, 1941, the board of the Jewish welfare committee referred to a letter from the Kreishauptmann ordering the establishment of a hospital, a quarantine section, and a steam bath. The committee had the space to set these up but no money to fix and open the bath. In the letter, the committee also requested 10 blankets, sheets, pillow cases, white aprons, men’s and women’s shirts, dressing gowns, and pajamas. The letter was signed by the head of the Judenrat, M. Kestenberg.⁷

On May 25, 1941, the board in Wawer sent the following note to the JSS in Warsaw: “We are waiting . . . hungry, sick, swollen, and ragged . . . mainly elderly and children, all miserable. It is so bad for us now that we can find no words to describe it. We beg you to help us!” The JSS reported providing aid to some 500 people in Wawer.⁸

A further appeal from the Judenrat in Wawer, on August 18, 1941, noted that a severe outbreak of typhus had struck the ghetto. The Germans had ordered the ghetto to be closed, and the Jews were completely cut off from the outside world. The letter concluded: “We are starving. Help us.”⁹ As a result of the epidemic, five Jews died.

In March 1942, there were approximately 950 Jews residing in the Wawer ghetto.¹⁰ According to Manes Puterman, the German authorities liquidated the ghetto on Thursday, March 23, 1942.¹¹ At the time of the ghetto liquidation, the German police shot around 10 sick and bedridden Jews locally. The remaining inmates of the ghetto were resettled into the Warsaw ghetto. During the transport to Warsaw, more than a dozen Jews were shot and buried in unmarked graves along the way.¹² Confirmation of the timing of the transfer can be found in a report preserved in the Ringelblum Archive concerning the ghetto in Tłuszcz. This noted that at the start of April, two weeks before Passover (April 16), news had arrived of the expulsion of the Jews from Pustelnik and Wawer.¹³

At the time of the ghetto’s liquidation in late March 1942, a number of Jews avoided the roundup and managed to find shelter with non-Jews in and around Wawer. For example, four members of the Frydman family found refuge with their old acquaintances, the Kupidłowska family. The Frydmans remained hidden successfully for two and a half years until the Germans were driven from the area. Other Jews who fled from the Warsaw ghetto also found temporary shelter in a specially prepared hiding place in Wawer set up with the help of Żegota (the Polish Council of Aid for Jews). Not all the Jews were able to hide successfully. On March 3, 1944, two Poles and two Jews, who had been in hiding in Wawer during the occupation, were shot on the street while trying to escape.¹⁴

After the war, “the crimes in Wawer” committed on December 27, 1939, were tried by the Polish Supreme National Tribunal (Najwyższy Trybunał Narodowy). On March 3, 1947, the court sentenced Max Daume to death. Friedrich Wilhelm Wenzel also was sentenced to death by the Regional Court (Sąd Wojewódzki) in Warsaw in 1951.

SOURCES Information on the fate of the Jewish population of Wawer during the German occupation can be found in the following publications: T. Berenstein, “Deportacje i zagłada skupisk żydowskich w dystrykcie warszawskim,” BŻIH, no. 1

(1952); Czesław Pilichowski et al., eds., Obozy hitlerowskie na ziemiach polskich 1939–1945: Informator encyklopedyczny (Warsaw: PWN, 1979), p. 556; and Guy Miron, ed., The Yad Vashem Encyclopedia of the Ghettos during the Holocaust (Jerusalem: Yad Vashem, 2010), pp. 923–924.

Relevant documentation can be found in the following archives: AŻIH (Ring I/222 and 501b; 211/1081, 1082, 1084, 1087 [JSS]; 301/447, 1134, 2747 [Relacje]); IPN (ASG); USHMM (Acc.1997.A.0124 [JSS]; RG-15.019M [IPN, ASG]; RG-15.079M [Ring]; RG-15.084 [Relacje]); and YVA (e.g., M.31).

Monika Tomkiewicz and Martin Dean
trans. Steven Seegel

NOTES

1. H. Pawłowicz, Wawer, 27 grudnia 1939 roku (Warsaw, 1962), pp. 30, 111–115; S. Płowski, “Wawer,” Biuletyn Głównej Komisji Badania Zbrodni Hitlerowskich w Polsce (Warsaw) 6 (1951): 125–130; W. Bartoszewski, Warszawski pierścień śmierci (Warsaw, 1970), pp. 53–58.

2. AŻIH, 301/1134, testimony of Samuel Wilenberg, p. 1.

3. Berenstein, “Deportacje i zagłada,” table 2a.

4. AŻIH, 211/1081, p. 48, Kreishauptmann Warschau-Land an den Judenrat in Kol. Różycka Gem. Wawer, November 30, 1940. According to the report of Manes Puterman from Wawer, the German authorities established a ghetto in Wawer on November 10, 1941 [sic]; it appears likely that Puterman was mistaken by one year; see AŻIH, Ring I/501b [938.], report of Manes Puterman.

5. Ibid., 211/1081, p. 48.

6. Pilichowski et al., Obozy hitlerowskie, p. 556; IPN, ASG, reel 19, vol. 62, pp. 294 and verso.

7. Ruta Sakowska, “Icchak Schiper w getcie warszawskim. Działalność opiekuńcza,” Kwartalnik Historii Żydów, no. 4 (216): (December 2005): 487; AŻIH, 211/1081, p. 34a.

8. AŻIH, 211/1082, pp. 2, 22.

9. Ibid., 211/1084, p. 41.

10. Pilichowski et al., Obozy hitlerowskie, p. 556.

11. Ibid., date it also in March 1942; AŻIH, Ring I/501b [938.].

12. Pilichowski et al., Obozy hitlerowskie, p. 556; IPN, ASG, vol. 62, pp. 294 and verso; Berenstein, “Deportacje i zagłada,” p. 88; AŻIH, 301/447, testimony of Helena Lewińska, 1945.

13. Joseph Kermish, ed., To Live with Honor and Die with Honor!: Selected Documents from the Warsaw Ghetto Underground Archives “O.S.” (“Oneg Shabbath”) (Jerusalem: Yad Vashem, 1986), p. 204, from Ring I/222.

14. Israel Gutman and Sara Bender, eds., The Encyclopedia of the Righteous among the Nations: Rescuers of Jews during the Holocaust—Poland (Jerusalem: Yad Vashem, 2004), pp. 396, 414–415, 423–424; H. Wierchowski, Anin, Wawer (Warsaw, 1971), p. 83.

WĘGRÓW

Pre-1939: Węgrów (Yiddish: Vengrov), town, initially Lublin województwo, then on April 1, 1938, Warsaw województwo, Poland; 1939–1944: Węgrów, Kreis Sokolow, Distrikt Warschau, Generalgouvernement; post-1998: Węgrów, województwo mazowieckie, Poland

ENCYCLOPEDIA OF CAMPS AND GHETTOS, 1933–1945

Węgrów is located alongside the Liwiec River, about 71 kilometers (44 miles) east-northeast of Warsaw. By September 1, 1939, there were 9,200 Jews living among the 92,226 residents of the Węgrów powiat. The Jews were concentrated mainly in the town of Węgrów, comprising two thirds of the town's 11,000 residents.

Upon occupying Węgrów on September 10, 1939, German soldiers engaged in antisemitic attacks. In the first week, they arrested and then executed a number of the town's wealthiest Jews.¹ Węgrów's German military administration also closed the town's synagogues. On Yom Kippur (September 23, 1939), the Germans discovered a private prayer service and dragged the men to the market square, where they ordered them to dance and sing. On this occasion they murdered Rabbi Jaakov Mendel Morgenstern by bayoneting him in the stomach.²

On November 28, 1939, the county's new Kreishauptmann, Landrat Friedrich Schultz, ordered Węgrów's Jews to create a Judenrat. The Judenrat's chair was Mordechai Zajman, and Shmuel Halberstadt served as vice president. The Judenrat also established a Jewish police force of 10 to 15 men headed by Noach Kochman, and medical services were placed under the direction of Dr. Melchoir. By mid-October, a German Gendarmerie post of 10 to 15 men, commanded by Oberleutnant Müller, patrolled Węgrów. A military detachment, directed by Commandant Scherle, also was stationed there.³

In the first months of the war, 390 Jews arrived in Węgrów, most of them fleeing from larger cities. By August 1940, the Germans had deported an additional 1,000 Jews there, mainly from Piotrków, Aleksandrów Łódzki, Kalisz, and Pułtusk. By September 1940, there were about 8,500 Jews living in Węgrów. By the end of December 1941, the Germans had ordered to Węgrów another 255 Jews, including those from the villages of Ruchna, Jaczew, Jarnice, and Wyszaków. Expellees from this last village included its rabbi, who assumed the functions of the murdered Morgenstern. Jews forcibly deported to Węgrów in this period included those from areas east of the town, such as from Grochów Szlachecki.⁴

Two Jewish policemen, presumably in the Węgrów ghetto, n.d. USHMM WS #05514, COURTESY OF LEOPOLD PAGE PHOTOGRAPHIC COLLECTION

The new arrivals were mainly destitute, with many of them begging for food. The Judenrat extended food assistance to the deportees, who comprised nearly half of the town's 2,500 most impoverished Jews by August 1940. In 1940, the Judenrat's Housing Authority also ordered Jews from Węgrów who lived in homes with more than one room to surrender remaining rooms to the emigrants. Even so, there was insufficient housing for the refugees, with some living in attics.⁵

Jews in Węgrów also faced increasingly more organized forced labor roundups. In 1939 and 1940, patrols of German soldiers and police arbitrarily conscripted hundreds of Jewish men to work at various army barracks. Tasks included gardening, latrine cleaning, and purchasing groceries. By the end of 1940, the Judenrat's Arbeitsamt (labor office) was assigning men to specific tasks. In 1940 and 1941, 250 Jews from Węgrów worked at a freight terminal near Sokołów Podlaski, unloading sacks of wheat. Others worked near the village of Liw, on the Liwiec River, about 8 kilometers (5 miles) from Węgrów, replacing bridge pilings destroyed in September 1939. Several hundred others were sent to a forced labor camp near Mordy to drain marshland. In September 1941, a large number was called up to work on a similar project in Łęki, and others labored in agriculture. By late 1941, part of Węgrów's forced labor quota was for craftsmen to work at the Treblinka forced labor camp. From May 1942, Jews from Węgrów also formed the initial labor pool used to build the Treblinka extermination camp.⁶

Hoping to forestall larger labor quotas, deportations, and the creation of a closed ghetto in Węgrów, the Judenrat organized internal taxes to raise money for gifts and payments to German authorities. It negotiated for smaller labor quotas by bribing German officials with diamonds, gold, fur coats, and leather boots. When German demands for labor increased at the end of 1940, the Judenrat imposed higher taxes to pay for larger bribes. In the first half of 1941, the Germans threatened to deport Węgrów's Jews to the Warsaw ghetto if a large demand was not met. A second large payment was made in the early summer of 1942 to avert the creation of a closed ghetto in Węgrów.⁷

As this evidence suggests, the town's ghetto remained open. Appointed Kreishauptmann of Sokołów Podlaski on June 10, 1940, Reichslandwirtschaftsrat Ernst Grams appears to have intended its closure. In a February 1, 1941, report, he stated that Węgrów was one of six concentration points for Jews in the Kreis and promised to close these ghettos as soon as weather permitted.⁸ Grams never implemented this plan fully. In Węgrów, as well as in Stoczek Węgrowski and Łochów, the ghettos remained open. Many eyewitnesses in Węgrów later claimed that the Germans nonetheless had created a Jewish quarter, as migrants and expellees were housed in the southern part of town, where Jews had been most heavily concentrated before the war. But many Polish Christians continued to live in this neighborhood. Some Jews continued to reside outside the Jewish neighborhood. Until Yom Kippur 1942, Jews were allowed free movement about the town, except perhaps for a few streets that housed German administrative and residential buildings. From February 1941, the Germans forbade Jews from leaving the town's boundaries.⁹

The February 1941 prohibition on Jewish movement beyond Węgrów brought a drastic deterioration in Jewish living conditions. Most Jewish business owners could not sustain operations by the end of 1941. Some traveled illicitly to the Warsaw ghetto for merchandise to stock their stores. A far larger number had to close their businesses. Some were wholly or partially expropriated by Poles. Under these conditions, poverty became widespread, as unemployment consumed virtually all those not employed by official Judenrat institutions. Most Jews now hovered on the edge of starvation, due to the prohibition on Jewish movement and the refusal of Grams's administration to make winter food rations available to Jews and Poles. The majority of Węgrów's Jews sought charity assistance in September 1941. The Judenrat, which reopened its community kitchen to feed the destitute, could provide meals only for 1,200 people. In early 1941 and again later that year, typhus epidemics ravaged the Jewish community.¹⁰

To secure money to pay bribes and to meet quotas for forced labor, the Judenrat resorted from mid-1941 to authoritarian measures. The Jewish Police arrested several families to extort money from them, and by July 1942, it even raided the homes of Jews behind on their taxes, conscripting able-bodied men for forced labor.¹¹

Although Węgrów's ghetto remained open, the town's Jews realized by the summer of 1942 that they would not be excluded from deportations to the Treblinka extermination camp. Suspicions about the camp heightened in July 1942 after forced laborers from Węgrów working there did not return home. In July, the wives of German military and police officials in Węgrów told Jews who worked for them to hide their valuables. Then, on August 24, 1942, posters were hung in Węgrów signed by Grams restricting access to Jewish neighborhoods only to registered residents and voiding all Jewish travel passes. The majority of the town's Jews realized that Grams's orders signaled their impending deaths. Many Jews constructed hiding places in their homes, and some arranged shelter with local farmers, usually in exchange for advance payment. Fearing the Germans would send them to their deaths on Yom Kippur, private services were begun early. The Shacharis (services of morning prayer) and Musaf (additional service recited on festive days) were prayed on Sunday, September 20, 1942, on the evening of Yom Kippur, with weeping interrupting the cantor at one such service during the Unesaneh Tokef (liturgical poem).¹²

The Germans' extermination of Węgrów's Jews began at dawn on Yom Kippur (Monday, September 21, 1942). Members of the SS, aided by Ukrainian auxiliaries, German Gendarmes, and Polish (Blue) Police, surrounded the town. Then they went from house to house, ordering the Jews—approximately 9,000 people—to the town's square. Those who refused or were too old or infirm to comply were shot in their homes. By some accounts, the Germans murdered some 600 Jews in the first two hours of the roundup. More than 2,000 Jews perished from gunshots in Węgrów before this first effort to exterminate Węgrów's Jews ended. Only 100 to 200 of the town's Jews were selected to form a postliquidation labor force. In the late afternoon, the remainder of those assembled, between 3,500 and 5,000 people, were marched 17 kilometers (10.6 miles) to the train station in Sokołów Podlaski. Along the way, the Germans shot those who failed to keep pace with the march. A large group of young Jews—reacting to a prearranged signal—fled en masse into the woods. Although an unknown number of them were shot, some survived. The march's remaining Jews, placed on wagons at the train station, were sent to the Treblinka extermination camp.

In Węgrów, the SS, German Gendarmes, and Polish (Blue) Police began searching for more than 2,000 Jews believed to be hiding. In the following days, an unknown number, possibly more than 1,400, were extricated from their hiding places and shot at the cemetery. After a week the SS departed and responsibility for pursuing Jews still in hiding fell to the Gendarmerie.¹³

In Węgrów, Christian complicity accompanied the murder of Jews in hiding. The Germans initially asked members of the Polish volunteer fire department to help them locate hidden Jews. Fire department members soon surpassed the Germans engaged in this task. Local members of the Polish (Blue) Police also participated at the outset in executions of Węgrów's Jews. The German police came to rely heavily on both forces to search for and execute Jews in hiding. Extricated from hiding by teams of firemen, groups of Jews usually were accompanied to the cemetery by one member of the Gendarmerie and six armed members of the Polish (Blue) Police. The firemen provided further reinforcement, surrounding the armed guards. Polish workers buried the dead. As payment the Poles received clothing that had belonged to the executed Jews. The fire department and their Polish followers became known as "the dentists" for the gold that they stripped from the mouths of Jews murdered at the cemetery.¹⁴

After locking up members of the postliquidation Jewish labor force for several weeks in an armory, the Germans organized an enclosed ghetto in Węgrów during the second week of November. Located on the corner of the main market square and Gdańsk Street, the ghetto was policed by German Gendarmes. Those who resided there, including some who had survived the Yom Kippur roundup in hiding, were required to repair Jewish homes and businesses to prepare them for transfer to local non-Jews. German police patrolled the ghetto, which had between 150 and 300 residents, executing Jews they found there during the day for evading work. At night, they confined most of the ghetto's residents to the basement of a large building on the corner of the square. The ghetto was administered by a Judenrat, which remained briefly under the direction of Mordechai Zajman. About another 100 Jews were allowed to remain outside the ghetto, as they were registered as workers necessary for the German war effort. Another 100 to 200 Jews refused to register with the Germans, preferring to remain in hiding. On the night of April 26–27, 1943, the Germans surrounded the ghetto and the homes of Jews officially living outside of it. That night, they shot the majority of the town's surviving Jews. The search for those in hiding continued through at least June 10, when the Germans executed about 10 Jews.¹⁵

In March 1944, a team from Sonderkommando 1005, the unit charged with obliterating traces of mass killings, arrived in Węgrów. In April, the officers of the Sonderkommando forced a tightly guarded group of Jewish prisoners, probably from Łódź, to dig up the remains of the Jews executed in Węgrów and burn them.¹⁶

No more than 100 of Węgrów's Jews are thought to have survived the war. Some did so by making their way to Mordy to join a forced labor camp, at which Jews continued to work. Most of the remainder of Węgrów's Jews depended on the assistance of local Poles. Several young children were brought into the homes of Polish families. These included Gitel Przepiórka, 3 years old when her mother turned her over to the Kowalczyks in the summer of 1942; Zofia Shenberg, an abandoned infant discovered by Marianna Ruszkowska in Węgrów on Yom Kippur 1942; Lusia Fabiarz found by Pelagia Vogelgesang on May 1, 1943; and the 10-year-old Sara Nortman who survived the ghetto liquidations living with the Buczyński family.¹⁷ Other Poles extended assistance to Węgrów's adult Jews, some in exchange for compensation. Zbigniew Bucholc, a Pole employed at Węgrów's labor office, arranged false documents for members of the Friedman family, which enabled them to travel as non-Jews to positions in Lwów. Similar papers enabled Ella Picot and her niece, Halusha Gross, to walk off the market square during the liquidation of the town's Jews on Yom Kippur 1942.¹⁸ The Potockis in Węgrów, the Czyżewskis in Pieńki, the Toefels in Jarnice, and the Korczak and Bujalski families in Zajac all extended shelter at some time to 10 members of the Bielowski (also known as the Bielawski or Biel) family, enabling them to survive the war.¹⁹

Węgrów's Jewish community was not reconstituted after the war. A majority of the few Jews who returned to the town soon immigrated to England, Canada, the United States, Argentina, and Israel. The only one of Węgrów's 13 Torahs known to have survived the Holocaust is located today at the Sixth & I Historic Synagogue in Washington, DC.²⁰

SOURCES A number of important published sources are available, including the memoirs by Shraga Feivel Bielawski (Fajwel Bielowski), The Last Jew from Wegrow (New York: Praeger, 1991), and by Nelli Rotbart, A Long Journey: A Holocaust Memoir and After: Poland, Soviet Union, Canada (Montreal: Concordia University Chair in Canadian Jewish Studies, 2002); as well as the yizkor book, Kehilat Vengrov: Sefer zikaron (Tel Aviv: Hotsa'at yots'e Vengrov be-Yisrael be-hishtatfut yots'e Vengrov ba-Argentinah, 1961).

Documentary sources on the Jews of Węgrów during the Holocaust can be found in the following archives: AŻIH (e.g., 301/38, 301/687, 301/3387, 301/4875, and 301/6043); BA-L (e.g., B 162/6843, 6845, and 6873); USHMM (e.g., Acc.1997.A.0124 [ŻSS, reel 50, 211/1091]; Acc.1999.A.0154 [AJDC, 210/708];

RG-15.019M, reel 14 [ASG, 45 Warsaw woj.]; VHF (e.g., # 13697, 17292, 18608, 23573, 26871, 32778, 34246, 35694, 45830, 51043); and YVA (e.g., O-33/1066).

Laura Crago

NOTES

1. AŻIH, 301/6043, Władysław Okulus, “Największa tragedia w dziejach Węgrowa,” p. 1.

2. Ibid., 301/38, testimony of Fajwel Bielowski, pp. 1–2; see also his account in Bielawski, The Last Jew, pp. 20–22; and under his Americanized name, VHF, # 34246, testimony of Phillip Biel; # 23573, testimony of Sara Kaye; Kebilat Vengrov, pp. 62, 116.

3. Bielawski, The Last Jew, pp. 22, 32, 47–48; VHF, # 35694, testimony of Henry Miller; and Tomasz Szczuchura, “Terror okupanta w powiecie węgrowskim w latach 1939–1944,” Biuletyn Głównej Komisji Badania Zbrodni Hitlerowskich w Polsce 27 (1977): 57–59.

4. For population figures and the origins of the migrants, see, among others, T. Berenstein, “Deportacje i zagłada skupisk żydowskich w dystrykcie warszawskim,” BŻIH, no. 1 (January–June 1952): 95; Tomasz Szczuchura, “Życie i zagłada społeczności żydowskiej w powiecie węgrowskim w latach 1939–1944,” BŻIH, no. 1 (January–March 1978): 40–42; T. Berenstein et al., eds., Eksterminacja Żydów na ziemiach polskich w okresie okupacji hitlerowskiej: Zbiór dokumentów (Warsaw: ŻIH, 1957), p. 278 (in German) and p. 279 (in Polish); AŻIH, 301/6043 (introduction); and 301/38, pp. 1–2; Bielawski, The Last Jew, pp. 22–24; and Barbara Engelking, “Życie codzienne Żydów w miasteczkach dystryktu warszawskiego,” in Barbara Engelking, Jacek Leociak, and Dariusz Libionka, eds., Provincia noc. Życie i zagłada Żydów w dystrykcie warszawskim (Warsaw: Wydawnictwo IFiS PAN, 2007), p. 219.

5. USHMM, Acc.1999.A.0154 (AJDC), 210/708 (Węgrów), pp. 39, 47–48; Bielawski, The Last Jew, p. 23; and VHF, # 34246; # 35694; and # 17292, testimony of Nellie Kapsan.

6. Bielawski, The Last Jew, pp. 23, 30, 36, 38, 41–43, 46, 39; USHMM, Acc.1997.A.0124 (ŻSS), reel # 8, 211/129, p. 43, and reel # 50, 211/1091 (Węgrów), p. 10; VHF, # 13697, testimony of Renia Lipska-Micznik, 1996; and # 34246; Jacek Andrzej Młynarczyk, “Treblinka—obóz śmierci ‘akcji Reinhardt,’” in Dariusz Libionka, ed., Akcja Reinhardt. Zagłada Żydów w Generalnym Gubernatorstwie (Warsaw: IPN, 2004), pp. 217–218.

7. Bielawski, The Last Jew, pp. 23–34, 27, 48, 38, 46; AŻIH, 301/6043, p. 2; and VHF, # 23573, testimony of Sara Kaye; # 45830, testimony of Leokadia Michalska.

8. On the creation of six regional concentration points for the Jews in Kreis Sokolow Węgrowski, see Document # 45 in Berenstein et al., Eksterminacja Żydów, p. 108.

9. AŻIH, 301/6043, pp. 1–2; 301/3387, p. 1; VHF, # 32778, testimony of Maria Borowska; # 51043, testimony of Ella Picot; # 35694; # 45830; Bielawski, The Last Jew, p. 29; and Szczuchura, “Życie i zagłada,” p. 44. Available sources differ on whether the concentration of Jews in Węgrów should be regarded as a ghetto or not. For example, Bielawski says “there was no ghetto” in Węgrów but goes on to say that all the town’s “Jews had been concentrated in one area. Only in a very few cases did Jews live together with Christians.” In their VHF testimonies, Borowska, Picot, Miller, and Michalska all discuss

“Aryan” or “Christian” and “Jewish” sections of town, with Picot describing the town’s main square as “neutral ground.”

10. Bielawski, The Last Jew, pp. 38, 43–44, 46, 49; VHF, # 32778; # 35694; # 17292; and USHMM, Acc.1997.A.0124, reel 50, 211/1091 (Węgrów), p. 10. The failure of Grams’s administration to deliver food rations to Jews and Poles in Kreis Sokolow is the subject of USHMM, Acc.1997.A.0124, reel # 8, 211/129, pp. 45–47; reel # 44, 211/912, p. 20; and reel # 45, 211/950 (Siedlce), pp. 13, 30–46.

11. Bielawski, The Last Jew, pp. 46–49; and VHF, # 35694.

12. Bielawski, The Last Jew, pp. 45, 48, 53–56; VHF, # 26871, testimony of Perla Orenstein; and Szczuchura, “Życie i zagłada,” p. 46.

13. Szczuchura, “Życie i zagłada,” pp. 46–47; AŻIH, 301/6043, pp. 3, 5; Jacek Andrzej Młynarczyk, “‘Akcja Reinhardt’ w gettach prowincjonalnych dystryktu warszawskiego, 1942–1943,” in Engelking, Leociak, and Libionka, Provincia noc, p. 67; Bielawski, The Last Jew, pp. 57–62; and VHF, # 35694; # 51043; # 32778; # 34246; # 26871; and # 45830. Agreement exists over the bloody nature of the Germans’ liquidation of the Węgrów ghetto, but discrepancies emerge in the documentation over the number of Jews murdered in Węgrów. Młynarczyk, for example, cites a testimony by a member of Węgrów’s Jewish police force, who worked over the course of two days to remove the bodies of 2,000 Jews murdered in Węgrów; see BA-L, B 162/6843, testimony of Ruwen F., June 12, 1962, p. 55.

14. On Polish collaboration, see the account of Władysław Okulus, AŻIH, 301/6043, pp. 4–7, 9–10, and those of Fajwel Bielowski: AŻIH, 301/38, p. 2; Bielawski, The Last Jew, pp. 57–67; and VHF, # 34246. Equally useful are the smaller treatments by eyewitness Hillel Zydman, titled, in English translation, “‘Good Neighbors’ as Beasts of Prey,” and by Ephraim Przepiurka, “The Way Wengrow Was Destroyed by Its Inhabitants,” in Kebilat Vengrov, pp. 63–65. See, too, VHF, # 13697.

15. Szczuchura, “Życie i zagłada,” p. 48; Bielawski, The Last Jew, pp. 77, 80–86, 97–101, 106–107, 114–115; AŻIH, 301/6043, pp. 5, 7; 301/4875, testimony of Pelagia Vogelgesang, p. 1; and VHF, # 23573.

16. AŻIH, 301/6043, pp. 8–9; 301/4875, p. 7; and Szczuchura, “Życie i zagłada,” p. 49.

17. These children’s survival accounts are retold in Gloria Glantz, “A Child’s Journey,” Holocaust/Genocide Project: Survivors Speak (June 2001), pp. 6–7, on the Web site of the International Education and Resource Network, at www.iearn.org/hgp/aeti/aeti-2001/2-SS.PDF; VHF, # 10888, testimony of Gloria Glantz; # 23573; Israel Gutman and Sara Bender, eds., The Encyclopedia of the Righteous among the Nations: Rescuers of Jews during the Holocaust, vol. 2, Poland (Jerusalem: Yad Vashem, 2004), pt. 2, pp. 683, 842–843; AŻIH, 301/4875, pp. 1–10.

18. AŻIH, 301/3387, pp. 1–4; and VHF, # 32778.

19. VHF, # 35694; and Bielawski, The Last Jew, pp. 111–144.

20. AŻIH, 301/4875, p. 9; Bielawski, The Last Jew, pp. 145–162; and David Brooks, “A Time to Dance, and Mourn,” New York Times, February 28, 2004.

WŁOCHY

Pre-1939: Włochy, town, Warsaw województwo, Poland; 1939–1944: Włochy, Kreis Warschau-Land, Distrikt Warschau, Generalgouvernement; post-1998: Włochy, województwo mazowieckie, Poland

Włochy is located on the outskirts of Warsaw, about 8 kilometers (5 miles) southwest of the city center. Only a few Jewish families were living in Włochy on the eve of war in 1939.

Włochy was occupied by the Germans at the end of September 1939. In late October a German civil administration took over the region from the military. Włochy became part of Kreis Warschau-Land; the Kreishauptmann was Regierungsrat Dr. Hermann Rupprecht.

Jewish residents of Włochy were subjected to a number of persecutory measures from early in the occupation. They had to wear white armbands bearing the Star of David; they had to perform forced labor; and their property was confiscated. At some time before the summer of 1940, a Jewish Council (Judenrat) was established in Włochy.

Information regarding the Włochy ghetto is scant, mainly because no survivor testimonies could be located for this town. A report from the Jewish Social Self-Help (JSS) in Warsaw notes that at the end of October a deadline had been set of November 15, 1940, for the resettlement of the Jews from the Włochy gmina and surrounding areas, some 700 people into Fort Solipse (aka Fort V, a nineteenth-century fort located outside the town). As the fortress was in an absolutely ruined condition, the gmina of Pruszków had offered to take in some of the Jews intended to go to Fort Solipse.¹

The establishment of the ghetto is confirmed in an official Polish postwar questionnaire, signed by the deputy mayor of Włochy. According to this report, the ghetto indeed was established on November 15, 1940. In total, around 300 Jews were brought into the Włochy ghetto, but only 17 of them were originally from Włochy. Among the others, there were 130 from Ożarów due west of Warsaw, 67 from Łomianki (gmina Młociny), 50 from the nearby gmina of Falenty, 14 from Okęcie, 12 from Warsaw, 6 from Piastów, and 6 from Skorosze. The ghetto measured about 4,860 square meters (1.2 acres) in area. Jews living in the ghetto worked in the bakery located there, in the slaughterhouse, and in workshops for sewing, tailoring, and shoemaking. Some craftsmen also received orders from the local residents of Włochy. There was no communal kitchen in the ghetto, so families had to fend for themselves. The head of the Judenrat was Jozek Ferszt. He permitted some wealthy Jews to leave the ghetto to visit the town in return for a payment. In the initial weeks, two members of the Polish (Blue) Police guarded the Jewish families in the ghetto. Subsequently German Gendarmes took over from them, and they escorted all the Jews to Warsaw.²

According to an account in the Ringelblum Archive, in early November, the Jews of Łomianki were given only until November 10 to leave Łomianki and to depart for [Fort] Solipse. Following a tip-off from local ethnic Germans, however, many of the Jews from Łomianki decided instead to move directly to the Warsaw ghetto, while another 25 moved to the ghetto established in Legionowo. The anonymous report states that around 60 Jews from Łomianki departed for [Fort] Solipse in mid-November 1940.³

Personal details of 296 Jews registered in the ghetto, including the town from which they came, were recorded by the town administration of Włochy and added to the postwar report on the ghetto as an appendix.⁴

According to a letter addressed to the JSS in Warsaw from the Włochy Judenrat, dated January 1, 1941, there were 274 Jewish residents in the Jewish quarter (dzielnica Żydowska). These people consisted mainly of women and children, who were in extreme need of material support. The letter complained in particular about a tax or “contribution” of 5 złoty per head, which had been imposed on the Jews of Włochy by the Kreishauptmann. The Judenrat requested that the JSS intervene with the Kreishauptmann to have this onerous tax rescinded. The last correspondence from the Judenrat in Włochy to the JSS is dated January 13, 1941.⁵ The JSS in Warsaw noted on January 16 that all the resettled Jews from around Włochy had been accommodated in Fort Solipse and were making urgent appeals for assistance in the form of bread and heating materials.⁶

An internal document from the Department for Resettlement (Abteilung Umsiedlung) in the office of the Gouverneur of Distrikt Warschau, dated January 20, 1941, states that the remaining 320 Jews in Włochy were scheduled to be deported to the Warsaw ghetto on February 3, 1941.⁷ It appears that the transfer may have occurred a few days earlier. According to the anonymous account concerning Łomianki in the Ringelblum Archive: “In January, the Jews who lived in [Fort] Solipse were within a half hour, put in vehicles and brought to Warsaw. [They were] not permitted to take anything with them other than a few bedding items. The entire Łomianki population—those who were in Warsaw, as well as those who were shipped from [Fort] Solipse to Warsaw and left everything behind—lives now in terrible need and poverty.”⁸ An article in the Gazeta Żydowska, dated February 18, 1941, noted that Jews from Włochy were among the recent arrivals in the Warsaw ghetto.⁹

After the ghetto liquidation, all the remaining Jewish property was confiscated by the Germans. The Jews transferred to the Warsaw ghetto shared the fate of most other Jews there. Jews from Włochy were among those who died from cold, starvation, and disease in the winter of 1941–1942. The majority were deported to the Treblinka extermination camp in the summer and fall of 1942.

After the liquidation of the ghetto in Włochy, there were several Poles in the town who provided shelter to Jews. After escaping from the Warsaw ghetto on June 30, 1942, Maria Klimczuk-Miron and her son were hidden in the home of Anna and Zygmunt Wróbel until the end of the occupation.¹⁰ Jadwiga Gedychowa, who lived in Włochy at 5 Sowińska Street, also cared for five members of a Jewish family.¹¹ Alicja Prechner hid on the “Aryan” side in Włochy, as did two other Jewish survivors, Irene Faitlowicz and Irene Rubinstein.¹² Unfortunately none of these survivors are able to provide information regarding the Włochy ghetto.

SOURCES Information on the Jewish population in Włochy during the Nazi occupation can be found in the following publications: T. Berenstein, “Deportacje i zagłada skupisk żydowskich w dystrykcie warszawskim,” BŻIH, no. 1 (1952); Czesław

Pilichowski et al., eds., Obozy hitlerowskie na ziemiach polskich 1939–1945: Informator encyklopedyczny (Warsaw: PWN, 1979), p. 556; and Barbara Engelking, Jacek Leociak, and Dariusz Libionka, eds., Prowincja noc: Życie i zagłada Żydów w dystrykcie warszawskim (Warsaw: Wydawnictwo IFiS PAN, 2007), pp. 208, 210.

Documentation regarding the fate of the Jews in Włochy during the Holocaust can be found in the following archives: AŻIH (211/124, 125, 1108 [JSS]; 301/2737, 5843 [Relacje]); IPN (ASG, sygn. 62, pp. 299–312); USHMM (Acc.1997.A.0124 [AŻIH, JSS]; RG-15.019M [IPN, ASG]; RG-15.079M [Ring]; RG-15.084 [AŻIH, Relacje]); and VHF (e.g., # 12272, 43738).

Monika Tomkiewicz and Martin Dean
trans. Steven Seegel

NOTES

1. USHMM, Acc.1997.A.0124 (AŻIH), 211/124, pp. 32–33, report of Dr. G. Wielikowski to JSS in Kraków, October 30, 1940.
2. Ibid., RG-15.019M (IPN, ASG), reel 19, sygn. 62, pp. 299–312.
3. Ibid., RG-15.079M, Ring I/847 [874.], “Geyrush Lomianki bay Varshe,” February 12, 1941.
4. The list includes the name and surname, names of parents, profession, date of birth, and place from which each person arrived; see ibid., RG-15.019M (IPN, ASG), reel 19, sygn. 62, pp. 301–312.
5. Ibid., Acc.1997.A.0124 (AŻIH), 211/1108, Włochy Judenrat letters to JSS, January 1 and 13, 1941.
6. Ibid., 211/125, undated note in German about “Aus-siedlungen im Distrikt Warschau,” January 16, 1941.
7. The order is partially reprinted in Josef Wulf, Das Dritte Reich und seine Vollstrecker: Die Liquidation von 500.000 Juden im Ghetto Warschau (Berlin: Arani, 1961), pp. 329–330.
8. USHMM, RG-15.079M, Ring I/847 [874.].
9. Gazeta Żydowska, no. 14, February 18, 1941. USHMM, RG-15.019M, reel 19, sygn. 62, p. 299, however, dates the ghetto’s liquidation on February 26, 1941.
10. AŻIH, 301/5843, testimony of Anna and Zygmunt Wróbel.
11. Michał Grynberg, Księga sprawiedliwych (Warsaw, 1993), p. 147.
12. AŻIH, 301/2737, testimony of Alicja Prechner; VHF, # 12272, testimony of Irene Faitlowicz; # 43738, testimony of Irene Rubinstein.

WOŁOMIN [AKA SOSNÓWKA]

Pre-1939: Wołomin, town, Warsaw województwo, Poland; 1939–1944: Wolomin, Kreis Warschau-Land, Distrikt Warschau, Generalgouvernement; post-1998: Wołomin, województwo mazowieckie, Poland

Wołomin is located 19 kilometers (12 miles) northeast of Warsaw. The Jewish population in 1921 was 3,079, 49.3 percent of the total population. About 100 Jews living in villages nearby were also linked to the Wołomin community. By 1939, as a result of Polish economic policies and other disruptions, the number of Jews in Wołomin had declined to 3,000, only 22 percent of the total population.¹

On the first day of World War II, the Germans bombed Wołomin, hitting neighborhoods that were predominantly Jewish and causing much damage and loss of life. The town was taken on September 13, 1939. From the first day the Germans tormented the Jews, stealing their possessions, robbing their stores, and grabbing men off the streets for forced labor. The most respected members of the community were ordered to sweep the streets and dance with their brooms. The Bet Midrash was burned together with the Torah scrolls on October 4, 1939.²

Many people fled eastward into areas taken by the Soviet army. In November, the occupiers also ordered the formation of a Jewish Council (Judenrat), chaired by Yaakov Blumberg. The Judenrat’s function was to meet all German demands; it had to organize forced labor groups and deliver money (“contributions”) and valuables. It was assisted in its functions by a Jewish police force. At the end of 1939, Jews over the age of 12 were ordered to wear the Star of David. From the beginning of the occupation Jews were subject to random shootings. When these occurred, the Judenrat was notified and ordered to bury the victims.³

In October 1940, the Germans ordered the establishment of a ghetto in Wołomin.⁴ The ghetto was composed of two neighborhoods. Jews were evicted from their homes and taken to the nearby settlement of Sosnówka,⁵ which consisted mainly of summer houses. The Jews were put in the houses of the Polish farmers, who in turn were moved into the Jewish homes. The “nicer” neighborhood on the edge of Wołomin was for members of the Judenrat, the Jewish Police, and prominent members of the community. The larger and more crowded neighborhood was for the others. At first it was an “open ghetto” with a population of 2,800 Jews, including 600 refugees expelled from Pułtusk, Wyszaków, Serock, and Nasielsk. Later on some displaced Jews arrived from Radzymin.⁶

Conditions in the ghetto were extremely overcrowded. Fourteen people, for example, were jammed into a small house with two rooms, a kitchen, and an attic.⁷ There was a severe shortage of food, which had to be obtained at inflated prices from local Poles by bartering valuables and personal possessions. Jewish artisans and craftsmen were able to exchange their finished goods for food. Others did not fare so well. Within the ghetto there was a bakery, to which farmers brought their grain. Jews ground the grain into flour on concealed hand mills, and the farmers smuggled the bread into Warsaw.⁸

There were two young Jewish women from Wołomin who had “Aryan” features that enabled them to engage in smuggling. They would travel by train to the outskirts of Warsaw, board a tram that passed by the Warsaw ghetto (but was not allowed to discharge passengers), and bribe the driver to slow down so they could jump off the tram. Then they would bribe their way into the ghetto, exchange bread for clothing, and make their way back to the ghetto in Sosnówka. The clothing was traded to the farmers for more grain to bake more bread.⁹

There is a brief note of a wedding in the ghetto, without music, singing, or dancing. Instead of rejoicing, the families in attendance read psalms as a source of consolation. Jewish marriages were forbidden, so the wedding was seen as an act of defiance. There is no mention of dates or names.¹⁰

A local “currency” was created by which needy Jews could “pay” for their free hot meals. The ghetto leaders also established an orphanage and formed a sanitation department to supervise cleanliness and run the local hospital. The physicians in charge were Drs. Resnik and Freik. Jews engaged in forced labor left the ghetto each day to work on the railroad tracks and on the estates of Polish gentry. Hundreds of young people were sent to work at camps in Lipnik, Izabelin, and Wilanów. Three hundred youths worked in a labor camp on the farm of Count Potocki.¹¹

At some time in the first half of 1941 (according to one account, in June), barbed wire was strung around the ghetto, making it an “enclosed ghetto.” The Germans placed signs at the entrance reading: “Beware, Infectious Diseases: Entry for ‘Aryans’ Forbidden!” The entrance to the ghetto was guarded by Jewish policemen.¹² In February 1941, the number of ghetto inhabitants reached 3,000. Hundreds died from starvation, overcrowded conditions, and disease, especially typhus. The Germans imposed a fine of 2,000 złoty on anyone caught smuggling food. Sometimes the smugglers, including children, were shot on the spot. Among the worst perpetrators was an SS officer named Nowak.¹³

By the summer of 1942, word arrived that the Warsaw ghetto was being liquidated. Several survivors recall the train transports to the Treblinka extermination camp that passed within sight of the Wołomin ghetto. One woman wrote:

I remember the trains. Day and night they rolled from Warsaw on the way to Treblinka. I could see the faces pressed against the small openings of the cattle cars. I could hear the cries of women and children. Often notes were thrown to the ground by someone in the transport warning: “Save yourselves,” or “Do something, we are on our way to destruction.” But of course, there was nothing we could do. It was too late. We were exhausted, starved, diseased, beaten.¹⁴

The Jews in the Sosnówka ghetto knew that nearly all the other ghettos in the vicinity had been liquidated and their day was coming soon. They frantically sought places to conceal themselves, in improvised hiding spots, underground bunkers, or the thick forests.¹⁵ All those attempting to escape and caught by the local police were taken off to be killed in some unknown place. Many Poles were indifferent to the fate of the Jews or even hostile towards them; however, several Polish families, including Antony Kleimak and his wife who rescued two Jewish families, took considerable risks to aid escaped Jews.¹⁶

At the beginning of October, the Germans liquidated the Wołomin orphanage, taking the children into the forest and murdering them. The destruction of the ghetto community began on the night of October 2, 1942,¹⁷ which was the holiday of Shemini Atzeret. By morning SS and Polish (Blue) Police had surrounded the ghetto. The Jews were driven from their houses into the village square. Anyone resisting was shot. Only a few managed to escape. They were taken to Radzymin and sent along with the Jews of that town to Treblinka. Around the same time the 300 youths working on the farm of Count Potocki were taken out and shot.¹⁸ Polish sources indicate that as many as 620 Jews were shot altogether in and around Wołomin at the time of the ghetto liquidation.¹⁹

SOURCES Publications on the history of the Jews of Wołomin and their fate during the Holocaust include the following: Shimon Kanc, ed., Sefer zikaron kehillat Wolomin (Tel Aviv: Wolomin Society, 1971); and Abraham Wein, ed., Pinkas ha-kehillot. Encyclopaedia of Jewish Communities: Poland, vol. 4, Warsaw and Its Region (Jerusalem: Yad Vashem, 1989), pp. 184–186. The ghetto in Wołomin is also mentioned in Czesław Pilichowski et al., eds., Obozy hitlerowskie na ziemiach polskich 1939–1945: Informator encyklopedyczny (Warsaw: PWN, 1979), p. 570; and Martin Weinmann, with Anne Kaiser and Ursula Krause-Schmitt, eds., Das nationalsozialistische Lagersystem (CCP) (prepared originally by ITS in 1949–1951; repr., with new introductory matter, Frankfurt am Main: Zweitausendeins, 1990), p. 690.

Documentation regarding the fate of the Jews of Wołomin under German occupation can be found in the following archives: AŻIH (e.g., 211/1132–33 [JSS]; Ring II, PH/41–1–5); IPN (ASG, sygn. 62, p. 222); USHMM (Acc.1997.A.0124 [JSS], reel 52); VHF (e.g., # 10331, 14868, 18625, 30068, 39044); and YVA.

Samuel Fishman and Martin Dean

NOTES

1. Kanc, Sefer zikaron kehillat Wolomin, p. 36; Encyclopaedia Judaica, 2nd ed., vol. 21 (Detroit: Thomson Gale/Keter, 2007), p. 153.

2. Kanc, Sefer zikaron kehillat Wolomin, p. 382; Wein, Pinkas ha-kehillot: Poland, vol. 4, Warsaw and Its Region, p. 186; VHF, # 10331, testimony of Solomon Aidelson.

3. Wein, Pinkas ha-kehillot: Poland, vol. 4, Warsaw and Its Region, p. 186; VHF, # 14868, testimony of Henry Kruger; # 18625, testimony of Kuba Markusfeld; Kanc, Sefer zikaron kehillat Wolomin, p. 381.

4. VHF, # 10331.

5. In 1921, Sosnówka had a Jewish population of 20; Blackbook of Localities Whose Jewish Population Was Exterminated by the Nazis (Jerusalem: Yad Vashem, 1965). The ghetto in Sosnówka is referred to in some sources as Kobyłka. In fact this was part of the Wołomin ghetto.

6. Wein, Pinkas ha-kehillot: Poland, vol. 4, Warsaw and Its Region, p. 186; AŻIH, 211/1132, p. 3, report dated December 30, 1940.

7. Kanc, Sefer zikaron kehillat Wolomin, p. 385.

8. Wein, Pinkas ha-kehillot: Poland, vol. 4, Warsaw and Its Region, p. 186; VHF, # 18625.

9. Kanc, Sefer zikaron kehillat Wolomin, p. 388.

10. Ibid., p. 397. One child survivor also recalls celebrating her fifth birthday party in the ghetto with several friends; VHF, # 39044, testimony of Rita Ross.

11. Wein, Pinkas ha-kehillot: Poland, vol. 4, Warsaw and Its Region, p. 186; AŻIH, 211/1133; VHF, # 18625.

12. Kapl Berman, “Meyn iberlebenishn in geto,” in Kanc, Sefer zikaron kehillat Wolomin, p. 418; VHF, # 14868; # 39044; # 10331, dates the enclosure of the ghetto in June 1941, linking it to the German attack on the Soviet Union.

13. Wein, Pinkas ha-kehillot: Poland, vol. 4, Warsaw and Its Region, p. 186; AŻIH, 211/1133; Berman, “Meyn iberlebenishn in geto,” p. 418; VHF, # 14868; # 10331.

14. Riva Kopyto Pfeffer, “Volomin Remembered,” in Kanc, Sefer zikaron kehillat Wolomin, p. 582 (English-language entry); see also VHF, # 10331.

15. Kanc, Sefer zikaron kehillat Wolomin, pp. 383–385; VHF, # 10331.

16. Wein, Pinkas ha-kehillot: Poland, vol. 4, Warsaw and Its Region, p. 186. Among those named as Righteous Among the Nations by Yad Vashem is Eleonora Warszawska of Wołomin, who hid the Rubinstein family after they escaped from the ghetto; see Shmuel Krakowski and Sara Bender, eds., The Encyclopedia of the Righteous among the Nations: Rescuers of Jews during the Holocaust—Poland (Jerusalem: Yad Vashem, 2004), p. 849. VHF, # 14868, Kruger mentions the hostile attitude of some Poles he encountered after escaping from the ghetto.

17. Kanc, Sefer zikaron kehillat Wolomin, p. 389; Joseph Kermish, ed., To Live with Honor and Die with Honor!: Selected Documents from the Warsaw Ghetto Underground Archives “O.S.” (“Oneg Shabbath”) (Jerusalem: Yad Vashem, 1986), p. 587.

18. Wein, Pinkas ha-kehillot: Poland, vol. 4, Warsaw and Its Region, p. 186; VHF, # 10331.

19. Pilichowski et al., Obozy hitlerowskie, p. 570.

ŻELECHÓW

Pre-1939: Żelechów, town, Lublin województwo, Poland; 1939–1945: Żelechów, Kreis Garwolin, Distrikt Warschau, Generalgouvernement; post-1998: Żelechów, województwo mazowieckie, Poland

Żelechów is located 85 kilometers (53 miles) southeast of Warsaw. By 1921, it had 4,806 Jewish residents.

On entering Żelechów in September 1939, the Germans burned the synagogue. Soon after, a number of Jews from the shelled town of Garwolin arrived.

Deportation of Jews from the Żelechów ghetto, September 30, 1942. USHMM WS #50433, COURTESY OF IPN

In November 1939, the new authorities established a Jewish Council (Judenrat), initially chaired by Israel Mordecai Engel. Szulim Finkelsztajn (Shalom Finkelstein), the pre-war leader of Żelechów's Zionists, soon replaced Engel. The Judenrat also included Dawid Kesselbrener (deputy), the craftsman Welwel Szprynger (Velvel Shpringer), Moses Weislander, and the tradesman Chaim Dawid Altman.

Altman also chaired the Judenrat affiliated self-help committee, which included the following members: Łódź journalist Izrael Lichtenstein (also in charge of the soup kitchen), Lipno refugee Dawid Bromberg, and Majer Dobrzyński of Łaskarzew. In the course of 1940, the kitchen operated for only 156 days. The Judenrat, the self-help committee, and the soup kitchen were located at 28 Piłsudski Street.

One of the Judenrat's first assignments was the selection of 150 Jews for labor on a German managed estate in Jarczew. Survivor Halina Gedanken recalls that after the ghetto's establishment, these laborers, having been provided with proof of employment, were permitted to walk the 3 kilometers (1.9 miles) to the estate unescorted.

By the summer of 1940, Żelechów's Jews were obliged to pay rent to continue living in their houses. Shops and businesses were either confiscated or assigned to a non-Jewish commissar. In July and August 1940, 1,200 refugees from Warsaw and Maciejowice arrived. At the end of this period, a medical office for ambulatory patients managed by gynecologist Dr. Mordechaj Szkop was organized.¹

In October 1940, an open ghetto was established in Żelechów. The ghetto was unfenced, but the Jews, as survivor Dwora Shamai recalls, knew where the borders were. The center of the town—with its marketplace and adjacent streets—was assigned to the ghetto, as many of Żelechów's Jews already lived there. The following streets were included in the ghetto: Chłopicki, Traugutt, Kościusko, 11 Listopada, and Piłsudski. Those Poles living within this area were forcibly removed and consigned to Jewish houses outside the ghetto.

Poles were allowed access to the ghetto. In addition, the Tuesday market continued to operate in the town's market square, with non-Jewish participants also receiving access. With rumors of deportations circulating by the summer of 1942, posts were erected around the ghetto in preparation for establishing a fence, but the job was never completed.²

In December 1940, a Jewish police force was established, commanded by Mejlach Szarfhar. One of the policemen—Bromberg—was later shot by the Germans. Subsequently, a 50-man fire brigade was established. Its members were exempted from forced labor and permitted to leave the ghetto.

Confiscations and house searches became more and more frequent. Living conditions in the overcrowded dwellings deteriorated. For example, in January 1941, the Judenrat reported: “Due to the establishment of a Jewish quarter in Żelechów, living conditions are terrible.” Of the 18,000 Jews in the Kreis, 12,000 were living in Żelechów by February 1942. (This total includes the 600 Jews transferred there from Stoczek Łukowski on February 9, 1941). The soup kitchen served 1,000 meals daily; half of them for 5 groszy each, the other half for no payment.

Since the Kreis center, Garwolin, had been almost completely depopulated of Jews, the Jewish Social Self-Help (JSS) in Kraków considered establishing its main branch for the Kreis elsewhere, with Żelechów a strong candidate, as it contained the most Jews. This office would supervise welfare assistance for the remainder of the Kreis, with smaller local branch organizations to be established in the other towns, where Jews still resided. Finkelsztajn sent numerous memoranda to Kraków insisting that Żelechów should be the Kreis seat, but the existing Żelechów self-help committee, consisting mostly of refugees, who claimed Finkelsztajn was corrupt to the bone, successfully undermined his credibility. Other localities were also against the establishment of the seat in Żelechów, particularly as the German Kreis authorities were based in Garwolin. Nevertheless, Finkelsztajn defended his position: “Neither Stoczek, Parysów, nor any other gossip, malicious types from Żelechów, can guarantee credible insight [on who is able to provide social assistance], but we—and only we—deserve this trust.”³

In April 1941, “due to [unhealthy] relations between local activists” in Żelechów, and despite the fact that the Germans had expelled all but 36 Jewish families from Garwolin, Kraków decided to establish the Kreis JSS committee there. Finkelsztajn finally fought his way onto the Kreis JSS committee by proposing that he should be included in it so as “not to encounter obstacles.” As of July 1941, he was a member, along with Jonathan Klepfisz and J. Wasserman.

The local branch of the JSS was established in Żelechów in April 1941. It included Dr. Mordechaj Szkop (as chairman), Dawid Bromberg (as deputy), Izrael Lichtenstein, Dawid Kesselbrener, Chil Judensznajder, Jankiel Lejb Goldcwaig, and Wolf Springer; membership was reduced to the initial three by July 1941. Nonetheless, Judenrat-JSS relations did not improve. In May 1941, Szkop wrote to Kraków, “Finkelsztajn felt that a potato and an ounce of bread are slipping from his hands. [He] began to terrorize me in ways unacceptable . . . to force me to resign.” Although this committee also offered to include Finkelsztajn, so as to be able to work in a “peaceful atmosphere,” relations only worsened with time. The committee continued to give examples of Finkelsztajn’s fraud. The JSS members claimed that they were not allowed to leave the ghetto due to Finkelsztajn’s actions.⁴

Following the start of the German-Soviet war in June 1941, Jews could leave the ghetto only for reasons of conscripted labor. That same month, four young Jews were caught smuggling sugar into the ghetto and sentenced to death; a fifth person was shot by the Germans when trying to exchange a fur for food with farmers.

In June 1941, with deteriorating sanitary conditions and cases of typhus appearing in the ghetto, the authorities ordered the opening of a 20-bed hospital. What came to be an epidemic reached its peak in August and September of 1941. By the end of that year, 637 Jews had been treated for typhus. With only 19 cases in January and 9 in February 1942, the epidemic was then considered to have been contained. At its height, during September 1941, a number of Jews were taken to the nearby labor camp in Wilga, where they dug drainage ditches near the Vistula River.⁵

In November 1941, “due to the forcible expulsion of Jews from some towns in the Kreis,” 900 additional Jews were resettled to Żelechów. The community was informed of their arrival on November 15, 1941—only five days beforehand. The newcomers included almost all the remaining Jews from Garwolin (which then became free of Jews), as well as residents of Huta Dąbrowa, Koryczany, and other villages.

As of November 1941, the Jews were allowed to live in only six localities within the Kreis: Parysów, Sobienie Jeziory, Stoczek Łukowski, Sobolew, Łaskarzew, and Żelechów. In December 1941, the Kreishauptmann moved the JSS seat to Żelechów, as both Wasserman and Klepfisz had been transferred there.

In December 1941, 3 Jews were hanged in the market square (a female teacher, a policeman, and a tradesman). In January 1942, there were reportedly 11,000 Jews living in the ghetto. Increasing poverty caused one third of the ghetto’s population to apply for winter aid, consisting of fuel and potatoes. Over 2,500 Jews applied for soup kitchen meals, yet only 1,600 were available.

The situation of the incoming refugees was especially difficult. In February 1942, Szkop sent the following comment to Kraków: “The Jewish cemetery has expanded thanks to the hospitality of local citizens towards their refugee brothers.” Moreover, “a refugee, as unwanted, is abused, and humiliated.”⁶

On March 4, 1942, the Judenrat opened a one-room orphanage for 20 children, which the JSS termed a “children’s cage.” As the power struggle continued, the Kreishauptmann ordered the deportation of Dr. Szkop to Sobienie by March 15, 1942; the deadline subsequently was postponed for one month. In the meantime, Szkop’s coworkers reported: “Szkop is of late afraid to visit the JSS office, believing that for this price, Finkelsztajn will allow him to stay.” Finkelsztajn denied any involvement. Klepfisz—who replaced Szkop in April—was arrested on June 7, 1942, and sent to the Wilga camp.⁷

In mid-July 1942, the Germans shot Finkelsztajn. Lichtenstein was nominated as the new chairman of a reorganized Judenrat. By mid-August 1942, Gedalia Kijewski had replaced him. A number of executions took place in the course of the summer in Żelechów, including those of the Polish Bürgermeister Ludwik Pudło and policeman Władysław Rybak, both of whom were sympathetic to Jews.

In July 1942, 400 laborers were sent to Wilga and 300 to Mińsk Mazowiecki. Those sent to Mińsk were repairing the Mińsk-Siedlce road for the Wolfer und Goebel Company. Another 200 Żelechów laborers worked on the Dęblin-Ryki road for the Schalinger Company. On September 18, 1942, the Kreishauptmann permitted the opening of workshops in Żelechów; however, there was work for only 20 carpenters, who were ordered to make windows and doors for 18 barracks.⁸

According to Pinkas ha-kehilot, a Jewish underground organization existed in the ghetto under the command of Isaac Weislander. It gathered clothing and food for Russian prisoners of war (POWs) who had fled from a nearby camp. Weislander was killed after some Poles informed on him, and the group was disbanded. According to The Yad Vashem Encyclopedia of the Ghettos, Yosef Melinkowski was the leader of the Żelechów underground.

Terror in the ghetto intensified just prior to its liquidation. In the course of September and early October 1942, over 700 Jews were shot and buried in 14 mass graves. According to Gedanken, the community sensed the approaching liquidation. The Germans did not announce it. On the contrary, “to mislead the Jews” they ordered shoes from cobblers one day before the liquidation.⁹

The ghetto was surrounded on September 30, 1942. In the morning, accompanied by the sound of sirens, Żelechów’s Jews were chased out onto the square, on which there stood the remains of the burned-out synagogue. Approximately 70 persons were killed during the Aktion. The remainder were taken to the train station in Sobolew (20 kilometers [12 miles] to the southwest), and from there they were sent to the Treblinka extermination camp.

The Germans left only the following Jews in Żelechów: 50 members of the fire brigade, the Jewish Police, and 25 craftsmen. The task of the firemen was to bury the dead and then sort Jewish property. Upon completing these tasks, they were sent to the Wilga camp, and then to another camp near Sobolew. The craftsmen continued working in the former study house until they were murdered on February 28, 1943. All the members of the Jewish Police, approximately 20 people including its commander Szarfhar, were shot at the Jewish cemetery in the spring of 1943.¹⁰

Several of the ghetto’s residents who had fled the deportation joined a partisan group led by Samuel Olshak. In 1943, the unit became more active, thanks to weapons airdropped by the Soviets. Its actions included operations to free Soviet POWs from a camp near Dęblin-Irena, as well as the destruction of railways and highways in the Dęblin-Lubartów area.

SOURCES The following publications include information on the Żelechów ghetto: Barbara Engelking, Jacek Leociak, and Dariusz Libionka, eds., Prowincja noc: Życie i zagłada Żydów w dystrykcie warszawskim (Warsaw: Wydawnictwo IFiS PAN, 2007); Czesław Pilichowski et al., eds., Obozy hitlerowskie na ziemiach polskich 1939–1945: Informator encyklopedyczny (Warsaw: PWN, 1979), p. 598; Abraham Wein, Bracha Freundlich, and Wila Orbach, eds., Pinkas ha-kehillot. Encyclopaedia of Jewish Communities: Poland, vol. 7, Lublin and Kielce (Jerusalem: Yad Vashem, 1999), pp. 199–203; Guy Miron, ed., The Yad Vashem Encyclopedia of the Ghettos during the Holocaust (Jerusalem: Yad Vashem, 2010), pp. 975–977.

Archival sources include AŻIH (210/755 [AJDC]; 211/394, 211/1176–1180 [JSS]; 301/4800, 301/5820 [Relacje]; IPN (ASG); USHMM (Acc.1997.A.0124 [JSS]; Acc.1999.A.0154 [AJDC]; RG-15.019M [Court inquiries about executions and mass graves in districts, provinces, camps, and ghettos]); and VHF (# 12350, 30347).

Jolanta Kraemer

NOTES

1. USHMM, Acc.1999.A.0154 (AJDC), 210/755 (Żelechów), p. 8; Acc.1997.A.0124 (JSS), 211/1176 (Żelechów), pp. 1, 7–8, 12–13; AŻIH, 301/5820, testimony of Halina Gedanken; Gazeta Żydowska, March 6, 1942.

2. VHF, # 12350, testimony of Dwora Shamai, 1996; # 30347, testimony of Janusz Sierczyński, 1997; AŻIH, 301/5820; USHMM, Acc.1997.A.0124, 211/1179 (Żelechów), p. 43.

3. Gazeta Żydowska, March 6, 1942; VHF, # 30347; USHMM, Acc.1997.A.0124, 211/1177 (Żelechów), pp. 2–8, 12–15, 38; 211/1178 (Żelechów), p. 51.

4. USHMM, Acc.1997.A.0124, 211/394 (Garwolin), pp. 19, 42–44, 57, 63; 211/1176, pp. 29, 49–51; 211/1177, pp. 6, 16–18, 22, 25–26; 211/1178, pp. 29–31; and 211/1179, pp. 19–21.

5. Ibid., 211/1177, pp. 27, 35–36, 50; 211/1178, pp. 3, 8–9; and 211/1179, p. 35.

6. Gazeta Żydowska, January 9, 1942; AŻIH, 301/4800, testimony of Jankiel Grynblat, 1950; USHMM, Acc.1997.A.0124, 211/1178, pp. 40–42, 47, 59, 64–65; and 211/1179, pp. 5–6, 19–21, 40.

7. USHMM, Acc.1997.A.0124, 211/1179, pp. 36–37, 53–54, 68–69, 73; 211/1180 (Żelechów), p. 3; Gazeta Żydowska, March 29, 1942.

8. AŻIH, 301/5820; Gazeta Żydowska, August 16, 1942; USHMM, Acc.1997.A.0124, 211/1180, pp. 17–18, 21, 33; Rejestr miejsc i faktów zbrodni popełnionych przez okupanta hitlerowskiego na ziemiach polskich w latach 1939–1945: Województwo siedleckie (Warsaw: GKBZHP, IPN, 1985), pp. 337–338.

9. AŻIH, 301/5820.

10. USHMM, RG-15.019M (Court inquiries about executions and mass graves in districts, provinces, camps, and ghettos), reel 13, file 307–308; AŻIH, 301/5820; Rejestr miejsc, p. 339.

ŻYRARDÓW

Pre-1939: Żyrardów (Yiddish: Zsbirardov), town, Warsaw województwo, Poland; 1939–1945: Żyrardow, Kreis Sochaczew, Distrikt Warschau, Generalgouvernement; post-1998: Żyrardów, województwo mazowieckie, Poland

Żyrardów is located about 45 kilometers (28 miles) southwest of Warsaw. It is named after Philip Girard (Żyrard), the French inventor of the spinning mill, who first set up spinning mills in Poland in 1825. In 1921, there were 2,547 Jews living in Żyrardów, comprising 12 percent of the total population. On the outbreak of war on September 1, 1939, there were more than 3,000 Jews in Żyrardów, out of a total population of more than 30,000.

In the war’s first days, there was great panic as thousands of fleeing refugees passed through and the Luftwaffe bombed the town. Some local Jews also sought to escape. A few made it across the border into areas under Soviet control, but most were forced to return by the rapid German advance. German forces captured the town on September 8, 1939. Jewish properties were plundered by the local Polish population, as well as by “Poles” who were recognized as ethnic Germans (Volks-deutsche) by the new authorities. The Germans held refugees from Łódź for two weeks in an open stadium, without cover from the rain. The refugees were greatly helped by local Jews, who brought them food and clothing.¹

VOLUME II: PART A

The deportation of Jews from the Żyrardów ghetto, n.d.
USHMM WS #81229, COURTESY OF IPN

In October 1939, the German military authorities ordered the establishment of a Jewish Council (Judenrat), which was headed by Jacob Baran (formerly a member of the Mizrahi political party).² On October 26, 1939, a German civil administration took over from the German military: Żyrardów was incorporated into Kreis Sochaczew. The Kreishauptmann was Landrat Pott. The head of the Judenrat, Baran, believed that “money will soften the heart of the German,” and he collected contributions from all segments of the Jewish population to bribe the Germans.³ Following the initial abuses and forced labor, there was a period of relative quiet in Żyrardów, with the required number of laborers being provided daily by the Judenrat.⁴

In July 1940, the Jewish population of the town was about 3,200, including some 1,000 refugees, mostly from parts of Poland annexed to the Reich, and almost all in desperate need.⁵ In December 1939, the Judenrat had established a public kitchen, which by January 1941 was serving 700 meals per day and also distributing food products to 600 needy people.⁶ Under the authority of the Judenrat, a Jewish court was established for the Jews of the town, regulating mainly disputes between Jewish tenants and subtenants; its decisions were also recognized by the other local courts.⁷

In December 1940, the Germans established a Jewish residential area (dzielnica żydowska), or open ghetto, in Żyrardów.⁸ The Jews were given until December 15 to move into the specified ghetto area, which lay within the following streets (German names): Familienstrasse, 1. Maistrasse, and Bahnhofstrasse. Some houses on the streets leading to Bahnhofstrasse were excluded from the ghetto. The Jews were permitted to take their smaller household items (Hausrat) with them but officially were supposed to leave the furniture (Einrichtungsgegenstände) behind. Accommodation within the Jewish quarter was to be assigned by the Judenrat. After December 15, Jews were not permitted to leave the ghetto. To assist with the transfer, a 50-member unit of Jewish Police (Jüdischer Ordnungsdienst) was established. The Jews were obliged to report to the authorities the addresses of all the apartments vacated by the move into the ghetto.⁹

In the second half of January 1941, 900 Jews from Sochaczew, and additional Jews from other places in the Kreis, including Mszczonów, were moved into the Żyrardów ghetto. A telegram from the Jewish Council in Żyrardów was received on January 19 by the Jewish Social Self-Help (JSS) in Warsaw that read: “Very many Jews from Sochaczew have arrived—requesting immediate help.” The Judenrat housed a number of the new arrivals in the synagogue, where they were subjected to severe beatings and abuse from the German Gendarmerie.¹⁰ Due to the short period of its existence, there were no serious outbreaks of disease in the Żyrardów ghetto and only a few deaths from illness or starvation.

On January 31, 1941, the Germans issued an instruction to the Judenrat that all the Jews were to be transferred to the Warsaw ghetto within 48 hours, taking with them no more than 25 kilograms (55 pounds) of their belongings.¹¹ Although Baran had known about the deportation plan before, he kept it secret, hoping somehow to forestall it through bribes. Therefore, no one was prepared when the news of the resettlement was announced.¹²

On February 1, 1941, German forces surrounded the Jewish residential area, and going from house to house, they took the Jews out to waiting railcars, separating men from women.¹³ The Jews were transported for one day and one night without being told their destination. Upon arrival in Warsaw, everyone was ordered to undress and taken to the bath; their clothing was steamed, and women’s hair was cut.

Some secondary sources indicate that similar short-lived ghettos were also established in the neighboring towns of Mszczonów and Wiskitki (Yiddish: Viskit).¹⁴ The available contemporary documentation does not appear to confirm this, although it remains unclear. According to a report in the Gazeta Żydowska, dated January 24, 1941, at that time it was still not known whether the Jews of Mszczonów would remain in place or be transferred to the Jewish quarter in Żyrardów. A subsequent report dated January 28 mentions a 6:00 p.m. curfew in Mszczonów and that exceptions were permitted only for those with special permits.¹⁵ The Kreishauptmann’s January 30 order concerning the clearing of Jews from the Kreis mentions that henceforth the Jews were confined to their residential areas (Wohngebiete). However, the same order lists Żyrardów, Wiskitki, and Mszczonów together for transfer to the Warsaw ghetto between February 1 and 9—implying, perhaps, that all these Jews were to be expelled via the Żyrardów ghetto.¹⁶

Firsthand accounts of the events in Mszczonów could not be located. However, two survivors from Wiskitki both report that in the period just before the expulsion to Warsaw the Jewish Council faced repeated demands for contributions from the Germans. The Jews surrendered all their remaining jewelry, silver, and gold, as each time they were assured that if they paid, the Germans would not create a ghetto in Wiskitki. Neither of them states that a ghetto was created but rather that on February 4 the Jews of Wiskitki were marched through the snow to Żyrardów, where they spent one night in the deserted ghetto, six or seven families to a room, before being sent on to the Warsaw ghetto the next day. Fajga Wołkowicz confirmed that two days earlier the Jews of Żyrardów had been expelled to Warsaw but noted that the Żyrardów Judenrat head, Baran, and his helpers were still there to supervise the loading of the Wiskitki Jews.¹⁷ Already on February 3, a permit was issued by the branch of the Arbeitsamt (labor office) in Żyrardów for one of its employees to remove salvaged Jewish property from the Jewish residential area.¹⁸ On February 11, 1941, the Gazeta Żydowska reported the arrival of 600 Jews from Żyrardów in the Warsaw ghetto; these Jews were sent for disinfection at a facility on Spokojnej Street.¹⁹

During the last months of 1941 and the first of 1942, a severe typhus epidemic in the Warsaw ghetto claimed the lives of many Jews from Żyrardów and its surrounding areas. The worst conditions of hunger and disease came in January 1942.²⁰ Jacob Baron, the former head of the Żyrardów Judenrat, registered for “volunteer” work in the Warsaw ghetto and never returned after the war.²¹ The majority of the remaining Jews from Żyrardów were deported to the extermination camps from Warsaw in the summer and fall of 1942.

A number of Jews from Żyrardów played an active role in the Warsaw Uprising in April and May 1943.²² Among those who were killed in the fighting was Itzhak Bloistein—one of the organizers of the uprising and the commander of a Dror (Freedom) detachment. Other fighters from Żyrardów who laid down their lives included Itzhak Greenboim, Aaron Haldzband, Moshe Ziegler, Feivl Schwarzshtein, and the Jewish women Irke Jakobowitch and Roize Blumstein.²³

Abraham Margolis from Żyrardów was a member of the group who planned the uprising at the Sobibór extermination camp. Margolis was 1 of 47 Jews known to have successfully escaped from the camp and survived the war.²⁴

SOURCES Much of this entry is based on the yizkor book, Mardekhai V. Bernshteyn, ed., Pinkes Zshirardov, Amshinov un Viskit: Yizker-bukh tsu der gesbikhte fun di kebiles . . . (Buenos Aires: Di landlayt-faraynen in Amerike, Yisroel, Frankraykh, Argentine, 1961). Additional information on the Jewish population of the town can be found in Elżbieta Hulka-Laskowska, Żyrardowsky Żydzi w mojej pamięci (Żyrardów: Stacja Naukowa MOBN, 1985).

Documentation regarding the fate of the Jewish communities of Żyrardów, Mszczonów, and Wiskitki under German occupation can be found in the following archives: AŻIH (e.g., Ring I/328/2, 352, 353, 458, 947, 1261; and 211/1071 and 1190); USHMM (Acc.1997.A.0124 [JSS]; RG-15.079M [AŻIH, Ring]); VHF (e.g., # 11002); and YVA.

Samuel Schalkowsky and Martin Dean

NOTES

1. Bernshteyn, Pinkes Zshirardov, pp. 453–454. According to another account in AŻIH, Ring I/458, published in Joseph Kermish, ed., To Live with Honor and Die with Honor!: Selected Documents from the Warsaw Ghetto Underground Archives “O.S.” (“Oneg Shabbath”) (Jerusalem: Yad Vashem, 1986), p. 230, the sports stadium camp held mostly Polish POWs. This account notes that “Jewish soldiers had to suffer much abuse from their Polish colleagues” and that “city people brought plenty of food, but demanded high prices.”

2. Isruel Milnbak, “Der ershter Pogrom un nach im,” in Bernshteyn, Pinkes Zshirardov, p. 482.

3. M. Boymerder, “In Iene Teg,” in Bernshteyn, Pinkes Zshirardov, p. 466.

4. Etarah Blumenshtayn, “Geblibn Eyne,” in Bernshteyn, Pinkes Zshirardov, p. 525.

5. Rukhl Fogel, “Dos gevein fun Zshirardover geto,” in Bernshteyn, Pinkes Zshirardov, p. 473.

6. USHMM, Acc.1997.A.0124, reel 54 (AŻIH, 211/1190), correspondence of the Jewish Council of Elders and Aid Committee in Żyrardów with the JSS in Kraków. These documents are also published in Bernshteyn, Pinkes Zshirardov, pp. 455–462.

7. Bernshteyn, Pinkes Zshirardov, p. 454; see also Isaiah Trunk, Judenrat: The Jewish Councils in Eastern Europe under Nazi Occupation (1972; Lincoln: University of Nebraska Press, 1996), p. 181.

8. USHMM, Acc.1997.A.0124, reel 54 (AŻIH, 211/1190), Żyrardów, January 14, 1941, letter to JSS in Kraków.

9. Ibid., RG-15.079M (AŻIH), Ring I/353; see also Bernshteyn, Pinkes Zshirardov, p. 454.

10. USHMM, Acc.1997.A.0124, 211/1071, p. 56; Bernshteyn, Pinkes Zshirardov, p. 454; Gazeta Żydowska, no. 11, February 7, 1941. Avraham Margulis, “Sobibor—Dos Schechtheuz far Mentshn,” in Bernshteyn, Pinkes Zshirardov, p. 506, however, dates the transfer of Jews from Mszczonów, Wiskitki, and Sochaczew in December 1941. See also Paweł Fijałkowski, Żydzi sochaczewscy (Sochaczew: Muzeum Ziemi Sochaczewskiej i Pola Bitwy nad Bzura, 1989), p. 22; and Milnbak, “Der ershter Pogrom,” p. 484, which dates the transfer in January 1941.

11. USHMM, RG-15.079M (AŻIH), Ring I/352, Kreishauptmann Sochaczew-Blonie, order concerning the clearing of the Kreis of Jews, January 31, 1941.

12. Fogel, “Dos gevein,” p. 469.

13. Berel Vaytser, “Vie azoy mir hobn sikh geratevet,” in Bernshteyn, Pinkes Zshirardov, p. 517.

14. For example, Guy Miron, ed., The Yad Vashem Encyclopedia of the Ghettos during the Holocaust (Jerusalem: Yad Vashem, 2010), pp. 503–504, describes an open ghetto in Mszczonów; Czesław Pilichowski et al., eds., Obozy hitlerowskie na ziemiach polskich 1939–1945: Informator encyklopedyczny (Warsaw: PWN, 1979), p. 564, mentions a ghetto in Wiskitki.

474 WARSAW REGION

15. Gazeta Żydowska, nos. 7–8, January 24 and 28, 1941.
16. USHMM, RG-15.079M (AŻIH), Ring I/352.
17. VHF, # 11002, testimony of Samuel Feldman; AŻIH, 301/5992, testimony of Fajga Wołkowicz.
18. USHMM, RG-15.079M (AŻIH), Ring I/328/2.
19. Gazeta Żydowska, no. 12, February 11, 1941.
20. See Kermish, To Live with Honor and Die with Honor, pp. 326–327.
21. Freyde Sheradzki, “Zvishn lebn un teut,” in Bernshteyn, Pinkes Zshirardov, p. 502.
22. “Die finf Zshirardover heldn,” in Bernshteyn, Pinkes Zshirardov, pp. 497–500.
23. Yosele Yakubovitsh, “Begegnishn mit Zshirardover Yidn,” in Bernshteyn, Pinkes Zshirardov, p. 569.
24. Margulis, “Sobibor,” pp. 507–515. The 47 survivors are listed in Jules Schelvis, Sobibor: A History of a Nazi Death Camp (Oxford: Berg in association with the United States Holocaust Memorial Museum, 2007), p. 168.

KRAKÓW REGION

View of the Kraków ghetto gate, ca. 1941. The text in Yiddish reads Yidisher Voynbazirk (Jewish residential district).
USHMM WS #73170, COURTESY OF IPN

KRAKÓW REGION (DISTRIKT KRAKAU)

Pre-1939: parts of the Kraków, Kielce, and Lwów województwa, Poland; 1941–1945: Distrikt Krakau, Generalgouvernement; post-1998: parts of województwa podkarpackie, małopolskie, and świętokrzyskie, Poland

Distrikt Krakau was established by the German authorities on October 26, 1939, as one of the four initial Distrikte of the Generalgouvernement. On this date the city of Kraków became the capital of the Generalgouvernement, where Generalgouverneur Hans Frank soon took up residence in the Wawel Castle, as well as the capital of Distrikt Krakau. The Distrikt was divided into 12 Kreise (counties), each governed by a Kreishauptmann. The Kreise were Debica, Jaroslau, Jasło, Krakau-Land, Krosno, Miechów, Neumarkt, Neu-Sandez, Przemyśl, Reichshof, Sanok, and Tarnów.

According to German statistics from 1940, Distrikt Krakau held more than 200,000 Jews, exceeding 5 percent of the total population.¹ These statistics, however, are likely an underestimate, as they do not fully reflect the large influx of Jewish refugees that arrived at the end of 1939 from Polish territories incorporated into the Reich.

The chief German civil authority in the Distrikt was initially Distrikt governor Dr. Otto Gustav Wächter, who was succeeded first by Richard Wendler, then by Dr. Ludwig Losacker (provisionally), and finally by Dr. Kurt von Burgsdorff. The SS and Police Leader (SSPF) was the senior police official in the Distrikt, subordinated to the Higher SS and Police Leader (HSSPF) of the Generalgouvernement, SS-Obergruppenführer Friedrich Wilhelm Krüger. The position of SSPF in Distrikt Krakau was held in the following succession: Hans Walter Zech, SS-Oberführer Julian Scherner, and finally SS-Sturmabführer Willi Haase. The SSPF oversaw the forces of the Sicherheitspolizei (Sipo) in the Distrikt and also those of the Ordnungspolizei (Orpo), which included both the Schutzpolizei (Schupo) in the cities and the Gendarmerie in the smaller towns and rural areas. The relevant local civil administrators, the Kreishauptmänner and their subordinates, were generally in charge of ghetto affairs. Surveillance and order were in the hands of the German Sipo and Orpo forces. The Jewish Police (Jüdischer Ordnungsdienst) kept order in the ghettos, guarding their internal borders, whereas Orpo forces and Polish (Blue) Police patrolled the ghettos externally.

Taking over authority from the military on October 26, 1939, the German civil administration introduced a series of antisemitic laws that deprived the Jews of their economic, cultural, and social rights and regulated forced labor.² On November 28, 1939, the Generalgouverneur ordered the establishment of Jewish Councils (Judenräte) for each Jewish community.³ The members were to be held personally responsible for the implementation of German orders. The main tasks of the Jewish Councils included the organization of forced labor, the collection of taxes and contributions, registration, the enforcement of sanitary regulations, and the organization of welfare and medical services. As of December 1, 1939, all Jews were obliged to wear armbands bearing the Star of David.⁴

Several improvised ghettos—for example, in Pruchnik, Sanok, and Leżajsk and, according to one source, also in Przeworsk—were established in Distrikt Krakau at the end of 1939. These ghettos were formed in response to the Soviet authorities closing the frontier to further immigration by Jews. Once German expulsion efforts in various border towns had failed to drive all the Jews across the border, in some places those that remained were forced to move together in specific parts of town. These early, improvised ghettos were established around November or December 1939, that is, just after the first documented ghetto in Piotrków Trybunalski (Distrikt Radom).

In the summer of 1940, Generalgouverneur Hans Frank announced a temporary halt to ghetto establishment. Nevertheless, in some towns, such as Tarnów, the first stage of ghettoization commenced with the exclusion of Jews from specific streets in the center of town. The main development at this time was the removal of Jews from the capital city of Kraków, as Stadthauptmann Dr. Carl Schmid sought to reduce considerably its Jewish population of more than 60,000 people. Initially Jews were encouraged to leave voluntarily. In response, tens of thousands of Jews left Kraków, mainly for other towns in the Distrikt: for example, some 4,000 fled to Tarnów and another 1,000 to Miechów. Then from November 1940 until March 1941, about 10,000 Jews were deported from the city of Kraków into Distrikt Lublin.

The establishment of the Kraków ghetto in March 1941 was followed by a wave of ghetto creation in the spring of 1941: additional ghettos were set up, for example, in Miechów, Bochnia, Jasło, and Wolbrom. Most of these ghettos were initially unfenced, although some were enclosed subsequently. In Miechów, the Judenrat was instructed to build a 5-meter-high (16.4-foot-high) wall topped with barbed wire. Jews continued to work outside the ghettos, facilitating the smuggling in of food to support the ghetto inhabitants.

The administration of welfare was transferred from the Jewish Councils to the Jewish Social Self-Help (JSS) organization, which had set up branches in most places with a significant Jewish population by mid-1941. The JSS branches opened soup kitchens, distributed food and clothing, and sought to provide for children and the elderly. The level of assistance was generally insufficient to meet the dire needs of the Jewish population, but it served to ameliorate conditions for the poorest Jews. Jewish Councils were criticized for their treatment of refugees, alleged corruption, and favoritism. However, the Judenräte inevitably faced “choiceless choices,” which also produced a high turnover among their leadership. A number were killed for failing to meet the incessant and impossible German demands. The Judenräte’s most common response to German pressure was bribery, but this had little chance of success in the long term, as Jewish financial resources became exhausted.

Jews forced out of Myślenice taking their household possessions on horse-drawn wagons, under the supervision of Kraków district officials, on August 22, 1942. Maria Gorniesiewicz clandestinely photographed this scene from the balcony of her second-story apartment.

USHMM WS #38494 COURTESY OF SHALOM FOUNDATION: GOLDA TENCER-SZURMIEJ COLLECTION

Following another brief halt to ghettoization, ordered by Hans Frank in the summer of 1941s, a more intense wave of ghetto establishment started towards the end of that year. Among the reasons for the Germans to establish ghettos were concerns about the spread of typhus among the Jews, the desire to control black market activities, and the acquisition of space in the cities and towns. On October 25, 1941, Generalgouverneur Frank decreed that henceforth Jews leaving their place of residence without permission were subject to the death penalty.⁵ Although formal ghettoization was not as widespread as in Distrikt Radom, more than 25 additional ghettos were established between October 1941 and February 1942 in Distrikt Krakau, many of them unfenced. Several of these were in Kreis Reichshof, where on December 17, 1941, Kreishauptmann Dr. Heinz Ehaus had ordered the establishment of Jewish quarters, setting dates for them to be closed. In Rzeszów, the closing order was effective on January 10, 1942; for the remainder of the Kreis, it was February 1, 1942. In Kolbuszowa, also in Kreis Reichshof, where a ghetto had been established previously in June 1941, on January 5, 1942, posters were put up around the ghetto, prohibiting Germans and other “Aryans” from entering the ghetto without a special pass.⁶

The new more stringent movement restrictions severely impacted Jewish communities. Jews now had to risk their lives to buy or barter for food with villagers. In the spring and early summer of 1942, there was a further wave of consolidation, as Jews in many smaller communities were moved to the nearest towns. In some regions, this process of consolidation had started earlier. For example, about 2,000 Jews from the surrounding region had been concentrated in the Nowy Targ ghetto in May 1941, as the Germans attempted to clear the border region near Slovakia of Jews.⁷ Some towns, such as Mszana Dolna, were named as concentration points for Jews, but no separate residential district (ghetto) was established there.⁸

As living conditions for Jews deteriorated in the first half of 1942, the terror of the Gestapo also intensified. In February 1942, the Security Police shot about 50 Jews in Jasło who had been allowed to return from Eastern Galicia in the fall of 1941. A similar Aktion was conducted in Tarnów a few weeks later. These people were deemed suspect as they had lived under Soviet rule. In the spring of 1942, the Security Police also seized and killed prominent Jewish social and political activists in a number of ghettos in Distrikt Krakau, especially any Jews known to be Communists, Socialists, or Zionists. For example, the head of the Gestapo in Nowy Sącz, SS-Obersturmführer Heinrich Hamann, received orders from the Commanding Officer of the Security Police and the SD (KdS) in Kraków to arrest and shoot all Jews in the Kreis known to be Communists or to sympathize with them. In response, Hamann obtained an old membership list for the Poalei Zion (left-wing Zionist) movement and ordered that all those on the list be arrested with the assistance of the Jewish Councils and Jewish Police. When the head of the Judenrat in Grybów attempted to limit the effects of this order, arresting only 20 people from a much longer list, Hamann ordered the shooting of 5 members each from the Judenrat and the Jewish Police.⁹ Similar “anti-Communist” Aktions took place, for example, in Rzeszów and Dąbrowa Tarnowska. The goal was to terrorize Jews and forestall efforts at resistance just prior to the deportations. At the same time, the Germans were rounding up young Jews for work in labor camps within the Distrikt, including those in Biesiadka, Pustków, and Płaszów.

In March 1942, the complete expulsion of the Jews from Mielec provided an indication of the terrible fate awaiting the Jewish communities of Distrikt Krakau. In a brutal Aktion, about 500 people were murdered in and around the town, 750 were selected for the Pustków camp, and another 3,000 were deported to various towns in Distrikt Lublin.

In 1942, the Jewish Councils and the JSS conducted a campaign to find employment for as many Jews as possible. Attempts were made to secure work for Jews, including women, Religious Jews from Jasło, rounded up for forced labor or deportation, are crowded onto the back of a truck, ca. 1940.

USHMM WS #08311, COURTESY OF MUZEUM OKRĘGOWE W RADOMIU

in agriculture and to establish workshops and vocational training courses. As news spread of large-scale deportations, there was a growing conviction that only those whom the Germans considered useful would be spared.

The organization of the deportations was in the hands of the SSPF and his staff. The ghetto liquidation Aktions were implemented by the German Security Police assisted by a number of Trawniki-trained auxiliaries and German Order Police units. In some places, units of the Polish (Blue) Police and Jewish Police were involved in the roundups. The Construction Service (Baudienst) organization, made up of conscripted Polish young men, was occasionally tasked with digging and filling in mass graves.

The main wave of deportation Aktions in Distrikt Krakau took place between June 1 and mid-September 1942—that is, within a period of only three and a half months. All of these transports were directed to the Bełżec extermination center. The first deportation Aktion took place on June 1 to June 8, 1942, from the Kraków ghetto. An additional group of Jews from Słomniki was added to this transport. Another large-scale deportation then followed from the Tarnów ghetto. The remaining deportations were carried out more or less Kreis by Kreis, as follows: Reichshof and Debica in July; Jaroslau, Krosno, Jaslo, Neu-Sandez, Neumarkt, and Krakau-Land in August; Miechow, Sanok, and Tarnow in September. A further large-scale Aktion was conducted in the Kraków ghetto at the end of October, while most of the smaller remnant ghettos were cleared in November 1942.¹⁰ It seems that in a number of places Jews continued to live in their former houses, without ghettoization, right up to the deportations, as, for example, in Skalbierz, while for a few locations, there is inadequate documentation to determine whether a ghetto was established.¹¹

The concentration process connected with the deportations, however, did produce a further wave of ghetto establishment. In Kreis Tarnow, ghettos were established in Dąbrowa Tar-

Jews are ferried from Sandomierz to the Kraków ghetto, 1940.

USHMM WS #14688, COURTESY OF ARCHIWUM DOKUMENTACJI MECHANICZNEJ

nowska, Brzesko, Tuchów, Zakliczyn, and Żabno in the summer of 1942 to serve as concentration points up to the main deportation Aktions in mid-September 1942.¹² At the time of the deportations, Kreishauptmann Dr. Kipke issued proclamations threatening Poles with the death penalty for concealing Jews and ordering them not to buy or receive Jewish property.¹³

Some ghettos were set up only a few weeks before the deportations, as was the case in Sędziszów Małopolski and Ropczyce. In other places, such as Słomniki and Radomyśl Wielki, the announcement of a “ghetto” by the German authorities was used mainly as a ruse to allay Jews’ fears during the period of concentration.

Two large collection ghettos were established in the Kreis centers of Dębica and Rzeszów, which held most of the Jews of their respective Kreis just prior to deportation. Some Jews were transferred twice during the period of consolidation. For example, the Jews of the Ropczyce ghetto were transferred first to the Sędziszów Małopolski ghetto before being deported to Bełżec via the Dębica ghetto. In most places, the sick and the elderly, as well as those uncovered in hiding or resisting deportation, were shot locally.

At several locations in Distrikt Krakau, almost all the Jews were shot not far from their places of residence, rather than being deported to Bełżec. In Mszana Dolna, where no ghetto had been established, more than 880 of the town’s 1,029 Jews were shot on the orders of Heinrich Hamann on August 19, 1942, just outside the town.¹⁴ In Rzepiennik Strzyżewski, after the selection of 30 Jews to be sent to the Gorlice ghetto, the remaining 364 Jews were shot in the nearby Dąbry Forest, located only about 1 kilometer (0.6 mile) from the ghetto. Similar mass shootings were conducted against the Jews from the ghettos in Jasienica Rosielna, Kołaczyce, Jodłowa, and Brzozów.

In Kreis Sanok, the Germans established a transit camp for Jews at Zasław, about 8 kilometers (5 miles) south of Sanok. In early September 1942, most of the Jews of Kreis Sanok (more than 10,000 people) were brought to the camp and crammed into barracks suitable for only about 500. They were then deported to Bełżec in three large transports over the ensuing days. In December 1942, around 700 of the last Jews from Sanok were murdered close to the camp.¹⁵ Similar transit camps existed at Pełkinie in Kreis Jaroslau and at Słomniki in Kreis Miechow, where Jews were held under horrendous conditions for several days prior to their deportation to Bełżec.

During the deportation Aktions, many of the able-bodied Jews were selected out and sent to labor camps. Following most deportations, a few Jews, often from the Jewish Police and the Judenrat, were retained to sort Jewish belongings or perform other labor tasks in so-called remnant ghettos. These registered Jews were often soon joined by others who had evaded the roundups by hiding. In a few locations, a form of remnant ghetto was established where no ghetto had existed prior to the main deportation Aktion. This was the case, for example, in Proszowice and in Pilica where, a few days after the deportations, the German authorities announced that Jews would be permitted to return to live in remnant ghettos. One of the main aims of such remnant ghettos was to lure additional Jews out of hiding.

On November 10, 1942, HSSPF Friedrich Wilhelm Krüger issued an order creating five official remnant ghettos in Distrikt Krakau. They were established in Kraków, Bochnia, Tarnów, Rzeszów, and Przemyśl.¹⁶ Their purpose was to lure out of hiding those who had evaded the deportations by promising them safety and work. A number of Jews were transferred to these places in November from other unofficial remnant ghettos. However, in many places the remaining Jews were shot or transferred to work camps. The five official ghettos had each been divided by December 1942 into “A” and “B” ghettos, with the former for working Jews and the latter for women, children, and the elderly, incapable of work. The A ghettos were gradually converted into labor camps over the ensuing months, while the situation of the Jews in the B ghettos became desperate with periodic selections and inadequate food supplies.

Jewish resistance movements were active in several ghettos in Distrikt Krakau. Bochnia had a branch of the Żydowska Organizacja Bojowa (Jewish Fighting Organization, ŻOB), which was linked to the larger organizations in Kraków and Warsaw. The ŻOB in the Kraków ghetto carried out several attacks in and around the city, including the bombing of the Cyganeria and Esplanada Cafés in December 1942. Several ghetto fighters were captured in the aftermath of these operations, however, severely disrupting the organization’s effectiveness. Other forms of resistance included the dissemination of the underground press, the smuggling of weapons, the preparation of bunkers, and mass escapes from several places just prior to deportation Aktions.

On December 31, 1942, according to the Korherr report, there were about 37,000 Jews remaining in Distrikt Krakau.¹⁷ These “legal” Jews were now all confined either in the five main remnant ghettos or in various enclosed camps, including those in Pustków, Mielec, Płaszów, and other locations.

The five remnant ghettos in Kraków, Tarnów, Przemyśl, Rzeszów, and Bochnia had all been liquidated by the end of September 1943. The labor camps, which succeeded the A ghettos, however, were in some cases not finally liquidated until February 1944, with many of the remaining Jews being transferred to other labor camps.

SOURCES Surprisingly, no comprehensive monograph has yet been prepared on the fate of the Jews of Distrikt Krakau during the Holocaust. Secondary works with coverage of the history of the Jewish communities of the region include the following: E. Podhorizer-Sandel, “O zagładzie Żydów w dystrykcie krakowskim,” BŻIH, no. 30 (1959): 87–109; Czesław Pilichowski et al., eds., Obozy hitlerowskie na ziemiach polskich 1939–1945: Informator encyklopedyczny (Warsaw: PWN, 1979); Danuta Dabrowska, Abraham Wein, and Aharon Weiss, eds., Pinkas ha-kehillot. Encyclopaedia of Jewish Communities: Poland, vol. 2, Eastern Galicia (Jerusalem: Yad Vashem, 1980); Abraham Wein and Aharon Weiss, eds., Pinkas ha-kehillot. Encyclopaedia of Jewish Communities: Poland, vol. 3, Galicia and Western Silesia (Jerusalem: Yad Vashem, 1984); Adam Bartosz, Tarnowskie judaica (Warsaw: Wydawnictwo PTTK “Kraj,” 1992); Stanisław Poradowski, “Zagłada Żydów rzeszowskich,” pts. 3 and 4, BŻIH (1987–1988); and Andrzej Potocki, Żydzi w Podkarpackiem (Rzeszów: Libra, 2004).

Relevant documentation can be found in the following archives: AAN; APKra; AŻIH; BA-BL; BA-L; FVA; IPN; MOR; NARA; USHMM; USHMPA; VHF; YIVO; and YVA.

Martin Dean

NOTES

1. Auszüge aus einem Bericht der Regierung des Generalgouvernements über die Lage der jüdischen Bevölkerung . . . bis Juli 1940, in Tatiana Berenstein et al., eds., Faschismus, Getto, Massenmord: Dokumentation über Ausrottung und Widerstand der Juden in Polen während des zweiten Weltkrieges [FGM] (Berlin: Rütten & Loening, 1961), p. 86.

2. For a more extensive list of restrictions, see Justiz und NS-Verbrechen, vol. 27 (Amsterdam: Amsterdam University Press, 2003), Lfd. Nr. 667a, pp. 350–354.

3. Verordnung des Generalgouverneurs H. Frank über die Einsetzung von Judenräten, in Berenstein et al., FGM, p. 71.

4. Anordnung: Kennzeichnung der Juden im Distrikt Krakau, signed Wächter, November 18, 1939 in Marian Domanski, Fleeing from the Hunter (Toronto: Azriei: Foundation, 2010).

5. Verordnungsblatt des Generalgouverneurs, 1941, p. 595.

6. USHMPA, WS # N64876, Polizeiliche Anordnung, signed Dr. Ehaus, January 5, 1942.

7. Pilichowski et al., Obozy hitlerowskie, p. 342; Report of the Kreishauptmann in Nowy Targ for the period from September 17, 1939, to May 31, 1941, in Berenstein et al., FGM, p. 64.

8. JuNS-V, vol. 24 (Amsterdam: Amsterdam University Press, 1998), Lfd. Nr. 635, p. 308; AŻIH, 211/710.

9. Shlomo Zalman Lehrer and Leizer Strassman, The Vanished City of Tsanz (Southfield, MI: Targum, 1997), p. 312; JuNS-V, vol. 24, Lfd. Nr. 635, p. 357.

10. For a concise overview, see Yitzhak Arad, Bełżec, Sobibor, Treblinka: The Operation Reinhard Death Camps (Bloomington: Indiana University Press, 1987), pp. 387–388.

11. Concerning Skalmierz, see PAIH, testimony of Zeev Lida, December 17, 1997: “It’s hard to call it a ghetto, even though we were not allowed to leave. They did not concentrate us in a specific street. We stayed in the same houses.” Other possible sites of ghettos include Żołynia (see www.zolynia.org/about-new.html—unfortunately, the information on this Web site could not be verified from other sources) and also Charsznica, where a small remnant ghetto for 25 Jews may have existed in the fall of 1942 (see VHF, # 37148, testimony of Solomon Salat; and AŻIH, 301/5484).

12. USHMM, Acc.1997.A.0124, reel 48, protocol of the JSS in Tarnów, July 31, 1942. See also Gazeta Żydowska, July 31, 1942.

13. ŻuNS-V, vol. 32 (Amsterdam: Amsterdam University Press, 2004), Lfd. Nr. 710a, pp. 390–391; and vol. 35 (Amsterdam: Amsterdam University Press, 2005), Lfd. Nr. 775, p. 303.

14. USHMM, RG-15.019M, reel 3, “Kwestionariusz o egzekucjach masowych i grobach masowych,” doc. 264; AŻIH, 301/1715, testimony of Abraham Borger; ŻuNS-V, vol. 24, Lfd. Nr. 635, pp. 397–403.

15. BA-L, B 162/14494, pp. 17–18; AŻIH, 301/3246, 301/3556, 301/4916.

16. Police Decree issued by HSSPF Krüger of the Generalgouvernement, November 10, 1942, published in Berenstein et al., FGM, pp. 344–345.

17. Korherr report, March 23, 1943, in ibid., p. 348.

BARANÓW SANDOMIERSKI

Pre-1939: Baranów Sandomierski, town, Lwów województwo, Poland; 1939–1944: Baranow, Kreis Debica, Distrikt Krakau, Generalgouvernement; post-1998: Baranów Sandomierski, województwo podkarpackie, Poland

Baranów Sandomierski is located 24 kilometers (15 miles) south-southwest of Sandomierz. In 1921, there were 745 Jews living in the town (42 percent of the total population).

The Jews of Baranów, mostly poor and barely making a living, were unprepared for the coming of war. Except for a few well-to-do families, they did not acquire any supplies. Hunger followed immediately on the German occupation in September 1939. Initially, the Wehrmacht administered the town, which did not particularly mistreat the Jews but required them to perform forced labor. Jewish men worked on road repairs, and women were cleaning and doing laundry; all returned after work to their quarters in Baranów. Later, the Polish (Blue) Police maintained order, with periodic visits by SS men who abused the Jews as they pleased. A man by the name of Numerik, who was a shepherd before the war working for a Jew, conveniently remembered his distant German heritage, deciding that he was a member of the “master race,” and became the ruler of the town, with the Bürgermeister deferring to him. Numerik took money from the Jews and also beat and abused them. (He is reported to have organized the deportation of Baranów’s Jews and personally to have shot Jews.)

After the outbreak of the German-Soviet war, Jews were sent to work camps in Biesiadka, Dęba, and Huta Komorowska. In Płaszów and Mielec the letters KL (Konzentrationslager—concentration camp) were tattooed on the hands of Jews. Polish policemen were the guards and frequently beat the Jews. There were about 180 Baranów Jews in all the work camps. They received passes to visit their families from Saturday afternoon until the roll call Monday morning, but they chose to return Sunday afternoon, to make sure they were not late. A German by the name of Nickel got drunk and announced that he must kill 2 Jews to prove himself to his friends. He shot and killed two brothers.¹

The Baranów ghetto was established on June 30, 1942, to facilitate the extermination of the Jews of Baranów and its surroundings, which began on July 20, 1942—three weeks later.² The ghetto encompassed part of the marketplace and sections of adjoining streets. Anticipating disaster, some Jews (including two Jewish policemen) managed to escape but perished later.³ A day before the liquidation, 40 Jews from Tarnobrzeg were marched to the Baranów ghetto, guarded by Polish policemen.⁴

On Sunday, the ghetto Jews were ordered to assemble on Monday morning in the marketplace, taking with them not more than “25 pounds” (11.3 kilograms) of their belongings and leaving the keys to their homes in the door. Of the assembled Jews, the Germans took 20 or 30 elderly people and children by horse and cart to the cemetery, where Jews had been forced to dig a ditch, and they shot them there; Poles were brought in to cover the ditch. The rest of the assembled Jews were marched to the railroad station and put into cattle cars that already contained Jews from Rozwadów and Łańcut. For two days the train traveled the 50 kilometers (31 miles) to Dębica, where a selection took place, including Jews brought from Rozwadów, Tarnobrzeg, Kolbuszowa, and Dębica (about 10,000 people). SS men from Pustków carried out the selection. The elderly were immediately shot; some others were taken to work camps and some to the ghetto in Dębica. On Thursday, the rest were transported to the Bełżec extermination camp.⁵

At the time of the deportation in July 1942, the Hauser family, consisting of Natan, his wife Dora, and their two children, escaped and found shelter with a farmer in a neighboring village. After six months the farmer asked them to leave, as he was afraid. Therefore, the family returned to Baranów, where they hid in the hayloft of Stanisław Karol Wawrzycki, a Christian friend from before the war. When it became too dangerous for them to stay in Baranów, Wawrzycki took them to a forester and continued thereafter to supply them with food. Here the Hauser family survived until the arrival of the Red Army in July 1944.⁶

After the war, Poles were afraid returning Jews would claim their possessions, and most were not welcoming; returning Jews soon left, as they feared for their lives. In the Jewish cemeteries only one tombstone remained intact.

The yizkor book Sefer Yizkor Barnov includes a listing of 162 names of the heads of Jewish families in Baranów who perished in the Holocaust. Having been derived entirely from the memories of survivors, the list cannot claim to be complete or accurate. The Jewish inhabitants of the following nearby villages perished along with the Jewish population of Baranów: Dąbrowica, Wola, Dymitrów, Skopanie, Padew, Przykop, Knapy, and Krasieczyn.⁷

SOURCES Much information on the fate of the Jews of Baranów during the Holocaust can be found in the yizkor book edited by N. Blumenthal, Sefer Yizkor Barnov (Jerusalem: Yad Vashem, 1964). There is also a short article in Hebrew in Abraham Wein and Aharon Weiss, eds., Pinkas ha-kehillot. Encyclopaedia of Jewish Communities: Poland, vol. 3, Galicia and Western Silesia (Jerusalem: Yad Vashem, 1984), pp. 59–62. The ghetto is also mentioned in Czesław Pilichowski et al., eds., Obozy hitlerowskie na ziemiach polskich 1939–1945: Informator encyklopedyczny (Warsaw: PWN, 1979), p. 91; and in BŻIH, no. 30 (1959): 95.

Samuel Schalkowsky

NOTES

1. Blumenthal, Sefer Yizkor Barnov, pp. 196, 198–200, 204.
2. Ibid., p. 205; Wein and Weiss, Pinkas ha-kehillot: Poland, vol. 3, Galicia and Western Silesia, p. 62.
3. At first they were hidden by non-Jews who, for payment, later either turned them over to the Nazi authorities or killed them personally; see Blumenthal, Sefer Yizkor Barnov, pp. 208–210.
4. Ibid., pp. 205, 208.
5. Ibid., pp. 202–203, 209–210.

6. Israel Gutman, ed., The Encyclopedia of the Righteous among the Nations: Rescuers of Jews during the Holocaust—Poland, vol. 2 (Jerusalem: Yad Vashem, 2004), p. 854. On May 16, 1993, Yad Vashem recognized Stanisław Karol Wawrzycki as being Righteous Among the Nations.

7. Blumenthal, Sefer Yizkor Barnov, pp. 220–222.

BIECZ

Pre-1939: Biecz, town, Kraków województwo, Poland; 1939–1944: Kreis Jasło, Distrikt Krakau, Generalgouvernement; post-1998: województwo małopolskie, Poland

The town of Biecz is located about 104 kilometers (65 miles) east-southeast of Kraków. In 1921, the Jewish population of Biecz was 632.

On September 7, 1939, German forces entered Biecz. Some of the Jews tried to escape, but most were forced to return because of the rapid advance of the German army.¹ Soon the German military administration started to conscript Jews for forced labor and impose large financial contributions on the Jewish community. The Germans confiscated two study houses, converting them into a warehouse and a theater. In late 1939 and 1940, Biecz absorbed 500 refugees from Łódź and its surroundings, raising the Jewish population to 1,300.

In March 1940, the German civil administration introduced the wearing of white armbands bearing a blue Star of David for all Jews over the age of 12. It also established a Judenrat (Jewish Council) in Biecz, headed by Markus Peller. Its main task was to provide forced laborers for the Germans. In the summer of 1940, the Judenrat had to supply 30 Jews per day for German forces stationed in the area. Some Jews worked in the Ulrich-Becker sand and gravel plant, where meager wages were paid, and others on water regulation projects. Among the many discriminatory regulations imposed by the Germans, including onerous taxes and the confiscation of property, the Jews were also prohibited from leaving the town limits without a valid work permit. Furthermore, Jews were not allowed to participate in funerals unless they were closely related to the deceased. During the first two years of German occupation, acts of random violence and harassment were commonplace, including the shaving of beards from Jewish men, but very few Jews were killed in this period.²

By the end of November 1940, the local branch of the Jewish Social Self-Help (JSS) had organized a public kitchen that distributed more than 500 free meals during that month, serving also refugees from Łódź and Kraków. In May 1941, the JSS branch reported that there were 1,063 Jews in Biecz. Of the adult male Jews able to work, 260 were working, and 85 were unemployed; 18 Jews were assigned to a labor camp outside the town.³ These figures reflected the ability of the Biecz Jewish Council to bribe the German authorities, limiting the number of those sent away to work.

In October 1941, the German authorities prohibited Jews from leaving the Jewish quarter in Biecz on pain of death.⁴ The Jewish quarter (or open ghetto) was based around the Ringplatz (market square) and the surrounding alleys leading onto it. Living conditions for the Jews were extremely harsh. Although the Judenrat had to comply with the demands of the occupying authorities, they attempted to save the lives of some Jews by establishing workshops, including shops making straw shoe-covers for German soldiers, which employed some of the most impoverished Jewish residents. Three members of the Jewish Council were the only Jews permitted to move freely outside the Jewish quarter.⁵

At the end of December 1941 the Germans ordered the Jews to surrender their fur items for the German army within three days. The collection was organized by the Judenrat, but some Jews burned their winter clothing rather than let them fall into the hands of the Germans.⁶

In 1942, conditions for the Jews in Biecz deteriorated severely. The number of shootings and killings increased markedly. Between January 3 and February 21, 1942, the Gestapo from Jasło and Gorlice visited Biecz several times; assisted by the local Polish auxiliary police, they shot more than 70 Jews. The corpses of the victims were buried in a common grave in the Jewish cemetery.⁷

By May 1942 the movement of Jews was further restricted within the town to the area around the Ringplatz. In June and July 1942, there was a large influx of Jews from surrounding small towns and villages that resulted in increased overcrowding and shortages of food. The population rose to almost 1,700 Jews in the Biecz ghetto in July. This concentration of the Jews was part of German preparations for their destruction.⁸ At the end of July, the Germans summoned all male Jews aged 18 to 35 to the market square and selected about 170 for work in the Płaszów forced labor camp. Among this group were most of the few survivors from the Biecz ghetto.⁹

On August 14, 1942, German policemen assisted by Ukrainian auxiliaries surrounded the ghetto in the early hours of the morning. All of the Jews were ordered to assemble at 7:00 A.M. on the Ringplatz with a few belongings, as they would be “resettled.” During the roundup the police forces murdered about 150 elderly and sick Jews, and their remains were buried in the Jewish cemetery. The roughly 1,000 Jews gathered on the market square were crammed into a barracks, where they were held for at least three days without food or water. On August 17, they were loaded onto railway wagons and sent to the Bełżec extermination camp.¹⁰

Many Jews attempted to hide within the ghetto or escape to the surrounding countryside. Some were shot by the Polish auxiliary police as they fled or when discovered in hiding. Others were handed over by local Poles, as the Germans imposed severe penalties for aiding Jews. One Pole was shot by the Germans for robbing a Jew he had handed over to them. The Judenrat members were taken to the Jewish cemetery in Gorlice and shot there. The Germans sealed the empty Jewish houses and confiscated remaining property. Only the 40 Jews who worked in the Ulrich-Becker factory remained in Biecz. Subsequently they were sent to a labor camp in Przemyśl. Most of the Jews who fled to the villages were captured and killed with the assistance of the Polish (Blue) Police.¹¹

SOURCES Further information on the history and fate of the Jewish population of Biecz can be found in the following publications: Yehudah Leyb Blum and Devorah Vinfeld-Samu'el, eds., Sefer-zikaron li-kidoshe 'ayaratenu Baitsh/Unzer shtetl Baytsb: Be/vinyanab uve-burbanab (Ramat Gan: Irgun yotse Baitsh vecha-sevivah be-Yisrael, 1959 [or 1960]); Samuel Halpern, The Life Story of Rabbi Samuel Halpern: A Holocaust Survivor (Canarsie, NY: S. Halpern, 1981); Abraham Wein and Aharon Weiss, eds., Pinkas ha-kehillot. Encyclopaedia of Jewish Communities: Poland, vol. 3, Galicia and Western Silesia (Jerusalem: Yad Vashem, 1984), pp. 88–90.

Documentation on the persecution and destruction of the Jewish community in Biecz can be found in the following archives: AHJP (HM/7921); AŻIH (301/3199); IPN; USHMM (Acc.1997.A.0124 [JSS], reel 15); VHF; and YVA (JM/1573, O-3/1695, O-16/1649, and O-33/42).

Caterina Crisci

NOTES

1. Blum and Vinfeld-Samu'el, Sefer-zikaron li-kidoshe 'ayaratenu Baitsh, pp. 147–150.
2. Ibid., pp. 149–159; VHF, # 42739, testimony of Ira Goetz; Halpern, The Life Story, p. 11; Wein and Weiss, Pinkas ha-kehillot: Poland, vol. 3, Galicia and Western Silesia, pp. 89–90.
3. USHMM, Acc.1997.A.0124 (JSS), reel 15, 211/217, pp. 3, 7, report of the Judenrat in Biecz to JSS in Kraków, November 26, 1940, and statistical report of the JSS delegation in Biecz to JSS in Kraków, May 31, 1941.
4. Blum and Vinfeld-Samu'el, Sefer-zikaron li-kidoshe 'ayaratenu Baitsh, p. 153.
5. Ibid., pp. 153–154; VHF, # 42739; Halpern, The Life Story, p. 11; Wein and Weiss, Pinkas ha-kehillot: Poland, vol. 3, Galicia and Western Silesia, pp. 89–90.
6. Blum and Vinfeld-Samu'el, Sefer-zikaron li-kidoshe 'ayaratenu Baitsh, p. 155; Halpern, The Life Story, p. 12.
7. AŻIH, 301/3199, testimony of S. Kurz; Rejestr miejsc i faktów zbrodni popełnionych przez okupanta hitlerowskiego na ziemiach polskich w latach 1939–1945: Województwo krosnińskie (Warsaw: Główna Komisja Badania Zbrodni Hitlerowskich w Polsce, 1983), pp. 18–19; Blum and Vinfeld-Samu'el, Sefer-zikaron li-kidoshe 'ayaratenu Baitsh, pp. 155–157.
8. Blum and Vinfeld-Samu'el, Sefer-zikaron li-kidoshe 'ayaratenu Baitsh, p. 159, specifically mentions the Biecz “ghetto” with reference to this time.
9. AŻIH, 301/3199; Halpern, The Life Story, p. 12; Blum and Vinfeld-Samu'el, Sefer-zikaron li-kidoshe 'ayaratenu Baitsh, p. 167.
10. Blum and Vinfeld-Samu'el, Sefer-zikaron li-kidoshe 'ayaratenu Baitsh, pp. 164–165.
11. Ibid., pp. 165–168; Wein and Weiss, Pinkas ha-kehillot: Poland, vol. 3, Galicia and Western Silesia, p. 90.

BIRCZA

Pre-1939: Bircza (Yiddish: Berch), village, Lwów województwo, Poland; 1939–1945: Kreis Przemyśl, Distrikt Krakau, General-gouvernement; post-1998: województwo podkarpackie, Poland

Bircza is located 24 kilometers (15 miles) southwest of Przemyśl. By 1921, there were 1,038 Jews residing there, constituting 54 percent of the village's population. Before World War II, the town had three ethnic quarters. Poles occupied the eastern part of the market square; Ukrainians, the western and southern parts; and the Jews lived in the northern part of the square.

In September 1939, Bircza was briefly under German occupation. On September 17, 1939, it was taken over by the Soviets and remained under their rule until the invasion of the Soviet Union by the German army on June 22, 1941. In the summer of 1940, a number of Bircza's Jews, who declared that they desired to move to German-occupied Polish territory, were deported instead into the eastern part of the Soviet Union.¹

According to survivor Avraham Kern, an unfenced ghetto was established in Bircza immediately on the renewed German occupation, at the end of June 1941. The German authorities announced that the entire village was a ghetto. The Jewish population was informed that no one was allowed to leave Bircza on pain of death. The Germans, lacking a presence there, established a Judenrat (Jewish Council) and charged it with fulfilling German orders.

Famine, including deaths from starvation, followed the establishment of the ghetto. As a result, many Jews risked their lives seeking food in the surrounding villages. According to Kern, the Ukrainian police never killed any of the ghetto's inhabitants; yet there were instances when local Poles or Ukrainians murdered Jews attempting to escape from the ghetto. The ghetto's inhabitants were not conscripted for forced labor. There were, however, some Jews who were taken to a labor camp (e.g., survivor Izrael Rubinfeld).

Kern and his friends organized the clandestine teaching of Hebrew and Jewish history to the ghetto's children. These classes lasted only a few months, as a Ukrainian policeman uncovered their existence and forced them to cease. No one was punished, due to connections one parent had with the Ukrainian police.²

The first mass execution of Bircza's Jews took place in April 1942, when 50 of them were rounded up, shot on a hill outside the village, and buried in a mass grave. One of the victims was Rubinfeld's father. Several other mass executions—most likely including Jews from other localities—were carried out prior to the ghetto's liquidation. The precise dating of these events remains unclear, but most secondary sources cite 16, reportedly wealthy, Jews shot on Kamienna Górka in May 1942, and between May and August of that same year approximately 200 Jews were shot at the Jewish cemetery. In Bircza Stara (Wierzyssko) 500 (or according to another source, 800) people were executed in either July or August 1942. The bodies of all these victims were exhumed in 1957 and buried in the Jewish cemetery in Przemyśl.³

Sometime prior to the ghetto's liquidation, Jews from other places in the vicinity were brought to the Bircza ghetto, including Jews from Pruchnik and from Leszczawa Dolna.

The ghetto was liquidated in mid-August 1942. About 48 hours before the deportation, on pain of death, Bircza's Jews were ordered to collect a large contribution of money, wedding rings, and other jewelry. After the ransom was paid, the community was ordered to gather at the village square at 4:00 P.M. Men wearing uniforms shot those who did not report as instructed. All the ghetto residents were held in the square overnight, in the open, until dawn and were then marched 24 kilometers (15 miles) to the Przemyśl ghetto. The old and children were driven in carts, from which many elderly people were thrown and shot along the way.

In Przemyśl, 150 to 160 Jews were selected and sent for labor in Rzeszów. The remainder were deported soon afterwards to the Bełżec extermination camp.⁴

SOURCES The Bircza ghetto is briefly mentioned in Andrzej Potocki, Podkarpackie judaica (Brzozów: Związek Gmin Brzozowskich and Muzeum Regionalne PTTK w Brzozowie, 1993), pp. 26–27.

The following archival sources were used to prepare this entry: VHF (# 816, 14890).

Jolanta Kraemer

NOTES

1. “Izrael (Srulek Jack) Rubinfeld,” in John J. Hartman and Jacek Krochmal, eds., Pamiętam każdy dzień . . . losy Żydów przemyskich podczas II wojny światowej (Przemyśl: Towarzystwo Przyjaciół Nauk w Przemyślu, 2001), pp. 72–74; VHF, # 14890, testimony of Avraham Kern, 1996; # 816, testimony of Hanna Bertram, 1995.

2. “Izrael (Srulek Jack) Rubinfeld,” pp. 72–74; VHF, # 14890.

3. Rejestr miejsc i faktów zbrodni popełnionych przez okupanta hitlerowskiego na ziemiach polskich w latach 1939–1945: Województwo przemyskie (Warsaw: GKBZHWP, 1983), pp. 13–15; “Izrael (Srulek Jack) Rubinfeld,” pp. 72–74.

4. “Izrael (Srulek Jack) Rubinfeld,” pp. 72–74; VHF, # 14890.

BŁĄŻOWA

Pre-1939: Błazowa, town, Rzeszów powiat, Lwów województwo, Poland; 1939–1944: Blazowa, Kreis Reichshof, Distrikt Krakau, Generalgouvernement; post-1998: Błazowa, województwo podkarpackie, Poland

Błazowa is located 18 kilometers (11 miles) south of Rzeszów. The 1921 census reported 930 Jews living in Błazowa (18.2 percent of the total population of 5,123); another 51 Jews resided within the Błazowa gmina. The Błazowa Jewish community numbered 825 people in 1939.

After the Soviets invaded Poland from the east on September 17, 1939, German troops stationed in Błazowa tried to expel as many Jews as possible by ordering them to cross the San River—located less than 16 kilometers (10 miles) from Błazowa—which had already been reached by Soviet forces. A total of 57 Jews left Błazowa permanently, and 768 decided to stay.¹

German authorities set up a Jewish Council (Judenrat), with Abraham Unger as the chairman and Wolf Silberstain as the secretary.² Mojsze Weiss was charged with assigning local Jews to labor conscription in accordance with German demands. Jakob Atlas was also a member of the Judenrat.

Members of Błazowa's Jewish establishment were generally assigned to paid jobs that were fairly easy, such as working at a large estate occupied by the German authorities. Both Poles and Jews worked the estate's land; as laborers, they were not mistreated. Weiss negotiated laborers' paid minimum wages with the estate's owner; most likely they received 1 or 1.20 złoty per day. Those Jews who were assigned to work for the municipality were unpaid.

According to the survivor Jozef Atlas, the Germans did not interfere with local Jews and hardly ever came to Błazowa. It seems that there was only a collaborationist Polish (Blue) Police unit in the town, at least from the summer of 1941, when the Germans invaded the Soviet Union. As Jozef Atlas reported, the Polish (Blue) Police were ill-disposed towards the Jews at times and confiscated goods in their frequent house searches.

By July 1940, 89 deportees from Łódź and 50 from Kalisz had been transferred to Błazowa via Rzeszów. By mid-October 1940, 60 more had arrived from the same towns.³ In December 1940, the Judenrat reported the following statistics regarding Jewish residents in Błazowa: out of a total of 991 Jews, 778 (240 families) were locals. Out of the total of 213 newcomers, 154 were deportees (39 families) and 59 refugees (23 families). The latter came to Błazowa as they had relatives there and had to rely on their support.

Some 30 of the deportee families (90 people) subsisted solely on the welfare provided by the self-help committee set up by the Judenrat, as less than 10 of the newly arrived families were able to find employment. A parentless child who was found later in Błazowa was assigned to a private family for sustenance at the Judenrat's expense.

The Judenrat opened a soup kitchen on November 26, 1940, which placed a great financial burden on the community. It served an average of 120 meals daily, although there were demands for 200. Those able to pay were charged 0.20 złoty per meal. Aside from the Judenrat's small monthly donation, this charge was the only other source of income for the kitchen.

A local branch of the Jewish Social Self-Help (JSS), subordinated to the Kreis office in Rzeszów, was established on May 2, 1941, and took over provision of welfare for Błazowa's Jews. Józef Natansohn chaired the local committee, which also included Hersch Lieber and Simche Intrator. However, the efforts of the local JSS were largely futile, as the kitchen ceased its activity by August 1941 due to lack of funds.

When Natansohn resigned in September 1941, Dr. Jakób Neiss was charged with running the organization. Unhappy with the performance of the other two elderly members of the JSS (Lieber and Intrator), Neiss suggested that they be relieved from the committee by November 1941, because in his opinion they were either not willing or not capable of fulfilling their duties. At Neiss's suggestion, David Lieber and Aleksander Klaristenfeld were nominated in their place. When the kitchen reopened in January 1942, it served only children, the elderly, and the sick. An estimated 80 children were undernourished in Błazowa, but the kitchen was able to feed only a total of 70 people per day.

JSS records imply that most Jewish businesses were taken over and placed under trustee management by mid-1941, although in many cases this process had been accomplished much earlier. In July 1941, only 13 Jewish craftsmen were running their own businesses: haberdashers, cobblers, and tailors.⁴

In mid-June 1941, approximately 100 Jews were taken to Rzeszów and employed in road works. They received full board and were paid enough to save some money for their families in Błażowa. This, the JSS believed, eased the burden on the town considerably. Another 80 Jews labored at this time outside the gmina. By September 1941, the number of Błażowa workers decreased to 40 laboring within the gmina, and 35 beyond it. The same source reports approximately 250 Jews working in the gmina in the following months and none beyond its borders. There is no information on where or what kind of labor Błażowa Jews performed then or if they were paid or compensated in any way.⁵

According to a survivor, Sam Reich, in the winter of 1941, the German authorities requested one young man from each Jewish family in Błażowa to go to a labor camp. The roundup was conducted in the middle of the night by two SS men, who arrived in a truck. Approximately 40 to 50 boys were driven to the nearby Huta Komorowska labor camp. The camp was unfenced, and although it was guarded by civilian ethnic Germans (Volksdeutsche), it was controlled by the SS. Its commander, a brutal man named Johann Robert Schmidt, was later replaced by Kopf, and then Nickel. There were no toilets in the camp. Water had to be delivered by wagons from another town. When it was available, it was dirty, and there was never enough for the prisoners to wash themselves. Many died of disease and exhaustion there. Inmates were housed in a wooden barracks and slept on bunk beds with little straw. Each day they were escorted to a nearby forest to cut beech trees.

During the “fur Aktion” in December 1941, Błażowa Jews were given only two days to give up their fur garments and other winter clothing.

By mid-January 1942, the community was made aware that from February 1, 1942, Jews would no longer be allowed to leave Błażowa’s town limits. The basis for this was an order issued by the Reichshof Kreishauptmann, Heinz Ehaus, on December 17, 1941, creating Jewish quarters in the territory of the Kreis. It was effective from January 10, 1942, in Reichshof; in the remainder of the Kreis, from February 1, 1942. A ghetto in Błażowa was most likely set up soon after this date. There is no information available as to how the establishment of the ghetto influenced the community’s life.⁶

A new demand for young Jewish laborers came in the spring of 1942. According to Jozef Atlas, the Jews captured in this roundup were sent to the Pustków labor camp. Those who had fake jobs through connections (e.g., Atlas, whom the Judenrat had registered as a courier) were able to stay in Błażowa.

That spring, the Gestapo suddenly appeared in Błażowa. Jews ran in panic, trying to hide in the nearby hills and along the riverbed. A total of 10 or 11 (according to another testimony, up to 15) Jews were captured and executed that day. Among them were Błażowa’s rabbi Meir Shapiro and his son.⁷

In May or June 1942, the Jews living in the vicinity were resettled into the Błażowa ghetto. The Błażowa community was not surprised by the resettlement to the Rzeszów ghetto. German authorities permitted a special market to be open for a week or two for Jews to sell their belongings. Then local Poles were ordered to report with their wagons on the day of the deportation to transport the ghetto residents to the Rzeszów ghetto.⁸

The liquidation of the Błażowa ghetto took place on June 26, 1942. There is no information on how many Jews were evacuated to Rzeszów. A Polish woman, Stanisława Jakubczyk, is known to have been shot in the course of the Aktion, but there is no information regarding Jewish victims on that day.⁹

In July 1942, the Jews of Błażowa, along with the other Jews concentrated in the Rzeszów ghetto, were deported to the Bełżec extermination camp.¹⁰

SOURCES The Jewish community of Błażowa and its fate during the Holocaust are briefly mentioned in the following publications: Andrzej Potocki, Żydzi w Podkarpackiem (Rzeszów: Libra, 2004), pp. 27–28; Abraham Wein and Aharon Weiss, eds., Pinkas ha-kebilot. Encyclopaedia of Jewish Communities: Poland, vol. 3, Galicia and Western Silesia (Jerusalem: Yad Vashem, 1984), pp. 91–92; and in a series of articles by Stanisław Poradowski, “Zagłada Żydów rzeszowskich,” published by BŻIH (nos. 1–2 [1984] and 3–4 [1985]).

Documents on the persecution of the Jews of Błażowa can be found in the following archives: AŻIH (210/265 [AJDC]; 211/231–233 [JSS]); USHMM (Acc.1999.A.0154 [AJDC]; and Acc.1997.A.0124 [JSS], reel 15); and VHF (# 15572 and 19803).

Jolanta Kraemer

NOTES

1. USHMM, Acc.1997.A.0124 (JSS), reel 15, 211/231, p. 53.
2. VHF, # 15572, testimony of Sam Reich, 1996; USHMM, Acc.1999.A.0154 (AJDC Błażowa), 210/265, p. 12.
3. USHMM, Acc.1999.A.0154 (AJDC), 210/265, p. 3.
4. Ibid., Acc.1997.A.0124 (JSS), reel 15, 211/231, pp. 28, 29; and 211/232, p. 38.
5. Ibid., 211/231, pp. 44, 54; and 211/232, pp. 14, 32, 38.
6. Ibid., 211/233, p. 18.
7. VHF, # 15572; and # 19803, testimony of Jozef Atlas.
8. Ibid., # 19803.
9. Poradowski, “Zagłada Żydów,” pt. 3, p. 91; and Potocki, Żydzi, p. 28.
10. Poradowski, “Zagłada Żydów,” pt. 3, p. 99.

BOBOWA

Pre-1939: Bobowa, village, Kraków województwo, Poland;
1939–1944: Kreis Jasło, Distrikt Krakau, Generalgouvernement;
post-1998: województwo małopolskie, Poland

Bobowa is located about 90 kilometers (56 miles) southeast of Kraków. In 1939, there were approximately 700 Jews living in the village.

The Wehrmacht captured the village on September 7, 1939. Kazimierz Wieniawa-Długoszowski was the Polish mayor of Bobowa at this time. It is unknown if there were any German forces permanently stationed in the village. Most sources note only that Gestapo and Gendarmerie officials from Jasło and Gorlice paid occasional visits.

A Jewish Council (Judenrat) was organized at the beginning of 1940, with Samuel Messinger as the chairman and Moses Hochberger as the secretary. The Judenrat's main task was to care for refugees, collect contributions imposed by the authorities, and conscript laborers to meet German demands. According to one survivor, Efraim Landau, the Judenrat did its best to treat the Jews fairly in the interests of the whole community, but other sources indicate there was some criticism of its handling of German demands for forced labor.

Unlike many other communities, the Judenrat did not initially organize a rotation system for forced labor. Rather, on its authority, Jews were seized at random from Bobowa's streets or houses. The workday lasted 10 to 12 hours (including Saturdays). It is not clear who supervised the laborers. Records show that 30 Jews were working outside of Bobowa throughout 1940 and 10 during the first months of 1941.¹

Jewish-owned businesses remained open for the first six months of the war. By September 1941, the number of tradesmen permitted to keep their businesses open had diminished from 62 before the war to only 23. The number of craftsmen also declined by more than half, from 29 to 13.²

By May 1940, there were already 90 refugees in the village, including many from Gorlice and its vicinity. A soup kitchen opened in the first part of the year but had to close when supplies collected among Jews and Christians dried up. The number of refugees rose to 140, after approximately 40 Jews expelled from Krynica and its environs arrived in November 1940. The soup kitchen reopened and fed 100 Jews two or three meals per day. About 125 children received cocoa milk and white rolls.

There were 1,237 Jews registered in Bobowa in July 1941. This included 160 Gorlice Jews expelled to Bobowa that same month. By August 1941, 60 Jews expelled from the town of Oświęcim were transferred to Bobowa, raising the total number of Jewish residents to 1,270. Like many other groups, they arrived empty-handed, draining Bobowa further of its resources. The local Jews pleaded with the Jewish Social Self-Help (JSS) central office in Kraków for additional support. One of the refugees, Rubin Wassertheil, recalls Bobowa's Jews blaming the less religious refugees for their persecution, believing that it was a punishment from God for their not being observant.³

According to some sources, the Germans established a ghetto in Bobowa as early as October 1941.⁴ Apparently it remained an open ghetto at first, as recalled by one survivor—Moishe Hochhauser—who was among those transferred to the Biezanów labor camp in the summer of 1942. Another survivor, Samuel Oliner, however, who did not enter the ghetto until June 1942, recalls the ghetto as being gated and surrounded with barbed wire, implying that it was probably enclosed by the summer of 1942. There is no information as to who guarded the ghetto. It measured roughly 1 or 2 square kilometers (0.4 to 0.8 square mile) in area and was located in Bobowa's predominantly Jewish center, including at least one side of the market square. Local Jews stayed in their own houses, while some refugees, who lived among Christians, were forced to move within the ghetto limits.⁵ Its inhabitants often sneaked out either to barter or to buy food from local farmers. Workshops manufacturing straw overshoes were organized in the synagogue, possibly before the ghetto was established.

Between January and March 1942, a series of executions took place, including of Jews brought in from other towns. Victims were shot either publicly on the market square or at the Jewish cemetery. The following shootings of Jews have been documented: on January 5, 1942, when the Gorlice Gestapo shot 17 Jews; on February 5, 4 shot; on March 4, 30 shot; and on March 14, 18 shot. During the execution on March 4, 30 of Bobowa's wealthier ghetto residents were shot. They were first taken to a barn on the outskirts of Bobowa, where they were ordered to hand over all of their remaining valuables. Those who agreed were escorted home to collect the ransom and then shot on providing it; the Germans shot the remainder at the cemetery.⁶

In the winter of 1941–1942, the Germans began transferring Jews living in the surrounding villages (including Brzana) into the Bobowa ghetto. The Jewish residents of Brzana were given only half an hour to pack their clothing and pots on sleighs. German Gendarmes then escorted them to the ghetto.⁷ By April 1942, there were 1,345 Jews concentrated in the ghetto, including 678 refugees, indicating that the population had doubled since the start of the war. At some point, Jews from Gładyszów were also brought in.⁸

On June 12, 1942, Jews living in the villages of Mszanka and Bielanka were forced into the ghetto. They could take with them only basic necessities and bedding. In July 1942, the Jews from Stróża were brought in. At the time, the ghetto was extremely overcrowded, and the Judenrat was forced to place several families into one room. Samuel Oliner, who moved into the ghetto at this time, remembers its inhabitants as frightened and hungry; some were forced to eat nonkosher food. According to Pinkas ha-kehillot, due to the efforts of the Polish mayor, there was no spread of contagious diseases among the Jews in Bobowa.⁹

Between May and August 1942, a number of Jews were taken to labor camps in Biezanów, Prokocim, and possibly Bochnia. A group of 210 Jews was sent to Biezanów in August, where they worked on the railway for the Stuaug and Klug companies.¹⁰

In June 1942, a workshop employing 150 Jewish tailors, shoemakers, upholsterers, haberdashers, and patch-makers was set up in Bobowa. Their production included straw shoes, drapery, and children's toys.¹¹

On August 13, 1942, the Germans called for new volunteers for the Biezanów camp. The community was promised that if each family were to send one able body, the remainder would be left in peace. The number of volunteers is unknown, but upon their departure the same afternoon, Germans and Ukrainian auxiliary forces surrounded the ghetto.¹²

The ghetto was liquidated on the morning of August 14, 1942. The liquidation Kommando went from house to house, banging on doors and dragging the inhabitants from their dwellings to the market square, where trucks awaited them. The Germans offered the Judenrat chairman, Messinger, a chance to save himself, but he refused.¹³

Twenty-five of Bobowa's Jews were reportedly shot in the course of the liquidation Aktion, either on the streets of Bobowa or in the Jewish cemetery, where they were later buried in a mass grave.¹⁴ The same day, several hundred (possibly 700) of Bobowa's and Gorlice's Jews were shot in the Garbacz Forest near Stróżówka village, in the vicinity of Gorlice. Another 80 are recorded as having been shot in the Dąbry Forest, near Rzepiennik Strzyżewski, "after August 14, 1942."

The number of Jews inhabiting the ghetto prior to its liquidation is difficult to determine, because the number of Jews reportedly sent to various labor camps differs considerably among the available sources. Another complication arises from the German policy of selecting Jews from different locations and taking them together to yet another location to execute them, as in the August 14, 1942, shooting of Bobowa and Gorlice Jews mentioned above. In addition, there are several accounts that indicate that those who survived the initial selection were also subsequently murdered.

It appears most likely that in fact most, if not all, of Bobowa's ghetto residents were shot in the Garbacz Forest near Stróżówka, where the Jews were made to undress before they were shot next to a mass grave.¹⁵ Some sources indicate, however, that only about 400 Jews, probably women, children, and elderly, were murdered in the Dombro (Dąbry) Forest near Bobowa. Of the remainder, some were sent to the Szebnie labor camp, and the others were deported to the Bełżec extermination camp after their transfer to and subsequent deportation from the Gorlice ghetto.

SOURCES The following published sources make reference to the Bobowa ghetto: Abraham Wein and Aharon Weiss, eds., Pinkas ha-kehillot. Encyclopaedia of Jewish Communities: Poland, vol. 3, Galicia and Western Silesia (Jerusalem: Yad Vashem, 1984), pp. 63–64; Samuel P. Oliner and Pearl M. Oliner, The Altruistic Personality: Rescuers of Jews in Nazi Europe (New York: Free Press, 1988), p. xvi; and Czesław Pilichowski et al., eds., Obozy hitlerowskie na ziemiach polskich 1939–1945: Informator encyklopedyczny (Warsaw: PWN, 1979), p. 109.

The following archival sources were used in preparing this entry: AŻIH (210/258, 211/235, 301/1373, and 301/242); USHMM (Acc.1997.A.0124 [JSS], reel 15; RG-02.208M [Pamiętniki]; and Acc.1999.A.0154 [AJDC]); and VHF (# 10797, 15948, 18652, 20731, 34133-3, 49767-1).

Jolanta Kraemer

NOTES

1. VHF, # 34133-3, testimony of Efraim Landau, 1997.
2. Ibid.; USHMM, Acc.1999.A.0154 (AJDC), 210/258, pp. 5, 17.
3. VHF, # 20731, testimony of Rubin Wassertheil, 1996; USHMM, Acc.1997.A.0124 (JSS), reel 15, 211/235, pp. 13, 17, 35; Acc.1999.A.0154 (AJDC), 210/258, pp. 35–36, 60.
4. But see USHMM, Acc.1997.A.0124 (JSS), reel 15, 211/235 (Bobowa), p. 2.

5. VHF, # 49767-1, testimony of Samuel Oliner, 1999; # 15948, testimony of Moïshe Hochhauser, 1996; # 10797, testimony of David Borgenicht, 1996.

6. Rejestr miejsc i faktów zbrodni popełnionych przez okupanta hitlerowskiego na ziemiach polskich w latach 1939–1945: Województwo nowosądeckie (Warsaw: GKBZHP, 1984), pp. 15–16; AŻIH, 301/1373, testimony of Rena Kant, 1946; 301/242, testimony of Hirsch Tauber, 1946; VHF, # 34133-3; # 15948; and Władysław Boczoń, Żydzi gorlicy (Gorlice: Władysław Boczoń, 1998), p. 149.

7. AŻIH, 301/1373.

8. USHMM, Acc.1999.A.0154 (AJDC), 210/258, p. 2; Pilichowski et al., Obozy hitlerowskie, p. 109.

9. VHF, # 49767-1.

10. Gazeta Żydowska, August, 16, 1942; VHF, # 15948; # 10797; and # 18652.

11. Gazeta Żydowska, July 8, 1942.

12. VHF, # 20731.

13. Ibid., # 34-133-3.

14. Ibid., # 49767-1; Rejestr miejsc, pp. 16–17.

15. This version is indicated by VHF, # 49767-1.

BOCHNIA

Pre-1939: Bochnia, town, Kraków województwo, Poland; 1939–1945: Salzberg, Kreis Krakau-Land, Distrikt Krakau, Generalgouvernement; post-1998: Bochnia, powiat center, województwo małopolskie, Poland

Bochnia is located 45 kilometers (28 miles) east-southeast of Kraków. In 1939, there were around 3,500 Jews living there, comprising about 20 percent of the town's population.

German forces occupied Bochnia on September 3, 1939. Soon after their arrival the Germans began to kidnap Jews for forced labor. Deportations to labor camps began in 1940 and continued through most of the ghetto's existence. Sometimes the Jewish community had to pay the transportation costs to the camps.¹

Jewish men and women make brooms in a workshop inside the Bochnia ghetto, n.d. The original German caption reads, "City workshops in Bochnia. Jewish labor strength made useful."

USHMM WS #51738, COURTESY OF IPN

In the fall of 1939, a Jewish Council (Judenrat) was established in Bochnia to act as intermediary between the Jewish community and the German authorities. In 1940, Symcha Weiss was appointed as chairman of the Judenrat, and the Jewish Police (Jüdischer Ordnungsdienst) was created under Dr. Szymon Rosen.

The Jewish population grew through the arrival of successive waves of Jewish refugees, from Kraków (May 1940), Krzeszowice (March 1941), and Mielec (spring 1942).

The German authorities established a ghetto in the center of Bochnia in March or April 1941. Initially the ghetto remained unfenced. The area of the ghetto was about 600 meters by 200 meters (656 by 219 yards), based around Kowalska Street.² From July 1941, Jews were not permitted to leave the ghetto without a special permit; by October the punishment for disobeying this order was death. Over the following 10 months, over 300 Jews were shot in the Jewish cemetery for disobeying this command.

Following the arrival of the Krzeszowice Jews, the ghetto was expanded in April 1941 and included the following streets: Proszowska, Wygoda, Podedworze Dolne, and the remainder of Krzeczowska Street. Due to the large number of refugees and the very confined space, the ghetto became severely overcrowded, and sanitary conditions were deplorable.³

The Germans controlled the supply of food into the ghetto and enforced strict food rationing. Those who worked received rations that were sufficient barely for one person. To feed the sick and the old, their names were added to the list of productive workers, but their relatives then had to cover for them by working even longer hours to meet stiff production quotas.

By the end of 1941, about 2,000 Jews were employed in workshops in the ghetto. They manufactured army uniforms, handkerchiefs, underwear, shoes, brushes, toys, electrical equipment, and baskets for the Germans. A German named Wettermann was in charge of these workshops, but a Jew, Salomon Greiwer, oversaw day-to-day operations.⁴ Other Jews exited the ghetto under escort each day to perform forced labor.

To maintain a semblance of normalcy, an elementary school and a Bet Midrash operated within the ghetto until August 1942. There was also a hospital from the end of 1941, which the Germans established to deal with a typhus epidemic. Dr. Anatol Gutfreund was in charge. The hospital received some medical supplies, with aid initially received from the American Jewish Joint Distribution Committee (AJDC) in Kraków.⁵

Nazi restrictions did not extend to Jews who were citizens of certain foreign countries. Therefore, these Jews were able to provide some contact between the ghetto's residents and the outside world. They also helped to smuggle foodstuffs into the ghetto, gave refuge to children during Aktions, and helped to organize escape routes to Hungary and Slovakia.⁶

In the spring of 1942, the ghetto was enclosed by a wooden fence, about 2 meters (7 feet) high, which Polish police guarded.⁷

Mass expulsions throughout the region spread fear among the Jews in the spring and summer of 1942. There were reports about whole communities being murdered. Greiwer tried to reassure the workers that they would remain protected, but many ghetto residents constructed bunkers to hide when the time came.

A few days before the first mass deportation in August 1942, the Judenrat was forced to pay the Germans a sum of 250,000 złoty—the latest in a series of demands—supposedly as protection money to guarantee the Jews' safety. However, it proved to be just a scam to steal the Jews' last remaining money.

All the Jews in the Kreis were gathered together on the evening of Friday August 21, 1942, and were brought to Bochnia the next morning. The entire Jewish community of Nowy Wiśnicz (about 1,500 people) was transferred to the Bochnia ghetto, along with Jews from a number of villages, including Brzeźnica, Bogucice, Lipnica Murowana, Rzezawa, Targowisko, Trzciana, Uście Solne, and Zabierzów. This relocation caused fear and panic in the Bochnia ghetto, as they now expected a large-scale Aktion—which indeed followed, between August 25 and 27.⁸ Some Jews went into hiding, on their own or with their German employers.⁹

Gestapo, SS, and Ukrainian auxiliaries surrounded the ghetto. Then (with help from the Jewish Police) they rounded up the Jews and conducted selections. As so many people were in hiding, there was a shortage of deportees. As a result, even some people with special permits were included in the deportation, and Jewish policemen had to bring their own family members. Those who were unwilling or unable to follow orders were shot in front of their families. Greiwer was murdered when he tried to save his workers.¹⁰

The Gestapo shot a number of Jews in and around the ghetto, and a group of about 800 elderly and sick Jews (including some from the hospital) was loaded onto trucks with the assistance of Polish Labor Battalion (Baudienst) members and transported to the village of Baczków to be shot. They were thrown into a pit and buried while many were still alive.¹¹

The remaining Jews on the roll-call square (Appellplatz), comprising healthy and strong Jews, were loaded onto a waiting train and sent to the Bełżec killing center, where they were murdered in the gas chambers.¹² Almost the entire membership of the Judenrat was on the last transport to Bełżec. They went along to reassure people that the Nazis were really resettling them to the east. In total, more than 5,000 Jews were deported to Bełżec during the August Aktion.¹³

After the Aktion, the remaining ghetto residents again had to pay for their right to survive, which they ironically called "slaughter money."¹⁴ Officially there were still some 1,000 Jews left in the ghetto, plus an additional 400 "illegals" in hiding. The number soon swelled to around 5,000 again, however, as many Jews emerged from hiding in Bochnia and the surrounding countryside. The head of the Gestapo in Bochnia, SS-Untersturmführer Wilhelm Schomberg, issued the Jews special permits allowing them to remain, and the workshops resumed operations, now employing some 3,000 people. During a second Aktion on November 10, 1942, 150 people were shot, and around 500 were sent to Bełżec.¹⁵ where Jews could live in a “Jewish residential area” (Juden-wohnbezirk).¹⁶ As a result, the ghetto population again swelled to more than 5,000, as additional people emerged from hiding.

That same day, the Germans announced that Bochnia would be one of the five remaining towns in Distrikt Krakau

In December 1942, several German officers bought the workshops to run them as a private business. At this time the Bochnia ghetto was split into two parts—Ghettos A and B—divided by an internal fence guarded by the Jewish Police. In Ghetto A, those who held workers’ permits were housed in separate barracks for men and women, as it was now officially designated a forced labor camp, subordinated to the SS- und Polizeiführer (SSPF) in Kraków; Ghetto B contained those who did not work: the elderly, disabled, weak, and children. The new owners were obliged to pay the SS for the right to exploit Jewish slave laborers. The Bochnia Jewish community had officially ceased to exist, and children had to be hidden, as they were forbidden in the labor camp.¹⁷

The Hebrew youth movement Akiba was active in Bochnia before the war, and from 1940 its members established an underground cell in the town, which cooperated with the branch of the Żydowska Organizacja Bojowa (Jewish Fighting Organization, ŻOB) in Kraków. The Bochnia underground dealt in money and false identifications and prepared bunkers in the forest as a base for resistance operations. ŻOB members were recruited in the ghetto, and after December 1942 the underground was located in Ghetto B. From there they maintained communications with sections of the Polish underground and also the ŻOB members in Kraków. On Friday, February 26, 1943, the Germans arrested most members of the Bochnia underground. Surviving ŻOB leaders moved to the forest to continue the armed struggle against the Nazis. They remained in contact with the remaining cell inside the ghetto until the ghetto’s liquidation.

In the early spring of 1943, another Aktion took place in which 100 Jews were sent to Płaszów for forced labor. In July 1943, there was a scramble in the ghetto to purchase false documents showing foreign citizenship, as it was rumored that any foreign Jew who paid a large sum would be able to migrate to the United States. However, the ruse was soon exposed when approximately 100 Jews were not sent to the United States but to Płaszów, where the Germans shot all but 2 of them.¹⁸

The final liquidation Aktion started on September 1, 1943. At approximately 5:00 A.M., SS forces surrounded the ghetto and roused the residents from sleep, with orders to go to the Appellplatz. There they were divided into two groups. One contained most of the inhabitants of Ghetto B, including all of the children and elderly. This group, numbering approximately 4,000 people, was sent to the Auschwitz-Birkenau concentration camp to be murdered. The other group, comprising approximately 1,000 people aged 13 to 35, was transported to the Szebnie camp on September 3, where most of them died. At the communal cemetery, around 60 people were shot and their bodies burned.¹⁹

Officially, 150 Jews were allowed to remain in Bochnia as a work detail to clear the ghetto, along with a few members of the Jewish Police. Another 100 people joined the work detail after appealing to the Judenrat. However, when this was discovered the next day, 100 people were taken at random and shot in the street. Those remaining were forced to pile up the dead and burn the bodies. These 150 people worked until December 1943, and then 50 were sent to the Płaszów camp and 100 went to Szebnie.²⁰

Many Jews hid during the last Aktion, but most were uncovered over the following six weeks.²¹ The Jews in the work details tried to help them, but the Germans used dogs and smoke to force the Jews out of hiding to murder them. Most who tried to escape were murdered either by the Germans or by extremist Polish nationalists. A few made it to Hungary. The total death toll for the Bochnia ghetto was at least 13,000 Jews deported, most of them sent straight to their deaths in Bełżec or Auschwitz, and over 1,800 people killed in Bochnia and its vicinity.²²

SOURCES Publications on the Bochnia ghetto include the following: I. Zelinkovsky, Ghetto Bochnia: On the Trail of the Family I Never Knew (Canada: I. Zelinkovsky, 1995)—another version is available on the Web (www.angelfire.com); “Bochnia Ghetto,” on the Aktion Reinhard Camps (ARC) Web site (www.deathcamps.org/occupation/bochnia%20ghetto.html); Irena Zawadzka, “W 50 rocznice zagłady getta bocheńskiego,” in Rocznik Bocheński, vol. 1 (Bochnia, 1993); Maria Szymkowska, “Bochenskie getto,” Wiadomości bochenskie, no. 3 (2002); Justiz und NS-Verbrechen, vol. 27 (Amsterdam: Amsterdam University Press, 2003), Lfd. Nr. 667; Abraham Wein and Aharon Weiss, eds., Pinkas ha-kehillot. Encyclopaedia of Jewish Communities: Poland, vol. 3, Galicia and Western Silesia (Jerusalem: Yad Vashem, 1984), pp. 64–69; and Chaim Shlomo Friedman, Dare to Survive (New York: CIS, 1992).

Documents describing the fate of the Jews of Bochnia during the Holocaust can be found in the following archives: AZIH (301/1909, 4927; 211/236–241); BA-L (B 162/1967–1976, 2251–2259, and 14275–14276 [Verdict of LG-Kiel, 2 Ks 4/66, March 19, 1968]); USHMM (RG-15.019M; RG-50.120*0099 and 0251; and RG-50.166*0021); VHF; and YVA (e.g., collections M-1/E and O-3).

Shannon Phillips and Martin Dean

NOTES

1. Recorded testimony of Pinkas Klapholz, in Zelinkovsky, Ghetto Bochnia (TST5), pp. 3–4.
2. JuNS-V, vol. 27, Lfd. Nr. 667, p. 357; YVA, O-3/4504, testimony of Bertha Brauhn, in Zelinkovsky, Ghetto Bochnia (TST1), p. 5.
3. YVA, O-3/4504, in Zelinkovsky, Ghetto Bochnia, p. 5; Gazeta Żydowska, April 25, 1941.
4. JuNS-V, vol. 27, Lfd. Nr. 667, p. 357; Friedman, Dare to Survive, pp. 76–77.
5. YVA, O-3/1383, testimony of Dr. Stefan Korenhauser, in Zelinkovsky, Ghetto Bochnia, p. 1.
6. Ibid., p. 3; testimony of Ida Grinberg, in Zelinkovsky, Ghetto Bochnia, pp. 7–8; Friedman, Dare to Survive, pp. 216–219.
7. Recorded testimony of Pinkas Klapholz, in Zelinkovsky, Ghetto Bochnia, p. 6; JuNS-V, vol. 27, Lfd. Nr. 667, p. 357.
8. Klapholz, p. 7, and Brauhn, p. 5, both in Zelinkovsky, Ghetto Bochnia; and USHMM, RG-50.120*0099.
9. YVA, O-3/1383, in Zelinkovsky, Ghetto Bochnia, p. 2.

10. Klapholz, p. 7, and YVA, O-3/1383, p. 2, both in Zelinkovsky, Ghetto Bochnia; AŻIH, 301/1909, mentions the brutality of the Jewish Police.

11. JuNS-V, vol. 27, Lfd. Nr. 667, pp. 366–367.

12. YVA, O-3/3284, testimony of Johanan Kalfus, in Zelinkovsky, Ghetto Bochnia, p. 8.

13. Testimony of Pincus Kolender, in Zelinkovsky, Ghetto Bochnia, pp. 4–5; JuNS-V, vol. 27, Lfd. Nr. 667, pp. 366–367.

14. Klapholz, in Zelinkovsky, Ghetto Bochnia, p. 8.

15. JuNS-V, vol. 27, Lfd. Nr. 667, p. 380.

16. Police Decree issued by HSSPF Krüger of the Generalgouvernement, November 10, 1942, published in Tatiana Berenstein et al., eds., Faschismus, Getto, Massenmord: Dokumentation über Ausrottung und Widerstand der Juden in Polen während des zweiten Weltkrieges (Berlin: Rütten & Loening, 1961), pp. 344–345.

17. JuNS-V, vol. 27, Lfd. Nr. 667, p. 379.

18. YVA, O-3/3091, in Zelinkovsky, Ghetto Bochnia, pp. 20–21.

19. Braunhut, in Zelinkovsky, Ghetto Bochnia, pp. 12–14.

20. YVA, O-3/1383, in Zelinkovsky, Ghetto Bochnia, p. 8.

21. Kolender, in Zelinkovsky, Ghetto Bochnia, p. 8.

22. Czesław Pilichowski et al., eds., Obozy hitlerowskie na ziemiach polskich 1939–1945: Informator encyklopedyczny (Warsaw: PWN, 1979), p. 110.

BRZESKO

Pre-1939: Brzesko, town, Tarnów powiat, Kraków województwo, Poland; 1939–1945: Kreis Tarnow, Distrikt Krakau, Generalgouvernement; post-1998: województwo małopolskie, Poland

Brzesko is located about 52 kilometers (32 miles) east-southeast of Kraków. On the outbreak of World War II in 1939, there were 2,119 Jews living in Brzesko (around 50 percent of the total population).¹

German armed forces occupied the town on September 5, 1939. The Jews were rounded up for forced labor. In September 1939, the Germans set the synagogue on fire. They also demanded a ransom of 40,000 złoty from the Jewish community and took 10 Jews hostage. In October 1939, the Germans registered all men between the ages of 15 and 60. The Jews were ordered to wear armbands bearing the Star of David. A Jewish Council (Judenrat) was established, headed by Jakub Hendler. It was entrusted with meeting German demands for forced laborers. The Szczurowa and Borzęcin Jewish communities (comprising 239 Jews in total in 1940) were both subordinated to the Brzesko Judenrat. Apart from the Judenrat and the Brzesko branch of Jewish Social Self-Help (JSS), there was also a Committee for the Aid to Refugees and the Poor, as well as the Central Organization for Orphan Care (CENTOS), which provided assistance to around 130 children in 1940. German police officials (most notoriously Wilhelm Rommelmann, Lapsch, and Beck) visited Brzesko occasionally to shoot Jews. They selected their victims either from a previously prepared list or at random.²

The Brzesko JSS reports 3,270 Jews in Brzesko on May 31, 1941. There were 1,625 Jews seeking assistance, but only 1,125 received help. Furthermore, around 500 Jews received meals from the community kitchen; 1,100 received financial assistance; 1,033 Jews received coal; 328 were given medical assistance; and 640 received medicine. There were still 48 Jewish workshops in Brzesko, where mainly tailors, hatmakers, furriers, and butchers worked. Around 82 businesses were owned by Jews, and some 200 Jews performed physical labor. In the first week of March 1941 and again on March 9, 1941, transports of Jews from Kraków arrived in Brzesko. These resettled Jews were left without any means of support. In December 1941, the Germans demanded that the Jews surrender all their winter equipment and fur clothing for the German army in Russia.³

In the fall of 1941, the Germans created an open ghetto in Brzesko, the area of which was designated by signs. Two Jewish residential districts were created in separate areas of the town: one area was located on both sides of Wapienna Street; the second area was situated around present-day Sobieski, Ruchu Oporu, Ogrodu Jordanowsi, and Chopin Streets and also Kazimierz Wielki Square. The Jews could not leave these areas on pain of death. At first, there were around 3,000 Jews concentrated in the ghetto, but the number rose to 6,000 in the summer of 1942. A Jewish police force also was created, headed by Diestler, a former soldier in the Austrian army. Jews performed forced labor for the Germans (a number of Jews from Brzesko were sent to the Pustków and other labor camps), as well as working in workshops inside the ghetto.⁴

In the ghetto, the Jews experienced hunger and disease. They could still obtain food while the ghetto remained open, as some contact with the local population was maintained. Due to poor sanitary conditions and malnutrition, an epidemic of typhus broke out. Patients were treated in the ghetto hospital where Maurycy Gross was one of the doctors. During three days around 15 people were hospitalized, 5 of whom died. Jews also became victims of shootings by the Germans. After the executions, the Germans demanded payment for the ammunition used and forced the Jews to sign documents falsely indicating the natural death of the victim. The Germans also demanded further “contributions” from the Jewish community.⁵

By the spring of 1942, the typhus epidemic had ended. An Aktion took place around that time. The Germans came to the town, rounded up people, and shot 6 of them in the town square. In mid-April 1942, a further Aktion took place. The Germans, including three members of the local Order Police, Lapsch, Wagner, and Mikler, shot around 50 Jews; the bodies were buried in two mass graves at the Jewish cemetery. In May 1942, Germans arrived from Tarnów, demanding furniture and money from the Jews of Brzesko. On June 18, 1942, the third Aktion took place. Ukrainian units surrounded the town, while German forces carried out the Aktion. Around 200 Jews were shot at the Jewish cemetery in Brzesko, and 400 were deported.⁶

According to an order issued by Kreishauptmann Dr. Kipke in Tarnów on July 15, 1942, Jews from the settlements of Kreis Tarnow, except from the city of Tarnów itself, were required to move to Dąbrowa Tarnowska, Brzesko, Tuchów, Zakliczyn, or Żabno by July 23, 1942. In mid-July 1942, the Germans established an enclosed ghetto in Brzesko. It was surrounded by a fence; windows had to remain closed, and the curtains drawn. There were two ghettos, one on each side of the church and divided by an “Aryan” street. Jews were transferred from one ghetto to the other escorted by the Jewish Police. In the ghetto there was overcrowding. According to German policy, 10 people were assigned for each window in a dwelling. People prepared hiding places; some forged Aryan papers. There was not enough to eat. The social organizations distributed only small amounts of food, and the ghetto inhabitants had to obtain the rest themselves. The Jewish Police were able to smuggle food into the ghetto; people also used to sneak out at night and barter items for food with the Poles. Polish police guarded the ghetto externally, but some Jews were able to escape. If they were caught outside the ghetto, they were shot. Although no official religious services were held, some people maintained their religious practices, such as observing Shabbat.⁷

In September 1942, the Germans liquidated the ghetto. The Jews were rounded up and sent to the Bełżec extermination camp. A number of Jews managed to escape the roundup, but most were subsequently captured and shot. Some escapees received help from Dr. Jan Brzeski, who treated Jews in their hideouts at great personal risk. Only around 70 Jews remained after the Aktion, tasked with clearing out the ghetto area. Afterwards, these Jews were sent to the Tarnów ghetto. In 1943, the Germans shot 28 Jews at the Brzesko Jewish cemetery (presumably people uncovered in hiding).⁸

Only about 200 Jews from Brzesko survived the Holocaust.

SOURCES Publications dealing with the history and murder of the Jews in Brzesko include the following: “Brzesko,” in Abraham Wein and Aharon Weiss, eds., Pinkas ha-kehillot. Encyclopaedia of Jewish Communities: Poland, vol. 3, Galicia and Western Silesia (Jerusalem: Yad Vashem, 1984); Aleksandra Pietrzykowa, Region tarnowski w okresie okupacji hitlerowskiej. Polityka okupanta i ruch oporu (Warsaw: PWN, 1984); Iwona Zawadzka, Cmentarz żydowski w Brzesku (Brzesko: Brzeska Oficyna Wydawnicza, 2001); and Adam Bartosz, Tarnowskie judaica (Warsaw: Wydawnictwo PTTK “Kraj,” 1992).

Documents on the fate of the Jews in Brzesko can be found in the following archives: AŻIH (301/609, 611, 1376; JM 10005, # 5735958); IPN (ASG, sygn. 48a, p. 25; ZhIII/31/35/68; Dsn 7/30/68/“W” 471); USHMM (Acc.1997.A.0124, reel 16; and RG-15.019M, reels 3 and 14); VHF (# 4147, 8609, 30095, 37249, 41736, 42765, 51734); WAPKOB; and YVA.

Joanna Śliwa

NOTES

1. USHMM, Acc.1997.A.0124, reel 16, JSS Brzesko report for period from September 1939 to May 31, 1941.

2. Ibid., report of the Mitglied des Judenrates in Brzesko für die Sammelgemeinden Szczurowa und Borzęcin, September 29, 1940, and letters of the Committee for the Aid to Refugees and the Poor, November 18 and 19, 1940; AŻIH, 301/609, testimony of Mendel Feichtal; and VHF, # 37249, testimony of Maurice Moritz Reiss.

3. USHMM, Acc.1997.A.0124, reel 16, JSS Brzesko report for period from September 1939 to May 31, 1941, and JSS Brzesko reports for May and June 1941.

4. Ibid., note from Kraków, March 17, 1941; RG-15.019M, reel 14, “Kwestionariusz o obozach”; and VHF, # 4147 and # 30095, testimonies of Anita Hirsch and Samuel Brandsdorfer.

5. USHMM, Acc.1997.A.0124, reel 16, letter of JSS Brzesko to Kraków, November 21, 1941.

6. A. Dylewski, Śladami Żydów polskich (Pascal, 2002); AŻIH, 301/611, testimony of Felicja Schafer; USHMM, RG-15.019M, reel 3, “Kwestionariusz o egzekucjach masowych i grobach masowych.”

7. USHMM, Acc.1997.A.0124, reel 16, protocol of JSS in Tarnów, July 31, 1942; AŻIH 301/611, pp. 3–5; VHF, # 8609, testimony of Aron Beidner; # 37249, # 30095, and # 42765, testimony of Stella Lanner.

8. Władysław Myśliński, A jednak tak było (Warsaw, 1978), pp. 283–284, states that the Aktion took place on August 24, 1942; Wein and Weiss, Pinkas ha-kehillot: Poland, vol. 3, Galicia and Western Silesia, dates the Aktion on September 12, 1942; AŻIH 301/611 and 1376, testimony of Helena Schmalholz; Shmuel Krakowski and Sara Bender, eds., The Encyclopedia of the Righteous among the Nations: Rescuers of Jews during the Holocaust—Poland (Jerusalem: Yad Vashem, 2004), pp. 117, 217.

BRZOSTEK

Pre-1939: Brzostek, village, Kraków województwo, Poland;
1939–1945: Kreis Jasło, Distrikt Krakau, Generalgouvernement;
post-1998: województwo podkarpackie, Poland

Brzostek is located 49 kilometers (29 miles) southwest of Rzeszów. According to the 1921 census, there were 479 Jews living in Brzostek. The Jewish community occupied the village square, 20 Czerwca and Żydowska Streets; the synagogue was located on the latter. By 1939 Brzostek had an estimated 500 Jewish residents.

A significant number of Brzostek's Jews fled to the east on the outbreak of war into the part of Poland annexed by the Soviet Union in the fall of 1939. With the occupation, the Germans established a Jewish Council (Judenrat), chaired by Israel Schonwetter. Its primary task was to supply laborers for agricultural work, to level and beautify the village square, and to pave roads. Labor squads building fortifications in Wiśniowa were driven to work on trucks and brought back in the evening.¹

By February 1940, a committee for refugee relief had been established in Brzostek. A man named Goldman was its chairman. Refugees were quartered in the synagogue; their numbers and place of origin are unknown. In 1942, a number of Jews from the Jodłowa ghetto were transferred to Brzostek.²

In the summer of 1941, after the invasion of the Soviet Union, the Germans selected around 40 professionals from among Brzostek's Jews to be sent to a labor camp in Lwów. One of the men selected, Adam Szus, recalls that the Germans threatened to kill his parents after he went into hiding to avoid deportation.³

By the summer of 1941, a branch of the Jewish Social Self-Help (JSS) had been established in Brzostek. It operated briefly, only to be closed in September 1941 by the Kraków JSS headquarters, in response to an assessment by the Jasło branch describing the Brzostek JSS's "insignificant activity."⁴

Mieczysław Wieliczko, historian of Jasło County, established that the process of ghettoization in the Kreis was completed in 1941 (most likely in the autumn), when a ghetto in Jasło was established. One of the ghettos created around that time was in Brzostek. An open ghetto, unguarded and unfenced, most likely included the village square and Żydowska Street.

At the beginning of 1942, a number of Jews were seized for work in labor camps, including in Pustków.⁵ On May 1, 1942, the Germans shot eight Jewish Communists, who were then buried in the Jewish cemetery on Szkotnia Street.⁶

Two days before the ghetto's liquidation on August 12, 1942, the Gestapo requested chairman Schonwetter to report to the Polish police station for questioning, where he was then held until the Aktion. The wife of the Polish police commander informed Schonwetter's family of the planned execution. The police commander released Schonwetter, asking him to "go for a walk." Schonwetter returned to the jail, saying: "I know exactly what is happening. But I am the leader of this community. I will stand with my people."⁷

According to Wieliczko, Jews from the Brzostek ghetto were brought to nearby Kołaczyce on August 12, 1942. Following a selection, some were sent to a labor camp in Jasło. Several people were shot during the liquidation Aktion in Kołaczyce. Others (as many as 260 people) were transported by the Germans to the Podzamcze Forest (also referred to as the forest in Kowalowy) near Krajowice village and then shot that same afternoon. Members of the Jasło Gestapo supervised the execution.⁸

SOURCES The following publications refer to the fate of the Jews of Brzostek: Bogdan Stanaszek, Brzostek i okolice (Brzostek: Towarzystwo Miłośników Ziemi Brzostockiej, 1997), pp. 61, 63, 66; Mieczysław Wieliczko, Żasielskie w latach drugiej wojny światowej (Warsaw: Wydawnictwo Ministerstwa Obrony Narodowej, 1974), pp. 131, 148, 182–184; and Arnon Rubin, The Rise and Fall of the Jewish Communities in Poland and Their Relics Today, vol. 3, District Krakow (Tel Aviv: Tel Aviv University Press, 2008), pp. 147–148.

Archival sources include AŻIH (210/280 [AJDC]; 211/472–473 [JSS]; 301/4697 [Relacje]); USHMM (Acc.1999.A.0154 [AJDC], 210/280; Acc.1997.A.0124 [JSS]); and VHF (# 4409, 20720, 35501).

Jolanta Kraemer

NOTES

1. VHF, # 4409, testimony of Adam Szus, 1995; # 20720, testimony of Mark Schonwetter, 1996; Tadeusz Frączek, "Historia ludności żydowskiej zamieszkałej w Brzostku w okresie II wojny światowej," Wiadomości Brzostockie, no. 4 (41) (July 1999): 9—see www.brzostek.alpha.pl/wiadomos/archiwum.html.

2. USHMM, Acc.1999.A.0154 (AJDC), 210/280 (Brzostek), p. 1; AŻIH, 301/4697, testimony of Regina Rueck, 1945.

3. VHF, # 4409.

4. USHMM, Acc.1997.A.0124 (JSS), 211/472 (Jasło), p. 36; and 211/473 (Jasło), p. 9.

5. VHF, # 35501, testimony of Leona Silverman, 1997; AŻIH, 301/4697.

6. Frączek, "Historia ludności żydowskiej"—the article is based on an interview with survivor Abraham Schuss. According to Schuss, the killing of Communists took place in 1941, but it most likely took place in the spring of 1942, when the Germans conducted killings of Jewish activists in ghettos.

7. VHF, # 20720; Johanna Ginsberg, "Family Helps Polish Town Reclaim Its Painful Past," New Jersey Jewish News, July 30, 2009—see njewishnews.com/njjn.com/073009/njFamilyHelpsPolishTown.html.

8. Rejestr miejsc i faktów zbrodni popełnionych przez okupanta hitlerowskiego na ziemiach polskich w latach 1939–1945: Województwo krośnieńskie (Warsaw: GKBZHP, 1983), pp. 70–71, 74–75.

BRZÓZÓW

Pre-1939: Brzozów, town, Lwów województwo, Poland; 1939–1945: Brzozow, Kreis Sanok, then from November 1941, Kreis Krosno, Distrikt Krakau, Generalgouvernement; post-1998: Brzozów, województwo podkarpackie, Poland

The town of Brzozów is located 18 kilometers (11 miles) north of Sanok. There were 1,127 Jews living in Brzozów in 1921, constituting 21.7 percent of the total population. Their number had fallen to 1,046 by 1931.

The Germans occupied Brzozów on September 9, 1939. Upon entering the town, they confiscated merchandise from Jewish shops, marked them with an inscription in yellow paint ("Jew"), and later assigned trustees to these businesses.

A sports field in Brzozów where Jews were assembled prior to deportation, August 8, 1942.

USHMM WS #33438, COURTESY OF GFH

Jewish residents, including their rabbi, Mojżesz Weber, were forced to clean streets and labor at nearby petroleum wells. Women cleaned the offices of the German administration. By October 1939, the number of Jews had declined to 920, as many fled east to the Soviet-occupied Polish territories.

On October 26, 1939, the Germans appointed a Jewish Council (Judenrat) chaired by Benzion Laufer. Joel Fass replaced him, most likely at the beginning of 1940. Mojżesz Knobelbarth was Fass's "sword-arm"; Sala Biber (secretary) and Uszer Freund (treasurer) also staffed the Judenrat. The Gestapo, together with officials from the Kreis and Landrat offices, paid the Judenrat frequent visits, demanding contributions in foreign currencies, gold, tea, coffee, liqueurs, and furs.¹

A German Gendarmerie post and its jail were located initially at 1 Sienkiewicz Street; later it was moved to the grounds of a church parish. The prison of a local court was located on Mickiewicz Street.

By March 1940, 91 Jewish refugees had settled in Brzozów. The Judenrat opened a kosher soup kitchen for their benefit on March 7, 1940. It operated six days a week, but half of its meals were meatless. The kitchen served on average 140 meals a day but only 33 to the newly arrived refugees. The Brzozów community contributed 25 percent of the kitchen expenses, while the remainder was covered by the American Jewish Joint Distribution Committee (AJDC). Due to financial constraints, meals with meat were soon reduced to one per week. As a result, the recipients became "very discontented," and the Judenrat considered closing the kitchen. Unable to finance it any longer, the Judenrat had no other choice and closed it anyway on July 20, 1940.²

In August 1940, the Judenrat reported 910 Jews (including 113 refugees) living in Brzozów. By November 7, 1940, the number of Jews had risen to 944, and the Judenrat was reporting, "We are sending over 300 workers to labor camps in Krosno, Baligród, Wzdów, and Bzianka."³

In May 1941, a local branch of the Jewish Social Self-Help (JSS) was established in Brzozów to relieve the Judenrat of its assistance duties to the poor and refugees. Out of a total of 1,007 Jews in Brzozów, one quarter sought assistance, and 811 were registered as "without an occupation." There were, however, 44 stores and 21 Jewish workshops still operating in the town. At the same time, only 13 Brzozów Jews were laboring in camps outside the gmina.⁴

The Brzozów ghetto was most likely set up in the second half of 1941, or possibly at the beginning of 1942. The ghetto encompassed the eastern part of the market square, including Piastowa and Kazimierzo Streets. The displacement was without warning. Brzozów's Jews were allowed to take up to 20 kilograms (44 pounds) of clothes and household goods with them.

Jacek Joterski, a Pole who assisted the Jewish community during the war and on whose memoir this entry is largely based, states that the ghetto inmates were forbidden to travel more than 1 kilometer (0.6 mile) beyond the town limits on pain of death. The ghetto was severely overcrowded, with up to 10 people sharing a room, typically with only straw for a bed and people sleeping in shifts due to the lack of space.⁵

None of the sources refer to the ghetto being physically enclosed. A Jewish police force was organized in October 1941 to keep order inside the ghetto and to guard it internally. Approximately 200 men were conscripted into the Ortsschutz (local protection force) and also air-raid-defense units, which guarded and patrolled the ghetto at night and enforced the blackout. The latter included Poles and was supervised by the Gendarmerie and Polish police. Fifteen prominent Poles and all ghetto residents were declared to be hostages to prevent any acts of sabotage.

In October 1941, the JSS reported that it was responsible for a total of 1,350 Jews in seven neighboring settlements; of that number, 1,000 were Brzozów Jews. It was at this time that the soup kitchen was reopened. Over a dozen workers labored on road works in Kalnica near Baligród.⁶

In May 1942, the authorities announced an increase in the size of the Jewish Police.⁷

On June 18, 1942, 400 Jews from the surrounding settlements were transferred to Brzozów. The Housing Committee and the Jewish Police placed them en masse in community buildings. It was also reported that a group of Jews was transferred from the Krosno ghetto. At that time, the Jewish Police was in the process of recruiting new members, as most of its staffers had been sent to Jaśliska to supervise Jewish laborers.⁸ Among the newcomers were approximately 20 families from Humniska, who even before their transfer to the ghetto had been working in Brzozów on a daily basis, carrying stones for road construction. Ten of these families were housed in a local school.⁹

At the beginning of August 1942, 258 Jews were deported to the Płaszów labor camp via the Targowiska train station. Over 40 people were sent for spadework at the petroleum well in Grabownica.

The Germans informed the Judenrat one day in advance that the ghetto residents would be resettled to labor camps on August 10, 1942. It was also announced that 50 craftsmen and their families would stay in Brzozów. All the Jews were ordered to gather at the local stadium near the Stobnica River with up to 20 kilograms (44 pounds) of luggage. The community was anxious and suspicious of German intentions, as they were aware that large ditches had recently been dug in a nearby forest on August 8.

The ghetto residents were transferred to the stadium unescorted. There, a selection by a single SS man was conducted; he directed individual Jews to be escorted away by other SS men onto three trucks standing at the stadium's gate. The Judenrat secretary, Sala Biber, checked those selected against a list. The trucks departed in a southwesterly direction towards the Spring Forest (Las Zdrojowy). Some of the trucks reportedly went northwest, in the direction of Stara Wieś village. By 10:30 A.M., the stadium was empty. The last to be loaded onto trucks were the members of the Judenrat.

The trucks were unloaded near the turning off point to Zmiennica, at the Spring Forest. Jews were ordered to undress and then led deeper into the forest to an opening, which locals often used for picnics. Three SS men carried out the executions by shooting their victims in the back of the skull on the edge of the pits. Small children were killed using an iron crowbar. By 2:00 P.M., an estimated 700 to 800 Jews had been murdered. As the SS had ordered the Judenrat to prepare a detailed list of all those selected to be killed, a search for the approximately 100 who had gone into hiding ensued.¹⁰

According to another source, the Krosno Gestapo conducted the liquidation Aktion. In its course, 1,400 Jews were murdered, of which 800 were shot in the settlement of Karolówka.¹¹ Some sources, for example, Obozy hitlerowskie and Pinkas ha-kehilot, state that a number of Jews survived the selection and were sent to Iwonicz (23 kilometers [14 miles], southwest of Brzozów).¹²

SOURCES The following publications were used to prepare this entry: Czesław Pilichowski et al., eds., Obozy hitlerowskie na ziemiach polskich 1939–1945: Informator encyklopedyczny (Warsaw: PWN, 1979), p. 120; Andrzej Potocki, Żydzi w Podkarpaciu (Rzeszów: Libra, 2004); and E. Podhorizer-Sandel, “O Zagładzie Żydów w dystrykcie krakowskim,” BŻIH, no. 30 (1959): 88.

Archival sources referring to the Brzozów ghetto include AŻIH (210/282 [AJDC]; 302/258 [Memoirs of Jews]); and USHMM (RG.02.208M [Memoirs of Jews]; Acc.1999.A.0154 [AJDC]; RG-50.002*0030).

Jolanta Kraemer

NOTES

1. USHMM, Acc.1999.A.0154 (AJDC), 210/282, pp. 2, 6; AŻIH, 302/258, memoir of Jacek Joterski, 1962.
2. USHMM, Acc.1999.A.0154 (AJDC), 210/282, pp. 8, 10–11, 23, 36–38, 41, 49, 60.
3. Ibid., pp. 57, 64. Note that pp. 67–74 list all 275 Jewish families living in Brzozów (name and surname of the head of the family and the number of family members). Although undated, it was most likely drawn up in December 1940.
4. Ibid., p. 2.
5. AŻIH, 302/258.
6. Ibid.; Gazeta Żydowska, October 17, 1941.
7. Gazeta Żydowska, May 20, 1942.
8. Ibid., June 18, 1942, and July 29, 1942.
9. USHMM, RG-50.002*0030, interview with Mina Zuckerman, 1983.
10. AŻIH, 302/258.
11. Rejestr miejsc i faktów zbrodni popełnionych przez okupanta hitlerowskiego na ziemiach polskich w latach 1939–1945: Województwo krośnieńskie (Warsaw: GKBZHWP, 1983), pp. 24–26.
12. Abraham Wein and Aharon Weiss, eds., Pinkas ha-kehilot. Encyclopaedia of Jewish Communities: Poland, vol. 3, Galia and Western Silesia (Jerusalem: Yad Vashem, 1984), p. 72.

CZUDEC

Pre-1939: Czudec, village, Rzeszów powiat, Lwów województwo, Poland; 1939–1945: Kreis Reichshof, Distrikt Krakau, General-gouvernement; post-1998: województwo podkarpackie, Poland

Czudec is located 136 kilometers (85 miles) east of Kraków. The 1921 census registered 322 Jews in Czudec, constituting 35.3 percent of the total population; this number had increased to 376 by 1939.¹

According to survivor Samuel Halpern, when the war broke out on September 1, 1939, the commander of the local Polish police force approached Czudec's rabbi and advised him that all Jewish men should leave the village. He believed that the women would be safe under German occupation. There is no information regarding the initial occupation of the village and possible casualties.

The new German authorities set up a Jewish Council (Judenrat), but its composition is unknown. A self-help committee was set up following the arrival of a stream of refugees and deportees in November 1939. One of its initial members was Jakub Nebenzahl, who was likely a member of the Judenrat. This institution was charged with organizing social assistance for Jews in the initial months of the war. The 48-year-old Nebenzahl was a local tradesman and the pre-war leader of the kehillah.²

The Judenrat census shows that at the end of November 1940 there were 494 Jews living in Czudec, including 83 newcomers. By February 1941, the number of newcomers had risen to 123, but the total number of Jews had declined to 476. The newcomers, most of them transferred by the German authorities via Rzeszów, were originally from Kalisz, Łódź, Kraków, Silesia, and various places in Germany. An estimated 80 percent of all Jews in Czudec were in need of some sort of support.³

The winter and spring correspondence of 1941 between the Czudec Judenrat and the Jewish Social Self-Help (JSS) office in Kraków, referring to the establishment of the official branch of the JSS in Czudec, indicates that the Judenrat, consisting of adversaries of the local Hasidim, sought to prevent them from taking charge of the organization. The three initial nominees pushed by the Hasidim (Zachariasz Jaffe, Szabse Herzig, and Samuel Engelberg) were deemed by the Judenrat to be “inadequate”—for example, Engelberg, “despite his wealth, pays his contributions only when forced.” Seeking to change the committee's composition, the Czudec Judenrat had to fight Jaffe and Herzig's supporter, Schmid, who was described by the Judenrat chairman as having “conjured up on the spot the surnames of his Hasidim, who for nearly a year and a half had not lifted their noses to see the light of day.”

By May 1941, the following were at last included in the committee: 37-year-old Szabse Herzig and two tradesmen, Jakub Nebenzahl and 43-year-old Pinkas Chajes. That same month, Nebenzahl was replaced by Samuel Engelberg, whose position was taken in August 1941 by a native of Rymanów, Izrael Iser Citronenbaum. Throughout most of that year, Czudec was entitled to 4 percent of the total amount of welfare distributed among all the localities in Kreis Reichshof by the JSS. A soup kitchen was opened on the market square only in September 1941, serving up to 100 meals daily.⁴

According to the records of the Czudec Judenrat, a total of 499 Jews were residing in Czudec in June 1941, increasing to 503 three months later. The same source indicates that 119 children under 18 years of age were living in Czudec that summer. Of that number, 14 were under 3 years old, 33 were 3 to 7 years old, 42 were 7 to 14 years old, and 30 were 14 to 18 years old.

There is no information concerning health or diseases among Czudec's Jews; however, it is known that there was no pharmacy in the village. By the summer of 1941, there was still no hospital or ambulatory clinic established there.

As regards Jewish labor conscription in Czudec, most of the surviving records refer to the summer months of 1941. At that time, only 11 Jewish businesses remained open with permission from the Germans, most of these being tailors and cobblers. Twenty-six Jewish laborers performed forced labor within the community, and another 41 worked in labor camps outside the village. The nature of their work and possible compensation—if any—are unknown. What is known is that between July and the end of October 1941, the so-called Administration of the Czudec Estate employed 35 Jews in agriculture. It is not clear whether their status was that of forced laborers and whether, as such, they were included in the statistics for “laboring Jews” cited in this paragraph, either as Jewish peasants working their own fields or simply as hired agriculture workers.⁵

Only one source, Pinkas ha-kebilot, dates and briefly describes the establishment of a ghetto in Czudec between late 1941 and the beginning of 1942. The Czudec ghetto was unfenced, and the German authorities let the Jews remain in their existing residential area; however, permission was required to leave the village. Those laboring outside the village limits did so with explicit permission from the employment office. The relatively vague time frame and description of the ghetto provided in the Pinkas ha-kebilot publication are consistent with evidence regarding other small ghettos in the vicinity.⁶

On March 20, 1942, 80 Jews from the nearby village of Lubenia were resettled to Czudec. An unknown number of Jews from other neighboring settlements soon followed. By April 4, 1942, 52 Jews suitable for labor had been selected and sent to a work camp. The local JSS committee complained to their headquarters in Kraków that they were now the sole support for the women and children that remained. The transfer of Jews from smaller to larger Jewish settlements and the round-ups of Jews for labor camps that followed serve as the two main indicators for the existence of several smaller ghettos within Kreis Reichshof.⁷

Eighteen Kennkarten (identification cards issued by German authorities, with corresponding colors based on ethnicity) designating their holders as “Poles” were obtained with the cooperation of a Polish employee and two staffers within the Czudec gmina registration office. Nine of the identification cards were issued for the following Czudec residents: Henryk Tewel, Ewa Tewel, Golda Speiser, Simon Götrek, Chaim Goback, Mozes Heffer, Naftali Engelberg, Naftali Jaffa, and a man known only by his first name, Berl; the other Kennkarten were issued to Jews from Pstrągowa, Lubenia, and Wyżne.⁸

Kreis Reichshof was chosen by the Germans to be one of the first to become judenrein (cleansed of Jews) in Distrikt

Krakau. Several of the ghettos in the Kreis were liquidated between June 25 and 27, 1942, when their inhabitants were relocated to the Rzeszów ghetto. Czudec's Jews were most likely among the Jews transferred at this time. A series of railroad transports organized in July 1942, destined for the Bełżec extermination camp, practically emptied the Rzeszów ghetto of most of its inhabitants.⁹

SOURCES Publications containing some information regarding the fate of the small Jewish community of Czudec include the following: E. Podhorizer-Sandel, “O Zagładzie Żydów w dystrykcie krakowskim,” BŻIH, no. 30 (1959); Andrzej Potocki, Żydzi w Podkarpackiem (Rzeszów: Libra, 2004); and Abraham Wein and Aharon Weiss, eds., Pinkas ha-kebilot. Encyclopaedia of Jewish Communities: Poland, vol. 3, Galicia and Western Silesia (Jerusalem: Yad Vashem, 1984).

This entry is based mostly on documents that can be found in the following archives: AŻIH (210/311A [AJDC Czudec]; 211/336-337 [JSS Czudec], 211/922, 211/925, 211/933 [JSS Rzeszów]); USHMM (Acc.1997.A.0154 [AJDC]; and Acc.1997.A.0124 [JSS], reel 20); and VHF (# 45091).

Jolanta Kraemer

NOTES

1. USHMM, Acc.1997.A.0124, reel 20, 211/336, p. 25.
2. VHF, # 45091, testimony of Samuel Halpern; USHMM, Acc.1997.A.0124, reel 20, 211/336, p. 20.
3. USHMM, Acc.1997.A.0124, reel 20, 211/336, pp. 2, 10a, 11, 17.
4. Ibid., pp. 11–13, 15, and 211/637, pp. 8, 16; Acc.1997.A.0124, reel 44, 211/922, p. 36, and 211/925, p. 49; Acc.1997.A.0124, reel 45, 211/933, p. 17.
5. Ibid., Acc.1997.A.0124, reel 20, 211/336, pp. 6, 25, 51, and 211/337, pp. 7, 14.
6. Wein and Weiss, Pinkas ha-kebilot: Poland, vol. 3, Galicia and Western Silesia, p. 303.
7. USHMM, Acc.1997.A.0124, reel 20, 211/337, pp. 61–62.
8. Elżbieta Rączy, Pomoc Polaków dla ludności żydowskiej na Rzeszowszczyźnie 1939–1945 (Rzeszów: Instytut Pamięci Narodowej-Komisja Ścigania Zbrodni przeciwko Narodowi Polskiemu, 2008), p. 59.
9. Podhorizer-Sandel, “O Zagładzie Żydów,” pp. 94–95; Zbigniew K. Wójcik, Rzeszów w latach drugiej wojny światowej: Okupacja i konspiracja 1939–1944–1945 (Rzeszów: Instytut Europejskich Studiów Społecznych; Kraków: Tow. Sympatyków Historii, 1998), p. 156; Potocki, Żydzi w Podkarpackiem, p. 41.

DĄBROWA TARNOWSKA

Pre-1939: Dąbrowa Tarnowska, town, Dąbrowa powiat, Kraków województwo, Poland; 1939–1945: Dąbrowa Tarnowska, Kreis Tarnow, Distrikt Krakau, Generalgouvernement; post-1998: Dąbrowa Tarnowska, województwo małopolskie, Poland

The town of Dąbrowa Tarnowska is located about 80 kilometers (50 miles) east-northeast of Kraków. On the eve of World War II, there were about 2,400 Jews living in Dąbrowa Tarnowska.

German troops entered the town on September 8, 1939. In October 1939, Dąbrowa Tarnowska was incorporated into Kreis Tarnow in Distrikt Krakau. Within Kreis Tarnow, Dąbrowa Tarnowska became the administrative center of its own Landgemeinde.¹ Anti-Jewish Aktions in Kreis Tarnow, including Dąbrowa Tarnowska, were organized and carried out by the Security Police detachment (Sipo-Aussendienststelle) in Tarnów, which served under the Commanding Officer of the Security Police and SD (KdS) in Kraków. The German Gendarmerie and Polish auxiliary police also took part in the Aktions against the local Jewish population.

Between 1939 and 1941, the German occupying authorities in Dąbrowa Tarnowska implemented a number of anti-Jewish policies. Jewish property was confiscated; the Jews were registered, ordered to wear patches and armbands bearing the Star of David, and were forbidden from leaving the limits of the town, performing ritual slaughter of animals, or trading with the non-Jewish population. Many were obliged to perform various forms of heavy physical labor. The Germans had established a Jewish Council (Judenrat) by early in 1940, which was headed by Dr. Neuberger. The Judenrat took measures to meet the basic needs of the Jewish community. It organized a communal kitchen, which in May 1941 provided more than 7,000 meals; it distributed shoes and clothing, and it provided some means of financial support to the needy. The Judenrat also assisted those Jews who from December 1941 were sent to work in the labor camps in Pustków and Mielec.

By June 1941, as a result of the resettlement of many Jews from western Poland, including the city of Kraków, the total number of Jews in Dąbrowa rose to 3,200. Following the influx of refugees, sanitary conditions for the Jews seriously deteriorated. In January 1941, an epidemic of typhus broke out, and Jews were forbidden to leave their homes. The town remained sealed off for two months, during which the Jewish population was on the verge of starvation, and provisions had to be smuggled in. By September 1941, the Jewish population in the town had declined to 3,091. In January 1942, another epidemic of typhus broke out. Despite the efforts of the Judenrat to obtain medical supplies and funds to treat and cure those infected, the hospital was only able to function intermittently.²

At the end of April 1942, around 20 Jews accused of being Communist activists were shot as part of a larger Aktion against alleged members of leftist movements that was carried out by the Security Police throughout the region. In June 1942, in an attempt to spare as many Jews as possible from being conscripted for forced labor, the Judenrat created a workshop that employed 412 workers. That month, the Germans demanded a large "contribution" from the Jews, which was to be composed mainly of cash, furniture, and appliances. The contribution was paid in full in the hope that this would avert a large deportation Aktion. However, a few days later, a detachment of the Security Police and an associated deportation Sonderkommando from Tarnów surrounded the town in the early hours of the morning. They rounded up the Jews in the town square and selected about 450 for deportation to the Bełżec extermination camp. Men of the Sonderkommando shot about 50 elderly people on the spot during the Aktion. Many people avoided the roundup by hiding in the woods and in underground bunkers.

Towards the end of June 1942, the German authorities established an enclosed ghetto in Dąbrowa Tarnowska. Between June 15 and June 23, 1942, Jews were resettled from the villages and small towns of Kreis Tarnow to Dąbrowa Tarnowska, Tarnów, and several other newly established ghettos. On July 17, a second Aktion was carried out in Dąbrowa Tarnowska. Around 1,800 Jews who had been concentrated in the town's ghetto from the surrounding area were deported to Bełżec; the German police forces shot nearly 100 people on the spot during the Aktion.³

The third Aktion took place on September 18, 1942. Although the Germans had intended to liquidate the ghetto on that day, a large number of people were able to hide. During this third Aktion, the Germans deported 500 people and shot 10 others, including the head of the Judenrat. In the days that followed, many people returned to the town from hiding, and a "small ghetto" was established. Suddenly on October 1, 1942, the German forces again descended on the town and deported 900 people to Bełżec. On October 6, the Germans rounded up 600 more people, many of whom had been hiding in bunkers, and they shot some 20 people. Around 30 Jews were left in the ghetto to clear out remaining property. Some of them were later taken to the Tarnów ghetto, while the Germans murdered the others at the Jewish cemetery on December 20, 1942.⁴

Although the ghetto was officially liquidated in 1942, between July and August 1943, more than 250 Jews were killed by the Gestapo in and around Dąbrowa. From October to December 1943, members of the Gestapo and the SS shot another 228 Jews in Dąbrowa Tarnowska, who had been in hiding. In 1944, there were at least two documented incidents in which members of the Gendarmerie and the SS shot Polish women and the Jewish families they had been hiding.⁵

SOURCES Information on the persecution and destruction of the Jewish population of Dąbrowa Tarnowska can be found in the following publications: Dąbrowa Tarnowska: Zarys dziejów miasta i powiatu (Warsaw, 1974); S. Zabierowski, Pustków. Hitlerowskie obozy wyniszczenia w służbie poligonu SS (Rzeszów, 1981); Abraham Wein and Aharon Weiss, eds., Pinkas ha-kehillot. Encyclopaedia of Jewish Communities: Poland, vol. 3, Galicia and Western Silesia (Jerusalem: Yad Vashem, 1984), pp. 107–111; A. Pietrzykova, Region tarnowski w okresie okupacji hitlerowskiej. Polityka okupanta i ruch oporu (Warsaw: PWN, 1984); and E. Podhorizer-Sandel, "O zagładzie Żydów w dystrykcie krakowskim," BŻIH, no. 30 (1959): 87–109.

Documents describing the fate of the Jews of Dąbrowa Tarnowska can be found in the following archives: AŻIH (301/1209, 1637, and 2348); IPN; USHMM (Acc.1997.0124 [AŻIH, JSS], reels 47 and 48); VHF (# 20597 and 43549); and YVA.

Caterina Crisci

NOTES

1. Podhorizer-Sandel, "O zagładzie Żydów," p. 88.

2. Pietrzykova, Region tarnowski w okresie okupacji hitlerowskiej, p. 184; USHMM, Acc.1997.0124, reel 47, JSS Tarnów protokół, September 30, 1941; VHF, # 20597 and # 43549, testimonies of A. Peled and H. Brand; AŻIH, 301/2348, testimony of A. Milet; and 301/1209, testimony of S. Feiner.

3. Podhorizer-Sandel, "O zagładzie Żydów," pp. 93–95; AŻIH, 301/1209, 2348, and 1637, testimony of I. Stieglitz. According to Wein and Weiss, Pinkas ha-kehilot: Poland, vol. 3, Galicia and Western Silesia, p. 110, it took place on July 24–25, 1942; USHMM, Acc.1997.0124, reel 48.

4. AŻIH, 301/2348 and 1209.

5. Rejestr miejsc i faktów zbrodni popełnionych przez okupanta hitlerowskiego na ziemiach polskich w latach 1939–1945: Województwo tarnowskie (Warsaw: GKBZHWP, 1984), pp. 48–49.

DĘBICA

Pre-1939: Dębica (Yiddish: Dembitz), town, Kraków województwo, Poland; 1939–1945: Debica, Kreis center, Distrikt Krakau, Generalgouvernement; post-1998: Dębica, województwo podkarpackie, Poland

Dębica is located about 110 kilometers (68 miles) east of Kraków. In 1921, about 40 percent of the town's population was Jewish (1,564 individuals out of 3,922 inhabitants).

The Germans captured Dębica on Friday, September 8, 1939. On October 26, Dębica became part of the Generalgouvernement, which was ruled by Gouverneur Hans Frank. In the first weeks of the occupation, the German authorities introduced a series of anti-Jewish measures, which included the seizure of much of their movable property, the imposition of forced labor, and a ban on visiting public places. Jewish social organizations and community institutions were closed down and their property confiscated. However, during this initial period, many Jewish businesses continued to function, and Jews were still able to use public transportation. The most onerous burden was the imposition of forced labor. Jews worked as cleaners and orderlies in offices and military barracks; others were made to clean the streets and to remove the ruins resulting from the German bombardments.

The German civil authorities in Dębica, under Kreishauptmann Dr. Auswald, initially made most key decisions regarding the Jewish community. The Gestapo, headed by a man named Gabler, only became more closely involved once the ghetto was established. In November 1939, a Jewish Council (Judenrat) was created, under the leadership of Tovia Zucker. The Judenrat was responsible for providing the daily quota of men for forced labor. In addition, it had to collect Jewish property and valuables to meet the "contributions" demanded by the Germans. Forced labor entailed road construction and work in factories repairing locomotives and railway cars. At work the Jews were frequently beaten and abused by the overseers. Some young Jews tried to escape and flee to the east. However, restrictions on obtaining Soviet citizenship soon forced many to return to Dębica.¹

In the spring of 1940, the German authorities conducted a census and used it to register those Jews capable of performing forced labor. In June 1940, a group of young Jewish men was sent to the labor camp in Pustków. In April and May, the Waffen-SS had established a military training camp there using Jewish labor. Many smaller labor camps were established around the camp, where Jews and Poles were exploited as forced laborers until 1944. The Judenrat was required to provide food, utensils, and blankets for the inmates, which helped many of them to survive. During the course of the year, bribes enabled the Dębica Judenrat to obtain the return of some forced laborers from Pustków.

During the winter of 1940–1941, conditions for the Jews in Dębica deteriorated steadily. The Germans imposed further restrictions on Jewish movement; they looted Jewish property; and they demanded large contributions. The Judenrat established a communal kitchen to help needy people obtain warm food. However, at this time, most Jews were still allowed to reside in their own homes. Due to internal differences, the head of the Jewish Council, Tovia Zucker, was replaced by Yosef Traub.

From the beginning of 1941, discussions began between the Jewish Council and the local town administration regarding the establishment of a "Jewish residential area." The area chosen for the ghetto was in one of the poorest and most run-down parts of town near the marketplace.² Some Polish families were removed from this area to make way for the Jews. Most probably during the early months of 1941, about 2,200 Jews from Dębica were settled into the ghetto. Since the living space in the ghetto was inadequate, small wooden huts were built at the edge of the ghetto, each of which had to accommodate about 20 people.³

By the summer of 1942, the ghetto was enclosed by a barbed-wire fence. Only individuals with special permits were allowed to leave the area. Jews caught outside the ghetto or in the process of smuggling food were shot in the Jewish cemetery. By July 1942, the influx of Jews from surrounding towns had brought the number of Jews in the ghetto to more than 4,000

A sign in German and Polish on the door of a Jewish business in Dębica, issued by Kreishauptmann Schlüter, announces the property's confiscation from its Jewish owners, March 9, 1942.

USHMM WS #49006, COURTESY OF YIVO

people. The Jewish Council was given the impossible task of finding housing for all the ghetto's residents. Due to the extreme overcrowding, sanitary conditions deteriorated. It became urgent for the ghetto residents to halt the spread of epidemic disease by organizing medical care and establishing an isolation hospital for the severely ill. Dr. Mantzer, Dr. Idek, and Dr. Tau treated the patients in this small hospital.

Even under the harsh conditions of the ghetto, some religious Jews managed to maintain an active underground yeshiva. Awareness of the expulsions from neighboring settlements increased anxiety among Jews in the Dębica ghetto, as they suspected that their turn would come soon. Some of the Jews working in factories outside the ghetto started to look for hiding places and attempted to make contact with non-Jewish acquaintances.⁴

The first large Aktion probably took place at the end of July 1942. One or two days before, many Jews from the neighboring villages and towns, including Sędziszów Małopolski, Ropczyce, Pilzno, Radomyśl Wielki, and Baranów Sandomierski, were brought into the Dębica ghetto, following Aktions conducted to clear those places of Jews. This was part of a large-scale deportation Aktion throughout Kreis Debica, during which up to 12,000 Jews were deported to the Bełżec extermination camp and murdered. Dębica was chosen as the main point of concentration because of its location on the main railroad towards Bełżec, as well as its status as the center of the Kreis. SS units, in collaboration with the Polish (Blue) Police, surrounded the ghetto and ordered the Jewish Council to collect all the work permits of the Jews, ostensibly for the purpose of renewing them. The Jews had to gather at the main square in the ghetto for the selection. The Jews were told that only the most essential and skilled workers would be issued new work permits; all the others were to be sent to work "in the east." Those without work permits were sent to a second collection point directly below the Każynca Lunka.⁵ Following the selection, Gestapo men, assisted by the Polish (Blue) Police and members of the Jewish Police (Jüdischer Ordnungsdienst), searched the houses in the ghetto, looking for any Jews in hiding. Those found were taken to the Jewish cemetery and shot immediately. The Jews who received valid work permits were ordered to return to their homes in the ghetto. Approximately 200 people were taken from the group to be deported to the "east." In fact, they were sent to Lisa Góra near the village of Wielice and shot.

Shortly after this initial selection, those Jews with new work permits were divided into three groups: one group was sent to work in the Messerschmidt aircraft factory in Rzeszów and the Heinkel aircraft factory in Mielec; another was transferred to the Pustków labor camp; and several hundred Jews remained in the ghetto. As a result of these selections, a group of approximately 2,000 Jews from the Dębica ghetto was sent along with several thousand of the Jews who had just arrived in Dębica from the surrounding towns to the Bełżec extermination camp.

Following this first large-scale Aktion, a number of Jews who had found refuge with Polish families or who had gone into hiding returned secretly to the ghetto. The survivors of this Aktion worked hard, hoping that their useful contribution to the German war effort might save their lives. In the autumn of 1942, about 600 Jews were still registered in the Dębica ghetto, which was now reduced in size. The Jews went to work every day outside the ghetto, which was guarded externally by the Polish (Blue) Police. The official food rations for ghetto residents consisted mainly of a thin watery soup occasionally containing a morsel of potato or cabbage.⁶ Therefore, in spite of the danger, a number of Jews tried to barter items for food from non-Jews or scavenge vegetables by sneaking out of the ghetto. In November 1942, Kreishauptmann Schlüter (Dr. Auswald's successor) published a proclamation stating that as of December 1, 1942, any person giving shelter to Jews outside the enclosed camps would face the death penalty.⁷

On December 15–16, 1942, the Germans conducted another large-scale Aktion against the ghetto residents at Każynca Lunka. At this time, the ghetto was to be liquidated, and only those working for the railway factory were to be retained in what was now to be a forced labor camp in which the Jewish elder was the notorious Jewish policeman Immerglick. As a result, many Jews tried to obtain a spot there by bribing the new Jewish leadership.⁸ When the Aktion started, the railway factory workers were separated from the rest. Almost all the remaining people, including the families of the railway factory workers, were deported to Bełżec. During this Aktion, conducted mainly by members of the Ukrainian Sonderdienst (Special Police), the Jewish Police again assisted the Germans in the hope of saving themselves. Many Jews tried to escape from the deportation trains, but most were shot by the guards.

Some Jews who survived the Aktion tried to return to the forced labor camp, but the Jewish Police (at this time led by Immerglick) did not allow them inside. It was already an open secret that the German authorities planned to liquidate the Dębica forced labor camp soon. At the beginning of 1943, the last surviving Jews of the neighboring Jewish communities were brought to the camp. The number of inmates increased to approximately 1,600. One group of 50 "illegal" Jews was handed over by the camp leadership and shot immediately. Other Jews without valid permits fled into the Bochnia ghetto, where they shared the fate of its residents. All were sent to the Auschwitz concentration camp in September 1943. The liquidation of the forced labor camp in Dębica started in April 1943. Up to then, the Jews had continued to work in the railway factory and in construction. At this time, the last camp inmates were transferred to a labor camp near Kraków or to other camps.⁹

As Soviet troops approached the area in 1944, the remaining labor camps were liquidated, and the prisoners, including a number of former inmates of the Dębica ghetto, were transported to a variety of forced labor and concentration camps further west. Some Jews survived by hiding with Polish families or fleeing to the woods. The precise number of Jews from the Dębica ghetto who survived until the end of the war is not known.

SOURCES Information on the history and fate of the Jewish population of Dębica can be found in the following publications: Daniel Leibel, ed., Sefer Dembitz (Tel Aviv: Irgun yots'e Dembits be-Yisrael, 1960); Abraham Wein and Aharon Weiss, eds., Pinkas ha-kehilot. Encyclopaedia of Jewish Communities: Poland, vol. 3, Galicia and Western Silesia (Jerusalem: Yad Vashem, 1984), pp. 119–124; and Irene Eber, The Choice: Poland 1939–1945 (New York: Schocken, 2004).

Documentation on the persecution and destruction of the Jewish community in Dębica can be found in the following archives: AŻIH (301/378); FVA (# 627); IPN; USHMM (RG-15.019M); VHF; and YVA (e.g., M-1/E/89, 1294, 1597, and 2490; and O-3/705).

Katrin Reichelt

NOTES

1. Reuven Siedlisker-Sarid, "The Murder of the Jews of Dembitz," in Leibel, Sefer Dembitz, pp. 141–155.
2. Eber, The Choice, p. 36.
3. Siedlisker-Sarid, "The Murder of the Jews of Dembitz," implies that the ghetto was established in the first months of 1941 but does not state this explicitly.
4. AŻIH, 301/378, testimony of Leonka Gertler, Kraków, 1945.
5. Siedlisker-Sarid, "The Murder of the Jews of Dembitz."
6. Eber, The Choice, p. 38.
7. Proclamation signed by Kreishauptmann Schlüter, Dębica, November 19, 1942, published in W. Bartoszewski and Z. Lewin, eds., Righteous among Nations: How Poles Helped the Jews, 1939–1945 (London: Eastcourt, 1969), p. 643.
8. Siedlisker-Sarid, "The Murder of the Jews of Dembitz."
9. Ibid.

DOBROMIL

Pre-1939: Dobromil, town, Lwów województwo, Poland; 1939–1941: L'vov oblast', Ukrainian SSR; 1941–1944: Kreis Przemyśl, Distrikt Krakau, Generalgouvernement; post-1991: raion center, L'viv oblast', Ukraine

Dobromil is located 94 kilometers (58 miles) southwest of Lwów. By 1921, there were 2,119 Jews living in Dobromil, constituting 61.7 percent of the total population. German forces briefly occupied the town in September 1939. Following the Soviet attack on Poland on September 17, 1939, the town was incorporated into the Soviet Union. The Germans reoccupied Dobromil on June 28, 1941.

From the Security Police outpost in Jasło, the Germans transferred Gestapo officials Walter Augustin, Max Lehmann, and Paul Pettirsch to a branch of the Grenzpolizei-kommissariat (Border Police Office [of the Security Police]) that was set up in November 1941 in Dobromil. In addition, a German Gendarmerie unit and a Ukrainian police post were established there.

The first Aktion against the Jewish population took place on June 30, 1941. It was prompted by the discovery of the bodies of several hundred Ukrainians who had been killed by the People's Commissariat of Internal Affairs (NKVD) prior to the Soviet retreat. Einsatzgruppen report no. 24 of July 16, 1941, stated:

Eighty-two bodies, including four Jews, were found in the Dobromil jail. The Jews had been Bolshevik informers; they were eliminated as accomplices. Near Dobromil was an abandoned salt mine shaft 80 meters [262 feet] deep completely filled with bodies. Close by was a mass grave measuring 6 by 15 meters [20 by 49 feet]. The number of people killed in and near Dobromil amounted to several hundred. . . . The Russians and Jews had carried out the slaughter by extraordinarily brutal means. . . . In Dobromil, both men and women were killed with sledge hammers used to stun livestock.

In retribution, antisemitic sentiment among the Ukrainians provoked a pogrom in the town during the course of which Ukrainians set synagogues on fire and beat and robbed many Jews. Local Ukrainians rounded up several hundred Jews on the market square. Members of Einsatzkommando 6, headed by SS-Standartenführer Dr. Kröger, took away 132 of them and shot them at the salt mine shaft.¹ According to the Dobromil yizkor book, there were some 50 Jewish victims in total.

The Germans established a district Jewish Council (Judenrat) in Dobromil that was given authority over the other Jewish Councils in several nearby places, namely, in Chyrów, Rybotycze, and Nowe Miasto. The Dobromil Judenrat was subordinated to the Jewish Council for the Kreis based in Przemyśl.² The Judenrat included Joseph Miller, Leib Teitelbaum, and two attorneys, Reiner and Karton. The German authorities carried out the registration of Dobromil's Jews, and they were required to report for various kinds of forced labor, including street cleaning, gardening, and lumber work. The Judenrat was charged with organizing this Jewish labor. Many of the forced laborers were mistreated by the Ukrainian guards; there are reports that they hitched Jews to wagons as "workhorses."

In October 1941, the German authorities created a Jewish "residential area"—that is, an open ghetto—in Dobromil.³ The town's Jews were evicted from several parts of the town and were confined to an area around the old market square, most likely including Szewska and Salinarna Streets. From this time, any Jews caught leaving Dobromil without permission could be punished with the death penalty. Permission to move freely was granted solely to the Judenrat members, the Jewish Police, and some professionals employed by the Germans. In addition, garbage collectors officially could leave and enter the ghetto, but many of them were murdered by Ukrainian collaborators.

In November 1941, when pleading for support from the headquarters of the Jewish Social Self-Help (JSS) in Kraków, the local Judenrat wrote: "Our community, affected by two years of Bolshevik administration and changes, is unable to remedy our misery on its own." By December 1941, there were 2,400 Jews living in the Dobromil ghetto, of which one third were in need of assistance.⁴

German regulations required that Jews wear an armband bearing an emblem of the Star of David. The Germans also confiscated most of the Jews' valuables and deprived them of many basic rights.⁵ This included prayers, which were conducted in secret in the house of Rabbi Zeydah on Szewska Street.

On February 21, 1942, the Judenrat opened a soup kitchen, which initially distributed 300 meals a day. One hundred were sold for 0.30 złoty per meal; the remainder were distributed free of charge.

In March 1942, on the orders of the Kreishauptmann in Przemyśl, the Judenrat staff was doubled from 5 to 10 members. At this time, its chairman was I. Koritan; his deputy was a man named Belemer.⁶ Between April 1942 and the ghetto's liquidation in July 1942, the Judenrat spent much of its energy unsuccessfully trying to open various workshops—especially one for knitted goods—to make the unemployed Jewish youth productive.⁷

In late July 1942, Jews living in the vicinity (including those in Nowe Miasto) were ordered to move to the Dobromil ghetto; for example, the Jews of Kwaszenica were informed of the transfer one week in advance. On arrival at the entrance gate, the Gestapo searched their belongings and confiscated most of them, along with any money. Next, the Germans selected 400 to 500 able-bodied men and separated them from other Jews in the ghetto. They were later marched to labor camps in Przemyśl.⁸

The liquidation of the ghetto took place on July 29, 1942, when 3,166 Jews were gathered at a stadium located near the railway station. From here, the Germans deported them by train to the Bełżec extermination camp. Several Jewish “specialists” remained in the town with their families. According to the yizkor book, as many as 500 Jews remained in Dobromil. This number included the Judenrat members Miller and Karton, as well as Jewish policemen, who bribed the Germans to let them remain. They were forced to dig their own graves before they were killed on November 24, 1942, at the Lichtman sawmill in Dobromil. The site was later ploughed over to cover any traces of the killings. A few hundred Jews who had hidden prior to the deportation Aktion were captured and killed in the course of 1942 and 1943.⁹ Only a small number of Jews from the town managed to survive.

SOURCES Relevant publications regarding the Jewish community in Dobromil and the ghetto there include Abraham Wein and Aharon Weiss, eds., Pinkas ha-kehillot. Encyclopaedia of Jewish Communities: Poland, vol. 3, Galicia and Western Silesia (Jerusalem: Yad Vashem, 1984), pp. 150–153, 232, 336; M. Gelbart, ed., Sefer zikaron le-zekher Kehilat Dobromil ve-Nayshtut (Tel Aviv: Irgun Dobromil ve-Nayshtut be-Yisrael, 1964); and Shmuel Spector and Geoffrey Wigoder, eds., The Encyclopedia of Jewish Life before and during the Holocaust (Jerusalem: Yad Vashem; New York: New York University Press, 2001), p. 317.

Documentation regarding the persecution and murder of the Jews of Dobromil can be found in the following archives:

AŻIH (211/360); BA-L (ZStL, 206 AR-Z 39/1960, 206 AR-Z 865/1971, SA 337, SA 566); DALO; GARF (7021-58-20); NARA: USHMM (Acc.1997.A.0124 [JSS]); VHF (e.g., # 2409, 32667); and YVA.

Jolanta Kraemer and Alexander Kruglov trans. Ilya Bourtnan

NOTES

1. NARA, T-175, reel 232, Ereignismeldung UdSSR (EM) no. 24, July 16, 1941; LG-Tüb, Ks 1/68, verdict of July 31, 1969, in Justiz und NS-Verbrechen, vol. 32 (Amsterdam: Amsterdam University Press, 2004), Lfd. Nr. 714.
2. USHMM, Acc.1997.A.0124 (JSS), 211/360 (Dobromil), p. 1; Gazeta Żydowska, March 25, 1942.
3. GARF, 7021-58-20, p. 138.
4. USHMM, Acc.1997.A.0124 (JSS), 211/360, pp. 1, 5.
5. GARF, 7021-58-20, p. 138.
6. Gazeta Żydowska, March 25, 1942.
7. USHMM, Acc.1997.A.0124 (JSS), 211/360, pp. 17–25, 29–31.
8. VHF, # 32667, testimony of Marion Domanski-Erdman, 1997; # 2409, testimony of Michael Lewental, 1998.
9. GARF, 7021-58-20, p. 139.

DUKLA

Pre-1939: Dukla, town, Krosno powiat, Lwów województwo, Poland; 1939–1945: Kreis Krosno, Distrikt Krakau, Generalgouvernement; post-1998: województwo podkarpackie, Poland

Dukla is located 64 kilometers (40 miles) south of Rzeszów on the Jasiołka River. In 1921, the Jewish population consisted of 1,509 people, 72 percent of the total population. On the eve of World War II, the Jewish population of Dukla was about 1,650.¹

German troops occupied Dukla on September 8, 1939. By then, many Jews had already fled to the east, and some of them subsequently remained in what soon became the Soviet-occupied zone of Poland. From the start, German soldiers terrorized the Jews by shaving off the beards of religious Jews and seizing Jewish men for forced labor. During the first phase of the occupation, the Germans ordered those Jews who were not skilled laborers to cross the San River. A group of Jews obeyed this order, entering the Soviet zone, while others went into hiding, and only around 100, mostly more wealthy, families remained in the town. In 1940, the Soviet authorities deported many of the recent refugees from Dukla into the Soviet interior—so at least 100 of them survived the war.²

By early 1940, the Germans had established a Jewish Council (Judenrat) in Dukla, which had to organize the daily quota of forced laborers.³ The Germans imposed various restrictions on the Jewish population. Jews had to register and wear the Star of David at all times. In addition, they had to obey a curfew and were forbidden to leave the town; and they were harassed, beaten, and subjected to random shootings. Most Jewish property was either seized and handed to non-Jews or became part of the many “contributions” demanded by the Germans from the Judenrat.⁴

In May 1941, 1,476 Jews were registered by the Judenrat in Dukla, reflecting the influx of a number of refugees from nearby villages and other towns in German-occupied Poland. At this time, 135 Jews worked as forced laborers on road construction and other tasks for the Germans.⁵ Many of the Jews in Dukla worked at the stone quarry about 3 kilometers (1.9 miles) outside the town. The manager of the quarry, Karol Marcinkowski, treated the Jewish workers badly, beating the weaker ones, although he was susceptible to bribes. Until August 1942, these Jewish laborers lived in the town and marched to the work site every day in a column supervised by Chaskiel Goldman and Hersch Ehrenreich. The laborers worked 10 hours per day for only 15 or 20 zloty per week, plus meager rations comprising one loaf of bread and a little jam or sugar.⁶

In June 1941, a branch of Jewish Social Self-Help (JSS), headed by L. Werner, was established in Dukla. Its main task was to provide the Jewish population with medical supplies, financial aid, and child care. The public kitchen was run by the local Judenrat, which by 1942 was headed by Simon Stoff. To combat an outbreak of typhus in the region, the Jewish Council in Krosno issued instructions in December 1941 to the Jews in Dukla to bathe regularly with soap.⁷

In the spring of 1942, all the Jews in Dukla were concentrated into one specific area, which one source describes as an enclosed ghetto, although it may have remained open until August 1942.⁸ In mid-August 1942, the Gestapo based in Krosno, assisted by the Order Police, conducted an Aktion in Dukla shortly after the Aktion in Krosno on August 10, 1942. It is probable that Jews from the surrounding towns and villages, such as Jaśliska, were brought into Dukla just prior to the Aktion, as by this time the number of Jews is estimated to have been more than 2,000.⁹ On the morning of August 13, the Germans drove the Jews out of their houses to the marketplace (Rynek). Some of those who tried to hide or were too sick to move were shot on the spot. Then Marcinkowski participated in the selection of about 300 Jews, mostly boys and young men, to remain in Dukla as forced laborers. The remaining Jews were divided into two groups. The women and children, probably more than 1,000 people, were deported by train to the Bełżec extermination camp.¹⁰ The elderly and the sick (about 400 people) were also separated and taken to a nearby forest, where they were shot, probably together with several hundred elderly Jews selected in Rymanów, Jaśliska, and other places. In total, the Germans murdered around 800 mostly elderly Jews at this time in the forest near Barwinek to the south of Dukla.¹¹

The 300 or so remaining Jewish workers were put into two Jewish forced labor camps in Dukla, established following the deportation Aktion. The labor camps belonged to the German construction firms of Artur Walde (Breslau) that had about 140 forced laborers and Emil Ludwig (Munich) with about 170, both established in mid-August 1942.¹² One survivor describes these two forced labor camps as the “ghetto,” which consisted of four or five buildings located in two different neighborhoods of the town that were guarded by the Polish (Blue) Police.¹³ In November 1942, the Artur Walde camp was liquidated, and the 200 or so Jewish workers there were sent to another forced labor camp near Kraków.¹⁴ A short time later, probably in December 1942, the Emil Ludwig camp was dissolved, and the forced laborers were sent to Rzeszów.¹⁵ Only about 50 Jews from Dukla survived the German occupation in the camps or in hiding.

SOURCES Information on the history of the Jewish community of Dukla and its fate during the Holocaust can be found in Abraham Wein and Aharon Weiss, eds., Pinkas ha-kehillot. Encyclopaedia of Jewish Communities: Poland, vol. 3, Galicia and Western Silesia (Jerusalem: Yad Vashem, 1984), pp. 111–114.

Documentation on the persecution and destruction of the Jewish community in Dukla can be found in the following archives: AŻIH (301/1757, 3236, and 3448); IPN; USHMM (Acc.1997.A.0124 [JSS], reels 21 and 32; RG-50.002*0028; and RG-15.019M, reel 17); VHF (# 18425); and YVA.

Caterina Crisci

NOTES

1. Wein and Weiss, Pinkas ha-kehillot: Poland, vol. 3, Galicia and Western Silesia, pp. 111–112; USHMM, Acc.1997.A.0124 (JSS), reel 21, 211/374, Sprawozdanie, May 31, 1941.

2. Wein and Weiss, Pinkas ha-kehillot: Poland, vol. 3, Galicia and Western Silesia, pp. 113–114. VHF, # 18425, testimony of J. Braun, erroneously dates this event in September 1941.

3. USHMM, Acc.1997.A.0124, reel 21, 211/373.

4. VHF, # 18425. According to Braun, there was no Jewish Police in Dukla.

5. USHMM, Acc.1997.A.0124, reel 21, 211/374, Sprawozdanie, May 31, 1941.

6. AŻIH, 301/3448, testimony of Rubin Bergman; and 301/1757, testimony of Adolf Nattel.

7. USHMM, Acc.1997.A.0124, reel 21, 211/374–375, and reel 32, 211/615, Dringender Rundauftrag der Jüdischen Gemeinde Krosno, Abtlg. Gesundheit und Hygiene, December 16, 1941.

8. Wein and Weiss, Pinkas ha-kehillot: Poland, vol. 3, Galicia and Western Silesia, pp. 113–114.

9. AŻIH, 301/3448, gives the figure of 2,500 Jews; 301/1757, gives the figure of 2,200, noting that some came from the surrounding area.

10. Estimates for the number of Jews sent to Bełżec vary considerably, from ca. 1,600 given in ibid., 301/1757, to only 300 in 301/3236, testimony of Mozes Kurzman.

11. Ibid., 301/3448; 301/1757; A. Potocki, Zydzi Rymanowscy (Krosno: APLA, 2000), p. 169; Rejestr miejsc i faktów zbrodni popełnionych przez okupanta hitlerowskiego na ziemiach polskich w latach 1939–1945: Województwo krosnieńskie (Warsaw: GKBZHwP, 1983), p. 35.

12. Czesław Pilichowski et al., eds., Obozy hitlerowskie na ziemiach polskich 1939–1945: Informator encyklopedyczny (Warsaw: PWN, 1979), p. 163; USHMM, RG-15.019M, reel 17, pp. 84–85. See also USHMM, Acc.1997.A.0124 (JSS), reel 21, 211/375, letter of ŻSS Kraków to Fa. Emil Ludwig, Dukla, October 15, 1942.

13. VHF, # 18425.

14. AŻIH, 301/3236; Pilichowski et al., Obozy hitlerowskie, p. 163.

15. USHMM, RG-15.019M, reel 17, p. 85. VHF, # 18425, dates the transfer to Rzeszów in June 1943.

DZIAŁOSZYCE

Pre-1939: Działoszyce, town, Miechów powiat, Kielce województwo, Poland; 1939–1945: Działoszyce, Kreis Miechów, Distrikt Krakau, Generalgouvernement; post-1998: Działoszyce, województwo świętokrzyskie, Poland

Działoszyce is located about 50 kilometers (31 miles) northeast of Kraków. In 1939, it is estimated that about 7,000 Jews lived there (80 percent of the total population).¹

German forces occupied the town on September 8, 1939. Refugees with relatives in Działoszyce returned from other towns (Zagłębie, Kraków, Pinczów, and Łódź). The German authorities enacted anti-Jewish legislation as soon as the fighting ended. Jewish shops and merchandise were confiscated, and the Jewish populace was forbidden to transact business. For most of the occupation, there was no permanent German police force stationed in the town, which somewhat diminished the daily pressure (and may be the reason many former residents returned from other areas). The German district authorities (office of the Kreishauptmann) were based in Miechów, about 25 kilometers (16 miles) away. By the winter of 1940–1941, the Jewish population of Działoszyce had reached 10,000, two thirds of them penniless refugees. Housing conditions were abysmal, with hundreds crowded into public buildings and institutions with no sanitary facilities or running water. Almost 1,000 people were crammed into the synagogue and adjoining Bet Midrash (study hall). The situation worsened in September 1941, when another 300 refugees were transferred to Działoszyce from Miechów.²

The Jewish Council (Judenrat) evolved from the leadership of the kehillah (Jewish community council), headed by Moshe Yosef Kruk. It served as an address for the Germans, implementing the unending flow of anti-Jewish orders and satisfying the appetites of the local officials. The members of the Judenrat were made personally responsible for enforcing all German orders. Among the most notorious extortionists were Kriminalobersekretär Bayerlein, head of the Gestapo office in Miechów, and others such as Schmidt, Vogt, Becker, and Reginer, as well as Gendarmes such as Kosko, Dachauer-Kornhäuser, and Schubert.³ They demanded numerous “contributions,” and everything of value had to be turned in: gold, silver, jewelry, foreign currency, radios, furs, and the like.⁴ The Judenrat’s basic strategy was that by fulfilling German demands they would delay or avert impending danger. One of the results was constant conflict within the community. Commenting on this situation, the yizkor book concludes: “[O]ne must always remember the factors involved in daily life, which caused the ordinary Jews to view it [the Judenrat] with suspicion. I am certain that in our town it functioned only in order to handle those difficulties produced by the times and the circumstances.”⁵

The Judenrat had to face the danger of epidemics and disease. Dr. Grambovsky was the only doctor in town, but in 1940 Dr. Dvora Lazar arrived from Kraków. In addition to overseeing medical services for 10,000 people, this heroic Jewish physician established sanitary measures to head off epidemics and the spread of contagious diseases. Disinfection stations were set up, and a sanitation committee made rounds to fumigate buildings with sulfur and other disinfectants. In 1941, there were simultaneous outbreaks of dysentery, typhoid, and typhus, but they were somehow contained. There were many deaths, but the news was never reported to the German authorities, as they were known to take drastic measures in such instances. In November, the hospital that had been set up in Skalbierz to deal with patients from the two communities was transferred to Działoszyce.⁶

The Judenrat had to supply workers for various work tasks in and around the town. All men over age 14 were taken to labor camps or pressed into forced labor, digging ditches and sewage canals. The German labor chief, named Mucha, worked with the Judenrat’s labor department, headed by Mr. Hoffmann, to establish a rotation schedule for all able-bodied men. For many the meager pay was the only source of income. Families with more resources paid substitutes a few coins to replace them in the forced labor gangs. Periodically, German police would show up to seize a few dozen young people and send them to labor camps near Kraków or to work in the factories of the German firm Richard Strauch. Sometimes the Judenrat’s Jewish Police (Jüdischer Ordnungsdienst) were called on to enforce the demands for Jewish forced labor.⁷

The most extraordinary effort of the beleaguered community was the communal kitchen, which was established when the first refugees arrived. Members of the Zionist youth movements went door to door to collect funds, clothing, bedding, and items of furniture for them. At the beginning of 1940, one wing of the Bet Midrash was opened as a public kitchen and dining hall. At first only a few hundred refugees ate there, but over time it became the most important institution in town, providing a hot daily meal for thousands. Some of the food came from the rations allocated to the Judenrat by the authorities, but the rest had to be obtained by other means, legitimate or not so legitimate. The kitchen functioned for two and a half years, until the final liquidation of the community in the autumn of 1942.⁸

During the early years, some assistance was available from the American Jewish Joint Distribution Committee (AJDC), which continued to operate in Poland until the United States entered the war. In 1940, the AJDC supplied Passover matzot for Polish Jewry. Although travel was forbidden, two young men hired a wagon and got to Częstochowa to bring back the matzot.⁹

Some secondary sources refer to a “ghetto” in Działoszyce from March of 1940,¹⁰ but primary sources indicate that the Jews continued to live in their own homes right up to the main deportation Aktion in September 1942 and that no fence was ever constructed to contain the Jews. As already noted, due to the influx of many refugees, Działoszyce became a collecting point for Jews in overcrowded conditions from early 1940. A curfew was strictly enforced at night, and several accounts stress that “it was forbidden to go beyond the limits of the town.”¹¹ By 1942, leaving the town to barter with the peasants was punishable by death. Nonetheless, many Jews felt compelled to leave the town to obtain a little extra food for their families, and some of them paid for this with their lives.¹²

Since the Jews gradually became subject to ever more stringent movement restrictions and harsh living conditions, some survivors have described Działoszyce as a kind of “open ghetto.” Szlama Leszman, who mostly lived outside Działoszyce, as a partisan with the underground resistance of the Polish Socialist Party, noted that the town was “abnormally overcrowded” with “people living in every attic and basement. . . . The poverty was dire and was accompanied by malnutrition, and this brought about an escalation of illnesses. The town was transformed into a huge Jewish ghetto.”¹³

In the spring and early summer of 1942, additional Jews were brought into Działoszyce from the surrounding villages, worsening the overcrowding. Despite the isolation, rumors about Aktyons in neighboring communities, such as Słomniki, began to spread during the summer of 1942.

On September 3, German armed units surrounded Działoszyce. On the next day, after a night of terror, everyone was instructed to pack a bundle of only 10 to 15 kilograms (22 to 33 pounds) of personal belongings, including work clothes, and report to the market square.¹⁴ After the marketplace filled up, horses and carts driven by peasants arrived. People too old or weak to walk to the train station were loaded onto the carts and taken straight to the cemetery. There they were shot with machine guns and buried in three mass graves, about 1,200 to 1,500 victims. Included in this group was the community's elderly rabbi, Itzhak Halevi Staslovsky. The others were taken by truck from the train station to a huge open field near Miechów, where Jews from other towns, including Książ Wielki and Wodzisław, were also assembled. By the following morning, there were approximately 15,000 Jews there. At noon the people were ordered into groups of 5, with young men sent to the left (about 2,000) and the rest to the right.¹⁵ The latter, Jews from Działoszyce as well as neighboring towns, were loaded onto cattle cars and taken by train to the Bełżec extermination camp. The younger group was sent, on the same train, to the Prokocim labor camp near Kraków.

Shortly after their arrival at Prokocim, the Germans sent the Jewish Police from Działoszyce back to the town to collect and clean up what was left behind after local Poles had looted the Jewish houses. When others heard this, they escaped from the camp and also returned. A few Jews who had survived the expulsion by hiding in neighboring villages also slipped into town, and the Germans even published announcements allowing them to return to their homes. By the end of October 1942, there were several hundred Jews in Działoszyce. According to Majer Zonenfeld's account, the Germans rounded up the remaining Jews living scattered in Działoszyce and moved them into the synagogue, and a small Judenrat was created. Now all movement was strictly forbidden, especially on the outskirts of the Jewish residential area. On November 3, German forces returned and began house-to-house searches. Some Jews were shot, the others deported.¹⁶

By the end of 1942, a few hundred Jews from Działoszyce were in the Krakau-Plaszow concentration camp, but only a handful survived. A number of Jews from Działoszyce hid during the roundups and fled into the woods around Pinczów, where they formed Jewish partisan units together with other Jewish escapees. However, many of them were killed in February 1944 in a battle near Pawlowice.

SOURCES This entry draws mainly on the yizkor book for the town, Sefer yizkor shel kehillat Działoszyce vebaseviva (Tel Aviv: Ha-Menora, 1973). Moshe Beisky's article in Sefer yizkor provides the most comprehensive summary of the Holocaust period; he also testified at the Eichmann trial in 1961. Two relevant personal memoirs are by Eliahu Razel (Rozdział), Alone and in Hiding, trans. Susan Rosenfeld (Moreshet: Mordechai Anilevich Study and Research Center, 1994); and Joseph E. Tenenbaum, Legacy and Redemption: A Life Renewed (Washington, DC: United States Holocaust Memorial Museum and Holocaust Survivors' Memoirs Project, 2005).

Documentation on the fate of the Jews of Działoszyce under the German occupation can be found in the following archives: AŻIH (301/118, 1765, and 3260); FVA (# 159 and 169); IPN; ITS; USHMM; VHF; and YVA (# 10331, testimony of Alter Lendgarten, in English).

Samuel Fishman and Martin Dean

NOTES

1. Sefer yizkor shel kehillat Działoszyce, p. 7.
2. Ibid., p. 33. Tenenbaum, Legacy and Redemption, p. 97, gives the figure of 12,000 Jewish inhabitants of the town due to the influx of refugees.
3. Sefer yizkor shel kehillat Działoszyce, p. 38.
4. Ibid., p. 35; Razel, Alone and in Hiding, p. 30.
5. Sefer yizkor shel kehillat Działoszyce, p. 38.
6. Ibid., p. 34.
7. Ibid., pp. 35–36; Razel, Alone and in Hiding, p. 28.
8. Sefer yizkor shel kehillat Działoszyce, p. 37.
9. Ibid., p. 25.
10. Czesław Pilichowski et al., eds., Obozy hitlerowskie na ziemiach polskich 1939–1945: Informator encyklopedyczny (Warsaw: PWN, 1979), p. 165; Martin Weinmann, with Anne Kaiser and Ursula Krause-Schmitt, eds., Das nationalsozialistische Lagersystem (CCP) (prepared originally by ITS in 1949–1951; repr., with new introductory matter, in Frankfurt am Main: Zweitausendeins, 1990), p. 685.
11. The Trial of Adolf Eichmann: Record of Proceedings in the District Court of Jerusalem, vol. 1 (Jerusalem: State of Israel Ministry of Justice, 1992), p. 344, evidence of Dr. Moishe Beisky; Abraham Langer, “During and After the War,” trans. Zulema Seligson, in Yizkor Book of the Jewish Community in Działoszyce and Surroundings (Tel Aviv: Hamenora, 1973), pp. 380–387, available at JewishGen.
12. Razel, Alone and in Hiding, pp. 33–34; Majer Zonenfeld, “In Działoszyce and the Camps,” trans. Sulema Seligson, in Yizkor Book of the Jewish Community in Działoszyce, pp. 365–387.
13. Szlama Leszman, “In the Polish Underground,” trans. Rochel Semp, in Yizkor Book of the Jewish Community in Działoszyce, pp. 298–303.
14. Razel, Alone and in Hiding, p. 38; Sefer yizkor shel kehillat Działoszyce, p. 40; AŻIH, 301/3260, testimony of Elias Minz; and 301/1765, testimony of Gustaw Weinfeld; Tenenbaum, Legacy and Redemption, pp. 105–106.

15. Sefer yizkor shel kehillat Działoszyce, p. 42; Razel, Alone and in Hiding, pp. 42–43; Tenenbaum, Legacy and Redemption, p. 113.

16. Sefer yizkor shel kehillat Działoszyce, pp. 42–43; Razel, Alone and in Hiding, pp. 41–43, 50–51; Zonenfeld, “In Działoszyce and the Camps,” pp. 365–387.

FRYSZTAK

Pre-1939: Frysztak, town, Lwów województwo, Poland; 1939–1945: Kreis Jasło, Distrikt Krakau, Generalgouvernement; post-1998: województwo podkarpackie, Poland

Frysztak is located about 120 kilometers (75 miles) east-southeast of Kraków. On the eve of World War II, there were 1,322 Jews living in Frysztak.

Units of the German army occupied Frysztak on September 8, 1939, and soon began maltreating the Jews.

In November 1939, the Germans established a civil administration in the newly formed Generalgouvernement. Frysztak was incorporated into Kreis Jasło, within Distrikt Krakau. Regierungsrat Dr. Walter Gentz was the Kreishauptmann from February 10, 1941.¹ The Border Police Office (Grenzpolizeikommissariat, GPK), commanded from 1940 to 1943 by SS-Hauptsturmführer Dr. Wilhelm Raschwitz, organized and carried out the large-scale anti-Jewish Aktions in Kreis Jasło. Stationed in Frysztak was a unit of German Gendarmerie that controlled the Polish (Blue) Police.

In the fall of 1939, the German authorities appointed a Judenrat in Frysztak, headed by a man named Baldinger. The Judenrat controlled a unit of Jewish Police. On April 29, 1940, the Judenrat in Frysztak was placed under the regional Judenrat for Kreis Jasło. Since all Jews aged 15 to 60 were required to perform forced labor, the Judenrat had to organize work details, as well as coping with refugees and distributing food. At the end of 1939 there were 1,466 Jews in Frysztak, including 116 refugees; one year later, there were 1,581 Jews, including 202 refugees. The refugees arrived mainly from Śląsk, Kraków, and Łódź. Living conditions for Jews in Frysztak deteriorated rapidly. In 1940, 283 Jews received material aid; and 1,440 received some financial assistance. On September 25, 1940, the Frysztak Judenrat sent an urgent letter to the Jewish Social Self-Help (JSS) organization in Kraków, warning of the imminent danger of starvation.²

On June 7, 1941, a branch of the JSS was established in Frysztak, headed by Jakub Braff. It provided help to Jews from Frysztak and Wiśniowa in Kreis Jasło and the Jewish community of Odrzykoń in Kreis Krosno. In September 1941, out of 1,080 Jews, 400 applied for aid, but the JSS could assist only 325 Jews.³

In April 1941, there were four labor camps around Frysztak, exploiting the labor of local Jews and Jews from Kraków. In mid-May 1941, about 1,000 Jewish forced laborers from the Warsaw ghetto arrived in Frysztak. On July 11, 1941, 150 Jews from Frysztak were sent to the Płaszów labor camp. From July to November 1941, there was a labor camp in Frysztak, located in two synagogues. Approximately 2,000 Jews from Warsaw were held there, supervised internally by a Jewish police force. The Jews worked on road construction and stone quarrying in Cieszyna. The guards mistreated and abused them. Due to overcrowding, typhus spread within the camp, and a number of inmates died. After its liquidation, the Germans probably transferred the surviving inmates back to the Warsaw region.⁴

Reports of the JSS in Frysztak indicate that the Germans had established a “Jewish residential area” (open ghetto) by January 1942. In December 1941, due to the spread of disease, the Germans prohibited Jews from leaving the town, which made it harder to obtain food. Jakub Braff reported that from early January 1942 the town was completely sealed off as a “Jewish residential area.” Signs placed around the town warned that Jews could not leave the limits of the town on pain of death. The only exception was for 250 Jews sent out daily to clear snow from the roads. In addition to refugees from other Polish towns, the Germans brought in Jews from the surrounding villages, shortly before the liquidation of the ghetto. In the spring of 1942, some 200 Jews from Jasło were moved to Frysztak. In total, there were about 1,800 Jews concentrated in Frysztak.⁵

In January 1942, the Frysztak branch of the JSS established a public kitchen, serving 300 dinners per day, which still failed to meet the demand. In May, it set up a separate cafeteria to feed 100 children, but another 100 went hungry. The JSS lacked the resources to sustain the public kitchens, obtain medical supplies, or assist about 100 Jews who had nothing to wear but rags. In 1942, the JSS made attempts to reestablish the town as a center of clothing production, in an effort to forestall further deportations to labor camps. About 100 Jewish tailors produced around 2,000 shirts and over 100 pairs of pants each day. However, in early 1942, the Kreishauptmann vetoed JSS plans to organize agricultural training for Jews.⁶

On July 2–3, 1942, Gestapo officers under the command of SS-Hauptsturmführer Raschwitz from Jasło organized the Jewish children, some wearing armbands, walk along an unpaved street in Frysztak, n.d.

USHMM WS #76183, COURTESY OF ARCHIWUM DOKUMENTACJI MECHANICZNEJ

first deportation Aktion in Frysztak, assisted by units of the Order Police, Ukrainian, and Polish (Blue) Police. The head of the Frysztak Judenrat was instructed that all of the Jews in Frysztak must assemble in the cattle market between 5:00 and 6:00 A.M. Here the Germans took all their valuables. Certain craftsmen and younger people were selected from a previously prepared list to have their working papers stamped. Men aged 52 or older were loaded onto trucks. Those who could not walk fast enough were beaten. Women with more than two children were also put on the trucks, as well as some individual Jews to complete the transport of some 800 people. The Jews were taken to the Warzyce Forest, stripped naked, and shot into three mass graves, which were filled in by Poles working for the German construction service (Baudienst). Children were seized from mothers and murdered by smashing them against the trucks. The Aktion was completed by 3:00 P.M. According to Mieczysław Chabański, the Kreishauptmann even charged the Kreis Judenrat in Jasło for the cost of transporting people from Frysztak to Warzyce, for ammunition, and for cleaning the Jews' clothing.⁷

Following this Aktion, the Gendarmerie hunted down groups of Jews in hiding in and around Frysztak. On August 13, 1942, the Gendarmerie shot 10 Jews, including four children, in Frysztak and Twierdza.⁸ The final liquidation of the Frysztak ghetto took place on August 18, 1942. Some Jews were taken to the Rzeszów ghetto, and 35 Jews were sent to the Przemyśl ghetto after they had been used to clear up the area of the Frysztak ghetto. The rest of the Jewish population was taken to Jasło, and from there they were deported to the Bełżec extermination camp on August 19 and 20.⁹

As many as 100 Jews escaped the deportation Aktions, mostly by hiding in the surrounding forests. However, due to repeated searches and some denunciations by local Poles, only about 20 of them remained by the end of 1943.

A number of Poles risked their lives to help Jews. On July 3, 1943, the Germans shot several Poles in the villages of Markuszowa and Kozłówek for aiding Jews.¹⁰ Eugeniusz Niedziela and his family from Markuszowa were recognized by Yad Vashem as Righteous Among the Nations for assisting the Weitz and Schmidt families, when they fled to the forests following the liquidation Aktions in Frysztak. Among others who helped Jews was Kasper Pilch from the village of Kozuchów, who assisted the Apfelbaum family from Frysztak, and also Michał Świętoń of Niewodna, who saved six members of the Resler family.¹¹

SOURCES Publications dealing with the persecution and murder of the Jews in Frysztak include the following: "Frysztak," in Abraham Wein and Aharon Weiss, eds., Pinkas ha-kehillot. Encyclopaedia of Jewish Communities: Poland, vol. 3, Galicia and Western Silesia (Jerusalem: Yad Vashem, 1984), pp. 295–298; Itzhok Berglas and Shlomo Yahalomi-Diamand, The Book of Stryzow and Vicinity, trans. Harry Langsam (Los Angeles: "Natives of Stryzow Societies" in Israel and the Diaspora, 1990); and Stanisław Zabierowski, Rzeszowskie pod okupacją hitlerowską (Warsaw: Książka i Wiedza, 1975).

Other works relevant to the history and persecution of the Jews in Frysztak include the following: Zofia Rusek and Danuta Skóra, Spółeczność żydowska w dawnym Strzyżowie i okolicy—historia i wspomnienia (Strzyżów, 2006).

Documents on the extermination of the Jews in Frysztak can be found in the following archives: AŻIH (JM 3968/5568401; 301/1952); BA-L (B162/14484); IPN (Dsn 13/74/73/"W" 452; Dsn 13/15/67/"W" 393; Dsn 13/216/73/"W" 717; Dsn 13/15/67/"W" 399; and Zh III/31/35/68); MOR (I/43b/V/H, GK 105z/A, t. 1; Bühler case, t. 74); OKBZH-Rz (II Ds 22/70; II Ds 58/68); USHMM (RG-10.027; Acc.1991.099; RG-15.019M, reels 10 and 17; Acc.1997.A.0124, reel 22); USHMPA (# 76183 and 76184); VHF; and YVA (e.g., O-3/3602; M-1/E/1690).

Joanna Śliwa

NOTES

1. BA-L, B162/14484 (II 206 AR-Z 827/63), verdict of LG-Arns, 6 Ks 4/70, December 5, 1972, pp. 11–13; Dr. Gentz, who committed suicide in 1967, succeeded Regierungsrat Dr. Ludwig Losacker in this post.
2. USHMM, Acc.1997.A.0124, reel 22.
3. Ibid.
4. Ibid., reels 3 and 22; RG-15.019M, reel 17; IPN, Zh III/31/35/68 and Dsn 13/216/73/"W" 717.
5. USHMM, Acc.1997.A.0124, reel 22, JSS in Frysztak reports to the Presidium in Kraków on January 8 and 19, 1942; RG-15.019M, reel 17; and BA-L, B162/14484, verdict of LG-Arns, 6 Ks 4/70, p. 16.
6. USHMM, Acc.1997.A.0124, reel 22.
7. AŻIH, 301/1952; USHMM, RG-15.019M, reels 10 and 17; BA-L, B162/14484, verdict of LG-Arns, 6 Ks 4/70, pp. 16–19; Mieczysław Wieliczko, Żasielskie w latach drugiej wojny światowej (Warsaw: Wydawnictwo Ministerstwa Obrony Narodowej, 1974), p. 165; MOR, I/43b/V/H, GK 105z/A, t. 1, and Bühler case, t. 74.
8. IPN, Dsn 13/15/67/"W" 399. See also USHMM, RG-15.019M, reel 17; and IPN, Dsn 13/216/73/"W" 717, regarding the shooting of a group of Jews in July 1942.
9. Wein and Weiss, Pinkas ha-kehillot: Poland, vol. 3, Galicia and Western Silesia, pp. 297–298; Zabierowski, Rzeszowskie pod okupacją hitlerowską, p. 181; BA-L, B162/14484, verdict of LG-Arns, 6 Ks 4/70, p. 19.
10. Zabierowski, Rzeszowskie pod okupacją hitlerowską, pp. 199–200.
11. Shmuel Krakowski and Sara Bender, eds., The Encyclopedia of the Righteous among the Nations: Rescuers of Jews during the Holocaust—Poland, vol. 2 (Jerusalem: Yad Vashem, 2004), pp. 544–545; Rusek and Skóra, Spółeczność żydowska, pp. 51–53; OKBZH-Rz, II Ds 58/68.

GŁOGÓW MAŁOPOLSKI

Pre-1939: Głogów Małopolski, town, Lwów województwo, Poland; 1939–1944: Głogów, Kreis Reichshof, Distrikt Krakau, Generalgouvernement; post-1998: Głogów Małopolski, województwo podkarpackie, Poland

Głogów Małopolski is located 12 kilometers (7.5 miles) north of Rzeszów. There were 648 Jews in Głogów in 1921. On the outbreak of World War II, approximately 600 Jews were residing there.¹

The German authorities established a Jewish Council (Judenrat) chaired by Symche Hiller. On December 17, 1939, a large group of refugees arrived, mostly from Łódź and Kalisz. A refugee committee established to relieve their situation organized a soup kitchen in the Bet Midrash, but the building was requisitioned shortly afterwards by the German military. From then on, the preparation of meals was divided between 11 private houses cooking approximately 150 meals daily.

In May 1940, the Judenrat reported 130 Jewish families in Głogów. The number of refugees stood at 104. By June 1940, the number of refugees had risen to 187, bringing the total number of Jewish residents to 806. A similar number, 800 Jews, was reported through November 1940.²

After the German army abandoned the school building in June 1941, a labor camp for approximately 100 Jews was established on its grounds. Both German and Jewish policemen guarded the camp. The prisoners worked cleaning the town, excavating earth, and working in the weapons magazines located in a forest, 2 kilometers (1.2 miles) outside of Głogów. The soldiers who guarded them mistreated the local Jews and extorted valuables and food supplies.

In September 1941, Jews from Raniżów and the surrounding villages of Staniszewskie, Zielonki, and Mazury were deported to Głogów (as well as to Sokołów Małopolski). Most of them were Jewish farmers, whose land the Germans planned to incorporate within their military training grounds. Deportees were permitted to take all of their belongings except for livestock.³

At this time, the German Landkommissar Twardon, residing in Kolbuszowa, ordered the Kolbuszowa Judenrat to move 25 Jewish families to Sokołów and Głogów. As a result, a number of farmers from villages surrounding Kolbuszowa (including Kupno and Przewrotne) were transferred to Głogów on October 14, 1941. Those refugees and deportees, who had settled in Głogów in 1939–1940, were simultaneously forced to relocate to barracks in Rzeszów.⁴

According to A. Potocki, a ghetto was established in Głogów on February 1, 1942. The Kreishauptmann's order to establish a net of ghettos in the Kreis was issued on December 17, 1941. In Rzeszów, the order was effective from January 10, 1942, with the closing of its ghetto; ghettos in the remainder of the Kreis were to be established by February 1, 1942.

Survivor Edith Kornbluth remembers that the Germans resettled the community to the most neglected part of the town. The ghetto was unfenced. As overcrowding was severe, the Kornbluth family had to share a room with three other families. Her father would sneak out at night to buy food from villagers. The men in the ghetto were subject to forced labor. The system of paying for substitutes to perform assigned labor was initially tolerated but subsequently became illegal.⁵

Edek Rebhum, head of the Jewish Police in the Głogów Małopolski ghetto, 1942. Rebhum was subsequently the leader of the Jewish forced labor camp in Głogów. Escaping from that camp, he joined Naftali Saleschütz's partisan group. He was later killed by the Poles.

USHMM WS #67241, COURTESY OF NORMAN SALSITZ

The Jews worked in forestry, agriculture, and road maintenance. A number of the laborers, according to another survivor of the ghetto, Martin Rosenberg, were deported to the Pustków forced labor camp. Rosenberg's family moved to the Głogów ghetto from Kolbuszowa to improve their living conditions and security.⁶

As of March 1942, the Schutzpolizei raids became more frequent and deadly. The following murders are registered: four men were shot in March 1942; then between May and June, another four persons, including a married couple, were murdered. The source, Rejestr miejsc i faktów zbrodni, notes that some of these murders might have been committed within the ghetto.⁷

On May 2, 1942, Gazeta Żydowska reported that the number of Jews in Głogów had tripled since the beginning of the war, rising to 1,800. The most recent newcomers were a group of 300 Jews from Kolbuszowa, Raniżów, and Sokołów. There was no soup kitchen in the town, and the system of distributing newcomers to private houses had failed due to overcrowding. There were no epidemics, partially because the community maintained a public steam bath.⁸

Survivor Michel Kruger testified that in May 1942 a number of men were selected by the Germans for the Biesiadka labor camp.⁹

Two hundred Jews from the Sokołów ghetto were reportedly transferred to Głogów on Sokołów's liquidation, which most likely took place on July 27, 1942.

The ghetto in Głogów was also liquidated in late July 1942; the Jews concentrated there were deported to Rzeszów.¹⁰ The Rzeszów ghetto was liquidated in the course of deportations to the Bełżec extermination camp that began in July 1942; its final liquidation took place in November 1942.

Some of Głogów's Jews were selected for the labor camp in the town's school. Since its establishment, the camp had been reorganized, holding approximately 120 Jews and Poles. The prisoners were tasked with maintaining the Głogów-Kolbuszowa road. During the camp's liquidation on October 25, 1942, the Jewish prisoners were sent to the Rzeszów ghetto.

SOURCES The following publications contain brief references to the destruction of the Głogów ghetto: Tadeusz Kowalski, Obozy hitlerowskie w Polsce południowo-wschodniej, 1939–1945 (Warsaw: Książka i Wiedza, 1973), pp. 103–104; Czesław Pilichowski et al., eds., Obozy hitlerowskie na ziemiach polskich 1939–1945: Informator encyklopedyczny (Warsaw: PWN, 1979), pp. 179, 462; Andrzej Potocki, Żydzi w Podkarpaciu (Rzeszów: Libra, 2004), pp. 54–56; and Stanisław Poradowski, “Zagłada Żydów rzeszowskich,” pt. 3, BŻIH, nos. 3–4 (1985): 89–90.

Archival sources can be found in AŻIH (210/339; 211/402); USHMM (Acc.1999.A.0154 [AJDC], Acc.1997.A.0124 [JSS]; RG-50.002*0140); and VHF (# 569, 12802, 15495, 39769, 43384).

Jolanta Kraemer

NOTES

1. Gazeta Żydowska, May 2, 1942.
2. USHMM, Acc.1999.A.0154 (AJDC), 210/339 (Głogów Małopolski), pp. 1–3, 6–7, 23, 25; VHF, # 39769, testimony of Louis Kadlovski, 1998.
3. Kolbuszowa Memorial Book, available on the Web at www.jewishgen.org—a translation of I.M. Biderman, ed., Pinkas Kolbushov (New York: United Kolbushover, 1971), pp. 55–88.
4. Franciszek Kotula, Losy Żydów rzeszowskich 1939–1945: Kronika tamtych dni (Rzeszów: Społeczny Komitet Wydania Dzieł Franciszka Kotuli, 1999), p. 71; VHF, # 569, testimony of Edith Kornbluth, 1995.
5. USHMM, RG-50.002*0140 (Edith Kornbluth); VHF, # 12802, testimony of Wolf Finkelman, 1996; # 569.
6. VHF, # 15495, testimony of Martin Rosenberg, 1996.
7. Rejestr miejsc i faktów zbrodni popełnionych przez okupanta hitlerowskiego na ziemiach polskich w latach 1939–1945: Województwo rzeszowskie (Warsaw: GKBZHWP, 1984), pp. 52–53.
8. Gazeta Żydowska, May 2, 1942.
9. VHF, # 43384, testimony of Michael Kluger, 1998.
10. Ibid., # 15495.

GORLICE

Pre-1939: Gorlice, town, Kraków województwo, Poland; 1939–1945: Kreis Jasło, Distrikt Krakau, Generalgouvernement; post-1998: województwo małopolskie, Poland

Gorlice is located about 100 kilometers (62 miles) southeast of Kraków. The Jewish population of Gorlice consisted of more than 3,400 people on the eve of World War II in 1939.

The German army occupied the town on September 7, 1939. Almost immediately, the Wehrmacht started seizing Jews for forced labor and stealing their possessions.

Jewish women and girls repair shoes in a fenced-in yard in the Gorlice ghetto, 1941.

USHMM WS #05951, COURTESY OF JERZY TOMASZEWSKI

Despite many residents' flight on the outbreak of the war, the Jewish population of Gorlice increased during the first year of occupation. Jewish refugees from Germany had begun to arrive following the expulsion of Polish Jews just prior to Kristallnacht (November 9–10, 1938), and after the war started, many Jews from western Poland sought refuge in the eastern part of the country. By the fall of 1940, the Jewish population of Gorlice had grown to 4,000, with another 1,500 living in the smaller surrounding villages.

In the fall of 1939, the German authorities confiscated Jewish workshops and businesses, placing them into fictional “trusteeships” under the direction of local ethnic Germans (Volksdeutsche) or German managers. For a few months, they allowed smaller Jewish shops to remain open, but women ran them, as the men stayed out of sight to avoid being rounded up for forced labor.¹

In March 1940, the Germans established a seven-man Judenrat headed by Dr. Henryk Arnold, a local lawyer and Zionist leader. Dr. Jakub Blech, also a lawyer, served as his deputy.² On April 29, 1940, the Gorlice Judenrat was placed under the jurisdiction of the regional Judenrat in Jasło. A Jewish auxiliary police force was also established. The Judenrat was instructed to organize forced labor details, which were made up of requests for between 100 and 300 men per day, and this brought an end to the random kidnappings. Around 200 Jews were sent to work at two sawmills run by the German firm HOBAG under a German manager named Girtner. The Jewish forced laborers were supervised by Jewish policemen and a Werkschutz (factory guard) detachment; some Poles worked there as well, and they helped Jews by giving them additional food. Among the finished items produced by HOBAG were wooden planks used for the construction of barracks and coffins to transport German soldiers killed in action. Some Jewish forced laborers worked at a factory for making tar paper, owned before the war by a Jew named Fessel, and others worked on road construction projects in the town, for which they received only some soup and the right to receive food coupons.³

The German Landkommissar based in Gorlice was an official named Alfred Koch, who was subordinated to the Kreishauptmann in Jasło (initially Dr. Ludwig Losacker, and then from February 1941, Dr. Walter Gentz). From March 1940, an outpost of the Border Police Office (Grenzpolizeikommissariat, or GPK) in Jasło was established in Gorlice. From December 1941 until March 1944, Kriminalassistent (later Kriminalsekretär) Ernst F. was in charge of this office, assisted by his deputy, Otto Friedrich. In Gorlice there was also a detachment of about 8 or 10 German Gendarmes (Order Police), which also commanded a larger force of local Polish (Blue) Police.⁴ In 1940, the German authorities instituted a system of hostage taking. As recalled by the survivor Joseph K.: “Ten Jewish men were named as hostages, and their names were posted on placards all over town. Should anything happen to a German, those ten men would be executed.” The hostages changed every 14 days. This system was already in operation in February 1940. Joseph K.’s father was one of those named among the list of 10 hostages posted on June 8, 1940. The hostages were taken on the orders of the Kreishauptmann, Dr. Losacker. Poles were sometimes also named among the hostages.⁵

The Judenrat organized a soup kitchen to support the many Jews in need. In 1940, a medical clinic was opened, but there were no Jewish doctors left in Gorlice. However, a local Polish doctor, Dr. Otański, “put aside his antisemitic convictions” and, at great personal risk, tended the Jewish sick. A Jewish refugee doctor from Kraków, Dr. Feldmaus, arrived in 1941. In the fall of 1940 two dental clinics were in operation. When epidemics broke out in late 1941 or early 1942, a small Jewish hospital was opened.⁶

Despite economic privation, the Jews of Gorlice were able to obtain food smuggled in from neighboring Slovakia, about 30 kilometers (19 miles) away. In July 1941, after the invasion of the Soviet Union, the new Kreishauptmann, Dr. Gentz, ordered the delineation of a ghetto area on the edge of town. About 160 impoverished Jews were expelled from Gorlice to Bobowa. On August 7, another group was shipped to Biecz, Bobowa, and two other towns. By October 1941, the Germans had established the ghetto in Gorlice, which at first remained open. The ghetto consisted of two separate sections located south of the market square (Rynek), which lay outside the ghetto. There was the Dworzyska area: composed of the present-day Mickiewicz, Nadbrzeźna, Stroma, and Strażacka Streets. This was separated by Mickiewicz Street, which remained open for non-Jewish traffic, from the Garbarnia area of the ghetto: composed of the present-day Nadbrzeźna, Legionów, Rzeźnicza, and Ogrodowa Streets. In total, there were about 3,500 Gorlice Jews residing in the ghetto, plus a growing number of refugees.

The ghetto was guarded by Ukrainian police and later also by Polish police, supervised by the local Gestapo and Gendarmerie. According to Polish sources, some of the Polish policemen were also members of the Polish Home Army (Armia Krajowa) commanded by Sergeant Jan Fereński (“Sęp”), and these men abetted the smuggling of food into the ghetto. The Jewish Police was issued with wooden bats made by HOBAG to maintain order inside the ghetto. Its commander, a tailor named Keller, is named in some sources as having been an informant of the Gestapo, who kept a close eye on the activities of the Jewish Police.⁷

The space allocated for the ghetto was gradually decreased, and as of February 1942, it became an enclosed ghetto. In addition to the overcrowding (10 to 15 people to a room), there were shortages of food, clothing, and fuel for heating. Disease broke out, and the death rate climbed. During the severe winter of 1941–1942, the Jews had to turn in their fur garments, including the fur hats worn by pious Jews. Some burned their furs to keep them out of German hands. Anyone caught disobeying the order was shot, as was the case with at least one family.⁸

During 1942, the situation in the ghetto deteriorated considerably, and the Judenrat eventually became less cooperative with the German authorities. On January 3, 1942, the Security Police shot about 20 Jews on the streets, allegedly to prevent the spread of typhus. On April 25, 1942, the Germans shot another 70 Jews, who were members of Zionist organizations. In the spring of 1942, Jews expelled from villages in the surrounding area started to arrive in Gorlice. Rumors of the impending liquidation of the ghetto began to spread. The Judenrat initiated a program to train people as tailors. By June, about 350 people were employed making clothes. A workshop for youngsters aged 13 to 20 enabled 100 of them to become employed making toys and house slippers.

On July 22, 1942, the German authorities ordered all men to assemble on the town square. Several hundred Jews were selected and were sent to labor camps in Płaszów, Pustków, and Fryszak or to the aviation factory in Mielec. At about this time the Germans demanded a “contribution” from the Jews. When people did not deliver the required amount, Germans broke into their dwellings and took money and valuables by force. At the beginning of August, Jews from Bobowa and Biecz were brought back to the ghetto.

In mid-August 1942, the Germans organized a major Aktion against the ghetto. First, the German authorities demanded another large contribution of 250,000 złoty. Then during the night of August 13–14 (or according to some sources, on August 16–17), the Germans, assisted by Ukrainian and other auxiliaries surrounded the ghetto, and all Jews were again ordered to report to the town square.⁹

Many hid in attics and cellars. The German-led forces combed the area, and anyone discovered in hiding was shot on the spot. Some 200 Jews were selected from the square and sent to the Płaszów camp. Perhaps several hundred Jews—the elderly, the sick, and the children—together with a similar group from the Bobowa ghetto were taken by truck to the Garbacz Forest in Stróżówka, forced to undress, lined up next to open pits, and murdered. The members of the Judenrat, the Jewish Police, and their families were shot next to Gestapo headquarters. The “essential” workers at HOBAG and the tar paper factory were excluded from the roundup. The rest were taken to sheds on the grounds of a shoe factory near the train station. Here they were held without food or water for three days and then put onto 60 freight cars destined for the Bełżec extermination camp. In total, about 2,500 Jews perished in this Aktion.¹⁰

About 700 Jews were left in the enclosed ghetto. These included the roughly 100 “essential” workers, others who were assigned to clean up the ghetto, and some agricultural workers. Also among them were some “illegals,” people who had hidden during the roundup. About 50 were caught and sent to the Garbacz Forest to bury the corpses. They never returned. Another selection took place at which 250 people were ordered to step forward. Anyone who refused was shot. The rest were shipped to Bełżec. On September 14, the ghetto was finally liquidated, when a few hundred more Jews were put on the train to Bełżec. Only the 70 working for HOBAG and the 30 at the tar paper factory remained. They were locked up on the grounds of these factories. On January 6, 1943, the 70 HOBAG workers were sent to the labor camp at Muszyna, and the 30 from the tar paper factory were taken to the camp at Rzeszów.¹¹

In August 1968 the regional court in Nürnberg-Fürth sentenced two former officials of the GPK in Gorlice, Otto Friedrich and Paul Baron, to life imprisonment for shooting Jews in Gorlice on a number of separate occasions in 1942 and 1943.¹²

SOURCES Publications on the Jewish community of Gorlice and its fate during the Holocaust include the following: M.Y. Bar-On, ed., Sefer Gorlice; Hakehillah bivinyanah uviburbanah (Tel Aviv: Association of Former Residents of Gorlice and Its Vicinity in Israel, 1962); Władysław Boczoń, Żydzi Gorliccy (Gorlice: W. Boczoń, 1998); and Abraham Weiss and Aharon Weiss, eds., Pinkas ha-kehillot. Encyclopaedia of Jewish Communities: Poland, vol. 3, Galicia and Western Silesia (Jerusalem: Yad Vashem, 1984), pp. 93–97. Extracts from a survivor testimony taken by the Fortunoff Video Archive (FVA) can be found in Joshua M. Greene and Shiva Kumar, Witness: Voices from the Holocaust (New York: Free Press, 2000).

Documents on the persecution and annihilation of the Jews of Gorlice can be found in the following archives: AŻIH (301/1113); BA-L; FVA (# 61); IPN; ITS (R 50/Z 34); USHMM (RG-15.019M, reel 10); VHF; and YVA.

Samuel Fishman, Martin Dean, and
Jolanta Kraemer

NOTES

1. Wein and Weiss, Pinkas ha-kehillot: Poland, vol. 3, Galicia and Western Silesia, p. 96; and Bar-On, Sefer Gorlice, p. 237.
2. AŻIH, 301/1113, testimony of Izrael Buchsbaum and Mojsesz Hirschfeld; and Boczoń, Żydzi Gorliccy, p. 135.
3. Boczoń, Żydzi Gorliccy, pp. 138–139.
4. Justiz und NS-Verbrechen, vol. 3 (Amsterdam: Amsterdam University Press, 2004), Lfd. Nr. 688, pp. 170–171.
5. Greene and Kumar, Witness: Voices from the Holocaust, p. 48. A facsimile of the poster dated June 8, 1940, is reproduced on page 50. Another such poster, dated February 17, 1940, is reproduced in Boczoń, Żydzi Gorliccy, p. 143.
6. Wein and Weiss, Pinkas ha-kehillot: Poland, vol. 3, Galicia and Western Silesia, p. 96; Bar-On, Sefer Gorlice, pp. 237–238.
7. Boczoń, Żydzi Gorliccy, pp. 144–145.
8. Bar-On, Sefer Gorlice, pp. 237–240; JuNS-V, vol. 30, Lfd. Nr. 688, p. 171.
9. Wein and Weiss, Pinkas Hakehillot: Poland, vol. 3, Galicia and Western Silesia, p. 96.

10. Ibid., pp. 96–97; AŻIH, 301/1113. Boczoń, Żydzi Gorliccy, pp. 148–156, dates the ghetto liquidation Aktion from August 17–20, 1942. Zabierowski Stanisław, Rzeszowskie pod okupacją hitlerowską (Warsaw: Książka i Wiedza, 1975), p. 185, cites 700 Jews from Gorlice and Bobowa murdered in the Garbacz Forest but dates it on August 13, 1942.

11. AŻIH, 301/1113.

12. JuNS-V, vol. 30, Lfd. Nr. 688, pp. 167–195.

GRYBÓW

Pre-1939: Grybów, town, Kraków województwo, Poland; 1939–1945: Grünberg, Kreis Neu-Sandez, Distrikt Krakau, Generalgouvernement; post-1998: Grybów, województwo małopolskie, Poland

Grybów is located 94 kilometers (58 miles) east-southeast of Kraków. In 1921, the Jewish population was 847 out of a total population of 2,931.

In September 1939, before the arrival of the Germans, many Jews fled to the east into what soon became the Soviet-occupied zone. Some remained there, while others returned to Grybów, once the fighting had ceased. A week after the outbreak of war, German forces arrived in Grybów and immediately began to kidnap Jews for forced labor. Most were put to work repairing roads and bridges damaged in the fighting. The German authorities imposed a series of anti-Jewish measures, including the levying of “contributions,” limitations on the movement of Jews, and the requirement to wear identifying markings.

At the end of October 1939, the town became part of Kreis Neu-Sandez, administered by Kreishauptmann Dr. Reinhard Busch. The German authorities ordered the establishment of a Jewish Council (Judenrat). One of its main tasks was organizing the daily quota of Jewish forced laborers. In the first months of 1940, the Jewish Police (Jüdischer Ordnungsdienst) was formed. As the economic plight of the community

Spectators watch as a Polish woman is led through the town square in Grybów by two Jews wearing armbands, n.d. The sign around her neck states, “For selling merchandise to Jews.” She is supposedly being taken to a killing site.

USHMM WS #79062, COURTESY OF ŻIH, IMIENIA EMANUELA RINGELBLUMA

worsened, the Judenrat extended material assistance to those in need. The local branch of the Jewish Social Self-Help (JSS) opened a public kitchen. By the fall of 1940, there were 1,320 Jews in Grybów (including 191 refugees). More than 500 Jews were receiving assistance from the JSS.¹

In the fall of 1940 and the first half of 1941, the German authorities ordered that Jews living in the villages and smaller towns in Kreis Neu-Sandez must move to the larger towns of Nowy Sącz, Stary Sącz, Mszana Dolna, Limanowa, and Grybów. As a result, a number of refugees arrived in Grybów from Łabowa, Tylicz, Librantowa, Muszyna, Krynica, and other places, almost all in need of support.² The local branch of the JSS sent an urgent plea to the central office of the JSS in Kraków for assistance in absorbing these additional refugees.

At the end of 1941, there was an increase in the number of people being kidnapped and sent to forced labor camps. In March 1942, the JSS sought to establish a workshop and develop a training program for young people, in the hope that this might provide some protection from the roundups for the labor camps.

At the beginning of 1942, the Germans banned the Jews from streets occupied by non-Jews and forced them to live on a few narrow streets of their own scattered throughout the town, establishing a form of open ghetto. The Jews had to build paths and steps to get from one street to the other without encroaching on non-Jewish boundaries.³

At the time of the formation of the open ghetto in early 1942, a Polish woman, Sukonawa, was caught selling milk to a Jewish woman. As a punishment, the Polish police forced Sukonawa to dance with a Jew in the marketplace on Sunday afternoon, as the Christians were returning home from church. As a result, most Poles became too scared to trade with the Jews, and the shortages of food in the ghetto worsened considerably.⁴ At this time the public kitchen increased its assistance to the needy, and the Judenrat opened a clinic to try to prevent outbreaks of disease.

In April 1942, the head of the Gestapo in Nowy Sącz, SS-Obersturmführer Heinrich Hamann, received instructions from the Commanding Officer of the Security Police and SD (KdS) in Kraków to arrest and shoot all Jews in the Kreis known to be Communists or to sympathize with them. In response, Hamann obtained an old membership list for the Poalei Zion (left-wing Zionist) movement and ordered that all those on the list be arrested with the assistance of the Jewish Councils and Jewish Police. When it was reported that the Jewish Police in Grybów had been able to arrest only about 20 people from a much longer list, Hamann traveled in person to Grybów on the morning of April 28. On his arrival he confronted the head of the Judenrat, Samuel Neugroschl, and ordered that he be shot together with four other members of the Judenrat and five members of the Jewish Police. The 20 or so Jews arrested in Grybów were sent to the prison in Nowy Sącz and were shot along with other Jews at the Jewish cemetery in Nowy Sącz shortly afterwards.⁵

At the beginning of August 1942, the German authorities demanded another large contribution from the Judenrat in

Grybów.⁶ The Gestapo office in Nowy Sącz planned the “re-settlement” of the Jews from Grybów on August 16, 1942. Just prior to this date, the Germans ordered Poles in the Construction Service (Baudienst) to dig a large ditch behind the wooded hill in Biała Niżna close to the Dominican monastery about 1.6 kilometers (1 mile) to the northeast of Grybów. At 6:00 A.M., on the morning of August 16, the Jews were assembled on the market square with the assistance of the Jewish Police. On the basis of a list prepared by the Judenrat, Hamann checked that all the Jews were present and then participated in the selection of about 300 sick and disabled Jews, who were sent to one side. Another group of 34 Jews employed at the Hobag-Werke in Grybów were given special passes and sent off to their work site.⁷

After placing their house keys into baskets as ordered, the remaining 1,200 or so Jews capable of walking were escorted by the Jewish Police 21 kilometers (13 miles) in the heat of the sun to the enclosed ghetto on Kazimierz Street in Nowy Sącz. Those selected as unfit were loaded onto five trucks and taken to the killing site at Biała Niżna, which was cordoned off by men of the Gendarmerie. The Jews were made to undress, and members of the Gestapo under Hamann’s supervision shot them in groups of 5 using machine pistols, as they lay facedown in the mass grave.⁸ Some Poles observed the gruesome scene at the site of the mass shooting while sitting on their rooftops.⁹

At the end of August 1942, the occupiers deported most of the Jews in the Nowy Sącz ghettos to the Bełżec extermination camp. Some of those from Grybów who were capable of work were sent to various labor camps, including those in Rytro, Rożnów, and Sędziszów Małopolski.¹⁰

Only very few Jews from Grybów and its vicinity managed to survive the German occupation, either in various camps or by hiding on the “Aryan” side.

SOURCES Both yizkor books for Nowy Sącz contain some information in relation to Grybów: Shlomo Zalman Lehrer and Leizer Strassman, The Vanished City of Tsanz (Southfield, MI: Targum, 1997); and Rafael Mahler, ed., Seyfer Sants (Tel Aviv: Sandzer landsmanshaftn, New York, 1970). Other relevant published sources include Abraham Wein and Aharon Weiss, eds., Pinkas ha-kehillot. Encyclopaedia of Jewish Communities: Poland, vol. 3, Galicia and Western Silesia (Jerusalem: Yad Vashem, 1984), pp. 100–103; and Justiz und NS-Verbrechen, vol. 24 (Amsterdam: Amsterdam University Press, 1998), Lfd. Nr. 635, pp. 269–484 (LG-Bo, 16 Ks 1/65, verdict against Heinrich Hamann and others).

Documentation on the persecution and destruction of the Jewish community in Grybów can be found in the following archives: AŻIH (301/1338, 1703; 211/437-440); IPN (ASG, sygn. 10, k. 428); USHMM (Acc.1997.A.0124 [JSS], reel 24); and YVA.

Martin Dean

NOTES

1. Wein and Weiss, Pinkas ha-kehillot: Poland, vol. 3, Galicia and Western Silesia, p. 103.
2. Tatiana Berenstein et al., eds., Faschismus, Getto, Massenmord: Dokumentation über Ausrottung und Widerstand der Juden in Polen während des zweiten Weltkrieges (Berlin: Rütten & Loening, 1961), p. 99. JuNS-V, vol. 24, Lfd. Nr. 635, p. 308, dates the clearance of the border area in the first half of 1940. Also see Mahler, Seyfer Sants, pp. 743, 769.

3. Lehrer and Strassman, The Vanished City of Tszanz, p. 311.

4. Ibid., pp. 311–312.

5. Ibid., p. 312; JuNS-V, vol. 24, Lfd. Nr. 635, p. 357. Rejestr miejsc i faktów zbrodni popełnionych przez okupanta hitlerowskiego na ziemiach polskich w latach 1939–1945: Województwo nowosądeckie (Warsaw: GKBZHWP, 1984), p. 44, lists seven of the victims, including Samuel Neugroschl. This source dates the Aktion on April 24, 1942.

6. AŻIH, 301/1703, testimony of S. Kaufer.

7. JuNS-V, vol. 24, Lfd. Nr. 635, pp. 389–391.

8. Ibid., pp. 390–391; Rejestr miejsc i faktów: Województwo nowosądeckie, p. 13.

9. Lehrer and Strassman, The Vanished City of Tszanz, p. 312.

10. AŻIH, 301/1703.

JASIENICA ROSIELNA

Pre-1939: Jasienica Rosielna, village, Lwów województwo, Poland; 1939–1944: initially Kreis Sanok, then Kreis Krosno, Distrikt Krakau, Generalgouvernement; post-1998: województwo podkarpackie, Poland

Jasienica Rosielna is located 62 kilometers (39 miles) west-southwest of Przemyśl. Approximately 500 Jews were living there in 1939.

German forces occupied Jasienica Rosielna around September 10, 1939. There is no information regarding the first months of the occupation other than that a small number of Jews from Krosno were resettled there, either in late 1939 or in 1940.¹

The German authorities set up a Jewish Council (Judenrat), which in the spring of 1940 included Osias Majerowicz as the chairman, Dawid Sicherman, Majer Balser, and Leib Sindel. By December 1940, Dawid Sicherman had taken over the Judenrat's leadership.² The date when the Jewish Police (Jüdischer Ordnungsdienst) was organized is unknown; however, it included Natan Balcer and Izrael Beer Weitz.³

In May 1940, there were 386 Jews living in Jasienica, including 46 refugees, mostly from Kraków and Upper Silesia. The Jasienica Judenrat, however, also administered a much larger Jewish population in the so-called Domaradz Collective Community that included nearby villages in which 750 Jews lived. The largest of the settlements was Domaradz, located 6 kilometers (4 miles) from Jasienica and boasting a population of more than 100 Jews. By the end of 1940, the number of Jews in Jasienica itself had risen to 430 (88 families).⁴

By the spring of 1940, most of Jasienica's Jews had already been deprived of their means of income and were left to support themselves by selling their furniture and clothing. In the autumn of 1940, a number of men were employed in road construction, earning 3 złoty per day, yet part of these meager wages was deducted to support those unable to work. Many were conscripted daily for forced labor in and around Jasienica. Not a single Jewish-owned shop remained open.⁵

As the authorities considered Jasienica a village—not a town—its Jews were not eligible for ration cards. Welfare organizations did not provide assistance because the community could not afford to open a soup kitchen, and this was a prerequisite for the provision of financial support. A soup kitchen was in fact opened briefly; but according to the Judenrat, its maintenance did not make much sense, as it was too difficult for the widely dispersed needy Jews to walk every day all the way to Jasienica for a single meal. The Judenrat's position was that the community would benefit more from the distribution of groceries instead.

With time, the Judenrat's correspondence with the main welfare institutions American Jewish Joint Distribution Committee (AJDC) and the Jewish Social Self-Help (JSS) organization reveals its increasing frustration, due to the continued denial of assistance. The severity of the situation may have led the JSS headquarters in Kraków to establish a branch in the smaller village of Domaradz at the beginning of 1942 despite its never having established a kitchen. The branch, chaired by Izydor Nattel, supervised the organization of welfare in six settlements, including Jasienica, where the soup kitchen was reopened in January 1942. Willi Halpern was the kitchen's manager.⁶

In March 1942, a number of Jasienica Jews worked in a labor camp in Bzianka (near Strzyżów). The Judenrat provided money for their sustenance.⁷

On June 24, 1942, 550 Jews from the area north of Brzozów were resettled to Jasienica. Among others, the resettlement included Jews from Domaradz, Hłudno, Barycz, Golcowa, Gwoźnica, Blizne, Przysietnica, Wesoła, Wola Jasienicka, and Orzechówka (mostly in the Domaradz and Nozdrzec Landgemeinden). This meant that approximately 250 of the newcomers were brought in from settlements that were not included in the original Collective Community. The number of Jews in Jasienica rose to approximately 1,000 or 1,100.

The Gestapo and the Polish police usually conducted the resettlements to Jasienica. The Jews were usually given only minutes to pack, so many of them arrived with few or no belongings.

The ghetto in Jasienica Rosielna was set up on June 27, 1942.⁸ In many cases, about 15 people shared a room, and some had to sleep in the streets. People slept both night and day, in shifts, or in sitting positions.⁹

The JSS branch was transferred from Domaradz to Jasienica on the establishment of the ghetto and included Izydor Nattel (chairman), Mechel Scherer, and Abraham Willner. With financial help from Krosno for the resettled, the soup kitchen continued serving meals, while children and the sick were getting some milk. Krosno also provided Jasienica's ghetto with some medicine and sent a Jewish doctor to examine the poor free of charge. A Sanitation Committee was established. The public bath was open every other day. Jasienica's Jews were also vaccinated for typhus.¹⁰

Immediately following the ghetto's establishment, on either June 29 or 30, 1942, able-bodied men had to register. Soon small groups of Jews went to Jaśliska, Dynów, Bachórz, and Wola Wyżna. In Jasienica itself, approximately 60 men labored in fieldworks at a nearby manor, on road works, and at a quarry.¹¹

The hardest labor was in Jaśliska, where laborers walked 28 kilometers (17 miles) each day to cut beech trees in a forest. A survivor recalls running 8 kilometers (5 miles) mostly uphill. Although workers were treated humanely, the daily quota set by the company management was impossible to fulfill. Divided into teams of three, the workers were to gather 5 cubic meters (177 cubic feet) of wood daily. Within the two weeks they spent in Jaśliska, the laborers received so little food that the Jasienica JSS had to furnish them with rations, clothing, and blankets. Laborers in Bachórz worked 12 to 13 hours daily. Laborers suffered from hunger in each of the camps. A number were released early due to malnourishment.¹²

At the end of July 1942, the Brzozów authorities—"in principle"—agreed to open workshops in the Jasienica ghetto. Tentative orders were placed but were to be fulfilled using their own materials. The Arbeitsamt registered 140 women who were then engaged in the small-scale production of straw goods.¹³

In early August, the ghetto was effectively closed, as the JSS chairman Nattel reported increased restrictions on movement: "The delivery or purchase of any food [outside of the ghetto] was precluded entirely."¹⁴

The liquidation of the Jasienica Rosielna ghetto was conducted on August 12, 1942. That morning, Gestapo men and Ukrainian policemen from Krosno surrounded the ghetto. Seven Jews were reportedly killed while the community was being chased out of their homes. Young girls and teenagers were taken on trucks to the Iwonicz train station; there are no sources reporting their fate. Some 645 women, children, and elderly were shot in the Jewish cemetery. The execution lasted from 10:00 A.M. until 5:00 P.M., with only a one-hour break. The victims were buried in a mass grave.¹⁵

SOURCES Brief information on the Jasienica Rosielna ghetto can be found in the following publications: Andrzej Potocki, Żydzi w Podkarpaciu (Rzeszów: Libra, 2004), pp. 65–66; and Abraham Wein and Aharon Weiss, eds., Pinkas ha-kehillot. Encyclopaedia of Jewish Communities: Poland, vol. 3, Galicia and Western Silesia (Jerusalem: Yad Vashem, 1984), p. 107 (Domaradz) and pp. 220–221 (Jasienica Rosielna).

Documentation on the persecution and destruction of the Jewish community in Jasienica Rosielna can be found in the following archives: AŻIH (210/375 [AJDC Jasienica Rosielna]; 211/466 [JSS Jasienica Rosielna]; 301/2045 and 301/4536 [Relacje]); USHMM (Acc.1999.A.0154 [AJDC]; Acc.1997.A.0124 [JSS Jasienica Rosielna], reel 25, and [JSS Korespondencja z Jakubem Sternbergiem], reel 10, 211/154–156; and RG-15.084M [Relacje], # 2045 and 4536); VHF (# 3503); and YVA.

Jolanta Kraemer

NOTES

1. Potocki, Żydzi, p. 66. However, the entry on "Krosno," pp. 82–83, indicates a relocation to Jasienica in November 1941.
2. USHMM, Acc.1999.A.0154 (AJDC), 210/375, pp. 1–2, 17.

3. Ibid., Acc.1997.A.0124 (JSS Korespondencja z Jakubem Sternbergiem), reel 10, 211/154, p. 60.

4. Ibid., pp. 1, 20–22; for the names of the family heads in Jasienica, see pp. 15, 17–20; and Acc.1997.A.0124 (JSS Jasienica Rosielna), reel 25, 211/466, pp. 3, 9.

5. Ibid., Acc.1999.A.0154, 210/375, pp. 2, 9, 21–22.

6. Ibid., pp. 4–6, 9, 10–11, 21–22; Gazeta Żydowska, February 20 and 24, March 22, April 8, and June 7, 1942; USHMM, Acc.1997.A.0124, reel 25, 211/466, pp. 4, 6.

7. Gazeta Żydowska, March 22, 1942.

8. Czesław Pilichowski et al., eds., Obozy hitlerowskie na ziemiach polskich 1939–1945: Informator encyklopedyczny (Warsaw: PWN, 1979), p. 204; Wein and Weiss, Pinkas ha-kehillot: Poland, vol. 3, Galicia and Western Silesia, p. 221 (Jasienica Rosielna).

9. AŻIH, 301/2045; and VHF, # 3503.

10. Gazeta Żydowska, April 8 and July 29, 1942; USHMM, Acc.1997.A.0124, reel 25, 211/466, pp. 11–12, 16, 18.

11. AŻIH, 301/2045; Gazeta Żydowska, July 29, 1942; USHMM, Acc.1997.A.0124, reel 25, 211/466, pp. 10–11, 19, 22; and Potocki, Żydzi, p. 66.

12. AŻIH, 301/2045; USHMM, Acc.1997.A.0124, reel 25, 211/466, pp. 21–22.

13. AŻIH, 301/2045; USHMM, Acc.1997.A.0124, reel 25, 211/466, pp. 22–23.

14. VHF, # 3503; USHMM, Acc.1997.A.0124, reel 25, 211/466, p. 27. According to Potocki, Żydzi, p. 66, the laborers were sent to Kraków-Podgórze on the day of the deportation.

15. Rejestr miejsc i faktów zbrodni popełnionych przez okupanta hitlerowskiego na ziemiach polskich w latach 1939–1945: Województwo krosnieńskie (Warsaw: GKBZHWP, 1983), p. 52; Czesław Czubyrt-Borkowski, ed., Przewodnik po upamiętnionych miejscach walk i męczeństwa 1939–1945 (Warsaw: Wydawn. "Sport i Turystyka," 1988), p. 394. Potocki, Żydzi, p. 66, dates the liquidation on August 11, 1942. According to Pilichowski et al., Obozy hitlerowskie, p. 204, those who were not killed in Jasienica were transported in the direction of Krosno.

JASŁO

Pre-1939: Jasło, town, Kraków województwo, Poland; 1939–1945: Jasło, center of Kreis Jasło, Distrikt Krakau, Generalgouvernement; post-1998: Jasło, województwo podkarpackie, Poland

Jasło is located about 94 kilometers (58 miles) west of Przemyśl. In 1939, on the eve of World War II, around 3,000 Jews were living there, among a total population of some 10,000 people. At the end of 1939 and in 1940, some 3,000 Jews were resettled into Kreis Jasło from western Poland, which increased the town's Jewish population considerably.¹

On September 8, 1939, German armed forces occupied the town. At the end of October, Jasło was incorporated into Distrikt Krakau within the Generalgouvernement. Jasło became the administrative center of Kreis Jasło. Regierungsrat Dr. Ludwig Losacker was the first Kreishauptmann, from the end of 1939; Regierungsrat Dr. Walter Gentz succeeded him in this post on February 10, 1941.²

Alongside the office of the Kreishauptmann, the Germans established in Jasło a German Gendarmerie force, the Polish

A Jewish couple wearing armbands stand in front of a sign in the Jasło ghetto. The sign, bearing skull and crossbones, says, "Ghetto." USHMM WS #38496, COURTESY OF SHALOM FOUNDATION: GOLDA TENCER-SZURMIEJ COLLECTION

(Blue) Police, and a Border Police Office (Grenzpolizeikommissariat, GPK), which was commanded from 1940 to 1943 by SS-Hauptsturmführer Dr. Wilhelm Raschwitz. The GPK (composed of Security Police) organized and carried out the Aktions against the Jews in Jasło and the surrounding areas.

On September 22, 1939, on the orders of the occupying forces, Polish firefighters burned down the synagogue. The Germans also demanded 40,000 złoty as a "contribution" from the Jews and took 150 notable Jews hostage in the prison as leverage. After this sum was paid in full, they released the hostages on September 25.³ From the start of the occupation, German soldiers and officials robbed Jewish shops and houses with impunity. Jews were also compelled to perform forced labor. At the end of October 1939, the German authorities ordered all Jews to wear white armbands bearing a blue Star of David and established a Jewish Council (Judenrat). The Jewish Council in Jasło served from April 29, 1940, as a central council of Jewish elders coordinating the operations of the 16 Jewish Councils operating in Kreis Jasło.⁴

Jakub Herzig has described how the president of Jasło's Judenrat and some of its members lived well while most Jews went hungry. According to Herzig, a minority of the Judenrat acted decently, but they lacked power.⁵ Despite this criticism of some corruption and favoritism, the Jewish Council did undertake several measures to alleviate the suffering of the Jews, including the many refugees in Jasło. It organized a soup kitchen, an orphanage, a hospital, and also in December 1940, a school for 300 children.⁶

Sometime during 1941, probably before May,⁷ Dr. Gentz ordered the Judenrat to establish a Jewish quarter (jüdisches Wohnbezirk) or open ghetto on a few of the poorest streets of the town, around the old marketplace, Targowica. Here, the Jews were crammed together in overcrowded houses under terrible conditions. Until the end of 1941, Jews could leave the area each day to buy goods from the local Poles. But on December 20, 1941, the ghetto was transformed into a closed area, surrounded on all sides by walls or a fence with only one exit that was closely guarded. Thereafter, Jews could not leave the ghetto without a special permit issued by the German authorities; signs placed around the ghetto warned violators that the punishment was death.⁸

At the end of December 1941, all Jews in the ghetto were ordered to hand over their fur coats and other fur articles of clothing. Refusal to comply was also punishable by death. The food rations issued to the Jews were totally inadequate, containing only a minimal amount of low-grade meat, a little bread and jam—but no fat or milk. Hunger and malnutrition accompanied by other diseases caused the Jews to become desperate. Some were compelled to sneak out of the ghetto in search of food despite the great risks involved.⁹

At the time of the "fur Aktion" (Pelzaktion), in the winter of 1941–1942, a number of Jews were shot by members of the GPK, allegedly for withholding fur items. Other Jews were shot for leaving the ghetto without permission. In February 1942, the GPK shot about 50 Jews who had been allowed to return from Eastern Galicia to Jasło in the fall of 1941. Shortly after this, Dr. Maria Zucker, a Jewish physician who had been permitted to live outside the ghetto because of her treatment of wounded German soldiers, was arrested on the orders of the mayor. Her husband was among those who had returned from Eastern Galicia. She was denounced for alleged defeatist remarks about the Germans, who executed her at the Jewish cemetery.¹⁰ In the spring of 1942, about 200 Jews were sent to the nearby town of Frysztak to perform forced labor. The GPK subsequently arrested the families of these Jews in Jasło in July 1942 and shot them in the forest.¹¹

In the summer of 1942, the German authorities began to liquidate the ghettos in Kreis Jasło. On August 18, 1942, Dr. Gentz ordered the Judenrat to assemble the Jews on the Targowica marketplace. At this time, German, Ukrainian, and Polish police had already surrounded the ghetto. As these forces searched the empty ghetto, any Jews that were uncovered were either shot on the spot or escorted to the marketplace. At the Targowica, the Jews were searched for any valuables. A selection was conducted, and about 200 Jews capable of work were sent to one side to assist with cleaning out the ghetto. Those unfit for travel were then loaded onto trucks and taken to the forest of Warzyce to be shot. As the deportation trains had not arrived in time, the remaining 2,000 to 3,000 Jews were escorted up the hill to the monastery of "Wizytka," part of which had been converted into a barracks. One or two days later, these Jews were escorted to the railway station and loaded onto trains destined for the extermination camp in Bełżec together with other Jews from the nearby towns of Frysztak and Żmigród Nowy.¹²

By 1943, only about 100 people were left in the remnant ghetto; they were then sent to a labor camp for Jews in Szebnie.¹³ Some Jews, such as Jakub Herzig, went into hiding or attempted to live on the Aryan side. They had to fear blackmailers or other people who might denounce them, and they could not survive without the assistance of non-Jews. Several people from Jasło have been recognized as Righteous Among the Nations by Yad Vashem for their assistance to Jews, including Helena Kosiba, who helped Jakub Herzig by regularly supplying him with food and helping him to leave Jasło once he had acquired false identification cards.¹⁴

As the Germans prepared for their retreat at the end of 1944, they began to destroy the town systematically. Very little of the town remained when the Red Army captured Jasło in January 1945.

On December 5, 1972, the local court in Arnberg, Germany, passed sentence on three former members of the GPK in Jasło who in 1942–1943 had participated in the persecution and murder of Jews in the town. One of the accused was found not guilty; Walter Augustin received a sentence of two years; and his other co-defendant was sentenced to five and a half years in prison.

SOURCES Information on the persecution and destruction of the Jewish population of Jasło can be found in the following publications: M.N. Even-Hayim, Toldot yebudei Jasło; me-resbit bityashvutam be-tokh ha-ir ad yemei ha-burban al yedei hanatzim . . . (Tel Aviv: Jasło Society, 1953); Jakub O. Herzig, Jasło (Montreal, 1954); Jakub O. Herzig, My Wanderings in the War (Montreal, 1955); Jasło oskarża (Warsaw, 1973); M. Wieliczko, Jasielskie w latach drugiej wojny światowej (Warsaw, 1974); Abraham Wein and Aharon Weiss, eds., Pinkas ha-kehillot. Encyclopaedia of Jewish Communities: Poland, vol. 3, Galicia and Western Silesia (Jerusalem: Yad Vashem, 1984), pp. 207–213; and Jakub O. Herzig, “Jasło: The Birth and Death of a Jewish Community in Poland from its Beginnings to the Holocaust,” translated by Rabbi Leila Berner and published by Adam and Jack Herzig (available at www.shtetlinks.jewishgen.org).

Relevant documentation can be found in the following archives: AŻIH; BA-L (ZStL, II 206 AR-Z 827/63 [B 162/14484]); IPN (ASG, sygn. 58, k. 51); ITS; USHMM (RG-15.073M, reel 1, 222/1, financial register of the Jewish Council in Jasło, 1941–1942; and Acc.1995.A.770); VHF; and YVA.

Alexander Kruglov and Martin Dean
trans. Steven Seegel

NOTES

1. E. Podhorizer-Sandel, “O zagładzie Żydów w dystrykcie krakowskim,” BŻIH, no. 30 (1959): 87–109.

2. BA-L, B-162/14484 (II 206 AR-Z 827/63), verdict of LG-Arns, 6 Ks 4/70, December 5, 1972, pp. 11–13; Dr. Gentz committed suicide in 1967 while under investigation for crimes in Jasło.

3. Herzig, “Jasło: The Birth and Death of a Jewish Community.”

4. Gazeta Żydowska (German newspaper in Polish that served as the propaganda instrument of the German authorities in the Generalgouvernement), December 13, 1940, # 42.

5. Herzig, “Jasło: The Birth and Death of a Jewish Community.”

6. Gazeta Żydowska, December 13, 1940, # 42; USHMM, RG-15.073M, reel 1, 222/1, financial register of the Jewish Council in Jasło, 1941–1942—this register includes expenses for these communal institutions.

7. Martin Weinmann, ed., Das nationalsozialistische Lagersystem (CCP) (Frankfurt am Main: Zweitausendeins, 1990), p. 686; ITS, R 50/Z 55.

8. Herzig, “Jasło: The Birth and Death of a Jewish Community”; BA-L, B-162/14484, verdict of LG-Arns, 6 Ks 4/70, December 5, 1972, pp. 14–15; Czesław Pilichowski et al., eds., Obozy hitlerowskie na ziemiach polskich 1939–1945: Informator encyklopedyczny (Warsaw: PWN, 1979), p. 205.

9. BA-L, B 162/14484, verdict of LG-Arns, 6 Ks 4/70, December 5, 1972, pp. 14–15.

10. Herzig, “Jasło: The Birth and Death of a Jewish Community.”

11. BA-L, B-162/14484, verdict of LG-Arns, 6 Ks 4/70, December 5, 1972, pp. 15–16.

12. Ibid., pp. 22–24; Wieliczko, Jasielskie w latach; USHMM, RG-15.073M, reel 1, 222/1, financial register of the Jewish Council in Jasło, 1941–1942—the last entry is for the end of July 1942.

13. Jasło oskarża, p. 95; Wieliczko, Jasielskie w latach, p. 185.

14. Herzig, “Jasło: The Birth and Death of a Jewish Community”; Israel Gutman, ed., The Encyclopedia of the Righteous among the Nations: Rescuers of Jews during the Holocaust—Poland (Jerusalem: Yad Vashem, 2004), p. 378.

JAWORNIK POLSKI

Pre-1939: Jawornik Polski, village, Rzeszów powiat, Lwów województwo, Poland; 1939–1945: Jawornik, Kreis Reichshof, Distrikt Krakau, Generalgouvernement; post-1998: Jawornik Polski, województwo podkarpackie, Poland

Jawornik Polski is located 35 kilometers (22 miles) southeast of Rzeszów. There were 328 Jews living in Jawornik and its vicinity on the eve of World War II. Several neighboring settlements had an average population of a few dozen Jews.

The Wehrmacht entered Jawornik on September 10, 1939. Wehrmacht forces were permanently stationed in Jawornik due to the presence of Red Army forces just across the San River, following the Soviet invasion of eastern Poland. Wehrmacht officers occupied the town hall, while soldiers were quartered in a barracks built next to it, as well as in private homes.

By the end of 1939, the new authorities had appointed a Jewish Council (Judenrat), with Jakób Schneid as its president and Markus Beck as his deputy.¹

By the end of the summer of 1940, the Reichshof Kreishauptmann had ordered 40 deportees from other parts of Poland to be resettled from Rzeszów to Jawornik. In December 1940, the Jewish community of Jawornik and its vicinity consisted of 350 Jews. This number remained more or less constant, increasing only by another 50 in May 1941. Some of the newcomers were housed outside of Jawornik with the better-off Jewish peasants, mostly comprising holders of small plots in neighboring settlements. Newcomer families were rotated between different households so as to distribute the burden of their care more evenly. A Jewish committee for social aid was set up on the deportees' arrival. In January 1941, its members were Judenrat deputies Markus Beck, Bernard Mohl, Chaim Teitelbaum, Israel Turner, and L. Magiet.²

The committee's aid proved to be inadequate; for example, its expenses for May 1941 show that out of its 137 złoty budget, 90 złoty went towards the salaries of the committee's three paid employees; 12 złoty was spent on office maintenance; and 10 złoty went to office supplies. The remaining 25 złoty is registered as "other expenses." If it were spent on the refugees' needs, it would provide each of them with only 0.50 złoty of aid per person, which at the time could buy only a single meal.

The same month, a branch of the Jewish Social Self-Help (JSS), headquartered in Kraków, was established in Jawornik Polski. A committee including the Judenrat's president Schneid as the chairman, Israel Turner, and Chaim Bessen governed it. The JSS staff was unpaid and was helped by 10 volunteers. The committee never opened a soup kitchen. A little cash, clothing, and groceries (mostly potatoes, flour, and kasha) were dispensed whenever aid was sent by the American Jewish Joint Distribution Committee (AJDC) or the JSS.

Apart from this activity, the Jawornik JSS refused even to attempt to organize any kind of help themselves, not only because of lack of funds but also because its staff was unpaid. In August 1941, when spurred by Kraków to set up a soup kitchen for children, the JSS committee replied that there were "not enough children" in Jawornik. As the community had no access to medical assistance, Kraków offered to send a doctor to visit Jawornik, to which chairman Schneid replied: "[E]veryone is in the best of health, so those doctors do not have to visit us." In March 1942, the chairman again reported no disease among Jawornik's Jews.³

By May 1941, only one Jewish-owned shop remained open; and none of the craftsmen were operating their businesses. Between March 1940 and July 1941, 40 Jews labored permanently either in Jawornik itself or within the gmina's borders. Out of a total of 355 registered members of the Jawornik community, 310 were "without occupation" during this time. Between August and November 1941, only 12 to 13 Jews were laboring. Occasionally, the Germans would request much larger numbers of workers. There is no information as to the nature of their work or its compensation. However, the JSS did not bear any of their labor costs, nor did it provide sustenance for the laborers, as was common in other Jewish communities.⁴

From December 17, 1941, Kreishauptmann Dr. Heinz Ehaus ordered the establishment of Jewish quarters in Kreis Reichshof, setting dates for them to be closed. In Rzeszów, the closing order was effective on January 10, 1942, whereas for the remainder of the Kreis, it was February 1, 1942. Soon after the latter date, Jawornik, or at least that part populated by Jews, was recognized as a ghetto, and the inhabitants were forbidden to leave on pain of death.

By April 1942, land belonging to Jewish peasants in the vicinity had been expropriated. The JSS in Kraków instructed its Jawornik branch to research whether the Jews could be employed in agriculture, but by April 25, 1942, the Kreishauptmann in Rzeszów had ordered all Jews living in the vicinity—approximately 200 people—to resettle within Jawornik's town limits. The number of Jews in the ghetto, however, did not change, as these peasants had been included previously in JSS statistics. As the Judenrat's chairman Schneid put it, the peasants "arrived in such a condition that they were unable to afford even a single breakfast."

Just days later on April 30, 1942, a registration of Jewish men aged 12 to 60 was conducted. A transport of an unspecified number of laborers left Jawornik on May 4, 1942, for the Biesiadka labor camp near Mielec. The Jawornik JSS made an effort to send weekly food packages to the camp.

In Biesiadka, Jews and Poles, separated from each other, were conscripted to cut beech trees for the German Fischer company and assist the Müller company to transport them to Mielec by truck. Jewish laborers were treated as prisoners and worked under the supervision of guards. Kolis, the commander of the Jewish camp in Biesiadka, often shot individual laborers. Laborers received a modest meal before and after work.

Upon the men's departure from Jawornik, a registration of young women was also conducted, and a number of them were tasked with beautifying the village. The few able-bodied men who remained in Jawornik worked on road construction.⁵

The last correspondence concerning the Jawornik JSS is dated May 23, 1942. The ghetto's liquidation took place in late June 1942. A brief description can be found in the Ringelblum Archives, as well as in the Polish Court Inquiry about Executions and Mass Graves of October 1945, although neither document uses the term "ghetto." The Ringelblum Archive states that while collecting the Jews on the market square by chasing them out of their houses, nine Jews were murdered. They were shot by the SS and police at the following locations: on the river bank, in the field, and on and around the market square. Apart from Chaja and Malcia Spiegel, who were both 20 years old, the other victims were 48 to 90 years old. Jewish residents buried the victims in separate graves in the Jewish cemetery. The remaining Jews, including the Judenrat, were sent to the Rzeszów ghetto.⁶

The Jawornik Judenrat is mentioned in another record in the Ringelblum Archives, which refers to overdue taxes that all inhabitants of the Rzeszów ghetto were due to pay by June 26, 1942 (in accordance with a June 19, 1942, order by Kreishauptmann Ehaus). In the evening of June 26, 15 Judenrat members (5 from Rzeszów and 10 from various liquidated ghettos whose residents had just been brought to Rzeszów, including Jawornik) were shot, allegedly for not having paid these overdue taxes.⁷

In July 1942, the Jews of Jawornik, along with other Jews concentrated in the Rzeszów ghetto, were deported to the Bełżec extermination camp.⁸

Six Jews who were discovered in an empty house in Jawornik were reportedly shot in August 1942 by SS and police forces for "hiding from the ghetto." All of them, including the four-person family of the tradesman Mozes Springer and his son's fiancée, were buried at the Jewish cemetery in a mass grave.⁹ On September 13, 1942, German Gendarmes shot five or six Jews in the Wola Rafałowska settlement. The Polish woman Rozalia Socha who had given them shelter was executed in punishment next to her house two months later. On September 16, 1942, the Gestapo shot three Jewish men and also a Pole, Wojciech Patroński, for hiding them. All were murdered in the Buczyzna Forest in the settlement of Szklary. In November 1942, the Germans discovered a bunker occupied by Jews hiding in the forest of Handle Szklarskie. A captured Jewish woman reportedly gave away the names of nine Poles who had helped the fugitives. In all, nine Poles and seven Jews were shot.¹⁰

SOURCES Brief descriptions and references can be found in the following publications: Andrzej Potocki, Żydzi w Podkarpaciu (Rzeszów: Libra, 2004), pp. 71–72; and Abraham Wein and Aharon Weiss, eds., Pinkas ha-kehillot. Encyclopaedia of Jewish Communities: Poland, vol. 3, Galicia and Western Silesia (Jerusalem: Yad Vashem, 1984), pp. 206–207; Stanisław Poradowski, “Zagłada Żydów rzeszowskich,” pt. 3, BŻIH, nos. 3–4 (1985) and pt. 4, BŻIH, nos. 1–2 (1988).

Relevant archival information can be found in AŻIH (Ring I/472; 211/475 [JSS]; and 210/380 [AJDC]); IPN (ASG); and USHMM (RG-15.019M [ASG]; Acc.1997.A.0124 [JSS]; Acc.1999.A.0154 [AJDC]; and RG-15.079M [Ring I/472, also as ARG I/1/35, DVD 2]).

Jolanta Kraemer

NOTES

1. USHMM, Acc.1997.A.0124 (JSS), reel 26, 211/475, pp. 1, 9.
2. Ibid., Acc.1999.A.0154 (AJDC), 210/380 (Jawornik Polski), pp. 2–3; Acc.1997.A.0124 (JSS), reel 26, 211/475, pp. 1, 22, 58.
3. Ibid., Acc.1997.A.0124 (JSS), reel 26, 211/475, pp. 1, 4, 7–10, 35, 53, 58.
4. Ibid., pp. 9–10, 24, 36, 39.
5. Gazeta Żydowska, June 26, 1942; and USHMM, Acc.1997.A.0124 (JSS), reel 26, 211/475, pp. 57–58, 60.
6. USHMM, RG-15.079M (ARG I/1/35), p. 7; RG-15.019M (ASG), reel 11, pp. 594–595; and Acc.1997.A.0124 (JSS), reel 26, 211/475, p. 61.
7. Ibid., RG-15.079M (ARG I/1/35), p. 5.
8. Poradowski, “Zagłada Żydów rzeszowskich,” pt. 3, p. 99.
9. USHMM, RG-15.019M (ASG), reel 11, p. 593.
10. Ministerstwo Sprawiedliwości, Główna Komisja Badania Zbrodni Hitlerowskich w Polsce, Rejestr miejsc i faktów zbrodni popełnionych przez okupanta hitlerowskiego na ziemiach polskich w latach 1939–1945: Województwo rzeszowskie (Warsaw, 1984), p. 185; Poradowski, “Zagłada Żydów rzeszowskich,” pt. 4, pp. 103–104; Potocki, Żydzi w Podkarpaciu, p. 72.

JEDLICZE

Pre-1939: Jedlicze, village, Lwów województwo, Poland; 1939–1945: initially Kreis Jasło then Kreis Krosno, Distrikt Krakau, Generalgouvernement; post-1998: województwo podkarpackie, Poland

Jedlicze is located about 140 kilometers (87 miles) east-southeast of Kraków. In 1921, there were 232 Jews living in Jedlicze.

Following the German occupation of the village in September 1939, Jews were forced to clean the Wehrmacht’s stables and quarters—the latter situated in a local school. They were “paid a few cents” for their work. According to survivor Bernice Feit, during Rosh Hashanah in 1939, the Gestapo raided the village, conducting strip-searches of women as they searched for hidden valuables. It was on this occasion that the Germans burned all the books in the synagogue.¹

Other survivors, however, emphasize that the occupation of Jedlicze was largely peaceful. Henry Adler stated that thanks to his cousin’s familiarity with the Gestapo men who oversaw Jedlicze, through “business transactions and bribery . . . [it was possible to ensure that] nobody touched the town.” Jewish stores were closed. Regular searches of Jewish houses were conducted, but in most instances, the occupants remained unharmed.²

A Judenrat chaired by Izrael Lambik was set up at the beginning of 1940; Szymon Friss, a refugee from Katowice, replaced him in the summer of 1942.

By May 1940, there were 300 Jews (75 families) in Jedlicze, including 27 refugees from Germany and Upper Silesia.³

More refugees arrived from Kraków in the summer of 1940. By mid-September of that year, they were the largest group of newcomers, totaling 65 persons. Lambik described the group as follows: “Nearly all of them are in need of relief, because the rich would not come to such a small place.” By February 1941, there was a total of 385 Jews in Jedlicze. In April 1941, the Judenrat reported to Kraków “that due to the deportations from Jasło, we are experiencing a great population influx, such that we cannot cope.”⁴

The date on which Jedlicze’s ghetto was established is not known. Unfenced, it remained open to the extent that its inhabitants did not feel restrained. Survivor Menasche Wolf describes the situation in 1941 as follows: “We lived in the same houses. There were no restrictions so to speak . . . like ghettos, but we were confined to our houses. . . . They managed without doing anything, still to keep you in the house [such that you did] not go too far.” A Jewish police force was organized.⁵

A children’s day-care service was opened on August 1, 1940. The Gazeta Żydowska reported that in the summer of 1941, two teachers were instructing all 60 children “in accordance with the program of the public school in Jasło,” as well as providing limited food rations.⁶

Throughout the town’s occupation, up to 50 men aged 16 to 50 regularly had to perform forced labor. Many labored in an oil refinery on the outskirts of Jedlicze. Others walked daily 10 kilometers (6 miles) to Krosno to build the Sanok-Jasło road or dig ditches for electricity and water pipes at a military airfield in Krosno. A column of laborers would leave at 5:00 A.M. every day, only to return in the evening. After the Germans constructed barracks at the airfield sometime in 1941, laborers remained there permanently and consequently were not allowed even to visit Jedlicze. In August 1941, 20 men were reported as laboring outside the gmina.⁷

In July 1941, a branch of the Jewish Social Self-Help (JSS) was set up in Jedlicze with the Judenrat chairman Izrael

Lambik as president. It also included Józef Reiss (deputy) and Samuel Felber. Shortly thereafter, the JSS opened a soup kitchen; however it was repeatedly closed due to insufficient funds. The JSS branch itself was closed in September 1941. Its members continued to work unofficially, but with little efficacy. In August 1941, there were 485 Jews living in Jedlicze.⁸

The Kreishauptmann ordered the concentration of the rural Jews of the Kreis in towns and ghettos by June 24, 1942. According to the Krosno JSS, 120 Jews from the Chorkówka collective gmina were given only one hour on this day to pack their belongings for resettlement to the Jedlicze ghetto. Survivor Stephen Feld recalls, however, that residents of other settlements were notified by the Judenrat's chairman, who went around informing all Jewish inhabitants that they had three days to transfer to Jedlicze. The newcomers were placed with the town's Jewish families and in the synagogue.⁹

The last information on the number of ghetto residents is from the July 1, 1942, issue of Gazeta Żydowska, reporting a population of 512 Jews, including 210 deportees to Jedlicze. One week later, the same source reported that a total of 170 Jews had been resettled to Jedlicze. At this time, 35 children were being taught Hebrew, Judaism, arithmetic, and bookkeeping.¹⁰

Using the false pretext of labor registration, the Germans rounded up Jedlicze's Jewish population and liquidated the ghetto—most likely—in the first half of August 1942. In the night preceding the liquidation, German and Ukrainian forces surrounded the village. The following morning, the Jewish Police helped to gather ghetto residents on the market square. Each person was allowed to take up to 10 kilograms (22 pounds) of luggage. Old people were then rounded up to be shot. Women, children, and those who could not present an Arbeitskarte (work card) were held at the market, then loaded onto wagons and taken to the Krosno ghetto.¹¹

Among the 80 people who were spared from deportation to work in the oil refinery were the new Judenrat chairman Friss and his wife. After another selection was conducted later that day, only 40 men and 3 women with children remained. They were given two large houses in which to live. Only those Jews working in the refinery could stay there; however, several escapees hid in the attic. After a surprise search by the Gestapo, refinery laborers “got scared because they endangered them.” In December 1942, the remaining laborers were informed by the Germans that they would be evicted and placed in another home; in fact, all were deported to the Rzeszów ghetto.¹²

SOURCES Andrzej Potocki, Podkarpackie judaica (Brzozów: Związek Gmin Brzozowskich i Muzeum Regionalne PTTK im. Adama Fastnachta w Brzozowie, 1993), p. 35, states that all but 40 Jews were deported on July 7, 1941, to the Jasło ghetto. None of the sources used in this entry confirm such an early date for the transfer of the community.

The following archival sources were used to prepare this entry: AŻIH (210/381 [AJDC]; 211/477, 211/615 [JSS]; 301/1373 [Relacje]; USHMM (Acc.1999.A.0154 [AJDC]; Acc.1997.A.0124 [JSS]); and VHF (# 7037, 24020, 25078, 34731, 34789).

Jolanta Kraemer

NOTES

1. VHF, # 7037, testimony of Bernice Feit, 1995.
2. Ibid., # 24020, testimony of Henry Adler, 1996; and # 34789, testimony of Menasche Wolf, 1997.
3. USHMM, Acc.1999.A.0154 (AJDC), 210/381 (Jedlicze), pp. 1–3, 5; Gazeta Żydowska, July 14, 1941; AŻIH, 301/1373, testimony of Rena Kant, 1946.
4. USHMM, Acc.1997.A.0124 (JSS), 211/477 (Jedlicze), pp. 6, 26, 33; Acc.1999.A.0154, 210/381, pp. 9, 12, 21–22.
5. AŻIH, 301/1373; VHF, # 34789.
6. USHMM, Acc.1997.A.0124, 211/477, p. 40.
7. VHF, # 34789; and # 24020; USHMM, Acc.1997.A.0124, 211/477, pp. 17, 30, 53.
8. Gazeta Żydowska, July 14, 1941; USHMM, Acc.1997.A.0124, 211/477, pp. 38, 41, 50, 53, 59, 66, 68, 72.
9. USHMM, Acc.1997.A.0124, 211/615 (Krosno), p. 52; VHF, # 7037.
10. Gazeta Żydowska, July 1 and July 8, 1942.
11. VHF, # 34731, testimony of Stephen Feld, 1997; AŻIH, 301/1373.
12. VHF, # 25078, testimony of Mala Niewodowski, 1996; and # 24020; AŻIH, 301/1373.

JODŁOWA

Pre-1939: Jodłowa, village, Kraków województwo, Poland; 1939–1945: Jodłowa, Kreis Jasło, Distrikt Krakau, Generalgouvernement; post-1998: Jodłowa, województwo podkarpackie, Poland

Jodłowa is located 29 kilometers (18 miles) southeast of Tarnów. There were 301 Jews living in Jodłowa in 1921.

After the German occupation, a Jewish Council (Judenrat) was established in Jodłowa at the beginning of 1940. Salamon Kanarek served as its chairman and Abraham Pariser as his deputy. In November 1940, there were 30 refugees from Kraków and Łódź in the village. By February 1941 the number of refugees had risen to 50. They were housed with local Jews, 1 to 2 persons per family. The total number of Jewish families in Jodłowa stood at 72. A self-help committee that the Jasło Judenrat had ordered to be established in Jodłowa was at this time “closed.”¹

According to survivor Jack Pariser, no Germans were permanently stationed in the village, and a unit of Polish (Blue) Police maintained order. The community was usually aware of German visits, as the Jews had to provide laborers or money. During one of the first raids, Jodłowa's Jews were forced to remove the Torah from the synagogue and walk on it. Jewish businesses were confiscated, but a majority of the Jews were engaged in agriculture and were able to keep their land and livestock until the very end. Pariser stated that with the exception of a few punitive Aktions the Jews lived peacefully in Jodłowa until the summer of 1942.²

Mieczysław Wieliczko, historian of Kreis Jasło, established that the process of ghettoization in the Kreis was completed in 1941. One of the ghettos created around that time was in Jodłowa. The open ghetto most likely included the village square and remained unguarded and unfenced.

A branch of the Jewish Social Self-Help (JSS) was established in the village on July 21, 1941. Its three members were: the Judenrat chairman Kanarek, a teacher Manes Guttman (deputy), and Salamon Kohn. Guttman was in charge of child care. At that time, there were 120 Jewish children aged 1 to 18. Of that number, 50 (aged 6 to 14) were selected for child care—that is, additional food, physical education, singing, needlework, and some form of education “to prevent illiteracy.” A Dr. Laja was employed by the Judenrat to attend to the children’s medical needs. In the summer of 1941, a soup kitchen was opened in Jodłowa.³ The JSS branch was closed again by September 15, 1941, due to “minimal” activity.⁴

In September 1941, there were 345 Jews in Jodłowa. The community was vaccinated for typhus at this time.⁵

As reported by A. Rubin, in February and March 1942, a number of men were selected for labor camps in Mielec and Pustków. Survivor Jakób Schenker testified that in June 1942, 50 men were sent to the latter.⁶

According to child survivor Regina Rueck (born 1935), her family and possibly a number of other Jodłowa Jews were deported to the Brzostek ghetto, most likely in 1942. They were allowed to take clothing and bedding and were quartered in Brzostek’s synagogue.⁷

Most sources date the ghetto’s liquidation on August 12, 1942.⁸ On August 11, SS troops came to the village and paid a short visit to the Polish (Blue) Police. The Polish policemen warned the Jewish community that the Germans planned to shoot all of them on the following day, after reporting to the village square for supposed transfer to a larger ghetto. News spread among the families who lived around the square, as well as to those who lived outside the Jewish quarter. Survivors Schenker and Pariser estimate that over 100 Jews escaped that night; close to 30 survived the war.⁹

In the course of the liquidation, 21 to 25 Jews were shot at various points in the village en route to the place of execution. Another 160 to 180 people were taken to a forest next to the village of Przeczyca and shot.¹⁰ Members of the Baudienst (Construction Service) in Jasło were forced to dig the graves for Jodłowa’s Jews. Two witnesses from among this group (Jan Rączka and Władysław M.) testified that the victims were led in groups of 10 to the grave and forced to undress. Standing by the grave, they were shot one by one in the back of the head.¹¹

SOURCES The following sources include references to the destruction of Jodłowa’s Jewish community: Mieczysław Wieliczko, Jasielskie w latach drugiej wojny światowej (Warsaw: Wydawnictwo Ministerstwa Obrony Narodowej, 1974), pp. 131, 148, 182–184; Andrzej Potocki, Żydzi w Podkarpaciu (Rzeszów: Libra, 2004), pp. 73–74; Czesław Czubyrt-Borkowski, ed., Przewodnik po upamiętnionych miejscach walk i męczeństwa: Lata wojny 1939–1945 (Warsaw: Sport i Turystyka, 1980), p. 482; and Arnon Rubin, The Rise and Fall of the Jewish Communities in Poland and Their Relics Today, vol. 3, District Krakow (Tel Aviv: Tel Aviv University Press, 2008), pp. 195–196.

The following archival sources were used to prepare this entry: AŻIH (210/387, 211/472, 211/495, 301/1694, 301/1778, 301/4697, 301/7164); IPN-Rz (OKBZH-Rz, 549); USHMM

(Acc.1997.A.0124 [JSS]; Acc.1999.A.0154 [AJDC]; RG-15.019M [Court inquiries about executions and mass graves in districts, provinces, camps, and ghettos]; RG-50.493*0107); and VHF (# 9514).

Jolanta Kraemer

NOTES

1. Gazeta Żydowska, September 5, 1941; USHMM, Acc. 1997.A.0124 (JSS), 211/495 (Jodłowa), p. 1; Acc.1999.A.0154 (AJDC), 210/387 (Jodłowa), p. 1; VHF, # 9514, testimony of Jack Pariser, 1995; USHMM, RG-50.493*0107 (testimony of Jack Pariser).

2. Rose Pariser Schwartz testimony (HRC-1043), in Joseph J. Preil, ed., Holocaust Testimonies: European Survivors and American Liberators in New Jersey (New Brunswick, NJ: Rutgers University Press, 2001), p. 112; VHF, # 9514; USHMM, RG-50.493*0107.

3. USHMM, Acc.1997.A.0124, 211/495, pp. 2, 5–7, 11–12, 15, 29–30, 32.

4. Ibid., p. 19; Acc.1997.A.0124, 211/472 (Jasło), p. 36.

5. Gazeta Żydowska, September 5, 1941; USHMM, Acc. 1997.A.0124, 211/495, p. 13.

6. AŻIH, 301/1694, testimony of Jakób Schenker, n.d.

7. Ibid., 301/4697, testimony of Regina Rueck, 1945.

8. Other sources date the liquidation in July 1942; e.g., Rejestr miejsc i faktów zbrodni popełnionych przez okupanta hitlerowskiego na ziemiach polskich w latach 1939–1945: Województwo tarnowskie (Warsaw: GKBZHP, 1984), pp. 96–98, dates the liquidation of the ghetto on July 16, 1942; Potocki, Żydzi w Podkarpaciu, pp. 73–74, on July 1, 1942.

9. VHF, # 9514; AŻIH, 301/1694; USHMM, RG-50.493*0107.

10. USHMM, RG-15.019M (Court inquiries about executions and mass graves in districts, provinces, camps, and ghettos), reel 10, sygn. 10, p. 179 (Przeczyca) and p. 186 (Jodłowa).

11. AŻIH, 301/7164, testimony of Jan Rączka, 1993; and 301/1778, testimony of Chaim Spett, 1946; excerpts of testimony by Władysław M., in Stanisław Zabierowski, Rzeszowskie pod okupacją hitlerowską (Warsaw: Książka i Wiedza, 1975), pp. 183–185; IPN-Rz, OKBZH-Rz, 549, zeznania Stanisława Janigi, pp. 107–108, as cited in Elżbieta Rączy, Pomoc Polaków dla ludności żydowskiej na Rzeszowszczyźnie, 1939–1945 (Rzeszów: Instytut Pamięci Narodowej-Komisja Ścigania Zbrodni przeciwko Narodowi Polskiemu, 2008), pp. 152–153.

KALWARIA ZEBRZYDOWSKA

Pre-1939: Kalwaria Zebrzydowska, town, Kraków województwo, Poland; 1939–1945: Kreis Krakau-Land, and Distrikt Krakau, Generalgouvernement; post-1998: województwo małopolskie, Poland

Kalwaria Zebrzydowska is located about 32 kilometers (20 miles) southwest of Kraków. There were approximately 700 Jews living in Kalwaria Zebrzydowska on the eve of World War II.¹ Fleeing the Germans’ advance in September 1939, most of the Jews sought shelter in Mielec and Lwów. Those who returned shortly afterwards found their homes destroyed and stores robbed.

VOLUME II: PART A

A Volksdeutscher (ethnic German) and local pharmacy owner named Kunze was appointed as the town's Kommissar. Soon afterwards, Kalwaria's Jews were forbidden to travel without a permit, even to nearby Kraków, where many of them conducted trade. Then their businesses were taken over by German trustees, while Jews, according to the local Jewish Council (Judenrat), were "prohibited to engage in any trade or craft." Nonetheless, records show that 17 craftsmen were permitted to run their workshops and also to employ an additional 10 Jews.

Either in late 1939 or early 1940, a German Stadtkommisar, Leopold Holtz, who was an elderly war veteran and invalid, replaced Kunze. Despite his hostility to the Jews, Holtz was—as one of the survivors described it—"open to bribery"—"everything had a price." Due to bribes, the community was allowed to bake matzot and sell it; such payments were likewise mandatory for the reception of food rations, to which the town's Jewish inhabitants were already entitled.²

Kraków's Kreishauptmann ordered the creation of a 12-member Judenrat in February 1940. The only two known names are those of the chairman, Baruch Rand, and his deputy, Dr. J. Breit, who most likely joined the Judenrat in 1941.³

The local court's prison was located at 9 Mickiewicz Street, where it held prisoners from Kalwaria and Skawina for short periods. There were also German policemen, Gendarmes, and Wehrmacht personnel, as well as a Polish (Blue) Police detachment stationed in Kalwaria.

By August 1940, a large number of refugees had arrived in Kalwaria, many from Kraków and Miłówka.

That summer, 70 Jews worked in road construction. On average, a total of 140 Jews labored on roads throughout 1940, 40 of them in Kalwaria itself and the remainder in its vicinity.

A school for young children opened in 1940, where a Hebrew teacher taught classes both in Hebrew and Polish.⁴

By March 1941, a clinic supervised by Dr. Breit was constructed on the premises of the Judenrat's headquarters at 9 Zebrzydowice Street. Breit also supervised a sanitation committee charged with the improvement of flats and yards. Although tuberculosis was on the rise in the first months of 1942, there were no reports of other contagious diseases in Kalwaria. Severely sick Jews were treated in the hospital of the Banifratrów Monastery in Kalwaria. It was at this time that the Judenrat operated a soup kitchen for the poor and refugees.⁵

On April 4, 1941, Kraków's Kreishauptmann Höller announced a list of towns and gminas where Jews were allowed to live; Kalwaria was one of them. The original deadline for resettlement—April 25, 1941—was delayed until May 18, 1941, and Jewish farmers were excluded.

An unknown number of Jews from Kalwaria's vicinity responded to the resettlement order and moved to Kalwaria, where they were housed en masse.⁶ The newcomers were mainly residents of the villages of Zebrzydowice and Brody. Upon their arrival, Holtz imposed further restrictions on Jewish residence in Kalwaria. All those Jews living along the main streets with windows overlooking the street had to move to apartments facing the backyards or onto side streets.⁷ At the end of May 1941, 1,069 Jews were registered in Kalwaria.⁸

During the second half of 1941, the town's Jews were permitted to walk the streets of Kalwaria for only two hours a day. Soon afterwards, a curfew was imposed, and all roads were closed to the Jews. To maintain communal contacts, they created passageways through the courtyards from house to house.

As it was probably never officially declared, the date of the ghetto's establishment is unknown; however, according to survivor Israel Scharf, going to the villages in 1941 to buy food meant "risking [one's] life," because "the minute that you pass beyond the town's perimeters, the Polish Police shot right away." He further claims that several Jews were shot for leaving the town.⁹ Another survivor, Leon Ebel, however, recalls taking off his armband and going to nearby Brzeźnica by bike to obtain food but does not mention any danger involved in leaving Kalwaria.¹⁰

By May 1941, 42 Jews from Kalwaria had been sent to the Pustków labor camp. Another 70 labored in the vicinity, and approximately 50 in Kalwaria proper worked on pulling down old houses. The number of Jews the local Arbeitsamt required for labor changed frequently, as did their assignments; for example, by autumn 1941 most of the women aged 12 to 45 and men aged 12 to 60 were employed as seasonal laborers in agriculture on surrounding estates.¹¹

On July 1, 1941, a branch of Kraków's Jewish Social Self-Help (JSS) was established in Kalwaria to take over the provision of welfare from the Judenrat. The Judenrat president, Rauch, chaired the committee together with Dr. Breit and a man named Ohrenstein.¹² With diminishing resources, the soup kitchen was soon serving approximately 200 meals a day and was thereby forced to cancel free meals and charge everyone. Soon afterwards, a tax was introduced on the ghetto inmates, as voluntary donations had dried up.

By October 1941, the JSS had opened a so-called garden for poor children aged 6 to 12. It was located on the premises of the ambulatory; the latter was soon transferred to the premises of the Judenrat. Activities were organized for about 80 children for three hours a day.¹³ By the end of January 1942, the number of ghetto inhabitants had risen slightly to 1,093. Records show that all laborers had returned from the labor camps, resulting in a total of 250 Jews employed in Kalwaria.

The date of the Germans' order for the transfer of Jewish farmers to Kalwaria is unknown; according to Leon Ebel, who moved there from Brzeźnica, it occurred at the beginning of 1942.

According to Scharf, the situation of Kalwaria's Jews changed in March 1942, when "Jewish labor became a hot item" and German companies were in constant search of free Jewish labor. At this time, Kalwaria's Jews were being rounded up, jailed for a short time, and then sent to build the Płaszów labor camp. Those who could find employment in Kalwaria were, in theory, exempted. By mid-August 1942, an estimated 100 Jews had been sent to Płaszów in three separate transports; it is known that the June transport consisted of 60 Jews. The local community was charged with providing the laborers with food and clothing.¹⁴

On Kommissar Holtz's orders the Jewish Police (Jüdischer Ordnungsdienst) was set up either at the end of June or the beginning of July 1942.¹⁵

In the first days of August 1942, Holtz informed the ghetto residents that they would be resettled to a work camp in two or three weeks. Having heard about similar reports from other towns, the Jews became suspicious of the Germans' plans.¹⁶ Other sources suggest that the community paid a contribution to try to prevent their deportation.¹⁷

On August 12, 1942, the Germans liquidated the Kalwaria Zebrzydowska ghetto, taking up to 1,000 Jews (among them a large number of refugees) to the Skawina ghetto. The latter was liquidated in turn on August 29–30, with most of the inhabitants being sent to the Bełżec extermination camp, while some able-bodied individuals were transferred to the Płaszów labor camp; the Germans separated out the elderly and children in Skawina and shot them in a nearby forest. About 550 of Kalwaria Zebrzydowska's Jews died in the Holocaust.¹⁸

SOURCES The fate of the Jewish community in Kalwaria Zebrzydowska is mentioned in the following publications: Abraham Wein and Aharon Weiss, eds., Pinkas ha-kehillot. Encyclopaedia of Jewish Communities: Poland, vol. 3, Galicia and Western Silesia (Jerusalem: Yad Vashem, 1984), pp. 315–318; Shmuel Spector and Geoffrey Wigoder, eds., The Encyclopedia of Jewish Life before and during the Holocaust (Jerusalem: Yad Vashem; New York: New York University Press, 2001), pp. 589–590; E. Podhorizer-Sandel, "O zagładzie żydów w dystrykcie krakowskim," BŻIH, no. 30 (1959): 87–109, here p. 92; and Gazeta Żydowska (1941–1942).

The following archival sources were used in preparing this entry: AŻIH (301/599 [Relacje] and 211/505 [JSS]); USHMM (Acc.1997.A.0124 [JSS], reel 27 [Kalwaria Zebrzydowska]); and VHF (# 2480, 11651, and 17120).

Jolanta Kraemer

NOTES

1. USHMM, Acc.1997.A.0124 (JSS), reel 27, 211/505, p. 2.
2. VHF, # 17120, testimony of Israel Scharf, 1996; USHMM, Acc.1997.A.0124, reel 27, 211/505, pp. 1–2.
3. Gazeta Żydowska, May 13, 1941; USHMM, Acc.1997.A.0124, reel 27, 211/505, p. 30.
4. USHMM, Acc.1997.A.0124, reel 27, 211/505, pp. 1–3.
5. Ibid., pp. 2, 40–41; Gazeta Żydowska, May 13 and June 24, 1941.
6. Gazeta Żydowska, May 23, 1941.
7. Ibid., June 24, 1941; VHF, # 17120.
8. USHMM, Acc.1997.A.0124, reel 27, 211/505, p. 2.
9. VHF, # 17120.
10. Ibid., # 11651, testimony of Leon Ebel, 1996.
11. Ibid., # 17120; Gazeta Żydowska, June 24, August 29, and September 28, 1941, and January 9, 1942; USHMM, Acc.1997.A.0124, reel 27, 211/505, pp. 2–3.
12. Gazeta Żydowska, July 25, 1941, and January 9, 1942; USHMM, Acc.1997.A.0124, reel 27, 211/505, pp. 1–3.
13. Gazeta Żydowska, July 21 and November 9, 1941, and January 9, 1942.

14. VHF, # 17120; # 11651; Gazeta Żydowska, July 5 and August 12, 1942; USHMM, Acc.1997.A.0124, reel 27, 211/505, p. 57.

15. Gazeta Żydowska, July 5, 1942.

16. VHF, # 17120.

17. Ibid., # 2480, testimony of Dorothy Fields, 1995.

18. AŻIH, 301/599, testimony of Zofia Głowacka Hradowa, 1945.

KAŃCZUGA

Pre-1939: Kańczuga, town, Lwów województwo, Poland; 1939–1945: Kanczuga, Kreis Jaroslau, Distrikt Krakau, Generalgouvernement; post-1998: Kańczuga, województwo podkarpackie, Poland

Kańczuga is located 40 kilometers (25 miles) northwest of Przemyśl. There were 948 Jews living there in 1939.

On occupation, Kańczuga's Jews received German permission to remain in their town, while many other communities in the vicinity were forced to relocate to the Soviet-occupied regions of Poland. In June 1941, the Kańczuga branch of the Jewish Social Self-Help (JSS) reported 810 Jewish residents.¹

Jews living in 11 nearby villages were part of the collective community called Kańczuga-Land (Kańczuga-wieś), with headquarters in Żuklin, located less than 2 kilometers (1.2 miles) from Kańczuga. Sometime before 1941, 250 members of this predominantly farming community were stripped of their land. Their Judenrat, chaired by a man named Mörsel, continually requested JSS assistance, emphasizing that Kańczuga-Land was "entirely separate" from Kańczuga. In its last letter to the JSS headquarters in Kraków, dated October 2, 1941, the community was reportedly caring for 18 refugees.²

In May 1942, the Kańczuga JSS described the situation as follows: "Since January 1942, the Jews in the Kreis are restricted in their movement. One must not leave [Kańczuga] and as a result the situation of our community has worsened by 100 percent." Survivor Moses Zellerkraut also noted in his brief testimony that "the Jews cannot leave the town."³

The ban on Jewish freedom of movement in and out of Kańczuga meant that, in effect, an open ghetto was established, bounded by the town's limits; this reflected also the general pattern of ghetto establishment in Kreis Jaroslau during the course of 1941–1942. According to Sefer Lantsut, the head of Kreis Jaroslau, Georg Eisenlohr, issued an order on December 18, 1941, forbidding the Jews from leaving their places of domicile on pain of death. "Domicile" was defined as an urban or rural community, a village, or lodging place. The order went into effect on January 1, 1942. It is very likely that the Kańczuga-Land community was transferred to Kańczuga town, as it was common procedure to concentrate the rural Jewish population in nearby towns; however, no archival documentation could be located to confirm this. In October 1941, the Kańczuga JSS issued its final report, giving the Jewish population as 808 residents. This record was made several months before the likely transfer of the Kańczuga-Land Jews.⁴

There is a little information available on the fate of Kańczuga's Jews during the occupation. Most of them occupied Węgierska, Świętej Barbary, and Długa Streets. Szmiel Westreich was the chairman of the Judenrat. Westreich also chaired the JSS branch set up in December 1940, which also included Abraham Turm (secretary) and Aron Freund. The JSS office was located on 79 Długa Street. In mid-September 1941, 17 Jews were rounded up and transferred to the police prison in Jarosław.⁵

During 1940–1941, there were only three cases of typhus registered. In March 1942, the community was vaccinated for typhus. There was no Jewish doctor in Kańczuga. As of May 1942, 60 Jews were employed in nearby Przeworsk; each day they would return for the night to Kańczuga.⁶

Survivor Jakub Kesstecher, who moved to Kańczuga in June 1942, testified that there were three large expropriations imposed prior to the liquidation of the community. In July 1942, the Germans began issuing Jewish identity stamps. Only those who received special stamps were to be spared from deportation. At first 350 documents were stamped, yet a subsequent registration reduced the number to 100. After the last registration, conducted on July 28, 1942, only four families were permitted to stay in Kańczuga.⁷

Secondary sources report that Kańczuga's liquidation took place on either August 1 or 8, 1942. According to Kesstecher, the community was deported to a transit camp in Pełkinie, where a number of men were selected for labor camps, children and the elderly were shot, and the remainder were sent to the Bełżec extermination camp. Kesstecher, however, does not mention the murder of 246 Jews at the community cemetery in Siedlecza (3 kilometers [1.9 miles] south of Kańczuga), as noted by other primary sources. This may be because the shooting, which took place over three days (around August 12), was conducted after the departure of most of the Jews to Pełkinie. Prior to their execution, Jews were held in an unfinished synagogue in Kańczuga. There were also 20 Jews registered as shot between August and October 1942. The bodies were buried in a private garden on Węgierska Street.⁸

SOURCES The following publications were used to prepare this entry: Fay Walker and Leo Rosen, Hidden: A Sister and Brother in Nazi Poland (Madison: University of Wisconsin Press, 2002), pp. 51–149; and N. Kudish and M. Walzer-Fass, eds., Sefer Lantsut (Tel Aviv: Irgune yots'e Lantsut be-Yisrael uve-Artsot ha-Berit, 1963), pp. xxxiv–xxxix.

The following archival sources refer to the fate of the Jewish community in Kańczuga during the Holocaust: AŻIH (301/4922, 301/4955); and USHMM (Acc.1997.A.0124 [JSS], 211/523–524; RG-15.019M [ASG]; RG-02.050).

Jolanta Kraemer

NOTES

1. USHMM, Acc.1997.A.0124 (JSS), 211/523 (Kańczuga), pp. 1–3; RG-02.050 (Fay Walker), “My memories, 1939–1945 testimony.”

2. Ibid., Acc.1997.A.0124, 211/524 (Kańczuga—wieś z siedzibą w Żuklinie), pp. 1, 5–6, 8, 11, 14.

3. Ibid., Acc.1997.A.0124, 211/523, p. 51; AŻIH, 301/4955, testimony of Moses Zellerkraut, 1945.

4. USHMM, Acc.1997.A.0124, 211/523, p. 33.

5. Ibid., pp. 1–3, 16, 23; AŻIH, 301/4955.

6. USHMM, Acc.1997.A.0124, 211/523, pp. 46, 51.

7. AŻIH, 301/4922, testimony of Jakub Kesstecher, 1945.

8. Ibid.; USHMM, RG-15.019M (ASG), reel 11, file 511 (Kańczuga); and file 513 (Siedlecza); Rejestr miejsc i faktów zbrodni popełnionych przez okupanta hitlerowskiego na ziemiach polskich w latach 1939–1945: Województwo przemyskie (Warsaw: GKBZHWP, 1983), pp. 45–46.

KOŁACZYCE

Pre-1939: Kołaczyce (Yiddish: Koloshtitz), village, Kraków województwo, Poland; 1939–1945: Kolaczyce, Kreis Jasło, Distrikt Krakau, Generalgouvernement; post-1998: Kołaczyce, województwo podkarpackie, Poland

Kołaczyce is located 10 kilometers (6 miles) north of Jasło. The Jewish community occupied a southern neighborhood of the town called Blich (Beilich). According to the archives of the Jewish Social Self-Help (JSS), 203 Jews were residing there on the outbreak of World War II.¹

The first chairman of the Judenrat (Jewish Council), established in December 1939, is unknown. Survivor Felicia Passal wrote in her memoir that in 1941 her brother, Itzek Fessel (22 years old), chaired the Judenrat.²

The Jews assigned for forced labor would pick up tools each morning from the Judenrat and return them upon completion of their labor. In August 1941, the daily quota of laborers was 25.

A six-man Jewish Police unit was organized. One of its assignments was to supervise Jewish labor. There was also a five-man Polish (Blue) Police unit supervised by the German Schutzpolizei.³

In January 1941, after the Kreishauptmann announced the transfer of a number of deportees to Kołaczyce from Kraków, the Judenrat requested the assistance of the American Jewish Joint Distribution Committee (AJDC). Kołaczyce's Jews had to convert their Bet Midrash into living quarters for the newcomers.⁴

According to Mieczysław Wieliczko, historian of Kreis Jasło, the process of ghettoization in the Kreis was completed in 1941. One of the ghettos established around that time was in Kołaczyce. The date when Jews from surrounding villages were ordered into the ghetto is unknown, but this transfer included Jewish residents of Sowin and, most likely, also Bieździedza.

Sowin Jews were given 24 hours to move into the ghetto. Survivor Thelma Krugman testified that the Germans designated a small area for the ghetto. Her grandfather committed suicide, as he did not want to move there. Krugman's large family was unable to find housing within the ghetto and received German permission to live outside of its limits in a rented house that was a 10-minute walk from the ghetto. Krugman recalls that one person from each family was forced to report to the Judenrat regularly for assignment to forced labor, which usually consisted of street cleaning.

Up to 14 Jews were executed for leaving the ghetto without permission, probably just before its liquidation in August 1942.⁵

Sowin native Genia Krüger (born 1935), whose family was one of those transferred to Kołaczyce, testified: “The Germans would come to the ghetto every week, take away 10 Jews and order the Jews to give them a lot of money [for ransom]. When people did not have the money, they would kill them [the hostages], or they would take the money and kill them anyway.” On those occasions, the Germans would gather all the Jews and usually order them to sweep the streets.⁶

On July 21, 1941, a branch of the JSS was established in Kołaczyce with Isak Boryl (chairman), Lipa Sperber (deputy), and Bernard Silber.

According to a Judenrat census, the community numbered 298 Jews—including 82 deportees—in August 1941. Out of eight pre-war workshops, only four were still operating (two glaziers, a tailor, and a maker of the upper parts for shoes). According to the Judenrat, a soup kitchen was operating from April 1 until June 25, 1941, and again from August 15, serving 120 breakfasts and dinners. One of the Kraków deportees, Henryk Blunstein, however, reported to the JSS headquarters in Kraków in September 1941 that no soup kitchen had yet been opened in the village. The JSS branch in Kołaczyce was liquidated by the officials in Kraków on September 15, 1941, and all its members were dismissed. Nevertheless, the JSS archives show two transfers (October 4 and 15, 1941) for a total of 600 złoty to be spent on food in Kołaczyce.⁷

In May 1942, the Gazeta Żydowska reported that the refugees in Kołaczyce were from Żywiec and Kraków; the most recent group had been transferred from the Jasło ghetto. A large number of them lived in the synagogue. On April 1, 1942, a registration of men (aged 16–60) for forced labor took place. On April 20, 15 men were assigned to agricultural work. A soup kitchen, established specifically for their benefit, distributed free breakfasts and dinners. The Jewish Police, who supervised the laborers, also helped in the kitchen.⁸

According to Wieliczko, Jews from the nearby Brzostek ghetto and a number from surrounding villages were brought to Kołaczyce on August 12, 1942. Following a selection, some were sent to a labor camp in Jasło. Several people were shot during the ensuing liquidation of the ghetto. Others (as many as 260 people) were transported by the Germans to the Podzamcze Forest (also referred to as the Kowalowy Forest) near the village of Krajowice and were shot the same afternoon. Members of the Gestapo from Jasło supervised the mass shooting.⁹

Members of the Baudienst (Construction Service) in Jasło were forced to dig the graves for the Kołaczyce Jews. Two witnesses from the Baudienst (Jan Rączka and Władysław M.) testified that the Jews were gathered in a clearing. In groups of 10, the victims were led to the grave and forced to undress. Standing by the grave, one by one, they were shot in the back of the head. Rączka, a native of Kołaczyce, recognized among the victims the families of Waldman, Rosner, Kraut, Rand, Szlam, and others. Salka (née Wald) was pregnant. Baudienst workers were made to disguise the grave by planting trees on top of it.¹⁰

SOURCES The following sources include references to the Kołaczyce ghetto: Mieczysław Wieliczko, Jasielskie w latach drugiej wojny światowej (Warsaw: Wydawnictwo Ministerstwa Obrony Narodowej, 1974), pp. 131, 148, 182–184; Andrzej Potocki, Żydzi w Podkarpaciu (Rzeszów: Libra, 2004), p. 78; Stanisław Zabierowski, Rzeszowskie pod okupacją hitlerowską (Warsaw: Książka i Wiedza, 1975), pp. 183–185; Czesław Pili-chowski et al., eds., Obozy hitlerowskie na ziemiach polskich 1939–1945: Informator encyklopedyczny (Warsaw: PWN, 1979), p. 238.

Archival sources include AŻIH (210/413, 211/551, 301/4698, 301/7164); USHMM (Acc.1997.A.0124 [JSS]; Acc.1999.A.0154 [AJDC]); and VHF (# 40037).

Jolanta Kraemer

NOTES

1. USHMM, Acc.1997.A.0124 (JSS), 211/551 (Kołaczyce), p. 9; Felicia Passal, In Quest for Life (Warsaw: Ypsilon, 1994), p. 22.

2. Gazeta Żydowska, August 25, 1941; Passal, In Quest for Life, p. 71.

3. Gazeta Żydowska, May 27, 1942; USHMM, Acc.1997.A.0124, 211/551, pp. 8–9.

4. USHMM, Acc.1999.A.0154 (AJDC), 210/415 (Kołaczyce), p. 1.

5. VHF, # 40037, testimony of Thelma Krugman, 1998; Rejestr miejsc i faktów zbrodni popełnionych przez okupanta hitlerowskiego na ziemiach polskich w latach 1939–1945: Województwo krośnieńskie (Warsaw: GKBZHWP, 1983), pp. 74–75.

6. AŻIH, 301/4698, testimony of Genia Krüger, 1945; 301/7164, testimony of Jan Rączka, 1993.

7. USHMM, Acc.1997.A.0124, 211/551, pp. 5, 8–9, 11–15, 18; Gazeta Żydowska, August 25, 1941.

8. Gazeta Żydowska, May 27, 1942.

9. Rejestr miejsc, pp. 74–75; AŻIH, 301/4698.

10. Extracts of Władysław M. testimonies in Stanisław Zabierowski, Rzeszowskie pod okupacją hitlerowską (Warsaw: Książka i Wiedza, 1975), pp. 183–185; AŻIH, 301/7164.

KOLBUSZOWA

Pre-1939: Kolbuszowa, town, Lwów województwo, Poland; 1939–1945: Kreis Reichshof, Distrikt Krakau, Generalgouvernement; post-1998: województwo podkarpackie, Poland

Kolbuszowa is located about 150 kilometers (93 miles) east-northeast of Kraków. On the outbreak of World War II, around 2,500 Jews were residing in the town.

Following the German invasion on September 1, 1939, many Jewish refugees arrived in Kolbuszowa. Upon capture of the town, about two weeks later, German soldiers began kidnapping Jews for forced labor and searching Jewish homes for valuables. At this time, many Jewish homes were burned down and looted.

In the fall of 1939, Gestapo men arrived in Kolbuszowa and took several Jews hostage, threatening to kill them if the

A group of Jewish forced laborers pose with shovels in Kolbuszowa, March 9, 1940.

USHMM WS #01472, COURTESY OF NORMAN SALSITZ

Jews did not leave town within a few days. A number of Jews fled to the Soviet-occupied zone, but several days later the evacuation order was rescinded, and some Jews who had left returned. In mid-November, German soldiers requisitioned most of the Jews' remaining food and merchandise.¹

In December 1939, Jews over the age of 12 were required to wear white badges bearing a blue Star of David. Initially the penalty for noncompliance was a 100 złoty fine, but subsequently the death penalty was introduced for this offense.

On January 25, 1940, the Germans established a Sonderdienst (Special Police) unit in Kolbuszowa, composed mainly of young ethnic German men. The German police soon found it difficult to find the 150 to 200 Jewish forced laborers demanded daily. So a Jewish Council (Judenrat) was established in March 1940, headed by Dr. Leon Anderman. The Jews were registered and performed forced labor in rotation. The payment for a replacement was initially a loaf of black bread and later only half or a quarter of a loaf. The Judenrat also paid bribes to the Germans to halt the ransacking of Jewish homes, to release detained Jews, and to obtain permits for Jewish train travel. It raised funds by taxing the Jews.²

In July 1940, all Jews aged 12 through 60 were registered and issued work cards. On September 9, German officials selected 50 Jewish men to be sent to the forced labor camp in Rzeszów. Two months later, the Judenrat arranged for their release. In November another roundup occurred; this time 80 Jews were chosen for forced labor in Pustków.

In June 1941, Landkommissar Twardon arrived in Kolbuszowa. On June 12, he ordered the resettlement to Rzeszów of Jews living in the market square. This measure decreased the Jewish population prior to the establishment of a ghetto. On June 13, Twardon gave the Jews only 48 hours to move into the ghetto, which was located in the poorest section of town, where 700 Jews and 90 Poles resided. Now the Poles were relocated to make space for 1,100 additional Jews in this area. The ghetto was bordered on the east by the river, on the west by Sędziszów Street, and on the north by the "Golden Row."

It did not include the market square, where Jewish shops were transferred to Poles.³

For the relocation, the Jews lacked transport and feared not making the deadline. On the second day, the German police increased the panic by beating up any Jews they encountered. That night they surrounded the ghetto and arrested 26 Jews, including most of the Judenrat. Efforts were made to obtain the release of Dr. Anderman, with the involvement of some Polish notables, but Twardon refused, and a new Judenrat was formed with Paszek Rappaport at its head.⁴

Soon afterwards, the new Judenrat raised the money demanded to purchase the return of those Jews who had been relocated to Rzeszów. The arrested Jews were sent to the Auschwitz concentration camp. Within a short time, most were killed, and the Gestapo insisted the families sign statements confirming the alleged cause of death.⁵

In the ghetto, clothing and shoes were made from old rags and scraps of wood. Hunger was severe. The Judenrat established a public kitchen, where many Jews received their only meal of the day. Smuggling into the ghetto was accomplished through permits to travel outside, arranged by Rappaport for a high price. The Judenrat and a few of Rappaport's friends obtained permits, enabling them to smuggle in food, kerosene, soap, wood, and other needed items, at the risk of their lives.⁶

On January 5, 1942, posters were put up around the ghetto, signed by Kreishauptmann Dr. Heinz Ehaus, prohibiting Germans and other "Aryans" from entering the ghetto without a special pass.⁷ This measure probably resulted from a fear of the spread of typhus. In January 1942, the Germans demanded that the Jews surrender all fur items on pain of death.

In February 1942, the Jewish Police was established, to assist the Judenrat with its functions. Landkommissar Twardon enacted many new decrees, such as forcing Jews to shave their beards and demanding a ransom of 5 kilograms (11 pounds) of gold for the lives of 15 Jews. On April 28, 1942, the Gestapo arrested and shot more than 20 Jews according to a list prepared by a Ukrainian informant, who served in the police. When Twardon learned that 3 Jews had only been wounded, he sent his doctor to see them—he uncovered the wounds and left the men to die.⁸

The murdered Jews were buried in mass graves in the Jewish cemetery. However, their family members dug up the corpses and put a knife in each right hand to symbolize revenge before reburying them in family plots.⁹

Three days later the Gestapo demanded various luxury items, including silk stockings, wool for suits, and canaries in cages. If the items were not produced by evening, another execution was threatened. As they could not be found in the ghetto, several Jews sneaked out and bought the items at high prices from Poles. When the Gestapo men were satisfied the demands had been met, they left.¹⁰

Conditions steadily deteriorated as starvation increased. New decrees were issued, and shootings became commonplace. Jews believed that to remain in the ghetto, they must be productive. Therefore, a cooperative workshop was established in the ghetto synagogue. After an inspection of the workshop, the Germans announced that the workers and their families could remain in Kolbuszowa.

In June 1942, Kreishauptmann Ehaus made repeated financial demands of the Jewish communities in the Kreis, which had to be paid within one week. If payment was incomplete, members of the respective Judenrat were murdered, corresponding to the deficient sum. Each time, the various Judenrat members were summoned to Rzeszów to hand over the money. According to Naftali (Norman) Salsitz's account, Kolbuszowa was the only Judenrat that managed to pay each sum in full, and therefore suffered no losses to its Judenrat.¹¹

After the executions, Ehaus announced that all Jews in the Kreis would be evacuated to Rzeszów by June 25–27. Panic and fear spread through the ghetto, as the residents quickly prepared for their departure. In preparation, the Judenrat used its remaining flour to bake one loaf of bread for every person.

On June 25, 1942, approximately 100 SS men encircled the ghetto and then drove the Jews out of their houses to the gates. All the Jews' possessions were loaded onto peasants' wagons, leaving no space for the Jews, so that everyone had to go on foot, escorted by the German and Polish police. On arrival in Rzeszów, the peasants demanded payment for the transportation, threatening otherwise to steal the Jews' possessions.¹²

The second evacuation the next day was much smaller but conducted in the same manner. Afterwards, thousands of peasants poured in to take property from the abandoned Jewish homes. A token sum was paid to make it appear that this was not looting. Only three Jews remained in the ghetto to run the cobbler's cooperative, making suits and boots for the German police.¹³

On June 28, 1942, Twardon went to Rzeszów and ordered a group of Jewish men to return to Kolbuszowa to dismantle the ghetto houses. The men were housed in the Bet Midrash, now called the "Kolbuszowa Labor Camp." Some Kolbuszowa Jews were sent from Rzeszów to the Jasionka labor camp, where most were murdered or died of starvation. The other Kolbuszowa Jews in Rzeszów were deported to the Bełżec extermination camp.

A few Jews survived in hiding, in the camps, or as partisans in the forests. Some survivors were murdered by Poles when they returned home, and many emigrated soon afterwards.¹⁴ The Jewish community of Kolbuszowa was not reestablished after the war.

SOURCES Much of this entry is based on the detailed account by Naftali Salsitz, "The Holocaust in Kolbuszowa," in I.M. Biderman, ed., Pinkas Kolbishov (New York: United Kolbushover, 1971), pp. 56–88; a more personalized account by the same author (after he changed his name) is Norman Salsitz, Against All Odds: A Tale of Two Survivors (New York: Holocaust Library, 1990), which adds some further details. Other relevant publications include Guy Miron, ed., The Yad Vashem Encyclopedia of the Ghettos during the Holocaust (Jerusalem: Yad Vashem, 2010), pp. 329–331; and Czesław Pilichowski et al., eds., Obozy hitlerowskie na ziemiach polskich 1939–1945: Informator encyklopedyczny (Warsaw: PWN, 1979), p. 237.

Documentation concerning the fate of the Jews in Kolbuszowa during the Holocaust can be found in the following archives: AŻIH (211/545-546); IPN (ASG, sygn. 58, p. 64); USHMM (e.g., RG-50.030*0199; RG-15.019M); USHMPA (WS # N64876); VHF (# 3331 and 16458); and YVA.

Shannon Phillips and Martin Dean

NOTES

1. Salsitz, "The Holocaust in Kolbuszowa," pp. 56–60.
2. Ibid., pp. 60–63; see also USHMM, RG-50.030*0199, interview with Norman Salsitz, May 15, 1990.
3. Salsitz, "The Holocaust in Kolbuszowa," pp. 66–67; Salsitz, Against All Odds, p. 125. USHMM, RG-15.019M, reel 17, file no. 58 (Rzeszów województwo), p. 64, indicates the ghetto was established in September 1941, on Piłsudski and Piekarski Streets, covering an area of 500 square meters (598 square yards).
4. VHF, # 16458, testimony of Max Notowitz.
5. Ibid.; Salsitz, Against All Odds, pp. 167–168.
6. Salsitz, "The Holocaust in Kolbuszowa," pp. 67–69.
7. USHMPA, WS # N64876, Polizeiliche Anordnung, signed Dr. Ehaus, January 5, 1942.
8. Salsitz, "The Holocaust in Kolbuszowa," pp. 74–75; Salsitz, Against All Odds, p. 193.
9. USHMM, RG-50.030*0199.
10. Salsitz, "The Holocaust in Kolbuszowa," pp. 75–77; Salsitz, Against All Odds, p. 196.
11. Salsitz, "The Holocaust in Kolbuszowa," pp. 77–79.
12. Ibid., pp. 79–81; Salsitz, Against All Odds, p. 207.
13. Salsitz, "The Holocaust in Kolbuszowa," pp. 81–82.
14. USHMM, RG-50.030*0199.

KORCZYNA

Pre-1939: Korczyna, town, Lwów województwo, Poland; 1939–1944: village, initially in Kreis Jasło, then from November 1941, Kreis Krosno, Distrikt Krakau, Generalgouvernement; post-1998: województwo podkarpackie, Poland

Korczyna is located 5 kilometers (3 miles) northeast of Krosno. There were 796 Jews living in the town of Korczyna in 1921.

After the German occupation of Korczyna in mid-September 1939, various German military units were garrisoned in the town for several months. During their stay they requisitioned Jewish houses and forced Jews to work for them as servants. They frequently searched Jewish homes and stores, beating the owners and taking whatever they liked.

In March 1940, a Jewish Council (Judenrat) was established, with J. Rubin as the chairman and Salomon Horowitz as his deputy. Jakob Sprung, Chaskel Lutman (or Lautmann), and Raffael Rachwall were also members.

According to the town's yizkor book, Korczyna's Jews were asked to choose their representatives. Apparently, the chairman Rubin and his assistant "Lewitman" (probably Lautmann) disappointed the Jews of Korczyna, as they "took matters into their own hands and ignored the rest of the Judenrat.” They received a salary from the Germans and had to implement German instructions. Those who failed to pay a monthly tax imposed by the Judenrat had their possessions (e.g., Shabbat candle holders, pillows, clothing, etc.) confiscated by the Jewish Police. The Judenrat asked the Germans for help on occasion. Arrestees were sent to the Krosno prison; there were also cases when Jews were shot in Korczyna.¹

By April 1940, the Judenrat had opened a soup kitchen serving three meals daily. The poorest received them for free, while others paid 20 to 30 groszy per day.

By September 1940, there were 20 refugees from Kraków, 17 from Łódź, and 15 Jewish families from Germany living in Korczyna. On March 27, 1941, the Krosno Landkommissar ordered the transfer of 119 Jews from Krosno to Korczyna. The same day, the Jasło Kreishauptmann also directed 22 Jews there from Jasło. On April 8, 1941, 75 more Jasło Jews were transferred and housed with the other recent arrivals in Korczyna. Most of them were refugees from Łódź. At this time, a total of 50 refugees from Kraków were living in the village.

In May 1941, a two-man Jewish police force was established. One of the policemen, Naphtali Kirschner, would forewarn the community of raids by the Polish police. In June 1941, Jewish-owned stores were confiscated.²

A local branch of the Jewish Social Self-Help (JSS) was set up in Korczyna in July 1941 to provide relief for the town's poor and refugees. It included chairman Salomon Horowitz, Jakub Sprung, and Izrael Isak Denn. The branch was liquidated in September 1941. The reasons for its liquidation included insignificant aid delivered, the small size of the Jewish population, and infighting among its members. For example, Horowitz requested the dismissal of Sprung and Denn as their “age and appearance” made them “unfit for the job.”³

An unfenced ghetto located around the market square of Korczyna was set up in November 1941.⁴ Poles—most likely—were not evicted from the ghetto grounds and continued to share some houses with the Jewish population. For example, during the ghetto's liquidation, survivor Rosa Walker and her son Hendrik did not report to the market square, “instead hiding in the attic of the house they lived in, which belonged to [a Pole] Stanisław Pudło.”

In January 1942, the German authorities ordered the Jews to surrender all their fur garments or face the death penalty. The Jews responded and brought even their old worn-out fur hats to the Judenrat, who passed them on to the Germans. Two days later, the Germans searched the Jews' homes to check for concealed items, but they found nothing, and the town suffered no casualties.⁵

It is not clear who was in charge of the ghetto's security. According to the yizkor book, Jews were forbidden to leave the Korczyna ghetto by March or April 1942. The Germans posted signs indicating the limits of the Jewish area. Jews could walk to Godele Gutwein's house, to Herz Halpern's house, to Mangel Street, to the pharmacy, and to Pszysłowski's house. Any Jew caught outside this demarcated area faced the death penalty.⁶ A. Potocki mentions that a man was shot for leaving “the ghetto” before this, in December 1941. Also, a 38-year-old, Lejb Korb, is registered as having been shot by the police in November 1941; the precise reason why he was killed, however, is not known.⁷

Survivor Aron Neubarth, who moved to the ghetto when rural Jews were brought in (in June 1942), testified that Korczyna's Jews were allowed to leave the ghetto only for organized labor assignments. Those who were assigned to work at an airfield or on road construction in Krosno would gather daily in the market square, then march from Korczyna unescorted. In the evening they would return to the ghetto—again unescorted. Otherwise, Jews were afraid to leave the ghetto and rarely attempted to sneak out.⁸

By January 1942, the ghetto had 700 Jewish inhabitants. Forced labor continued; approximately 80 men then walked daily to Krosno for snow removal. They were paid a small compensation and given a hot meal by Krosno's Jewish community. The sanitary commission continued to check Jewish households for signs of contagious diseases, finding none. In May 1942, Jews aged from 6 to 60 years old were vaccinated against typhus. Dr. Bucholz attended to the sick.⁹

The concentration of the rural Jews of the Kreis in ghettos began on June 24, 1942. By that date, the number of Jews in Korczyna had reached 1,200. The JSS branch was reopened on June 28, 1942, most likely due to the increase in the number of ghetto inmates. The reorganized branch was now led by a refugee from Kraków, Aleksander Choczner, with assistance from Wolf Gleicher and pharmacist Jakub Lewaj. They kept the soup kitchen open and organized a day care in the ghetto for 55 children aged four to nine.

All Jews aged 14 to 60 were obliged to work at this time. Women and young girls performed agricultural labor. In June 1942, Korczyna's Jews were ordered to pay overdue taxes, allegedly outstanding from when the war started.¹⁰

On July 30, 1942, 300 Jews, who were composed of deportees from Łódź who were living in Krosno, were moved to Korczyna. Due to the lack of lodging, most of them were quartered in the town's synagogue. Their hygiene was so poor that the JSS ordered free-of-charge hair clipping, shaving, and bathing for all newcomers.¹¹

The ghetto was liquidated on August 12, 1942.¹² Korczyna's Jews were ordered to report to the market square. The Germans possessed a list of all the inhabitants and their addresses. House searches for those in hiding were conducted, while the remaining Jews were sitting in the square. According to Pinkas ha-kehillot, trucks took old and sick Jews to the vicinity of Wola Janicka, where they were then shot. The Rejestr miejsc, however, reports that on the same day the SS and the Gestapo shot several dozen Jewish families in the Wawrzyce Forest; some of their names are available.¹³

As for the remainder of the ghetto's inmates, women and children were deported to Krosno on trucks, while men walked there under the escort of Ukrainian auxiliary forces.¹⁴ On August 14, 1942, Korczyna's Jews were deported to the Bełżec extermination camp.

Out of 140 Jews who were selected to remain and labor in Korczyna, 70 were taken to the Krosno ghetto. In December 1942, they were transferred together with the remaining Jews of that ghetto to the ghetto in Rzeszów and then dispersed among various camps.

SOURCES The following publications include information on the Korczyna ghetto: Andrzej Potocki, Podkarpackie judaica (Brzozów: Związek Gmin Brzozowskich i Muzeum Regionalne PTTK im. Adama Fastnachta w Brzozowie, 1993), p. 35; Abraham Wein and Aharon Weiss, eds., Pinkas ha-kehilot. Encyclopaedia of Jewish Communities: Poland, vol. 3, Galicia and Western Silesia (Jerusalem: Yad Vashem, 1984), pp. 326–328; and Shmuel Krakowski and Sara Bender, eds., The Encyclopedia of the Righteous among the Nations: Rescuers of Jews during the Holocaust—Poland (Jerusalem: Yad Vashem, 2004), p. 652.

The yizkor book Korczyna; sefer zikaron (New York: Committee of the Korczyna Memorial Book, 1967) contains information on the German occupation, and a translation by William Leibner is on the Web at www.jewishgen.org/yizkor/korczyna.

The following archival sources were used to prepare this entry: AŻIH (211/471, 211/472, 211/570, 211/650 [JSS]); USHMM (Acc.1997.A.0124 [JSS]; RG-15.019M [ASG]); and VHF (# 38834).

Jolanta Kraemer

NOTES

1. Gazeta Żydowska, May 2, 1941; USHMM, Acc.1997.A.0124 (JSS), 211/471 (Jasło), p. 42; Korczyna; sefer zikaron, pp. 84–86.
2. USHMM, Acc.1997.A.0124, 211/570 (Korczyna), pp. 1–3, 7, 9–12, 28; Gazeta Żydowska, May 2, 1941; Korczyna; sefer zikaron, pp. 86, 95–96.
3. USHMM, Acc.1997.A.0124, 211/570, pp. 25, 45; 211/471, p. 42; and 211/472 (Jasło), p. 36.
4. Ibid., RG-15.019M (ASG, Korczyna), reel 10, pp. 90–91. Potocki, Podkarpackie judaica, dates the ghetto's establishment in the spring of 1941.
5. Korczyna; sefer zikaron, pp. 96–97.
6. Ibid., p. 97.
7. Rejestr miejsc i faktów zbrodni popełnionych przez okupanta hitlerowskiego na ziemiach polskich w latach 1939–1945: Województwo kroszeńskie (Warsaw: GKBZHWP, 1983), p. 77.
8. VHF, # 38834, Aron Neubarth, 1998.
9. Gazeta Żydowska, January 30, May 29, and August 7, 1942.
10. USHMM, Acc.1997.A.0124, 211/615 (Krosno), pp. 52, 55; and 211/271, p. 1; Gazeta Żydowska, August 7, 1942.
11. USHMM, Acc.1997.A.0124, 211/271, pp. 10, 12.
12. Ibid., RG-15.019M (ASG, Korczyna), reel 10, pp. 90–91.
13. Rejestr miejsc, pp. 151–152.
14. VHF, # 38834.

KRAKÓW

Pre-1939: Kraków, city and województwo center, Poland;
1939–1945: Krakau, Kreis center, Krakau-Land, and Distrikt

Krakau, Generalgouvernement; post-1998: Kraków, powiat center, województwo małopolskie, Poland

Kraków is located about 290 kilometers (180 miles) south of Warsaw. In 1931, the Jewish population of the city was 56,800.

On September 6, 1939, the German army entered Kraków. At the time of the invasion, many men, Jews and non-Jews alike, fled the city, often with other family members. However, German bombing and the rapid advance of the Wehrmacht forced many to return to the city.

Anti-Jewish Aktions and measures began immediately. German soldiers kidnapped Jews for forced labor, humiliated them in the streets, and also arrested and killed some of them, seemingly at random. Jewish homes and businesses were looted. Between October and December 1939, Jewish homes were searched by the German occupiers, and a curfew was decreed. Anyone caught disobeying the curfew could be shot. German officials exploited the searches to steal or confiscate items that were illegal for Jews to possess, such as gold, jewelry, and foreign currency.

On September 8, 1939, all Jewish enterprises were required to be marked with a Star of David. Also at this time, Jews were removed from breadlines. A survivor, Mieczysław Staner, recalls: "In Kazimierz, the old Jewish quarter of Cracow, Orthodox Jews were dragged out of their homes into the streets to be beaten by the drunken SS troopers and tortured sadistically by having their beards torn out or being set on fire, to the amusement of the offenders and horror of the onlookers."¹

On September 13, 1939, all Jewish synagogues and prayer houses were closed. On the holiest day of the Jewish year, Yom Kippur, Jews were required to fill in antitank ditches. Shortly afterwards, in October 1939, the Jews of Kraków were registered by the Municipal Registration Offices "on special registration forms marked with a yellow band."²

On October 26, 1939, Generalgouverneur Hans Frank ordered the Jews subject to forced labor and instituted special Jewish labor battalions.³ In November and December, almost all Jewish schools were closed and Jewish teachers also Jews forced to construct a wall around the Kraków ghetto, 1941.

 USHMM WS #39064, COURTESY OF IPN

dismissed from non-Jewish schools. Jewish families responded by organizing clandestine classrooms, where parents or private tutors taught children in small groups.⁴

In November 1939, a census conducted by the Judenrat counted 68,482 Jews in Kraków and a few neighboring places (including Skawina, Prokocim, and Borek Fałęcki).⁵ In December 1939, a 24-member Jewish Council (Judenrat) was formally recognized in Kraków by the German authorities. It had already been established in September at the request of SS-Oberscharführer Paul Siebert, who ordered Marek Bieberstein, a teacher and public activist, to become its head. The vice president was Dr. Wilhelm Goldblat. The Judenrat offices were located at 41 Kraków Street. Subsequently in the ghetto the Jewish communal leadership had its offices at the corner of Limanowski Street and Rynek Podgórski.⁶ The Germans held the Judenrat personally responsible for carrying out all their demands, and the Jewish community was ordered to obey the Judenrat.

From December 1, 1939, all Jews above age 12 were required to wear a Star of David on their right arm. A curfew was instituted for Jews from 9:00 P.M. to 5:00 A.M. From January 1, 1940, Jews were forbidden to change residence without permission, and by the end of January, Jews were no longer allowed to travel by rail.⁷ Despite these restrictions, the number of Jews in Kraków continued to increase, as refugees arrived, especially from those parts of Poland incorporated into the Reich. In January and February 1940, Jewish businesses were seized, and a trustee institution was set up to organize their transfer to Germans and ethnic Germans, with businesses of lesser value being given to Poles or Ukrainians.

In April 1940, Hans Frank determined that his capital city of Kraków should become the “most Jew-free city” in the Generalgouvernement. He ordered that the vast bulk of Kraków’s more than 60,000 Jews be expelled and dispersed among smaller towns and villages in the Distrikt, while only about 10,000 Jews were to remain as indispensable skilled workers.⁸ To implement these instructions, Stadthauptmann Dr. Carl Schmid announced on May 18 that by August 15 the Jewish population was to be reduced to 15,000 workers and their families.⁹ To encourage Jews to leave, those who left voluntarily were permitted to take their possessions with them. By June 1, the Jewish population in Kraków had declined to 54,517.¹⁰ Many Jews left for Warsaw, Bochnia, Kielce, and other places.

In July 1940, the forcible removal of the Jewish population of Kraków commenced. Only those Jews able to obtain permits indicating that they were economically necessary to the Germans could remain in the city. At the end of August, several thousand Jews who could not obtain permits were forced to leave the city, being allowed to take with them only 25 kilograms (55 pounds) of possessions. By the beginning of October the population of the city had declined by about 50 percent.

Stadthauptmann Schmid decided to do his part to decrease the Jews in town by ordering the arrest of Dr. Bieberstein. During the mass expulsions, Bieberstein attempted to bribe the authorities to allow more Jews to remain in Kraków.

He was arrested, and after his release 18 months later, he was sent to the Płaszów forced labor camp, where he died in 1944. The second chairman of the Judenrat was Dr. Ahron Artur Rosenzweig.

Between October and December 1940, there was a slight increase in the city’s Jewish population, as some Jews who had fled to the surrounding areas returned to Kraków. To inhibit this, Dr. Otto Wächter, governor of Distrikt Krakau, issued an order on November 25, 1940, banning all Jews without special permits from residing in the city.¹¹ Deportation transports to a number of smaller towns in Distrikt Lublin had commenced on November 12, 1940. Almost 10,000 Jews from Kraków were dispatched to Distrikt Lublin on more than 40 transports up to March 20, 1941.¹²

On March 3, 1941, Governor Wächter, citing sanitary, economic, and police considerations, announced the establishment of a Jewish residential district, a ghetto, in the poor Kraków suburb of Podgórze. Jews had until March 20, 1941, to move into the designated area, which lay on the left bank of the Vistula River. Furniture and other items, which could not be taken into the new accommodations, had to be offered first to the Trustee Office (Treuhand-Aussenstelle Krakau) and could only be sold freely once released by that office.¹³ The relocation period was extended to the end of April 1941, when the last Jews were moved into the ghetto. In the weeks following the decree, thousands more Jews fled Kraków to avoid enclosure in the ghetto. Approximately 15,000 Jewish workers resided in the ghetto area, and another 2,500 officially lived outside the ghetto walls.¹⁴

The ghetto area stretched from Rynek Podgórski to the end of Limanowski Street and from Józefińska Street to Plac Zgody to the foot of Krzemionki Hill. In all, it consisted of 15 streets, 320 houses, and a total of 3,167 rooms. During April 1941, a wooden fence and a 2- to 3-meter-high (6.6- to 9.8-foot-high) wall, evoking the look of Jewish gravestones, were erected around the ghetto, and doors and windows facing the Aryan side of the ghetto were ordered to be bricked up.¹⁵ The main entrance gate at Rynek Podgórski “was ornamented with a huge blue Star of David and a sign in German, but written using Hebrew letters, spelling ‘Jüdische Wohnbezirk’ [Jewish residential area].”¹⁶ In addition to this main entrance, there were entrances at Lwów Street, at Plac Zgody, and two entrances on Limanowski Street. A trolley ran through the ghetto, but it was forbidden to stop there.

Initially, the Jews were able to enter and exit the ghetto more or less whenever they chose; however, this freedom was short-lived, as just a few weeks later the ghetto gates were closed, and Jews needed permits to enter and exit the ghetto. The ghetto was guarded by German and Polish (Blue) Police externally, as well as by the Jewish Police (Jüdischer Ordnungsdienst) internally. The Jewish Police had been established by the Gestapo in the summer of 1940 and was headed by Simcha Spira, a glazier by trade, who had been a religious man before the war.¹⁷ The Jewish Police in Kraków subsequently earned a bad reputation for its inhumanity to other Jews, including participation in German roundups.

Other ghetto institutions included health-care services. One survivor reported: “Three hospitals were within the walls of the ghetto, the General Hospital located on the corner of Józefińska and Węgierska streets, the Epidemic Hospital on Rękawka Street, and the Hospital for the Disabled and Psychologically Ill on Plac Zgody.”¹⁸ There was also an old-age home and an orphanage.

The ghetto also had a German labor office, which set wages at 4 to 5 złoty per day, the cost of 1 kilogram (2.2 pounds) of bread. Approximately 60 percent of the ghetto residents worked outside the ghetto walls, in various factories, at the airfield, or cleaning offices for German officials. Each worker needed a permit to leave the ghetto, and this required a monthly identity card renewal. There were also several factories inside the ghetto. Some were traditional factories such as the “Madritch Uniform Factory” in the former “Optima” chocolate factory, which was owned by an Austrian industrialist and member of the SS. Madritch saved many Jews during the war. The more famous Oskar Schindler also used Jewish labor in his Kraków factory, which became a Nazi subcamp and thereby saved 1,098 Jews.

Others worked in home-based enterprises, such as making brushes, which they then sold in bulk to the Germans. There were also a number of private business operations, which relied on the ability of Jews to enter and exit the ghetto with their products.

Various cultural and religious activities continued within the ghetto. Zionist groups organized secret study groups, and at least three synagogues and other religious study houses remained in use. There was even a café on the corner of Limanowski Street and Rynek Podgórski offering live music, including the Rosener Players, and the ghetto pharmacy served as a place where people could read official and underground newspapers and discuss daily problems.¹⁹

In October and November 1941, conditions deteriorated further as 27 smaller communities around Kraków were incorporated into the city, and an additional 5,000 Jews from these places were forced to move into the ghetto. In December 1941, the receipt and sending of postal packages was forbidden. Then in January 1942, Jews were ordered to surrender their furs under penalty of death. Some people destroyed their furs rather than hand them over. Others stood in the freezing cold to hand over their furs at the designated building on Limanowski Street. Altogether some 8,000 fur items were collected.

In 1941 and the first half of 1942, there were repeated arrests and roundups of Jews in the ghetto. Some had their names put on lists by Jewish Police chief Spira or by a Jewish Gestapo agent named Szymon Szpic, and they were deported to Distrikt Lublin, as the ghetto was too overcrowded. Others were taken away by the Gestapo directly.²⁰

The German Security Police conducted the first mass deportation to the Bełżec extermination camp from Distrikt Krakau, following an Aktion in the Kraków ghetto on June 1–8, 1942. Between March and May of 1942, the Kraków Jews were registered. Those who had trades were given stamps on their identification cards (Kennkarten), whereas those who were unemployed or had white-collar professions were denied the stamp. During the mass deportation in early June, those without the stamp were rounded up and deported to the Bełżec extermination camp.²¹ Approximately 150 Jews were shot during the Aktion, including the poet Mordechai Gebirtig.²² In total, some 7,000 Jews from Kraków were deported at this time.

On June 7, 1942, in preparation for the final roundup of the Aktion, a registration was conducted in the offices of the Jewish Social Self-Help (JSS). Those Jews needed as workers received a blue card stamped by the SS and Police Leader (SSPF) attached to their identification cards. Those who did not receive a blue card were taken to the Optima factory courtyard, from which they were deported to Bełżec the next day.²³ During the June Aktion of 1942, the head of the Judenrat, Rosenzweig, refused to cooperate with the deportations. As punishment, he and his family were sent to Bełżec. He was replaced by the third and final Judenrat leader in Kraków, Dawid Gutter.

Shortly after the June Aktion, on the orders of Stadthauptmann Rudolf Pavlu, who had succeeded Schmid in September 1941, the ghetto was reduced considerably in size.²⁴

Jewish resistance organizations conducted activities both outside and within the ghetto. Various pre-war youth groups reconnected after the initial invasion and began training their members in weapon usage, implementing mutual assistance programs, and engaging in a variety of underground activities. Important among these groups were Akiva, a pre-war religious Zionist pioneer youth movement, led by Adolf “Dolek” Liebeskind, and Ha-Shomer Ha-Za’ir, a pre-war Socialist Zionist youth movement, led by Zvi “Heshek” Bauminger. The underground groups were organized into cells of five and engaged in various actions. They eventually merged in the autumn of 1942 into the Żydowska Organizacja Bojowa (Jewish Fighting Organization, ŻOB), which had been formed in the Warsaw ghetto.

The resistance fighters killed off Gestapo informants, stole German uniforms being produced in the ghetto, and Group portrait of members of a Jewish resistance group, Jewish Fighting Organization (Żydowska Organizacja Bojowa, or ŻOB), led by Juda Lieber. The group was involved in the attack on the Cyganeria Café on Szpitalna Street that resulted in the deaths of seven German officers.

USHMM WS #65857, COURTESY OF ŻIH, IMIENIA EMANUELA RINGELBLUMA

carried out other acts of resistance. Outside the ghetto walls, they set fire to the German garage at Grzegórzki, which at the time was full of Organisation Todt vehicles; threw grenades into an officers' mess; carried out directed assassinations; and attacked German checkpoints.²⁵ The largest attack, carried out on December 22, 1942, was the bombing of the Cyganeria and Esplanada Cafés. In the aftermath of these operations, the hiding place of the ghetto fighters was discovered, and those captured in the bunker were tortured. In the end, some of the arrestees revealed the locations of others, and the underground organization in the Kraków ghetto was severely disrupted.²⁶

The second major deportation Aktion occurred on October 28, 1942, when at least 6,000 Jews were sent to their deaths, and another 600 were killed on the spot. One survivor described the deportation of the children from the orphanage on Józefińska Street: "SS soldiers arrived at the orphanage in trucks and herded all the children into them, piled on top of each other. The younger ones and the babies were thrown inside through the windows of the trucks, onto the children already inside. Their screams were heard from afar, reaching all corners and breaking hearts, but apparently they never reached the heavens."²⁷ Two hospitals and an old-people's home were also completely cleared during this Aktion, which was directed by SSPF SS-Sturmbannführer Willi Haase, who by then had succeeded Julian Scherner in this post.²⁸

Following the Aktion, the ghetto area was again reduced. Then on December 6, 1942, the remnant ghetto inhabitants were divided into two sections: Ghetto A, for those who were able to work, and Ghetto B, for those unable to work. The final liquidation of the Kraków ghetto, personally supervised by Haase and carried out by SS-Sturmführer Amon Leopold Goeth, began on March 13, 1943. The able-bodied from Ghetto A, at least 8,000 people, were marched to the Płaszów labor camp. The remaining people, including all the inhabitants of Ghetto B, were either murdered in the ghetto or transported to their deaths, with some 1,000 being sent to the Auschwitz concentration camp, where all but 15 men and 26 women were sent straight to the gas chambers.²⁹ Following this, the Judenrat members also were sent to Płaszów, where Gutter was murdered on his arrival.

Only around 2,000 Jews from Kraków survived the German occupation.

A number of postwar trials dealt with crimes committed in Kraków. Amon Leopold Goeth, the infamous commandant of the Płaszów forced labor camp, was extradited to Poland, where he was tried in 1946. He was found guilty, sentenced to death, and executed by hanging.

SOURCES Information on the fate of Kraków's Jews during the Holocaust can be found in the following publications: Arieh L. Bauminger, The Fighters of the Cracow Ghetto (Jerusalem: Keter Press, 1986); Aleksander Bieberstein, Zagłada Żydów w Krakowie (Kraków: Wydawn. Literackie, 2001); Anna Jodłowiec-Dziedzic, The Holocaust of Cracow Jews 1939–1945 (Kraków: Historical Museum of the City of Kraków, 2004); Felicia Karay, The Women of Ghetto Krakow (Tel Aviv, 2001); Anna Pióro, The Cracow Ghetto 1941–1943: A Guide to the Area of the Former Ghetto (Kraków: Historical Museum of the City of Kraków, 2005); Roman Pytel, "Destruction of the Jewish Community in Cracow," in Memorial Journal in Honor of Jews from Cracow Perished 1939–1945 (New York: New Kraków Friendship Society, 1967); Aleksander B. Skotnicki, Oskar Schindler in the Eyes of Cracovian Jews Rescued by Him (Kraków: Wydawn. AA, 2008); Katarzyna Zimmerer, Zamordowany świat: Losy Żydów w Krakowie 1939–1945 (Kraków: Wydawn. Literackie, 2004); Proces ludobójcy Amona Goetha (Kraków: Centralna Żydowska Komisja Historyczna w Polsce, 1947).

Relevant published memoirs and documentation include Tadeusz Pankiewicz, The Cracow Ghetto Pharmacy (New York: Holocaust Library, 1987); Malvina Graf, The Kraków Ghetto and the Płaszów Camp Remembered (Tallahassee: Florida State University Press, 1989); Mieczysław Staner, The Eyewitness (Kraków: Wydawnictwo "Hagada" and Argona-Jarden, 1999); Zvi Barlev-Bleicher, Would God It Were Night: The Ordeal of a Jewish Boy from Cracow—Through Auschwitz, Mauthausen, and Gusen (New York: Vantage Press, 1991); and Every Day Lasts a Year: A Jewish Family's Correspondence from Poland, introduced and edited by Christopher R. Browning, Richard S. Hollander, and Nechama Tec (New York: Cambridge University Press, 2007).

Relevant documentation can be found in these archives: AAN; APKra (e.g., collection 450); AŻIH (e.g., 211/583-596, 218, 301, and 302 collections); BA-BL (e.g., R 52III/22); BA-L; IPN (e.g., NTN 39-47); NARA; USHMM (e.g., RG-02.107, 143, 168; RG-15.026M [Records of the Generalgouvernement]; RG-15.072M [Jewish Council in Kraków, mostly 1939–1940]; RG-15.098 [Stadthauptmann der Stadt Krakau]; Acc.1998.A.0248); VHF; and YVA (e.g., M-1/E/22).

Helene Sinnreich, Shannon Phillips, and Martin Dean

A group of Jewish men is assigned to clear out the homes of the deported, following a deportation Aktion in the Kraków ghetto, ca. 1942. USHMM WS #07120, COURTESY OF ARCHIWUM PAŃSTWOWE W KRAKOWIE

NOTES

1. Staner, The Eyewitness, p. 7.
2. UNWCC, Law Reports of Trials of War Criminals (New York: Howard Fertig, 1992), p. 119.
3. Verordnungsblatt des Generalgouverneurs für die besetzten polnischen Gebiete, no. 1 (1939): 1. For an English translation, see Raphael Lemkin, Axis Rule in Occupied Europe (New York: Howard Fertig, 1973), p. 524.

4. Graf, The Kraków Ghetto, p. 17.
5. Andrzej Chwalba, Dzieje Krakowa, Kraków w latach 1939–1945, vol. 5 (Kraków, 2002), p. 95.
6. Bieberstein, Zagłada Żydów, p. 16; Staner, The Eyewitness, p. 9.
7. For a more extensive list of restrictions, see Justiz und NS-Verbrechen, vol. 27 (Amsterdam: Amsterdam University Press, 2003), Lfd. Nr. 667a, pp. 350–354.
8. Hans Frank, Das Diensttagebuch des deutschen Generalgouverneurs in Polen, ed. Werner Präg and Wolfgang Jacobmeyer (Stuttgart: DVA, 1975), p. 165 (entry of April 12, 1940).
9. Bieberstein, Zagłada Żydów, p. 32.
10. Zimmerer, Zamordowany świat, p. 40.
11. Pytel, “Destruction of the Jewish Community”; YVA, M-1/E/22, testimony of Josef Kohs, February 13, 1946.
12. USHMM, RG-15.072M (AŻIH), 218/1, comprehensive list of Jewish transports from Kraków, 1940–1941; see also David Silberklang, “The Holocaust in the Lublin District” (Ph.D. diss., Hebrew University, Jerusalem, 2003), pp. 141–144.
13. Wächter Verordnung, Betrifft: Bildung eines jüdischen Wohnbezirkes in der Stadt Krakau, March 3, 1941, in Krakauer Zeitung, March 6, 1941, reprinted in Tatiana Berenstein et al., eds., Faschismus, Getto, Massenmord: Dokumentation über Ausrottung und Widerstand der Juden in Polen während des zweiten Weltkrieges (Berlin: Rütten & Loening, 1961), pp. 118–120.
14. Tatiana Berenstein, ed., Eksterminacja Żydów na ziemiach polskich w okresie okupacji hitlerowskiej. Zbiór dokumentów (Warsaw: ŻIH, 1957), p. 111; Pytel, “Destruction of the Jewish Community.”
15. Pankiewicz, The Cracow Ghetto Pharmacy, p. 4; Pytel, “Destruction of the Jewish Community.” ŻuNS-V, vol. 27, Lfd. Nr. 667a, p. 355, gives a more detailed description of the ghetto area.
16. Staner, The Eyewitness, p. 9. Compare with caption on p. 477.
17. Graf, The Kraków Ghetto, p. 39.
18. Staner, The Eyewitness, p. 11.
19. Pankiewicz, The Cracow Ghetto Pharmacy, p. 12.
20. Ibid., pp. 33–38.
21. Graf, The Kraków Ghetto, p. 43.
22. Bauminger, The Fighters of the Cracow Ghetto, p. 27.
23. ŻuNS-V, vol. 23 (Amsterdam: Amsterdam University Press, 1998), Lfd. Nr. 619a, pp. 80–81; Graf, The Kraków Ghetto, p. 47.
24. Pankiewicz, The Cracow Ghetto Pharmacy, p. 62; Bieberstein, Zagłada Żydów, p. 67; ŻuNS-V, vol. 27, Lfd. Nr. 667a, p. 356.
25. Bauminger, The Fighters of the Cracow Ghetto, pp. 67–68.
26. Moshe Singer, “Jewish Resistance Movement in Kraków,” in Memorial Journal in Honor of Jews from Cracow Perished 1939–1945 (New York: New Cracow Friendship Society, 1967).
27. Barlev-Bleicher, Would God It Were Night.
28. On the October Aktion, see, for example, ŻuNS-V, vol. 27, Lfd. Nr. 667a, pp. 370–376; and Pankiewicz, The Cracow Ghetto Pharmacy, pp. 69–82.
29. Pytel, “Destruction of the Jewish Community”; ŻuNS-V, vol. 27, Lfd. Nr. 667a, p. 377; Danuta Czech, Auschwitz Chronicle, 1939–1945 (New York: H. Holt, 1990), p. 354, entry for March 16, 1942.

KROSNO

Pre-1939: Krosno, town, Jasło powiat, Lwów województwo, Poland; 1939–1944: initially Kreis Jasło, then from November 1941, center of Kreis Krosno, Distrikt Krakau, Generalgouvernement; post-1998: województwo podkarpackie, Poland

Krosno is located about 152 kilometers (94 miles) east-southeast of Kraków. On the eve of World War II, there were about 2,500 Jews living in Krosno and another 5,870 in the neighboring towns and villages.

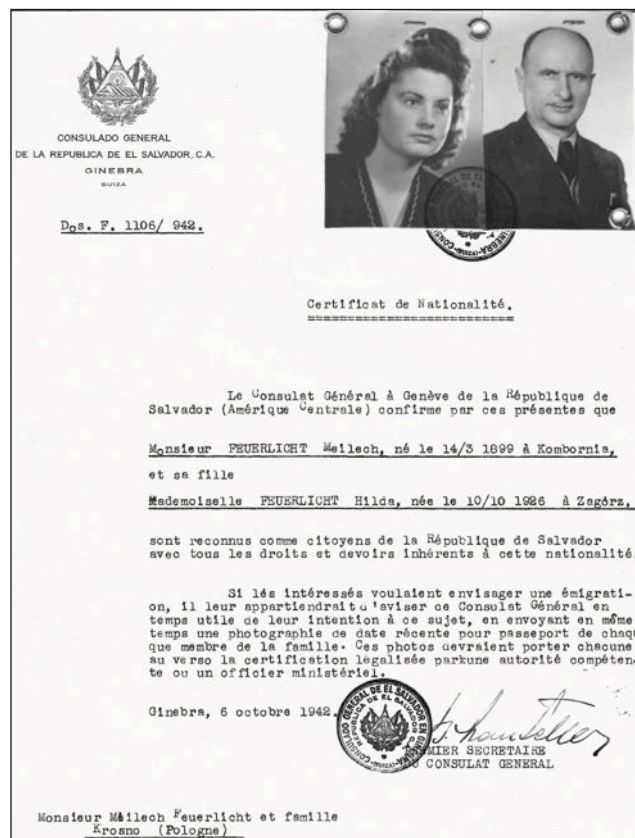

In the first days of World War II, some of Krosno's Jews fled east into what soon became the Soviet-occupied zone of Poland. At the same time many Jewish refugees from western Poland also arrived in Krosno. The German army occupied Krosno on September 9, 1939, and soon a program of mistreatment, plunder, and murder began. A Gestapo office was set up in the town, headed by SS-Hauptsturmführer Gustav Schmatzler (sentenced to death by the Special Criminal Court in Rzeszów after the war) and his deputy SS-Obersturmführer Ludwig von Davier. Other officials included SS-Untersturmführer Stengler (Stentzler) and Oskar Bäcker. From October 1939 to May 1940, Walter Thormeyer and Albert Schulz served in the Grenzpolizei (Border Police) unit in Krosno.¹

At the end of 1939 or in early 1940, the Germans appointed a Judenrat headed by Juda Engel, who was assisted by his deputy Moshe Kleiner. The chairman was viewed favorably by most Jews. The Judenrat was required to provide forced laborers, consisting mainly of impoverished refugees, to work at the military airport in Krosno and at a labor camp in Frysztak. The Judenrat paid the workers small wages out of contributions collected from wealthier Jews, who were exempted from forced labor. Several Jews worked at an oil refinery in Jedlicze, and about 160 Jews worked in factories.

In December 1939, there were about 500 resettled Jews in Krosno (400 of them having been expelled from Łódź), along with about 400 local Jews, who were all in need of support. According to a subsequent report, by April 1941, another 600 Jews had been resettled there from Kraków. At that time, there were about 1,400 Jews in need of support in Krosno. In June 1941, the Krosno branch of Jewish Social Self-Help (JSS) was established under the leadership of Juda Engel and later of Samuel Rosshandler. Up to the end of 1941, the shammes (or sexton) Silberberg organized a shelter in the synagogue for arriving refugees.²

As of June 22, 1941, there were 2,072 Jews in Krosno: 1,187 women and 885 men. Of these, 172 were 60 years of age or older, and 395 were under 12 (including 84 infants of less than 3 years). Only 544 Jews were capable of working (26.3 percent).

As of mid-November 1941, there was no Jewish district in the town, which the chairman of the Judenrat ascribed to his own efforts. Jewish stores remained open. The Judenrat ran a school for Jewish students; it also maintained a shelter for refugees, a community kitchen that distributed about 200 meals a day, and a shelter for about 12 elderly single women. Until 1942, the Jews of Krosno were allowed to live in Unauthorized Salvadoran citizenship certificate issued to Meilech Feuerlicht and his daughter, Hilda, by Salvadoran diplomat George Mandel Mantello, while they were held in the Krosno ghetto, October 6, 1942. Addressed to Mr. Meilech [sic] Feuerlicht and family, Krosno [Poland], the text reads:

"Certificate of Nationality

The Consulate General at Geneva of the Republic of Salvador [Central America] confirms by these presents that

Mr. FEUERLICHT Meilech, born the 14th of March 1899 at Kombornia And his daughter

Miss FEUERLICHT Hilda, born the 10th of October 1926 at Zagórz,

Are recognized as citizens of the Republic of Salvador with all the rights and obligations inherent to this nationality.

If the applicants would like to consider emigration, it is up to them to notify the Consulate General in time of their intention on this subject, at the same time sending a recent photograph for the passport of each family member. Each of these photos must carry on the reverse the legal certification by a competent authority or a ministerial officer."

USHMM WS #87320, COURTESY OF ENRICO MANDEL-MANTELLO

their pre-war homes, but the Germans imposed a curfew and prohibitions on schooling and religious observance; in addition, food could only be obtained at certain times and places.³

Up to November 1941, Krosno was part of Kreis Jasło, but following the incorporation of Distrikt Galizien within the Generalgouvernement, in the summer of 1941, Krosno became the center of its own Kreis. In November 1941, the Germans permitted 85 Jews to return to Krosno from Distrikt Galizien, which until June 1941 had been under Soviet occupation. On November 19, 1941, about 100 Jews from Krosno were sent to the nearby towns of Brzozów, Jasienica Rosielna, Jasło, Korczyna, Rymanów, and Żmigród Nowy. In December 1941, the Jews were ordered to surrender all fur items of clothing on pain of death.

At the end of July or the beginning of August 1942, the Germans demanded a "contribution" from the Judenrat, claiming that it would postpone their resettlement. The Jews managed to collect the money, although they were also providing assistance to the Strzyżów Judenrat.

On August 10, 1942 (the Jewish mourning day Tisha B'Av), the first deportation Aktion took place. Members of the Security Police, Order Police, and Waffen-SS, as well as Polish and Ukrainian auxiliary police units, surrounded the town. The Germans conducted a selection and issued work permits to young and able-bodied Jews. About 120 Jews, mainly the sick and disabled, were taken away to a forest and shot, and about 1,000 Jews were sent by train to the Bełżec extermination camp. Afterwards, the Germans conducted thorough searches for any Jews in hiding.⁴

The sources unanimously agree that there was a ghetto in Krosno, but the recollections of survivors contain some contradictions. One survivor recalls that in May 1942 the Germans ordered the preparation of a ghetto area. The ghetto was to be located in four or five houses on Franciszkańska Street. Jews were allowed to exit the ghetto only with a permit. One Polish policeman and one Jewish policeman guarded the gate.⁵ While some survivors recall it as an open ghetto, others describe walls surrounding the ghetto.⁶ Some survivors claim that the ghetto was guarded, and one needed a permit to leave the ghetto to go to work; others claim that the ghetto was only a sleeping area for workers, and it was possible to sneak in and out.⁷ Finally, a number of survivors recall that the Krosno ghetto was established the night after the first deportation Aktion on August 10, 1942.⁸

The trial verdict of the court in Bonn concludes that on the night of August 10, 1942 (after the Aktion), the Germans established the Krosno ghetto for the remaining Jews. It was an enclosed ghetto guarded on the outside. The ghetto was in the shape of an L and was located around the Franciszkańska Square, on Franciszkańska and Spółdzielcza Streets. There were two entrances to the ghetto: on Sienkiewicz Street and near the Franciscan Church. Between 300 and 600 Jews inhabited the ghetto, and Moshe Kleiner was appointed the new head of the Krosno Judenrat.⁹

According to a report by the Krosno Jewish community dated November 8, 1942, there were 950 Jews in the Krosno area, and they performed forced labor in German factories or quarries.¹⁰

The Krosno ghetto was liquidated on December 4, 1942 (on a Friday, the first day of Hanukkah). Members of the Security Police, Order Police, and Waffen-SS, as well as Polish and Ukrainian auxiliary police, surrounded the town. The Germans ordered the remaining Jews (about 300) to assemble at Franciszkańska Street. The entire population of the ghetto, with the exception of 25 people, was sent to the Rzeszów ghetto. The area of the ghetto was searched thoroughly, and any Jew found in hiding was shot on the spot.¹¹

In the years from 1942 to 1944, the Germans shot a number of Jews who were caught in the Krosno region. In the spring of 1942, the Germans shot 6 Jews, including 4 children. Jews captured after the liquidation of the ghetto were shot inside the synagogue. Around March 1943, 7 children were shot on the street, and their parents were burned alive in one of the former Jewish houses. In 1943, between 100 and 120 Jews from Krosno and its vicinity were shot by the Germans at the Jewish cemetery on Zawodzie Street. Some Poles, such as the priest Jan Zarzecki, helped Jews by providing them with places to hide.¹²

SOURCES Publications dealing with the history and murder of the Jews in Krosno include the following: “Krosno,” in Abraham Wein and Aharon Weiss, eds., Pinkas ha-kehillot. Encyclopaedia of Jewish Communities: Poland, vol. 3, Galicia and Western Silesia (Jerusalem: Yad Vashem, 1984), pp. 329–331; “Krosno,” in Andrzej Potocki, Żydzi w Podkarpaciu (Rzeszów: Wydawnictwo Libra, 2004); Elżbieta Rączy, Ludność żydowska w Krośnie 1939–1946 (Krosno: Muzeum Rzemiosła w Krośnie, 1999); Jakob Breitowicz, Through Hell to Life (New York: Shengold Publishers, 1983); and Alexander B. White, Be a Mensch: A Legacy of the Holocaust (Scottsdale, AZ: A.B. White, 2004).

Documents on the fate of the Jews in Krosno can be found in the following archives: AŻIH (301/2832, 301/4924); BA-L (B 162/14505); IPN; USHMM (Acc.1997.A.0124, reels 31 and 32; RG-15.019M; RG-50.002*0047; RG-50.042*0017; RG-02.056; Acc.2002.335.1); VHF (# 1559, 4113, 4364, 9987, 12530, 12730, 12852, 19762, 20714, 22642, 28197, 28463, 28534, 29310, 30456, 33925, 37309, 38152, 38834, 43099, 44867, 45836, 46267, 48091, 50973, and 51382); and YVA.

Joanna Śliwa

NOTES

1. AŻIH, 301/4924, testimony of Dawid Melamed; 301/2832, testimony of Helena Bruder Szmidt Kenig.

2. USHMM, Acc.1997.A.0124, reel 31: “Aufruf—Odezwa” [Appeal of the Jewish Community of Krosno], December 22, 1939; Krosno Jewish community to AJDC in Kraków, April 20, 1941; Krosno Jewish community to JSS in Kraków, April 4, 1941; letter from JSS Kraków to Juda Engel of Krosno, June 10, 1941; JSS Kraków to Mojżesz Wiesenfeld of Krosno, June 11, 1941; Acc.1997.A.0124, reel 32, Samuel Rosshandler to JSS Kraków, April 16, 1942.

3. Ibid., Acc.1997.A.0124, reel 31, report of the visit to Krosno, November 14–16, 1941; “Regulations concerning attendance of the CENTOS School,” December 18, 1940; VHF, # 12730, testimony of Salek Beim; # 38152, testimony of Sol Willner.

4. White, Be a Mensch, pp. 93, 96–98; Itzhok Berglas and Shlomo Yahalomi-Diamand, The Book of Stryzow and Vicinity, trans. Harry Langsam (Los Angeles: “Natives of Stryzow Societies” in Israel and the Diaspora, 1990), p. 242; “Krosno,” in Wein and Weiss, Pinkas ha-kehillot: Poland, vol. 3, pp. 329–331, Galicia and Western Silesia; “Krosno,” in Potocki, Żydzi w Podkarpaciu, p. 83; BA-L, B 162/14505, verdict of LG-Bonn, 8 Ks 1/72, pp. 14–15.

5. VHF, # 4113, testimony of Alexander White; White, Be a Mensch, p. 89.

6. VHF, # 4364, testimony of Abraham Herson; # 12852, testimony of Enoch Trencher.

7. Ibid., # 28534, testimony of Manny Spindler; # 48091, testimony of Rosa Lichter.

8. VHF, # 29310, testimony of Paul Thaler; # 45836, testimony of Richard Wehrman; # 12730, testimony of Salek Beim; # 9987, testimony of Shlomo Berger; # 38152.

9. USHMM, RG-15.019M, woj. Rzeszów, “Kwestionariusz o obozach,” no. 91; AŻIH, 301/2832; Breitowicz, Through Hell to Life; BA-L, B 162/14505, verdict of LG-Bonn, 8 Ks 1/72, pp. 15, 20–22.

10. USHMM, RG-15.019M, woj. Rzeszów, “Kwestionariusz o obozach,” no. 92; Acc.1997.A.0124, reel 32, Krosno Jewish community to JSS Kraków, November 8, 1942.

11. Ibid., RG-15.019M, woj. Rzeszów, “Kwestionariusz o obozach,” no. 91; BA-L, B 162/14505, verdict of LG-Bonn, 8 Ks 1/72, pp. 15–16, 20, 22–23.

12. USHMM, RG-15.019M, reel 10, woj. Rzeszów, “Kwestionariusz o egzekucjach masowych i grobach masowych,” no. 234.

ŁAŃCUT

Pre-1939: Łańcut, town, Lwów województwo, Poland; 1939–1944: Landsbut, Kreis Jaroslau, Distrikt Krakau, Generalgouvernement; post-1998: Łańcut, województwo podkarpackie, Poland

Łańcut is located 35 kilometers (22 miles) west of Jarosław. There were 2,753 Jewish residents in Łańcut in 1921, constituting 30 percent of the total population.

On September 22, 1939, the German authorities occupying Łańcut ordered all Jews to leave the town in the direction of Jarosław and cross the San River, which they presumed would serve as the new German-Soviet border after the latter’s attack on Poland on September 17. The expulsion was to be implemented on the following day. On September 24, 1939, the Germans combed the neighborhoods in search of those who had stayed behind, loading them onto trucks with no luggage and driving them to the other bank of the San. However, some of the Jews, who had left on their own initiative, settled along the way in nearby villages, hoping to be able to return to Łańcut.¹

Jews are forced to dig graves before a killing Aktion in the Łańcut ghetto, which coincided with the ghetto’s liquidation, August 3, 1942. USHMM WS #98754, COURTESY OF GFH

In the first days of October 1939, the Germans announced that those Jews remaining could stay in Łańcut on condition that they register with the authorities. According to survivor R.L., they were allowed to remain in their own houses but forbidden to leave Łańcut, which meant that effectively a form of open ghetto was established, bounded by the town's limits. R.L. does not state exactly when the movement of Łańcut's Jews was restricted in this way.² Historian Czesław Pilichowski states that the Germans established a ghetto at the end of 1939. According to Sefer Łantsut, however, this probably occurred much later, when all the remaining communities in the Kreis were ghettoized. According to this source, the head of Kreis Jaroslau, Georg Eisenlohr, issued an order on December 18, 1941, forbidding the Jews from leaving their places of domicile on pain of death. "Domicile" was defined as an urban or village community, a village, or lodging place. The order went into effect on January 1, 1942.

In October or November 1939, the Germans designated Marcus Pohorille to serve as the chairman of the Jewish Council (Judenrat). His staff included Luzer Marder, Shlomo Greenbaum, Leizer Fass, Wolf Gutman, Moshe Sigel, David Rosenblum, Hayyim Leib Kornblau, Isaac Weinbach, and Israel Gersten. Rachel Sapir was the Judenrat secretary.

The Judenrat summoned one person from each Jewish family once a week for forced labor—primarily cleaning assignments. There was no soup kitchen, but each of the wealthier families had to provide for at least one poor person two days a week. Subsequently, there were only a few sporadic cases of typhus and dysentery.

Some of the Jewish houses in Łańcut were torn down to create a Planty (small recreational area with trees). In the winter of 1939–1940, the Jews were ordered to wear armbands with a Star of David emblem. They were excluded from economic life; accordingly, all 150 Jewish-owned shops were closed, and by January 1940, their remaining property had to be registered.

Early in 1940, the Germans ordered all Jews performing forced labor to be registered. Of the total of 900 Jewish residents at the time, at least half were newcomers, most of them having been expelled from the western parts of Poland incorporated into the Reich. Of that number, 157 were between the ages of 14 and 60 (i.e., 17.4 percent) and were obliged to report for forced labor. The majority of the deportees were from Łódź, Kalisz, and also some from Piotrków Trybunalski inside the Generalgouvernement.³

The Jewish Social-Self Help (JSS) committee for Kreis Jaroslau was established in Łańcut at the end of 1940, rather than in the Kreis center of Jarosław, in which very few Jews remained after similar expulsions in late September 1939. The JSS committee included two Judenrat members—M. Pohorille and L. Fass—as well as Shmelke Westreich of Kańczuga. In December 1940, the JSS estimated 6,000 Jews were left in the Kreis, of which the largest community was in Łańcut, amounting to 1,300 people (including 400 deportees).⁴

After the Germans attacked the Soviet Union on June 22, 1941, a significant number of Łańcut Jews who had been expelled into Eastern Galicia returned. These people were forced to register and pay 100 złoty.

Diana Greenbaum, the daughter of one of the Judenrat members who returned to Łańcut from Lwów in January 1942, testified that, on the whole, the community lived in peace at that time and somehow managed their lives. It was even still possible to get meat from a ritual slaughterer.⁵

At the end of 1941, Łańcut's mayor Bernard Bonnek started to persecute those Jewish returnees who had lived under Soviet occupation and had not registered on their return to Łańcut. Suspecting that many of them had collaborated with the Soviets, the mayor had 20 of them arrested and interrogated for alleged membership in the Communist Party or for being commissars; this group was later released and sent to work. Of another group of 24 returnees who were arrested, 23 were shot at the Jewish cemetery after only a few months in captivity.

Another major round of arrests of several dozen Poles and Jews was conducted on March 20–23, 1942 (or possibly in February 1942). At the same time, the Judenrat was summoned to the Gestapo; only Greenbaum, Marder, and Weinbach showed up, while the other members hid. These three were arrested along with six Jews who had been randomly picked up after the Judenrat members refused to select 10 hostages. Six of those arrested were reportedly shot in the prison courtyard, and the remainder were executed in July 1942. The resultant panic that arose among the returnees caused many to register with the authorities.⁶

Gestapo officials from Jarosław carried out most of the executions. N. Dzibulski, N. Kritzingier, and N. Kirschner are reported as having taken part in several of them. The most feared, Kokut, a member of the Łańcut German Gendarmerie, was discovered in 1957 in Czechoslovakia and extradited to Poland, where he was sentenced to death.

The new Judenrat was chaired by a lawyer, Rubin Nadel, and included Moshe Siegel, Joel Perlmutter, Mottel Kern, David Rosenblum, Hayyim Leib Kornblau, and Israel Milrad. Naphtali Reich was its secretary. According to Diana Greenbaum, the new Judenrat was made up of young people who "had no esteem in the town" and "didn't enjoy high regard" among the Jews. The Judenrat imposed various charges on the Jews, and when the Germans ordered it to collect allegedly overdue taxes in July 1942, this was conducted "in a relentless manner."⁷

From early in 1942, all Jewish men were forced to work. As news arrived of the resettlement of Jews from other towns, most people tried to secure work in road construction or in German enterprises, as such employment appeared to offer the best safeguard against being deported.⁸

On July 15, 1942, the Gestapo ordered all of Łańcut's Jews to gather at the playing field of a local high school (gymnazium) to have their identification cards (Kennkarten) stamped. Only those with stamped cards were allegedly to be spared from the resettlement, which was set for August 1, 1942. The Gestapo chief in Jarosław, Schmidt, chaired this special commission. In the end, the stamps did not make any difference. Some of those who attempted to escape to the countryside during this period were caught and shot.⁹

Jews still living in the countryside around Łańcut appear only to have been brought into the town at the last minute. For example, according to Józef Leichter, a Judenrat messenger only informed the Jewish population in Medynia Głogowska one night in advance that they would have to evacuate to the Łańcut ghetto on the following morning, August 1, 1942. Some Jews from that village were ordered to move to the Rzeszów ghetto.¹⁰

On the day of the Łańcut ghetto's liquidation (August 1, 1942), all its Jewish residents were transferred either by horse and buggy or on foot to a transit camp in Pełkinie (14 kilometers [9 miles] away). The Germans selected this former Soviet prisoner-of-war (POW) camp as the place to concentrate the Jews of the Kreis. From there, the elderly were taken to a nearby forest and shot; the others were loaded onto trains and sent to the Bełżec extermination camp. The young and able were dispatched to various labor camps.

A group of approximately 60 young people and the members of the Judenrat were sent back to Łańcut for work. They were able to move back into their apartments and help those who had survived the expulsion by hiding in Łańcut. They were then transferred to the Sieniawa ghetto, on September 17, 1942. The Sieniawa ghetto existed until May 4, 1943. Most of its residents worked in labor camps in forestry.¹¹

Georg Eisenlohr, the Kreishauptmann in Jarosław, was extradited in 1947 to Poland by the French authorities and sentenced in 1948 to five years in prison by the court in Kraków. He died in prison on March 27, 1951.

SOURCES The following publications were used to prepare this entry: Czesław Pilichowski et al., eds., Obozy hitlerowskie na ziemiach polskich 1939–1945: Informator encyklopedyczny (Warsaw: PWN, 1979), p. 287; Martin Gilbert, Holocaust Journey: Traveling in Search of the Past (New York: Columbia University Press, 1997), p. 203; and N. Kudish and M. Walzer-Fass, eds., Sefer Lantsut (Tel Aviv: Irgune yots'e Lantsut be-Yiśrael uve-Artsot ha-Berit, 1963), pp. xxxiv–xxxix.

Relevant documentation can be found in the following archives: AŻIH (211/657 [JSS]; 301/840, 301/891, 301/1501, 301/2745, 301/4939 [Relacje]); USHMM (Acc.1997.A.0124 [JSS]; RG-15.019M [ASG]); and YVA.

Jolanta Kraemer

NOTES

1. AŻIH, 301/1501, testimony of Diana Greenbaum (Grinbaum), 1946; 301/840, testimony of R.L., n.d.

2. Ibid., 301/840.

3. Ibid.

4. USHMM, Acc.1997.A.0124 (JSS), 211/657 (Łańcut), pp. 15–16.

5. AŻIH, 301/1501.

6. The sequence of events with regard to the arrests of returnees from the former Soviet-occupied zone—as well as various details—differs in the following sources: Kudish and Walzer-Fass, Sefer Lantsut, p. xxxvi; AŻIH, 301/840. According to AŻIH, 301/1501, Diana Greenbaum's father was the only Judenrat member who reported to the authorities and was arrested.

7. AŻIH, 301/1501.

8. Ibid., 301/4939, testimony of Ignacy Fliegel, 1945.

9. Ibid., 301/1501; 301/840.

10. Ibid., 301/891, testimony of Józef Leichter, 1944; 301/2745, testimony of Zalman Birenfeld, 1947.

11. USHMM, RG-15.019M (ASG Sieniawa), reel 17, p. 46; AŻIH, 301/840; and 301/1501.

LESKO

Pre-1939: Lesko (Yiddish: Linsk), town, Lwów województwo, Poland; 1939–1944: Kreis Sanok, Distrikt Krakau, Generalgouvernement; post-1998: województwo podkarpackie, Poland

Lesko is located about 208 kilometers (129 miles) east-southeast of Kraków. The 1921 census reported 2,338 Jewish residents, constituting 61.4 percent of the population.

In the first days of September 1939, Lesko received large numbers of refugees fleeing eastward, away from the advancing German troops. Among the newcomers there were 200 to 300 Jewish deserters from the Polish army. According to Leon Finver, a survivor, the local youth set up a self-defense group whose goal was to obtain civilian clothes for these deserters to prevent the Germans from sending them to prisoner-of-war (POW) camps on their capture of the town, which occurred on September 10, 1939. During the ensuing short-lived German occupation, Jews were apprehended for cleaning jobs.¹

In accordance with the Molotov-Ribbentrop Pact, Lesko became a border town with German and Russian guards on opposite ends of the bridge over the San River. Most of the Jews found life at least bearable under Soviet rule.

The situation changed radically at the end of June 1941 when the Germans recaptured Lesko, following their invasion of the Soviet Union. A Ukrainian militia and a prison to hold short-term male arrestees were soon established. By October 1941, the Sanok Kreishauptmann had taken over the administration of Lesko, as it became incorporated into Distrikt Krakau. From the very beginning of the occupation, the Germans seized religious Jews and shaved off their beards. They sporadically shot people in the streets for no reason. According to the testimony of survivor Renee Stern, unlike in other parts of the Generalgouvernement, the Jews of Lesko were not required to wear armbands with the Star of David—or at least this regulation was not enforced in Lesko.²

The new German administration ordered the establishment of a Jewish Council (Judenrat), with a notary named Teich as its chairman. According to Jaffa Wallach, the Judenrat mainly looked out for its own interests more than those of the entire community. Its tasks included the collection of contributions imposed by the Germans.³

A Jewish Social Self-Help (JSS) committee independent of the Judenrat was established in Lesko following the German occupation. By August 1941, the soup kitchen was serving 400 meals daily. It closed within a month, however, and when it reopened in mid-October, it was only able to distribute 200 bowls of soup per day. To help as many of the needy as possible, the JSS only issued meals to individuals on alternate days. The kitchen was financed by the Kraków central office of the JSS, by donations from local Jews, and by the Judenrat. By November 1941, there were 2,260 Jews living in Lesko (684 families). At that time, the Judenrat was reporting cases of people swelling up from hunger. The only Jewish shop operating sold stationery. Dr. Nathan Wallach attended Lesko's sick.⁴

There is no information on Jews performing forced labor in the town; however, registrations of men aged 18 to 50 were conducted at the town hall, and a number were conscripted to build labor camps in the vicinity. According to one source, there were also roundups of young males who were never heard from again.⁵

As of December 12, 1941, the Sanok Kreishauptmann restricted the residency of Jews in the Kreis to those who were registered prior to June 22, 1941. All those who had arrived after that date were ordered to leave the Kreis. There is no information on how this impacted the population of Lesko; however, by April 1942, the number of Jews had changed very little, that is, to 2,300.⁶

A ghetto was established in Lesko in the spring of 1942, and an estimated 200 Jews were shot during the ghetto's existence. Renee Stern, whose family had to leave their market square lodging, said that Jews were being transferred "in bunches" to the town's outskirts. Residents were forbidden to leave the ghetto, but there is no information as to whether it was closed or guarded. Peasants who were free to move around often came to the ghetto to sell or barter food. There were cases of contagious diseases. In 1942, the Judenrat reported spending a significant amount of its funds on burials (700 złoty monthly, as compared with 150 to 250 złoty per month in 1941).⁷

When welfare donations dried up in May 1942, the Judenrat imposed forced contributions. The stationery shop remained open, and a second Jewish shop—a grocery—had just received permission to operate. Nine workshops were still open (two barbers, four tailors, two tinsmiths, and a haberdasher). The Judenrat reported that the remainder of Lesko's Jews lived by selling their belongings or from welfare support. Despite the poverty, the soup kitchen continued serving meals. A day-care center for 46 children aged 4 to 15 had opened by July 1942, serving three meals per day.⁸

A large-scale transfer of Jews to Lesko from throughout Kreis Sanok began in June 1942—for example, those from nearby Cisna (31 kilometers [19 miles] south of Lesko) were expelled to Lesko on June 20, 1942. The transfer was unannounced and conducted by German and Ukrainian police units. Cisna's Jews were marched to Lesko-Łukawica, where the newcomers were forced to surrender any money exceeding 20 złoty, which was then handed over to the Lesko Judenrat.⁹

By mid-July 1942, the Judenrat reported that 365 expellees had arrived, whereas in total some 1,600 new arrivals from the entire Kreis were expected. Regarding the Jewish communities that were transferred to Lesko, only a few locations are known, including Wola Michowa, Baligród (15 kilometers

[9 miles] south of Lesko), and Kalnica (or Kalica). The Judenrat supervised the accommodation of the newcomers. A carpentry workshop was opened to make bunk beds, chairs, and tables for them. The soup kitchen was expanded, serving almost 900 meals per day.¹⁰

On September 4, 1942, the Sanok Kreishauptmann, Dr. Class, announced that the deportation of all the Jews of the Kreis would commence the next day, and he warned the non-Jewish population that any assistance rendered to the Jews would be punishable by death.¹¹

According to Jaffa Wallach, all Jews—with the exception of the Jewish doctor—were "imprisoned in their own houses" prior to the deportation. On September 6, 1942, the ghetto residents were free to go out until nightfall when they were to return and be ready for their departure to the Zasław labor camp 6 kilometers (4 miles) northeast of Lesko, where they were to work in a paper factory. Following a selection, approximately 100 elderly and disabled Jews were shot at the Jewish cemetery in Lesko.¹²

Sources agree that the ghetto liquidation took place at night and that the ghetto's residents were marched to Zasław; however, some date it on August 14, 1942—before the Kreishauptmann's deportation order.¹³ According to The Encyclopedia of Jewish Life, Lesko's Jews made a mass pilgrimage to the local cemetery before leaving for Zasław.¹⁴

On arrival at the camp barracks in Zasław, the Lesko Jews found them already overcrowded with Jews brought there from other localities, so they were forced to remain outside. They did not receive any food, and there was no work waiting for them. Over the next few days, a deportation transport of 4,000 Jews, including women and children, was sent from Zasław to the Bełżec extermination camp. This was followed by the shooting of elderly Jews in a nearby forest and then more transports to Bełżec, which continued until the camp's liquidation in 1943.¹⁵

SOURCES The following sources include information on the ghetto in Lesko: Andrzej Potocki, Podkarpackie judaica (Brzozów: Związek Gmin Brzozowskich and Muzeum Regionalne PT'TK w Brzozowie, 1993), p. 38; Czesław Pilichowski et al., eds., Obozy hitlerowskie na ziemiach polskich 1939–1945: Informator encyklopedyczny (Warsaw: PWN, 1979), p. 266; and Jerzy Tomaszewski and Andrzej Żbikowski, eds., Żydzi w Polsce. Dzieje i kultura. Leksykon (Warsaw: Wydawnictwo Cyklady, 2001), p. 252.

The following archival sources were used in preparing this entry: AŻIH (211/636; and 301/280); USHMM (Acc.1997.A.0124 [JSS], reel 32 [Lesko]); and VHF (# 10770-2, 11086-1, 15248-9, 16875, 25239-3, and 32066).

Jolanta Kraemer

NOTES

1. VHF, # 10770-2, testimony of Leon Finver, 1996.
2. USHMM, Acc.1997.A.0124 (JSS), reel 32, 211/636, p. 6; VHF, # 25239-3, testimony of Renee Stern; and # 11086-1, testimony of Rosalind Ryza. It is possible that the armband regulation was not enforced in Lesko, as the town only became part of Distrikt Krakau in the summer of 1941, whereas the armband regulations had been introduced throughout the rest of the Distrikt at the end of 1939.

3. VHF, # 16875, testimony of Jaffa Wallach, 1996.

4. USHMM, Acc.1997.A.0124 (JSS), reel 32, 211/636, pp. 1–2, 5–7.

5. VHF, # 25239–3; and # 11086–1.

6. USHMM, Acc.1997.A.0124 (JSS), reel 32, 211/636, pp. 22–23; and Acc.1997.A.0124, reel 31, 211/614, p. 30, letter signed by Dr. Tisch of November 17, 1941.

7. VHF, # 25239–3; # 11086–1; and USHMM, Acc.1997.A.0124 (JSS), reel 32, 211/636, pp. 22–23.

8. USHMM, Acc.1997.A.0124 (JSS), reel 32, 211/636, pp. 23, 25, 26, 28.

9. AŻIH, 301/280, testimony of Moses Zwas, 1945.

10. Ibid. Please note that two different villages named Kalnica are located in the vicinity, in Cisna and Zagórz gminas. Zwas estimates that 13,000 Jews were collected in the ghetto before its liquidation, but this figure is clearly too high. Also see USHMM, Acc.1997.A.0124 (JSS), reel 32, 211/636, p. 28.

11. W. Bielawski, Zbrodnie na Polakach dokonane przez hitlerowców za pomoc udzielaną Żydom (Warsaw: Główna Komisja Badania Zbrodni Hitlerowskich w Polsce, 1987), p. 121.

12. VHF, # 16875; and Potocki, Podkarpackie, p. 38.

13. VHF, # 16875. According to AŻIH, 301/280, the ghetto was liquidated at the end of August 1942. Tomaszewski and Żbikowski, Żydzi w Polsce, p. 252, and Potocki, Podkarpackie, p. 38, both date the liquidation Aktion on August 14, 1942.

14. Schmuel Spector and Geoffrey Wigoder, The Encyclopedia of Jewish Life before and during the Holocaust (Jerusalem: Yad Vashem; New York: New York University Press, 2001), p. 724; please note that this publication erroneously places Lesko in today's Ukraine.

15. AŻIH, 301/280; Pilichowski et al., Obozy hitlerowskie, p. 445; and VHF, # 16875.

LEŻAJSK

Pre-1939: Leżajsk (Yiddish: Lizbensk), town, Lwów województwo, Poland; 1939–1945: Leżajsk, Kreis Jaroslaw, Distrikt Krakau, Generalgouvernement; post-1998: Leżajsk, województwo podkarpackie, Poland

Leżajsk is located about 200 kilometers (124 miles) east-northeast of Kraków. On the eve of World War II, there were around 2,500 Jews residing in Leżajsk.

Following the outbreak of war in September 1939, many Jews fled eastward from Leżajsk—by crossing the San River—into what was soon to become Soviet-occupied territory. The Germans occupied Leżajsk on September 10, 1939. On that same day the Germans set the synagogue on fire. They plundered Jewish property and abused mainly the Orthodox Jews. At the end of September 1939, the Germans expelled most of the Jews to the Soviet occupation zone. Only about 350 Jews, who had hidden in nearby villages, returned to live in the town. A local ethnic German, Nelis, was appointed as mayor of Leżajsk.¹

At the end of 1939 or in January 1940, the German authorities established an “open ghetto” in Leżajsk in an area that had also been inhabited by Jews before the war. The Germans concentrated some 40 Jewish families from Leżajsk and an unknown number of resettled Jews into a “Jewish quarter,” on Bożnicza Street, where the synagogue had once stood. Poles and Germans took over the vacant Jewish dwellings. According to a report prepared by the Leżajsk branch of Jewish Social Self-Help (JSS) in May 1942, there were 105 small wooden houses and 27 brick houses in the Jewish quarter. The Jews were allowed to leave the area between 8:00 A.M. and 10:00 A.M. to purchase food. Conversations among Jews in the ghetto were concerned mainly with food and the bleak outlook for the future. Education and religious practice were forbidden by the Germans, but Yosel Melamed taught the children to keep them occupied, and some Jews worshipped secretly and observed the Sabbath. In 1940, the Jews were also required to wear white armbands bearing a blue Star of David.²

A Jewish Council (Judenrat) was formed, headed by Feivel Wagner, Shmuel Ozer, and Leibel Katz. It was entrusted with providing laborers for the Germans who performed work such as digging up matzevot (Jewish tombstones) for paving roads. Jewish women worked mainly as maids in German homes. In November 1940, the Judenrat planned to open a community kitchen for the impoverished Jews of Leżajsk, which would distribute around 200 meals a day. The Judenrat wrote to the JSS in Kraków requesting assistance with the provision of food supplies.³

In 1941, the Germans enclosed the Leżajsk ghetto. Now Jews could leave the ghetto only with a special permit and only for labor. Jews caught outside the ghetto without a permit were imprisoned in the local jail; 6 Jews were executed in the jail yard. According to the Leżajsk branch of the JSS, there were about 1,000 Jews in the town as of April 1, 1942. The inhabitants of the Leżajsk ghetto consisted of the Jewish population of Leżajsk and the surrounding area who had evaded the Nazi deportation into the Soviet Union and more than 100 resettled Jews from Kalisz (arrived in 1939), Kraków (resettled in 1940), and Germany (deported in 1938).⁴

The anti-Jewish Aktions conducted by the Germans intensified. In 1942 (the exact date is unknown), members of the Gestapo and Order Police shot a number of Jews at the Jewish cemetery in Leżajsk. The details of the Aktion are unclear, since the arrests and shooting of the Jews took place at night. Soon afterward, a group of Jews was sent to an unknown destination. On June 23, 1942, the Germans shot 8 Jews who were being transported to Sieniawa. On July 15, 1942, the Germans shot 16 Jews in the town's square and executed 20 Jews in Jelna.⁵

At the end of July and beginning of August 1942, German police forces liquidated the Leżajsk ghetto: 39 Jews were taken to the village of Wierzawice and shot; the remaining Jews were taken to a temporary camp in Pełkinie, about 20 kilometers (12 miles) to the southeast, and after brutal treatment, they were deported to the Bełżec extermination camp. Several families and individual Jews were hidden by their Christian acquaintances. Some survived with the aid of Aryan papers provided by Marian Kozyra, which enabled them to register for work in Germany. Others fled to the forests in the hope of surviving there. The Germans conducted thorough searches of the Leżajsk area for hidden Jews, right up to the end of the occupation.⁶

On February 18, 1945, a unit of the National Military Organization “Wołyński” attacked three Jewish homes and a building of the Soviet People’s Commissariat of Internal Affairs (NKVD), killing a number of Jews. The few survivors immigrated mainly to Israel and the United States. The Jewish community of Leżajsk was not reconstituted after the war, but Jews from all over the world come to Leżajsk on Adar 21, the anniversary of tzaddik Elimelech Weisblum’s death (Yahrzeit). The ohel (a structure built over the resting place of a tzaddik, destroyed by the Germans in 1940) was restored in 1963, thanks to the efforts of Boruh Sefir, who survived the war in a Soviet camp; and Kazimierz Gdula and Rabbi Friedman, who, while imprisoned at Dachau concentration camp, promised each other to rebuild the ohel if they survived.⁷

SOURCES Publications dealing with the persecution and murder of the Jews in Leżajsk include the following: “Leżajsk,” in Abraham Wein and Aharon Weiss, eds., Pinkas ha-kehillot. Encyclopaedia of Jewish Communities: Poland, vol. 3, Galicja and Western Silesia (Jerusalem: Yad Vashem, 1984), pp. 232–236; Chaim Rabin, ed., Lizbensk; sefer zikaron le-kedoshei Lizbensk she-nispu be-sboat ha-natsim (Tel Aviv: Former Residents of Leżajsk in Israel, 1970); “Leżajsk,” in Andrzej Potocki, Żydzi w Podkarpaciu (Rzeszów: Wydawnictwo Libra, 2004); and Stanisław Kłos, Leżajsk i powiat leżajski (Krosno: Roksana, 1999).

Relevant documentation can be found in the following archives: AŻIH (211/638); IPN; USHMM (Acc.1997.A.0124 [JSS], reel 32; RG-15.019M [ASG], reels 10 and 17); VHF (# 7685 and 47446); and YVA.

Joanna Śliwa

NOTES

1. VHF, # 7685, testimony of Paula Engel; Rabin, Lizbensk, pp. 41–45, 271.

2. VHF, # 7685; Rabin, Lizbensk, pp. 46–54, 82, 271–273; USHMM, Acc.1997.A.0124 (JSS), reel 32, report of Leżajsk branch of JSS to JSS headquarters in Kraków, received May 21, 1942.

3. VHF, # 7685; Rabin, Lizbensk, pp. 46–54, 82, 271–272; USHMM, Acc.1997.A.0124, reel 32, Leżajsk Judenrat to JSS Kraków, November 28, 1940.

4. USHMM, Acc.1997.A.0124, reel 32, Leżajsk JSS to JSS Kraków, received May 21, 1942.

5. Ibid., RG-15.019M, reel 10, ASG, woj. rzeszowskie, “Kwestionariusz o egzekucjach masowych i grobach masowych,” Leżajsk, p. 345; IPN, ASG, woj. rzeszowskie, “Egzekucje,” Łańcut; Sąd Grodzki w Łańcut, Zg—brak numeru aktów zgonu/1946; Potocki, Żydzi w Podkarpaciu, p. 95.

6. E. Podhorizer-Sandel, “O zagładzie Żydów w dystrykcie krakowskim,” BŻIH, no. 30 (1959): 95–96; Rabin, Lizbensk, pp. 21–27.

7. Potocki, Żydzi w Podkarpaciu, p. 96; N. Aleksium-Mądrzak, “Nielegalna emigracja Żydów z Polski w latach 1945–1947,” BŻIH, nos. 3/95–2/96 (1995–1996): 76; Rabin, Lizbensk, pp. 130–133. See also Adam Mickiewicz Institute, available at www.diapozytow.pl/en/site/slady_i_judaica/lezajsk.

LIMANOWA

Pre-1939: Limanowa, town and powiat center, Kraków województwo, Poland; 1939–1945: Ilmenau, Kreis Neu-Sandez, Distrikt Krakau, Generalgouvernement; post-1998: Limanowa, town and powiat center, województwo małopolskie, Poland

The town of Limanowa is located 74 kilometers (46 miles) southeast of Kraków. According to the 1931 census, 1,002 Jews were living in Limanowa.

German forces occupied Limanowa on September 10, 1939. Shortly after their arrival, the Germans started to persecute the Jewish population; they arrested six Jews and took them to the nearby village of Stara Wieś, where they killed them.¹

On the official establishment of the Generalgouvernement on October 26, 1939, Limanowa became part of Kreis Neu-Sandez in Distrikt Krakau. The Kreishauptmann in Nowy Sącz was Dr. Reinhard Busch. The Aktions against the Jewish population in the Kreis were organized and carried out by the Grenzpolizeikommissariat (Border Police Office, GPK) in Nowy Sącz, subordinated to the Commanding Officer of the Security Police and SD (KdS) in Kraków. SS-Obersturmführer Heinrich Hamann, one of the cruelest and most bloodthirsty SS officers in the region, was in charge of the Nowy Sącz GPK (also known simply as the Gestapo) from 1940 to 1943. In implementing the various anti-Jewish measures and Aktions, the Security Police was assisted by the German Gendarmerie and the Polish (Blue) Police in Limanowa.

In the fall of 1939 and the spring of 1940, a large number of refugees came to Limanowa from other towns in Poland. In March 1940, 500 refugees from the city of Łódź were confined within a refugee camp in Limanowa. This camp was, however, soon closed down without warning in mid-April. The refugees were sent to Nowy Sącz, Grybów, Mszana Dolna, and Limanowa; from the fall of 1940 and during 1941, these became collecting centers for all the Jews forced out of the smaller towns and villages in the area.²

The bodies of sixty Limanowa Jews who were murdered in the Jewish cemetery are prepared for burial, ca. 1942–1943. USHMM WS #50376, COURTESY OF IPN

In the fall of 1940, there were 895 Jews in Limanowa, including 95 refugees. In September 1940, a public kitchen coordinated by the local Jewish Council (Judenrat) was established in Limanowa to alleviate the growing needs of the local population.³ By the summer of 1941, all the Jews from the surrounding villages had been concentrated in the town, and the population had swelled to over 1,000 residents. At the end of December 1941, the Germans conducted a “Fur Aktion” in Limanowa and imposed a large monetary contribution on the Jewish population.⁴ In April 1942, Limanowa counted a population of 1,402 Jews, including 602 refugees.⁵

In April 1942, the head of the GPK, Hamann, in Nowy Sącz received instructions from KdS Kraków to arrest and shoot all Jews in the Kreis known to be Communists or to sympathize with them. In response, Hamann obtained an old membership list for the Poalei Zion (left-wing Zionist) movement and ordered that all those on the list be arrested with the assistance of the Jewish Councils and Jewish Police. When the head of the Judenrat in Limanowa, Sola Shnitzer, refused to obey this order, Hamann traveled personally to Limanowa. On April 20, 1942, Hamann arrested Shnitzer together with the other members of the Judenrat. They were taken to a barn not far from the office of the Judenrat, where, under Hamann’s supervision, three SS men shot them. The members of Poalei Zion in Limanowa were then arrested and shot shortly afterwards.

On June 4, 1942, the Germans established an enclosed ghetto in the town. The ghetto was located in the so-called Kamieniec area along the Mordarka Stream.⁶ Between July 10 and July 16, 1942, more than 50 Jews from the ghetto were murdered by the Gestapo from Nowy Sącz and members of the local Gendarmerie post in Limanowa. In particular, Hamann directed the shooting of 33 people on July 16, 1942, with the aim of inducing the Jews in the ghetto to pay a contribution consisting of 75,000 złoty, several meters of fabric, 50 liters (13 gallons) of spirits, and 50 kilograms (110 pounds) of canned food.⁷ Another contribution was requested at the beginning of August 1942, when similar contributions were demanded from the Jews in Nowy Sącz, Stary Sącz, Grybów, and Mszana Dolna.⁸

On August 16, 1942, the Gestapo office in Nowy Sącz began the evacuation of the Jews from the ghettos of Limanowa, Stary Sącz, and Grybów, and from Mszana Dolna to the two ghettos in Nowy Sącz. The ghetto in Limanowa was liquidated on August 18, 1942.⁹ One day prior to this, Poles conscripted into the Baudienst (Construction Service) were ordered to excavate a mass grave in the forest about 2 kilometers (1.2 miles) south of town on the road to nearby Stara Wieś.¹⁰

All the Jews were forced to assemble in the marketplace; they were allowed to bring with them only 20 kilograms (44 pounds) of luggage.¹¹ Among those assembled in the marketplace were 50 Jews who were already in a special work detachment (Arbeitskommando), employed as workers for the Vianowa construction company. Another 50 workers were then selected by Hamann for this detachment to fulfill the quota of 100; after the selection, the group was forced to surrender all valuables and marched to a labor camp in nearby Sowliny.¹² Around 200 people, mostly the sick and the elderly, were selected and taken to the mass grave close to Stara Wieś and shot on the spot by members of the Gestapo and the SS.¹³ The Germans forced all the others, about 800 people, to walk to the ghettos in Nowy Sącz, some 26 kilometers (16 miles) away.¹⁴ At the end of August 1942, the occupiers deported almost all the Jews in the Nowy Sącz ghettos to the extermination camp in Bełżec.

After the liquidation of the ghetto, the Żulag (Jewish forced labor camp) at Sowliny to the north of the town continued to exist until November 1942. An additional 80 Jews were sent there from Mszana Dolna. On November 5, 1942, on Hamann’s orders, Fechner from the Gestapo in Nowy Sącz, assisted by local Gendarmerie officials under the command of Leutnant Georg Urban, escorted the remaining Jews of this camp (about 150 people) to a forest near Tymbark, to the west of Limanowa, where they were shot.¹⁵

Once the ghetto had been cleared, the houses in the area of the former ghetto were occupied by local Poles. The Germans arranged for the sorting of remaining Jewish property, and the less valuable items were auctioned off to local inhabitants.¹⁶

SOURCES Information on the fate of the Jewish population of Limanowa during the Holocaust can be found in the following publications: Abraham Wein and Aharon Weiss, eds., Pinkas ha-kebilot. Encyclopaedia of Jewish Communities: Poland, vol. 3, Galicja and Western Silesia (Jerusalem: Yad Vashem, 1984), pp. 235–236; Czesław Pilichowski et al., eds., Obozy hitlerowskie na ziemiach polskich 1939–1945: Informator encyklopedyczny (Warsaw: PWN, 1979), p. 268; and Justiz und NS-Verbrechen, vol. 24 (Amsterdam: Amsterdam University Press, 1998), Lfd. Nr. 635, pp. 269–484 (LG-Bo, 16 Ks 1/65, verdict against Heinrich Hamann and others).

Documentation on the persecution and destruction of the Jewish community of Limanowa can be found in these archives: AŻIH (301/1203 and 1703); IPN; USHMM, (RG.15.019M [ASG], reels 4 and 14–15; and Acc.1997.A.0124 [JSS], reel 32, 211/693); VHF; and YVA.

Caterina Crisci

NOTES

1. USHMM, RG-15.019M (ASG), reel 4.
2. ŻuNS-V, vol. 24, Lfd. Nr. 635 (Urteil von LG-Bo, 16 Ks 1/65, July 22, 1966), p. 308.
3. USHMM, Acc.1997.A.0124 (JSS), reel 32, 211/639.
4. ŻuNS-V, vol. 24, Lfd. Nr. 635, p. 328.
5. USHMM, Acc.1997.A.0124, reel 32, 211/639.
6. Ibid., RG-15.019M, reels 14–15, p. 110, “Kwestionariusz o obozach”; and Wein and Weiss, Pinkas ha-kebilot: Poland, vol. 3, Galicja and Western Silesia, p. 235.
7. USHMM, RG-15.019M, reel 3. It is not clear from this source if these shootings in July were related to the Aktion in April.
8. AŻIH, 301/1703, testimony of S. Kaufer.
9. ŻuNS-V, vol. 24, Lfd. Nr. 635, pp. 393–397.
10. Ibid.
11. AŻIH, 301/1203, testimony of Mojżesz Ginter.

12. JuNS-V, vol. 24, Lfd. Nr. 635, pp. 393–397.
13. USHMM, RG-15.019M, reel 3.
14. JuNS-V, vol. 24, Lfd. Nr. 635, pp. 393–397; and AŻIH, 301/1703.
15. JuNS-V, vol. 24, Lfd. Nr. 635, pp. 438–440.
16. USHMM, RG-15.019M, reels 14–15, p. 110, “Kwestionariusz o obozach.”

MIECHÓW

Pre-1939: Miechów, town and powiat center, Kielce województwo, Poland; 1939–1945: Miechow, Kreis center, Distrikt Krakau, Generalgouvernement; post-1998: Miechów, województwo małopolskie, Poland

Miechów is located about 38 kilometers (24 miles) north of Kraków. In 1939, on the eve of war, the Jewish population was about 2,500 (out of a total of 6,700).

At the time of the German invasion on September 1, 1939, a large number of refugees, Jewish and non-Jewish, arrived in Miechów from towns and cities near the German-Polish border. The Germans arrived on September 3, and food supplies became short, as the Germans took the best for themselves.¹ Soon the German army and SS were abusing the Jews, and they burned down the synagogue.²

In the fall of 1939, the leadership of the Jewish community was reconstituted as a Jewish Council (Judenrat), which was chaired by Hirsch Edelist. Its principal responsibility was to supply workers for forced labor. A six-man unit of Jewish Police assisted in enforcing German demands. In December the Judenrat was ordered to compel every Jew aged 15 or older to wear a white armband with a Star of David. The Judenrat, which controlled the supply of material for the armbands, manufactured and sold them to people.³

A few Jews who had escaped to the Soviet part of divided Poland slipped across the border for visits and reported on the relatively tolerant treatment of Jews on the Soviet side. This prompted a small number of young people to cross the San River and try their luck under the Soviets. During the period between the division of Poland in 1939 and the German invasion of the Soviet Union on June 22, 1941, there was a reliable postal service across the border. The winter of 1939–1940 passed without major disruption. However, Jews were under constant threat of being kidnapped for forced labor, such as shoveling snow. An 8:00 P.M. until dawn curfew was imposed on the Jewish population.⁴

In April 1940, German soldiers surrounded the town and forced the Jews and some non-Jews to assemble at the Miechów municipality. The Germans instigated a riot, breaking into Jewish homes, smashing furnishings, attacking the men, and raping some women. Towards evening they lit bonfires and forced the Jews to burn holy books and religious articles while singing and dancing around the fires.

In the spring of 1940, a German firm, Jaeger, arrived to take charge of repaving the Kraków-Miechów-Warsaw highway. The Judenrat was ordered to provide a substantial workforce as quickly as possible. Well-to-do members of the community bribed their way out of the labor gangs (10 złoty per day, paid to the Judenrat) and were replaced by poorer people. In many cases the meager food allowance the workers received was a lifesaver. There were, however, protests against such favoritism by some youths, who were repeatedly pressed into forced labor. Other parties were used to redirect the river channel at the edge of town or for road maintenance.⁵

From the start of the occupation until July 1940, Miechów's total population increased from 6,700 to 9,860, mainly due to the influx of Jewish refugees. Another 1,000 Jews who were expelled from Kraków arrived during the summer of 1940. From time to time, the local authorities forced people, mainly Jews, to leave the town to relieve the overcrowding. The Judenrat took on the responsibility for health and sanitation, assistance to the needy, education, and other functions. Some of the Kraków refugees were sick with typhus, and everyone in Miechów was inoculated. The Judenrat also opened a bathhouse and ordered everyone to bathe there on a weekly basis. Members of the sanitation service entered houses to inspect for cleanliness and to fumigate clothing. In June 1940, 120 poor people received one warm meal a day. By March 1941, the public soup kitchen was serving 300 meals a day for a token payment. A women's committee tended to the nourishment of 150 children and ran a kindergarten in the Judenrat building. A local branch of the Jewish Social Self-Help (JSS) organization in Kraków was also active in Miechów, although it did not always see eye to eye with the Judenrat.⁶

A man stands alongside a wall inscribed with a Star of David inside the Miechów ghetto, July 11, 1941.

USHMM WS #18606, COURTESY OF IPN

According to the JSS records for Miechów, in March 1941 the Jews were ordered to move to about 10 designated streets in the south of town around the synagogue, which became a “partially enclosed” ghetto. The ghetto area contained 350 houses, which had to accommodate more than 2,000 people.⁷ The German authorities gave the Jews only a few hours to move in, taking only what they could carry with them. Two or three families were forced to share each house. The few Christians who lived there were moved into abandoned Jewish houses. Subsequently the Judenrat was instructed to build a 5-meter-high (16.4-feet-high) wall topped with barbed wire, at its own expense, around the ghetto. Entry and exit required a permit from the German authorities. However, the guards could be bribed, and local farmers exchanged produce for work done by tailors and shoemakers in the ghetto, so that Jews could supplement their inadequate rations. At the start, there were probably around 2,500 inhabitants in the ghetto.⁸

In 1941 and 1942, additional Jews arrived from surrounding towns, as well as some deportees from Austria and Germany. Due to the overcrowded conditions, about 300 refugees were moved from Miechów to Działoszyce. During the winter of 1941–1942, the oppressive conditions and hunger grew worse. By February 1942, the JSS was assisting 450 needy people, and the public soup kitchen had to increase the number of daily meals. Despite the ban on movement in and out of the ghetto, ways were found to acquire food. Until the spring of 1942, the Jews of Miechów were able to send food packages to relatives in other towns. By 1942, Jews caught outside the ghetto would be shot on sight.⁹

One day at the end of June 1942, the Jews were locked inside the ghetto. Then 50 young men were taken to the Great Synagogue and held for 24 hours. On the next day they were taken to Bonarka, near Kraków, and put to work in the brick factory. For a while they were able to steal away from the work camp for an occasional Sunday visit in Miechów.¹⁰

On August 28, 1942, the Security Police post in Miechów took 600 sick and elderly Jews to Słomniki, where they joined thousands of others from the region. They were held without food or water, under heavy guard, in a swampy field on the banks of the Szereniawa River. After a week, at the beginning of September, a “selection” took place. Several hundred Jews were taken to open pits and killed on the spot. Jews deemed fit for work were sent to labor camps, while the rest were loaded onto freight trains and taken to the extermination camp at Bełżec. On September 4, 1942, the great Aktion took place in Miechów. German police units and auxiliary forces surrounded the ghetto and chased the inhabitants into a field near the train station, where thousands of Jews from Działoszyce, Proszowice, Skalmierz, and other nearby towns were waiting. Many who evaded the roundup were hunted down and shot. The Germans selected 800 to 900 young men for the labor camps at Prokocim and Płaszów. The rest were put into freight cars “sanitized” with a dusting of lime and transported to Bełżec. About 50 Jews were kept back to clean up the ghetto and sort the possessions that were left behind. During the following weeks, they were joined by some 200 others who had escaped deportation or fled the labor camps to seek refuge in Miechów. Some were former inhabitants, others from smaller towns in the area.¹¹

At the beginning of November 1942, the German command ordered the complete “cleansing” of Kreis Miechow. In mid-November, the deputy Kreishauptmann in Miechów, Dr. Friedrich Schmidt, assisted by some local Poles, SS forces, German Gendarmerie, men of the civil administration, and the Jewish Police, captured about 600 surviving Jews from throughout the Kreis (including the last few dozen Jews left after the deportation from nearby Koszyce, where no formal ghetto had been established) and murdered them in the Chodówka Forest. Their bodies were thrown into pits dug by local farmers. Some who had hidden in the forest emerged from their hiding places, and they too were caught and shot to death. On January 15, 1943, the Germans burst into the ghetto and finished off the remaining 32 Jews (composed mainly of the Judenrat and Jewish Police). These victims were thrown into a common grave at the Jewish cemetery.¹²

Despite these Aktions, about 20 Jews managed to escape. Most of them survived in hiding for the rest of the war. On January 16, 1945, the Red Army drove the Germans from Miechów.¹³

SOURCES Articles on the destruction of the Jewish population of the town can be found in the following publications: Nachman Blumental and Aviva Ben-Azar (Broshy), eds., Sefer yizkor Miechow, Charsznica, Ksiaz (Tel Aviv: Former Residents of Miechow, Charshnitz and Kshoynzh, 1971); Abraham Wein, Bracha Freundlich, and Wila Orbach, eds., Pinkas ha-kehilot. Encyclopaedia of Jewish Communities: Poland, vol. 7, Lublin and Kielce (Jerusalem: Yad Vashem, 1999), pp. 300–305. The personal memoir of William Eisen, Two Pounds of Sugar (Buffalo, NY: William Eisen, 2003), includes a description of his life in the ghetto. The ghetto in Miechów is mentioned in Czesław Pilichowski et al., eds., Obozy hitlerowskie na ziemiach polskich 1939–1945: Informator encyklopedyczny (Warsaw: PWN, 1979), pp. 317–318.

Documentation on the fate of the Jews of Miechów during the Holocaust can be found in the following archives: AŻIH (301/1739; and 211/680–694); BA-L (ZStL/II 206 AR-Z 40/62); ITS; USHMM (RG-15.019M, reel 14; RG-50.002*0063; and RG-50.155*0009); VHF (e.g., # 5821, 11791, 20139); and YVA.

Samuel Fishman

NOTES

1. Blumental and Ben-Azar, Sefer yizkor Miechow, pp. 196, 197.

2. Ibid., p. 197.

3. Ibid.; Eisen, Two Pounds of Sugar, pp. 45–46.

4. Blumental and Ben-Azar, Sefer yizkor Miechow, p. 198; USHMM, RG-50.002*0063, Oral History with Aba Prawer, March 19, 1987; RG-50.155*0009, Video Testimony of Emanuel Tanay, June 16, 1987.

5. Blumental and Ben-Azar, Sefer yizkor Miechow, pp. 198–199.

6. AŻIH, 211/680–694 (files of the JSS branch in Miechów).

7. Ibid., 211/694, p. 48; VHF, # 5821, testimony of Peter Gersh recalls that ghettoization took place “a bit over a year after the start of the occupation.”

8. Eisen, Two Pounds of Sugar, pp. 48–49. Blumental and Ben-Azar, Sefer yizkor Miechow, pp. 215, 217, also date the establishment of the ghetto in 1940. Other sources date it in April 1941 (USHMM, RG-15.019M, reel 14, p. 123) or September 1941 (Wein, Freundlich, and Orbach, Pinkas ha-kebilot: Poland, vol. 7, Lublin and Kielce, pp. 303–304). These later dates probably reflect the completion of the wall around the ghetto; in his oral testimony (USHMM, RG-50.155*0009), Emanuel Tanay stresses that the ghetto was established incrementally and probably was not formally “closed” until 1942.

9. Wein, Freundlich, and Orbach, Pinkas ha-kebilot: Poland, vol. 7, Lublin and Kielce, pp. 303–304; AŻIH, 211/694, p. 48.

10. Blumental and Ben-Azar, Sefer yizkor Miechow, p. 199.

11. Wein, Freundlich, and Orbach, Pinkas ha-kebilot: Poland, vol. 7, Lublin and Kielce, p. 304.

12. Blumental and Ben-Azar, Sefer yizkor Miechow, p. 211, 217; another account (p. 200) dates this Aktion on January 15, 1943. Also see USHMM, RG-15.019M, reel 14, p. 123; AŻIH, 301/1739.

13. Blumental and Ben-Azar, Sefer yizkor Miechow, p. 211.

NIEBYLEC

Pre-1939: Niebylec (Yiddish: Nebilitz), village, Rzeszów powiat, Łwów województwo, Poland; 1939–1945: Kreis Reichshof, Distrikt Krakau, Generalgouvernement; post-1998: województwo podkarpackie, Poland

Niebylec is located approximately 22 kilometers (14 miles) south of Rzeszów. An estimated 450 Jews were living in the Niebylec gmina on the eve of World War II.¹

Following the German invasion in September 1939, the German authorities had established a Jewish Council (Judenrat) in Niebylec by the end of 1939. In March 1940, Moses Pariser was its chairman.² The German Gendarmerie also operated a jail in the village.

In December 1939, 20 refugees from Kalisz and Łódź were sent via Rzeszów to Niebylec, bringing the number of Jews up to approximately 220. As all of them arrived with almost nothing, the Judenrat provided them with free housing (some families were housed in nearby Lutcza), as well as bread, potatoes, and milk. They also received a small amount of cash and firewood; their shoes were repaired at the Judenrat's expense. A doctor was brought in to care for 2 people who had fallen ill. One of them was a shochet (ritual slaughterer), Dawid Reicher (or Rescher), who “suddenly lost his mind.” By May 1940, the town's Jews had spent 3,000 złoty on the newcomers' sustenance but had received only 150 złoty in assistance from the

Kraków branch of the American Jewish Joint Distribution Committee (AJDC).³

In the spring of 1940, the Judenrat engaged in providing seeds for Jewish farmers holding small plots. Out of the approximately 50 farming families in the gmina, 17 were unable to fully sow their fields. The authorities threatened to expropriate them as “negligent” and put their farmland under Polish administration. Of the 17 families, 5 of those families lived in Lutcza, 4 in Blizianka, 3 in Niebylec, 2 each in Baryczka and Jawornik, and 1 in Gwoźnica Górna. They owned a total of 49 morgi (1 morga is approximately 5,600 square meters or 6,698 square yards) but were able to sow only 32, leaving 17 to lie fallow. Pariser pleaded with the AJDC for financial help, as he feared that those farmers would be resettled to Niebylec, “and if that were to happen, a few more vagrant families would come in.”⁴

A JSS committee was later set up to aid the refugees. It acted under the Judenrat's supervision and included Aron Uhes, Hersch Freund, and later, Israel Feldman.⁵

In August 1940, the Rzeszów Judenrat sent 10 new refugees from Kraków to Niebylec. Soon after, a much larger group of 40 expellees followed, bringing the number of newcomers to 64 by September 1940. This number of refugees remained stable until at least January 1941.⁶

In November 1940, the Judenrat was ordered to register Jews for forced labor; however, there is no information regarding the forced labor performed in Niebylec or its surroundings.⁷

On December 17, 1941, the Reichshof Kreishauptmann, Heinz Ehaus, ordered the establishment of ghettos in the Kreis. In Rzeszów, the order was effective on January 10, 1942; for the remainder of the Kreis, on February 1, 1942. The Jewish residential area in Niebylec was most likely established as a ghetto shortly after this date. While not fenced, its inhabitants were allowed to leave it only with written permission. Laborers conscripted to work outside the ghetto were granted such permission.

Similar to other places in the region, the Jews living in the vicinity of Niebylec were ordered to move there in March 1942. An estimated 450 Jews were collected in the Niebylec ghetto during this period.

On April 14, 1942, the Gestapo shot seven ghetto residents. Of those executed, five names are known: Ida Brener (60 years old), Jankiel Fridrich (60), Szymon Mer (90), Józef Graz (45), and Mozes Schneiwas (70). All were buried in a mass grave at the Jewish cemetery.

In June 1942, the German authorities in Kraków issued an order for all the Jews of Kreis Reichshof to be concentrated in the Rzeszów ghetto for deportation, as Kreishauptmann Ehaus was eager to be the first to render his Kreis judenrein (cleansed of Jews) in Distrikt Krakau. As a result, in the second half of June, the Gendarmerie supervised the transfer of the Jews from all the other Kreis ghettos into the Rzeszów ghetto, such that some 22,000 Jews were concentrated there by the beginning of July 1942.⁸

The Niebylec ghetto was liquidated on June 25, 1942. Agents of the Sonderdienst (Special Police) killed three Jewish merchants during the transport to Rzeszów. Aron Blum and Aron Rain were buried in the village of Połomia; Szandla Rain, in Baryczka.⁹

In Rzeszów, the Niebylec Jews shared the fate of others concentrated there and were sent in the course of the July 1942 deportations to the Bełżec extermination camp.¹⁰

In November 1943, the Gestapo shot nine Jews and the 11 Poles who had been sheltering them in the neighboring village of Połomia.

SOURCES Brief descriptions and references on the ghetto in Niebylec are included in the following publications: Andrzej Potocki, Żydzi w Podkarpaciu (Rzeszów: Libra, 2004), pp. 114–115; Abraham Wein and Aharon Weiss, eds., Pinkas ba-kehillot. Encyclopaedia of Jewish Communities: Poland, vol. 3, Galicia and Western Silesia (Jerusalem: Yad Vashem, 1984), pp. 266–267; and Rejestr miejsc i faktów zbrodni popełnionych przez okupanta hitlerowskiego na ziemiach polskich w latach 1939–1945: Województwo rzeszowskie (Warsaw: GKBZHWP, 1984), p. 123.

Relevant documentation can be found in the following archives: AŻIH (210/509 [AJDC], 211/918 [JSS]); and USHMM (Acc.1999.A.0154 [AJDC Niebylec]).

Jolanta Kraemer

NOTES

1. E. Podhorizer-Sandel, “O zagładzie Żydów w dystrykcie krakowskim,” BŻIH, no. 3 (1959): 88.

2. USHMM, Acc.1999.A.0154 (AJDC), 210/509 (Niebylec), p. 1.

3. Ibid., 210/509, pp. 1–4, 11, 21, 24.

4. Ibid., pp. 7–8, 14–15; for a full list of the farmers, see p. 13.

5. Ibid., pp. 20, 30, 46.

6. Ibid., pp. 36–37, 42, 47, 54, 59; for a complete list of all refugees, including their towns of origin, see pp. 43–45.

7. Ibid., p. 51.

8. Justiz und NS-Verbrechen, vol. 32 (Amsterdam: Amsterdam University Press, 2004), Lfd. Nr. 711, pp. 414–415; and Moshe Yaari Wald, ed., Rzeszów Jews: Memorial Book (Tel Aviv: Rzeszower Societies in Israel and the United States, 1967), p. 82.

9. Rejestr miejsc, p. 123. Czesław Pilichowski et al., eds., Obozy hitlerowskie na ziemiach polskich 1939–1945: Informator encyklopedyczny (Warsaw: PWN, 1979), p. 333, dates the Niebylec ghetto liquidation in July 1942; Potocki, Żydzi, p. 115, as April 1942. However, other sources confirm that Jews from the neighboring ghettos were brought into Rzeszów during a three-day period, between June 25–27, 1942; e.g., see Stanisław Poradowski, “Zagłada Żydów rzeszowskich (Part 3),” BŻIH, nos. 3–4 (1985): 90.

10. Poradowski, “Zagłada Żydów rzeszowskich (Part 3),” p. 99.

NOWY SĄCZ

Pre-1939: Nowy Sącz (Yiddish: Nay-Sants), city, Kraków województwo, Poland; 1939–1945: Neu-Sandez, Kreis center, Distrikt Krakau, Generalgouvernement; post-1998: Nowy Sącz, city and powiat center, województwo małopolskie, Poland

Nowy Sącz is located about 80 kilometers (50 miles) southeast of Kraków. In 1939, the city’s population numbered about 35,000; of these, approximately 12,000 were Jews.¹

The German army occupied Nowy Sącz on September 6, 1939. The Germans suppressed all Jewish religious institutions, including the synagogues and religious schools, plundered Jewish homes, and required that Jewish males perform physically demanding labor.

At the end of September 1939, SS-Obersturmführer Heinrich Hamann of the Security Police was appointed as deputy head of the Border Police Office (Grenzpolizeikommissariat, GPK) in Nowy Sącz (becoming its head in 1940).² In late September the German authorities ordered the establishment of a Jewish Council (Judenrat); among its first tasks was to supply laborers to the Germans, which to some extent stopped Jews from being seized from the streets. In November 1939, a number of Jewish refugees from Łódź and Sieradz arrived, and the Jewish Council helped to integrate them into the community.³

In the spring of 1940, Yaakov Marin was officially appointed as head of the Jewish Council; but in October 1940, on Hamann’s orders, he was sent to the Auschwitz concentration camp and died there of pneumonia. In 1940, the Jewish Police (Jüdischer Ordnungsdienst) was also established under Y. Folkman to assist the Judenrat with its tasks. It was comprised mostly of social outcasts and soon earned a bad reputation for working closely with the German police.⁴

Over the initial months of the occupation, the Germans imposed a series of anti-Jewish measures in the city. These included the marking of Jewish businesses and a ban on leaving the city without permission. Jewish lawyers were forbidden to practice, and Jewish doctors could treat only Jewish patients. Many Jewish stores were “Aryanized”—that is, their inventory was seized or the businesses were placed under “trusteeship” by the German authorities.

Polish Jews wearing armbands walk down a street in Nowy Sącz, n.d. USHMM WS #63041, COURTESY OF MICHAEL O.

By the summer of 1940, the Germans had established a labor camp at Lipie, about 30 kilometers (19 miles) from Nowy Sącz, and had sent several hundred Jewish laborers there. At Lipie the Jews lived and worked under harsh conditions while constructing a new road. Another group of 300 Jews was sent from Nowy Sącz to work constructing a dam in Rożnów. Other Jews worked at sites around the city, assigned by the labor office (Arbeitsamt). A Jewish Block Dienst (separate from the Ordnungsdienst) assisted in rounding up Jews for forced labor quotas. The German police guarded the Jews, pursued them on the streets of the city, and sent them to labor camps. The Gestapo demanded money and other “contributions” from the Jewish community. Jewish houses were searched repeatedly for weapons, and the officials conducting the searches frequently looted any items they fancied.

In the fall of 1940, all the Jews living close to the Slovak border were ordered to leave their homes and move to Nowy Sącz or its immediate vicinity. The Kreishauptmann in Nowy Sącz, Dr. Reinhard Busch, decreed that several spa towns in this area, including Krynica, Muszyna, and Piwniczna, had to be cleared of Jews by November 30. The Jewish Council in Nowy Sącz had to find accommodation for these new refugees.

The number of Jews in the city increased, especially following the expulsion of thousands of Jews from Kraków in the spring of 1941. This increase in the Jewish population meant new challenges and burdens for the Jewish Council. The Jewish hospital on Kraszewski Street was reopened, receiving financial support from Jewish Social Self-Help (JSS) in Kraków.

In April 1941, the Jewish community of Nowy Sącz was fortunate to receive more than 6,000 kilograms (6.6 tons) of matzot in time for Passover. Part of this delivery was purchased by the Jewish Aid Committee in Slovakia and sent to Nowy Sącz on instructions from the American Jewish Joint Distribution Committee (AJDC). At this time, 1,000 people were using the public kitchen that served hot meals. In the summer of 1941, some food aid was even received from Portugal, thanks to assistance from the First New Sandez Society in New York.⁵

In May 1941, the German authorities ordered that Jews who were living in the villages and smaller towns in Kreis Neu-Sandez had to move to the larger towns, including Nowy Sącz. As a result, several hundred more refugees arrived, almost all in need of support.⁶ Then in July 1941, following the German attack on the Soviet Union, the German authorities established two Jewish residential areas or ghettos in Nowy Sącz, in the northern part of the city where most Jews had lived for generations. The first was at Piekło, in the northeast, near the Kamienica River, and the second was in the area around Kazimierz Street (also known as Jewish Street). The latter area was smaller in size but more densely populated. In July 1941, all Jews living outside these two demarcated areas were forced to move within them. The ghettos remained unfenced at first, but Jews required special permits to leave them. A total of about 12,000 Jews were forced to reside in the two ghettos.⁷

Extreme overcrowding was the norm. In some cases, four or five families (20 people) had to share a single apartment comprising one room and a kitchen. There was also terrible hunger. The weekly ration consisted of only 700 grams (24.7 ounces) of bread, 30 grams (1 ounce) of meat, and 20 grams (0.7 ounce) of sugar per person. Everyone had to obtain some extra food illegally or starve. In the cold winter of 1941–1942, the Jews had to chop up their furniture for firewood to keep warm, as they were ordered to surrender all fur items. Soon afterwards they were even ordered to surrender their remaining furniture.

In the late summer of 1941, the Border Police post (or Gestapo) launched a manhunt for rabbis and traditionally clothed Hasidim. Code-named “Aktion Kaputan,” this resulted in the arrest of 10 individuals who were all sent to Auschwitz.

At the start of 1942, a typhus epidemic broke out in the ghettos. A health committee, composed of those with medical experience, strove to improve medical treatment and sanitary conditions. At first, the hospital did not charge for medical services, but later a small fee was collected and turned over to the Jewish Council. The doctors made house calls and were permitted to go out after the curfew. The German authorities forbade the treatment of gunshot wounds, but the medical staff ignored this order. There were no Jewish surgeons in the ghetto. In the face of the growing danger of Aktions in the town, some Jews sought to hide in the hospital.

In the fall of 1941, the Gestapo targeted Jews who had fled to Soviet-controlled eastern Poland in the fall of 1939 and had subsequently returned to Nowy Sącz. They arrested about 30 Jews during this Aktion and murdered them. In January 1942, the Gestapo conducted a “cigarette Aktion” in the ghetto. On Hamann’s instructions, they raided the ghetto and arrested any Jews trading in cigarettes. Two groups comprising about 70 people altogether (including some children) were arrested as “black marketeers” and shot in the old Jewish cemetery.

Officials of the Gestapo and German Order Police sometimes entered Jews’ apartments and arrested them with no explanation. They operated together with the Jewish Police, which also participated in many of the roundups.

In the first half of 1942, a German named Hans Swoboda was in charge of Jewish affairs at the Arbeitsamt; he was responsible for sending groups of Jews to labor camps in the region, such as those at Rabka and Pustków. Some of those sent to these camps were murdered there or died from the harsh conditions.⁸

On April 28, 1942, Hamann conducted an Aktion against left-wing elements in the ghetto, especially Zionists. At 5:00 A.M., SS units surrounded the ghetto. On the basis of lists, the German and Jewish Police arrested about 150 people and brought them to the prison on Piarska Street. After one day and night in prison, they took the prisoners to the Jewish cemetery and shot them there. On the following night, at least another 50 Jews were murdered as Hamann's men shot people wildly in the ghetto.

Rumors spread among the Jews that these Aktionen were only the prelude to a larger deportation or killing Aktion. Ghetto residents tried to find work with German companies or the Wehrmacht, which might provide some security. Some Jews paid bribes to obtain these positions. Many of the skilled jobs were located in the area of the Piekło ghetto, which remained an open ghetto, although its area was reduced by a few streets in the summer of 1942. Here, there were workshops specialized in repair work and trades such as carpentry, broom making, and preparing furs. Among those places employing Jews outside the ghetto were a German army barracks, various construction companies, a school for Luftwaffe officers, woodworking companies in Nawojowa and Rytro, coal transportation at the railroad station, and the labor camp in Kurów. The workers employed by these enterprises received permits that appeared to protect them from deportation.

At some time in July 1942, the Germans enclosed the second ghetto on Kazimierz Street with a brick wall 2 meters (6.6 feet) high.⁹ The preparation for the liquidation of the ghettos also began in July 1942. The sick and elderly were moved into the enclosed ghetto, and Jews capable of work were registered once again. In August the Piekło ghetto was reduced in size, increasing overcrowding. Heavy taxes were demanded from all the Jews of the Kreis, just before the deportation Aktion. Then between August 17 and August 20, Jews from the surrounding towns of Stary Sącz, Grybów, and Limanowa were transferred to the ghettos in Nowy Sącz, raising the number of Jews there to more than 16,000.¹⁰ The SS and Police Leader (SSPF) ordered that the sick and elderly were to be shot on the spot. Hamann was in charge of the Aktion leading to the deportation of the Jews.

During the clearing of the Jews from the surrounding towns, Hamann's men shot many of the Jews on site, and in Mszana Dolna almost all the Jews were shot, rather than being transferred to Nowy Sącz despite the existence of a rail connection.¹¹ On August 21, 1942, Hamann assembled all the Jewish officials and announced that the expulsion of the Jews would start two days later, on August 23, 1942. The Jews were ordered to gather that day at 5:00 A.M., next to the Dunajec River between the railway and Helena bridges. The Jewish Council instructed the Jews to bring their apartment keys with them, tagged with the owners' names and addresses. Every person was told to bring 10 kilograms (22 pounds) of food and 15 kilograms (33 pounds) of luggage. The Jews were informed they would be resettled to Ukraine for agricultural work, but many expected the worst as some Germans spoke openly about the Jews' fate: "They will come to St. Peter."

The Germans launched the Aktion on Saturday, August 22, with the arrest of about 200 Jews. They escorted the Jews to the Jewish cemetery, where they were ordered to destroy all the tombstones so as to leave no trace of a Jewish presence in the town. The remaining Jews, around 16,000 people, began to assemble at the Dunajec River late in the evening of August 22. At 6:00 A.M. the next morning, Hamann showed up with Swoboda of the employment office and other German officials, Gestapo officers, and a police unit. Armed guards surrounded the entire area. The selection began at 9:00 A.M., and after two hours, about 750 Jews had been selected for labor details. Those not capable of work were sent back to the ghetto. These people would be sent to the Bełżec extermination camp.

The first train arrived on Monday, August 24, 1942, and left two days later; the last one departed on Friday, August 28. Jews were packed into the rail cars—about 140 in each—and lime spread on the floor of the cars was the only "comfort" they received on the journey to Bełżec.¹² Many people had to leave their belongings behind, due to lack of space. Each train had approximately 25 railroad cars. The windows of the cars were barred with barbed wire. The Jews that left from Nowy Sącz were gassed on arrival at Bełżec.

Of the 750 selected Jews, about 200 were sent away to other labor camps at Muszyna, Rożnów, and Sędziszów Małopolski. Those who remained in Nowy Sącz were housed on Kazimierz Street, and most were assigned to the Aufräumkommando, tasked with clearing up remaining Jewish property in the ghettos. At the end of August, Hamann also directed the killing of the patients of the Jewish hospital. These individuals were shot in Marcinkowice, about 6 kilometers (4 miles) from Nowy Sącz. After the deportations the Gestapo searched systematically for Jews who tried to hide in the city or in the former ghettos, all of whom they shot on the spot or at the Jewish cemetery.

The work of the clearing group was accompanied by hunger, physical exhaustion, and the emotional strain of witnessing the searches for Jews in hiding and the sale of Jewish property. When a group who worked outside the remnant ghetto was caught smuggling in food, Hamann had all 38 of them shot. As the amount of work declined in late 1942, groups of Jews were sent to Mielec and Tarnów for other work assignments. The remaining 100 or so Jews were sent to the labor camp at Szebnie in two groups in July and August 1943. Altogether, more than 20,000 Jews from the city and its vicinity perished within less than three years. Only a few hundred managed to survive in the various labor camps, in hiding, or on the "Aryan side."

Heinrich Hamann was sentenced to life imprisonment by the regional court (Landgericht) in Bochum in 1966.

SOURCES The Yiddish-language yizkor book for Nowy Sącz edited by Rafael Mahler, Seyfer Sants (Tel Aviv: Sandzer landsmanshaftn in New York, 1970), contains a particularly detailed section on the Holocaust by Rafael Mahler "der hurbn un um-kum," pp. 721–797; another detailed source is the more recent volume in English by Shlomo Zalman Lehrer and Leizer Strassman, The Vanished City of Tsanz (Southfield, MI: Targum, 1997), pp. 247–333. Other relevant published sources include Abraham Wein and Aharon Weiss, eds., Pinkas ha-kehillot. Encyclopaedia of Jewish Communities: Poland, vol. 3, Galicia and Western Silesia (Jerusalem: Yad Vashem, 1984), pp. 256–266;

Justiz und NS-Verbrechen, vol. 24 (Amsterdam: Amsterdam University Press, 1998), Lfd. Nr. 635, pp. 269–484 (LG-Bo, 16 Ks 1/65, verdict against Heinrich Hamann and others); and Mordechai Lustig, “Ghetto of Nowy Sącz under German Occupation” (testimony written in Hebrew in June 2006; a translation is available at www.jewishgen.org).

Documentation on the persecution and destruction of the Jewish community in Nowy Sącz can be found in the following archives: AŻIH (301/211, 1203, 1327, 1338, 1703, 2040, 3455, 3456, and 3458); IPN; USHMM (RG-15.019M; 1997.A.0124 [ŻSS]); VHF; and YVA.

Katrin Reichelt and Martin Dean

NOTES

1. Lustig, “Ghetto of Nowy Sącz,” on the JewishGen Web site: “Remember the Community of Sanz,” p. 1; Lehrer and Strassman, The Vanished City of Tsanz, p. 257.
2. ŻuNS-V, vol. 24, Lfd. Nr. 635, p. 276.
3. Mahler, Seyfer Sants, p. 734; Lehrer and Strassman, The Vanished City of Tsanz, pp. 269, 277.
4. AŻIH, 301/1703, testimony of Samuel Kaufer; Mahler, Seyfer Sants, p. 770; Lehrer and Strassman, The Vanished City of Tsanz, p. 287.
5. Mahler, Seyfer Sants, pp. 756–760, 764.
6. Ibid., pp. 743, 769; Lustig, “Ghetto of Nowy Sącz,” p. 2.
7. Mahler, Seyfer Sants, pp. 769–770. USHMM, RG-15.019M, “Kwestionariusz o obozach” for Nowy Sącz, dates the establishment of the ghetto in August 1941.
8. AŻIH, 301/3455–3456, and 3458; Mahler, Seyfer Sants, p. 774.
9. AŻIH, 301/1338, testimony of Emil Steinlauf; ŻuNS-V, vol. 24, Lfd. Nr. 635, p. 308; USHMM, RG-15.019M, “Kwestionariusz o obozach.”
10. AŻIH, 301/1203 and 1338; Lustig, “Ghetto of Nowy Sącz,” p. 4; Mahler, Seyfer Sants, pp. 782–783.
11. ŻuNS-V, vol. 24, Lfd. Nr. 635, p. 357.
12. Ibid., pp. 405–406; and Lustig, “Ghetto of Nowy Sącz,” p. 4.

NOWY TARG

Pre-1939: Nowy Targ, town, Kraków województwo, Poland; 1939–1945: Neumarkt, Kreis center, Distrikt Krakau, Generalgouvernement; post-1998: Nowy Targ, województwo małopolskie, Poland

Nowy Targ is located about 80 kilometers (50 miles) south of Kraków. In 1921, there were 1,342 Jews living in the town (16 percent of the total population). In 1939, on the eve of World War II, there were about 2,500 Jews living in Nowy Targ.

German armed forces occupied Nowy Targ on September 1, 1939, the first day of the invasion, due to the town’s proximity to the Czechoslovakian border. A few Jews fled to Eastern Galicia ahead of the German advance. The Soviet authorities subsequently deported most of these Jews to Siberia after they occupied eastern Poland in mid-September. As soon as the Germans occupied Nowy Targ, they arrested 12 Jewish community leaders on the pretext that they had fired on German troops, then sent them to a concentration camp in Germany. Accompanying the German army were mobile forces of the Sicherheitspolizei (Security Police). Einsatzkommando I/3, commanded by Alfred Hasselbach, advanced through Zakopane to Nowy Targ. According to one source, Hasselbach’s forces murdered 45 Jews in the Nowy Targ area before moving on to Nowy Sącz and Jarosław.¹

A group of boys wearing armbands pose in Nowy Targ, April 1940. USHMM WS #44839, COURTESY OF ROBERT MENDLER

Among the first decrees issued by the German authorities was for all Jewish businesses to be taken over by a custodian. The larger ones were handed over to local ethnic Germans, and the smaller ones were liquidated. All Jews over the age of 10 had to wear the Star of David on their clothing, Jews were not permitted on the town square or the main streets, and they could not buy food in Polish stores. From November 12, 1939, Nowy Targ came under the supervision of SS-Hauptsturmführer Robert Philip Weissmann, the head of the Security Police in Kreis Neumarkt, whose headquarters was located in Zakopane.

The Germans established a Jewish Council (Judenrat) consisting of 12 members chaired by Meir Ginsberg. The Jewish Council’s duties included preparing lists of Jews for forced labor and collecting “contributions” for the Germans. No Jewish police force was created. The Jews were conscripted to perform various forced labor assignments in the town and for the Germans. Jews from Nowy Targ also worked in a stone quarry in Zakopane. The workers received meager food rations and had to work long hours. They were able to receive parcels from relatives provided an “Aryan” delivered the parcels to the Zakopane Judenrat for distribution.²

The Nowy Targ “Jewish residential area” (open ghetto) was created in May 1941. It was located between Kraśnińskiego, Waksmund, Nadwodna, Jan Kazimierz, and Dorota Streets. Its area was about 1,000 square meters (1,196 square yards). Initially about 2,000 Jews from Nowy Targ and the surrounding region were concentrated there. According to a report by the Kreishauptmann in Nowy Targ, written at the beginning of June 1941, the area around Zakopane had been cleared of Jews up to the gates of Nowy Targ. “The Jews in Neumarkt were currently being concentrated in a ghetto, which later on was also to absorb the Jews from the other locations [in the Kreis].”³ The area of the open ghetto was very small and dilapidated. The Jews were persecuted and harassed. For example, the Weissmann family was killed because they bore the same name as the head of the Security Police in Zakopane, Robert Weissmann. From October 15, 1941, leaving the Jewish residential area without special permission was punishable by death.⁴

Random executions of Jews intensified. The Germans executed several Jews from the Nowy Targ ghetto in the Bolfark Forest near the town. On June 8, 1942, the Germans took several Jews from a feather-plucking plant, shooting and burying them at the Jewish cemetery. Also, Jews charged with trading in foreign currency were taken to the SS training school in Rabka, tortured, and murdered there.⁵

At the end of July or the beginning of August 1942, SS-Oberführer Scherner, the commander of the Security Police in Kraków, ordered that the Jews from Szczawnica, Krasiuski, and other villages should be concentrated in Nowy Targ briefly, prior to their deportation. Those who were too old or sick to be moved were to be shot on the spot. During August these orders were implemented, resulting in an additional influx of several hundred Jews into the Nowy Targ ghetto. In Szczawnica, for example, a Security Police detachment commanded by Richard Sehmisch shot 39 Jews, sending the remainder to Nowy Targ.⁶

On August 29, 1942, the Nowy Targ Judenrat, on instructions from the Germans, announced that all Jews were required to assemble in the Piłsudski sports stadium the following morning. The Jews were told they would be sent to work in Reichskommissariat Ukraine and that they should bring a small amount of luggage. About 3,500 Jews assembled at the stadium, where German and Polish police surrounded them. Then SS-Hauptsturmführer Weissmann carried out a selection. Old and infirm Jews were hurriedly sent to one side together with the members of the Judenrat. Jews with special skills or craftsmen were also selected into another group on the basis of a list from the work office (Arbeitsamt) and separated from their families. The Jews were then made to surrender their valuables, and those chosen for work were loaded onto trucks and taken to a collection point under guard. The mass of the Jews were then escorted to the railway station and loaded onto cattle trains to be sent to the Bełżec extermination camp; Jews from the neighboring town of Jordanów were added to the deportation train, following a similar Aktion there on the same day. In Nowy Targ, the elderly and infirm together with the Judenrat members were taken and shot at the Jewish cemetery. Polish members of the conscripted Construction Service (Baudienst) filled in the mass grave. David Grassgreen managed to escape the shooting, as he knew the hidden trails in the area. Following the ghetto liquidation, the German and Polish police forces combed the Jewish houses, looking for those in hiding. Over the following months a number of Jews were captured and shot in the Nowy Targ area.⁷

A labor camp was established in Nowy Targ on August 30, 1942. It was located in a barracks behind the train station. The labor force consisted of approximately 35 Jews who had been spared deportation from the Nowy Targ ghetto. The prisoners performed the following types of work: carpentry, plumbing, shoemaking, and sewing. The prisoners also had to sort the clothing that belonged to the murdered Jews. About 10 of the prisoners died in a typhus epidemic. The Germans executed some inmates outside the labor camp. When the camp was liquidated on May 25, 1944, the remaining prisoners were taken to the Płaszów forced labor camp.⁸

After the war, a few Jewish survivors returned to Nowy Targ and established a local Jewish committee in the town. According to the yizkor book, Poles belonging to the extremist right-wing organization NSZ (National Armed Forces) began attacking and harassing the Jews. Chairman Klinger and six other Jews were given 24 hours notice to leave town; they were shot before the required time elapsed. David Grassgreen, who escaped from the cemetery during the August 1942 Aktion, was also murdered following his requests to the Polish Ministry of Interior for the return of the synagogue, which had been converted into a movie theater. This wave of antisemitic violence convinced the remaining Jews not to remain in Poland; most immigrated to Israel and the United States.⁹

SOURCES Publications dealing with the fate of the Jews in Nowy Targ include the following: Michael Walzer-Fass, ed., Remembrance Book of Nowy Targ and Vicinity. Translation from Sefer Nowy Targve ha sevilla (Tel Aviv: Townspeople Association of Nowy Targ and Vicinity, 1979); and Mieczysław Adamczyk, ed., Dzieje Miasta Nowego Targu (Kraków: Drukarnia Narodowa w Krakowie, 1991).

Documents on the extermination of the Jews in Nowy Targ can be found in the following archives: AŻIH (301/1667, 1781, 4707); BA-L; IPN (e.g., Wyrok p-ko Robertowi Weissmannowi i Richardowi Schmiesłowi); USHMM (Acc.2004.368; Acc.1997.A.0166; RG.15.019M, reels # 4 and 14; and Acc.1997.A.0124 [JSS], reel 36); VHF; and YVA (e.g., M-1/E/1420 and 1172; O-6/410/5564276; O-41/650/5732776).

Joanna Śliwa

NOTES

1. Walzer-Fass, Remembrance Book of Nowy Targ, pp. 56–57.
2. Ibid., pp. 56–57, 75–76; verdict in the case of Robert Philip Weissmann, LG-Frei, 1 Ks 1/64, June 25, 1965, published in Justiz und NS-Verbrechen, vol. 21 (Amsterdam: Amsterdam University Press, 1979), Lfd. Nr. 593, pp. 170–219.

3. Czesław Pilichowski et al., eds., Obozy hitlerowskie na ziemiach polskich 1939–1945: Informator encyklopedyczny (Warsaw: PWN, 1979), p. 342; Report of the Kreishauptmann in Nowy Targ for the period from September 17, 1939, to May 31, 1941, published in Tatiana Berenstein et al., eds., Faschismus, Getto, Massenmord: Dokumentation über Ausrottung und Widerstand der Juden in Polen während des zweiten Weltkrieges (Berlin: Rutten & Loening, 1961), p. 64; USHMM, RG-15.019M, reel 14 (ASG sygn. 48 b), “Kwestionariusz o obozach,” p. 189.

4. JuNS-V, vol. 21, Lfd. Nr. 593, p. 182; A. Eisenbach, “Ludność żydowska w Królestwie Polskim w Końcu XIX w.,” BŻIH, 30 (1959): 96; Walzer-Fass, Remembrance Book of Nowy Targ, pp. 57–58; USHMM, RG-15.019M, reel 14 (ASG sygn. 48b), p. 189.

5. USHMM, RG-15.019M, reel 4, docs. 552 and 553, “Kwestionariusz o egzekucjach masowych,” and doc. 498 Protokół, June 10, 1945; IPN, Ankieta GK “Represje . . .” pow. Nowy Targ, woj. krakowskie; Sąd Pow. w Nowym Targu, Zg 13/46, 43/48, 6/49; Ankieta GK “Egzekucje” Nowy Targ, woj. krakowskie.

6. Walzer-Fass, Remembrance Book of Nowy Targ, p. 69; JuNS-V, vol. 21, Lfd. Nr. 593, pp. 184–185.

7. Walzer-Fass, Remembrance Book of Nowy Targ, p. 60; JuNS-V, vol. 21, Lfd. Nr. 593, pp. 186–189; USHMM, RG-15.019M, reel 4, “Kwestionariusz o egzekucjach masowych i grobach masowych,” doc. 548; AŻIH, testimonies of Józef Winstrauch (301/1781) and Maryla Pastor (301/4707, 1667). Also see Rejestr miejsc i faktów zbrodni popełnionych przez okupanta hitlerowskiego na ziemiach polskich w latach 1939–1945: Województwo nowosądeckie (Warsaw: GKBZHWP, 1984), pp. 78–83; this source indicates that some 1,500 Jews were shot at the Jewish cemetery in 1942, but this figure may be too high.

8. IPN, ASG, sygn. 48a, p. 188; IPN, Kolekcja “Z,” sygn. 924; OKKr, S 33/71; Walzer-Fass, Remembrance Book of Nowy Targ, p. 62; Pilichowski et al., Obozy hitlerowskie, p. 342.

9. Walzer-Fass, Remembrance Book of Nowy Targ, p. 72.

OLPINY

Pre-1939: Ołpiny, village, Kraków województwo, Poland; 1939–1945: Ołpiny, Kreis Jasło, Distrikt Krakau, Generalgouvernement; post-1998: Ołpiny, województwo małopolskie, Poland

Ołpiny is located approximately 30 kilometers (19 miles) northwest of Jasło. There were 185 Jews living there in 1921, out of a total population of 2,674.

The Germans appointed a Jewish Council (Judenrat) chaired by Chaskiel Machler. Benjamin Wróbel served as the Judenrat's secretary. In May 1940, there were 225 Jews in Ołpiny, including 50 refugees from Łódź who settled there in December 1939. In describing the community's situation at the time, the Judenrat wrote to the American Jewish Joint Distribution Committee (AJDC) that Ołpiny's Jews are no longer engaged in any kind of trade, which had been their main pre-war source of income.¹

According to Arnon Rubin, the Germans restricted the freedom of movement of all Jews soon after the occupation, allowing them to go only to the nearest village, and so depriving them of their means of income. The Judenrat delivered 30 Jews a day for forced labor. It also collected money and valuables at the Germans' request.

In February 1941, the Judenrat reported 299 Jewish residents. A number of Jews were receiving some food from surrounding estates owned by Poles.²

According to Mieczysław Wieliczko, historian of Jasło County, the process of ghettoization in the Kreis was completed in 1941, while some Jews were still allowed to live in villages. One of the ghettos established around that time was in Ołpiny.

Wieliczko established that in the spring of 1942 part of the Jewish population from the ghetto in Ołpiny was moved to Jasło and to Biecz. Rubin, who maintains that no ghetto was established in Ołpiny, dates the resettlement to Biecz in the summer of 1942. Prior to this deportation (June and July 1942), 40 men were sent to the labor camp in Płaszów. The remaining 120 men, women, and children were taken on August 9, 1942, to the Dąbry Forest near Rzepiennik Biskupi and shot there.

SOURCES The following publications include references to the fate of the Jews of Ołpiny: Mieczysław Wieliczko, Jasielskie w latach drugiej wojny światowej (Warsaw: Wydawnictwo Ministerstwa Obrony Narodowej, 1974), pp. 131, 182–184; Arnon Rubin, The Rise and Fall of the Jewish Communities in Poland and Their Relics Today, vol. 3, District Krakow (Tel Aviv: Tel Aviv University Press, 2008), pp. 259–260.

Archival sources can be found in AŻIH (210/524) and USHMM (Acc.1999.A.0154 [AJDC]).

Jolanta Kraemer

NOTES

1. USHMM, Acc.1999.A.0154 (AJDC), 210/524 (Ołpiny), pp. 1–3.

2. Ibid., pp. 11, 19–20.

PILICA

Pre-1939: Pilica (Yiddish: Piltz), town, Kraków województwo, Poland; 1939–1945: initially a town, reclassified in 1941 as a village, Kreis Miechow, Distrikt Krakau, Generalgouvernement; post-1998: town, województwo śląskie, Poland

The town of Pilica is located 51 kilometers (32 miles) north-northwest of Kraków. On the eve of World War II, there were 1,763 Jews living there.¹

Pilica was occupied by German troops on September 5, 1939, and it soon came under the administration of the German civil authorities (the Landkommissar for Kreis Miechow) based in nearby Wolbrom. A German Gendarmerie post was set up in Pilica Castle; there was also a unit of Polish (Blue) Police in Pilica. Until the autumn of 1941, however, Jews were allowed to conduct their lives in nearly the same manner as they did before the war.²

Pre-war photograph of the Berman family in front of a wooden synagogue in Pilica.

USHMM WS #11901, COURTESY OF ANN BERMAN DAY

By March 1940, the German authorities had set up a Jewish Council (Judenrat), with Ber (Berek) Fogiel as chairman, Ch. Zielony as secretary, and Bencion Oberbaum, M. Blumenfeld, Gutman (Gitman) Wajnsztok, and Dr. Jakub (Jan) Szabszewicz (Szabsiewicz) as the remaining members.³

A Jewish health-care organization, Towarzystwo Ochrony Zdrowia (TOŻ), resumed its activities in Pilica on June 25, 1940, under the supervision of Dr. Szabsiewicz. Due to the scarcity of resources, it could only distribute small amounts of basic medicine, and yet it provided special assistance to Jewish children by serving them a glass of milk, two white rolls, and a slice of bread daily. At first, only 20 children were in its care, but by the end of 1940, it was assisting up to 80. From September 22, 1940, the Central Organization for Orphan Care (CENTOS) was also active in Pilica.⁴

By the end of November 1940, the number of Jews in Pilica had increased by 500, reaching 2,253. Most of the newcomers were either deportees from Silesia or refugees from Kraków or the town of Szczekociny, which had been burned down.

On January 1, 1941, the authorities revoked Pilica's town status, and as a result, all residents were divested of their right to food rations, as they were now treated as village residents.⁵

A six-man Jewish Police unit was set up on the orders of the Kreishauptmann in April 1941. Its number increased to 10 in May 1942, at which time a sentry was also posted outside the ghetto.⁶

A branch of the Jewish Social Self-Help (JSS) was established in Pilica to take over provision of welfare from the Judenrat on July 31, 1941. The committee was chaired by Dr. Szabsiewicz, and it included Bencion Oberbaum and Abram Borzykowski. The Judenrat members Fogiel and Wajnsztok soon replaced the latter two. Szabsiewicz resigned in protest, accusing the Judenrat of obstruction of welfare in Pilica.⁷

By October 1941, 191 deportees from Miechów and Wolbrom had been resettled in Pilica with an additional 200

Jews from other localities. The Judenrat registered 2,500 Jews living in Pilica in December. This number had increased slightly—to 2,572—by April 1942.⁸

According to a survivor, Helena Rusinek, the situation of the Jews in Pilica changed after Polish partisans shot two Polish policemen on February 28, 1942. Within days, two retaliatory Aktions followed in which 11 Pilica residents were arrested and machine-gunned in a public execution. During these Aktions, three Jews were also shot separately.

After that, approximately 60 young Jews began to meet and discuss the possibility of resistance. Two rifles were purchased with money received from Chairman Fogiel, who also informed them of the location of three hidden revolvers and let the group use the typewriter to produce leaflets. Organized in cells of 5 people each, they entered into an agreement with local Polish partisans. The two groups undertook some joint sabotage operations, such as taking down road signs, loosening railroad ties, and distributing flyers. They further communicated with partisan groups in Jędrzejów and Opoczno and collected 100,000 złoty by going into peasants' homes and demanding a levy on "pain of death." Following the disappearance of one of their most active members—Herbert—Chairman Fogiel was no longer kept informed of the unit's plans, as circumstantial evidence indicated that he had betrayed Herbert to the Germans.⁹

According to JSS records, in April 1942, no separate Jewish quarter had yet been established in Pilica. Possible confirmation of the existence of an "open ghetto" in Pilica just prior to the liquidation Aktion in September comes from the testimony of one survivor regarding the deportation of Pilica's Jews: "there was no closed ghetto in the town. Jews lived on one street."¹⁰

By July 1942, 100 Jews had been sent to the Płaszów labor camp, and another 75 to the Biezanów labor camp. A special committee was set up to collect money and food for their sustenance. The Jewish Police was tasked with its weekly delivery.¹¹ By August 1942, workshops had been set up in the synagogue with 50 tailors supported by 40 assistants sewing pants.

It was at this time that the Miechów Kreiskommissar visited Pilica and promoted the secretary of the Jewish Police, Leon Teuchler, to its commander. He also increased its strength from 10 to 14 members.¹²

Pilica's Jews were aware of the partial deportation of the nearby Słomniki community that took place in early June 1942. On June 8, 1942, the Judenrat chairman warned the community that "[when the time comes] every able Jew must flee to the forest."¹³

In the event of a deportation Aktion, the community's Jewish partisans planned to stock each house with gasoline, set the town on fire, and "die on the spot." A few weeks later, on September 5, 1942, forces of the SS, the Gestapo from Miechów and Wolbrom, and Gendarmes surrounded the town. All Jews were summoned to the market square, where they were held all day without any food or water. Approximately 20 people, including children, were shot.¹⁴

According to Estera Rusinek, 1,080 Jews were deported, while over 1,000 managed to flee.¹⁵ However, the Encyclopedia of Jewish Life, which dates the liquidation Aktion on September 6, states that the majority of the 3,000 able-bodied Jews were sent to work camps and the remainder (1,060) to the Bełżec extermination camp from Wolbrom.

By September 12, Chairman Fogiel had received the Germans' permission to establish an open, remnant ghetto in a separate part of the town, where somewhere between several hundred and 3,000 Jews gathered. They were confined to a few houses near the synagogue under very overcrowded conditions. They worked gathering, cleaning, and sorting abandoned Jewish property.

With the help of local Poles, those partisans who had evaded the deportation built four separate bunkers in the vicinity and moved out of the ghetto. Soon afterwards, a group of ghetto inhabitants were removed, some of them being sent to work camps.¹⁶

A police order issued on November 10, 1942 (effective December 1, 1942), listed those towns in Distrikt Krakau where the presence of Jews in ghettos was still permitted; Pilica was not one of them. The penalty for Jews found outside of ghettos was death. A number of Pilica residents managed to move to the Radomsko, Będzin, and Sosnowiec ghettos before the Pilica ghetto was liquidated in November 1942 and its residents murdered.¹⁷

The Jewish underground failed in its attempt to organize local resistance. Most of the partisans were killed when the Germans discovered their bunkers in mid-January 1943. Some 70 Jews were reportedly shot in Pilica and its vicinity that month. Some of the Poles who provided shelter, including Maria Rogozińska and her one-year-old son Piotr, and certain Polish policemen were also shot.¹⁸

Of the few Jews known to have survived from Pilica, most passed through a series of forced labor and concentration camps, including several who were inmates of the Auschwitz concentration camp.

SOURCES The main published account on the fate of the Jewish community of Pilica during the Holocaust is Abraham Wein, Bracha Freundlich, and Wila Orbach, eds., Pinkas ha-kehilot. Encyclopaedia of Jewish Communities: Poland, vol. 7, Lublin and Kielce (Jerusalem: Yad Vashem, 1999), pp. 388–392. Reference to a ghetto in Pilica is made also in Shmuel Spector and Geoffrey Wigoder, eds., The Encyclopedia of Jewish Life before and during the Holocaust (Jerusalem: Yad Vashem; New York: New York University Press, 2001), pp. 988–989.

The following archival sources were used to prepare this entry: AŻIH (210/545 [AJDC]; 211/789-791 [JSS]; and 301/520 and 2856 [Relacje]); and USHMM (RG-15.079 [Ring I/122]; Acc.1997.A.0124 [JSS]; Acc.1999.A.0154 [AJDC]).

Jolanta Kraemer

NOTES

1. USHMM, Acc.1997.A.0124 (JSS), reel 38, 211/789 (Pilica), p. 10.

2. AŻIH, 301/520, testimony of Estera Rusinek, n.d.
3. According to Gazeta Żydowska, February 16, 1942, Uberbaum died in February 1942; Gazeta Żydowska, April 5, 1942; USHMM, Acc.1999.A.0154 (AJDC), 210/545 (Pilica), p. 4; and Acc.1997.A.0124, reel 38, 211/789, pp. 33, 39.
4. USHMM, Acc.1997.A.0124, reel 38, 211/789, pp. 2, 8, 12–13; Acc.1999.A.0154, 210/545, pp. 5–8.
5. Ibid., Acc.1997.A.0124, reel 38, 211/789, p. 61.
6. Gazeta Żydowska, May 3, 1942.
7. USHMM, Acc.1997.A.0124, reel 38, 211/790 (Pilica), pp. 1, 9, 11–14.
8. Ibid., 211/791, pp. 3, 9.
9. AŻIH, 301/520; in her description of events, Rusinek is frequently off by one year.
10. Ibid., 301/2856, testimony of Helena Lederman, 1947. It is possible that Lederman was referring to the open remnant ghetto that was set up later, as she refers to the Aktion as the “last deportation,” but she mentions simultaneous Aktions in Wolbrom and Żarnowiec, which probably indicate rather the September deportation.
11. Gazeta Żydowska, July 3, 1942; and USHMM, Acc.1997.A.0124, reel 38, 211/791, pp. 41, 43, 46.
12. Gazeta Żydowska, August 28, 1942.
13. USHMM, Acc.1997.A.0124, reel 38, 211/791, p. 53.
14. AŻIH, 301/520.
15. Ibid.
16. Ibid.
17. Ruta Sakowska, ed., Archiwum Ringelbluma. Getto warszawskie, lipiec 1942–styczeń 1943 (Warsaw: PWN, 1980), p. 309.
18. AŻIH, 301/520. Note that Shmuel Krakowski in The War of the Doomed: Jewish Armed Resistance in Poland, 1942–1944 (New York: Holmes and Meier, 1984), p. 234 and in his later article “Żydowski opór w Generalnym Gubernatorstwie,” p. 285, in e.d. D. Libionka, Akcja Reinhardt: Zagłada Żydów w Generalnym Gubernatorstwie (Warsaw: IPN, 2004) – reports about armed resistance in Pilica on September 5, 1943, long after the small ghettos in the Distrikt were liquidated (or gives this date as the date of the ghetto liquidation). Krakowski further connects these purported uprisings with a larger wave of Jewish resistance in 1943, i.e., in Warsaw or Częstochowa. The chronological error most likely derives from Rusinek’s testimony (AŻIH, 301/520).

PILZNO

Pre-1939: Pilzno, town, Dębica powiat, Kraków województwo, Poland; 1939–1945: Kreis Debica, Distrikt Krakau, Generalgouvernement; post-1998: województwo podkarpackie, Poland

Pilzno is located about 100 kilometers (62 miles) east of Kraków. A census in 1921 recorded 752 Jews (21.2 percent of the total population) living there. In 1939, on the eve of World War II, 788 Jews were residing in the town, out of a total population of 1,342.

German forces occupied the town about one week after the start of the invasion on September 1, 1939. When the Germans established the Generalgouvernement in late October 1939, Pilzno became part of Kreis Debica within Distrikt Krakau.

In Pilzno there was an outpost of the German Gendarmerie and a detachment of the Polish (Blue) Police.

In mid-September 1939, the synagogue was burned down. Starting in the fall of 1939, the German authorities in Pilzno introduced a series of anti-Jewish measures. Jews were made to wear white armbands bearing a blue Star of David and were required to register with the authorities. Jews were deprived of much of their private property. A Jewish Council (Judenrat) was established, which was assigned the task in 1940 of providing Jews for forced labor. Forced labor tasks performed by the Pilzno Jews included road construction work, breaking rocks in a quarry, cutting trees in the forest, and sweeping the streets.

In mid-August 1940, the Judenrat established a self-help committee, which by the end of the year had become subordinated to the official Jewish Social Self-Help (JSS) organization for the Generalgouvernement, based in Kraków. In late September 1940, there were about 1,300 Jews residing in Pilzno, including 250 refugees, mainly from Łódź, Poznań, and Kraków.¹

By the summer of 1941, the JSS had established a soup kitchen, which provided food for the poor. It received occasional food distributions from the food supply office (Ernährungsamt) of the Kreishauptmann in Dębica and also more regular financial support from the JSS in Kraków—but little help from the Judenrat. However, the available resources always remained inadequate to meet the needs of the many impoverished Jews in Pilzno.

In July and August 1941, the simmering conflicts between the Judenrat, headed by M. Treibicz, and the JSS branch in Pilzno, headed by Leon Kupferblum, intensified. Disputes about the financing of JSS activities in Pilzno were aggravated by personal accusations made by the Judenrat against members of the JSS branch. These disputes were settled temporarily in September, following the intervention of the Kreisjudenrat in Dębica. In October 1941, there were 17 cases of typhus reported, mostly among the poorer Jews of Pilzno, which resulted in three deaths.²

In mid-December 1941, the JSS branch opened a child-care facility in Pilzno for children of poor Jewish families, providing health checkups, some education, and also supplementary nutrition. In the following months, around 30 children received extra food and care in this facility.³

In January 1942, the head of the Judenrat, Treibicz, was dismissed by the Kreishauptmann, and a new Judenrat was formed. Among its members now was Samuel Birnbach, who also served on the local JSS committee. In this way, it was hoped that most of the previous frictions between the two bodies could be eliminated. Twenty-four of the Jews sent for work at the Pustków labor camp returned in January, as they had become infected with typhus there.⁴

On June 20, 1942, the Jews of Pilzno were informed that they had until July 4 to move to a “closed quarter” (geschlossenes Viertel).⁵ Several Pilzno survivors confirm that a ghetto was set up in Pilzno during the summer of 1942. It covered about 1,800 square meters (2,153 square yards) and existed for just a few weeks. According to Israel Turk, it was set up in a few buildings in the smallest, dirtiest corner of town. Henry Reicher noted that part of the town was fenced off and guarded by the Jewish and Polish (Blue) Police. The Jews lived crowded together, with more than 4 people per room. Sarah Friedman recalls being forced to move out of her house into the ghetto, which was very overcrowded; people slept on mattresses on the floor.⁶ The JSS records confirm that by July 4, 1942, a Jewish hospital had been opened within the “Jewish quarter.” By mid-July, between 400 and 600 additional Jews had been brought into Pilzno from the surrounding villages, half of whom qualified for support from the soup kitchen. At this time, the Pilzno JSS desperately pleaded for a special subvention from the headquarters in Kraków, as all the able-bodied men were assigned to work in Dębica, or further away, and the remaining women and children were left with no means of support. In addition, the resources of the Judenrat were exhausted, due to many additional costs.⁷

In the second half of July, the office of the German Security Police (Sipo-Aussendienststelle) in Dębica organized the liquidation of the ghetto, assisted by the local Gendarmerie and other auxiliary forces. During the roundup in Pilzno, at least 17 Jews were killed on the spot, and around 1,500 Jews were sent to Dębica.⁸ According to one survivor, a policeman came to warn his family of the impending ghetto liquidation the next day, so her family fled at night to the countryside. They tried to retrieve belongings they had hidden with Polish neighbors, but these former friends turned them away empty-handed.⁹

From Dębica, together with Jews from other localities, the German Security Police deported most of the Jews from Pilzno to the Bełżec extermination camp. A few able-bodied Jews were sent to Pustków and other labor camps. Some of those sent to Pustków were subsequently transferred to the Auschwitz concentration camp.

In the second half of 1942 and in 1943, after the Pilzno ghetto had been liquidated, the German Gendarmerie and Polish (Blue) Police hunted down and shot Jews who had gone into hiding. The Chilowicz, Bochner, and other Pilzno families evaded the roundups by hiding in prepared bunkers, but some Jews were betrayed and killed.¹⁰

A good number of local Poles decided to help the Jews, and several of them paid for it with their lives when the Germans discovered their humanitarian efforts.¹¹ On February 19, 1943, the German police shot four Poles for offering shelter to Jews; they also killed the 6 Jews whom the Poles had hidden. On October 9, 1943, the Germans shot five members of the Rębina family and the 12 Jews they had been hiding, then burned all the buildings on the farm. When Josef Bobrowski was discovered to be hiding 2 Jews, both he and the Jewish refugees were shot. After the war, Yad Vashem recognized Józefa Ryńska of Pilzno as Righteous Among the Nations for her role in helping Jews during the occupation. Another Pole who provided life-saving help to the Jews was Mieczysław Ryba, of Slotiwej. From August 1942 to the summer of 1944, 3 Jews hid on his father's farm: Benjamin Deresiewicz, Abraham

Einspruch, and Israel Hamel. In the spring of 1943, the brothers Hyman and Mendel Reiner of Pilzno joined them. As the front grew closer, the 5 Jews moved to another farm. All survived.

SOURCES Information on the persecution and murder of the Jewish population of Pilzno can be found in these publications: Czesław Pilichowski et al., eds., Obozy hitlerowskie na ziemiach polskich 1939–1945: Informator encyklopedyczny (Warsaw: PWN, 1979), p. 385; Abraham Wein and Aharon Weiss, eds., Pinkas ha-kehilot. Encyclopaedia of Jewish Communities: Poland, vol. 3, Galicia and Western Silesia (Jerusalem: Yad Vashem, 1984), pp. 291–293; Arnon Rubin, The Rise and Fall of the Jewish Communities in Poland and Their Relics Today, vol. 3, District Krakow (Tel Aviv: Tel Aviv University Press, 2008), pp. 268–270; and Guy Miron, ed., The Yad Vashem Encyclopedia of the Ghettos during the Holocaust (Jerusalem: Yad Vashem, 2010), p. 586. Additional information can be found on these Web sites: “Maurice Chilowicz and the Story of Pilzno,” at www.shtetlinks.jewishgen.org; and “Pilzno,” at www.sztetl.org.pl.

Relevant documentation can be found in the following archives: AŻIH (211/792-794 [JSS]); IPN (ASG); USHMM (Acc.1997.A.0124 [JSS]; RG-15.019M [ASG]); VHF (e.g., # 6985, 10213, 23367, 27137, 30184); and YVA.

Alexander Kruglov and Martin Dean
trans. Robert Haney

NOTES

1. USHMM, Acc.1997.A.0124 (JSS), 211/792, p. 7, JSS Pilzno to JSS Kraków, September 25, 1940.
2. Ibid., 211/793, pp. 10–55.
3. Ibid., 211/792, p. 26, JSS Pilzno to JSS Kraków, January 5, 1942 (misfiled); 211/793, pp. 67–70; 211/794, pp. 12, 39.
4. Ibid., 211/794, p. 14, JSS Pilzno to JSS Kraków, February 1, 1942.
5. Ibid., 211/794, pp. 46–47, JSS Pilzno to JSS Kraków, June 21, 1942; RG-15.019M, woj. Rzeszów, “Kwestionariusz o obozach,” no. 8 (Pilzno), dates the ghetto from June 20, 1942, but this was the day when the order for its establishment by July 4 was issued.
6. VHF, # 6985, testimony of Israel Turk; # 27137, testimony of Henry Reicher; # 30184, testimony of Sarah Friedman.
7. USHMM, Acc.1997.A.0124, 211/794, pp. 46–54, June and July 1942.
8. Pilichowski et al., Obozy hitlerowskie, p. 385; VHF, # 10213, testimony of Sidney Schrank.
9. VHF, # 30184.
10. “Maurice Chilowicz and the Story of Pilzno,” at www.shtetlinks.jewishgen.org/pilzno/Chilowicz.htm.
11. www.shtetlinks.jewishgen.org/pilzno/backgr.html.

PROSZOWICE

Pre-1939: Proszowice, town, Kielce województwo, Poland; 1939–1945: Kreis Miechow, Distrikt Krakau, Generalgouvernement; post-1998: województwo małopolskie, Poland

Proszowice is located 24 kilometers (15 miles) northeast of Kraków. In 1939, there were 1,450 Jews living in Proszowice.¹

The Wehrmacht occupied Proszowice in early September 1939. Dawid Szydłowski was charged with running the town’s Jewish Council (Judenrat). The remainder of the Judenrat consisted of the pre-war leaders of the community.² A Jewish police force was organized subsequently, and its commander cooperated with the Germans.³

At first, the Proszowice Jews were able to lead their lives much as they had before the war. All survivors emphasize that it was safe and quiet there until 1942.

By May 1940, there were 1,700 Jews in Proszowice, including 200 refugees. The Judenrat assigned the poor to local families for support and sustenance. A self-help committee was set up for their benefit by August 1940 and was chaired by the Judenrat’s president. By October 1940, the number of refugees had doubled, the newcomers being mainly Jews expelled from Kraków. Although many rented from Poles, there was a serious shortage of lodging.⁴

A typhus epidemic broke out in March 1941. German authorities quarantined the town, and Proszowice residents were forbidden to leave. There was no epidemic hospital. A Jewish doctor by the name of Loofenholz attended to the sick. By May 1941, the number of Jews had increased significantly, reaching 2,600. At the end of June 1941, the town was still closed. A soup kitchen was launched to feed the sick and was maintained after the epidemic for the benefit of the poor. Typhus cases kept reappearing periodically. A hospital fitted with 10 beds opened only in June 1942.⁵

A branch of the Jewish Social Self-Help (JSS) organization was established in Proszowice in July 1941 to take over the organization of welfare from the Judenrat. It included the Judenrat chairman Szydłowski as president, Leibuś Felman as his deputy, and Dawid Rozenberg. In the summer of 1941, the JSS soup kitchen served 350 meals daily, including 100 free of charge. In November 1941, the JSS solicited food supplies from 20 Polish estates in the vicinity for the soup kitchen; 19 owners promptly responded, promising produce free of charge. By January 1942, the number of Jews in Proszowice had reached 3,008, with the number of newcomers (1,558) exceeding the number of local Jews.⁶

In June 1942, JSS member Rozenberg accused Szydłowski of abuse of power and called for an investigation of the branch by the main office in Kraków. According to Rozenberg, Szydłowski denied other members access to the organization’s affairs, correspondence, and bookkeeping; the latter was done solely by his brother and sister. Szydłowski further intentionally delayed two vital matters for the community, these being the opening of workshops and an agricultural cooperative. Although the outcome of Rozenberg’s action is unknown, only Szydłowski’s name appears in subsequent official correspondence.⁷

On July 15, 1942, the Jews living in the villages surrounding Proszowice were brought into the town. Their number is unknown.⁸

On June 22, 1942, 100 laborers were sent to Kraków, thereby raising the number of Proszowice Jews laboring in the vicinity of Kraków to 350. A few hundred more Jews were dispatched to Kraków in mid-July. The community was forced to deliver weekly food rations for its laborers. That summer in Proszowice, 50 Jews worked repairing roads; 40, on water irrigation projects for the Strauch Company; 10, for Trunkenpolz in agriculture; 8, for an agricultural cooperative; and 10 aged over 50, cleaning the streets. Approximately 100 women were employed in agriculture in Wierzbno, Kościelec, Jakubowice, Opatkowice, and Kowary.⁹

A Czech German named Lachowicz and a Jewish refugee from Kraków named Stern organized privately owned workshops in late July 1942. Proszowice Jews generally distrusted Stern, and of the town's craftspeople, only the tailors decided to take paid jobs at the workshop. Another obstacle to the workshop's operations was the local Arbeitsamt, which continued to conscript workshop employees for forced labor in Kraków, thereby forcing Lachowicz to change the status of the workshop from "private" to "collective," as the latter designation was approved by the Arbeitsamt. The workshops filled sample orders of trousers, drawers, suits, and furs for the Strassberg, Medwitz, and Lichtig companies. By the time production orders were placed by these companies, however, the community was no longer in existence.¹⁰

The Jewish community of Proszowice was liquidated at the end of August 1942, probably on Saturday, August 29. One day prior to the community's deportation, the town was surrounded, and the Germans ordered all Jews to report to the market square. Local farmers were forced to provide wagons to transport 2,000 Jews to nearby Słomniki, from where many of the Jews of Kreis Miechow were being gathered for deportation to the Bełżec extermination camp. Posters were hung reminding Poles of the death penalty for helping Jews.

Those who did not report to the market square were shot in their houses. The elderly and children were selected out and shot. A group of Jews numbering between 50 and 100 were sent to Płaszów by truck. Some volunteered to go.¹¹

Aside from those who fled or hid with Polish friends, the Germans left behind 100 to 200 Jews, including members of the Judenrat and Jewish Police, to gather, clean, and sort the abandoned Jewish property stored under the Judenrat's care. These Jews formed the basis for some kind of remnant ghetto, as they were subsequently joined by other Jews who emerged from hiding.

Upon the community's liquidation, the Germans went from village to village in search of Jews in hiding. Those they caught they shot on the spot; Poles found to be sheltering Jewish escapees shared the fate of the Jews. The killings, however, ended after three or four days, as the German authorities announced that Jews would be permitted to return to Proszowice to live in their own houses. On September 24, 1942, Szydłowski informed the Kraków JSS office of the resumption of social welfare activities, including the reopening of the soup kitchen after "a one-month break." By this time, approximately 500 Jews had gathered in the Proszowice "ghetto." Szydłowski further estimated that 700 Proszowice Jews were in the various Kraków camps. After the Germans caught one of his sons pocketing an item from the warehouse, Szydłowski and all his sons were shot together on one day. A total of 26 Jews were reportedly shot in October 1942.¹²

A police order issued on November 10, 1942, listed those towns in Distrikt Krakau where the presence of Jews in ghettos was permitted; Proszowice was not one of them. The penalty for Jews found outside these ghettos was death. This order presaged the imminent deportation of the remaining Jews in Proszowice.¹³ One of the survivors, Al Bukiet, reported that after the main deportation Aktion, he was still able to return from his labor camp to Proszowice for weekends. With time the ghetto became smaller and smaller, and only those who had jobs were allowed to stay.¹⁴

The ghetto was most likely liquidated in December 1942, although some sources date it in November. Its inhabitants were sent to Bełżec.¹⁵

SOURCES The fate of the Proszowice Jewish community is mentioned in Shmuel Spector and Geoffrey Wigoder, eds., The Encyclopedia of Jewish Life before and during the Holocaust (Jerusalem: Yad Vashem; New York: New York University Press, 2001), p. 1030.

The following archival sources were used for this entry: AŻIH (210/564 [AJDC]; 211/820-825 [JSS]; 302/66 [Pamiętniki]); USHMM (Acc.1997.A.0124 [JSS], reel 50; Acc.1999.A.0154 [AJDC]; and RG-02.208M [Pamiętniki]); and VHF (# 01355-1, 07285-3, 11515-6, 19305, 19311, 22337, 24467-3, 31459-4, 31742, 32085, 35546, 37184, 42061-3, and 43560).

Jolanta Kraemer

NOTES

1. USHMM, Acc.1997.A.0124 (JSS), reel 50, 211/824 (Proszowice), p. 19.
2. VHF, # 19305, testimony of Majer Goldstein, 1996; USHMM, Acc.1997.A.0124, reel 50, 211/820 (Proszowice), pp. 7, 11.
3. VHF, # 31459-4, testimony of Helen Reich, 1997.
4. USHMM, Acc.1999.A.0154 (AJDC), 210/564, pp. 1, 5, 7.
5. Ibid., Acc.1997.A.0124, reel 50, 211/820, pp. 32, 34; 211/821, pp. 23, 31; 211/822, p. 22; 211/823, p. 23; 211/824, pp. 6, 19; and 211/825, p. 7.
6. Ibid., 211/821, pp. 44, 54; 211/822, pp. 61, 66; and 211/824, p. 19.
7. Ibid., Acc.1997.A.0124, reel 50, 211/825, pp. 1-3.
8. Gazeta Żydowska, August 2, 1942; and VHF, # 35546, testimony of Barbara Dohnal, 1997.
9. Gazeta Żydowska, August 2, 1942, and August 16, 1942; USHMM, Acc.1997.A.0124, reel 50, 211/825, pp. 8-9, 13, 16.
10. USHMM, Acc.1997.A.0124, reel 50, 211/825, pp. 18, 23-24, 28, 44.
11. According to VHF, # 19311, testimony of Hala Goldstein, 1996; # 32085, testimony of Rachel Englard, 1997; # 22337, testimony of Mannie Schneider, 1996; # 07285-3, testimony of David Werdyger, 1995; # 43560, testimony of Al Bukiet, 1998; # 19305; # 31742, testimony of Janek Schnall, 1997; and Spector and Wigoder, The Encyclopedia of Jewish Life, p. 1030.
12. USHMM, Acc.1997.A.0124, reel 50, 211/825, pp. 47, 50; VHF, # 11515-6, testimony of Fryda Wollstein, 1996; AŻIH, 302/66, testimony of Maria Stecko; VHF, # 19305; # 24467-3, testimony of Jack Kleiner, 1997, specifically uses the word ghetto in describing Proszowice at this time. Also see Rejestr miejsc i faktów zbrodni popełnionych przez okupanta hitlerowskiego na ziemiach polskich w latach 1939–1945: Województwo krakowskie (Warsaw: GKBZHWp, 1984), p. 79; and Spector and Wigoder, The Encyclopedia of Jewish Life, p. 1030. No description of the “ghetto” has survived, but it probably was an open ghetto where the remaining Jews lived together in a few houses.

13. E. Podhorizer-Sandel, “O zagładzie Żydów w dystrykcie krakowskim,” BŻIH, no. 30 (1959): 98.

14. VHF, # 43560.

15. USHMM, Acc.1997.A.0124, reel 50, 211/825, p. 57; VHF, # 19305; # 11515-6; # 07285-3; # 43560; Rejestr miejsc, p. 79.

PRUCHNIK

Pre-1939: Pruchnik, village, Lwów województwo, Poland; 1939–1945: Kreis Jaroslau, Distrikt Krakau, Generalgouvernement; post-1998: województwo podkarpackie, Poland

The village of Pruchnik is located 18 kilometers (11 miles) southwest of Jarosław. In 1921, there were 877 Jews living in Pruchnik, constituting 51.7 percent of the total population. Jewish residency was concentrated around the market square, as well as on Kańczuga, Jarosław, Kościelna, and Długa Streets.

There were 976 Jewish residents in Pruchnik on the outbreak of World War II. Shortly after capturing the village on September 9, 1939, the Germans shot approximately 50 Jews after having dragged them behind horses through the streets.¹

The Germans replaced the majority of Poles serving in the Pruchnik municipality with Ukrainians. A man by the name of Harasymow was appointed as the new mayor; and a certain “Kondratko” became Pruchnik’s wójt. A small German Gendarmerie post was stationed in the village.²

Archival files of the Pruchnik American Jewish Joint Distribution Committee (AJDC) and Jewish Social Self-Help (JSS) branches maintain that an open ghetto in Pruchnik was established as early as November 1939. Until the beginning of 1942, the ghetto—located on Długa Street—served as the designated place of Jewish residence; however, its inhabitants could still move freely around the village.³

The Judenrat chairman, Samuel Goldstein, described events leading to the ghetto’s establishment as follows: “In November 1939, the community was expelled to the [new German-Soviet] border, but because the border was [already] closed, they [the Jews] could not cross it. Wanting to return to their houses, they were unfortunately forbidden entrance, and were forced to wander for two weeks until they finally received the authorities’ permission [to move back to Pruchnik]. On their return, they were compressed onto a single street, suffocating in this confined space and dying of hunger.” In this letter, sent to the AJDC’s Kraków office in June 1940, Goldstein requested assistance for the 580 Jews who had returned to Pruchnik (i.e., approximately two thirds of the pre-war population), including 25 refugees. By December 1940, the number of ghetto residents had risen to 600.⁴

In the spring of 1941, the community sought the Kreishauptmann’s permission to teach horticultural and agricultural courses and for the assignment of uncultivated parcels of land in and around Pruchnik. The Kreishauptmann denied the request. Nevertheless, clandestine schooling of Jewish children took place in the ghetto. Among the teachers was Irena Kudler, who also took part in the underground education of Polish youth in Pruchnik.⁵

A branch of the JSS was established in Pruchnik in June 1941. Local doctor Ottmar Schorr (born 1908) chaired the committee, which also included Irena Kudler (deputy) and Bernard Pasternak. On Schorr’s request, Maier Ober replaced the latter due to poor performance, in March 1942. The committee never managed to open a soup kitchen and limited its activity to the distribution of small sums of money or rations.

According to Schorr, very few men returned after the 1939 expulsion; hence the ghetto’s residents consisted primarily of women, children, and the elderly, none of whom were able to donate any funds for social services. According to the JSS report, there were 137 ghetto residents under the age of 18 in August 1941. Of that number, 39 were 14 to 18 years old. In the summer of 1941, a number of Jews arranged employment for reasonable wages with local farmers.

In an attempt to increase welfare funds, Schorr wrote to the JSS headquarters in Kraków in June 1941: “The municipality in Pruchnik collects rent from all ‘ownerless’ Jewish houses [those whose owners did not return after expulsion], and even from those whose owners are residing in Pruchnik. Furthermore, the municipality collects significant rental sums from the military quartered now for several months in two synagogues. Of all this income, the Jewish community is not receiving anything.” Schorr requested Kraków’s assistance in persuading the municipality to transfer a portion of this income for the welfare of Pruchnik’s Jews. Furthermore, according to Schorr, expropriated Jewish land had been assigned to private commissars, who were depositing part of the income with the Treuhandstelle (Trustee Office)—not the Jews.⁶

By January 1942, Pruchnik’s Jews were no longer allowed to leave the limits of the village, due to “the recent order forbidding the Jews to leave their places of residence.” Despite poverty and overcrowding among the Jews of Pruchnik, there was only one case of typhus registered by March 1942. Dr. Schorr was the only doctor serving the community.

In April 1942, there were 575 Jews living in the ghetto. They occupied 51 houses, comprising 146 rooms. A few of the Jews were permitted to live outside the ghetto; for example, in June 1942, Schorr lived at 39 Rynek Street, and Irena Kudler, at 5 Kościelna Street.

Pruchnik’s Jews remained hopeful of obtaining jobs in agriculture; however, by June 1942, “permissions to go to work on neighboring farms” remained with the authorities. Finally, in mid-July 1942, 65 volunteers were working in agriculture, 15 of whom were under 15 years of age and labored in local orchards.

The JSS reported in June 1942 that “[the community] recently declined by 20 people, mainly fathers and mothers, who up to now had sustained families, which are now left to their fate.” These people were either sent to labor camps or more likely shot. In the summer of 1942, over a dozen Jews were reportedly shot by three German Gendarmes near the cemetery.⁷

As evidenced by another of Schorr’s letters to Kraków, dated August 3, 1942, the ghetto was liquidated between August 1 and 3, 1942. “Because [the] entire local population is being deported, the JSS branch is ending its activities as of July 31, 1942.” According to a secondary source, the community was deported to the Bircza ghetto, and shortly thereafter, on that ghetto’s liquidation, to the Bełżec extermination camp. An unknown number of Jews were also taken from Pruchnik to the killing site in Wólka Pełkińska and shot there. The Germans allowed a few families to remain in Pruchnik for at least one month, after which they were moved to the ghetto in Sieniawa.

SOURCES The Pruchnik ghetto is briefly mentioned in Andrzej Potocki, Podkarpackie judaica (Brzozów: Związek Gmin Brzozowskich and Muzeum Regionalne PTTK w Brzozowie, 1993), pp. 123–124.

The following archival sources were used to prepare this entry: AŻIH (210/565 [AJDC]; 211/826–827 [JSS]); USHMM (Acc.1999.A.0154 [AJDC]; Acc.1997.A.0124 [JSS]); and VHF (# 5761).

Jolanta Kraemer

NOTES

1. VHF, # 5761, testimony of Dov Feit, 1995; Rejestr miejsc i faktów zbrodni popełnionych przez okupanta hitlerowskiego na ziemiach polskich w latach 1939–1945: Województwo przemyskie (Warsaw: GKBZHP, 1983), pp. 82–83; USHMM, Acc.1997.A.0124 (JSS), 211/827 (Pruchnik), p. 28.

2. “Wspomnienia łączniczki Armii Krajowej ps. ‘Kropka’ z lat okupacji hitlerowskiej z terenu Pruchnika,” Ziemia Pruchnicka, no. 3 (11) (2002): 3–4.

3. USHMM, Acc.1999.A.0154 (AJDC), 210/565 (Pruchnik), p. 1; “Wspomnienia łączniczki,” pp. 3–4.

4. USHMM, Acc.1997.A.0124, 211/657 (Łańcut), p. 16; Acc.1999.A.0154, 210/565, pp. 1–2. According to Shmuel Spector and Geoffrey Wigoder, eds., The Encyclopedia of Jewish Life before and during the Holocaust (Jerusalem: Yad Vashem; New York: New York University Press, 2001), p. 1030, the expulsion was “an initiative of the Polish mayor.”

5. USHMM, Acc.1997.A.0124, 211/827, pp. 6–7; “Wspomnienia łączniczki,” pp. 3–4.

6. USHMM, Acc.1997.A.0124, 211/826 (Pruchnik), pp. 6–7, 15–19, 36, 41–43; and 211/827, pp. 2, 10, 23.

7. Rejestr miejsc, pp. 82–83; USHMM, Acc.1997.A.0124, 211/827, pp. 6–7, 24, 28, 33–34, 39, 43.

PRZEMYŚL

Pre-1939: Przemyśl, city and powiat center, Lwów województwo, Poland; 1939–1941: two occupation zones along the River San—the German-occupied right bank, Jarosław powiat, from

June 27, 1940, Deutsche-Przemyśl, and the Soviet-occupied left bank, Pshemysl’, Drogobych oblast’, Ukrainian SSR; 1941–1944: Przemyśl, Kreis center, Distrikt Krakau, Generalgouvernement; post-1998: Przemyśl, województwo podkarpackie, Poland

Przemyśl is located about 220 kilometers (137 miles) east-southeast of Kraków. On the eve of World War II, Przemyśl had around 54,000 inhabitants, including some 20,000 Jews. Another 4,000 Jews resided in the villages of the Przemyśl powiat.

Przemyśl straddled the demarcation line between the German and Soviet occupation zones in Poland. The city was divided along the San River, creating a German-occupied zone, including the left-bank Przemyśl, and a Soviet-occupied zone, incorporating the city center and its adjacent districts.

On September 16, one day after the German capture of Przemyśl, parts of the Einsatzgruppe zur besonderen Verwendung (Einsatzgruppe z.b.V.) commanded by Obergruppenführer Udo von Woyrsch entered the city. Einsatzgruppe personnel collected Jewish men, especially leaders of the community, shot them in pits at various locations outside the city, then went on to loot and destroy Jewish homes and businesses.¹

By the end of September, the Jews from German-occupied Przemyśl had been expelled across the San River. After the expulsions, only 66 Jews remained in the part of the city now called Deutsche-Przemyśl. These Jews were subsequently forced into two buildings on 11/13 Dolińskiego Street; they consisted mainly of sick and elderly refugees from Katowice and Jarosław. In June 1942, the Germans killed them in the nearby village of Kuńkowce.

After October 26, 1939, the Einsatzgruppen administration was transformed into the regional office of the Gestapo under SS-Sturmbannführer Dr. Alfred Hasselberg based in Przemyśl. At this point, Captain Schiffer was appointed as the Kreishauptmann, while SS-Obergruppenführer Schattenheim became head of the local Gestapo.

Poles buy household goods being sold by Jews in the Przemyśl ghetto, 1941. The original Yiddish caption reads, “The peasants exploit our desolation.”

USHMM WS 44372, COURTESY OF YIVO

On June 22, 1941, Germany invaded the Soviet Union, capturing Przemyśl on June 28 after heavy fighting. Among the city's 65,798 inhabitants were about 16,500 Jews.

On November 1, 1941, the Germans reunited the right- and left-bank districts of Przemyśl into one administrative district. On March 1, 1943, Przemyśl became the center of its own Kreis with an area of 1,996 square kilometers (771 square miles) and 217,106 inhabitants.

After the Germans captured the city, the Jewish community organized a committee led by Drs. Susswein, Haas, and Duldig. In early July, this committee was transformed into the Jewish Council (Judenrat). The German authorities appointed Dr. Ignacy Duldig as head of the council. Its executive committee consisted of over 20 prominent members of the Jewish community and had its headquarters on Kopernik Street. The Judenrat was responsible for collecting funds, provisions, and equipment demanded by the local German army command, as well as supplying Jewish laborers for road construction and repairing war damage in the city. Shortly after the German occupation of Przemyśl, the Gestapo arrived and announced a new set of regulations for the Jews. They were to be separated from the rest of the population, made to surrender personal property and valuables, and ordered to abandon their homes and relocate to the Garbarza district of the city. In addition, all Jews aged 16 to 60 were required to register with the Jewish labor office, which was subordinated to the German Arbeitsamt, headed by a Ukrainian senior official. Groups of Jewish workers provided manual labor overseen by ethnic Germans and Ukrainians.

The Judenrat was also responsible for issuing food rations and overseeing the Jewish Police. To assist the starving population, the Judenrat organized a soup kitchen. In addition, members maintained the small synagogue on Mnisza Street (the only synagogue within the Jewish quarter) and several churches (kloizers), particularly on Czarniecki Street.

In July 1941, Jews were forced to move to a designated area of Przemyśl, and after December 26, 1941, the Schutzpolizei became responsible for policing the Jewish district. The Garbarza district, designated as the Jewish residential area, was bounded on three sides by the bend in the River San. The southern boundary was marked by the Kraków-Lwów rail line. This small Jewish quarter became home to 17,000 people. Initially the Jewish area was not enclosed, and Jews could walk freely through the streets. Only crossing the river via the provisional bridge was prohibited by the Germans.

On July 3, 1942, the newly appointed Stadtkommissar, Bernard Giesselmann, issued a formal decree to create a separate Jewish residential quarter in Przemyśl. On July 16, the Przemyśl ghetto came into being, covering roughly the same territory as the existing Jewish quarter.²

The Jews had to move to the ghetto no later than 10:00 P.M. on July 15. Those leaving the ghetto illegally and those knowingly giving shelter to Jews were threatened with the death penalty. All the entrances to the ghetto were closed except for those on Wiktoria (Jagiellońska) and Lwów Streets. In its final section, the regulation ordered that Jews could only leave the ghetto to work. In the early hours of July 16, the fencing of the ghetto began.

Most sources estimate that at least 22,000 Jews had been resettled to the ghetto by the summer of 1942. Throughout its history, approximately 24,000 Jews passed through the Przemyśl ghetto.

From the spring of 1942 on, the Gestapo and members of the Grenzpolizeikommissariat (Border Police Office, GPK) shot groups of Jews at the Jewish cemetery on Słowacki Street on numerous occasions. In addition, between June and August 1942, the Germans killed a number of Jews remaining in the surrounding villages. By the end of June 1942, some 5,000 surviving Jews from neighboring villages, such as Bircza, Krzywcz, Niżankowice, and Dynów, had been resettled to the Przemyśl ghetto, as the area around Przemyśl was cleared of Jews.

On the orders of Gestapo chief SS-Untersturmführer Adolf Benthin, in mid-June 1942, the Judenrat had to provide a list of 1,000 young, able-bodied Jews capable of work. On June 18, 1942, people on the list were arrested and handed over by the Jewish Police to the Gestapo and Schupo. On June 20, those not able to bribe their way off the list were transported to the Janowska Street Camp in Lwów.

After sealing the ghetto on July 16, 1942, the Germans prepared for the first large-scale deportation from Przemyśl. The leaders of the Judenrat were notified on July 23, 1942, that the first resettlement for forced labor would take place four days later. Members of the Judenrat, hospital staff and patients, and those with working permits were to be exempted. The Gestapo issued 5,000 work permits to Duldig to be distributed among the 20,000-strong Jewish population. All work cards were collected and sent to the Gestapo on July 24 and given back to the Judenrat two days later with a list of those marked for "resettlement."

On July 25, the ghetto was surrounded by part of Police Battalion 307, under Captain Schaller's command. Announcements were posted throughout the city notifying the local population of the resettlement of the Jewish population on July 27 and warning that anyone caught giving assistance to Jews or plundering their property would face the death penalty. On July 27, 3,850 Jews, primarily from the areas adjacent to the synagogue on Mnisza Street, were deported to the extermination camp at Bełżec. On the same day, the head of the Judenrat, Dr. Duldig, and his deputy, Rechter, were killed on the steps of the Judenrat building on Kopernik Street. At this time, several hundred elderly, sick, and disabled Jews were taken to the forest near Grochowce and shot by members of the Sipo, commanded by Karl Reisner.

The deportations continued on July 31, when about 3,000 residents of Czarniecki, Kopernik, and adjacent streets were transported to Bełżec. On August 3, another 3,000 Jews shared the same fate. In total, 9,850 Jews were sent to their deaths in Bełżec between July 27 and August 3, 1942. It was during this first Aktion that despite the pledges made by the Catholic bishop of Przemyśl, Franciszek Barda, all Jewish converts to Christianity were shot at the Jewish cemetery. In addition, all the patients of the Jewish hospital were shot.

On November 17, men of the Schupo and Gestapo surrounded the ghetto. The next morning, "Aktion Judenrein" began, in which 4,000 people were collected at the deportation square and sent to their deaths in Bełżec. (Some 8,000 Jews were slated for deportation to Bełżec, but only 3,500 showed up. The remainder were in hiding in the ghetto. Before the trains left, another 500 were pulled from their bunkers and added to the transport.) On the same day, the orphanage was liquidated.

After the second Aktion, the ghetto was reduced in size and partitioned into two ghettos: "Ghetto A," for about 800 people capable of work; and "Ghetto B," for about 4,000 "nonproductive" Jews. In February 1943, the two ghettos in Przemyśl were put under the command of SS-Obersturmführer Josef Schwammberger, who was known for his exceptional cruelty. Ghetto A was officially declared a labor camp by Schwammberger, and any contact with Ghetto B was strictly forbidden.

Although there was no armed resistance in the ghetto, a dozen young Jews managed to escape in mid-April 1943. An organized group, headed by Brunk, Kastner, and Grin, attempted to reach Polish partisans in the surrounding forests but was apprehended. All the escapees, except for one, were shot by Ukrainians just outside the city. On May 10, 1943, Reisner was severely injured after a Jew stabbed him. The attempt on Reisner's life brought severe German retaliation to the ghetto when three randomly chosen Jews, Grin, Gründ, and Krebs, were sentenced to be hanged. In addition, approximately 30 Jews in the ghetto were shot as a reprisal.

On September 2–3, 1943, the final liquidation of Ghetto B began when an entire battalion of German troops rounded up approximately 3,500 Jews and sent them to the Auschwitz II-Birkenau concentration camp. On September 4, 100 Jews from the ghetto were deported to the work camp at Szebnie. On September 10, the commander of the GPK, Rudolf Benewitz, announced that all Jews who reported for resettlement voluntarily would be assigned to work camps. On the following day, 1,580 Jews gathered at the Grzegorz Pirałowicz School on Kopernik Street. After making them undress and surrender their valuables, the Sipo shot them in groups of 50. This Aktion became known as the "Turnhalle Aktion" (Gymnasium Aktion). Another deportation of 100 Jews to the Szebnie camp followed on October 28.

Between November 28, 1943, and February 2, 1944, the roughly 1,000 Jews remaining in the (former) Ghetto A labor camp were either shot or sent to the camps at Stalowa Wola, Szebnie, Płaszów, or Auschwitz II-Birkenau. The last 20 Jewish children in the ghetto were shot personally by Schwammberger. Just before the liberation of Przemyśl, the bodies of Jews killed in the ghetto were burned by the Wehrmacht. By the spring of 1944, only approximately 120 Jews remained in hiding in Przemyśl.

The ghetto was destroyed at the end of February 1944, at which point Przemyśl was declared to be judenrein (cleansed of Jews). The estimated 120 Jews still hiding in bunkers and other places in Przemyśl were mostly discovered and killed over the subsequent months.

On July 27, 1944, the Red Army reentered the city. According to official data, the population of Przemyśl had fallen from approximately 54,000 on the eve of World War II to only 28,144 in January 1945. Of these, there were 22,173 Poles, 3,372 Ukrainians, 415 Jews, 106 Russians, and 78 of other nationalities. Of the 415 Jews in Przemyśl in January 1945, fewer than 250 were pre-war residents of the city. The Shoah abruptly ended the thousand-year history of the Jewish community in Przemyśl.

When the SS prepared to launch their first Aktion on July 26, 1942, the military commandant in Przemyśl, Major Max Liedtke, and his adjutant, Dr. Albert Battel, requested that Jews working for the German army be spared. When the request was denied, Wehrmacht forces took control of the rail bridge over the San River. They threatened that no transports would leave the ghetto and ordered the bridge to be blockaded. When the SS Kommando attempted to cross the bridge, Liedtke threatened to open fire. After phoning their commander in Kraków, Julian Scherner of the Gestapo, they acceded to the request, temporarily saving many Jews from deportation. On the same day, according to survivors' testimony, an army detachment under Battel's command broke into the ghetto and used army trucks to whisk off between 80 and 100 Jews to a military barracks for protection.

After the incident, SS authorities began a secret investigation into Battel's conduct. They discovered that Battel, though himself a member of the Nazi Party since May 1933, had previously attracted notice by his friendly behavior towards Jews. Before the war, he had been indicted by a party tribunal for extending a loan to a Jewish colleague. During his service in Przemyśl, he was officially reprimanded for shaking the hand of the chairman of the Judenrat. Battel's actions even attracted the attention of Heinrich Himmler, who took a lively interest in the investigation. Yad Vashem posthumously recognized Albert Battel as Righteous Among the Nations nearly 30 years after his death. For his part, Major Max Liedtke became the highest-ranking German officer to be awarded the same honor.

In Przemyśl, the number of Christians who provided assistance to their Jewish neighbors will never be known. Whether it was a piece of bread for a starving inhabitant of the ghetto or a hiding place for a Jewish stranger, the true extent of aid given to Jews during their last days can never be quantified. In spite of constant fear and the threat of death, dozens of Christians from Przemyśl, both Polish and Ukrainian, were recognized as Righteous Among the Nations by Yad Vashem. Fortunately, much evidence of the kindness and heroism of a number of people from Przemyśl and its vicinity has been documented by those Jews who survived with their help.

A number of Poles and Ukrainians, however, lost their lives for helping Jews, due to betrayal by neighbors, friends, and even family members. According to postwar investigations, 568 Christians from Kreis Przemyśl were murdered for attempting to help Jews. For example, Michał Gierula from the village of Łodzinka near Bircza was hanged by the Gestapo after being betrayed by a Polish woman for offering shelter to three partisans of the Armia Krajowa (Home Army) and to three Jews.

Stefania Podgórska and her sister, Helena, saved 13 Jews using a hiding place in the attic behind a false wall in their home at 3 Tatarska Street. Stefania went on to marry Max Diamand (Józef Burzmiński), one of the Jews hidden in her cottage. Their story was made into a film, Hidden in Silence (1996), and a documentary, The Other Side of Faith (1991). The Sisters of the Sacred Heart, a convent in Przemyśl, sheltered and cared for 40 Christian and 13 Jewish children during World War II. Most of the Jewish children there either had been left on the steps of the orphanage at 80 Mickiewicz Street by desperate parents or had been brought by Polish friends and neighbors. In addition to individuals and religious orders, a local branch of Żegota also functioned in Przemyśl after September 1943. Żegota provided false identity cards, food, and money; assisted individuals and institutions sheltering Jews; and protected them against informers.

Karl Reisner was sentenced to life imprisonment by a German court in 1969 for crimes committed in Przemyśl.³

SOURCES Further information on the history and fate of the Jewish population of Przemyśl can be found in the following publications: Aaron Freiwald and Martin Mendelson, The Last Nazi: Joseph Schwammberger and the Nazi Past (New York: W.W. Norton & Co., 1994); John J. Hartman and Jacek Krochmal, eds., I Remember Every Day: The Fates of the Jews of Przemyśl during World War II (Przemyśl: Towarzystwo Przyjaciół Nauk and Remembrance and Reconciliation, 2002); Arie Menczer, ed., Sefer Przemyśl (Tel Aviv, 1964); Joseph Rebhun, God and Man in Two Worlds (Claremont, CA: Or Publishing, 1985); Joseph Rebhun, Leap to Life: Triumph over Nazi Evil (New York: Ardor Scribendi, 2000); Jan Rożański, "Przemyśl w latach drugiej wojny światowej," in Tysiąc lat Przemyśla (Warsaw and Kraków, 1974); Józef Sohn-Sonecki, Byłem jeńcem Wehrmachtu (Warsaw, 1956); Józef Sohn-Sonecki, Byłem więźniem Wehrmachtu (Warsaw, 1965); Bronisław Szatyń, A Private War: Surviving in Poland on False Papers 1941–1945 (Detroit, MI: Wayne State University Press, 1985); A. Wolfshant-Dinkes, Échec et mot: La miracle de ma vie (Paris, 1975); and Hamburger Institut für Sozialforschung, ed., Verbrechen der Wehrmacht: Dimensionen des Vernichtungskrieges 1941–1944 (Hamburg: Hamburger Edition, 2002), pp. 586–592.

Documentation on the fate of the Jews of Przemyśl under the German occupation can be found in the following archives: APPrz; AŻIH (e.g., 301/4957; 211/833–834); BA-L (e.g., ZStL, 205 AR-Z 302/67, vol. 3); IPN; USHMM (e.g., RG-50.002*0131; RG-15.019M, reel 11); VHF; and YVA.

Curt Dunagan

NOTES

1. BA-L, ZStL, 205 AR-Z 302/67, vol. 3, pp. 498–577.
2. For a map of the ghetto area as of its enclosure on July 15–16, 1942, see Hamburger Institut für Sozialforschung, Verbrechen der Wehrmacht, p. 589.
3. Justiz und NS-Verbrechen, vol. 31 (Amsterdam: Amsterdam University Press, 2004), Lfd. Nr. 699, pp. 519–671, verdict of LG-Hamb, (50) 38/67, January 14, 1969.

PRZEWORSK

Pre-1939: Przeworsk, town, Lwów województwo, Poland; 1939–1945: Kreis Jaroslau, Distrikt Krakau, Generalgouvernement; post-1998: town, województwo podkarpackie, Poland

Przeworsk is located 35 kilometers (22 miles) east of Rzeszów. There were 1,457 Jews living in Przeworsk in 1921, according to the census.

In the first days of World War II, the Jewish section of Przeworsk was severely damaged by air raids. Shortly after occupying the town, the Germans searched the synagogue and allegedly found ammunition there. In retaliation, they razed the building on September 12, 1939. The Gestapo arrived from Jarosław to execute 30 Jews.

Survivor Harry Kuper testified that the Germans, soon after entering Przeworsk, ordered the Jews gathered in a church. After an elderly rabbi failed to report, the Germans selected every tenth man from among the assembled, took them away, and pretended to torture them to find out the rabbi's whereabouts. After a man disclosed his hiding place, the rabbi was arrested and thrown into a hole for execution. Observing the scene from his window, a priest was shot for intervening. The prisoners, including the rabbi, were released.¹

Within weeks, the Germans stripped Jewish stores of merchandise and then closed them. Men, aged from 15 to 70 years old, and women, from 15 to 65 years old, daily assembled at the market square for work assignments. The assignments included cleaning train cars of debris, factory labor, and menial work for the Germans.²

Survivor Zygmunt Margules testified that shortly after the Soviet invasion of Poland, on September 17, 1939, the SS arrived in Przeworsk late one night, beat many Jewish residents, and "said everybody has to go."³ According to historian Andrzej Potocki, most of the Jews were forced across the San River, into Soviet-occupied Polish territory, including to the nearby town of Sieniawa. The Germans left only 27 Jews in Przeworsk.

One religious Jew is forced to cut off the sidelocks of another in front of German SS men in Przeworsk, ca. 1939–1940.

USHMM WS #33485, COURTESY OF GFH

Contemporary documentation of the American Jewish Joint Distribution Committee (AJDC) indicates that nearly 1,750 Jews were forcibly expelled from Przeworsk. In 1940, the Jewish Council (Judenrat), led by Mojżesz Korn, reported that some 2,000 Jews had resided in Przeworsk before the war, but only 25 Jews lived there in May 1940. Another 200 Jews, presumably former Przeworsk residents, were living in neighboring villages. In November 1940, the Judenrat reported “35 souls” residing in Przeworsk. In a retrospective report, dated March 2, 1941, to the AJDC concerning charity efforts over the past year, the Judenrat noted that the same number of Jews were still in Przeworsk. Another 170 Jews lived in its vicinity. There were no refugees or deportees. The Jews had no paying jobs and were living off their “depleted savings.”⁴

A detailed testimony by Mina Kalter, the only other primary source available to the author, suggests that Kalter’s extended family were some of the only Jewish residents still living in Przeworsk after the expulsions. Because Kalter’s family resided in a house in an undamaged Christian neighborhood, they took in other relatives and a family of refugees from Kraków, bringing the number of occupants to 28.

Kalter recalls that the Germans forced the Przeworsk Jews to reside in a ghetto in October 1939 but does not mention explicitly the forced expulsions, which made the ghetto one of the smallest in the Distrikt. She states that the possible reason for the Germans to establish a ghetto was because “my home town was only 15 miles from the border that was established then between Germany and the Soviet Union. . . . So we thought that maybe the Germans did not have any confidence in us, knowing that the Russians are only a few miles away; therefore, they separated us from the mainstream of society and maybe from the Soviets. They had no confidence, because that’s all we heard is Jews are Communists, and that’s maybe the reason we are there.”⁵ Two secondary sources report that the ghetto was established as late as July 1942.⁶

Kalter testified that violence accompanied the Jewish population’s transfer to the ghetto. One day after work, the community was ordered to deliver all valuables and house keys to the town hall the following morning. That day, the Jews were ordered to wait outside their houses with only what they could carry. They were then escorted to a pasture behind the Bernadine monastery. There the Judenrat members were ordered to dig a hole. The rabbi and his two sons were thrown into it and shot. All the remaining Jews were then escorted to the burned-out section of the town and ordered to reside there.

Initially unfenced, the ghetto was subsequently enclosed. Kalter describes the situation as follows: “In the first weeks, which was then called the ghetto, it was open. . . . Only a couple of weeks later, the ghetto was encircled by barbed wire, by four watch towers that were manned twenty-four hours a day, and nobody could get out any more, except to and from work. There were gates through which the people taken out to work were counted.” The workers were often beaten and insulted.

Only working ghetto residents received “a small bread ration and a bowl of soup.”

Diseases, especially typhus and dysentery, spread due to the deplorable living conditions. The sick were either shot or left to die. “It began to be a very common sight to see on your way to work all the people in the streets dying and dead,” Kalter recalls. She also remembers that separate barracks for men and women subsequently were constructed on the ghetto grounds. The sick, forced to reside in a barrack at the very end of the ghetto, were periodically removed and presumably shot.⁷

Secondary sources date the ghetto’s liquidation to October 1942, when its residents were sent to the Bełżec extermination camp. Kalter, who escaped from the ghetto in March 1941, believes the Przeworsk Jews were deported to Sędziszów Małopolski, an unlikely destination located in Kreis Debica.

A number of Jews likely perished during the ghetto liquidation or subsequently. Polish documentation indicates 90 Jews were shot in Przeworsk between 1942 and 1943. Some probably were fugitives from the liquidation of ghettos in other localities. The victims were buried in the Jewish cemetery. Nine people were buried in a field owned by Jakub Kapusta in the Mokra Strona neighborhood.⁸

SOURCES The following publications were used to prepare this entry: Andrzej Potocki, Żydzi w Podkarpackiem (Rzeszów: Libra, 2004), p. 138; Czesław Pilichowski et al., eds., Obozy hitlerowskie na ziemiach polskich 1939–1945: Informator encyklopedyczny (Warsaw: PWN, 1979), p. 410.

Archival sources on the fate of the Przeworsk community include AŻIH (210/269 [AJDC]; 211/836 [JSS]); USHMM (Acc.1999.A.0154 [AJDC]; Acc.1997.A.0124 [JSS]; RG-15.019M [ASG]; and RG-50.462*0013); and VHF (# 7785, 14642).

Jolanta Kraemer

NOTES

1. VHF, # 14642, testimony of Harry Kuper, 1996.
2. USHMM, RG-50.462*0013, testimony of Mina Kalter, 1986.
3. VHF, # 7785, testimony of Zygmunt Margules, 1995.
4. USHMM, Acc.1999.A.0154 (AJDC), 210/269, pp. 1–5.
5. Ibid., RG-50.462*0013.
6. Rejestr miejsc i faktów zbrodni popełnionych przez okupanta hitlerowskiego na ziemiach polskich w latach 1939–1945: Województwo przemyskie (Warsaw: Główna Komisja Badania Zbrodni Hitlerowskich w Polsce, 1983), pp. 96–97; Pilichowski et al., Obozy hitlerowskie, p. 410, citing undefined documentation in ITS Arolsen.
7. USHMM, RG-50.462*0013.
8. Ibid., RG-15.019M (ASG), reel 11, file 527 (Przeworsk).

RABKA

Pre-1939: Rabka, town, Nowy Targ powiat, Kraków województwo, Poland; 1939–1945: Kreis Neumarkt, Distrikt Krakau, Generalgouvernement; post-1998: Rabka-Zdrój, województwo małopolskie, Poland

Rabka is located about 60 kilometers (37 miles) south of Kraków. On the outbreak of World War II, around 500 Jews were living there.¹

The German army occupied Rabka on September 3, 1939. In the first months, Jews were harassed and beaten by the Germans, and their property was plundered. The German authorities imposed a number of restrictions on the Jews, including the wearing of the Star of David.

In March 1940 the Germans created a 12-member Jewish Council (Judenrat) in Rabka, referred to as the Jewish Community (Jüdische Gemeinde), with Zygmunt Buschbaum as chairman. The other members included Benzion and Dawid Braunschweig, Salomon Koc, Bernard Borger, Chaim Schiffer, Stiel, Hochman, Szymon Zollman, Izrael Selinger, Filip Ettinger, Scherer, and Samuel Reitenbaum. The Rabka Judenrat held jurisdiction over several surrounding villages and small towns. The Judenrat had to pay "contributions" to the Germans.²

In August 1940, the Germans transferred the headquarters of the Security Police School (Die Schule des Befehlshabers der Sicherheitspolizei und des Sicherheitsdienstes) from Zakopane to Rabka. The purpose of the school was to train future German and Ukrainian Security Police officers and collaborators. SS-Hauptsturmführer Hans Krüger was the founder and first commander of the school. SS-Untersturmführer Wilhelm Rosenbaum was his deputy and later the commandant. Jews performed forced labor at the school, such as constructing shooting ranges; they were also rounded up, tortured, humiliated, and killed there, serving as live practice targets. Paul Beck, a Jew from Zakopane, was entrusted with organizing the work details.³

As of February 21, 1941, there were 460 Jews in Rabka, 120 of them receiving social welfare assistance. On March 30, 1941, a community kitchen administered by the Judenrat opened in Rabka. Due to lack of food, it was forced to close several times during its existence. By June 1941, the Jewish population had risen to around 630. In September, the newly established branch of the Jewish Social Self-Help (JSS) in Rabka provided financial assistance to 96 people (15 percent of Rabka's Jews). From September 1, 1939, to March 31, 1942, the JSS in Rabka provided medical help in 143 cases and housing to 30 people; helped 75 people obtain clothing; provided supplementary food to 130 people; and distributed about 66 meals a day in the community kitchen.⁴

The Jews of Rabka were conscripted for forced labor. In 1941, around 30 Jewish men together with about 300 Poles worked in stone quarries in Zaryte. They worked 16 hours a day and received little payment and no food or clothing. On October 24, 1941, Jews from Rabka were taken to a labor camp at Czarny Dunajec. Among those sent were 37 men, mainly the elderly and sick, who had previously not been deemed fit for such work.⁵

The situation of the Jews of Rabka deteriorated in 1942. All Jewish men were enlisted for forced labor. Almost no one received any kind of money for work. There were also conflicts between the JSS and the Judenrat over lack of funds. In February 1942, the Jews were ordered to surrender all winter clothing to the Germans. Four Jews who tried to hide their clothing were shot. On April 1, 1942, there were 686 Jews in Rabka, including 370 refugees who had arrived from Kraków and Bielsko-Biała (in Ost-Oberschlesien) in 1940. At this time 200 Jews were receiving aid from the JSS, which was also planning job training for women.⁶

In May 1942, around 80 forced laborers from Stary Sącz were working in Rabka. In June 1942, another group of destitute Jews arrived from Nowy Sącz. The Jewish Council planned to open a tailoring cooperative for 10 tailors and 50 seamstresses, in the hope that productive efforts might preserve the Jewish community, which in July comprised 450 people, as well as 200 Jewish forced laborers from other towns. During the summer, the Germans shot hundreds of Jews from Rabka and other nearby towns in a series of bloody Aktions.⁷

The first Aktion took place on May 20, 1942; 45 Jews from Rabka and its vicinity, who had been identified as elderly or unfit for work during an examination conducted by SS-Untersturmführer Rosenbaum a few weeks earlier, were assembled at the Villa Tereska. They were shot and buried in a mass grave in a small clearing in the forest behind the Security Police School. About 10 of the forced laborers from Stary Sącz deemed unfit were shot with them.⁸

The second Aktion took place in June 1942. The victims included 45 Jews brought from Nowy Targ (arrested for alleged currency offenses) and 55 Jews from Rabka.⁹ The Germans also shot a whole family because it bore the name Rosenbaum, which was the name of commandant Wilhelm Rosenbaum, and the Buschbaum family, because the wife was German and had converted to Judaism.¹⁰ The third Aktion took place on July 17, 1942, when the elderly Jews of Rabka were assembled by the Germans near the Villa Tereska and shot. At this time the Germans demanded "contributions" from the Judenrat, claiming that in return the Jews would not be deported. In the course of daily roundups, the Germans picked up Jews and shot them in the nearby forest.¹¹ At the end of July 1942, around 100 Orthodox Jews carrying Torahs were brought to Rabka from Nowy Sącz, tortured, and murdered.¹²

The deportation of the Jews of Rabka to the Bełżec extermination camp took place on August 30, 1942. The Germans issued a warning that any Pole providing help to the Jews would face the death penalty. Nonetheless, the convent of the Sisters of Magdalene in Rabka gave refuge to Jewish children from many places in Poland.

The Germans hunted down and murdered the remnants of Rabka's Jews who had evaded deportation. At the end of August 1942, SS officers hanged 10 Jews at the Security Police School, including a member of the Judenrat.¹³

Several sources indicate the existence of a form of "open ghetto" in Rabka but do not date its establishment. From 1940 the Jews of Rabka and its vicinity were conscripted regularly to perform forced labor at the Security Police School. At first, the local Jews were allowed to live in their own houses, while Jewish workers from outside the town were housed near the school in the Słone district. Eventually, all the Jews of Rabka were ordered by the Germans to move into this residential area.¹⁴ In June 1941, the Germans extended the judenfrei (free of Jews) resort area around Zakopane northward towards Nowy Targ.¹⁵ A curfew was imposed on the Jews of Rabka. They could remain on the streets for only one hour a day. In January 1942, Zygmunt Buschbaum, as chair of the JSS in Rabka, wrote to the main office in Kraków that German plans to create a Jewish residential area in Rabka had been postponed.¹⁶ Some sources indicate that the Rabka “ghetto” was located in two or three residential buildings on Długa Street. The ghetto could be accessed from a drugstore in the Słone district of the town.¹⁷

Wilhelm Rosenbaum was tried in Hamburg in 1967 and sentenced to life imprisonment.¹⁸

SOURCES Publications dealing with the fate of the Jews in Rabka during the Holocaust include Michael Walzer-Fass, ed., Remembrance Book of Nowy Targ and Vicinity; Translation from Sefer Nowy Targve ha sevivva (Tel Aviv: Townspeople Association of Nowy Targ and Vicinity, 1979); Robin O’Neill, “Rabka Police School (Poland)” (Salisbury, England: Yizkor Book Project, 2004), available at www.jewishgen.org; and Czesław Pilichowski et al., eds., Obozy hitlerowskie na ziemiach polskich 1939–1945: Informator encyklopedyczny (Warsaw: PWN, 1979), p. 416.

Documents on the extermination of the Jews in Rabka can be found in the following archives: AŻIH (301/3269, 3270, 4727); IPN (SP Nowy Targ Ns IV 5/53, Zg 19/46, 54/49; SP Sucha Beskidzka Zg 8/47/1, 8/47/2-3, 20/48, and 34/46; and SP Żywiec Zg 72/46); USHMM (RG.15.019M, reels 4 and 14; Acc.1997.A.0124, reel 36, JSS [AŻIH, 211/848-850]; and RG-50.002*0063); VHF; and YVA.

Joanna Śliwa

NOTES

1. USHMM, Acc.1997.A.0124 (JSS), reel 41, 211/849, JSS memo April 1, 1942.
2. AŻIH, 301/3270, testimony of Izrael Salinger, p. 1.
3. Martin Gilbert, The Boys: Triumph over Adversity (London: Weidenfeld & Nicolson, 1996), p. 449; O’Neill, “Rabka Police School (Poland)”; AŻIH, 301/3719, testimony of Leopold Kestenbaum.
4. USHMM, Acc.1997.A.0124, reel 41, 211/848, JSS report to Kraków, September 28, 1941; and letter of Jewish Community to JSS Kraków, February 21, 1941.
5. Ibid., testimonies of Henryk Ettinger and Paweł Langsam in JSS Kraków report of June 22, 1941, and letter to Kraków JSS, October 22, 1941; RG-50.002*0063, testimony of Aba Prawer.
6. Ibid., Acc.1997.A.0124, reel 41, 211/849-850, JSS reports on January 17, April 1, 6, 20, 24, and May 8, 1942.
7. Ibid., Acc.1997.A.0124, reel 41, 211/850, JSS reports to Kraków, June 29, July 6 and 20, 1942, interview with Mr. Naht from Rabka, June 19, 1942, and with Mr. Schreiber, June 21, 1942; Verdict against Wilhelm Rosenbaum, LG-Ham (50) 21/67, in Justiz und NS-Verbrechen, vol. 30 (Amsterdam: Amsterdam, 2004), Lfd. Nr. 689, pp. 216–218.
8. ŻuNS-V, vol. 30, Lfd. Nr. 689, pp. 216–218; AŻIH, 301/3270, 3269, testimony of Maria Żak (Maria Grunberg), p. 3; and 4726, testimony of Oskar Lonker, p. 2.

9. AŻIH, 301/3269, 301/4726.

10. Walzer-Fass, Remembrance Book of Nowy Targ and Vicinity, p. 80; ŻuNS-V, vol. 30, Lfd. Nr. 689, pp. 221, 232.

11. IPN, SP Żywiec Zg 72/46; ŻuNS-V, vol. 30, Lfd. Nr. 689, p. 219; AŻIH, 301/3269.

12. ŻuNS-V, vol. 30, Lfd. Nr. 689, pp. 218–219; AŻIH, 301/3269.

13. Ewa Kurek, Your Life Is Worth Mine. How Polish Nuns Saved Hundreds of Jewish Children in German-Occupied Poland, 1939–1945 (New York: Hippocrene Books, 1997), pp. 197–204; ŻuNS-V, vol. 30, Lfd. Nr. 689, pp. 222–223.

14. ŻuNS-V, vol. 30, Lfd. Nr. 689, p. 211; O’Neill, “Rabka Police School (Poland).”

15. Tatiana Berenstein et al., eds., Faschismus, Getto, Massenmord: Dokumentation über Ausrottung und Widerstand der Juden in Polen während des zweiten Weltkrieges (Berlin: Rütten & Loening, 1961), p. 64.

16. USHMM, Acc.1997.A.0124, reel 41, 211/849), JSS report to Kraków, January 17, 1942.

17. Ibid., RG-15.019M, reel 14 (IPN, ASG, sygn. 48b, k. 193), report on the Jewish Ghetto in Rabka, signed by Józef Stalin [sic?]; testimony of Dr. Zdzisław Olszewski (at www.rabka.pl).

18. Verdict against Wilhelm Rosenbaum, in ŻuNS-V, vol. 30, Lfd. Nr. 689.

RADOMYŚL WIELKI

Pre-1939: Radomyśl Wielki, town, Kraków województwo, Poland; 1939–1945: Radomyśl Wielki, Kreis Debica, Distrikt Krakau, Generalgouvernement; post-1998: Radomyśl Wielki, województwo podkarpackie, Poland

Radomyśl Wielki is located 30 kilometers (19 miles) northeast of Tarnów. In 1925, there were 1,425 Jews living in Radomyśl Wielki out of a total of 2,432 residents. In 1939, Jews still comprised more than half of the town’s population.

Soldiers of the Wehrmacht entered Radomyśl Wielki after bitter fighting on September 7, 1939. Immediately, they seized Jewish and Polish men and took them to the local church, where they were held for a few days before being released. The Germans beat the nearly 300 captive men, murdering several. Soon after their arrival, the Germans began to conscript Jews for forced labor and also beat and humiliated them. On one occasion, they chased the Jews to the market square (Rynek) and forced them to undress, taking their valuables and giving their clothes to local peasants. They also forced Jews to clean the square with their bare hands and to cut the grass with their teeth. German soldiers raided Jewish homes, confiscating valuables and brutalizing the occupants.¹

The German authorities soon imposed a series of discriminatory restrictions on the Jewish community. Although Jewish businesses had reopened shortly after the occupation, Jewish owners were forced to display the Star of David outside the front door. In addition, Jews were forced to wear armbands at all times. Jews could not move freely without a special pass; restrictions on the selling of food were enforced, and ritual slaughter of animals was strictly forbidden. Shortly after the introduction of these discriminatory laws, most Jewish businesses were handed over to local ethnic Germans (Volksdeutsche). Despite the restrictive measures, the Jewish population initially retained some contact with the surrounding villages. Soon, however, Jews were forbidden to leave town even with work passes, and “contributions” and special taxes were imposed on the Jewish community.

The German authorities established a Jewish Council (Judenrat), headed by Jeremiah Leibowicz, on January 25, 1940.² Its main task was to ensure that the orders imposed by the Germans were carried out, or it would face severe punishment. It organized quotas of forced laborers every day, and in response to repeated German demands for contributions, it collected and handed over Jewish property. The Judenrat also coordinated the work of various welfare organizations that were active during the occupation. The Jewish Social Self-Help (JSS) organization in Radomyśl Wielki ran two public kitchens that depended heavily on the branch’s ability to raise funds. According to one report from November 1941, the Jewish community in Radomyśl Wielki, which was largely composed of refugees, was suffering from overcrowding, impoverishment, and famine. Some 80 percent of the Jews were in need of welfare support.³

The members of the Judenrat tried their best to spare as many Jews as possible from being sent away for forced labor. The establishment of small workshops and factories provided several Jews with employment, which exempted them from labor conscription. Despite the efforts of the Judenrat, in 1940, kidnappings of young Jewish men capable of work intensified. Many of those captured by the Germans were sent to the Pustków labor camp or to the neighboring village of Dulcza Mała. On April 17, 1940, over 200 people were taken to Pustków; the transport that followed, which also included members of the Judenrat, was more than twice this number.⁴

In 1941 and 1942, another influx of refugees from Mielec and Dębica caused living conditions in Radomyśl Wielki to deteriorate. Overcrowding and dire sanitary conditions contributed to the outbreak of a typhus epidemic. Once again, the Judenrat acted promptly, establishing a sanitary unit as well as an isolation hospital for those infected.

In April 1942, a member of the Gestapo from Mielec came to Radomyśl Wielki and murdered all the Zionists, including their leader Haskel Eisland.⁵

The sources disagree on the existence of a ghetto in Radomyśl Wielki. Most archival sources indicate that there was not a ghetto, or even a Jewish quarter, until just prior to the deportation Aktion.⁶ It appears that a “ghetto” existed in Radomyśl Wielki only very briefly in mid-July 1942, serving as a temporary holding area for Jews from surrounding villages during the destruction process.⁷ Prior to this, it appears that the Jewish population continued to live beside their Aryan neighbors. However, some oral testimonies and sections of the yizkor book mention the existence of a ghetto without specifying the date of its establishment.⁸ According to J. Ziobron’s essay, following the second transport of Jews to the Pustków camp (probably in 1942), the Germans “sought to create a ghetto in town, and to put all the Jews from the nearby villages in that ghetto.”⁹ It appears that some survivors employ the term ghetto to convey the idea that the Jews were concentrated under overcrowded conditions and physically segregated from the rest of the population.

From April to June of 1942, an influx of refugees from Dębica and Bobowa further strained the resources of the Judenrat and the welfare organizations in Radomyśl Wielki. Living conditions became unbearable, and tension was further exacerbated by constant German demands. In mid-July 1942, all the remaining Jews from the surrounding villages were brought to Radomyśl Wielki. Soon afterwards, the Judenrat informed the population that had converged on the town that the Germans demanded the establishment of a ghetto, but many Jews refused to believe it.¹⁰

Shortly afterwards, the Germans asked for a contribution from the Jews, claiming that it might defer an impending deportation Aktion. Although the contribution was delivered, on July 17, 1942, forces of the Gestapo and the police sealed the town. Two days later, in early morning, all the Jews of Radomyśl Wielki were ordered to assemble in the market square with all their possessions. A selection was carried out; and many Jews were murdered during the process, as they were unwilling to be separated from their loved ones. The elderly and infirm (about 150 people) were taken to the Jewish cemetery where forces of the Gestapo, the Gendarmerie, and the Schutzpolizei shot them. Their bodies were buried in a mass grave. Those who remained in the marketplace were transported on carts to Dębica, which served as a concentration point for the Jews of the area. From Dębica, most of the Jews were deported with other Jews of the region to the extermination camp in Bełżec.¹¹

A few Jews managed to escape the roundup and fled to the forests. The Germans and their collaborators hunted down most of them, but one group formed a partisan unit of about 50 people (including a number of Jews from Radomyśl Wielki) in the forest near Dulcza Mała. German raids resulted in the capture of some Jews even in November 1944. One group of 70 partisans succeeded in crossing the front line to the Soviet side on December 27, 1944.¹²

SOURCES Further information on the history and the fate of the Jewish population of Radomyśl Wielki can be found in the following publications: Antoni Balarzyn, Martyrologia ludności żydowskiej z Radomyśla Wielkiego i okolic podczas II wojny światowej (Radomyśl Wielki: A. Balarzyn, 1989); The Martyrdom of the Jewish Population of Radomysl Wielki and the Surrounding Areas during the Second World War, trans. Krystyna Brozyna (Virginia: M. Miller, C. Fox, 1989); Hilel Harshoshanim and Yitshak Turkov-Grudberg, eds., Radomishel rabati yeha-sevivah: Sefer zikaron Groys Radomishle un sviveh: Yizker-bukh, (Tel Aviv: Irgun yots’e Radomishel yeha-sevivah be-Yisrael, 1971); Abraham Wein and Aharon Weiss, eds., Pinkas ha-kehillot. Encyclopaedia of Jewish Communities: Poland, vol. 3, Galicia and Western Silesia (Jerusalem: Yad Vashem, 1984), pp. 338–341; and Jan Ziobron, “The History of the Jewish Commune in Radomysl Wielki” [in Polish], Ziemia Radomska, no. 3/7 (March 1991).

Documentation on the persecution and destruction of the Jewish community of Radomyśl Wielki can be found in the following archives: AŻIH (301/1428, 1025, 1103, and 1145; and 211/873); IPN; USHMM (1997.A.0272; RG-50.030*0285); VHF (# 18869, 46584); and YVA.

Caterina Crisci

NOTES

1. AŻIH, 301/1145, testimony of H. Aussenberg; Ziobron, "The History of the Jewish Commune," pp. 4–5; and Harshoshanim and Turkoŷ-Grudberg, Radomishel rabati veba-sevivah, pp. 1104–1105.

2. Haja Garen-Rozenblat (now Levi), "The First Days with the Germans," in Harshoshanim and Turkoŷ-Grudberg, Radomishel rabati veba-sevivah.

3. USHMM, Acc.1997.A.0124 (JSS), reel 42, 211/873, report of the JSS Radomyśl Wielki to JSS in Kraków, November 19, 1941.

4. Balaryn, Martyrologia ludności żydowskiej, p. 12; AŻIH, 301/1145, and 301/1428, testimony of Z. Reich; Wein and Weiss, Pinkas ha-kehillot: Poland, vol. 3, Galicia and Western Silesia, pp. 340–441; Ziobron, "The History of the Jewish Commune," p. 5.

5. Ziobron, "The History of the Jewish Commune," p. 5.

6. See AŻIH, 301/1145; 301/4964, states that there was no ghetto or Jewish quarter in Radomyśl Wielki.

7. Ibid., 301/1145.

8. Harshoshanim and Turkoŷ-Grudberg, Radomishel rabati veba-sevivah, pp. 1104–1105; VHF, # 18869, testimony of Jack Honig; and # 46584, Pnina Levenberg.

9. Ziobron, "The History of the Jewish Commune," p. 5.

10. AŻIH, 301/1145.

11. Ibid., 301/1103, testimony of B. Lichtig; Ziobron, "The History of the Jewish Commune," pp. 5–6.

12. AŻIH, 301/1145.

ROPCZYCE

Pre-1939: Ropczyce (Yiddish: Ropshitz), Kraków województwo, Poland; 1939–1945: Kreis Debica, Distrikt Krakau, Generalgouvernement; post-1998: województwo podkarpackie, Poland

Ropczyce is located about 120 kilometers (75 miles) east of Kraków. On the eve of war in 1939, there were about 1,200 Jews living in Ropczyce.¹

Following the invasion of Poland, German troops occupied Ropczyce on September 8, 1939.² In the first days of the conflict, the Germans bombed the town heavily. Jewish homes were particularly affected, leaving more than 30 families without shelter. Upon entering Ropczyce, the Germans burned the local synagogue, and they harassed and humiliated the Jewish population.³ Soon after, the Germans began to conscript Jews for forced labor. In 1939 or early in 1940, the Germans created a Jewish Council (Judenrat), headed by Dr. Arnold Meister. Immediately after its establishment, the Judenrat began to take care of the numerous needs of the Jewish community. At the end of 1940, under the patronage of the Judenrat, a public kitchen, a shelter, and a "women's committee" were established. In 1941 and 1942, following the establishment of a local branch of the Jewish Social Self-Help (JSS) organization, many of the impoverished and malnourished Jewish children in Ropczyce were provided with food and medical assistance.

Jews are gathered in an open lot in the Ropczyce ghetto, April 1, 1942. USHMM WS #44341, COURTESY OF YIVO

By the spring of 1940, Ropczyce had become a collection point for Jewish refugees from the territories annexed by the Third Reich and from neighboring villages. The Jewish population in the town increased from 773 in 1940 to over 1,000 in 1941.

On May 7, 1942, on orders from the Security Police in Dębica, 75 men capable of physical work were sent to the labor camp in Pustków.⁴ A second roundup took place at the beginning of June 1942. The Germans shot 23 people on the spot and sent 150 more to the Pustków labor camp. In late June 1942, the Jews from Ropczyce and neighboring villages were forced into a ghetto located on Jewish Street. The conditions in the ghetto were extremely hard, due to severe overcrowding.⁵

In July 1942, the Germans liquidated the ghetto. They shot 28 people, mostly children and the elderly on the spot, while the majority of the population was escorted on July 23 to the nearby town of Sędziszów Małopolski. From there, most of them were sent to the Bełżec extermination camp. A group of young women was loaded on cattle cars destined for this extermination camp. According to information from local Christians, the train also carried lime, which may have poisoned the passengers; however, it is more likely that they were gassed on arrival at Bełżec. A number of the Jews from Ropczyce were selected as unfit for travel, and the SS and Gendarmerie shot several hundred Jews on the spot in Sędziszów and buried them in a mass grave at the Jewish cemetery.⁶

SOURCES Further information on the history and fate of the Jewish population of Ropczyce can be found in the following publications: Abraham Wein and Aharon Weiss, eds., Pinkas ha-kehillot. Encyclopaedia of Jewish Communities: Poland, vol. 3, Galicia and Western Silesia (Jerusalem: Yad Vashem, 1984), pp. 352–353; and I. Rosenfeld, ed., Hayo hayta Ayara Ropczyce (Israel: privately published, 1985).

Documentation on the persecution and destruction of the Jewish community in Ropczyce can be found in the following archives: AŻIH (301/793 and 301/620); USHMM (Acc.1997. A.0124 [JSS], reel 44); VHF (# 19939); and YVA.

Caterina Crisci

NOTES

1. Rosenfeld, Hayo bayta Ayara Ropczyce, pp. 25–26, 37.
2. AŻIH, 301/793, report prepared by the Temporary Jewish Committee in Dębica.
3. VHF, # 19939, testimony of Helena Horowitz.
4. AŻIH, 301/620, testimony of J. Himmelblau.
5. Rosenfeld, Hayo bayta Ayara Ropczyce, pp. 74–78, dates the establishment of the ghetto at the beginning of 1942; but VHF, # 19939, and Wein and Weiss, Pinkas ha-kehillot: Poland, vol. 3, Galicia and Western Silesia, pp. 352–353, both date the establishment of the ghetto in June 1942.
6. Rosenfeld, Hayo bayta Ayara Ropczyce, pp. 74–78, 92–95; AŻIH, 301/793 (this source dates the liquidation of the ghetto and the transfer to Sędziszów on July 24).

RYMANÓW

Pre-1939: Rymanów, town, Sanok powiat, Lwów województwo, Poland; 1941–1945: Rymanow, Kreis Krosno, Distrikt Krakau, Generalgouvernement; post-1998: Rymanów, Krosno powiat, województwo podkarpackie, Poland

Rymanów is located about 160 kilometers (100 miles) east-southeast of Kraków. In 1921, of a total population of 3,546 the Jews numbered 1,412.

On September 8, 1939, the Germans entered Rymanów. Soldiers marched into the town, claiming that local civilians had fired on them.¹ They forced the Jews to assemble in the main square and stand for hours at gun point with their arms up. Soon women and children were allowed to leave, and the others were released three hours later. On September 17, the Security Police from Sanok arrived in Rymanów and ordered that all Jews, except for a few families and members of the Judenrat, must leave town and relocate to the Soviet-occupied zone. Most of those who crossed the border, however, were able to return home shortly afterwards.² The Jews of Rymanów did not offer any organized resistance to the German occupation.³

On October 26, 1939, when the Generalgouvernement was created, Rymanów was incorporated into Kreis Krosno, within Distrikt Krakau. Large-scale deportations of Jewish populations in the area of Kreis Krosno, including Rymanów, were organized and carried out by the Krosno Border Police detachment subordinated to the main office in Jasło (Grenzpolizeikommissariat [GPK] Jasło–Aussendienststelle Krosno). The German Gendarmerie and Polish (Blue) Police also participated in these Aktionen.

From the fall of 1939, the German authorities enforced a series of discriminatory measures against the Jewish population of Rymanów. They confiscated Jewish businesses and prohibited the free movement of Jews without special permission. Jews were forced to wear armbands bearing the Star of David and to surrender any valuable items, and they were conscripted for forced labor. Jews were forbidden to buy produce in the marketplace before 10:00 A.M. The German authorities demanded several large “contributions” from the Judenrat, which were paid.⁴ Furthermore, those able to work were forcibly engaged in the construction of what subsequently became a camp for Soviet prisoners of war (POWs) during 1941.⁵

Rymanów became a transit point to which Jews from other cities were brought shortly before being deported to extermination and labor camps. In November 1941, 100 Jews were brought to Rymanów from the neighboring town of Krosno. Jews were apparently able to take with them various kinds of movable property.⁶ In December 1941, the town of Rymanów had 1,300 Jewish residents, 300 of which were displaced persons from neighboring villages and towns. The Jewish Social Self-Help (JSS) organization was active by 1941, establishing a public kitchen as well as a sanitary commission. The Jewish Council (Judenrat) was headed by H. Spira and P. Silber. It established a Jewish police force to assist it in enforcing German regulations and demands for laborers.⁷

Information on the ghetto in Rymanów is sparse and somewhat contradictory. The majority of the Jewish population was not significantly displaced, as most Jews lived within the “Jewish residential quarter” near the center of town. Jews brought in from neighboring towns and other refugees were moved in with the original population, and no physical barriers were erected around the Jewish quarter, which served as an open ghetto. By 1942, leaving this area without permission was punishable by death. There was also a camp or area of Jewish concentration on the outskirts of the town at Posada Dolna. This served both as a transitory holding area for some Jews before being sent on to labor camps or sites of destruction and as a lodging place for those performing forced labor for the Kirchhof road construction firm. The sources occasionally refer to this specially constructed Jewish “camp” as a ghetto. Both the camp at Posada Dolna and the area of the Jewish quarter in the town had been established by early 1942 (some sources date these events in 1941).⁸

Jews are assembled for deportation in a public square in the Rymanów ghetto, August 1942.

USHMM WS #18782, COURTESY OF YVA

In March 1942, the entire Jewish population, including those who had been displaced there from other cities and towns, was officially registered. In July 1942, almost 600 Jews from throughout Kreis Krosno were moved to Rymanów, causing further overcrowding and pressure on limited resources. Those able to work were promptly registered by the employment office to be eligible to receive assistance from the JSS.⁹

At the beginning of August 1942, a selection took place. The Gestapo informed the Judenrat that a group of Jewish men fit for work was to assemble on the marketplace the next morning: 200 young men between the ages of 18 and 35 answered the order. They were subsequently divided into two groups. One was sent to the Kirchhof facility, and the other was directed to the railway station where the men boarded a train headed for the Płaszów labor camp.¹⁰ Deportations to extermination sites at Bełżec and Barwinek near the Slovak border followed soon after. On August 13, 1942, a group of SS men and local militia surrounded the town and ordered all Jews to report to the marketplace. Women, children, and those unable to work, as well as those who were living in the outskirts of Rymanów, were shot on the spot.¹¹ The assembled mass of Jews was then divided into groups; the elderly were taken to Barwinek and subsequently murdered in the woods near the border town of Dukla.¹² A number of those able to work were sent to the Kirchhof facility, while the rest of those assembled in the marketplace were taken to the railway station and loaded onto trains probably destined for the Bełżec extermination camp. For several weeks after the deportation, the police forces then patrolled the town, hunting down and shooting Jews they found in hiding. The Kirchhof workers were employed for a few more weeks and were then sent to Rzeszów. Their fate is unknown.¹³

Although the Rymanów ghetto had been almost completely liquidated, in August 1943 around 100 Jews coming from Brzozów, the area around Rymanów, and the town itself were shot by unidentified members of the Gestapo and two SS officers, Neumann and Keller from the Krosno Border Police Office. The corpses of this group were buried in a mass grave at the local Jewish cemetery.¹⁴

According to the testimony of P. Dager and B. Scherrer, there were roughly 400 survivors, about 20 of which had survived the camps. Those who were not deported mainly survived in hiding with the aid of non-Jews, on forged “Aryan” papers, or because they had crossed into the Soviet Union prior to June 1941.

SOURCES Further information on the history of the Jewish community in Rymanów can be found in the following publications: Abraham Wein and Aharon Weiss, eds., Pinkas bakehilot. Encyclopaedia of Jewish Communities: Poland, vol. 3, Galicja and Western Silesia (Jerusalem: Yad Vashem, 1984), pp. 356–358; Yosef Rotem et al., eds., Rimanov: Toldot ba’ir ve-haye ba-Yehudim b’temunot (Israel: Y. Rotem, G. Vainreb, Y. Sharar, 2001); and A. Potocki, Żydzi rymanowscy (Krosno: APLA, 2000). The ghetto in Rymanów is mentioned in Czesław Pili-chowski et al., eds., Obozy hitlerowskie na ziemiach polskich 1939–1945: Informator encyklopedyczny (Warsaw: PWN, 1979), p. 440.

Documentation on the persecution and destruction of the Jewish community of Rymanów during the war can be found in the following archives: AŻIH (301/235); IPN; ITS; USHMM (RG-15.019M, reel 1; and Gazeta Żydowska); VHF (e.g., # 1077, 10361); and YVA (e.g., O-3/2283; M-1/Q/38, 205; M-1/E/2139, 2171, 2197).

Caterina Crisci

NOTES

1. AŻIH, 301/235, testimony of Israel Alster.
2. Ibid.; and Central Historical Commission (CHC) of the Central Committee of Liberated Jews in the U.S. Zone, Munich (Historical questionnaire) Pearl Dager, Betsheva Scherrer, published in Potocki, Żydzi rymanowscy, pp. 158–160.
3. CHC, U.S. Zone, Munich (Historical questionnaire) Pearl Dager, Betsheva Scherrer, pp. 158–160.
4. AŻIH, 301/235.
5. Potocki, Żydzi rymanowscy, p. 78.
6. Gazeta Żydowska, November 19, 1941.
7. Ibid., December 12, 1941.
8. Potocki, Żydzi rymanowscy, pp. 49, 79, 169; Rotem et al., Rimanov.
9. Gazeta Żydowska, July 8, 1942.
10. AŻIH, 301/235.
11. Ibid.; Rotem et al., Rimanov, p. 42.
12. Potocki, Żydzi rymanowscy, p. 169.
13. AŻIH, 301/235.
14. USHMM, RG-15.019M, reel 1.

RZEPIENNIK STRZYŻEWSKI

Pre-1939: Rzepiennik Strzyżewski, village, Kraków województwo, Poland; 1939–1945: Rzepiennik Strzyżewski, Kreis Jasło, Distrikt Krakau, Generalgouvernement; post-1998: Rzepiennik Strzyżewski, województwo małopolskie, Poland

Rzepiennik Strzyżewski is situated on the small Rze-pianka River, approximately 30 kilometers (19 miles) south of Tarnów. An estimated 40 Jewish families lived in Rzepiennik Strzyżewski in 1939.¹

The German army occupied the village in early September 1939, but there is no information on how this initially impacted the Jewish community. The new administration set up a German Gendarmerie post. The synagogue was destroyed.

Moses Braw was appointed as the chairman of the Jewish Council (Judenrat), and D. Baranker was its secretary. In January 1940, the Judenrat reported only 169 Jews living in Rzepiennik Strzyżewski, 10 of them refugees from Kraków. The American Jewish Joint Distribution Committee (AJDC) archives contain a list of recipients of donated flour distributed by the Judenrat in December 1940. The list contains the names of the heads of 26 families, close to one half of the community—97 people.²

On August 28, 1940, 12 expellees from Łódź arrived in Rzepiennik. They were housed with local Jewish families who also provided them with sustenance. Even the arrival of such a small group became a heavy burden on the impoverished community. The Judenrat set up a welfare organization, with Simson Kirschenfeld as the chairman. Its primary purpose was to seek any help available from the AJDC and the Jewish Social Self-Help (JSS) organization.³ From mid-1942 onward, Dawid Kahane was in charge of local welfare.⁴

By January 1941, the number of Jews in Rzepiennik had increased to 241. Another group of expellees—numbering 36 in all—came from Oświęcim in February or March 1941. The Judenrat housed them together by assigning them to flats and provided them with beds containing straw for padding. A soup kitchen was opened for their benefit, serving up to 65 meals per day. The kitchen did not last very long, due to financial constraints, but it was reopened in May 1942. In the meantime, a small amount of donated groceries was distributed. In March 1941, the Judenrat reported 300 Jews living in Rzepiennik.⁵

On the orders of the Kreishauptmann in Jasło, Dr. Walter Gentz, a ghetto was established in Rzepiennik Strzyżewski at the end of 1941.⁶ Again, there is no information regarding how the ghetto's founding changed the community's life, the size of the ghetto, or restrictions on movement. Most likely, Jews remained in those houses they had lived in since before the war. The Jewish Police (Jüdischer Ordnungsdienst) was organized and charged with keeping order among the ghetto's inhabitants.⁷

By June 1942, Jewish farmers from the surrounding villages, including the other Rzepienniks, were resettled into the ghetto, thereby bringing the number of residents to over 400.

Information regarding disease in the ghetto is lacking; however, it is likely that the community was on the verge of an epidemic, as all residents were vaccinated for typhus in the summer of 1942. The Judenrat's sanitation committee periodically checked yards for cleanliness. That summer, 45 laborers were employed in road works, and 8 women worked as gardeners, "beautifying the neglected appearance of the village."

In July 1942 a new chairman of the Judenrat, Jechiel Loria, was appointed.⁸

German forces commanded by the Gestapo chief in Gorlice, Ernst Fundheller, assisted by Gendarmes from Rzepiennik Strzyżewski, Jasło, and Gorlice, liquidated the ghetto on August 11, 1942. The community was made to believe that it would be deported to a different location. Each person was allowed to take up to 25 kilograms (55 pounds) of luggage. Thirty young men were selected from the group and sent to the Gorlice ghetto.

The remaining 364 Jews were led to a nearby meadow by a ravine. Formed in rows of 4, all were marched to the nearby Dąbry Forest located about 0.8 kilometer (0.5 mile) from the ghetto. In sequence, groups of 10 people each were forced to undress and walk approximately 201 meters (220 yards) through bushes to a bench. Sitting on the bench, they were shot in the head in succession. A young boy would throw the dead bodies into a large hole, powdering them with lime. The mass shootings were completed by nightfall. Active participants in the shooting included Paul Roloff, the Gendarmerie commander in Jasło, and Alois Viellieber, deputy commander of the Gorlice Gendarmerie.⁹

Only a few names of those murdered are known: Dawid Dembitzer, with his wife and daughter; Berl Kochane, with his wife, daughter, and son-in-law; the families of Judo Sped, Pachel Taffel, Gast, Kirschenfeld, Kornfeld, and Teller. A number of Jewish residents who were at some point brought to the Rzepiennik ghetto from the nearby village of Olpiny may also have been among those murdered.¹⁰

In Gorlice, 30 men from Rzepiennik were collected on the edge of the town in a shoe factory on Polna Street. They were most likely included in the transport that was sent to the Bełżec extermination camp on August 17, 1942.

It is not known how many Rzepiennik Jews managed to escape the liquidation. On September 8, 1942, the shochet Chaim Stamler, his wife Miriam, and two-year-old child were shot by the German Gendarmerie near a forest in Rzepiennik Strzyżewski. They were buried together at the place of execution.

SOURCES Brief information on the Jews of Rzepiennik Strzyżewski can be found in these publications: Abraham Wein and Aharon Weiss, eds., Pinkas ha-kehillot. Encyclopaedia of Jewish Communities: Poland, vol. 3, Galicia and Western Silesia (Jerusalem: Yad Vashem, 1984), pp. 154–155; and Rejestr miejsc i faktów zbrodni popełnionych przez okupanta hitlerowskiego na ziemiach polskich w latach 1939–1945: Województwo tarnowskie (Warsaw: GKBZHWP, 1984), p. 166.

Relevant documentation can be found in the following archives: AŻIH (301/1113 [Relacje]; 210/610 [AJDC Rzepiennik Strzyżewski]; and 211/918 [JSS Rzepiennik Strzyżewski]); and USHMM (Acc.1999.A.0154 [AJDC]; Acc.1997.A.0124 [JSS], reel 44; and RG-15.084M, # 1113).

Jolanta Kraemer

NOTES

1. Gazeta Żydowska, June 5, 1942.
2. USHMM, Acc.1999.A.0154 (AJDC), 210/610 (Rzepiennik Strzyżewski), pp. 1, 4, 7, 13–15. At the turn of 1940–1941, Braw was temporarily replaced by Ch. Hölzel. He is named as the chairman's deputy in the summer of 1942; see Acc.1997.A.0124 (JSS), reel 44, 211/918 (Rzepiennik Strzyżewski), pp. 69, 71.
3. Ibid., Acc.1999.A.0154, 210/610, pp. 9, 17; also see Acc.1997.A.0124, 211/918, p. 14.
4. Ibid., Acc.1997.A.0124, 211/918, p. 65.
5. Ibid., pp. 3, 43, 65; and Acc.1999.A.0154, 210/610, p. 17.
6. Władysław Boczoń, Żydzi gorlicy (Gorlice: Władysław Boczoń, 1998), p. 144.
7. Gazeta Żydowska, August 12, 1942.
8. Ibid.; also, June 5, 1942.
9. Rejestr miejsc, p. 166; Stanisław Zabierowski, Rzeszowskie pod okupacją hitlerowską (Warsaw: Książka i Wiedza, 1975), p. 182; Czesław Pilichowski et al., eds., Obozy hitlerowskie na ziemiach polskich 1939–1945: Informator encyklopedyczny (Warsaw: PWN, 1979), p. 411; "Rzepiennik Strzyżewski," www.kirkuty.xip.pl/rzepiennik.htm. According to Wein and Weiss, Pinkas ha-kehillot: Poland, vol. 3, Galicia and Western Silesia, p. 155, the liquidation Aktion took place on August 9, 1942.
10. Rejestr miejsc, p. 166—three days later, on August 14, 1942, 80 residents of the Bobowa ghetto and 38 of the Biecz ghetto (they came from Skołyszyn near Jasło) were executed in the same Dąbry Forest. For a partial name list, see p. 167.

RZESZÓW

Pre-1939: Rzeszów, city, Lwów województwo, Poland; 1939–1945: Reichshof, Kreis center, Distrikt Krakau, Generalgouvernement; post-1998: Rzeszów, województwo podkarpackie, Poland

Rzeszów is located about 156 kilometers (97 miles) east of Kraków. In 1931, there were 11,228 Jews living in Rzeszów out of a total population of 26,902. On the outbreak of World War II, there were probably about 14,000 Jews living in the city.

The Germans bombarded Rzeszów on September 9, 1939, and occupied the town on September 10. As the German forces drew closer, many Jews tried to flee to the east, but most were turned back. The Germans ordered a census, including a special listing of the Jews. Many were put to forced labor, including office and street cleaning, road and bridge repairs, and other forms of menial labor. During this work the Jews were beaten and the beards and payot (side locks) of Orthodox Jews were torn off their faces. Within the first month, the interiors of the synagogues were trashed and their contents desecrated. The better apartments of the Jews were taken over by German officers. The Jewish hospital was turned into a military installation.

At the end of October 1939, a 30-man Judenrat, headed by the attorney Kleinman, was appointed. A Jewish police force, commanded by Leon Brezner, was also established. The Judenrat had to raise “contributions” demanded by the Germans and organize the quota of forced laborers.

From December 1, 1939, Jews aged 12 and older were ordered to wear white armbands with a blue Star of David. Their movement about the city was restricted and train travel forbidden. A 7:00 P.M. curfew was imposed. In December, thousands of Jews from Kalisz, Łódź, and Upper Silesia were forcibly resettled to Rzeszów. They were housed in synagogues and the old army barracks. All Jews aged 16 to 55 were examined by physicians to see if they were fit for labor. Those who passed were registered at the Arbeitsamt (labor office).¹

The Germans changed the name of Rzeszów to Reichshof. During 1940, the principal disruptions for the Jews were caused by arbitrary house searches and kidnappings for forced labor. People of means were able to bribe their way out of forced labor, paying for replacements. The German mayor (Stadthauptmann) ordered the removal of Jewish businesses from the main streets of the city, which in turn created some all-Jewish streets, although a ghetto was not created at this time.²

Jews walk in a long column through the streets of Rzeszów during a deportation Aktion in the ghetto, July 1942.

USHMM WS #74347, COURTESY OF IPN

By 1941, it was evident that the Germans were planning to establish a ghetto. Starting in June of that year and continuing throughout the fall, the Jews were ordered to vacate their homes and move onto the special streets designated for the ghetto.³ The official announcement of the establishment of the ghetto was published on December 17, 1941. The ghetto area included these streets: Galenzówsky, Wenska, Tannenbaum Słowacki, Kazimierz, Baldachówka, Szpitalna, Blum, and Mickiewicz. There were entrance gates at three streets—Mickiewicz, Galenzowsky, and at the junction of Kazimierz with Baldachówka. The part of the ghetto lying between Targowica and Lwów Streets was marked out in such a way that only the buildings were in the ghetto, but the streets themselves were outside it. To pass from one house to another, people had to make holes in walls, cross over balconies, or go through improvised passages and gangways. By December 1941, all the Jews had moved into the ghetto.⁴

On January 5, 1942, posters were put up around the ghetto, signed by Kreishauptmann Dr. Heinz Ehaus, prohibiting Germans and other “Aryans” from entering the ghetto without a special pass.⁵ This order followed other measures also affecting the movement of Poles, designed to combat the spread of typhus. On January 10, 1942, the Rzeszów ghetto was sealed. By this time the ghetto had been enclosed by walls and wooden fences and surrounded by barbed wire. Houses along the ghetto perimeter had had their windows and doors boarded up. At this time the number of people imprisoned in the ghetto is estimated at 12,500. The only people permitted to leave the ghetto were those being taken to forced labor. Within the ghetto there were workshops for tailoring, shoemaking, and upholstery. The Judenrat was ordered to open a medical clinic to replace the Jewish clinic outside the ghetto that was shut down.

In addition to the work noted above, Jews were put to forced labor at installations belonging to the German air force, in a factory formerly owned by Jews, on nearby farms, and in military camps. Those allowed outside the ghetto for work fared somewhat better than those locked in with no access to food and because of the poor sanitary conditions. Epidemics of dysentery and typhus drove up the mortality rate, and bodies piled up in the streets. The Judenrat established a small hospital, which lacked both beds and medicine. The Jewish Social Self-Help (JSS) provided support for 2,500 people, and two public kitchens distributed hundreds of portions of soup on a daily basis. The Judenrat received permission to grow potatoes in a field outside the ghetto. Some of the small ghetto workshops served German clients, which enabled the ghetto inhabitants to acquire supplementary food.⁶ In the spring of 1942, a number of forced laborers were transferred to a labor camp in Biesiadka, where they cut down trees.

The Judenrat established an elementary school, which functioned until the large Aktion of July 1942. The Judenrat also offered vocational training courses to provide more people with “essential skills” that might keep them alive. There were courses for training electricians, carpenters, nurses, and agricultural workers.

In addition to the Jews of Kalisz and Łódź, other Jews from the vicinity were brought to the Rzeszów ghetto. The overcrowding became severe, sometimes with more than one family to a room. In January 1942, the inhabitants were ordered to turn in their fur garments. On April 30, 1942, the Gestapo in Rzeszów conducted a “Kommunisten-Aktion” against the Jews of the ghetto. Gestapo men arrested a number of Jews as alleged Communists. These people were then tortured in prison before being killed. The Judenrat was instructed to collect the mutilated bodies and bury them.⁷

In June 1942, Kreishauptmann Dr. Ehaus imposed a massive “contribution” of 1 million złoty on the Reichshof ghetto, threatening to kill members of the Judenrat if the sum was not paid within one week. The other Jewish Councils in the Kreis also had to deliver smaller sums to the Kreishauptmann personally at this time. According to a survivor from Kolbuszowa, the Judenrat from that town was the only one not to suffer losses at the hands of Dr. Ehaus during this Aktion. It was probably at this time that Kleinman and several other members of the Rzeszów Judenrat were executed, although some secondary sources date this much earlier in 1940.⁸

On June 25–27, 1942, congestion in the ghetto became intense with the transfer of Jews from Łańcut, Tyczyn, Kolbuszowa, Głogów Małopolski, Sokołów Małopolski, Sędziszów Małopolski, Czudec, Jawornik Polski, Błażowa, Niebylec, and Strzyżów to the Rzeszów ghetto. Mina Perlberger recalled the scenes as the Jews crowded into Rzeszów: “The wagons, starting to move, were lined up, and it was impossible to see the beginning or the end of the line. It was wagons from all the small towns around Rzeszów, Błażowa, Jawornik, Tyczyn, going in one direction: Ghetto.” Word soon spread that there was insufficient space to accommodate all the Jews and that people would have to sleep in the streets.⁹

Once they were all settled into the Rzeszów ghetto, there were now three families to a room. By early July 1942, the ghetto population had reached around 22,000 people. At that time the Judenrat was notified by the German authorities that the evacuation of the ghetto would begin in a few days, starting with those who were unfit for work or in an otherwise weakened condition. Everyone was told to bring a few personal effects, including jewelry, and a two-day supply of food. Placards informed the public that any Pole who hid a Jew would be shot.¹⁰

The massive expulsion began on July 7 and was carried out in four stages: July 7–8, July 11, July 14–15, and July 17–18. At each stage the sector of the ghetto designated for removal was surrounded by forces of the Order Police and the Gestapo. The inhabitants were ordered to assemble in the old Jewish cemetery. People lingering in their dwelling places for any reason were shot on the spot. The assembled Jews were stripped of their possessions. “Essential” workers and their families were exempted from the expulsion. Patients in the hospital were forcibly removed. Jewish doctors slipped poison to some of their patients to spare them from the ordeal. The remaining hospital patients, occupants of the old-age home, and others unfit for labor (about 1,000 people) were taken to the Rodna Forest (between Rzeszów and Głogów) and murdered. The majority of the ghetto inhabitants were marched to the train station at Starowina and sent to the Bełżec extermination camp.¹¹

The evacuations continued throughout July. The empty apartments were turned over to Poles who had been evicted from their own dwellings to make way for German occupants. During this period, nearly 20,000 Jews were deported, and hundreds were shot.¹² At the end of this major Aktion, the only ones left were those with a special stamp on their identification cards.

Following this major Aktion, the size of the Rzeszów ghetto was reduced to the area between Baldachówka and Kaczmarska Streets. In November 1942, the Germans designated the Rzeszów ghetto as one of the five ghettos in Distrikt Krakau in which the remnants of the Jewish population in that area would be concentrated.¹³ At this time, only 3,000 Jews remained, mainly essential workers and their families, but also people who had evaded the expulsion—the “illegals.”¹⁴

The ghetto was divided into two sectors—one to the right of Baldachówka Street and the other to the left. The eastern ghetto (# 1) was run like a concentration camp. It was surrounded by barbed wire and lit up by searchlights. Each morning the prisoners were lined up for a roll call. The beds were removed and replaced by wooden shelves, and a barrier separated the men from the women. The western ghetto (# 2) was called the Schmelz (smelting) ghetto by the Jews and was for the elderly, the children, and those unable to work. In August 1942, women with children were ordered to register for “light labor.” With a perversity of hope this was interpreted as a positive sign; women who had no children “borrowed” a child from their neighbors. As they reported for the registration, they were surrounded by an SS unit and then sent to Bełżec.

On November 15, the Gestapo ordered everyone with a labor permit to assemble at the roll-call square. Many brought their children with them, based on the assumption that their work permits would protect the children as well. As the workers stepped forward and were checked off, the children were detained for placement in a “children’s home.” During this Aktion, around 1,500 Jews (mainly children) were loaded onto trucks and taken to their deaths.¹⁵

Between December 1942 and June 1943, there were numerous Aktions that led to the murder or transfer to work camps of the ghetto inhabitants. Jews continued to work making clothes for the German army and dismantling the houses in the ghetto, among other tasks. The head of the Judenrat in this period was a Jew named Serog from Teschen in Silesia.¹⁶ In March 1943, 22 Jews were shot as they entered the ghetto from work. In late August or early September 1943, the existence of the two ghettos came to an end. The remaining inhabitants, about 2,500 to 3,000 people, were assembled on Baldachówka Street. Some were transferred to the forced labor camp at Szebnie, and many of the others were deported to the Auschwitz concentration camp. About 150 were held back to clean up the ghetto area and collect the belongings of the deported.¹⁷ After this date, around 450 Jews remained in Rzeszów in the forced labor camp at the aero-engine factory (Zwangsarbeitslager im Flugmotorenwerk Reichshof), which existed until the summer of 1944.¹⁸

SOURCES Information on the fate of the Jews of Rzeszów during the Holocaust can be found in the following publications, among others: M. Yari-Wold, ed., Kehilat Raysba; sefer zikaron (Tel Aviv: Former Residents of Rzeszow in Israel and the USA, 1967); Abraham Wein and Aharon Weiss, eds., Pinkas ha-kehillot. Encyclopaedia of Jewish Communities: Poland, vol. 3, Galicia and Western Silesia (Jerusalem: Yad Vashem, 1984), pp. 155–170; Encyclopaedia Judaica, vol. 14 (Jerusalem: Keter, 1972), pp. 537–538; Justiz und NS-Verbrechen, vols. 23 and 32 (Amsterdam: Amsterdam University Press, 1998 and 2004), Lfd. Nr. 619 and Lfd. Nr. 711; Stanisław Kotula, Losy Żydów rzeszowskich 1939–1944: Kronika tamtych dni (Rzeszów, 1999); Andrzej Potocki, Żydzi w Podkarpaciu (Rzeszów: Libra, 2004); Stanisław Poradowski, “Zagłada Żydów rzeszowskich,” BŻIH, pts. 1–4 (1983–1988); and Hilde Huppert, Hand in Hand mit Tommy: Ein autobiographischer Bericht 1939–1945 (St. Ingbert: Werner J. Rohrig, 1988).

Relevant documentation can be found in the following archives: AŻIH (e.g., 211/922-933; 301/4968); BA-L (B 162/2275-2277); IPN; USHMM (e.g., RG-02.054); USHMMPA (WS # N05250, N05264, N64876, N64897, copies received from MOR); VHF (e.g., # 907, 19803, and 24020); and YVA.

Samuel Fishman and Martin Dean

NOTES

1. Yari-Wold, Kehilat Raysba, pp. 75, 95; USHMMPA, WS # N05250 and N05264 (copies received from MOR).
2. Bericht des Stadthauptmanns in Reichshof, October 30, 1940, published in Tatiana Berenstein et al., eds., Faschismus, Getto, Massenmord: Dokumentation über Ausrottung und Widerstand der Juden in Polen während des zweiten Weltkrieges (Berlin: Rütten & Loening, 1961), pp. 186–187.
3. Yari-Wold, Kehilat Raysba, pp. 79, 95.
4. Ibid., p. 95; Wein and Weiss, Pinkas ha-kehillot: Poland, vol. 3, Galicia and Western Silesia, pp. 165–166.
5. USHMMPA, WS # N64876, Polizeiliche Anordnung, signed Dr. Ehaus, January 5, 1942.
6. Wein and Weiss, Pinkas ha-kehillot: Poland, vol. 3, Galicia and Western Silesia, p. 166.
7. Yari-Wold, Kehilat Raysba, p. 522.
8. Naftali Salsitz, “The Holocaust in Kolbuszowa,” in I.M. Biderman, ed., Pinkas Kolbushov (New York: United Kolbushover, 1971), p. 77.
9. USHMM, RG-02.054, “Buried Alive,” a diary by Mina Perlberger, p. 128.

10. Yari-Wold, Kehilat Raysba, pp. 83, 523; USHMMPA, WS # N64897, Bekanntmachung, signed Der Kreishauptmann, July 6, 1942.

11. Wein and Weiss, Pinkas ha-kehillot: Poland, vol. 3, Galicia and Western Silesia, p. 167. See also BA-L, B 162/2275–2277 (ZStL, AR-Z 288/60, vol. 2, pp. 273 ff, and vol. 4, pp. 934 ff.); and JuNS-V, vol. 23, Lfd. Nr. 619, p. 91.

12. AŻIH, 301/4968, testimony of Dawid Grünberg, p. 3.

13. Polizeiverordnung des HSSPF Krüger über die Errichtung jüdischer Wohnbezirke, November 10, 1942, in Verordnungsblatt des Generalgouvernements, November 11, 1942; see Berenstein et al., Faschismus, Getto, Massenmord, pp. 344–345.

14. Wein and Weiss, Pinkas ha-kehillot: Poland, vol. 3, Galicia and Western Silesia, p. 167.

15. Yari-Wold, Kehilat Raysba, pp. 85–86; JuNS-V, vol. 32, Lfd. Nr. 711, p. 415.

16. Huppert, Hand in Hand mit Tommy, pp. 55–81.

17. Yari-Wold, Kehilat Raysba, p. 90; Wein and Weiss, Pinkas ha-kehillot: Poland, vol. 3, Galicia and Western Silesia, p. 168.

18. JuNS-V, vol. 32, Lfd. Nr. 711, p. 416.

SANOK

Pre-1939: Sanok, town, Lwów województwo, Poland; 1939–1944: center, Kreis Sanok, Distrikt Krakau, Generalgouvernement; post-1998: województwo podkarpackie, Poland

Sanok is located approximately 200 kilometers (124 miles) southeast of Kraków. In 1938, there were 4,773 Jews in Sanok (including 324 Jews from Posada Olchowska, which was incorporated into the town in 1930). At the onset of World War II, more than 5,000 Jews were living in Sanok, including a number of refugees from Germany, Austria, and western Poland.¹

German armed forces occupied Sanok on September 8, 1939. On the night of September 16–17, the Germans burned down three synagogues and destroyed two Jewish printing houses and libraries, containing some 4,000 volumes. On September 26, the Germans ordered 150 Jewish families across the San River into the Soviet zone of occupation. The Aktion was organized by Einsatzkommando I/1. Jews from Kraków, Bochnia, Tarnów, Krosno, and Rymanów were also deported into the Soviet zone via Sanok, and others came to Sanok, attempting to cross the border voluntarily. By the end of 1939, the Soviet authorities had more or less closed the border.

View of the Sanok ghetto, n.d.

USHMM WS #59022, COURTESY OF STADTAN, E 39 NR. 933/13

In October 1939, Sanok became a Kreis center within Distrikt Krakau. The first Kreishauptmann was Dr. Schaar; Dr. Class succeeded him from the second half of 1941 until the start of 1943. Primarily responsible for the anti-Jewish Aktions in Sanok was the Border Police-Office (Grenzpolizeikommisariat, GPK), especially the members of its Gestapo section.

In the fall of 1939, the Germans started to confiscate and liquidate Jewish businesses. From December 1, Jews aged over 12 had to wear armbands bearing a blue Star of David. The Germans appointed Leon Werner as chairman of the Jewish Council (Judenrat), which had to provide a daily quota of forced laborers aged between 14 and 60. More wealthy Jews, however, were permitted to pay for replacements. Jewish men worked mainly cleaning and repairing the streets, while women and children either worked as domestic servants or were forced to gather rocks from the San River. The Jews were poorly paid and malnourished, so they had to barter possessions for food on the black market.²

On their arrival, German officials started to evict Jews to take their apartments, and Jews also had to meet German demands for furniture. Soon the Jews expelled from their homes and those living in other areas of town were all required to move into several designated Jewish residential areas within Sanok. The movement of Jews was restricted; they could leave the town only up to the distance of 1 kilometer (0.6 mile) and only during specific hours. To travel further afield, they required special permits issued by the Kreishauptmann. The penalty for disobeying these rules was death. According to several sources, the resettlement of the Jews into specific quarters within Sanok effectively meant the establishment of an open ghetto, although it is difficult to date this precisely.³

As of December 1940, there were about 9,000 Jews in Kreis Sanok, of which some 2,500 lived in the Kreis center.⁴ According to a report of the Jewish Social Self-Help (JSS), in July 1941, there were 2,700 Jews in Sanok, including 140 merchants; 120 skilled workers (of which 68 owned businesses, mainly tailors, shoemakers, and tinsmiths); 200 laborers; 6 self-employed; and 600 unemployed. Furthermore, 350 Jews were receiving assistance, while another 550 had applied for aid. The community kitchen distributed daily meals to 175 Jews; 102 Jews received medical help; and 144 families were receiving financial assistance.⁵ In September 1941, the Sanok JSS reported there were 2,400 Jews in the town, of whom 334 were receiving assistance; 50 Jews were performing forced labor.⁶ Around this time (at Rosh Hashanah), the Gestapo arrested a group of Jews while praying and deported them to the Auschwitz concentration camp.⁷

As of December 12, 1941, the Kreishauptmann in Sanok introduced a law restricting the residence of Jews within the Kreis. Jews who were not permanent residents before June 22, 1941, were not permitted to settle in Kreis Sanok. Any Jews who had arrived after this date were required to leave the area. The Judenrat were required to report any Jewish newcomers to the office of the Kreishauptmann. Violators of the law would be severely punished.⁸ In the winter of 1941–1942, the Jews had to surrender all items of fur clothing to the Germans.⁹

From the spring of 1942, the Gestapo in Sanok conducted repeated registrations of the Jews in the town, dividing them into those able to work and those unfit for work.¹⁰ From this time, members of the Gestapo regularly arrested groups of Jews and shot them in the Jewish cemetery on Kiczury Street. The Judenrat was forced to send other Jews to bury the bodies. Among the victims were Jews who had appealed against their categorization as unfit for work and probably some who had returned from Distrikt Galizien, but others were shot more or less at the whim of the Gestapo. At the end of the occupation, the Polish authorities uncovered more than 30 mass graves here, containing the bodies of around 1,000 Jews. The other Jewish cemetery was razed, and the Germans used the matzevot (tombstones) to pave the roads.¹¹

In mid-summer 1942, the Germans dissolved the separate Jewish quarters in Sanok and established a single enclosed ghetto in the town, which was closely guarded. Jews could only leave it with a special pass to go to their workplaces. Jews caught outside the ghetto without permission faced the death penalty.¹² It was located on Jagiellońska Street and covered 2,000 square meters (almost 2,400 square yards). Initially, about 2,500 Jews inhabited the ghetto, but additional Jews were brought there from other places in the Kreis. Some Jews left the ghetto daily to work in road construction and at a railway carriage factory. Others worked in a labor camp based at the Trepca quarry on the outskirts of town. The death rate in the ghetto reportedly was about 2 people per day.¹³

In preparation for the deportations from Kreis Sanok, the Germans also established a transit camp for Jews at Zasław, about 8 kilometers (5 miles) south of the town. This was an unfinished paper factory, with its own railhead, that was surrounded with barbed wire. The only accommodation was in primitive barracks. From the middle of August the Germans started to concentrate Jews in Zasław, for example, from Lesko, Bukowsko, and Ustrzyki Dolne. The camp's location within a factory was exploited to make Jews believe they would find employment there, but most were deported to the Bełżec extermination camp within days.

On September 5, 1942, the Germans announced on placards that all the Jews in the Sanok ghetto would be taken to the Zasław camp.¹⁴ Then on September 10, the German police, assisted by Ukrainian auxiliaries, conducted a major deportation Aktion. The Jews were ordered to appear with luggage in front of their houses, leaving their keys behind. It was announced that anyone providing help to Jews would be punished by death. The Jews of Sanok were taken to the Zasław camp, where in total more than 11,000 Jews from the region were crammed into barracks suitable for only about 500 people. The sick and the disabled were shot at the Jewish cemetery in Sanok. After a few days, some 4,000 Jews from Kreis Sanok were deported to Bełżec. Soon afterwards, two more transports carrying about 9,000 Jews in total were sent from Zasław to Bełżec.¹⁵

On September 14, 1942, Stadthauptmann Class announced the creation of three separate Jewish camps (or remnant ghettos) in Kreis Sanok, in Sanok, Trepcza, and Zasław. In this manner, the Germans attempted to lure out of hiding the remaining Jews, promising them survival. About 300 Jews had remained in the Sanok ghetto. The Germans soon killed most of the Jews who emerged.¹⁶ In the fall of 1942, about 100 Jews were retained to clear the area of the ghetto, but several hundred others lived in the Trepcza camp and other workplaces in Sanok, now converted into barrack camps. In mid-December 1942, the Gestapo shot remaining members of the Judenrat in the Jewish cemetery.¹⁷ Also in December, the Trepcza camp was liquidated, and about 700 Jews were transferred to Zasław, where they were shot the next day.¹⁸ In January 1943, the remaining Jewish laborers in Sanok were concentrated in the remnant ghetto. After a few days, they were then sent to the Zasław camp. It is assumed that most were then sent to their deaths from Zasław, although the details remain unclear.¹⁹

Some Jews managed to escape the liquidation of the ghetto and go into hiding. The Germans hunted down the Jews in the nearby villages. In Bykowce, the Germans shot 3 Jewish escapees from the Sanok ghetto. In Dąbrówka, the Gestapo shot 14 Jews. On April 19, 1944, Stanisława Kornecka was executed by the Germans for sheltering a Jew.²⁰

SOURCES Publications dealing with the persecution and murder of the Jews in Sanok include the following: El'azar Sharvit, ed., Sanok: Sefer zikaron li-kehillat Sanok veba-sevivah (Tel Aviv: Irgun yots'e Sanok veba-sevivah be Yisrael, 1969)—a translation of sections dealing with the Holocaust (pp. 327–333) is available at jewishgen.org; “Sanok,” in Andrzej Potocki, Żydzi w Podkarpaciu (Rzeszów: Wydawn., 2004); David Bloomberg, Won't Forgive . . . Can't Forget: The Story of Jacques Graubart (Oxfordshire, England: Writersworld, 2006); and Jafa Wallach, Bitter Freedom: Memoirs of a Holocaust Survivor (Schuylkill Haven, PA: Hermitage Publishers, 2006).

Documents on the fate of the Jews in Sanok can be found in the following archives: AŻIH (301/1619, 1793, 3245, 3246, 3555, 3992); BA-L (B 162/14494); USHMM (Acc.1997.A.0124 [JSS], reel 45; RG-15.019M, reel 11; RG-50.155*0010); USHMPA (WS # 57831, 57842, 57843, 57848, and 57851); VHF (e.g., # 9007, 20860, 38212, 38885); and YVA.

Joanna Śliwa

NOTES

1. “Sanok,” in Potocki, Żydzi w Podkarpaciu, pp. 170–174.

2. BA-L, B 162/14494, Verdict of LG-Be (500), 3 P(K) Ks 1/72, August 23, 1973, against Johann Bäcker und Hans Quambusch (ZStL, II 206 AR-Z 13/64), pp. 10–12; Sharvit, Sanok: Sefer zikaron, pp. 327–333; AŻIH, 301/3245, testimony of Hadasa Hochdorf; VHF, # 38885, testimony of Henry Stern; # 9007, testimony of Pearl Parnes; testimony of Ya'akov Gurfein, in The Trial of Adolf Eichman: Record of Proceedings in the District Court of Jerusalem, vol. 1 (Jerusalem: Israel State Archives and Yad Vashem, 1992–1995), pp. 331, 333; Stanisław

Zabierowski, Rzeszowskie pod okupacją hitlerowską (Warsaw: Książka i Wiedza, 1975), pp. 36–38; “Sanok,” in Potocki, Żydzi w Podkarpaciu, p. 174.

3. BA-L, B 162/14494, p. 12; VHF, # 38885; # 9007; Gurfein testimony, in The Trial of Adolf Eichman, vol. 1, p. 331.

4. USHMM, Acc.1997.A.0124, reel 45, letter from Kraków JSS to Sanok, December 22, 1940.

5. Ibid., report of Sanok JSS for July 1941.

6. Ibid., report of Sanok JSS for September 1941.

7. Sharvit, Sanok: Sefer zikaron, p. 331.

8. USHMM, Acc.1997.A.0124, reel 45, letter signed by Dr. Tisch, November 17, 1941.

9. BA-L, B 162/14494, p. 13; Gurfein testimony, in The Trial of Adolf Eichman, vol. 1, p. 333.

10. Gurfein testimony, in The Trial of Adolf Eichman, vol. 1, p. 331.

11. OKBZH-S, 8/70, testimony of Janina Piotrowska and Jan Smyczyński; C. Cyran and A. Rachwał, “Eksterminacja ludności na Sanoczyźnie 1939–1944,” Rocznik Sanocki (1979), p. 42; USHMM, RG-15.019M, reel 11, “Protokół,” doc. 685.

12. BA-L, B 162/14494, p. 17.

13. USHMM, RG-15.019M, “Kwestionariusz o obozach,” doc. 185; BA-L, B 162/14494, p. 17; “Sanok,” in Potocki, Żydzi w Podkarpaciu, p. 174.

14. AŻIH, 301/3555, testimony of Maria Dżambowa and Mała Sturm, p. 1.

15. BA-L, B 162/14494, pp. 17–18; Gurfein testimony, in The Trial of Adolf Eichman, vol. 1, p. 331; AŻIH 301/3246, testimony of Markus Silberman; 301/3556, testimony of Usher Szwarc; 301/4916, testimony of Mojżesz Zwas; E. Podhorizer-Sandel, “O zagładzie Żydów w dystrykcie krakowskim,” BŻIH, no. 30 (1959): 97.

16. Podhorizer-Sandel, “O zagładzie Żydów,” pp. 97–98.

17. Sharvit, Sanok: Sefer zikaron, p. 332.

18. BA-L, B 162/14494, p. 25.

19. Sharvit, Sanok: Sefer zikaron, pp. 332–333, gives the final destination as Bełżec, but this killing facility was closed at the end of December 1942.

20. USHMM, RG-15.019M, reel 11, “Kwestionariusz o obozach,” doc. 683; “Sanok,” in Potocki, Żydzi w Podkarpaciu, p. 175.

SĘDZISZÓW MAŁOPOLSKI

Pre-1939: Sędziszów Małopolski, town, Kraków województwo, Poland; 1939–1945: Sedziszow Małopolski, Kreis Debica, Distrikt Krakau, Generalgouvernement; post-1998: Sędziszów Małopolski, województwo podkarpackie, Poland

Sędziszów Małopolski is located about 120 kilometers (75 miles) east of Kraków. In 1921, when the town became part of the reestablished Polish state, there were only 861 Jewish residents in Sędziszów Małopolski.

Soon after the invasion of Poland, German troops entered Sędziszów Małopolski on September 8, 1939. When the Germans established the Generalgouvernement in October 1939, the town became part of Kreis Debica, within Distrikt Krakau. A branch of the Security Police (Sipo-Aussendienststelle) based in Dębica organized the main Aktions against the Jews within its area of jurisdiction, including the town of Sędziszów Małopolski, assisted by the German Order Police and other auxiliary forces.¹

VOLUME II: PART A

In 1939, there were 1,000 Jewish residents in the town. In the period from 1939 to 1941, the Germans imposed a series of discriminatory measures against the local Jewish population. These included the confiscation of Jewish property, the imposition of forced “contributions,” the obligation to wear white armbands bearing a blue Star of David, and mandatory registration. In addition, the Germans prohibited the Jews from leaving the town limits and conscripted them to various kinds of compulsory hard labor.

There is very little information regarding the fate of the Jewish population prior to the establishment of the ghetto in June 1942. A Jewish Council (Judenrat) headed by a man named Faust was established and made responsible for providing the daily quotas of forced laborers, who were mainly employed in construction and cleanup work. Records of the local Jewish Social Self-Help (JSS) organization indicate that until September 26, 1941, despite the dire situation of the Jews in the town, there was no public kitchen. This was mainly due to the difficulties encountered raising funds to restore the local synagogue, in which the kitchen was to be established. Although no epidemic of typhus broke out in Sędziszów Małopolski, poor sanitary conditions among the Jewish population forced Meilech Löw, the head of the local JSS, to request funds to buy medical supplies in January 1942.² On February 2, 1942, the public kitchen, which served around 100 free meals per day, was finally opened. However, the living conditions in the town were also affected by considerable overcrowding. By February 15, 1942, the number of Jews in Sędziszów Małopolski had reached 1,380, including many refugees who had arrived from the nearby town of Kolbuszowa.³

At the beginning of May 1942, 50 young Jews were sent to the Pustków labor camp. The Germans established an open ghetto in Sędziszów Małopolski in June 1942 in an area circumscribed by three buildings. In addition to local Jews, it very briefly held several hundred Jews from the village of Ropczyce, who were concentrated there on July 23, 1942, just one day before the ghetto’s liquidation. This brought the number of Jews in the ghetto to about 1,900. The ghetto was liquidated on July 24, 1942. Approximately 400 Jews, many of them old people, children, and women from Ropczyce, were shot on the spot by members of the SS and the Gendarmerie after a selection. Their remains were buried in a mass grave in the Jewish cemetery. About 1,500 Jews were dispatched via Dębica to the extermination camp at Bełżec. Although the town was officially declared to have been “cleansed of Jews” (judenrein) following the liquidation of the ghetto, at least 19 Jews were discovered subsequently in hiding and were immediately shot.⁴

SOURCES Information regarding the ghetto in Sędziszów Małopolski can be found in the following publications: Abraham Wein and Aharon Weiss, eds., Pinkas ha-kehillot. Encyclopaedia of Jewish Communities: Poland, vol. 3, Galicia and Western Silesia (Jerusalem: Yad Vashem, 1984), pp. 280–282; E.

Podhorizer-Sandel, “O zagładzie Żydów w dystrykcie krakowskim,” BŻIH, no. 30 (1959): 87–109, here pp. 87 and 95; Czesław Pilichowski et al., eds., Obozy hitlerowskie na ziemiach polskich 1939–1945: Informator encyklopedyczny (Warsaw: PWN, 1979), p. 446; and Rejestr miejsc i faktów zbrodni popełnionych przez okupanta hitlerowskiego na ziemiach polskich w latach 1939–1945: Województwo rzeszowskie (Warsaw: GKBZHP, 1984), p. 172.

Documents describing the fate of the Jews of Sędziszów Małopolski may be found in the following archives: AŻIH (JSS 211/948); IPN (Zh III/31/35/68, g., woj. Rzeszowskie); USHMM (Acc.1997.A.0124 [JSS], reel 45); VHF (e.g., # 1236 and 18693); and YVA (e.g., M-1/E/1412 and O-22/54).

Caterina Crisci and Alexander Kruglov
trans. Robert Haney

NOTES

1. Podhorizer-Sandel, “O zagładzie żydów,” p. 87.
2. USHMM, Acc.1997.A.0124 (JSS), reel 45, Bescheinigung, Krakau, January 31, 1942.
3. Ibid., reel 45; VHF, # 1236, testimony of E. Kleinman.
4. Wein and Weiss, Pinkas ha-kehillot: Poland, vol. 3, Galicia and Western Silesia, p. 282; VHF, # 18693, testimony of S. Blaufeld, and # 1236; Podhorizer-Sandel, “O zagładzie Żydów,” p. 95; Rejestr miejsc, pp. 172–173; Yehoshua Gold, “Ropshitz during the Occupation,” in I. Rosenfeld, ed., Hayo hayta Ayara Ropczyce (Israel: I. Rosenfeld, 1985), pp. 74–78.

SIENIAWA

Pre-1939: Sieniawa, town, Lwów województwo, Poland; 1939–1941: Seniawa, L'vov oblast', Ukrainian SSR; 1941–1944: Sieniawa, Kreis Jaroslau, Distrikt Krakau, Generalgouvernement; post-1998: województwo podkarpackie, Poland

Sieniawa is located 50 kilometers (31 miles) north-northwest of Przemyśl. In 1939, there were 1,300 Jews living in Sieniawa.¹ German forces briefly occupied the town in September 1939. The Soviets took over later that month, following their invasion of Poland from the east. The Soviet occupation was largely peaceful for Sieniawa’s Jews. Survivor Sally Bach recalled it as “a very good period” under the Soviets.²

Following the German recapture of Sieniawa in late June 1941, 50 to 60 Jews were arrested on charges of having cooperated with the Soviet police. Most were released after paying a ransom, but 15 people were detained and later shot.

The Germans established a Jewish Council (Judenrat) chaired by Shmiryahu Schmidt, who was soon replaced by Eliyahu Gross. According to survivors, Gross was very friendly and influential with the Gestapo who oversaw the town, often bribing its members.³

On May 26, 1942, a conference of all the Judenrat chairmen in the Kreis took place in Sieniawa. The Kreishauptmann in Jaroslau appointed Gross as the Kreisobmann, that is, the president of the Presidium of the Area Council. This position held authority over all 15 Jewish Councils, some of which had much larger Jewish populations. Among them were Jaroslau (the Kreis center), Łańcut, Przeworsk, Pruchnik, Landshut, Leżajsk, Grodzisko Dolne, Żołynia, Bystrowice, Markowa, Kańczuga, Czarna, and Monasterz. At the conference, Gross “introduced a work plan in the sphere of fulfilling the decrees of the German authorities, and in the social field.” Gross never exercised much of his power, and in the summer of 1942, most of the Jewish communities in the area were liquidated.

In July 1942, there were 1,800 Jews living in Sieniawa. By then, its Judenrat had distributed some clothing, heating fuel, and 20,000 złoty among the town’s Jews. No soup kitchen was organized. The Jewish population sustained itself by trading household items for food with Ukrainians, the predominant residents of the town. Jews worked in forestry, road repairs, and sanitation.⁴

In the summer and early autumn of 1942, several processes were taking place in Sieniawa, most of them simultaneously. Each was part of the liquidation plan for the Jews of Kreis Jaroslau. The Germans had selected Sieniawa as the main place of concentration for the Jews before their final shipment to extermination or labor camps. The Jews from neighboring settlements were brought into Sieniawa in the summer of 1942. A number of Jews from larger towns in the Kreis were also transferred to Sieniawa, following the liquidation of their communities. At that time, the Jews of Sieniawa were not ghettoized and there are no references to restrictions on their movement within the town.

Available sources differ, but the liquidation of the Sieniawa Jewish community probably took place on August 25, 1942. After this main Aktion, only several hundred Jews remained in Sieniawa. According to Pinkas ha-kehillot—which gives an earlier date of July 20 for the Aktion—the community was gathered in the synagogue and then sent to the Pełkinie transit camp. Many children and elderly people were murdered in and around Sieniawa during the course of this Aktion. The women were deported to the Bełżec extermination camp, while the healthy men were transferred to labor camps. Historian E. Podhorizer-Sandel, however, dates the Aktion on August 25 and indicates that the Jews were sent on wagons to nearby Wólka Pełkińska and from there by truck to a forest where they were shot.

The latter date seems more likely, as the local office of the Jewish Social Self-Help (JSS), established in Sieniawa only on July 19, 1942, reported to JSS headquarters in Kraków on August 26, 1942: “[F]or the laborers, deportees, abandoned, and children who remained [in Sieniawa], we have set up a kitchen.” It served three meals a day for 150 people but worked to increase this output as the authorities had announced that they should expect more deportees to be resettled to Sieniawa. “We are stressing that from the entire Kries Jaroslau, Sieniawa will be the only town inhabited by Jews, the number of which cannot presently be determined,” the JSS added.⁵

It was only after this first liquidation Aktion that a closed ghetto was established on September 15, 1942, in the center and northern parts of Sieniawa. Poles were expelled from their houses, and all the Jewish inhabitants were relocated to this area. The Germans gradually fenced the ghetto area with barbed wire and constructed at least one guarded gate. A Jewish police force was organized, possibly before the ghetto’s establishment. Apart from the remaining Jews of Sieniawa, there were also Jews from Leżajsk, Łańcut, Żołynia, Grodzisk, and Kańczuga in the ghetto.

A German Gendarme by the name of Seidel was in charge of ghetto affairs. He was assisted by the commander of a Ukrainian police force, Babak, and another Ukrainian named Kozak.⁶

Even after the first liquidation, when new Jews were still being brought into the ghetto from other places where the Jewish communities had just been liquidated, Gross repeatedly assured the ghetto inmates that he would protect them against deportation.⁷

In the course of the ghetto’s establishment, the Germans ordered the Judenrat to set up several labor camps. Gross approved the candidates for labor conscription. The first of three camps, which all lay less than 10 kilometers (6 miles) from Sieniawa, had been set up by September 11, 1942. Some 200 men and 30 women labored in forestry and lived in barracks constructed close to their workplaces. The Sieniawa ghetto was ordered to provide meals for them from its soup kitchen. The monthly cost was estimated at 10,000 złoty. Sieniawa Jews drained of money pleaded to the JSS in Kraków for help: “Other localities in our Kreis cannot help us either, as there are no longer any Jews there at all.” By October 26, 1942, the JSS reported 1,300 Jews living in Sieniawa’s enclosed ghetto.⁸

Earlier in October 1942, another massacre took place. At least eight members of the Judenrat were shot in an Aktion that some survivors described as another liquidation operation, which ended with the murder of many ghetto inmates. A witness, Helen Gruenfeld, a relative of Gross, testified: “The president [of the Judenrat] ran out and screamed, ‘Please save my ghetto!’ And they were so drunk, the SS-men. They started shooting [at] him. There were seven shots and he begged for his life, and then all of a sudden it became quiet.”

According to Pinkas ha-kehillot, members of the Judenrat, including Gross, were murdered when they were caught carrying furs and other valuables, which they intended to use to bribe the “governor [Kreishauptmann] in Jaroslau,” in exchange for cancellation of the planned dissolution of the Sieniawa ghetto. The execution took place outside the Judenrat building. Lazar Pes was then appointed as the new chairman. Bernard Schanzer further recalled that when the camps were being organized, the Germans killed all the chairmen of the Jewish Councils from neighboring towns who were living in the ghetto, as well as most of their family members.⁹

By November 1942, the number of Jews in the ghetto had declined to 1,100. The Judenrat and JSS were responsible for providing food to 169 laborers who were then working in the three forestry camps: in Dobra (10 kilometers [6 miles] distant), Milniki (8 kilometers [5 miles] distant), and Koty (4 kilometers [2.5 miles] away from Sieniawa). There were cases of typhus reported among the camp inmates.¹⁰

It is not clear to what extent the Jews in the camps were able to communicate with the ghetto or what the Jews who remained in the ghetto were doing at this time. The ghetto existed until May 4, 1943. The number of inhabitants at that time and the manner of its liquidation are unknown. In the spring of 1944, an SS detachment exhumed the bodies of the people who had been murdered in Sieniawa during the German occupation, transferred them to Koniaczów, and burned them there.¹¹

SOURCES The Sieniawa ghetto is mentioned in the following publications: Abraham Wein and Aharon Weiss, eds., Pinkas ha-kehillot. Encyclopaedia of Jewish Communities: Poland, vol. 3, Galicia and Western Silesia (Jerusalem: Yad Vashem, 1984), pp. 360–362; and E. Podhorizer-Sandel, “O zagładzie Żydów w dystrykcie krakowskim,” BŻIH, no. 30 (1959): 95–96.

The following archives were used to prepare this entry: AŻIH (211/952 [JSS]; 301/2200 [Relacje]); USHMM (Acc. 1997.A.0124 [JSS]; RG-15.019M [ASG]); and VHF (# 2380, 4222, 7563, 24980).

Jolanta Kraemer

NOTES

1. Gazeta Żydowska, July, 3, 1942.
2. VHF, # 24980, testimony of Sally Bach, 1997.
3. Ibid., # 7563, testimony of Helen Gruenfeld, 1995; # 4222, testimony of Bernard Schantzer, 1995.
4. USHMM, Acc.1997.A.0124 (JSS), 211/952 (Sieniawa), pp. 3–4, 7; Gazeta Żydowska, July 3, 1942.
5. USHMM, Acc.1997.A.0124, 211/952, pp. 10, 15.
6. Ibid., RG-15.019M (ASG Sieniawa), reel 17, fr. 46; AŻIH, 301/2200, testimony of Szymon Wulwik, 1945; VHF, # 24980; and # 4222.
7. VHF, # 4222.
8. USHMM, Acc.1997.A.0124, 211/952, pp. 18, 22.
9. VHF, # 2380, testimony of Ben Stelzer, 1995; # 7563; and # 4222.
10. USHMM, Acc.1997.A.0124, 211/952, p. 25; VHF, # 24980.
11. USHMM, RG-15.019M (ASG Sieniawa), reel 17, fr. 46.

SKAWINA

Pre-1939: Skawina, town, Kraków województwo, Poland; 1939–1945: Kreis Krakau-Land, Distrikt Krakau, Generalgouvernement; post-1998: województwo małopolskie, Poland

Skawina is located 15 kilometers (9 miles) southwest of Kraków. There were approximately 360 Jews living in Skawina in 1939. Many fled before the advancing German troops at the start of the September Campaign; by the spring of 1940, there were only 290 Jews left in Skawina, including nine refugees.¹ A Polish (Blue) Police squad and a German Gendarmerie post were based in the town.

The occupying German authorities appointed Salomon Heim as the chairman of Skawina's Jewish Council (Judenrat) and Mendel Spielman as his deputy.² The Judenrat set up a self-help committee in early March 1940. Although unable to open a soup kitchen, it distributed food received from the American Jewish Joint Distribution Committee (AJDC) in Kraków. It also required that better-situated families should provide daily meals to 10 children from poor families. A complete list of the Jewish families living in Skawina in November 1940, prepared for flour distribution, is available in the AJDC files. It includes the name and surname of the family heads and the number of people in each family.³

In the autumn of 1940, a large number of Jews who had been expelled from Kraków moved to Skawina, nearly doubling the town's pre-war Jewish population. By mid-November 1940, 100 refugees had already been settled; and another 230 were in the process of arranging their accommodation. Each able-bodied newcomer had to register with the local Arbeitsamt (labor office) for work assignment.⁴

By the end of 1940, Jewish shops and businesses had either been closed down or taken over by non-Jewish trustees. At this time, the Judenrat stated that “the only source of income was from forced labor.” In January 1941, 700 Jews were registered in Skawina.⁵

A temporary infirmary was set up for the severely ill refugees in the early spring of 1941. A Women's Committee affiliated with the Judenrat organized a rotation among local families, who took it in turns to bring food to the inpatients to provide them with sustenance. Some patients were later transferred to Kraków.⁶

In April 1941, before the Passover holidays, the Gestapo and the Polish (Blue) Police rounded up 150 men and women enlisted for deportation to Międzyrzec Podlaski. The list was handed over to the Judenrat's chairman one day in advance. A number of those listed went into hiding after learning of their planned deportation; in their place, other Jews were seized randomly.

Available records show that by May 1941 the number of Jews in Skawina had decreased to 556.⁷

On May 22, 1941, the then-deputy of the Judenrat, Mendel Spielman, was appointed as its new chairman, with the approval of Kraków's Kreishauptmann.⁸

The new Judenrat chairman was also appointed as the president of the Jewish Social Self-Help (JSS) branch that was officially established by the Kraków headquarters on August 7, 1941. The JSS was located on 133 Kolejowa Street. It opened a soup kitchen on August 18, 1941, at 219 Korabnicka Street.⁹

A Judenrat sanitation committee was soon created to prevent the spread of disease. A Jewish female doctor, Czapnicka, supervised it; she was also in charge of the clinic. The sanitation committee consisted of six people tasked with inspecting Jewish households for cleanliness, ordering vaccinations and haircuts, providing bedding replenishment, and maintaining floors and toilets. Poor people could use the public baths free of charge and were ordered to do so once a week. Half of Skawina's Jewish population was vaccinated for typhus. By May 1942, there were still no serious diseases, apart from three cases of tuberculosis.¹⁰

There were 597 Jews registered in Skawina between February and May 1942. These included some Jewish deportees from Slovakia, such as Mikuláš Liptovský, who were trying to locate relatives sent to other towns.¹¹

In the first days of July 1942, the Jews living in Krzeszowice (renamed Kressendorf by the Germans), including those from the villages of Tenczynek and Nowa Góra within Landgemeinde Kressendorf, as well as Jews from the separate Landgemeinden of Liszki and Czernichów, were notified of their upcoming transfer to Skawina. At the time of the transfer from Krzeszowice, a Sonderdienst squad took approximately 140 children, sick, and elderly into a forest near Tyniec, where they were forced to undress and then shot. The victims were buried in three mass graves.

With the arrival of 222 Jews from Landgemeinde Kressendorf, Skawina's Jewish population rose to 812.¹²

The newcomers from Kressendorf were followed by many more. The local government was instructed not to interfere with those Jews attempting to settle in the by now extremely overcrowded town of Skawina, "as long as it was within the town's boundaries."¹³ A number of houses near the train station were emptied of Poles, and Jews were housed in their place.¹⁴

Although there is no evidence that a ghetto was ever formally established, an informal open ghetto was effectively in place by August 1942, at the latest.¹⁵

On August 12, 1942, up to 1,000 Jews (among them a large number of refugees) were brought in from the liquidated ghetto in Kalwaria Zebrzydowska.¹⁶ At that time, on the orders of the Arbeitsamt in Kraków, all Jews employed in agriculture in the vicinity of Skawina were released from their employment. By then an SS unit was quartered in Skawina. Its headquarters, set up in the local factory, received more and more troops. Supplementary Polish police forces were also gathered and quartered in the local school. The SS informed the town's mayor that Skawina's Jews were under their jurisdiction and ordered the Jews to pay three separate "contributions" in a very short time.

The Jews from Myślenice and its vicinity were brought to the Skawina ghetto on August 21, 1942. At this time the ghettoization process was complete, and Jews were no longer allowed to leave the town. Checkpoints were spread out along Skawina's town limits; the identification of those coming in and leaving was checked. At least two Jews were killed trying to leave the town.¹⁷

On August 29, 1942, the ghetto's inhabitants were informed that they were to be deported "to the East for work" and were to report to the market square. In the process of assembling, those slow to arrive or discovered in hiding were killed. The night before, groups of Jews were rounded up and kept in the so-called Catholic House and the new slaughterhouse. The Germans announced shortly afterwards that Poles were forbidden to enter the market square until noon the next day, Sunday, August 30, when the liquidation of the Skawina ghetto would be complete.

The following morning, the deportation commenced with the tormenting of those Jews who showed up with the heaviest luggage. They were ordered to run to the Catholic House and back, then to the train station and back. Children's carriages and luggage were collected in front of the town hall, after which a selection took place. Small children, infants, the old, and handicapped were loaded onto trucks. All of them were taken to the so-called Pobory Forest and shot on the edge of a previously dug mass grave. Polish workers serving in the German Construction Service (Baudienst) were later forced to bury them.

The remainder of the Jews was divided into two groups. An unknown number of healthy men were ordered to one side of the square and then loaded on trains destined for the Płaszów labor camp. Women and youths over 12 years old were taken to the other side and then sent on freight cars to the Bełżec extermination camp.¹⁸

An intensive search for escapees from the ghetto was conducted following its liquidation; for example, 4 Jews were shot on September 1, 1942; 6 Jewish men, all with the same surname (Kunstlinger), were shot on September 2; 17 Skawina Jews were murdered on September 3; and another 16 on September 30.¹⁹

SOURCES The ghetto in Skawina is briefly mentioned in E. Podhorizer-Sandel, "O zagładzie Żydów w dystrykcie krakowskim," BŻIH, no. 30 (1959): 96; more information on conditions for the Jews concentrated in Skawina can be found in Bruno Shatyn, A Private War: Surviving in Poland on False Papers, 1941–1945 (Detroit, MI: Wayne State University Press, 1985).

The following archival sources were used in this entry: AŻIH (210/632, 211/965-966, 301/599, 301/799, 301/4470, 301/4572, 301/4720, and 301/5322); USHMM (Acc.1999.A.0154 [AJDC], 210/632 [Skawina]; Acc.1997.A.0124 [JSS], reel 46, 211/965-966 [Skawina]); and VHF (# 28035-3, 2480, and 17120).

Jolanta Kraemer

NOTES

1. USHMM, Acc.1999.A.0154 (AJDC), 210/632 (Skawina), pp. 1–3; Acc.1997.A.0124 (JSS), reel 46, 211/965 (Skawina), p. 18.
2. Shatyn, A Private War, p. 10; USHMM, Acc.1999.A.0154, 210/632, pp. 1, 8.
3. USHMM, Acc.1999.A.0154 (AJDC), 210/632, pp. 11–13, 18; Acc.1997.A.0124 (JSS), reel 46, 211/965, p. 28.
4. Shatyn, A Private War, p. 11; USHMM, Acc.1999.A.0154, 210/632, p. 15.
5. USHMM, Acc.1999.A.0154, 210/632, pp. 15, 20; Acc.1997.A.0124, reel 46, 211/965, p. 18; and 211/966 (Skawina), pp. 36–37.
6. Gazeta Żydowska, April 25, 1941.
7. AŻIH, 301/4720, testimony of Dawid Enoch, n.d.; USHMM, Acc.1997.A.0124, reel 46, 211/965, p. 18.
8. Gazeta Żydowska, July 2, 1941; and USHMM, Acc.1999.A.0154, 210/632, p. 30.
9. USHMM, Acc.1997.A.0124, reel 46, 211/965, pp. 23, 28–29; and 211/966, p. 8.
10. Ibid., reel 46, 211/966, pp. 4, 14, 30, 50; Gazeta Żydowska, July 2, 1941.
11. USHMM, Acc.1997.A.0124, reel 46, 211/966, pp. 4, 28, 36, 49.
12. Ibid., p. 54.
13. Shatyn, A Private War, p. 20.
14. VHF, # 28035-3, testimony of Regina Lockerman, 1997.

15. Podhorizer-Sandel, "O zagładzie Żydów," p. 96. In this article the author specifically uses the term ghetto referring to Skawina.

16. VHF, # 2480, testimony of Dorothy Fields, 1995.

17. Shatyn, A Private War, pp. 27–29; AŻIH, 301/599, testimony of Zofia Głowacka Hradowa, 1945.

18. Shatyn, A Private War, pp. 32–33; AŻIH, 301/599; VHF, # 17120, testimony of Israel Scharf, 1996.

19. Rejestr miejsc i faktów zbrodni popełnionych przez okupanta hitlerowskiego na ziemiach polskich w latach 1939–1945: Województwo krakowskie (Warsaw: GKBZHwP, 1984), pp. 92–93.

SŁOMNIKI

Pre-1939: Słomniki, town, Kielce województwo, Poland; 1939–1945: Słomniki, Kreis Miechow, Distrikt Krakau, Generalgouvernement; post-1998: Słomniki, województwo małopolskie, Poland

Słomniki is located about 20 kilometers (12 miles) north-northeast of Kraków. In 1921, the Jewish population was 1,460, out of a total population of 4,797.

German forces occupied Słomniki on September 6, 1939. A number of Jews, mainly young men, fled eastward just before the occupation. However, many subsequently returned in the winter of 1939–1940.

On October 26, 1939, Słomniki became incorporated into Kreis Miechow in Distrikt Krakau within the Generalgouvernement. The German authorities imposed a series of anti-Jewish measures, including the confiscation of property, a curfew, and subsequently a prohibition on Jews leaving the town. A Jewish Council (Judenrat) was established, headed by Israel Moshe Bialebroda. The Jewish Council had to supply forced laborers to the Germans for clearing snow, road construction, quarrying, and draining swamps. Jews with means were able to pay for substitutes to replace them on forced labor details.¹ According to Pinkas ha-kehilot, the German commissar of the labor office in Miechów, Beckman, was notable for his brutality; on one visit to Słomniki, he forced Rabbi Huberband to remove all the holy books from the synagogue and burn them in front of the building.

In the period up to the end of 1941, the Jewish population of Słomniki increased by up to 1,000 refugees, including a number of people displaced from Kraków. The community organized public assistance and a soup kitchen for the needy. In the winter of 1940–1941, about 100 young men from Słomniki were sent to a labor camp in Nowy Targ.

Probably in the spring of 1942, the German Security Police selected a few of the most prominent Jews of Słomniki and took them to Miechów, where they were killed.² In the first half of 1942, a unit of Jewish Police was created in Słomniki, which served under the Judenrat.

In late April or early May 1942, the Germans rounded up about 150 able-bodied Jews in Słomniki and deported them to work at two camps near Kraków. Some worked at the Fliegerhorstkommando, agricultural section, in Rakowice, and others were sent to the Siemens factory camp in Płaszów. The Słomniki Judenrat managed to send them small amounts of money, food, and clothing for a few weeks in the summer of 1942.³ According to Roman Ohrenstein, who was among those included in this deportation, up to this date there was no ghetto in the town. The Jews received bread in accordance with ration cards but had to barter possessions with local farmers to supplement this meager diet. They continued to live in their own homes, but all the decrees meant that living conditions were "just as bad as a ghetto."⁴

The first large-scale deportation Aktion from Słomniki, which was also the first from Kreis Miechow, took place on June 4–8, 1942. Jewish Social Self-Help (JSS) records indicate that at this time about 1,200 Jews were deported, and some 800 to 900 Jews remained in the town.⁵ On the night of June 4, hundreds of SS men aided by Ukrainian auxiliaries and Polish (Blue) Police surrounded the town. The German authorities ordered the Judenrat to prepare a list of the Jews who lived in the town's center and its eastern part. That night, Jews from these districts were forcibly evicted using vicious dogs and imprisoned in the synagogue and two Polish schools. Those unable to walk were killed on the spot.

After being held in the schools and the synagogue for three days without food or water, on June 8, the Jews were then transported on trucks to Prokocim, just to the southeast of Kraków, where they were held in the local soccer field for a few hours. Here they were ordered to hand over their valuables. A selection was conducted, and a few dozen able-bodied Jews were sent to the Płaszów labor camp. The old, sick, and frail were also selected out and killed nearby. The bulk of the Jews were then deported by rail to the Bełżec extermination camp on cattle cars, together with other Jews from Kraków, where the first large Aktion had commenced on May 30 and was now concluding.⁶

Following this Aktion, about 900 Jews were still living in the western part of town. At the end of June 1942, the Kreishauptmann in Miechów issued a decree on the establishment of "Jewish quarters" (Jüdischer Wohnbezirke) in Kreis Miechow. According to German trial materials, this order instructed the Jews of Michałowice (and probably also other nearby villages) to move to the "ghetto" in Słomniki by July 15, 1942.⁷ The resettlement of the Jews of Michałowice was conducted in a brutal fashion by the head of the Gestapo Aussendienststelle in Miechów, SS-Untersturmführer and Kriminalobersekretär Bayerlein; a number of Jews were shot in the streets of the village.⁸ JSS records confirm that the Kreishauptmann informed the Jews of Słomniki to expect the resettlement of about 450 Jews from the neighboring villages on July 13–14, 1942. Then on July 21, JSS records indicate that initially the mayor of Słomniki did not want to accept these new arrivals. However, he agreed, once an official from the office of the Kreishauptmann gave permission for them to be housed with the other Jews within the borders of the "eventual Jewish quarter" and even permitted some to be housed temporarily in other parts of town, once the official had stated that "there were no plans to establish a [permanent] ghetto in Słomniki."⁹ Thus the order announcing the establishment of a Jewish quarter in Słomniki appears to reflect the town's use as a temporary concentration point for Jews of the region prior to their deportation, rather than the establishment of a formal ghetto for Słomniki's Jews. Its main purpose was probably to deceive Jews passing through Słomniki about the real nature of the deportation Aktion. Nonetheless, most of the native Jews of Słomniki were by now concentrated in the western part of the town, due to the manner in which the first deportation Aktion was conducted.

On August 2, 1942, the soup kitchen in Słomniki was reopened after the disruptions caused by the first deportation. The Gestapo chief in Miechów, Bayerlein, engaged in selling "certificates" to the increasingly anxious Jews for a price of 10,000 złoty, which were supposed to protect people from deportation; however, during the next deportation Aktion, these certificates proved to be worthless. By mid-August, the Germans had established a transit camp near Słomniki, consisting of a specially fenced area in a field, near the flour mill on the Szerniewa River. On August 20, 1942, most of the remaining Jews of Słomniki were transferred to this area, where Jews from other nearby towns were also brought successively during the last days of August and the first days of September. Among other places, Jews were brought there from Charsznica, Skalmierz, Koszyce, Miechów, Proszowice, and Skała.¹⁰ Many Jews were murdered by the Ukrainian and Lithuanian escorts during these transports, and eventually the transit camp held about 6,000 to 8,000 Jews, including about 1,000 from Słomniki. In the camp, the inmates were held under terrible conditions, exposed to the elements. Only some 200 Jews, including members of the Judenrat, were allowed to remain in Słomniki.

The Słomniki Judenrat managed to organize some food and water for the thousands of Jews crammed into the camp.¹¹ However, more than 40 people died during the first four days, and many others contracted dysentery and typhus. On September 6–7, 1942, the Germans and their auxiliaries liquidated the camp. About 1,000 people were selected and sent to forced labor camps, and hundreds of the infirm and children were shot and buried in nearby pits, some being buried alive. The remaining Jews were loaded onto cattle cars and sent to the Bełżec extermination camp.

The remaining Jews in Słomniki were subsequently joined by other Jews who had evaded the roundups in hiding. At this time, the Germans and their collaborators were scouring the region for any Jews who had escaped, shooting those they found on the spot.

In November 1942, the Germans shot the last remaining 200 Jews in Słomniki in the Chodów Forest, along with a number of Jewish fugitives captured in the area. Only a few Jews from Słomniki managed to survive until the end of the German occupation in 1945.

SOURCES Information on the fate of the Jews in Słomniki during the Holocaust can be found in these publications: Abraham Wein, Bracha Freundlich, and Wila Orbach, eds., Pinkas ba-kebilot. Encyclopaedia of Jewish Communities: Poland, vol. 7, Lublin and Kielce (Jerusalem: Yad Vashem, 1999), pp. 358–362; Justiz und NS-Verbrechen, vol. 23 (Amsterdam: Amsterdam University Press, 1998), Lfd. Nr. 619; and Shmuel Spector and Geoffrey Wigoder, eds., The Encyclopedia of Jewish Life before and during the Holocaust (Jerusalem: Yad Vashem; New York: New York University Press, 2001), pp. 241–242, 665–666, 1190, 1200.

Relevant documentation can be found in the following archives: AŻIH (211/976 [JSS]; 301/1695, 1732, 1808); VHF (e.g., # 20661, 27514, and 27994); and YVA (M-1/E/494).

Martin Dean

NOTES

1. VHF, # 27994, testimony of Roman Ohrenstein; # 27514, testimony of David Merin.
2. Ibid., # 27994.
3. Ibid., # 27994; # 27514; AŻIH, 211/976, p. 5, JSS Słomniki to JSS Kraków, May 4, 1942.
4. VHF, # 27994.
5. AŻIH, 211/976, pp. 32, 38, JSS Słomniki to JSS Kraków, May 4, 1942.
6. VHF, # 27514.
7. JuNS-V, vol. 23, Lfd. Nr. 619b, p. 119.
8. Ibid., Lfd. Nr. 619a, pp. 89–91.
9. AŻIH, 211/976, pp. 48, 50, JSS Słomniki to JSS Kraków, July 13, 1942, and Notatka, Kraków, July 21, 1942.
10. Ibid., 301/1695, testimony of Mozes Goldkorn; 301/1732, testimony of Mates Brunengraber; 301/1808, testimony of Izrael Anker.
11. YVA, M-1/E/494, testimony of Wolf Lerer.

SOKOŁÓW MAŁOPOLSKI

Pre-1939: Sokołów Małopolski, town, Rzeszów powiat, Lwów województwo, Poland; 1939–1945: Sokolow, Kreis Reichshof, Distrikt Krakau, Generalgouvernement; post-1998: Sokołów Małopolski, województwo podkarpackie, Poland

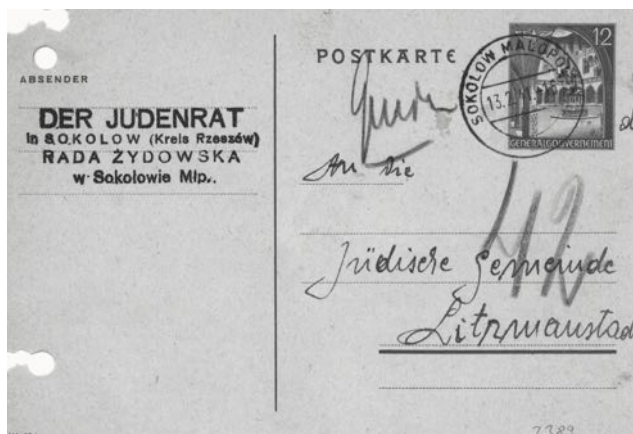

Sokołów Małopolski is located 27 kilometers (17 miles) north-northeast of Rzeszów. On the eve of World War II, there were 1,600 Jews living there.

Following the German occupation of the town in September 1939, a Jewish Council (Judenrat) was appointed in the fall. Leon Kaufmann became its chairman. One of the Judenrat's main functions was providing laborers for the Germans.

By December 1939, over 200 Jews who had been deported by the German authorities from Łódź were transferred to Sokołów Małopolski via Rzeszów. Upon their arrival, Sokołów's Jews spontaneously set up a Committee for the Support of Deportees. A soup kitchen opened, distributing breakfasts and dinners. The Judenrat had taken charge of the committee by January 1940.

In March 1940, there were 1,700 Jews living in Sokołów, including 270 deportees from other areas. The number of deportees fluctuated, with several groups of Jews arriving and then leaving Sokołów; by June 1940, the number had fallen to approximately 150.¹

Those Jews who remained in Sokołów worked for a construction company on various projects on and around the

A postcard bearing a rubber stamp in German and Polish addressed from the Judenrat in Sokołów Małopolski to the Jewish community in Litmannstadt (Łódź), February 13, 1941.

COURTESY OF EDWARDVICTOR.COM

market square. Civilian supervisors named Jeschko, Lindner, and Schäfer often beat these laborers. In winter, Jewish labor was used to clear the streets of snow.²

The Judenrat closed the soup kitchen in the summer of 1940, immediately after the American Jewish Joint Distribution Committee (AJDC) stopped sending money. Before this, the AJDC had questioned the Judenrat's policy of not charging for meals and overspending on provisions (bought on the black market), instead of attempting to buy food at the maximum prices fixed by the German authorities in their efforts to prevent speculators; in fact, Jewish charitable organizations were still eligible to buy some food under these regulations.

In September 1940, an AJDC inspector criticized the Judenrat chairman Kaufmann for being "a flincher," taking the easiest way out by simply refusing to reopen the soup kitchen. From then on, the Judenrat only distributed cash, which forced the poor to buy food themselves at inflated prices, whereas the Judenrat could have negotiated to pay bulk prices and could also have saved on fuel costs by operating a communal kitchen. The AJDC did not renew its support, as it considered its money was being spent unwisely.³

By February 1941, a branch of the welfare organization known as the Jewish Social Self-Help (JSS), with its headquarters in Kraków, opened in Sokołów. It took over the provision of social aid from the Judenrat, which now included Dr. Józef Weissberg, Symche Halpern, and Awadje Breselod. Continuing the politics of the Judenrat, the JSS chose to distribute cash instead of organizing a soup kitchen. Close to half of its 1941 budget was spent supplying conscripted laborers with food and clothing.⁴

According to a JSS report of June 1941, a total of 400 Jews worked in labor camps outside the Kreis, most of them likely in Górno.

In September 1941, all Jews from villages surrounding Raniżów and Sokołów, including Wola Raniżowska, Zielonka, Staniszewskie, Mazury, and Górno, were deported to Sokołów and Głogów Małopolski. A group of 250 people, mostly farmers, resettled in Sokołów, the remainder in Głogów. Those who were sent to Sokołów had been working at the open labor camp in Górno; their resettlement was to rationalize their labor there.⁵ One Jewish survivor, who arrived in Sokołów in September 1941, described the town at that time as "a kind of a ghetto" overcrowded with refugees but unguarded, unfenced, and with no gates. He claimed that there was no hunger and the town's Jews could still go out and buy food.⁶ At this time, the German Landkommissar Twardon, residing in Kolbuszowa, ordered the Kolbuszowa Judenrat to move 25 Jewish families to Sokołów and Głogów.⁷

A hospital was probably not established in the village until 1942. Towarzystwo Ochrony Zdrowia (Society for the Protection of Health) disinfected dirty apartments from December 1940. One source claims that there was never a serious epidemic in Sokołów and the death rate was not significantly above average. However, on December 20, 1941, the police decree of Kreishaupmann Heinz Ehaus announced Strzyżów, Niebylec, and Sokołów Małopolski as quarantined areas, and all traffic in and out was halted. The penalty for disobeying the order was a 1,000 złoty fine or prison time. There is no information as to when the quarantine was lifted.⁸

At the beginning of 1942, the Judenrat organized linen-sewing, carpentry, and agricultural courses for the youth. Although the courses began in February 1942, the Judenrat subsequently failed to establish workshops that might have offered people some form of employment and therefore perhaps security against deportation for forced labor.

The German authorities established a ghetto in Sokołów on April 27, 1942. It covered approximately 500 square meters (almost 600 square yards) and included Kupiecka and Kochanowskiego Streets, as well as part of Piłsudski. The Poles living there had to leave their homes. Landkommissar Twardon became the commandant in charge of the Sokołów ghetto. Marcuse, a refugee, was head of the Jewish Police.⁹ Survivor testimonies disagree on whether or not the Sokołów ghetto was physically enclosed.¹⁰

By May 1942, the ghetto had 3,000 inhabitants. The local Arbeitsamt (labor office) registered all newcomers aged between 14 and 60 years old. In May 1942, according to Gazeta Żydowska, approximately 800 Jews worked daily at the Luftwaffe barracks in Górno; however, it is not clear if all of them were from the Sokołów ghetto. At that time, the commander of the Górno outpost offered dinners to Jewish laborers at 0.40 złoty each. Another 100 to 120 Jews worked in Sokołów cleaning the town and repairing roads.

The Reichshof Gestapo arrived in Sokołów in early May 1942 and shot several Jews whom they believed to be Communists as part of a wider Aktion throughout Distrikt Krakau.

The liquidation of the Sokołów ghetto took place in July 1942. German police officers arrived in Sokołów and shot around 30 ghetto residents, following a selection. Approximately 200 Jews were relocated to Głogów; Jewish professionals were sent to Rzeszów. The remaining Jews were given only two days to transfer to the Rzeszów ghetto. Forty Jews found hiding were murdered in four separate shootings in the forest near the village of Pogwizdów Nowy.¹¹

Along with those expelled from other towns, Sokołów's Jews were put into shacks outside the Rzeszów ghetto. All were most likely sent to the Bełżec extermination camp in the course of the July 1942 deportations.¹²

In the summer of 1943, Wehrmacht soldiers shot three Jews and executed four Poles accused of hiding them. All were shot and buried on the grounds of Sokołów's elementary school. According to a survivor's testimony, one Jewish man was killed in Sokołów after the end of the war, as he was accused of having been a member of the Jewish Police—an allegation that the survivor deemed to be false.¹³

SOURCES There is no single publication describing in detail the fate of the Jews of Sokołów Małopolski. Brief descriptions of the destruction of the community can be found in Andrzej Potocki, Żydzi w Podkarpaciu (Rzeszów: Libra, 2004), p. 181; and Abraham Wein and Aharon Weiss, eds., Pinkas ha-kehillot. Encyclopaedia of Jewish Communities: Poland, vol. 3, Galicia and Western Silesia (Jerusalem: Yad Vashem, 1984), pp. 276–278.

Documentation and testimonies can be found in the following archives: AŻIH (210/645 [AJDC]; 211/983 and 211/931 [JSS]; and 301/4968 [Relacje]); USHMM (RG-15.019M [ASG]; Acc.1999.A.0154 [AJDC]; and Acc.1997.A.0124 [JSS]); USHMPA (CD no. 0409, WS # N64867); and VHF (# 30185).

Jolanta Kraemer

NOTES

1. Gazeta Żydowska, December 20, 1940; USHMM, Acc.1999.A.0154 (AJDC), 210/645, pp. 1, 3, 7, 11, 23; Stanisław Poradowski, “Zagłada Żydów rzeszowskich. Part 2,” BŻIH, nos. 1–2 (1984): 97.

2. USHMM, RG-15.019M (ASG Sokołów Małopolski); AŻIH, 301/4968.

3. Gazeta Żydowska, December 20, 1940; USHMM, Acc. 1999.A.0154, 210/645, pp. 1, 21, 24–26, 28.

4. Gazeta Żydowska, May 15, 1942; USHMM, Acc.1999.A.0154, 210/645, pp. 14, 24; Acc.1997.A.0124 (JSS), reel 47, 211/983, pp. 1, 3.

5. Franciszek Kotula, Losy Żydów rzeszowskich 1939–1945: Kronika tamtych dni (Rzeszów: Społeczny Komitet Wydania Dzieł Franciszka Kotuli, 1999), pp. 68–69; USHMM, Acc.1997.A.0124, reel 45, 211/931, p. 13.

6. VHF, # 30185, testimony of Israel Friedman, 1997.

7. Kolbuszowa Memorial Book, available at www.jewishgen.org (a translation of I.M. Biderman, ed., Pinkas Kolbushov [New York: United Kolbushover, 1971]), pp. 55–88.

8. USHMPA, CD no. 0409, WS # N64867; USHMM, RG-15.019M (ASG); Acc.1997.A.0124, reel 47, 211/983, p. 24; Gazeta Żydowska, December 20, 1940.

9. USHMM, RG-15.019M (ASG); Kolbuszowa Memorial Book, pp. 55–88.

10. See AŻIH, 301/4968; VHF, # 30185.

11. Czesław Pilichowski et al., eds., Obozy hitlerowskie na ziemiach polskich 1939–1945: Informator encyklopedyczny (Warsaw: PWN, 1979), p. 462.

12. Stanisław Poradowski, “Zagłada Żydów rzeszowskich. Part 3,” BŻIH, nos. 3–4 (1985): 99.

13. AŻIH, 301/4968; Rejestr miejsc i faktów zbrodni popełnionych przez okupanta hitlerowskiego na ziemiach polskich w latach 1939–1945: Województwo rzeszowskie (Warsaw: GKB-ZHwP, 1984), p. 177.

STARY SĄCZ

Pre-1939: Stary Sącz, town, Nowy Sącz powiat, Kraków województwo, Poland; 1939–1945: Alt-Sandez, Kreis Neu-Sandez, Distrikt Krakau, Generalgouvernement; post-1998: Stary Sącz, województwo małopolskie, Poland

Stary Sącz is located about 85 kilometers (53 miles) southeast of Kraków. On the eve of World War II, there were about 434 Jews living in the town.¹

German armed forces occupied Stary Sącz on September 5, 1939. At the end of October, the town became part of Kreis Neu-Sandez, administered by Kreishauptmann Dr. Reinhard Busch. A Border Police Office (Grenzpolizeikommissariat, GPK) was established in Nowy Sącz and headed from 1940 by SS-Obersturmführer Heinrich Hamann. A unit of Polish (Blue) Police, stationed in Stary Sącz, was commanded by a Viennese official named Neumann. The Germans conscripted Jews for forced labor, mainly cleaning streets, washing latrines, and performing other degrading work. A curfew was imposed on the Jews. A Judenrat was established in the town in the fall of 1939.²

Up to the beginning of 1940, Jews were permitted to remain in their own houses unless the house was on one of the main streets, from which all Jews were evicted as Jews were not permitted to use them. In 1940, the Germans confiscated Jewish houses and businesses. At the end of 1940 and in the first half of 1941, the Kreishauptmann ordered that all Jews living in the smaller towns and villages must move to one of five major towns in the Kreis: Nowy Sącz, Stary Sącz, Limanowa, Mszana Dolna, or Grybów. By 1942, leaving the residential area without permission was punishable by death.³

In 1941, the Germans began to concentrate the Jews in one area on the outskirts of Stary Sącz. Jews from nearby villages and smaller towns, including Krynica, Stadło, Piwniczna, and Rytro, were brought into the town. About 1,000 Jews lived in the crowded Jewish area in the northern part of town, which became an open ghetto. It was administered by the Judenrat and policed internally by the Jewish Police, with Polish (Blue) Police acting as external guards. Due to the prohibition on leaving the ghetto and the meager food rations supplied, many Jews engaged in black market activities. The Germans also prohibited Jews from religious observance, but some Jews held clandestine religious services.⁴

According to a report by the Stary Sącz branch of the Jewish Social Self-Help (JSS) for the period from June 26 to July 15, 1941, the Judenrat had registered 1,024 Jews, of which more than half had arrived since the start of the occupation. These included 33 merchants, 25 skilled workers, 4 farmers, 5 self-employed individuals, 43 forced laborers, and 257 unemployed. Some 85 Jews were receiving aid. Based on the community kitchen's report for October 1941, the kitchen distributed paid and unpaid meals to 231 Jews, but 298 more people had applied for assistance.⁵

The Germans intensified their persecution of the Jews during 1941. On September 13, 1941, the Germans shot 20 Jewish women in the Miejska Góra Forest.⁶ On December 13, 1941, a renewed order was issued commanding Jews to wear armbands with the Star of David. The armband had to specify the person's last name, address, and town of residence.⁷ At the end of December 1941, the Germans ordered that the Jews surrender any fur items and hard currency.⁸

On January 6, 1942, the Kreishauptmann announced that Jews could not leave their area of residence without the approval of either his office (Kreisamt) or the labor office (Arbeitsamt). Jews had to obtain an approval from the Kreishauptmann for travel by rail. In the spring or summer of 1942, the Jews from Kreis Neu-Sandez were ordered to hand over to the Germans a contribution of 140,000 złoty, furs, large amounts of tea and coffee, and 500 pots. Somehow the Judenrat in Stary Sącz managed to scrape together their share of this harsh German demand.⁹

On August 14, 1942, the Germans ordered conscripted Poles of the Construction Service (Baudienst) to dig a large ditch in a field near the Poprad River. The Germans sent an order via the Judenrat that all Jews must assemble at the cattle market in the early hours of August 15, 1942. The Order Police and Gestapo from Nowy Sącz carried out the Aktion. A selection was made in the course of which at least 70 people who were elderly, sick, or otherwise unfit for work were sent to one side. They were taken to the mass grave near the Poprad River and shot. The Germans also selected about 140 people from the mass of Jews for three labor detachments, issuing them special work cards stamped by the GPK in Nowy Sącz. One group consisting of 35 people was taken on trucks to perform forced labor at the HOBAG factory in Rytró just to the south of Stary Sącz. A second group, also of 35 people, became the cleanup group (Aufräumkommando) that remained in Stary Sącz to sort the clothes and other possessions of the Jews. Another work group consisting of 70 men was marched off to the Piekło ghetto in Nowy Sącz. The remaining group of more than 300 Jews was escorted by Jewish Police to the closed ghetto on Kazimierz Street in Nowy Sącz.¹⁰ The Germans deported the majority of the Jews from the two Nowy Sącz ghettos to the Bełżec extermination camp between August 24 and August 28, 1942.

SOURCES Publications dealing with the persecution and murder of the Jews in Stary Sącz include "Stary Sącz," in Abraham Wein and Aharon Weiss, eds., Pinkas ha-kehillot. Encyclopedia of Jewish Communities: Poland, vol. 3, Galia and Western Silesia (Jerusalem: Yad Vashem, 1984), pp. 278–280; and Justiz und NS-Verbrechen, vol. 24 (Amsterdam: Amsterdam University Press 1998), Lfd. Nr. 635, pp. 269–484 (LG-Bo, 16 Ks 1/65, verdict against Heinrich Hamann and others).

Documents on the fate of the Jews in Stary Sącz can be found in the following archives: AŻIH (301/1895); IPN;

USHMM (Acc. 1995.A.228; Acc.1997.A.0124 [JSS], reel 47; RG-02.070*01; RG-15.019M, reel 4; RG-50.106*0008; RG-50.002*0156); VHF (# 291, 9874, 10710, 11490, 20997); and YVA.

Joanna Śliwa

NOTES

1. USHMM, Acc. 1997.A.0124, reel 47, report for the period June 26 to July 15, 1941, by the Stary Sącz branch of the JSS.

2. A. Krawczyk, "Hitlerowski aparat okupacyjny na sądecku," in Okupacja w Sądecku: Praca zbiorowa (Warsaw: Ministerstwo Sprawiedliwości, Główna Komisja Badania Zbrodni Hitlerowskich w Polsce, 1979), pp. 67, 72, 187; VHF, # 10710, testimony of Moses Goldberg.

3. JuNS-V, vol. 24, Lfd. Nr. 635, pp. 308, 347; Witold Rawski, "Dzieje okupacyjne Starego Sącza i Grybowa," in Okupacja w Sądecku, p. 193; VHF, # 10710; Rafael Mahler, ed., Seyfer Sants (Tel Aviv: Sandzer landsmanshaftn in New York, 1970), p. 769; Tatiana Berenstein et al., eds., Faschismus, Getto, Massenmord: Dokumentation über Ausrottung und Widerstand der Juden in Polen während des zweiten Weltkrieges (Berlin: Rütten & Loening, 1961), p. 99.

4. VHF, # 10710; # 11490, testimony of Leon Sperling; # 9874, testimony of Henry Sperling; # 291, testimony of Murray Goldfinger; and USHMM, RG-02.070*01, p. 4, "Leontyna Davies questionnaire." Czesław Pilichowski et al., eds., Obozy hitlerowskie na ziemiach polskich 1939–1945: Informator encyklopedyczny (Warsaw: PWN, 1979), p. 472, date the establishment of the ghetto in the spring of 1942; this may have been the time at which all Jews residing in Stary Sącz were compelled to move within the Jewish quarter.

5. USHMM, Acc.1997.A.0124, reel 47, report for the period June 26 to July 15, 1941, by the Stary Sącz JSS branch; and report of the Stary Sącz community kitchen for October 1941.

6. IPN, Ankieta GK "Egzekucje" pow. Nowy Sącz, woj. krakowski; also Alert ZHP, t. VII, z. 12, k. 19.

7. Rawski, "Dzieje okupacyjne Starego Sącza i Grybowa," p. 193.

8. JuNS-V, vol. 24, Lfd. Nr. 635, p. 328.

9. Rawski, "Dzieje okupacyjne Starego Sącza i Grybowa," p. 193. Shlomo Zalman Lehrer and Leizer Strassman, The Vanished City of Tsanz (Southfield, MI: Targum, 1997), p. 309, date the demand for a large contribution in early August 1942.

10. JuNS-V, vol. 24, Lfd. Nr. 635, pp. 385–387; Rawski, "Dzieje okupacyjne Starego Sącza i Grybowa," pp. 193–194; USHMM, RG-15.019M, reel 4, "Kwestionariusz o egzekucjach masowych i grobach masowych," doc. 483. Lehrer and Strassman, The Vanished City of Tsanz, p. 310, give the number of Jews shot in Stary Sącz as 100 to 150, and the number of workers sent to the open ghetto in Nowy Sącz as 40.

STRZYŻÓW

Pre-1939: Strzyżów, town, Rzeszów powiat, Lwów województwo, Poland; 1939–1944: Strzyżów, Kreis Reichshof, Distrikt Krakau, Generalgouvernement; post-1998: Strzyżów, województwo podkarpackie, Poland

Strzyżów is located about 32 kilometers (20 miles) southwest of Rzeszów. On the eve of World War II, there were 1,300 Jewish residents in the town.

On September 8, 1939, German forces occupied Strzyżów. Maltreatment, plundering, and killings began almost immediately.

A detachment of German Order Police was established in Strzyżów under the command of Hauptmann Otto Koeller and his deputy Wilhelm Kopf. Their subordinates included Hugo Drewitz, Hans Hoffmann, and Wiktor Waszek (Waschek). The latter was especially sadistic towards Jews and was sentenced to 10 years in prison by Rzeszów's Provincial Court after the war. Hauptmann Koeller often carried out executions himself; Polish partisans shot him in Zaborów on July 3, 1944.

A Jewish Council (Judenrat) was established by the new authorities and was chaired by Abraham Braw. The Jewish Council included Yacov (Jakub) Rosen, Aaron Deutsch, Elimielech Waldman, and a manufacturer from Łódź, Zygmunt Schinagiel. By May 1940, Avigdor Diamant was appointed the Judenrat's treasurer, and by November 1940, Nussbaum was also included on the council. Besides Strzyżów proper, the Judenrat was also responsible for the following settlements: Bonarówka, Żyznów, Wysoka, Żarnowa, Grodzisko, and Łętownia.

Itzhok Berglass, the author of the chapter on the Holocaust in the Strzyżów yizkor book who actually spent the war years in Russia, reports that the Judenrat behaved decently towards the town's Jews, doing all that it could to ameliorate the impact of German decrees. Of the two Jewish Police in Strzyżów, only one extorted money from his fellow Jews.¹

On December 15, 1939, the Kreishauptmann in Reichshof sent 247 refugees to Strzyżów, most of whom originally were from Łódź and Kalisz. A commission for refugees was set up within the Judenrat; however, it soon ran into debt trying to provide for their sustenance and housing. The numerous sick among the refugees generated further costs at the local pharmacy and with a private doctor. A few patients had to be sent to the general hospital in Rzeszów. By the end of January 1940, over 60 of them had left Strzyżów.

In the following months the number of refugees steadily diminished by about 20 people a month, as newcomers chose to leave Strzyżów to join their families in other places in the Generalgouvernement or were simply forced to leave owing to the deterioration of living conditions in the town. The Strzyżów Judenrat provided them with funds for their journeys.

By April 1940, there were 1,238 Jews (i.e., approximately 210 families) in Strzyżów; only 140 of them were refugees and deportees. Among them there were 34 Jews from places in Germany (including Stuttgart, Cologne, and Hamburg) and Upper Silesia. In July 1940, only 126 refugees remained in Strzyżów, half of the original number.

By June 1940, 60 to 70 percent of Jewish-owned shops in Strzyżów had been closed down. Jews were no longer receiving their ration cards. Prices of food were high—for example, a 2-kilogram (4.4-pound) loaf of bread cost 5 złoty. The Strzyżów

Judenrat was responsible for sending local Jews to perform forced labor. In the autumn of 1940, 140 of them worked daily.²

On October 2, 1940, the community was informed by Kreishauptmann Ehaus to prepare for the arrival of another 80 deportees from Rzeszów. The Judenrat had a problem housing them, as German companies operating in Strzyżów were demanding more and more space.³

By November 1940, there were 1,240 Jews living in Strzyżów, including approximately 200 deportees (among them now, 58 from Kraków). Out of the total number of Jewish residents, the Judenrat estimated that 220 were less than 18 years old. A soup kitchen that issued breakfasts consisting of one roll and a glass of milk was opened for approximately 120 children daily; it operated only between October 1940 and April 1941.⁴

By June 1941, 190 Strzyżów Jews were being conscripted for labor a few days a week. They worked for two German companies: the Organisation Todt (OT) and Kirchhof. Both companies provided meager food rations and some wages, but the latter had a reputation for mistreating people. Some poorer Jews volunteered to work for food. The labor included paving roads, building tunnels, quarrying stone, and unloading freight. Jews were also forced to remove tombstones from the Jewish cemeteries to pave the marketplace, then to level them to create public space. Besides Strzyżów's Jews, 60 Jewish laborers from the Czudec and Niebylec gminas were added to the road construction brigades. Only a few Jewish men from Strzyżów were sent to labor camps during the German occupation, those camps being at Biesiadka and Pustków.

That summer, there were 32 Jewish businesses still operating, comprising mainly tailors, tinsmiths, and bakers. Apart from their owners, they employed another eight sales assistants. All Jewish farmers (a total of five families) were still able to sustain themselves from agriculture. In June 1941, the community numbered 1,243.⁵

After several outbreaks of disease in Strzyżów in the autumn of 1941, the German authorities ordered the opening of a public bath that cost an estimated 15,000 złoty, as the building had already been partially torn down to widen the street. On December 20, 1941, Kreishauptmann Ehaus announced that Strzyżów, Niebylec, and Sokołów Małopolski were quarantine areas, and all traffic was halted. By February 1942, the bath had not yet been opened. There is no information as to when the quarantine was lifted, but the material situation of the Jews deteriorated rapidly.

On December 17, 1941, the Kreishauptmann in Rzeszów ordered the establishment of Jewish quarters in the Kreis, setting dates for them to be closed. In Rzeszów, the closing order was effective on January 10, 1942; for the remainder of the Kreis, it was February 1, 1942. Soon after the latter date, an unfenced ghetto was announced for Strzyżów's Jews. None of the available sources mention that Jews had to move to a designated area; therefore, they were probably allowed to remain where they were living. This, and the fact that Jews had been forbidden to leave Strzyżów since mid-1940, meant that their situation did not change dramatically with the ghetto's establishment, especially since the recent quarantine measures had already largely cut them off from the outside world.

In the summer of 1942, Strzyżów's Judenrat tried to halt the expulsion order to the Rzeszów ghetto. Hauptmann Koeller promised to delay the deportation for a few grams of gold. Strzyżów's Jews managed to collect it with the help of the Jews of Krosno. But the moment the bribe was delivered, the Germans set the date for the deportation Aktion.⁶

German forces probably liquidated the Strzyżów ghetto on June 26–28, 1942, as most of the ghettos in the Kreis were emptied at this time and their residents transferred to the Rzeszów ghetto.

It is known, however, that although there was a train station in Strzyżów, its Jews were deported to Rzeszów on carts, for which Hauptmann Koeller ordered them to pay. Tadeusz Sztetela, a Polish Catholic and resident of Strzyżów, remembers how peasants with their wagons arrived in the town square. Jews loaded their belongings onto the wagons, as they were allowed to take everything with them, and quickly headed towards Rzeszów because the Germans had announced that any Jew found in the town after 6:00 P.M. would be shot on the spot. On the way to Rzeszów, the elderly and infirm were killed by the Germans.⁷

The bulk of Strzyżów's Jews were most likely sent to the Bełżec extermination camp in July 1942 during the deportations from the Rzeszów ghetto.⁸

SOURCES Publications dealing with the persecution and murder of the Jews in Strzyżów include the following: Itzhok Berglass and Shlomo Yahalomi-Diamand, eds., The Book of Strzyżów and Vicinity, trans. Harry Langsam (Los Angeles: "Natives of Strzyżów Societies" in Israel and the Diaspora, 1990). An unpublished work dealing with the history and the persecution of the Jews in Strzyżów was also consulted in preparing this entry: Zofia Rusek and Danuta Skóra, "Społeczność żydowska w dawnym Strzyżowie i okolicy—historia i wspomnienia" (Strzyżów, 2006).

Documents on the fate of the Jews in Strzyżów can be found in the following archives: AŻIH (210/663 [AJDC]; 211/925, 932, 933, and 995 [JSS]; 301/899 [Relacje]); IPN (Dsn 13/11/68/"W" 922); USHMM (RG-15.019M [ASG], reel 11; Acc.1997.A.0124 [JSS], reels 44 and 47; Acc.1999.A.0154 [AJDC]); USHMPA (WS # N64867); and YVA.

Joanna Śliwa and Jolanta Kraemer

NOTES

1. USHMM, Acc.1997.A.0124 (JSS Strzyżów), reel 47, 211/995, pp. 8, 30; Acc.1999.A.0154 (AJDC Strzyżów), 210/663, pp. 27, 54; I. Berglass, "The Second World War," in Berglass and Yahalomi-Diamand, The Book of Strzyżów, p. 238.

2. USHMM, Acc.1999.A.0154, 210/663, pp. 1–2, 4, 6, 10, 12, 15, 18, 21, 29, 35, 40.

3. Ibid., pp. 46, 55; Acc.1997.A.0124, reel 47, 211/995, p. 8.

4. Ibid., Acc.1997.A.0124, reel 47, 211/995, pp. 7–9, 14.

5. Ibid., Acc.1997.A.0124 (JSS Rzeszów), reel 44, 211/925, p. 18, and reel 47, 211/995, pp. 3, 13–14; and Berglass, "The Second World War," pp. 233, 239.

6. Berglass, "The Second World War," p. 242.

7. AŻIH, 301/899, testimony of Samuel Rozen, 1945. Czesław Pilichowski et al., eds., Obozy hitlerowskie na ziemiach polskich 1939–1945: Informator encyklopedyczny (Warsaw: PWN, 1979), pp. 477–478, date the ghetto liquidation in July 1942. Also see Berglass, "The Second World War," pp. 242–243, 245; Tadeusz Sztetela, Dzieje Dobrzeczuwa, opowieść o rodzinnej wsi (Rzeszów-Dobrzeczuw, 2003).

8. Stanisław Poradowski, "Zagłada Żydów rzeszowskich, part 3," BŻIH, nos. 3–4, 1985: 99.

TARNOBRZEG

Pre-1939: Tarnobrzeg, town and powiat center, Lwów województwo, Poland; 1939–1945: Kreis Debica, Distrikt Krakau, Generalgouvernement; post-1998: powiat center, województwo podkarpackie, Poland

Tarnobrzeg is located about 140 kilometers (87 miles) northeast of Kraków. In 1939, around 2,800 Jews were living in Tarnobrzeg.

In mid-September 1939, German armed forces occupied the town. Within a week of their arrival, the initial German military administration introduced a program of forced labor for the Jews, which involved road repairs and other heavy manual labor, accompanied by beatings.¹ In October 1939, Tarnobrzeg was incorporated into Kreis Debica, within Distrikt Krakau in the Generalgouvernement. The office of the Security Police and SD in Dębica was primarily responsible for the implementation of anti-Jewish Aktionen in the Kreis, assisted by forces of the German Order Police (Schutzpolizei) and Gendarmerie) and the Polish (Blue) Police.

In September 1939, immediately following the occupation of the town, soldiers of the Wehrmacht killed 5 Jews.² By the end of September 1939, a number of Jews from neighboring towns and other Jewish refugees began to concentrate in Tarnobrzeg. In October 1939, the Germans ordered all the Jews to assemble in the marketplace (Rynek), bringing with them all their valuable belongings. More than 4,000 people gathered in the Rynek; members of the SS lined the Jews up in rows, at the end of which there was a table manned by a German officer. The Jews were then robbed of all their valuable possessions and brutally beaten. They were stripped naked, medically examined by a doctor, and forced to sign a document, declaring their voluntary evacuation from the town.³ Subsequently the Jews were divided into groups of 500 to 600 people and were marched towards Radomyśl nad Sanem, just across the San River, more than 35 kilometers (22 miles) to the east. After marching for three days in the pouring rain, those who arrived at the riverbank were forced onto rafts by members of the Gestapo and pushed into the water. Many people drowned, and those who turned back seeking help, including women and children, were shot at by the Gestapo. During this expulsion Aktion, dozens of Jews were killed or drowned in the river. Most made it across to Radomyśl but soon were forced to move on in the direction of Lwów, as the area around Radomyśl was about to be handed over to the Germans. A few hundred of the Jewish expellees from Tarnobrzeg subsequently returned to the town in the period up to the summer of 1941. Most of those who remained under Soviet rule were deported to the Soviet interior in 1940 or 1941, an action that may have saved their lives.⁴

German soldiers search Jews in Tarnobrzeg, before permitting their crossing of the San River into then-Soviet territory, September 1939. USHMM WS #50874, COURTESY OF IPN

In Tarnobrzeg, the Kreishauptmann ordered the formation of a Jewish Council (Judenrat) headed by Aron Tannenbaum. Its main task was the allocation of Jews for forced labor, repairing the road from Tarnobrzeg to Ćmielów. The Jews worked for a private firm and were taken to the site each day in motorized transport. They also received wages for their work, which enabled them to buy some food from the peasants. The Germans took the synagogue and the Bet Midrash and used them for storage purposes.⁵ In November 1940, the Jewish Council issued a desperate appeal for help to the Jewish Social Self-Help (JSS) based in Kraków, as the Jewish population in Tarnobrzeg consisted mainly of deportees, who had no means to repair their apartments and had to live under almost inhuman conditions. Aid was also needed to buy food and clothing.⁶ In February 1941, 320 Jews were reportedly living in the town.⁷

According to the yizkor book, the Jews were not confined within an enclosed ghetto but lived in a Jewish quarter (Judenviertel) or open ghetto, which consisted of part of the market square and some of the houses behind it.⁸ According to one source, the ghetto was created in June 1941. Towards the end of 1941 and in the first half of 1942, the number of residents increased due to an influx of Jews evacuated from towns such as Jarosław, Rozwadów, and the surrounding villages. Around this time, 1 Jew was shot for being outside the town without permission. Another Jew was shot in the street by the SS. It is estimated that about 12 Jews were shot altogether before the ghetto's liquidation.⁹

In July 1942, the Germans liquidated the open ghetto in Tarnobrzeg. Rumors of an imminent deportation spread when the Jews from nearby Grębów were brought to Tarnobrzeg and locked in the synagogue. Fearing the worst, the Jews of Tarno-brzeg prayed or sought to escape or hide. However, all escape routes were already cut off by the SS. On July 19, in the early hours of the morning, the SS and Gendarmerie drove the Jews out of their houses and conducted a selection. The elderly and sick people were taken to the old Jewish cemetery, where they were killed. The remaining Jews were escorted in the pouring rain initially to the town of Baranów Sandomierski; then subsequently, on July 21–22, they were sent from there to the ghetto in Dębica. On July 24, most of the remaining Jews from Tarnobrzeg were included in the transport from Dębica to the extermination camp in Bełżec.¹⁰

The available sources also mention a Jewish forced labor camp in Tarnobrzeg established in the spring of 1941. It was located in the rabbinate and a nearby barracks on Szeroka Street and housed between 40 and several hundred inmates. The workers were mainly involved in road construction for the Bermann Company. Polish sources date the liquidation of this camp in the fall of 1942, but survivor Don Spira recalls being transferred from the Tarnobrzeg labor camp to another camp in Mielec in August or September 1942.¹¹

SOURCES Further information on the history and the fate of the Jewish population of Tarnobrzeg can be found in the following publications: Y.Y. Flaisher, ed., Kehilat Tarnobrzeg-Dzikov (Galitsyah ha-ma-aravit) (Tel Aviv: Irgun Yotse Tarnubzig-Dzikov be-Yisrael, 1973); Abraham Wein and Aharon Weiss, eds., Pinkas ha-kehillot. Encyclopaedia of Jewish Communities: Poland, vol. 3, Galicia and Western Silesia (Jerusalem: Yad Vashem, 1984), pp. 191–194.

Documentation on the persecution and destruction of the Jewish community of Tarnobrzeg can be found in the following archives: AŻIH (301/242, 3212, and 3473); USHMM (RG-15.019M, reel 11; and Acc.1997.A.0124, reel 47 [AŻIH, JSS, 211/1015]); VHF (# 3189 and 25386); and YVA (e.g., M-1/E/2395).

Caterina Crisci

NOTES

1. AŻIH, 301/3212, testimony of Hersz Engelberg.
2. USHMM, RG-15.019M, reel 11.
3. AŻIH, 301/242, testimony of O. Kalech, states that 4,500 Jews assembled at the market square and 4,000 arrived in Radomyśl, but in view of the town's pre-war population (estimated at 2,800), these numbers are probably too high. Also see AŻIH, 301/3212; VHF, # 3189, testimony of Pola Schlenger; Flaisher, Kehillat Tarnobrzeg-Dzikov, pp. 302–303.
4. AŻIH, 301/242; and Flaisher, Kehillat Tarnobrzeg-Dzikov, pp. 306–307.
5. Flaisher, Kehillat Tarnobrzeg-Dzikov, pp. 311–312. This source also names several other members of the Judenrat.
6. USHMM, Acc.1997.A.0124, reel 47 (AŻIH, JSS), 211/1015, Judenrat Tarnobrzeg to the JSS in Kraków, November 16, 1940.
7. AŻIH, 301/242.
8. Flaisher, Kehillat Tarnobrzeg-Dzikov, p. 311. Evidence from the archives of the JSS also confirms the existence of a Jewish “quarter” (dzielnica); see AŻIH, JSS, 211/1015.
9. Flaisher, Kehillat Tarnobrzeg-Dzikov, p. 312; Czesław Pilichowski et al., eds., Obozy hitlerowskie na ziemiach polskich

1939–1945: Informator encyklopedyczny (Warsaw: PWN, 1979), p. 514.

10. Flaisher, Kebillat Tarnobrzeg-Dzikov, pp. 312–313; AŻIH, 301/242. It appears that a few of the able-bodied Jews in Tarnobrzeg were transferred to the Mielec forced labor camp, either from the ghetto (via Dębica) or from the Tarnobrzeg forced labor camp.

11. Pilichowski et al., Obozy hitlerowskie, p. 514; VHF, # 25386, testimony of Don Spira.

TARNÓW

Pre-1939: Tarnów, city, Kraków województwo, Poland; 1939–1945: Tarnow, Kreis center, Distrikt Krakau, Generalgouvernement; post-1998: Tarnów, województwo małopolskie, Poland

Tarnów is located about 90 kilometers (56 miles) east of Kraków. On the outbreak of World War II, about 25,000 Jews (45 percent of the city's population) were residing in the city.

German armed forces occupied the city on September 7, 1939. Ernst Kundt became the first Kreishauptmann, with

Walter Heinrich as his deputy. In December 1940, Ludwig Stitzinger replaced Kundt as Kreishauptmann, to be succeeded in January 1942 by Dr. Kipke. The headquarters of the Gestapo, Order Police, and Sonderdienst were all in the city, as it was the Kreis center. On September 9–11, 1939, the Germans burned down all the synagogues and shtiblekh (prayer houses) in Tarnów. By an order issued on October 20, 1939, the Jews of Tarnów had to wear the Star of David on their clothes. In November 1939, Jewish bank accounts were blocked; on November 12, 1939, the Germans ordered Jews to mark their businesses and the entrances to cafés and restaurants with a white Star of David painted on the buildings. The penalty for disobeying the order was 10 year's imprisonment and a fine; after the creation of the ghetto, the penalty was death. Jews aged 14 to 60 had to enlist for forced labor. Jewish schools and institutions were closed. In the first weeks of the war, many Jews fled to the Soviet occupation zone.¹

In November 1939, the Germans appointed a Jewish Council (Judenrat) in Tarnów. Initially, it was chaired by a former head of the Jewish community, Dr. Józef Offner, who quickly resigned. The next chairman, Dawid Lenkowicz, and another Judenrat member, Ruwen Waksman, escaped to Lwów. A new Judenrat was appointed in 1940, headed by Dr. Szlomo Goldberg and Dr. Wolf Schenkel, who were both arrested by the Germans and sent to the Auschwitz concentration camp. Eventually, Artur Volkman became chairman of the Judenrat. The Judenrat was entrusted with preparing lists of Jews for forced labor and handling social issues. It also provided assistance to inmates of the Pustków labor camp.²

From the beginning of January 1940, Jews were prohibited from moving to other towns, traveling, or using the main streets. They were restricted from entering districts north of Krakowska and Wałowa Streets and west of Brodziński Street. In time, they were also prohibited from looking out of their windows onto certain streets. Jews had to clear the streets of snow and garbage. In April 1940, Jews were forbidden to enter public parks; and on April 17, 1940, a curfew was imposed on the Jews, who could remain outside only until 9:00 p.m. In the spring of 1940, the Germans demanded a ransom of 500,000 złoty from the Jewish community, which it managed to collect in the hope of easing the restrictions. In June 1940, the Germans publicly destroyed Jewish prayer shawls and religious books. The Jews were prohibited from performing the ritual slaughter of animals. In the summer of 1940, the Jews were assembled in the town's square while the Germans plundered their homes. On June 13, 1940, the Germans arrested 753 men in Tarnów, among them 5 prominent Jews. The next day, 728 men were sent on a cattle train to Auschwitz. The "Tarnovian" prisoners were tattooed with numbers from 31 to 758 and marked the beginning of the Auschwitz concentration camp. Almost 200 of them survived; none of these survivors were Jews.³

On August 7, 1940, the wealthier Jews who lived on Kraków and Wałowa Streets received an order to move out of their houses within 12 hours and move to the eastern part of the city—Grabówka, which was inhabited mostly by poorer

A Jewish woman wearing a Jewish star walks on the streets of Tarnów, 1939.

USHMM WS #13538, COURTESY OF IPN

Jews. This was the first step towards the creation of a ghetto, but it was not completed until early in 1942.

On the order of Stadtkommissar Dr. Hein, on October 16, 1941, the wearing of beards and side locks by Jews was forbidden for “sanitary reasons.” For violating the order, a fine of 100 złoty and a 14-day arrest were imposed. At this time, Jews were also banned from the following streets in Tarnów: Kraków, Jasna, Marktstrasse, Wallstrasse, Cathedralstrasse including Kazimierz Square to the circle, the Kleinen and Grossen Treppe, Bastei Treppe, Fischgasse, and Festungsgasse. It was forbidden for Jews to come closer than 100 meters (109 yards) to those streets. The presence of Jews in the whole western part of the city now was strictly forbidden. Some Jews who lived there could only enter the eastern part of the city from the southern pathway on Narutowicz, Lipowa, or Mickiewicz Streets; the Jews who lived near the circle could access it through Brama Pilźnieńska. Going to work located on the forbidden streets was possible only by taking the nearest adjacent cross streets. This order forced most of the Jews to move into the Grabówka district in the east of the city.⁴

On October 16, 1941, the Germans created a Jewish Police unit consisting of about 300 policemen. The Jewish Police was headed by Miller, then Wasserman, and finally by Diestler. Diestler was a German Jew who had held the rank of captain in the Austrian army. His brutality was much feared among Jews. The Jewish Police was located in the building of a bus depot at Magdeburg Square.⁵

In the winter of 1941–1942, the Jews had to surrender all fur clothing, winter boots, and skis on pain of death. From December 1, 1941, Jews were prohibited from receiving food packages. A German police officer, Grunow, came to Tarnów and staged an Aktion against the Jews on December 8, 1941: over 100 Jews were arrested, 17 of whom were shot, and the rest were released after a few days. According to the Jewish Social Self-Help (JSS) report, in 1939, 285 children were born, while the death rate was 172 people. By comparison, in 1941, 235 children were born, and the death toll was 540 people.⁶

Most sources date the completion of the ghettoization process in Tarnów in February 1942.⁷ The Germans established an open ghetto in Tarnów that encompassed the following area: left side of Lwów Street; Pod Dębem Square; and Nowa, Folwarczna, Szpitalna, Polna, and Jasna Streets. There were four entrances to the ghetto: two at Magdeburg Square, the third at Pod Dębem Square, and the fourth at Folwarczna Street, near the Judenrat building.⁸

Until 1942, the Jews had managed to live as normally as they could in such circumstances. They were still able to bury the dead at the Jewish cemetery. At the beginning of 1942, all Jews had to register with the German authorities. In 1942, through March 20, there were 251 reported deaths in the ghetto. Death resulted from hunger, exhaustion, an epidemic of typhus, and random shootings. The people felt endangered. The streets were empty by 6:00 P.M. Around 9,500 Jews were receiving social help; the four community kitchens distributed around 7,000 meals per day; there were 78 children in the orphanage; and 51 people resided in the home for the elderly.⁹

On April 1, 1942, on the eve of Passover, the German officers Grunow and SS-Sturmscharführer Wilhelm Rommelmann, on noticing a Jewish woman selling poultry, demanded to know who had performed the slaughter. The Germans stormed into the house of Lipa, a shochet (ritual slaughterer), and killed him and his family. The Jewish community was deeply affected by the incident, and many stopped eating meat. On April 24, 56 Jews were murdered following their return to Tarnów from Lwów. In May, the Germans demanded from the Judenrat 500,000 złoty and furniture sufficient for 500 German apartments. At the end of May, the head of the Jewish Police received an order from the Germans to increase the size of the police force.¹⁰

On June 10, 1942, the registration of the Jewish population of Tarnów was completed. Two notices then appeared: the first, signed by SS-Untersturmführer Palten, informed them about the resettlement of the Jews from Tarnów, apart from the hospital staff and the Jews whose identification cards had been stamped; the second notice, signed by SS-Obergruppenführer Julian Scherner, announced that anyone providing aid to the Jews of Tarnów upon their resettlement would be punished by death. The notice also specified that on June 11, 1942, no Jews were to leave their houses, but the houses should remain open. During the first Aktion of June 11–18, which was directed by Kriminalsekretär Wilhelm Rommelmann (who was tried by a Polish court and executed in 1948), German and Ukrainian auxiliary units shot around 6,000 Jews, mainly the sick, the elderly, and children, in the Buczyna Forest at Zbylitowska Góra; they also sent around 3,500 Jews to the Bełżec extermination camp and shot around 3,000 Jews at the Jewish cemetery in Tarnów. Following this Aktion, the ghetto was considerably reduced in size.¹¹

On June 19, 1942, Stadthauptmann Gustaw Hackbarth announced the creation of an enclosed ghetto for the remaining Jews in Tarnów. According to the decree, 20,000 Jews, as well as Jewish converts, had to move into the ghetto within 48 hours. From the house on 16 Lwowska Street, the borders of the ghetto ran through the following streets: Zamknięta, Szpitalna, Jasna through Polna Street, right side of Goldhammera, Drukarska, Nowa, to Folwarczna Streets. The area was sealed off with barbed wire. There were four guarded gates leading to the ghetto: two of them at Magdeburg Square, the third at Folwarczna Street, and the fourth at the Pod Dębem Square. Polish (Blue) Police guarded the ghetto externally, and Jewish Police guarded it on the inside. The ghetto was administered by SS-Oberscharführer Hermann Blache, who lived at 24 Lwowska Street. The Jews were prohibited from leaving the ghetto on pain of death. There was a Jewish post office inside the ghetto directed by Bronisława Perlberg. The death penalty also applied for making contact with the Polish population. Some Jews, like Mania Korn, Dr. Lustig, and Ms. Organd, were killed by the Germans for contacting Poles. Jews had to perform forced labor inside and outside the ghetto. Food was scarce, but some people managed to smuggle it in on their return from external work details. There was an orphanage run by Dr. Lieblich, four community kitchens, and a branch of the JSS; and a Jewish hospital section, which treated patients with tuberculosis, was run by Dr. Eugeniusz Schipper.¹²

After the ghetto was established, there were about 40,000 Jews, including Jews from Tarnów and its vicinity, about 3,000 refugees from Kraków (639 of whom were resettled between March 3, 1941, and December 28, 1941), as well as Jews from Austria, Czechoslovakia, and Germany. The Jews organized their own associations of craftsmen that produced items for the Germans. Work details outside the ghetto were escorted by either the German or Polish (Blue) Police. The workers received little payment, and those who did not work received no official help. The German companies using ghetto labor included Papapol, Bon Boveru, Ostbahn, and Madritsch, among others.¹³

On September 11, 1942, another registration of the Jewish population took place. Some of those who did not get a work stamp sought help with the artisan Raba, who forged stamps for a nominal fee. During the second Aktion on September 12, 1942, which was orchestrated by Rommelmann, the ghetto was surrounded by German and Polish (Blue) Police units. Jews were ordered to assemble at the Magdeburgski Square. After the initial selection, another selection was made in which every tenth Jew was picked out for deportation. Nineteen-year-old Mosze Alban resisted a German by spitting and hitting him, after which the German shot him. On September 13, 1942, around 3,500 Jews were deported to Bełżec. Overall, close to 8,000 Jews from ghettos in Tarnów, Brzesko, Dąbrowa Tarnowska, Tuchów, Zakliczyn, and Żabno were deported to Bełżec.¹⁴

The third Aktion took place on November 15, 1942. A few days earlier, a notice appeared announcing that Jews who were hiding in nearby towns and villages could safely enter the Tarnów ghetto. On the day of the Aktion, the Polish (Blue) Police surrounded the ghetto while the Germans rounded up 2,500 Jews, whom they sent to Bełżec. On November 16, 1942, SS-Oberscharführer Blache ordered that the ghetto be divided into ghetto A (for the elderly, children, and people without permanent work) and ghetto B (for all Jews with permanent work papers). The ghettos were divided by a fence. Movement between ghettos was strictly prohibited. There was starvation in ghetto A, but Jews from ghetto B provided clandestine help. By November 1942, all the smaller ghettos in Kreis Tarnow had been liquidated. The Jews who had to clear the area of the former ghettos were transferred to the remaining larger ghettos, including Tarnów, in which around 12,000 Jews were concentrated. Further movement restrictions were imposed on the Jews remaining in the Tarnów ghetto. New armbands were issued, specifying the types of companies where the Jews were working.¹⁵

There were some escapes from the ghetto. In the ghetto there was a group of young Jews from Ha-Shomer Ha-Za'ir, of which the most active were Josek Bruder, Szmulik Springer, and Melech Bienenstok. They managed to obtain weapons and make contact with the Polish underground. They also helped those Jews living outside the ghetto. Josef Birken, one of the leaders, and his sister Franka forged Aryan papers. Another form of resisting the enemy was observance of forbidden religious practices. For example, Sam Goetz's parents prepared a celebration of his Bar Mitzvah on June 21, 1941.¹⁶

In mid-August 1943, SS-Hauptsturmführer Amon Goeth arrived in Tarnów to liquidate the ghetto. On September 2, 1943, in the early morning, German and Latvian units surrounded the ghetto and removed the internal fence dividing it in two. The Jews were ordered to assemble on Magdeburgski Square. They were notified that they were being sent to the Płaszów camp. Children could not be taken, but mothers secretly smuggled their children with them on the transport. The final roundup and deportation Aktion was conducted on September 2–3, 1943, during which Goeth displayed inhuman cruelty towards the Jews (he was tried in a Polish court and hanged in 1946). About 8,000 Jews were sent to Auschwitz; 3,000 were sent to Płaszów; and a group of 300 young and strong Jews were selected to clean out the ghetto (Säuberungskolonie, a purge column).¹⁷

The 300 Jews were located in two buildings at 13 and 14 Szpitalna Street, which constituted the last closed area of the Tarnów ghetto. The Ukrainian guards locked the Jews in the houses after they returned from work. The population of the ghetto increased to about 500 when some Jews came out of the bunkers a few days after the Aktion. These "illegal inhabitants" of the ghetto were shot on their way to Szeged at the end of September 1943. Also, 150 Jews who were no longer needed were taken to Szeged. The last transport of the remaining 150 Jews from Tarnów was sent to Płaszów on February 9, 1944.

Some Jews were able to hide in the Tarnów area. Around 450 Jews caught in different hiding places were assembled at Widok Street. The Germans shot them and burned their bodies. Others managed to find shelter in nearby villages and towns or lived on Aryan papers.¹⁸

SOURCES Publications dealing with the history and destruction of the Jews of Tarnów include the following: Kazimierz Bańburski, Janusz Bogacz, and Janusz Koziół, eds., Żydzi w Tarnowie. Świat, którego nie ma (Tarnów: Muzeum Okręgowe w Tarnowie, 2003); Adam Bartosz, Tarnowskie judaica (Warsaw: Wydawnictwo PTTK "Kraj," 1992); Adam Bartosz, Żydowskim szlakiem po Tarnowie: In the Footsteps of the Jews of Tarnów (Tarnów: Muzeum Okręgowe w Tarnowie, 2002); Adam Bartosz and Janusz Koziół, Tarnowski cmentarz żydowski (Tarnów: Muzeum Okręgowe w Tarnowie, 2005); Abraham Chomet, ed., Tarnów: The Life and Decline of a Jewish City (Tel Aviv: Association of Former Residents of Tarnow, 1954); Sam Goetz, I Never Saw My Face (Danbury, CT: Rutledge Books, 2001); Leszek Hońdo, Żydowski cmentarz w Tarnowie (Kraków: Wydawnictwo Uniwersytetu Jagiellońskiego, 2001); Ian Lichtig, Memories: An Incredible, True Story of Survival under the Holocaust (New York: I. Lichtig, 1996); William Kornbluth, Sentenced to Remember. My Legacy of Life in Pre-1939 Poland and Sixty-Eight Months of Nazi Occupation (London: Associated University Presses, 1994); Rebeka Lipiner, Kartki ocalałe z płomieni (Tarnów: Muzeum Okręgowe w Tarnowie, 1989); Aleksandra Pietrzykowska and Stanisław Potępa, Zagłada tarnowskich Żydów (Tarnów: Muzeum Okręgowe w Tarnowie, 1990); Stanisław Wróbel, Opowieści o dawnym Tarnowie (Tarnów: Muzeum Okręgowe w Tarnowie, 2003); Proces ludobójcy Amona Leopolda Goetha przed Najwyższym Trybunałem Narodowym (Kraków: Centralna Żydowska Komisja Historyczna przy Centralnym Komitecie Żydów w Polsce, 1947).

Documents on the fate and extermination of the Jews in Tarnów can be found in these archives: AŻIH (301/436, 570, 571, 580, 836, 1090, 1101, 1111, 1182, 1208, 1591, 1668, 2040, 2053, 2059, 2081, 3228, 3247, 3432, 3433, 3434, 3436, 3437, 3446, 3548, 3579, 3703, 3705, and 3860); IPN (AGK, ASG, sygn. 11, pp. 750, 764, and sygn. 413, pp. 8–9); PAP-Tarn (sygn. PTW 346/41, 347/41); SOT (sygn. 150–152, 158); SPT (Zg 1154/46, 1155/46, 1156/46, 1207/46, 1208/46, 1220/46, 1224/46, 1235/46, 1236/46, 1255/46, 1296/46, 199/47, 94/48, 95/48, 96/48, 98/48, 99/48, 132/48, 133/48); USHMM (RG-15.019M, reels 4 and 15; RG-15.020M; RG-15.072M; RG-02.168, 169, and 204; RG-50.002*0049; RG-50.030*0218; RG-50.120*0012 and *0114; Acc.1997.8; Acc.1998.31; Acc.2004.637; Acc.1994.A.427; Acc.1995.A.517; Acc.1995.A.526; and Acc.1997.A.0124, reels 1, 47, 48); VHF; and YVA (e.g., O-3/215; and O-41).

Joanna Śliwa

NOTES

1. AŻIH, 301/3228, testimony of Halina Kornilo; 301/3548, testimony of Eugeniusz Schipper; Hońdo, Żydowski cmentarz w Tarnowie, p. 25—the order issued by Ernst Kundt in Tarnów preceded the decision of Hans Frank about the marking of Jews on November 10, 1939.

2. Pietrzykowa and Potępa, Zagłada tarnowskich Żydów, pp. 17, 26–27, 37.

3. Ibid., pp. 23–24; Hońdo, Żydowski cmentarz w Tarnowie, p. 25; Bartosz, Żydowskim szlakiem po Tarnowie, pp. 53–54; Danuta Czech, Auschwitz Chronicle, 1939–1945 (New York: H. Holt, 1990), p. 13.

4. USHMM, Acc.1997.A.0124, reel 47, Anordnung issued by Stadtkommissar Dr. Hein, October 16, 1941.

5. Bańburski, Bogacz, and Kozioł, Żydzi w Tarnowie, p. 53; Pietrzykowa and Potępa, Zagłada tarnowskich Żydów, p. 14; AŻIH, 301/3579, testimony of Naftali Spanglet.

6. USHMM, Acc.1997.A.0124, reel 48, report of Tarnów JSS to Kraków, January 19, 1942; Pietrzykowa and Potępa, Zagłada tarnowskich Żydów, pp. 28–29.

7. Czesław Pilichowski et al., eds., Obozy hitlerowskie na ziemiach polskich 1939–1945: Informator encyklopedyczny (Warsaw: PWN, 1979), p. 516. Guy Miron, ed., The Yad Vashem Encyclopedia of the Ghettos during the Holocaust (Jerusalem: Yad Vashem, 2010), p. 814, dates it on February 19.

8. Hońdo, Żydowski cmentarz w Tarnowie, p. 10; Bartosz, Tarnowskie judaica, pp. 54–55; Urteil gegen Karl Oppermann and Gerhard G., LG-Bo, 16 Ks 1/68, in Justiz und NS-Verbrechen, vol. 32 (Amsterdam: Amsterdam University Press, 2004), Lfd. Nr. 710, p. 327.

9. USHMM, Acc.1997.A.0124, reel 48, report of Tarnów JSS to Kraków, March 20, 1942, and notes from trips to Tarnów and Plesnia, March 26, 1942; Hońdo, Żydowski cmentarz w Tarnowie, pp. 25–26.

10. Pietrzykowa and Potępa, Zagłada tarnowskich Żydów, pp. 31–34.

11. AŻIH, 301/3432, testimony of Leon Leser; 301/3433, testimony of Józef Kornilo; 301/3434, testimony of Izaak Iz-rael; 301/3436, testimony of Lola Gimpel; 301/3437, testimony of Łucja Rausch; 301/3446, testimony of Franciszka Kryształ; 301/3705, testimony of Artur Spindler; Elżbieta Kobierska-Motas, Ekstradycja przestępców wojennych do Polski z czterech stref okupacyjnych Niemiec 1946–1950, Część II (Warsaw: Główna Komisja Badania Zbrodni Przeciwko Narodowi Polskiemu-Institut Pamięci Narodowej, 1992), p. 193; Pietrzykowa and Potępa, Zagłada tarnowskich Żydów, pp. 36, 38–45; JuNS-V, vol. 32, Lfd. Nr. 710; Urteil gegen Hermann Blache, LG-Bo, 16 Ks 1/63, in JuNS-V, vol. 20 (Amsterdam: Amsterdam University Press, 1979), Lfd. Nr. 571.

12. Goetz, I Never Saw My Face, p. 31; Pietrzykowa and Potępa, Zagłada Tarnowskich Żydów, pp. 24, 47–50; Arthur Spindler, Outwitting Hitler, Surviving Stalin: The Story of Arthur Spindler (Sydney: UNSW Press, 1997), pp. 31–42; Naftali Frankel, I Survived Hell: The Testimony of a Survivor of the Nazi Extermination Camps (Prisoner Number 161040), (New York: Vantage Press, 1991), pp. 46–70; Kornbluth, Sentenced to Remember, pp. 76–84; USHMM, RG-15.019M, reel 15, “Kwestionariusz o obozach”; Acc.1997.A.0124, reel 48, report of Tarnów JSS, July 26, 1942; AŻIH, 301/2059, testimony of Blanka Goldman; 301/2081, testimony of Janina Schiffówna; 301/3228; 301/3579; JuNS-V, vol. 32, Lfd. Nr. 710, pp. 327–328; USHMM, RG-50.030*0218, testimony of Martin Spett.

13. USHMM, RG-15.019M, reel 15, “Kwestionariusz o obozach”; Acc.1997.A.0124, reel 47, letter of Tarnów JSS to Kraków, September 4, 1940; and letters of the Tarnów Judenrat to the Stadtkommissariat of September 19, 1940, and October 30, 1940; and reel 48, report of Tarnów JSS to Kraków, March 18, 1942; RG-15.072M; E. Podhorizer-Sandel, “O zagładzie Żydów w dystrykcie krakowskim,” BŻIH, no. 30 (1959): 90.

14. Bartosz, Tarnowskie judaica, p. 55; Podhorizer-Sandel, “O zagładzie żydów,” p. 98; Pietrzykowa and Potępa, Zagłada Tarnowskich Żydów, pp. 54, 57, 73–82; JuNS-V, vol. 20, Lfd. Nr. 571, and vol. 32, Lfd. Nr. 710.

15. Podhorizer-Sandel, “O zagładzie Żydów,” p. 98; AŻIH, 301/3579; Pietrzykowa and Potępa, Zagłada tarnowskich Żydów, pp. 66–68; Proces ludobójcy Amona Leopolda Goetha, pp. 161–169, 257–261, 304, 440–442; JuNS-V, vol. 20, Lfd. Nr. 571, and vol. 32, Lfd. Nr. 710.

16. Pietrzykowa and Potępa, Zagłada tarnowskich Żydów, pp. 53–54, 62–64; Josef Birken, “Udział szomrów tarnowskich w ruchu oporu,” Mosty, no. 23 (April 1947); Goetz, I Never Saw My Face, pp. 26–28.

17. Bartosz, Tarnowskie judaica, pp. 54–55; Kornbluth, Sentenced to Remember, pp. 96–104; AŻIH, 301/1090, testimony of Samuel Grunkraut; 301/1591, testimony of Erna Landau; 301/2040, testimony of Giza Beller; JuNS-V, vol. 20, Lfd. Nr. 571, and vol. 32, Lfd. Nr. 710.

18. Bańburski, Bogacz, and Kozioł, Żydzi w Tarnowie, p. 58; Pietrzykowa and Potępa, Zagłada tarnowskich Żydów, pp. 84–85; JuNS-V, vol. 32, Lfd. Nr. 710, p. 363.

TUCHÓW

Pre-1939: Tuchów, town, Tarnów powiat, Kraków województwo, Poland 1939–1945: Tuchow, Kreis Tarnow, Distrikt Krakau, Generalgouvernement; post-1998: Tuchów, województwo małopolskie, Poland

Tuchów is located 88 kilometers (55 miles) east-southeast of Kraków. At the outbreak of World War II, around 500 Jews (25 percent of the population) were living in Tuchów.

The German armed forces occupied Tuchów on September 7, 1939. On September 11, Wehrmacht soldiers shot 12 Jews from Tuchów in the Karwodrza Forest. In November 1939, the Germans burned down the synagogue and destroyed the Jewish cemetery, using Jewish tombstones (matzevot) to pave roads. As soon as the Germans entered the town, they began maltreating the Jews by cutting the beards of Orthodox Jews, looting Jewish businesses, and destroying homes. In December 1939, all Jewish men aged 13 and older were ordered to appear at the local school. The Germans selected 15 men and murdered them in the nearby village of Tarnowiec. The Jewish community paid a bribe to the Germans so that the corpses could be brought back to town for a religious Jewish burial. A Jewish Council (Judenrat) headed by Emil Wachs was appointed by the Germans to keep records of the Jewish population and to enlist Jews for forced labor.¹

In 1941, the Germans resettled Jews into Tuchów from neighboring towns and villages, including Ryglice and Gromnik. According to records of the Jewish Social Self-Help (JSS) organization in Tarnów, on September 30, 1941, there were 536 Jews in Tuchów. The Judenrat and the local branch of the JSS used their scarce resources to assist the refugees as much as possible. In January 1942, the community kitchen distributed 150 meals daily, but it lacked sufficient food to supply all those in need. On March 4, 1942, the JSS opened a public kitchen in Tuchów for about 50 Jewish children.²

Since the Nazis prohibited religious observance, the Jews of Tuchów worshipped secretly, and the home of the Weiss family became a prayer house. In May 1942, the Germans discovered this secret house of worship and murdered six elderly Jews who were praying.³

In 1942, the Germans established a ghetto in Tuchów, which was administered by Karl Oppermann and Hermann Blache, of the Security Police in Tarnów, and by a man named Prussok, who was sent to the Tarnów region from the Schutzpolizei in Breslau (Wrocław). A Jewish Police unit was set up in the ghetto, which was located in the southern part of town and enclosed with barbed wire. On its establishment, about 2,500 Jews were confined in a ghetto consisting of only 17 houses. (During the entire existence of the ghetto, some 3,000 Jews passed through it.) The Jews worked on local farms, as well as in workshops. The Jews in the Tuchów ghetto did not receive food from the German authorities, but the JSS and the Judenrat distributed food purchased with their scarce resources. There were random shootings of Jews inside as well as outside the ghetto, and the bodies were buried at the Jewish cemetery.⁴

In mid-June 1942, the German Schutzpolizei officer Prussok publicly executed six Jews in the town square. On June 23, 1942, Karl Oppermann shot seven Jews, including the chairman of the Judenrat. On orders issued by the Kreishauptmann in Tarnów on July 15, 1942, Jews from the towns of Kreis Tarnow, except from the city of Tarnów itself, were required to move into ghettos established in Dąbrowa Tarnowska, Brzesko, Tuchów, Zakliczyn, and Żabno by July 23, 1942. In September 1942, units of German and Polish (Blue) Police surrounded the Tuchów ghetto. The Jews were commanded to assemble in the town square. After a selection, the Jews were taken to the train station and loaded into cattle trains and were deported to the Bełżec extermination camp.

Only 43 Jews were spared deportation. They formed the Aufräumkommando, which was ordered by the Germans to clear the ghetto and sort Jewish belongings. The work was finished at the beginning of December 1942. The German Gestapo officer from Tarnów, Oppermann, ordered that the Jews be locked in a building until their resettlement to Tarnów. The next day, Oppermann inspected the building in which the Jews were being held and shot a Jewish man, Grunewald. In December 1942, Oppermann shot 26 Jews at Ogrodowa Street in Tuchów. Once the remnant of Jews from the Tuchów ghetto had been brought to the Tarnów ghetto, Oppermann ordered all of them to be shot. A few managed to escape. The survivors related their stories at the trial of Karl Oppermann in Germany, where he was sentenced to life imprisonment.⁵

SOURCES Publications dealing with the persecution and murder of the Jews in Tuchów include “Tuchów,” in Abraham Wein and Aharon Weiss, eds., Pinkas ha-kebilot. Encyclopaedia of Jewish Communities: Poland, vol. 3, Galia and Western Silesia (Jerusalem: Yad Vashem, 1984).

Documents on the fate of the Jews in Tuchów can be found in the following archives: IPN (AGK, ASG, sygn. 11, pp. 771–775); USHMM (Acc.1997.A.0124, reels 47 and 48; RG-15.019M, reels 4 and 15; and RG-50.002*0056); and YVA.

Joanna Śliwa

NOTES

1. Adam Bartosz, Tarnowskie judaica (Warsaw: Wydawnictwo PTTK “Kraj,” 1992), pp. 95–96; and USHMM, RG-15.019M, reel 4, “Kwestionariusz o egzekucjach masowych i grobach masowych.”

2. USHMM, Acc.1997.A.0124, reels 47 and 48, letter of the JSS Kraków headquarters to Tarnów branch, January 24, 1942; letter of Tarnów JSS to Kraków, March 11, 1942; protocol of Tarnów JSS, September 30, 1941.

3. Ibid., RG-15.019M, reel 4, p. 774, “Kwestionariusz o egzekucjach masowych i grobach masowych.”

4. Ibid., reel 15, p. 229, “Kwestionariusz o obozach”; Urteil gegen Karl Oppermann and Gerhard G., LG-Bo, 16 Ks 1/68, in Justiz und NS-Verbrechen, vol. 32 (Amsterdam: Amsterdam University Press, 2004), Lfd. Nr. 710, pp. 378–383.

5. USHMM, RG-15.019M, reel 4, pp. 771–773, “Kwestionariusz o egzekucjach masowych i grobach masowych”; Acc.1997.A.0124, reel 48, protocol of Tarnów JSS, July 31, 1942; fuNS-V, vol. 32, Lfd. Nr. 710, pp. 378–383.

TYCZYN

Pre-1939: Tyczyn, town, Lwów województwo, Poland; 1939–1945: Kreis Reichshof, Distrikt Krakau, Generalgouvernement; post-1998: województwo podkarpackie, Poland

Tyczyn is located 10 kilometers (6 miles) south of Rzeszów. There were 720 Jews living in Tyczyn on the outbreak of World War II in 1939. Soon after the occupation, the Germans ordered the Jewish community to leave within 24 hours and cross over to the Soviet-occupied Polish territories. The initial order was postponed for a few days. At the last minute, the evacuation was “called off for four weeks and then they stopped to talk at all about departures,” as noted by survivor Mina Perlberger in her diary.¹

The ethnic German (Volksdeutscher) mayor selected five established leaders of the community to serve in the Judenrat. Wheat merchant Moszek Goldman was appointed as its chairman. Jakob Eisen was the Judenrat’s secretary. Its office was located in Tuchman’s house on the market square. The Judenrat’s first order was to register all Jews in Tyczyn and its vicinity aged 12 and older. A second registration in the winter of 1939–1940 served to identify a prisoner’s profession and current workplace. Unemployed Jews were assigned to hard labor in the fields, on road construction, and in wet areas, performing swamp drainage.²

According to George Salton (born 1928), in the summer of 1940, Jews were “no longer allowed to travel from Tyczyn to Rzeszów without specific written documents from the police.” Perlberger, a prisoner who worked as a black market trader, recalled being fined 10 to 25 złoty for this offense. The Jews were also forbidden to leave their houses after 9:00 P.M.; this was particularly problematic, as most of the smuggling to Rzeszów took place at night when the Germans would stop patrolling the roads.³

In May 1941, there were 953 Jews in the town, including 250 refugees, the majority of whom had arrived in Tyczyn on December 15, 1940. Many were former Kalisz and Łódź residents. The Judenrat’s requests for assistance were dismissed by the American Jewish Joint Distribution Committee (AJDC), as it described the Judenrat’s welfare efforts as being of “the most primitive kind”—that is, that the services were limited to the distribution of donated food and clothing, sometimes by way of a lottery. At this time 560 residents were requesting help.

A number of Jewish men were seized from the streets and taken to labor camps in Babice, 12 kilometers (7.5 miles) from Tyczyn, for the summer of 1940 (or 1941).⁴

In May and June 1941, a large detachment of German soldiers stationed in Tyczyn demanded the provision of forced laborers. These soldiers were engaged in training and did not bother the Jewish community. Following their departure, with Germany’s invasion of the Soviet Union, some of Tyczyn’s residents, who had fled east at the beginning of the war, returned. Their lodgings were organized by the local administration in homes that German soldiers had recently vacated.

In the spring of 1941, a refugee from Kalisz named “Hanka” and an elderly man, Mates Wachs, were shot. From the fall of that year, the Gestapo and SS began to visit Tyczyn almost every week, conducting house searches and confiscations and fining the Judenrat for various offenses. As regards the visits of the Kreishauptmann, Perlberger wrote: “[He was] searching every home for young females. He was well known for his sadistic, sexually degenerate way of hitting with his riding whip, only females.”⁵

Perlberger noted in her diary that as of “February 1942, it was a death sentence for the Jews to cross a border to another city [sic].” This was most likely the result of the December 17, 1941, order by the Kreishauptmann to create ghettos in the Kreis. In Rzeszów, the order was effective on January 10, 1942, with the closing of the ghetto, and in the remainder of the Kreis it applied from February 1, 1942.

An open ghetto—unfenced and unguarded—was established in the center of Tyczyn in March 1942. The Jews were still allowed to move around Tyczyn, but as Perlberger noted: “You can’t cross the border from Tyczyn, because you will be killed on the spot.” Jews living in nearby villages (e.g., Hermanowa) were given three days for relocation to the ghetto. In Hermanowa, each family had to wait for the Germans to oversee their departure from their homes and collect the keys. Perlberger’s family was forced to sign a document surrendering possession of their immovable property. There was little housing available in Tyczyn because Jews from other localities who were ordered to transfer to the Rzeszów ghetto had moved to the Tyczyn ghetto instead. The Judenrat was charged with assigning accommodation, which typically amounted to one room per family.

According to George Salton, as of the spring of 1942, the Polish (Blue) Police and the SS were permanently present in Tyczyn, patrolling the streets. Violence and killings escalated. One day, 14 men were rounded up and shot at the Jewish cemetery. At this time, the Germans ordered the Judenrat to deliver laborers for transfer to a labor camp in Biesiadka. As the men on the Judenrat’s list went into hiding, the Germans threatened the community with the substitution of their women for labor in Biesiadka. It took the Jewish Police three days to deliver the demanded number of laborers.

Several contributions, some in the form of overdue taxes, were imposed on the community in the months preceding the ghetto’s liquidation. Five Jewish hostages were shot. Tensions and anger rose within the community because of the way the Judenrat had handled these demands; for example, the amount each family had to pay was based on the Judenrat’s estimation of their means. Perlberger records that Polish policemen extorted money and various possessions from the Jews. The community was also reportedly ordered to pay to Poles all the debts owed to them, on pain of death. A local farmer blackmailed Perlberger’s family.⁶

In late June 1942, the commander of the SS summoned the Judenrat and informed them of the impending resettlement to the Rzeszów ghetto. Judenrat chairman Goldman was arrested. The same day posters were put up: “It was typed and carried the seal and signature of the German Distrikt administrator. It read: ‘Within one week, all Jews residing in Tyczyn and vicinity must be relocated to the Rzeszów ghetto.’” Secondary sources report that relocation took only three days, from June 25 to 27, 1942. The German and Polish (Blue) Police escorted columns of wagons to Rzeszów. The Jews were able to take with them very little in the way of belongings.

Several people were killed in the course of the ghetto's liquidation, including Berl Kuflik.⁷

The Rzeszów ghetto was liquidated in the course of deportations to the Bełżec extermination camp that began in July 1942; its final destruction took place in November 1942.

SOURCES Useful in the preparation of this entry was the book by George Salton, The 23rd Psalm: A Holocaust Memoir (Madison: University of Wisconsin Press, 2002). The following publications contain brief references to the destruction of the Tyczyn Jewish community: Czesław Pilichowski et al., eds., Obozy hitlerowskie na ziemiach polskich 1939–1945: Informator encyklopedyczny (Warsaw: PWN, 1979), p. 533; Andrzej Potocki, Żydzi w Podkarpaciu (Rzeszów: Libra, 2004), p. 183; Stanisław Poradowski, “Zagład Żydów rzeszowskich,” pt. 3, BŻIH, nos. 3–4 (1985): 80, 86, 89–90.

The following archival sources were used to prepare this entry: AŻIH (210/694 [AJDC], 211/1048 [JSS]); USHMM (Acc.1999.A.0154 [AJDC]; Acc.1997.A.0124 [JSS]; RG-15.019M; and RG-02.054); and VHF (# 26577).

Jolanta Kraemer

NOTES

1. USHMM, Acc.1997.A.0124 (JSS), 211/1048 (Tyczyn), p. 3; RG-02.054 (“Buried Alive: A Diary by Mina Perlberger” [typescript], pp. 53–55).

2. Ibid., Acc.1999.A.0154 (AJDC), 210/694 (Tyczyn), p. 5; Salton, The 23rd Psalm, p. 26.

3. Salton, The 23rd Psalm, p. 34; USHMM, RG-02.054, pp. 10, 77, 101.

4. USHMM, Acc.1999.A.0154 (AJDC), 210/694, pp. 2–7; Acc.1997.A.0124 (JSS), 211/1048, pp. 1–3; RG-02.054, p. 10.

5. Salton, The 23rd Psalm, pp. 37–41; USHMM, RG-02.054, p. 122.

6. Salton, The 23rd Psalm, pp. 44, 48; USHMM, RG-02.054, pp. 83, 93–97, 102–104, 122–123, 125; VHF, # 26577, testimony of George Salton, 1997.

7. Salton, The 23rd Psalm, pp. 49, 53; USHMM, RG-02.054, pp. 125–130.

USTRZYKI DOLNE

Pre-1939: Ustrzyki Dolne (Yiddish: Istrik), town, Lwów województwo, Poland; 1939–1941: Nizhn'o-Ustriki, raion center, Drogobych oblast', Ukrainian SSR; 1941–1944: Ustrzyki Dolne, Kreis Sanok, Distrikt Krakau, Generalgouvernement; post-1998: województwo podkarpackie, Poland

Ustrzyki Dolne is located 34 kilometers (21 miles) southeast of Sanok. The 1921 census registered 1,767 Jewish residents in Ustrzyki. German forces occupied Ustrzyki briefly in September 1939 before handing over control to the Soviet Union. Following their attack on the Soviet Union, German forces reoccupied the town in late June 1941.

Most of the information on this entry is based on two detailed testimonies by Herman Iwler, which he gave to the Archives of the Jewish Historical Institute in Warsaw in 1948 and 1949. Iwler never uses the term ghetto, although from his descriptions—especially those given in his 1948 testimony—a form of open ghetto most probably existed in Ustrzyki.¹ Also, Pinkas ha-kehilot states that Jews were evicted from their homes and concentrated in a dilapidated area of the town. This publication, however, does not state when the ghetto was established. The ghetto most likely remained unfenced, as neither of these sources mentions any form of enclosure.²

Nonetheless, Jewish movement was restricted from the onset of the German occupation in 1941. For example, at this time the German authorities prohibited Jews from crossing the market square and the main street, the latter starting from the pharmacy building where the Gestapo offices were located. In addition, Ustrzyki Dolne's Jews could only use side streets—and those only until 7:15 P.M. They were ordered to wear armbands with an emblem of the Star of David. Those caught without an armband were punished with 25 lashes or sometimes shot.

In the second half of 1941, an outpost of the Gestapo was established in Ustrzyki Dolne; among the more notorious Gestapo men based there were Johann Bäcker and a man named Doppke. Others who served there included Müller, Schmidtchen, and von Malottki.³ The Germans also set up a Ukrainian police force commanded by Ustianowski. The Ukrainian militia conducted searches of Jewish households and confiscated food. Locals were forbidden to sell goods to Jews. Jewish shops were closed.⁴

The German authorities designated a local veterinarian, Schimel (or Schiml), as the Judenrat chairman. Schimel himself selected the remainder of his staff: Rapaport (dentist), Szymon Reich, Dawid Scheinbach (wholesaler), Sterner Jr. (lawyer), Dawid Harman, and Mojżesz Horowitz; the latter later resigned.

The first forced labor conscription for local Jews was to build a Russian prisoner-of-war (POW) camp in Ustianowa. The Judenrat provided each of the 60 to 80 laborers with a daily ration of 25 grams (0.9 ounces) of bread and a bowl of soup.

In April 1942, 150 Jews were sent to work in a sawmill and at a refinery. At the same time, the local Gestapo conscripted a separate group of 60 to 120 Jews who were required to reinforce the banks of the Strwiąż River; to build a bridge, a shack, garages, and stables; and later to regulate the river's waters. The foreman, Szymon Walzman, often beat his laborers. Early in the summer of 1942, Jewish farmers from the vicinity were also forced to work for the Germans. For example, owners of horses and wagons were made to transport wood from disassembled Soviet shelters and bunkers found in the surrounding forests.⁵

In June 1942, the Germans ordered all Jewish residents over 65 years old to report to the Judenrat. Prior to this, Bäcker had gone from house to house registering them. Approximately 200 registered men and women were transferred to a local jail that evening (an exact date is not known); 50 of them were shot that same night in the courtyard of the Judenrat's office, while others were taken away in vehicles and shot in a forest near Berechy. According to historian Andrzej Potocki, the murder took place in Brzegi Dolne. Other publications claim the murder took place earlier, on May 5, 1942, and cite 300 victims.⁶

Following this mass killing, the Gestapo made several trips to nearby villages including Ropienka, Olszanice, Czarna, Stefkowa, and Wańkowa, shooting many Jewish residents but sparing horse and buggy owners. In Lutowska, the Ustrzyki Gestapo ordered all Jews to report to the market square: 800 of them were selected and killed; the remainder were transferred to Ustrzyki Dolne together with the looted possessions of the murdered Jews gathered by Doppke and Bäcker.⁷

In July or August 1942, the Jews from surrounding villages were also brought into Ustrzyki to join the ghettoized Jews living there. Iwler describes it as follows: “All of them were driven past the Gestapo, where they were searched [by Gestapo men], who ripped apart their down comforters and killed two children, allegedly for being dirty. At the beginning of spring 1942, the Germans had prohibited Jews from going beyond the limits of the villages.” The Judenrat placed the deportees with other Jewish families. Following the arrival of the rural Jews, according to Iwler, some 3,000 Jews were concentrated in Ustrzyki. At that time—weeks before its liquidation—it was most likely announced that the ghetto was to be closed, with strict orders that nobody could leave it.⁸

Individual executions of ghetto residents continued throughout the summer. Reportedly, Doppke conducted them at night in front of the Judenrat building. His victims were most often accused of having cooperated with the Soviets. The Judenrat was instructed to dispose of the bodies, and they were carried away for burial using the doors of the Judenrat office, which had been taken off their hinges. Executions were so frequent that there was a nightly guard duty especially assigned for this purpose.

Residents of the ghetto were aware of the approaching deportation Aktion and the clearance of neighboring Jewish communities; for example, conscripted sawmill laborers witnessed passing cattle trains loaded with people. The Judenrat maintained that they contained Soviet POWs. According to Iwler, “[T]he Judenrat instructed us to go to work smiling, with heads up so as to not to incur the anger of the Germans.”

A registration of the ghetto inmates took place in August 1942. Those who received special stamps on their Kennkarten (identity cards) were allegedly to be spared from the resettlement. This group of 60 to 70 Jews was purportedly slated for forestry work.⁹

On September 2, 1942, the Judenrat announced that the workday would end at noon and that Ustrzyki's Jews should prepare for their transfer to a labor camp in Zasław, 24 kilometers (15 miles) away. The community was told that they would be housed there in barracks and would work in a paper factory. “Those who refused to go were to be shot,” testified Iwler, adding that the Judenrat used this occasion to trick Jews by offering to accept bribes in return for enlisting them for deportation. The order was then rescinded that same day, after which it was announced that 50 individuals were to remain behind, working at the sawmill. Ustrzyki's Judenrat then sought to extract more funds by offering places on a “new list” of those who were to remain in Ustrzyki Dolne.

The deportees were allowed to take all their possessions by wagon. The column left Ustrzyki under escort at night, on September 2, 1942, and it arrived at the Zasław camp the next morning, on September 3, 1942. Jews from other localities also were being concentrated there. A separate registration was conducted to identify those Jewish men from Ustrzyki fit for labor. Women, children, and the elderly were separated out.

Ustrzyki's Judenrat president was shot in Zasław. Most of the Jews concentrated there were sent to the Bełżec extermination camp within a week, the first transport leaving on September 6, 1942; the second, on September 8.¹⁰

SOURCES Reference to the fate of the Ustrzyki Jews can be found in the following publications: Andrzej Potocki, Podkarpackie judaica (Brzozów: Związek Gmin Brzozowskich and Muzeum Regionalne PTTK w Brzozowie, 1993), p. 51; Shmuel Spector and Geoffrey Wigoder, eds., The Encyclopedia of Jewish Life before and during the Holocaust (Jerusalem: Yad Vashem; New York: New York University Press, 2001), p. 1365; Danuta Dabrowska, Abraham Wein, and Aharon Weiss, eds., Pinkas ha-kehillot. Encyclopaedia of Jewish Communities: Poland, vol. 2, Eastern Galicia (Jerusalem: Yad Vashem, 1980), pp. 59–62; Justiz und NS-Verbrechen, vol. 39 (Amsterdam: Amsterdam University Press, 2008), Lfd. Nr. 799, pp. 236–259.

The following archival sources were used to prepare this entry: AŻIH (211/1061 [JSS]; 301/3558, 301/4314 [Relacje]).

Jolanta Kraemer

NOTES

1. AŻIH, 301/3558, testimony of Herman Iwler, 1948.
2. Dabrowska, Wein, and Weiss, Pinkas ha-kehillot: Poland, vol. 2, Eastern Galicia, pp. 59–62.
3. JuNS-V, vol. 39, Lfd. Nr. 799, pp. 240, 244.
4. AŻIH, 301/3558. In 1973, Bäcker was sentenced to life in prison by a German court; see Potocki, Podkarpackie judaica, p. 51.
5. AŻIH, 301/4314, testimony of Herman Iwler; and 301/3558.
6. Ibid., in 301/3558 Iwler testified that the killings in Lutowska took place before those of the elderly Jews murdered in Ustrzyki.
7. JuNS-V, vol. 39, Lfd. Nr. 799, p. 244.
8. AŻIH, 301/3558.
9. Ibid.; also 301/4314.
10. Ibid., 301/3558; 301/4314.

WIELICZKA

Pre-1939: Wieliczka, town, Kraków województwo, Poland; 1939–1945: Kreis Krakau-Land, Distrikt Krakau, Generalgouvernement; post-1998: województwo małopolskie, Poland

Wieliczka is located about 16 kilometers (10 miles) southeast of Kraków. In 1939, an estimated 1,500 Jews were living there.¹

The Wehrmacht occupied Wieliczka on September 7, 1939. By that time, the majority of the town's male Jewish population had fled. Due to the virtual absence of males, the women, old, and sick also performed forced labor at first. Eventually, the German authorities forced women to become members of the Jewish Council (Judenrat).

Bronisława Friedmann chaired the seven-woman Judenrat. The following women were also members of the Judenrat: Berla (or Berta) Rakower, Berla (or Berta) Zellner, Hania Feidenfron, Helena Brishorn, Salomea Küchler, and Złata Komhamer.

The Judenrat's first order was to collect a contribution of 8,000 złoty demanded by the Germans. The town's women had to travel to Kraków, where their husbands were hiding, to get the money. They were also required to furnish the offices of the German Gendarmerie (commanded by Wagner) and of the Sonderdienst that were set up in Wieliczka. Three months later, the men started to return gradually, but they were still afraid to cooperate with women in the Judenrat.²

A German named Frenzel was appointed as Stadtkommissar in Wieliczka; he was very susceptible to bribes. In 1940, SA officer Hermann Rosig replaced him.

Although Jewish businesses and houses were registered and repeatedly plundered, the situation in Wieliczka stabilized following Rosig's appointment. Word spread quickly that the town was a safe haven for Jews, and this attracted refugees. Moreover, its proximity to Kraków played a major role in influencing approximately 350 Jewish families to move to Wieliczka. A larger wave of Kraków refugees arrived in Wieliczka in the early summer of 1940. The Judenrat tried to relieve the suffering of the poor by opening a soup kitchen on November 10, 1940.

In December 1940, the German authorities set up the Jewish Police (Jüdischer Ordnungsdienst), which was commanded by lawyer Maksymilian Liebeskind. By the end of 1941, the force had expanded to 20 members.

The creation of the Kraków ghetto in March 1941 led more Jews to move to Wieliczka to escape the harsh conditions of ghetto life. According to Maria Bill-Bajorkowa, the German authorities set a limit of 5,000 Jews for Wieliczka. All those who were not registered were to be shot. Official Judenrat statistics, which registered 4,000 Jews in June 1941, 4,300 by the end of October 1941, and 4,900 in April 1942, may have been falsified, as many testimonies suggest that the number of Jews in Wieliczka actually surpassed the set quota.³

Wieliczka did not have an enclosed ghetto or even a separate Jewish quarter; the Jews continued to live where they wanted in the town, mixed in with the Poles.⁴ However, by late 1941, Wieliczka's Jews were required to stay within the town's limits, on pain of death. There was considerable overcrowding in Wieliczka, as the original Jewish population had more than trebled by the spring of 1942.

A branch of the Jewish Social Self-Help (JSS) organization was established in Wieliczka in July 1941 to take over the organization of welfare from the Judenrat. Chairwoman Friedmann was nominated as the organization's president, and the lawyer Ludwik Steinberg from Kraków was appointed as her deputy, with Salomon Heller as the third member. Through their efforts, a second soup kitchen was launched at the end of the same month, serving up to 200 meals daily. It was set up for the refugee "intelligentsia" and referred to as the "B" kitchen or "kitchen for the impoverished middle class." By February 1942, the "A" kitchen, for the poor, served on average 700 meals daily (i.e., 454 grams [16 ounces]) of vegetarian soup, of which 30 percent were free of charge. The "B" kitchen prepared up to 300 meals per day (a soup and two vegetable sides), charging 1.50 złoty per meal at a discount.⁵

By September 1941, male refugees from Kraków took over the Judenrat. Its new deputy, Grossman, later wrote that he and Steinberg (appointed as the chairman) made their participation in the Judenrat conditional on receiving a free hand to select its remaining members. The other members were: the lawyer Zygmunt Landau from Kraków, Leo Münzer from Bielsko as secretary, and four local Jews (Dr. Izidor Rakower, Roman Joachimsman, Chaim Loffelholz [Loffecholz], and Jakub Zellner). According to Zellner, Salomon Gelles, Ozjasz Goldstein, and Bronisława Friedmann were also included in the Judenrat, although Friedmann served only a short time.⁶

From the very beginning of the war, Friedmann had advocated opening a Jewish hospital in Wieliczka, but the authorities continually denied their permission. A clinic was established on August 21, 1941, with the arrival of a number of doctors from Kraków. Organized and managed by Dr. Otmar Reiner, it was located in the Judenrat building on 11 Seraf Street and admitted patients daily. Patients were treated free of charge in the clinic; however, doctors requested to be paid for house visits.

Permission to set up a hospital was finally granted in May 1942, but the authorities stressed that additional approval would be required to open it. The Cheder School building on Bolesław Szpunar Street was subsequently renovated and equipped for this purpose.⁷

The most significant JSS activity was its provision of a daily breakfast, starting in October 1941, for up to 200 children (3–12 years old). It consisted of 100 grams (3.5 ounces) of bread with marmalade and a glass of chicory coffee with milk or porridge. By the summer of 1942, 78 children in their care were from Wieliczka, while 130 were the children of refugees.⁸

After partial deportations from the Kraków ghetto in June 1942, Wieliczka's Jews became concerned about their own fate. Their rabbis, as from the beginning of the war, commanded the community to endure all German brutalities with submissiveness, repeating: "Let the beast devour." The idea of opening workshops and thereby saving themselves by working for the Wehrmacht rose within the Judenrat; some sources cite that it was actually Stadtkommissar Rosig's idea. At the time, Rosig promised that nothing bad would happen to Wieliczka's Jews, and he was "showered with diamonds" again.

"Town Workshops," an agency linked to those operating already in Bochnia, opened in mid-June 1942 in a local school. Its largest branches consisted of tailors and furriers who repaired winter clothing for the Wehrmacht.

With increasing reports of Jews being deported from other locations, Wieliczka's Jews paid bribes of up to 50,000 złoty to obtain unpaid positions in the workshops, yet only about 700 could secure a workplace. All believed that deportations from Wieliczka would be partial and would not affect Jews who worked. A number of those who could not afford bribes reportedly sent denunciations to the Kraków Gestapo.

It was at this time that the Judenrat intensified their efforts to obtain permission to open the hospital, believing that its patients would be spared from the deportations. A list of 100 patients for admission was prepared, but securing a place on that list cost thousands of złoty.⁹

In early August 1942, Kraków's Stadtkommissar Rüger and Rosig demanded a contribution of 1 million złoty from the Wieliczka Judenrat to be paid by August 22. The Judenrat negotiated it down to half a million. The community was already aware that such contributions generally preceded deportations. In those days, many Jews prepared bunkers or secured a hiding place with local Poles. A significant number fled Wieliczka.

On August 20, 1942, Rosig ordered the Judenrat to prepare for the arrival of 3,600 Jews on August 22. These were from Niepołomice, Mogiła, Łapanów, Dobczyce, and Gdów. At the time, Rosig told the Judenrat that he intended "to expand the 'Jewish quarter' considerably." The Wieliczka Jewish community was informed about the sudden concentration by posters. Signed by Rosig, they announced that the resettlement would "enlarge the 'Jüdische Wohnbezirk' and provide Jews with sustenance."¹⁰ Therefore, the concept of a ghetto, or separate Jewish quarter in Wieliczka, was exploited by the Germans to dupe the Jews into thinking they would not be deported, while Wieliczka itself became a temporary concentration point and staging post for the deportations.

The Jews of Niepołomice, Gdów, and Łapanów were informed of their resettlement approximately seven days in advance. They were allowed to take all of their belongings with them and waited for their wagons to be packed. The Gdów Jews were intimidated to such an extent that they prevented anyone from evading the deportation, for fear of possible German reprisals.¹¹ An estimated 3,000 to 3,500 Jews arrived in Wieliczka. The authorities announced that from then on all Jews found outside Wieliczka would be shot, as well as any Poles hiding them. As a result, many Jews were shot at the roadside on the first day following the deadline.¹²

The Wieliczka Judenrat was unable to house everyone. Approximately 700 of the newcomers were accommodated in a barracks in the Nowy Świat quarter of Wieliczka that was designed to hold no more than 70 people. Poles that lived on the outskirts of the town were forbidden to give shelter to the newcomers, who were ordered to concentrate in the center of Wieliczka. By this time, the town had been surrounded by a number of German units, Polish auxiliary police, and later also by the Jewish Police brought from the Kraków ghetto. Despite this, some people were still able to escape, often with the help of local Poles.¹³

On August 26, 1942, Kunde, Heinrich, and Becher arrived from Kraków with a list of 128 employees of the Town Workshops whose Kennkarten (identity cards) were to be stamped prior to the transfer of them and their families to the Bochnia workshops (a total of 500 people). The authorities at this time demanded another contribution of 150,000 złoty and 3 kilograms (6.6 pounds) of coffee. That same night they informed the Judenrat that all Jews should report to the field near the train station by 5:00 A.M. on August 28, 1942. Rosig maintained that the community would be sent to Ukraine for work.¹⁴

On August 27, 1942, the hospital that the Germans had allowed to open just three days prior to the deportation Aktion was liquidated. Its patients and about 40 doctors and nurses were brought to the forest and shot.¹⁵

On the day of the deportation a selection took place near the train station. Approximately 700 elderly and infirm people were loaded onto trucks and taken to the Niepołomicki Forest, where they were shot. Others, found in hiding or trying to escape, were killed in the town. About 700 young men were selected for forced labor and sent to Pustków, the Julag in Kraków, and other labor camps. The remainder were loaded onto the waiting train late in the afternoon and sent to the Bełżec extermination camp. It is estimated that at least 6,000 Jews were deported to Bełżec of the around 8,000 Jews concentrated there just before the deportation Aktion. A small cleanup detachment of up to 300 Jews remained in Wieliczka to sort out remaining Jewish property. Following alleged Jewish sabotage in Bochnia—the setting of a fire in the workshops—the 128 laborers that remained in Wieliczka were dispatched to Skawina for liquidation.¹⁶

SOURCES Published information on the Jewish community of Wieliczka during the Holocaust includes Shemu'el Me'iri, ed., Kehilat Vilits'kab: Sefer zikaron (Irgun yots'e Vilits'kah be-Yisrael, 1980); and Justiz und NS-Verbrechen, vol. 27 (Amsterdam: Amsterdam University Press, 2003), Lfd. Nr. 667a.

Relevant documentation can be found in the following archives: AŻIH (210/712 [AJDC]; 211/1092-1095 [JSS]; 301/573, 301/776, 301/1120, 301/1183, 301/2320, 301/2052, 301/3411, 301/3266, 301/4117, 301/5321, 301/5425, and 301/6245 [Relacje]; 302/143 [Pamiętniki]; FVA (# 15); USHMM (RG-02.208M [Pamiętniki]; Acc.1999.A.0154 [AJDC]; Acc.1997.A.0124 [JSS], reel 50; RG-15.084M [Relacje]; VHF (e.g., # 27085, 30751, 42577, and 45865); and YVA.

Jolanta Kraemer

NOTES

1. USHMM, Acc.1997.A.0124 (JSS), reel 50, 211/1092 (Wieliczka), p. 30.

2. Ibid., pp. 1, 30; AŻIH, 301/5425, testimony of Maria Bill-Bajorkowa, 1952; 301/1120, testimony of Tauba Zyslowitz, n.d.; Michael Zellner, "The Nazi Atrocities in Wieliczka," in Me'iri, Kehilat Vilits'kab, p. 39.

3. USHMM, Acc.1997.A.0124, reel 50, 211/1092, pp. 30, 67; 211/1094, pp. 49–50, AŻIH, 301/5425; and 301/2052, testimony of Hirsch Grossbard, 1946.

4. JuNS-V, vol. 27, Lfd. Nr. 667a, p. 358.

5. Gazeta Żydowska, August 20, 1941, and February 20, 1942; USHMM, Acc.1997.A.0124, reel 50, 211/1092, pp. 26, 30, 34, 64.

6. AŻIH, 301/2052; 301/1183, testimony of Meilech Zeliner, 1945; Gazeta Żydowska, February 20, 1942; USHMM, Acc.1997.A.0124, reel 50, 211/1093, pp. 38–40.

7. Gazeta Żydowska, August 27, 1941; USHMM, Acc. 1997.A.0124, reel 50, 211/1092, pp. 44, 72–73; 211/1093, pp. 30, 39; and AŻIH, 301/5425.

8. USHMM, Acc.1997.A.0124, reel 50, 211/1092, p. 40; and 211/1095, p. 29.

9. AŻIH, 301/573, testimony of M. Hollaender, 1945; 301/3266, testimony of Salomea Flawmhaft, 1947; and 301/1183; USHMM, Acc.1997.A.0124, reel 50, 211/1093, p. 44; and 211/1095, pp. 37–38.

10. AŻIH, 301/2320, testimony of Leib Storch, 1947; 301/2052; 301/573; 301/3266.

11. Ibid., 301/4117, testimony of Fajwel Kornberg, n.d.; 301/5321, testimony of Anna Steinberg, n.d.

12. Ibid., 301/2052; 302/143, memoir of Maria Bajorkowa, a fragment published also in Michał Grynberg and Maria Kotowska, eds., Życie i zagłada Żydów polskich, 1939–1945: Relacje świadków (Warsaw: Oficyna Naukowa, 2003), pp. 40–46, and Me'iri, Kehilat Vilits'kab, pp. 63–81.

13. AŻIH, 302/25, testimony of Michał Weichert; and 302/143, testimony of Maria Bill-Bajorkowa. A number of Jewish testimonies refer to the help they received from Poles—e.g., 301/6245, testimony of Zofia Chorowicz-Rosenbaum, Edmund Fischler, Lonka Fischler-Tempka; 301/3266.

14. Ibid., 301/2052.

15. Mieczysław Skulimowski, “Zagłada szpitala żydowskiego w Wieliczce w roku 1942,” in Me'iri, Kehilat Vilits'kab, pp. 81–88, also published in Przegląd Lekarski 22(1) (1966): 101–105; it is based mainly on Bill-Bajorkowa nad Zeller testimonies and includes a partial list of the murdered doctors.

16. AŻIH, 301/573; 301/5425; 301/2052; and ŻuNS-V, vol. 27, Lfd. Nr. 667a, pp. 367–370. Some sources date the deportation on August 27, 1942—e.g., AŻIH, 301/1183; and 301/3411, testimony of Herman Schnur, 1947.

WIELOPOLE SKRZYŃSKIE

Pre-1939: Wielopole Skrzyńskie, village, Lwów województwo, Poland; 1939–1945: Wielopole Skrzyńskie, Kreis Debica, Distrikt Krakau, Generalgouvernement; post-1998: Wielopole Skrzyńskie, województwo podkarpackie, Poland

Wielopole Skrzyńskie is located about 148 kilometers (92 miles) east of Kraków. According to the 1921 census, there were 550 Jewish residents, constituting 54.7 percent of the total population of Wielopole Skrzyńskie.

Upon the village's occupation, the Germans established a Judenrat chaired by Chaim Meller, together with Abraham Langer (treasurer) and Mendel Kanner. In May 1940, the Judenrat reported 763 Jews, including 135 refugees, living in the village. Of that number, 70 had arrived from Inowrocław in December 1939. Other refugees were mostly from Łódź or other localities within Kreis Debica. In late 1940 and 1941, dozens of Jews were sent to a forced labor camp in Pustków near Dębica.¹

The Gestapo from Dębica oversaw life in the village, and it often extorted valuables from its Jewish inhabitants. According to A. Rubin, the Germans executed two Jews caught outside the village, buying food from farmers in January 1941.

On May 1, 1940, the Judenrat opened a soup kitchen. It served on average 45 breakfasts and dinners per day. On Saturdays those receiving food from the soup kitchen were assigned to local families for a meal. The kitchen closed in November 1940 due to a lack of money. It reopened briefly, only to close again in June 1941.²

In March 1941, 112 Jews from Kraków were deported to Wielopole. By mid-April 1941, their number had risen to 250, as some of the Kraków Jews who were initially assigned to Mielec were later directed to Wielopole.³

In May 1941, the Judenrat wrote to the Jewish Social Self-Help (JSS) in Kraków, stating that none of the Jewish businesses were under trustee management. In June 1941, a branch of the JSS was set up in Wielopole with three officials: Szaje Tajtelbaum (chairman), Chaim Mejer Lipschitz (deputy), and Jakub Barth. It managed to reopen the kitchen on November 1, 1941, producing 70 meals daily. Those who could afford it paid 10 groszy per meal; most customers received their meals for free.⁴

Secondary sources date the establishment of the ghetto in the spring of 1942, at which time Jews were forbidden to live in certain parts of Wielopole and were resettled to a few narrow streets. The ghetto was not enclosed, but its inhabitants' freedom of movement was severely restricted.

In March 1942, approximately 170 Jews were deported to Mielec to work in aircraft factories. Norbert Friedman testified that the Germans surrounded the village one day and announced that if men volunteered for the labor camps, their women and children would not be resettled. Friedman was one such volunteer.⁵

By May 1942, the JSS had found agricultural employment for 100 Jews. They worked on the surrounding large estates, including in Mała (about 8 kilometers [5 miles] northwest of Wielopole), and on other nearby homesteads.⁶

The ghetto was liquidated on June 26, 1942, when the community was resettled to the ghetto in nearby Ropczyce. In the course of the liquidation—or shortly thereafter—50 to 56 elderly Jews were shot and buried in a mass grave at the Jewish cemetery. Some of them were brought from the village of Mała. Among the victims were Arsycz Schaja Hiller, Feiga Mała Hiller, and Samuel Leidner.⁷

The ghetto in Ropczyce was liquidated on July 23, 1942, when the majority of its population was escorted to the nearby town of Sędziszów Małopolski and then deported to the Bełżec extermination camp.

SOURCES The ghetto in Wielopole is briefly mentioned in the following publications: E. Podhorizer-Sandel, “O zagładzie Żydów w dystrykcie krakowskim,” BŻIH, no. 30 (1959): 95; Andrzej Potocki, Żydzi w Podkarpackiem (Rzeszów: Libra, 2004), pp. 189–200; Guy Miron, ed., The Yad Vashem Encyclopedia of the Ghettos during the Holocaust (Jerusalem: Yad Vashem, 2010), p. 928; and Arnon Rubin, The Rise and Fall of the Jewish Communities in Poland and Their Relics Today, vol. 3, District Krakow (Tel Aviv: Tel Aviv University Press, 2008), pp. 354–355.

Relevant documentation can be found in the following archives: AŻIH (210/713, 211/344, 211/1096-1097); USHMM (Acc.1997.A.0124 [JSS]; Acc.1999.A.0154 [AJDC]); and VHF (# 3022).

Jolanta Kraemer

NOTES

1. USHMM, Acc.1999.A.0154 (AJDC), 210/713 (Wielopole Skrzyńskie), p. 4; Acc.1997.A.0124 (JSS), 211/1096 (Wielopole Skrzyńskie), pp. 4, 10–11, 13.
2. Ibid., Acc.1999.A.0154 (AJDC), 210/713, pp. 14, 17; Acc.1997.A.0124 (JSS), 211/1096, p. 4a.
3. Ibid., Acc.1997.A.0124 (JSS), 211/344 (Dębica), pp. 26, 34, 55, 67.
4. Ibid., 211/1096, pp. 20, 26, 43.
5. VHF, # 3022, testimony of Norbert Friedman, 1995.
6. USHMM, Acc.1997.A.0124 (JSS), 211/1097 (Wielopole Skrzyńskie), pp. 21, 23.
7. Rejestr miejsc i faktów zbrodni popełnionych przez okupanta hitlerowskiego na ziemiach polskich w latach 1939–1945: Województwo rzeszowskie (Warsaw: GKBZHWP, 1984), pp. 199–200.

WOLBROM

Pre-1939: Wolbrom, town, Miechów powiat, Kielce województwo, Poland; 1939–1945: Wolfram, Kreis Miechow, Distrikt Krakau, Generalgouvernement; post-1998: Wolbrom, województwo małopolskie, Poland

Wolbrom is located 38 kilometers (24 miles) north-northwest of Kraków. In 1921, the Jewish population of the town was 4,276 (59 percent of the total), rising by 1931 to 5,450 Jews.¹

When the German invasion began on September 1, 1939, many young men from Wolbrom, Jews and non-Jews, were mobilized into the Polish armed forces. Some were killed in action or captured and taken to Germany, but soon afterwards the prisoners of war (POWs) were sent home. When the German army entered the town, it had been emptied of young Jewish men. Dozens of Jews were immediately shot. The Germans drove the Jews out of town in the direction of Zawiercie, and a number died of exhaustion on this forced march. After two weeks they were allowed to return.²

On a daily basis the Germans abused and humiliated prominent members of the community. They forced the rabbi, doctors, nurses, and pharmacists to sweep the streets. Other Jews were put to work repairing the rail line to Olkusz and Chrzanów. A Jewish Council (Judenrat), headed by Moshe Aharon Wolochinsky, was established. A Jewish police force was also recruited. Refugees from Upper Silesia, Kraków, and Łódź, seeking a more secure place, arrived in Wolbrom. Former residents who had left town before 1939 came home. Some who were in the Soviet-occupied area of pre-war Poland crossed the cease-fire line to rejoin their families.³

The Judenrat was responsible for extracting the money and goods demanded by the German authorities, organizing forced labor, monitoring the 7:00 p.m. until dawn curfew, and enforcing the order for Jews to wear a white armband with a blue Star of David on their sleeves. Jews were required to stay in their own dwellings, refrain from travel to other towns (except with a permit obtainable for a suitable bribe), shave their beards, and not eat white bread. Meat, butter, and eggs, most of which the Germans took from local farmers, were also forbidden to the Jews. Clothing and leather goods were confiscated from Jewish shops, as well as gold and silver, and put into military storehouses. The displacement of people from areas destined for annexation to Germany brought additional refugees to Wolbrom, which was near the new border. When the Jews of Kraków were driven out of the city and their apartments given to SS and Gestapo officers, hundreds more Jews arrived in Wolbrom. The local community struggled to absorb them, mostly in their own homes, with some put up in communal buildings. The Judenrat established a public kitchen, which by October 1940 was feeding up to 200 Jews, so no one went hungry despite the deplorable conditions.⁴

According to the records of the Jewish Social Self-Help (JSS) branch in Wolbrom, in May 1941, just prior to the German invasion of the Soviet Union, the German authorities established an open ghetto, which consisted of 177 houses located in the vicinity of the synagogue.⁵ From the summer of 1941, conditions for the Jews in Wolbrom worsened considerably. By early 1942, a much more brutal Gendarmerie officer, Leutnant Baumgarten, had taken over from Leutnant Müller in command of the 15-man Gendarmerie post on the outskirts of town. Under this new leadership, the Gendarmerie significantly increased the tempo of random killings, abuse, coercion, and demands for money, gold rings, silver synagogue ornaments, and fur coats.⁶ The few goods and valuables that people had in their homes were confiscated. The price of food shot up, resulting in increased shortages and hunger, and the overcrowded conditions exacerbated the deteriorating situation. On April 1, 1942, 4,940 Jews were registered as living in the Wolbrom ghetto, or more than 20 per house.⁷

In July 1942, the Germans set up a clothing factory in the Bet Midrash HaGadol (community study center), and all tailors were ordered to report with their sewing machines. In August the German authorities demanded 20 kilograms (44 pounds) of gold, which the Judenrat managed to collect in the naive hope that this would appease the occupiers.⁸

The SD office in Kraków organized the first Aktion in Wolbrom in early September 1942. Word spread that on Thursday, September 3, the rabbi and synagogue leaders had hidden the Torah scrolls in a crate and buried it in the old Jewish cemetery—a sure sign that disaster loomed. On Friday the SS notified the Judenrat that everyone was required to report to the market square by 8:00 a.m. on Saturday morning, including the old and the weak. They were to bring up to 10 kilograms (22 pounds) of food and clothing and leave the doors of their houses unlocked. Anyone attempting to flee or hide would be shot on the spot. The Jews made ready for the fateful day; some hid valuables in their homes. A number of them committed suicide by overdosing on pain-relieving medicine. On Saturday, September 5, the SS and Ukrainian auxiliaries, assisted by the German Gendarmerie and units of the Polish (Blue) Police surrounded the Jewish quarter. As people gathered in the square they saw wagonloads of conscripted Polish youth of the Baudienst carrying shovels and axes. Probably in excess of 6,000 people, including deportees and refugees, were assembled in the square. The initial step was to load about 300 elderly and weak people onto carts (as if to spare them the march to the train station) and take them to the Olkusk Forest opposite the Jewish cemetery, where they were stripped, shot, and thrown into open pits. The rest of those assembled were herded into a marshy area opposite the station.⁹

Jews from two neighboring towns (which had no train station) were brought to Wolbrom. Around 12:00 A.M., about 1,000 arrived from Żarnowiec. At 4:00 P.M., more than 1,000 from Pilica were brought in, swelling the assembly to more than 7,000. Towards evening the Germans separated out about 2,500 men, aged 18 to 50 and fit for work, and designated them for forced labor. The rest were sent east in cattle wagons to the Bełżec extermination camp.¹⁰

The workers, joined by Jews who had been hiding, were held in the community study center. For example, 23-year-old Willie Sterner gave himself up after hiding for three weeks, once he learned the fate of the rest of his family. Over the next few weeks, representatives of German factories came to claim the workers, in groups of several hundred, for forced labor, sending many of them to the Płaszów camp. Their number dwindled to about 150, who were put to work burying the dead and gathering abandoned household goods for shipment to Germany.¹¹

From mid-September 1942 until the liberation of the town at the end of 1944, nearly 400 Jews, who were found or denounced while in hiding, were shot at the Jewish cemetery. At the beginning of November 1942 the final contingent of Jews was sent to Bełżec from Wolbrom.¹²

SOURCES The yizkor book, edited by M. Geshuri, Wolbrom irenu (Tel Aviv: Association of Former Residents of Wolbrom in Israel, 1962), contains sections in Hebrew and Yiddish and has a few articles covering the war years and the Holocaust in Wolbrom. The ghetto in Wolbrom is also mentioned in Czesław Pilichowski et al., eds., Obozy hitlerowskie na ziemiach polskich 1939–1945: Informator encyklopedyczny (Warsaw: PWN, 1979), p. 569.

Documentation concerning the ghetto in Wolbrom can be found in the following archives: AŻIH (211/1131; 301/1699, 3263); BA-L (B 162/14504); IPN (Bühler Trial); ITS; USHMM (Acc.1997.A.0124 [JSS], 211/1131); VHF; and YVA.

Samuel Fishman

NOTES

1. Geshuri, Wolbrom irenu, pp. 22, 412–417.
2. Ibid., pp. 24–25.
3. Ibid., pp. 25, 56–57.
4. Ibid., pp. 26–27; Bericht des Kreishauptmanns in Miechów für September, October 4, 1940, published in Tatiana Berenstein et al., eds., Faschismus, Getto, Massenmord: Dokumentation über Ausrottung und Widerstand der Juden in Polen während des zweiten Weltkrieges (Berlin: Rütten & Loening, 1961), p. 217.

5. USHMM, Acc.1997.A.0124, 211/1131 (Wolbrom), p. 41. Geshuri, Wolbrom irenu, pp. 28–30, however, dates the establishment of the ghetto in April 1942.

6. BA-L, B 162/14504 (II 206 AR 1356/69), verdict of LG-Stutt, Ks 27/71, July 11, 1973, p. 8.

7. USHMM, Acc.1997.A.0124, 211/1131 (Wolbrom), p. 41. Geshuri, Wolbrom irenu, pp. 28–30.

8. Geshuri, Wolbrom irenu, p. 57.

9. BA-L, B 162/14504, verdict of LG-Stutt, Ks 27/71, July 11, 1973, pp. 9–12; Geshuri, Wolbrom irenu, pp. 58–59, 87; AŻIH, 301/3263.

10. Geshuri, Wolbrom irenu, p. 60; AŻIH, 301/3263.

11. Geshuri, Wolbrom irenu, p. 40; Israel Gutman, ed., The Encyclopedia of the Righteous among the Nations: Rescuers of Jews during the Holocaust—Poland (Jerusalem: Yad Vashem, 2004), pp. 760–761. Willie Sterner was later transferred to the Płaszów camp but managed to escape with aid of Aryan papers smuggled into the camp by Kazimiera Strzałka, who was later recognized by Yad Vashem as Righteous Among the Nations.

12. Geshuri, Wolbrom irenu, p. 40; AŻIH, 301/1699.

ŻABNO

Pre-1939: Żabno, town, Dąbrowa Tarnowska powiat, Kraków województwo, Poland; 1939–1945: Zabno, Kreis Tarnow, Distrikt Krakau, Generalgouvernement; post-1998: Żabno, województwo małopolskie, Poland

Żabno is located 69 kilometers (43 miles) east-northeast of Kraków. On the eve of World War II, between 500 and 600 Jews were living there.¹

Once the Germans occupied the town, the Jews were subjected to humiliations and restrictions. Jews had to wear armbands bearing the Star of David, and even children caught not wearing their armbands properly were severely beaten and could be shot. Soon after the start of the occupation, Jewish children were denied schooling. There were food shortages in the town, and people encountered difficulties in getting enough to eat. The Jews were prohibited from going more than 2 kilometers (1.2 miles) beyond the limits of the town, which reduced their ability to scavenge for food.² The Jews also were required to perform forced labor, with most being sent to work in agriculture on the estates in the surrounding countryside.

In May 1940, the Judenrat conducted a census of the Jewish population in Żabno, which served as the basis for reports prepared by the Żabno branch of the Jewish Social Self-Help (JSS).³ In November 1940, the Żabno Judenrat established a community kitchen that distributed 70 meals per day.⁴ According to the Żabno JSS report for August 1941, there were 634 Jews in the town. Among those Jews 20 were merchants, 15 were skilled workers, 187 were laborers (35 of whom were in labor camps), and 183 were unemployed. Jews owned 35 businesses at that time. While 250 Jews were receiving some sort of assistance, another 250 Jews in need were still seeking help. The community kitchen fed 220 people, 11 Jews received Group portrait of Jewish children in front of a stage set of a Purim celebration in Żabno, March 1941.

USHMM WS #32691, COURTESY OF ANN SHORE (HANIA GOLDMAN)

monetary assistance, 10 individuals received medical assistance (although there was no hospital in the town), and 50 Jews received additional help.⁵ By September 1941, the number still seeking assistance had increased to 253; the community kitchen gave out 280 meals per day; 25 people received financial assistance; 4 received medical help; and 75 received bread and flour. The report indicates that 37 Jews performed forced labor.⁶ The next Żabno JSS report for October 1941 shows that the number of Jews receiving assistance had increased to 320, while another 345 Jews seeking assistance had to be turned away empty-handed.⁷

On March 10 or 11, 1942, members of the Order Police from Dąbrowa Tarnowska and the Gestapo from Tarnów dragged between 30 and 40 Jews from their houses and shot them near the brick factory. The bodies were buried in one mass grave at the Jewish cemetery in Żabno. After the event, a few Jews fled from the town and hid with peasants in the countryside, in some cases in return for payment.⁸

The Żabno ghetto was established at the beginning of May 1942. About 700 Jews were confined within it.⁹ The ghetto was administered by the Order Police from Dąbrowa Tarnowska and the Tarnów Gestapo. There was overcrowding inside the ghetto, and the Jews lived in a state of uncertainty and fear. Some people referred to the Jewish area as the gettele (little ghetto) hoping that now their persecution would be diminished, as they only lived together with other Jews. They did not want to believe those Jews who claimed that the purpose of ghettoization was to concentrate the Jews to facilitate the German anti-Jewish Aktions.¹⁰ The German persecution of the Jews continued—on May 9, 1942, the Gestapo shot a Jewish man.¹¹ According to Polish court documentation, between March 12, 1942, and August 31, 1942, the Germans shot around 50 Jews in Żabno and its vicinity. The bodies were buried in three mass graves at the Jewish cemetery in Żabno. The shootings were carried out by members of the Gestapo from Tarnów and of the Order Police from Dąbrowa Tarnowska in conjunction with the Polish (Blue) Police and a member of the Sonderdienst named Fanyusz. Thus it appears that a dozen or so more Jews were shot in the period up to the liquidation of the ghetto.¹²

According to an order issued by the Kreishauptmann in Tarnów on July 15, 1942, Jews from the towns of Kreis Tarnów, except for the city of Tarnów itself, were required to move to concentration points in Dąbrowa Tarnowska, Brzesko, Tuchów, Zakliczyn, and Żabno by July 23, 1942.¹³ It is not known how many additional Jews were brought into the Żabno ghetto as a result of this order. Unfortunately, very few sources exist that can shed light on living conditions in the Żabno ghetto, as most of those Jews who survived escaped from Żabno before the ghetto was established.

The Żabno ghetto was liquidated in mid-September 1942, around the same time as the second large-scale deportation Aktion in the city of Tarnów. From the summer of 1942, the main officer dealing with Jewish affairs at the Tarnów Gestapo was an official named Rommelmann, who probably was responsible for coordinating the deportations in Kreis Tarnów on the orders of the SS- und Polizeiführer in Kraków. At the time of the deportations, Kreishauptmann Dr. Kipke issued proclamations threatening Poles with the death penalty for concealing Jews and ordering them not to buy or receive Jewish property.¹⁴ Most of the 650 or so Jews that remained in the Żabno ghetto were sent to the Bełżec extermination camp. About 40 Jews were left behind to clear out the area of the ghetto. At the end of October 1942, the Jews organized an escape into the nearby forests. Their fate remains unknown.¹⁵

The German occupation forces were driven out of Żabno by the Red Army in January 1945. Only 15 Jews are known to have survived the war and returned to Żabno, and most of these soon emigrated from Poland.

SOURCES Publications dealing with the history and persecution of the Jews in Żabno include the following: “Żabno,” in Abraham Wein and Aharon Weiss, eds., Pinkas ha-kehilot. Encyclopedia of Jewish Communities: Poland, vol. 3, Galicia and Western Silesia (Jerusalem: Yad Vashem, 1984), pp. 139–141; and “Żabno,” in Adam Bartosz, Tarnowskie judaica (Warsaw: Wydawnictwo PTTK “Kraj,” 1992), pp. 97–98.

Documents on the fate of the Jews in Żabno can be found in the following archives: AŻIH (301/3446); USHMM (Acc. 1997.A.0124 [JSS], reel 53; RG-15.019M, reels 3 and 15); and VHF (# 39906).

Joanna Śliwa

NOTES

1. Bartosz, Tarnowskie judaica, pp. 97–98; also see www.jewishinstitute.org.pl/en/gminy/miasto/650.html.

2. Story of Ann Shore [Hanna Goldman] in Howard Greenfeld, After the Holocaust (New York: Greenwillow Books, 2001), p. 8; VHF, # 39906, testimony of Ann Shore.

3. USHMM, Acc.1997.A.0124, reel 53, report of Żabno JSS, September 1–30, 1941.

4. Ibid., letter from Żabno Judenrat to JSS in Kraków, November 20, 1940.

5. Ibid., report of Żabno JSS, August 1–31, 1941.

6. Ibid., report of Żabno JSS, September 1–30, 1941.

7. Ibid., report of Żabno JSS, October 1–31, 1941.

8. Story of Ann Shore, in Greenfield, After the Holocaust, pp. 8–9; USHMM, RG-15.019M, reel 3, “Kwestionariusz o egzekucjach masowych i grobach masowych,” doc. 165. See also Shmuel Krakowski and Sara Bender, eds., The Encyclopedia of the Righteous among the Nations: Rescuers of Jews during the Holocaust—Poland, vol. 1 (Jerusalem: Yad Vashem, 2004), pp. 270–271.

9. Bartosz, Tarnowskie judaica, p. 98; www.jewishinstitute.org.pl/en/gminy/miasto/650.html; USHMM, RG-15.019M, reel 15, “Kwestionariusz o obozach,” doc. 78.

10. VHF, # 39906.

11. OKK, “Wykaz spraw . . .,” Zg 1946, p. 388.

12. USHMM, RG-15.019M, reel 3, “Kwestionariusz o egzekucjach masowych i grobach masowych,” doc. 166.

13. Ibid., Acc.1997.A.0124, reel 48, protocol of the JSS in Tarnów, July 31, 1942. See also Gazeta Żydowska, July 31, 1942.

14. Justiz und NS-Verbrechen, vol. 32 (Amsterdam: Amsterdam University Press, 2004), Lfd. Nr. 710a, pp. 390–391; and vol. 35 (2005), Lfd. Nr. 775, p. 303. On Rommelmann, see also AŻIH, 301/3446.

15. Bartosz, Tarnowskie judaica, p. 98.

ZAKLICZYN

Pre-1939: Zakliczyn, town, Tarnów powiat, Kraków województwo, Poland; 1939–1945: Kreis Tarnow, Distrikt Krakau, Generalgouvernement; post-1998: województwo małopolskie, Poland

Zakliczyn is located about 72 kilometers (45 miles) east-southeast of Kraków. On the outbreak of World War II, there were around 600 Jews (40 percent of the total population) living in Zakliczyn.¹

The German army entered Zakliczyn on September 5, 1939. The Germans established a Jewish Council (Judenrat) in Zakliczyn, chaired by Jakub Appel. Other Judenrat members included Mendel Ebenholz, Michał Frant, Izak Kirschenbaum, Roman Finder, and a woman—with the surname Weinstock.²

In 1940, around 220 Jewish refugees from Kraków (50 people), Krynica, and from the countryside arrived in Zakliczyn. The situation of the Jews living in the town was terrible: there was not enough food, medicine, or housing.³ In the first months of 1941, around 38 Jews from Zakliczyn were sent to the Pustków labor camp.⁴ Jews also performed forced labor on road construction in the area. In June 1941, the Zakliczyn branch of the Jewish Social Self-Help (JSS) was established, with Pinkas Kupfer as chair and Emil Lerner as his deputy.⁵ In October 1941 an epidemic of typhus broke out among the Jewish population of Zakliczyn: about 6 Jews contracted the disease.⁶ In December 1941 a kitchen for around 50 children was opened in Zakliczyn. Apart from receiving meals, the children celebrated Jewish holidays such as Hanukkah.⁷ The JSS was forced to close the community and children's kitchens in April 1942, due to lack of food. The Jewish inhabitants suffered from hunger and diseases related to malnutrition.⁸

On July 10, 1942, the Germans established a ghetto in Zakliczyn, which was sealed on July 23, 1942, at 9:00 A.M. The Jewish community had to pay the Germans a “contribution” of 50,000 złoty and surrender furniture and other valuable items.⁹ According to an order issued by the Kreishauptmann in Tarnów on July 15, 1942, Jews from the towns of Kreis Tarnow, except from the city of Tarnów itself, were required to move to concentration points in Dąbrowa Tarnowska, Brzesko, Tuchów, Zakliczyn, and Żabno by July 23, 1942.¹⁰ The Zakliczyn ghetto was an enclosed ghetto surrounded by barbed wire. There was only one gate located on the side that bordered the town square. The ghetto was located between the left side of Mickiewicz Street and Piłsudski Street, covering an area of around 500 square meters (598 square yards). The ghetto was under the authority of the Kreishauptmann in Tarnów, Dr. Kipke, his deputy Dr. Pyrnus, and SS-Sturmscharführer Wilhelm Rommelmann of the Security Police in Tarnów.¹¹ In the ghetto there were workshops for tailors and cobblers. The Jewish Police was established under the direction of Chaim Ebenholz. Its members included Hersz Frant, Kantorowicz, Stenek Schreiber, Handel, Spitzer, Mendel Finder, Schneiderman, Leon Dener, Dow Mikołajewicz, Hausman, Józef Schlanger, and Irom.¹²

More than 2,000 Jews from Zakliczyn and its vicinity were concentrated in the ghetto. Jews from Wojnicz (356), Czchów (290), Ciężkowice (286), Iwkowa (183), Uszwiał (147), Pleśna (58), Gromnik (57), Radłów (33), Szczurowa (14), Gumniska (11), and Wietrzychowice (4)—in total, 1,439 additional people—were forced into the ghetto. As communication with people outside the ghetto was cut off almost completely, and the Jews had virtually no financial resources left, there was starvation among the ghetto's inhabitants. Some of the Jewish refugees who arrived in Zakliczyn had already been resettled several times and were unable to bring with them much in the way of personal belongings. They were housed in barns and attics, with no sleeping mattresses, since the Jewish quarter consisted of only about 160 rooms and was unable to accommodate all the new arrivals. Around 20 people had to share one room. Until the end of summer people even slept outside. Before the influx of resettled Jews, about 50 Jews from Zakliczyn were receiving meals at the community kitchen. Thereafter the community kitchen had to feed 825 people.¹³ There was a Jewish medical unit in the ghetto directed by Dr. Helena Schajer-Ehrlichowa and Dr. Józef Bester.¹⁴

In mid-September 1942, German police forces liquidated the ghetto in Zakliczyn. The Jews were deported by rail from the Gromnik station to the Bełżec extermination camp. About 72 adult Jews and 1 child, mainly the members of the Jewish Police and the Judenrat and their families, were spared deportation. The Jews, planning on escaping to the forest, began to organize weapons with the aid of some Poles, but they were denounced to the Gestapo. On December 12, 1942, SS-Unterscharführer Rommelmann shot about 50 Jews in Zakliczyn, who were buried in a mass grave near the synagogue. The Germans ordered the synagogue to be dismantled afterwards. Around 20 Jews still remained to clean up the area of the ghetto. Five Jews had to bury the dead, and 4 Jewish girls were taken to the Tarnów ghetto. The remaining 16 Jews were taken to the Brzesko cemetery to be shot. Only 1 Jew was able to escape from this last remnant.¹⁵

Among the few survivors from the Zakliczyn ghetto were Regina (Rivka) Riegelhaupt and her two daughters Lea and Judit, who were smuggled out of the ghetto dressed as Polish peasants by a Polish acquaintance, Andrzej Piechniczek, shortly before the ghetto's liquidation. They survived by hiding with a number of poor peasants until the liberation but nearly starved. Others were not so lucky. German police from Zakliczyn shot Maria Pierzyński on January 20, 1944, for sheltering two Jews, Benjamin and Roman Sukman.¹⁶

SOURCES Publications dealing with the history of the Jews of Zakliczyn and their fate during the Holocaust include the following: "Zakliczyn," in Abraham Wein and Aharon Weiss, eds., Pinkas ha-kehillot. Encyclopaedia of Jewish Communities: Poland, vol. 3, Galicia and Western Silesia (Jerusalem: Yad Vashem, 1984), pp. 146–147; "Zakliczyn," in Adam Bartosz, Tarnowskie judaica (Warsaw: Wydawnictwo PTTK "Kraj," 1992), pp. 96–97.

Documents on the fate of the Jews in Zakliczyn can be found in the following archives: AŻIH (301/1758, 2038, 2051, and 3733); IPN; USHMM (Acc.1997.A.0124 [JSS], reel 52; RG-15.019M, reel 14); VHF (# 19005, 27431, and 31437); and YVA.

Joanna Śliwa

NOTES

1. Bartosz, Tarnowskie judaica, p. 96.
2. USHMM, Acc.1997.A.0124, reel 52, letter of Zakliczyn Judenrat to JSS headquarters in Kraków, December 8, 1940; AŻIH, 301/1758, testimony of Sala Ebenholz.
3. USHMM, Acc.1997.A.0124, reel 52, Zakliczyn JSS report of April 1, 1942, and letters of Zakliczyn Judenrat to JSS headquarters in Kraków on November 3 and 22 and December 8, 1940; VHF, # 31437, testimony of William Nattel.
4. USHMM, Acc.1997.A.0124, reel 52, Zakliczyn JSS to Kraków regarding the typhus epidemic, October 19, 1941; VHF, # 19005, testimony of Arthur Neigut; and # 31437.
5. USHMM, Acc.1997.A.0124, reel 52, Kraków JSS headquarters to Zakliczyn regarding the Zakliczyn JSS branch, June 9, 1941.
6. Ibid., Zakliczyn JSS to Kraków, November 17, 1941, and Zakliczyn JSS to Kraków regarding the typhus epidemic, October 19, 1941.
7. Ibid., Zakliczyn JSS to Kraków regarding kitchen for children, April 9, 1942, and Zakliczyn JSS to Kraków, November 9, 1941.
8. Ibid., Zakliczyn JSS to Kraków, April 15, 1942.
9. Ibid., note about the conversation with Dr. Spira from Kraków, July 23, 1942.

10. Ibid., Acc.1997.A.0124, reel 48, protocol of the JSS in Tarnów, July 31, 1942.

11. Bartosz, Tarnowskie judaica, p. 96; USHMM, RG-15.019M, reel 14, "Kwestionariusz o obozach"; Acc.1997.A.0124, reel 52, Zakliczyn JSS to Kraków, August 1, 1942, and Zakliczyn JSS to Kraków of August 1, 1942 (regarding the establishment of the Jewish district in Zakliczyn); AŻIH, 301/2051, testimony of Izrael Dawid Mikołajewicz; 301/2038, testimony of Stefan Sztuka; and 301/3733, pp. 3–4, testimony of Regina Riegelhaupt Kempnińska; Czesław Pilichowski et al., eds., Obozy hitlerowskie na ziemiach polskich 1939–1945: Informator encyklopedyczny (Warsaw: PWN, 1979). Rommelmann was sentenced to death by a Polish court on March 25, 1948, and executed on November 9, 1948.

12. AŻIH, 301/1758.

13. USHMM, Acc.1997.A.0124, reel 52, letter of Zakliczyn JSS to Kraków, August 1, 1942, and on the same date (regarding the establishment of the Jewish district in Zakliczyn); AŻIH, 301/2051.

14. USHMM, Acc.1997.A.0124, reel 52, letter of Zakliczyn JSS to Kraków, August 1, 1942.

15. Ibid., RG-15.019M, reel 14, województwo krakowskie, pp. 42–43; AŻIH, 301/2051; 301/2038; and 301/1758; VHF, # 27431, video testimony of Israel Mikel.

16. AŻIH, 301/3733; Shmuel Krakowski and Sara Bender, eds., The Encyclopedia of the Righteous among the Nations: Rescuers of Jews during the Holocaust—Poland (Jerusalem: Yad Vashem, 2004), p. 601; and Anna Poray-Wybranowski, Polish Righteous: Those Who Risked Their Lives (Canada: A. Poray), no. 460, Maria Pierzyński.

ŻMIGRÓD NOWY

Pre-1939: Żmigród Nowy, town, Kraków województwo, Poland; 1939–1945: Zmigrod Nowy, Kreis Jaslo, Distrikt Krakau, Generalgouvernement; post-1998: Nowy Żmigród, województwo podkarpackie, Poland

Żmigród Nowy is located about 140 kilometers (87 miles) southeast of Kraków. On the eve of World War II, 800 Jews were living in Żmigród Nowy.

The German army occupied Żmigród Nowy on September 8, 1939. They immediately started to impose restrictions on the Jews. Jews were prohibited from moving freely, were forced to wear armbands with the Star of David, had to pay "contributions" to the Germans, and were required to perform forced labor. On September 14, 1939 (the first day of Rosh Hashanah), German soldiers entered the synagogue and beat those worshipping there. On October 5, 1939 (the last night of the Jewish holiday of Sukkot), the Germans set fire to the synagogue and ordered the Jews to raze the building to the ground.

In November 1939, the Germans established a civil administration in the newly formed Generalgouvernement. Żmigród Nowy was incorporated into Kreis Jaslo, within Distrikt Krakau. Regierungsrat Dr. Walter Gentz was the Kreishauptmann from February 10, 1941.¹ The Border Police Office (Grenzpolizeikommissariat, GPK) was commanded from 1940 to 1943 by SS-Hauptsturmführer Dr. Wilhelm Raschwitz. Stationed in Żmigród was a unit of German Gendarmerie under Paul Roliff, which controlled the Polish (Blue) Police.

At the end of 1939, the Germans established a Jewish Council (Judenrat) in Żmigród Nowy headed by Hersz Eisenberg, which was subordinated to the Judenrat in Kreis Jasło on April 29, 1940. The Germans ordered the Judenrat to conduct a census of the Jewish population. The Judenrat was entrusted with distributing food and providing medical and housing assistance. It also prepared lists of Jews for work details to repair roads and bridges and to dig trenches. The forced laborers received meager food rations and suffered from disease. Every day about 50 Jews were sent out for road construction work for the German company of Emil Ludwig at Lipowce near Dukla. From the spring of 1941, several transports of Jews were sent to various forced labor camps from Żmigród.²

In 1940, Jews were brought into Żmigród Nowy from the surrounding villages. A public kitchen was established that initially distributed almost 200 meals per day. In February 1941, the aid committee of the Judenrat reported that 114 daily meals were supplied, 115 people received housing help, and 25 Jews received financial assistance. That same month a Society for Health Protection was created, headed by Hersz Eisenberg. In March and April 1941, 100 Jews from Kraków, 150 from Łódź, and 200 from Jasło were brought to Żmigród, raising the Jewish population to 1,500 and producing overcrowding. In addition, the Jews were ordered to surrender all valuable items to the Germans and, in December 1941, all fur clothing.

The increased Jewish population led to food shortages. On July 25, 1941, the Jewish Social Self-Help (JSS) branch in Żmigród sent a telegram to the main office in Kraków warning that 300 people were starving because the community kitchen had no food. On January 13, 1942, about 300 additional Jewish refugees from Jasło arrived in Żmigród. Attempts by the Judenrat to prevent this transfer were in vain. Living conditions in Żmigród deteriorated further; the JSS complained of a lack of medicine and reduced food rations due to the influx of refugees.

A "Jewish residential area" (open ghetto) was established in Żmigród Nowy in the first half of 1942. It was inhabited by the Jewish population of Żmigród and its vicinity, as well as by refugees. On its establishment, it contained about 1,300 Jews. The Żmigród Jewish residential area was not fenced in, but signs were put up around the open ghetto warning Jews that they were forbidden to leave the borders of the town on pain of death. The first Jewish victim of the Germans was "mute Dovid" who left the town to get flour from a peasant and was shot by the German police officer Kreil in 1942. There was immense overcrowding in the ghetto, and living conditions became unbearable. At the beginning of 1942, the authorities demanded 100,000 złoty from the Judenrat, threatening to kill chairman Eisenberg. In February 1942, the Judenrat made plans for Jews to be employed as craftsmen as a way for the Jews to become useful to the Germans and perhaps avoid deportation. Work outside the town also enabled some Jews to barter items illegally and smuggle food back into the ghetto.³

In May 1942, the JSS created a sanitary unit, which collected bedding and clothing for the poorest Jews, cleaned the living quarters, and distributed soap. The JSS also established a day care for 90 children, who were also fed in the public kitchen and received medical care. On June 17, 1941, the JSS created a mother and child committee headed by Rab Hersch that provided food to 72 Jewish children and 15 infants.⁴

On July 7, 1942, all the Jews in the Żmigród ghetto were ordered to assemble on the soccer field. At that time, there were around 2,000 Jews in the ghetto. German, Polish, and Ukrainian police units surrounded them. The able-bodied were ordered to register for work with representatives of various German companies. All Jews were required to hand in their valuables. Members of the Gestapo brutally murdered the chairman of the Judenrat in front of the other Jews. A group of 1,250 Jews, composed mostly of women, children, the sick, and the elderly, was taken by truck to a forest near Hałbów, where the Germans shot them and buried them in a mass grave. On July 12, 1942, around 150 Jews were sent to the Płaszów concentration camp. On August 15, 1942, a group of Jews was sent to the Zasław labor camp near Kraków. The remaining Jews of Żmigród were deported to the Bełżec extermination camp at the end of the summer in 1942.⁵

About 70 or 80 Jews managed to escape the July 1942 deportation Aktion and hid in the forests, but most were hunted down by German and Polish police. For example, on April 25, 1943, the Gestapo shot 16 people, including 2 Jewish children. They took the Jews from a local prison and shot them in a mass grave near the Jewish cemetery in Żmigród. In the second half of 1943, 3 Jews from Żmigród were caught by the Germans and brought to the Jasło prison, where they committed suicide.⁶

After the war the Jewish community of Żmigród was not revived. The survivors immigrated to Israel and the United States. After World War II, Żmigród regained its status as a town and was renamed Nowy Żmigród.

SOURCES Publications dealing with the persecution and murder of the Jews in Żmigród Nowy include the following: "Nowy Zmigrod," in Abraham Wein and Aharon Weiss eds., Pinkas ha-kehillot. Encyclopaedia of Jewish Communities: Poland, vol. 3, Galicia and Western Silesia (Jerusalem: Yad Vashem, 1984), pp. 152–154; and the memoir by Leo Rosner, The Holocaust Remembered—A Child Survivor's Account of Imprisonment and Redemption 1939–1945 (2003).

Documents on the extermination of the Jews in Żmigród Nowy can be found in the following archives: AŻIH (301/1764); BA-L (B-162/14484); IPN (Dsn 13/5/67/"W" 1093; Dsn 13/5/67/"W"/393; OK Rzeszów S 13/67/R; Sąd Grodzki w Jaśle Zg 8/47; AGK Tarnów-Rzeszów, sygn. 5, k. 167); USHMM (Acc.1997.A.0124 [JSS], reel 54; RG-15.019M, reels 10 and 17; RG-50.002*0033; RG-50.002*0039; RG-50.431*0788); and YVA.

Joanna Śliwa

NOTES

1. BA-L, B-162/14484 (II 206 AR-Z 827/63), verdict of LG-Arns, 6 Ks 4/70, December 5, 1972, pp. 11–13; Dr. Gentz, who committed suicide in 1967, succeeded Regierungsrat Dr. Ludwig Losacker in this post.

2. USHMM, RG-50.002*0033; and RG-50.002*0039.

3. IPN, Tarnów-Rzeszów, sygn. 5, k. 167; and Dsn 13/5/67/“W” 1093; A. Eisenbach, “Ludność żydowska w Królestwie polskim w końcu XIX w., BŻIH, no. 30 (1959): 94; BA-L, B-162/ 14484, verdict of LG-Arns, 6 Ks 4/70, December 5, 1972; USHMM, RG-50.002*0033; RG-50.002*0039; and Acc.1997.A.0124, reel 54.

4. USHMM, Acc.1997.A.0124, reel 54.

5. BA-L, B 162/14484, verdict of LG-Arns, 6 Ks 4/70, December 5, 1972; Stanisław Zabierowski, Rzeszowskie pod okupacją hitlerowską (Warsaw: Książka i Wiedza, 1975), pp. 181–182; and AŻIH, 301/1764, testimony of Moses Einhorn, January 17, 1946.

6. IPN, Dsn 13/5/67/“W” 1093; Dsn 13/5/67/“W”/393; OK Rzeszów S 13/67/R; and Sąd Grodzki w Jaśle Zg 8/47; USHMM, RG-15.019M, reels 10 and 17.

LUBLIN REGION

People walk along a commercial street near the Lublin ghetto entry sign, ca. 1941–1942. The sign reads, “GHETTO! Entry for Wehrmacht (personnel) is forbidden.”
USHMM WS #65614

LUBLIN REGION (DISTRIKT LUBLIN)

Pre-1939: parts of the Lublin, Lwów, and Warsaw województwa, Poland; 1941–1945: Distrikt Lublin, Generalgouvernement; post-1998: parts of the Lublin and Podkarpackie województwa, Poland, and the L'viv oblast', Ukraine

Distrikt Lublin was established on October 26, 1939, as one of the initial four Distrikte of the Generalgouvernement. Spanning 26,660 square kilometers (10,294 square miles), the Distrikt, composed of territories from pre-war Poland, encompassed almost the entire Lublin województwo, a territorial sliver from the Warsaw województwo, and small parts of the Lwów województwo required to extend its southern frontier to the San River.

Some 2.4 million people resided in the Distrikt, including 240,000 to 300,000 Jews. The Jewish population fluctuated, initially because tens of thousands fled German occupation by crossing into neighboring Soviet-occupied Poland.

General Governor Hans Frank leads a tour in the Lublin ghetto, following completion of a deportation Aktion, June 2, 1942. Pictured from left to right in the front row are an unidentified German army officer, unidentified General Government official, SS-Gruppenführer Richard Wendler, Frank, unidentified Luftwaffe officer, Ernst Zörner, Otto Wächter, Ernst Kundt, and an unidentified SS officer.

USHMM WS #61417, COURTESY OF ARCHIWUM DOKUMENTACJI MECHANICZNEJ

On October 26, 1939, Friedrich Schmidt was named the first governor of Distrikt Lublin. Ernst Otto Zörner, the former mayor of Dresden and German-occupied Kraków, succeeded him on February 21, 1940. Kreishauptmänner governed 10 Kreise, centered in Biała Podlaska, Biłgoraj, Chełm, Hrubieszów, Janów, Krasnystaw, Lublin, Puławy, Radzyń Podlaski, and Zamość. A Stadthauptmann oversaw the municipality of Lublin. Odilo Globocnik, the SS and Police Leader (SSPF) of Distrikt Lublin, was the senior police official in the Distrikt, subordinated to the Higher SS and Police Leader (HSSPF) of the Generalgouvernement. Through February 1942, civilian officials oversaw Jewish affairs.

German civilian authorities, present in the Distrikt from October 4, 1939, used increasingly more uniform antisemitic decrees to deprive Jews of their social, economic, and cultural rights. From October 10, Otto Strössenreuther, the Kreishauptmann in Janów, met weekly with the newly appointed heads of local collaborationist civilian administrations, initially native Poles appointed wójtowie (singular, wójt) and mayors, to convey various orders. At the December 14 meeting, he required Jewish Councils to sell armbands with Jewish stars for 2 złoty and mandated the Jews to wear them by January 5, 1940. In late December 1939, Strössenreuther forbade Jews from selling or transferring property. At the January 5, 1940, meeting, he excluded Jewish children from primary education.¹

Absent from the order portfolios in Kreis Janow, the only place where such early documentation wholly survived, are decrees by Generalgouverneur Hans Frank mandating forced labor and Jewish Councils (October 26 and November 28, 1939). In more eastern areas, where a brief Soviet occupation delayed the civilian administration's establishment, survivors recall that the SS issued the marking decrees and civilian officials ordered the Jewish Councils established.² Created across the Distrikt by January 1940, the Jewish Councils initially were composed of pre-war community leaders.

David Silberklang has suggested the well-documented rivalry between civilian authorities and Globocnik for control of Jewish policy made the former reluctant to establish ghettos. Mid-August 1940 raids conducted by the SS on Jewish communities throughout Distrikt Lublin for labor camp conscription at Bełżec convinced them that ghettoization would facilitate Globocnik's drive. "By not establishing ghettos," Silberklang explains, "civilian authorities in effect made the job of the SS more difficult and increased their own involvement in Jewish affairs. Without a ghetto, the SS would need increasingly to turn to the civilian authorities."³ As a result, in September 1941, the Kreishauptmänner reported ghettos existed in just 11 places: Biała Podlaska, Irena, Lublin, Opole, Piaski Luterskie, Zamość, and the towns of Kreis Radzyn (e.g., Kock, Lubartów, Łuków, Międzyrzec Podlaski, and Radzyń Podlaski, with Ostrów, on September 1, transferred to Kreis Lublin-Land).

SS-Gruppenführer Odilo Globocnik, the SS and Police Leader of Lublin, reviews troops [after November 9, 1942].
USHMM WS #09538, COURTESY OF IPN

The research conducted for this volume indicates that the September 1941 lists should not be the benchmark to determine the extent of ghettoization in Distrikt Lublin. By then, at least 26 ghettos had been established. Some had disappeared. Others had not yet been created. Required to resettle Jews in the Distrikt from December 1939 and to respond to related demands for increased security, German authorities had established a complex policy to confine and isolate Jews, of which ghettos were just a part.

The first ghetto was established in Puławy (October 1939), where war devastation left little available space for the Kreis administration. A larger effort to concentrate Jews came in October and November, when Radzyn Kreishauptmann Hennig von Winterfeld designated Ostrów and Kock the Juden-reservate (Jewish reservations) for the Kreis's 32,430 Jews. From mid-October through November, the SS transferred thousands of Jews to the Reservate. In Lubartów, an open ghetto, of a few streets, was established for workers (and their families) retained for labor.

In Kreis Pulawy, an informal Reservat emerged from late December 1939, after the Puławy ghetto was disbanded and the SS forcibly expelled its residents to Opole. May 1940 bans on Jewish residence in spa towns brought the expulsion of the Jews from Nałęczów. Expellees not sent to labor camps ended up in Opole, the only place where Kreishauptmann Alfred Brandt permitted all Jewish newcomers to register.⁴

These early efforts to concentrate Jews vaguely echoed Adolf Eichmann's use of a sliver of Distrikt Lublin, near the San River, for a Judenreservat for expellees from Vienna, Katowice, and Morawska-Ostrava. Under the Nisko Plan (October 1939), the so-called useful Jews among the first 3,587 (of 4,088) deportees constructed a retraining camp in Zarzecze. Those deemed nonuseful were pushed over the Soviet frontier.

The Nisko Plan slowed ghettoization in Distrikt Lublin, as expulsions, such as the Chełm death march (including about 3,000 Jews from Chełm, Hrubieszów, and Dubienka) on November 30–December 1, 1939, gained the upper hand. On December 6, Winterfeld changed course, ordering hundreds of Jews in Radzyń to Sławatycze, a border town, to await expulsion. In Zamość, Kreishauptmann Helmuth Weihenmaier, believing an expulsion imminent, imprisoned 150 Jews from Włocławek. The Radzyń expellees received permission to return to Kreis Radzyn in April 1940, on the formal suspension of the Nisko Plan. Only some were allowed to resettle in Radzyń. Returnees were required to be vetted by the Jewish Council, to pay a fee, and to reside in the historic Jewish neighborhood, recognized as an open ghetto in the late spring of 1940.

Ghettoization was shaped even more decisively by the October 30, 1939, decision to expel to the Generalgouvernement a projected 1 million Polish Christians and Jews from territories the Germans were annexing to the Reich to make room for ethnic German settlers from the Baltic states and Volhynia. Janina Kielboń conservatively estimates that 30,140 Polish Jews (including 5,570 prisoners of war [POWs]), 32,000 Polish Christians, and 24,000 ethnic Germans were resettled in Distrikt Lublin between 1939 and 1940. An additional 3,220 Jewish expellees (including 1,200 from Stettin and 1,020 from Kraków) arrived that year.⁵

Kielboń has shown that the Warthegau deportees were distributed across the Distrikt (probably to speed the expulsions and to secure local Polish authorities' acquiescence, as Heinrich Himmler, the director of the resettlement initiative, required they assume responsibility for the expellees). In most Kreise, Jewish deportees were divided among many Jewish communities, where the appropriate Jewish Council and subsequently the local branch of the Jewish Social Self-Help (JSS) organization, formally established in Kraków in January 1940, became responsible for them. An exception was in Kreis Krasnystaw, where Izbica and Turobin were designated from December 1939 for the resettlement of Polish Jewish deportees. Reich deportees were divided between fewer localities. The Stettin expellees, for example, were settled in Bełżyce, Głusk, and Piaski Luterskie.

In Ostrów, where 5,000 Jewish expellees had arrived by early January 1940, Winterfeld began permitting local Jews expelled to the Reservate to return home and instead designated Kock for Jewish newcomers.⁶ In Kock, no ghetto replaced the Reservat because Winterfeld refused to provide rations to unemployed Jews or to permit the Kock JSS food purchases from cheaper government resources, thereby making the deportees the responsibility of the local Jewish community. In Ostrów, a ghetto replaced the Reservat. Winterfeld provided rations (initially bulk food grants), enabling the JSS to distribute meals to 850 Poznań deportees. The assistance probably was required, as the Jews formally were confined to a ghetto.

Jews line up in front of a public kitchen sponsored by the Jewish Social Self-Help (JSS) office in Biała Podlaska, 1941–1942.

USHMM WS #18548, COURTESY OF ZIH IMENIA EMANUELA RINGELBLUMA

The arrival of Polish Christian expellees sometimes hastened ghettoization, but rationing policies constrained official recognition of what had occurred. In Szczepieszyn, pressures to house the newcomers resulted in the establishment of a ghetto in the winter of 1940–1941. However, the ghetto (and another open ghetto, established in the summer of 1940 in Biłgoraj) officially did not exist, as Biłgoraj Kreishauptmann Werner Ansel never provided nutritional assistance to unemployed Jews. For this reason, the Jews were permitted to leave the ghetto to purchase food. Similarly, the Krasnystaw Jewish Council, in official correspondence, mentioned not a ghetto, ordered by Kreishauptmann Hartmut Gerstenhauer on August 9, 1940, but spoke of the relocation of the Jews to a new neighborhood. In Chełm, circumstantial evidence indicates the Cholmer Aktion (September 2–December 14, 1940), which brought 28,365 Polish Christians to a relocation camp and saw the permanent Polish population grow by 10 percent (the largest increase in the Distrikt), sparked the German mayor's ghettoization decree on October 30, 1940.

In 1940, ghettos also were established in Łęczna (January), Kazimierz Dolny (March), Wisznice (November), and Piaski (December 31). In these cases, officials also were responding to local conditions. Emil Ziegenmeyer, Kreishauptmann of Lublin-Land, ordered an open ghetto established in Łęczna because his official residence was located there. In Wisznice, designated for Ukrainian settlement, newly appointed local authorities confined the Jews to the first closed ghetto in the Distrikt, enabling Ukrainian newcomers to appropriate their residences. The Wehrmacht's use of Kazimierz for rest and recreation leaves contributed to ghettoization there.

Elsewhere, the decision to transfer responsibility for expellees onto Jewish communities delayed ghettoization. For this reason, too, when expulsions resumed in November 1940, with the formal abandonment of the Madagascar Plan, some 3,436 Jews from Kraków, expelled by April 1941, initially were distributed among almost every Jewish community in the Jews are rounded up for deportation in the Wisznice ghetto, 1942.

USHMM WS #03831, COURTESY OF ELIEZER AND JENELLY ROSENBERG

Distrikt. In mid-December 1940, at least 3,000 Jews from Mława and Ciechanów arrived in Kriesie Biała Podlaska and Radzyń. On February 15 and 27, some 2,006 Viennese expellees were directed to Opole. On March 5, another 981 Viennese deportees were resettled in Modliborzyce. On March 10–13, 3,000 Jews from Konin arrived in Kreis Krasnystaw.

Preparations for the invasion of the Soviet Union (June 22, 1941) spurred the next significant round of ghettoization. Ghettos were established in Irena and Janów Podlaski (January), Ryki and Opole (March), Lublin and Wąwolnica (April), Łuków and Zamość (May), and Zwierzyńiec. The presence of significant military installations or the quartering of troops almost always prompted the decrees.

Hobbled by rationing policies, the JSS established the deepest welfare programs in ghettos, such as Chełm, where Jews received rations and could not safely leave, and ghettoization was complete. The fact most Jews in the Distrikt lived outside of ghettos and until the spring and again in the summer of 1941 could move around relatively freely permitted some to evade ghettoization and nearby communities to respond to the plight of those in ghettos. During the winter of 1940–1941, the Jewish communities of Sławatycze and Parczew transported thousands of kilograms of donated and purchased food to Mława expellees confined to the Wisznice ghetto.

Privileged Jews, usually craftsmen, medical personnel, and others employed by the Germans, often resided outside of ghettos (e.g., Radzyń, Wisznice, Piaski, and Lublin) at times in specifically designated areas (e.g., Szczepieszyn and Zamość). Typhus outbreaks from December 1939 and epidemics (in the spring of 1941 and the fall of 1941 through the winter of 1942) in overcrowded Jewish (and non-Jewish) communities likely made some Distrikt authorities recognize that ghettos would be seedbeds of infectious diseases and prompted the decision to allow some Jews to live outside the ghetto. In Chełm, Kazimierz, and Opole, where ghettoization was complete, non-Jewish deportees from Vienna live in crowded barracks in Opole, ca. 1941.

USHMM WS #45838, COURTESY OF LILLI SCHISCHA TAUBER

Jews were permitted to enter the ghetto to seek out the services of craftsmen.

On January 17, 1941, Zörner established the basis for a new form of concentration by recommending Kreishauptmänner and mayors contain Jews to fewer places, ostensibly to cut down on illegal trade and smuggling but really to keep Jews out of militarized areas and towns.⁷ The orders saw Ziegenmeyer place northern Kreis Lublin-Land off limits to new expellees and to designate Bychawa, Chodel, and Bełżyce not as ghettos but rather as Judensammelorte (assembly points for Jews) for future expellees. The Konin expellees were divided between Izbica and Józefów, effectively the Sammelorte for new Warthegau deportees to Kreise Krasnystaw and Bilgoraj. On January 23, 1941, Janow Kreishauptmann Hans Asbach first deployed the recommendation locally ordering 1,000 Jews (mainly Łódź deportees) expelled to Radomyśl nad Sanem, a community of fewer than 311 native Jews. The larger Radomyśl nad Sanem gmina served in practice as the Sammelort for all new Jewish deportees to the Kreis, including in November some 400 from Kraków.⁸

Expulsions to what in effect were Sammelorte sometimes forestalled ghettoization. In Biała Podlaska, the Jewish Council reported a ghettoization decree, initially issued on January 4, 1941, was rescinded after 1,507 mainly Kraków expellees accepted “voluntary resettlement” to Podedwórze-Opole and Piszczac. Forced to live in barns, the Podedwórze-Opole expellees began returning almost immediately, prompting authorities to establish a ghetto in Biała Podlaska by the early summer of 1941.

In Lublin, where 10,000 Jews were expelled on March 10–13, 1941 (initially to the Sammelorte of Kreis Lublin-Land), and voluntary resettlements soon followed, the expulsions were intended to establish a small ghetto, officially for 25,000. (Some 14,149 Jews refused resettlement, making the ghetto population much larger.) In Zamość, too, 900 (mostly Warthegau) expellees were forcibly transferred to Komarów or Krasnobród before a ghetto was established. To prevent their return, Kreishauptmann Helmuth Weißenmayer extended to the expellees the same rations he provided nonworking Jews in the Zamość ghetto.

Expulsions resulted in significant reductions in the size of some ghettos. In Krasnystaw, after 950 to 1,250 Jews were expelled in May to the Zakrzew gmina, just 250 to 300 were left in the ghetto. Similar expulsions in Kazimierz led to the establishment of a labor ghetto and the creation in Wąwolnica of a ghetto for those with direct family ties to the locality.

Opole, long used to dump unwanted Jews, was the only informal Sammelort transformed into a ghetto. Its barbed-wire fencing was replaced in June by a 2.5-meter-high (8.2-foot-high) wooden fence. In June, a fence also was erected around the Piaski ghetto. Yet, that same month, authorities rejected the request of the wójt in Bełżyce (like Piaski, in Kreis Lublin-Land) to transform the Sammelort into a closed ghetto, because no fencing material existed. In practice, authorities preferred territorial solutions, such as expanding preexisting Sammelorte (e.g., in Radomyśl).

Many survivors recall overcrowding, poor sanitary conditions, and hunger existed in ghettos. However, as the Jews desiring to remain in Lublin, Kazimierz, and Biała Podlaska attest, conditions were comparatively better in most ghettos than in the Sammelorte. The worst material conditions for Jews in the Distrikt probably were in Józefów, Radomyśl, and Izbica, with the latter perhaps not officially declared a ghetto before the summer of 1942.⁹

In Radomyśl, some 600 Kraśnik expellees were crowded into the synagogue or lived 10 to a room with native Jews. Food reserves for the Polish Christian population, swelled by 600 Warthegau newcomers, were so limited the wójt feared the Jews would starve. Most survived by begging for food in the countryside. In November and December 1941, after Frank imposed the death penalty on Jews throughout the Generalgouvernement found without permission outside their places of registration and a Jew from Radomyśl was shot dead, the local JSS chair noted that “almost the entire town [almost all the Jews] were condemned to extinction.” By mid-January 1942, 25 to 30 Kraśnik expellees had died from a lack of food.¹⁰

Frank’s proscriptions did not see any place where Jews resided transformed into open ghettos. The only ghetto established in the autumn of 1941 was in September, in Urzędów. It was organized to provide the Heinkel Company (Heinkel Werke) a captive winter labor pool to transform a factory in Dąbrowa-Bór into an airplane repair facility.

In none of the approximately 25 responses to the April 1942 JSS ghetto questionnaire did a Jewish official describe the entire locality as a ghetto. Positive responses, including in Janów Podlaski, Lubartów, Łęczna, Łuków, Ostrów, Wisznice, and Zwierzyniec, indicate that ghettos in the Distrikt were defined narrowly as residential areas, of a limited number of houses. Negative responses were received from among others such as Biłgoraj, Hrubieszów, Kock, Międzyrzec, Modliborzyce, Parczew, Piszczac, Terespol, Włodawa, and Wojsławice. Rather, Frank’s orders were understood as part of a complex group of decrees, which had restricted Jewish movement in different degrees, at various times and places.¹¹

The final phase of ghetto construction occurred during the deportations to killing centers. Around October 13, 1941, Himmler ordered Globocnik to begin work on the Bełżec extermination facility and appointed him to organize, oversee, and implement Operation Reinhard throughout the Generalgouvernement, elevating him above Friedrich Wilhelm Krüger, his formal superior. On the eve of the expulsions, the SS increased labor camp conscription quotas. Civilian authorities issued new identification cards to separate so-called productive Jews from the remainder of the population. To facilitate the expulsions, the Lublin ghetto in February 1942 was fenced and partitioned, with the smaller ghetto on March 16 designated for those who worked for the Germans and the much larger ghetto A for those slated for expulsion.

The deportations in the Generalgouvernement began in Lublin, with the expulsion of 30,000 Jews to Bełżec from March 17–28 and March 31–April 14, 1942. (Several thousand were killed in or outside of Lublin.) To root out fugitives, the SS ordered those retained for labor relocated to a closed ghetto in Majdan Tatarski. On April 20, 2,500 to 4,000 illegal ghetto residents were shot, leaving just 3,300 to 4,000 Lublin Jews in the remnant ghetto.

The deportations expanded to touch almost every community during March and April 1942. The first wave targeted small numbers of mainly elderly. However, in Kraśnik, most of the Jews were sent to Bełżec on April 12, 1942, as the Kreis administration, scheduled to move there, needed their homes. In Irena, Izbica, Końskowola, Krasnystaw, Kraśniczyn, Lubartów, Opole, Rejowiec, Piaski, Tyszowce, and Zamość, a considerable part of the Jewish population was gassed at Bełżec so their places could be filled temporarily by foreign deportees.

Approximately 85,000 foreign Jews arrived in Distrikt Lublin between March 13 and June 20, 1942, as part of Operation Reinhard. The deportees included 19,000 to 25,000 Germans, 6,000 Austrians, 14,000 Czechs and Slovaks from the Protectorate of Bohemia and Moravia, and 39,899 Slovaks and Hungarians from Slovakia. About 63,000 passed through one of the designated consolidation or collection points, officially known as Hauptunterbringungs- und Umschlagpunkte (literally, main accommodation and loading/unloading points). A few thousand deportees were sent to labor camps, while transports carried another approximately 18,000 directly to killing centers. A few places (e.g., Piaski, Izbica, and Rejowiec) became revolving doors.

From May 6, 1942, the expulsions became more systematic, moving across Kreise, from Pulawy, Krasnystaw, Cholm, Zamosc, Hrubieszow, and Biala Podlaska before temporarily halting on June 12. At least eight remnant ghettos (e.g., Kurów, Rejowiec, Tomaszów Lubelski, Tyszowce, and Hrubieszów) were established for the few Jews retained for labor. Some ghettos (e.g., Opole and Irena) were used to consolidate Jews from nearby communities and thereby bring them closer to railway connections. The Jews almost all were killed at the Sobibór extermination camp, opened in May.

The mass shooting in July and early August 1942 of 1,700 Jews in Józefów and 2,187 in Łomazy shattered the lull, extended killing operations into Kreis Bilgoraj and renewed them in Kreis Biala Podlaska. From mid-August, the expulsions systematically enveloped Kreise Cholm, Zamosc, and Lublin-Land (via Piaski). The expulsions appeared more tentative in Kreise Biala Podlaska and Radzyn and parts of Kreis Pulawy because killing operations at Treblinka, opened in July, had bogged down. (The choice of killing center was determined by the fact that the Jews lived near the main railway line to Treblinka or its Lublin switching junction in Dęblin.) Repeated sweeps in October and early November focused on sending those earlier retained for labor in remnant ghettos to killing centers or to the Majdanek concentration camp, along with almost all Jews in Kreise Janow, Cholm, Biala Podlaska, and Radzyn not imprisoned in labor camps.

To facilitate the expulsions, new collection ghettos were established in Tarnogród, Kraśnik, Zaklików, Międzyrzec, Włodawa, and Izbica. Some Jews (mainly men) were imprisoned at nearby labor camps (e.g., Krychów, Majdanek, Poniatowa, Trawniki, Budzyń, Małaszewicze Duże, etc.), at new labor camps (e.g., Bełżyce, Cholm, Kraśnik, Jatkowa, etc.) established at the time of the expulsions, and in northern Distrikt Lublin (e.g., Kreise Biala Podlaska and Radzyn) in fenced remnant ghettos (e.g., Kock, Komarówka Podlaska, and Parczew).

Officially, orders from October 28, 1942, permitted Jews to reside outside of labor camps in just eight remnant ghettos: Izbica, Piaski, Włodawa, Końskowola, Międzyrzec, Łuków, Parczew, and Zaklików. In practice, no such ghetto existed in Zaklików. Some collection ghettos (e.g., Rejowiec) existed alongside the remnant ghettos until the spring of 1943. They, like the longest-lived remnant ghettos, also were used as labor ghettos (e.g., Łuków, Międzyrzec) or as temporary sites to imprison Jews (e.g., Końskowola) from outside the Distrikt during transportation bottlenecks or backlogs in murder operations at Bełżec or Sobibór. Liquidated in stages, the last ghetto, in Międzyrzec, disappeared in July 1943, with the execution of its 200 to 300 Jewish residents.

In researching ghettos in Distrikt Lublin, documentation was examined for 120 communities. Materials discovered in contemporary Jewish materials, including American Jewish Joint Distribution Committee (AJDC) and JSS records, resulted in the addition of several communities (e.g., Rossosz, Urzędów, and Zwierzyniec) never previously thought to have had ghettos. For some communities (e.g., Łomazy), entries were included when new documentation indicated no ghetto existed, but nonetheless it was still open to question. Documentation was found to have been misinterpreted for some places (e.g., in Firlej) but mostly to have been too sparse in others (e.g., in Kamionka, Kodeń, and Michów), long believed to have had ghettos.

Wherever possible, contributors included a discussion of Reservate, Sammelorte, and Hauptunterbringungs- und Umschlagpunkte, while maintaining the focus on ghettos, the subject of the volume, and on representing as accurately as possible how German authorities and Jews (contemporaries and survivors) understood them. The absence of entries for some places (e.g., Radomyśl, Józefów, Podedwórze-Opole, and Kraśniczyn) known to have been communities in which Jews were concentrated provides a reminder that ghettos were but one part of a complex, evolving German policy, designed to exploit and to isolate Jews while facilitating the transformation of Distrikt Lublin into one of the Holocaust's primary killing grounds.

SOURCES Secondary works with regional coverage about the history of Jews in the Distrikt Lublin ghettos include Tatiana Berenstein, "Martyrologia, opór i zagłada ludności żydowskiej w dystrykcie lubelskim," BŻIH 21 (1957): 21–92; Christopher R. Browning, Ordinary Men: Reserve Police Battalion 101 and the Final Solution in Poland (New York: HarperCollins, 1992); M.J. Fajgenbaum, Podlaskie in umkum: Notitsn fun burben (Munich: Aroysgegebn fun der Tsentraler Historisher Komisyse baym Ts. K. fun di bafrayte Yidn in der Amerikaner Zone in Daytshland, 1948); Daniel J. Goldhagen, Hitler's Willing Executioners: Ordinary Germans and the Holocaust (New York: Knopf, 1996); Janina Kiełboń, Migracje ludność w dystrykcie lubelskim w latach 1939–1944 (Lublin: Państwowe Muzeum na Majdanku, 1995); Shmuel Krakowski, The War of the Doomed: Jewish Armed Resistance in Poland, 1942–1944, trans. Orah Blaustein (New York: Holmes & Meier Publishers, Inc., 1984); Robert Kuwałek, "Getta tranzytowe w dystrykcie lubelskim," in Dariusz Libionka, ed., Akcja Reinhardt. Zagłada Żydów w Generalnym Gubernatorstwie (Warsaw: IPN, 2004), pp. 138–160; Zygmunt Mańkowski, "Pierwsze miesiące okupacji niemieckiej w Kraśniku (październik 1939–maj 1940)," Regionalista, no. 7 (1997): 58–63; Bogdan Musiał, Deutsche Zivilverwaltung und Judenverfolgung im Generalgouvernement: Eine Fallstudie zum Distrikt Lublin 1939–1944 (Wiesbaden: Harrassowitz, 1999); Dieter Pohl, Von der "Judenpolitik" zum Judenmord. Der Distrikt Lublin des Generalgouvernements 1939–1944 (Frankfurt am Main: Peter Lang, 1993); Arnon Rubin, The Rise and Fall of the Jewish Communities in Poland and Their Relics Today, vol. 2, District Lublin (Tel Aviv: Tel Aviv University Press, 2007); David Silberklang, "Defining the Ghettos: Jewish and German Perspectives in the Lublin District," in Jonathan Petropoulos, Lynn Rapaport, and John K. Roth, eds., Lessons and Legacies, vol. 9, Memory, History, and Responsibility: Reassessments of the Holocaust, Implications for the Future (Evanston, IL: Northwestern University Press, 2010), pp. 106–123; David Silberklang, "The Holocaust in the Lublin District" (Ph.D. diss., Hebrew University, Jerusalem, February 2003); and Abraham Wein, Bracha Freundlich, and Wila Orbach, eds., Pinkas ha-kehillot. Encyclopaedia of Jewish Communities: Poland, vol. 7, Lublin and Kielce (Jerusalem: Yad Vashem, 1999).

Works providing coverage of various Reserve schemes and the radical population relocation programs that shaped ghettoization in the region include, among others, Götz Aly, "Final Solution": Nazi Population Policy and the Murder of the European Jews, trans. Belinda Cooper and Allison Brown (London: Arnold, 1999); Christopher R. Browning, The Origins of the Final Solution: The Evolution of Nazi Jewish Policy, September 1939–March 1942 (Jerusalem: Yad Vashem, 2004); Philip Friedman, "The Lublin Reservation and the Madagascar Plan: Two Aspects of Nazi Jewish Policy during the Second World War," in Ada June Friedman, ed., Roads to Extinction: Essays on the Holocaust (Philadelphia: Jewish Publication Society of America, 1980), pp. 34–59; Se'ev Goshen, "Eichman und die Nisko-Aktion im Oktober 1939," Vierteljahrshefte für Zeitgeschichte 19:1 (3 January 1981): 74–96; Jonny Moser, "Nisko: The First Experiment in Deportation," Simon Wiesenthal Center Annual 2 (1985): 1–30; and Joseph Poprzeczny, Odilo Globocnik: Hitler's Man in the East (Jefferson, NC: McFarland, 2004).

Also important are the relevant volumes of Rejestr miejsc i faktów zbrodni popełnionych przez okupanta hitlerowskiego na ziemiach polskich w latach 1939–1945, województwa: białkopodlaskie, chełmskie, lubelskie, siedleckie, tarnobrzeczkie, zamojskie (Warsaw: GKBZHP and GKBZHP-IPN, 1984–1994).

Relevant documentation can be found in the following archives: AAN; APL; APL-Chełm; APL-Kraśnik; APL-Radzyń; APZ; AŻIH; BA-BL; BA-L; FVA; IPN; IPN-Lu; NARA; USHMM; VHF; YIVO; and YVA. Many museums in the Lublin województwo, including in Lublin, Kraśnik, Łęczna, Lubartów, Łuków, Zamość, and the State Museum in Majdanek (APMM), also are important repositories for unique archival documentation.

Laura Crago

NOTES

1. Mańkowski, "Pierwsze miesiące," pp. 58–60.
2. AŻIH, 301/4333, testimony of Berko Finger, p. 1; 302/122, testimony of Mieczysław Garfinkel, pp. 6, 8–9.
3. Silberklang, "The Holocaust," p. 184.
4. VHF, # 31584, testimony of Rose Welner.
5. Kiełboń, Migracje, pp. 26–35, 140.
6. AŻIH, 301/2013, testimony of Mojżesz Apfelbaum, pp. 1–3.
7. Musiał, Zivilverwaltung, p. 134.
8. USHMM, Acc.1997.A.0124 (AŻIH), 211/871, p. 49.
9. AŻIH, 301/72, testimony of Leon Feldhändler, pp. 4–8 (Izbica), which dates ghettoization in Izbica to the fall of 1942. See, however, also Mark Roseman, A Past in Hiding: Memory and Survival in Nazi Germany (New York: Metropolitan, 2001), pp. 186–197.
10. USHMM, Acc.1997.A.0124, 211/870, pp. 12–13; 211/871, pp. 39–40, 61; 211/872, pp. 6, 16.
11. See, for example, for Annopol, VHF, # 14967, # 477, # 3843, respectively, testimonies of Eli Fishman, Benny Kleiman, and Josef Krystal.

Borders as of 1942

BARANÓW NAD WIEPRZEM

Pre-1939: Baranów nad Wieprzem, village, Puławy powiat, Lublin województwo, Poland; 1939–1944: Baranow, Kreis Pulawy, Distrikt Lublin, Generalgouvernement; post-1998: Baranów, Puławy powiat, Lublin województwo, Poland

Baranów lies atop a high bank of the Wieprz River, some 60 kilometers (37 miles), by road, northwest of Lublin. Its 1930 population of 2,071 included 1,092 Jews.

In the second week of September 1939, the Luftwaffe bombardment killed an unknown number of Baranów Jews as they were on the road, fleeing west to Ryki, some 16 kilometers (10 miles) distant. On September 17, a Wehrmacht unit briefly occupied Baranów. The soldiers held a group of Jewish and Christian Poles hostage in the synagogue but released the prisoners unharmed several days later. The local military commander ordered the Jews to surrender valuables. German soldiers ransacked Jewish shops and residences in the ensuing searches.¹ The German military commander appointed a local Polish collaborationist civil administration, led by a wójt (head), for the larger pre-war Baranów nad Wieprzem gmina, of which Baranów served as the administrative center.

In 1940, German civilian authorities occasionally arrived from Puławy to impose financial and material demands on the Jews. During one such visit, the Jews were ordered to establish a Jewish Council (Judenrat). Its chair was Aron Cukierman. Accompanied by local members of the Polish (Blue) Police, the Germans usually demanded monetary contributions and took a number of Jews as hostages, pending receipt of the payments.² However, because local Polish authorities in Baranów tended to look the other way, the Jews managed to circumvent some of the anti-Jewish decrees imposed on all Jews living in the Generalgouvernement. As a result, most Baranów Jews initially were able to restore a part of their pre-war lives, though sometimes illicitly. When Jews, for instance, were forbidden from attending schools, parents in Baranów organized informal instructional circles for their children.

Because the Jews initially lived in much better conditions than their counterparts in many places in the Generalgouvernement, Baranów quickly flooded with refugees. By mid-December 1940, 350 refugees had swelled the Jewish population to 1,500. Among the refugees were a substantial number of Jews expelled from Puławy in late December 1939. In January 1941, 400 Jewish refugees were residing in Baranów. In June, the refugee population crested at 483 (140 families).³ Abraham Edelist, a printer and pre-war kehillah officer from Puławy, established a committee to assist the refugees. From December 1940, he also chaired the Jewish Social Self-Help (JSS) office in Baranów. Abraham Aichenstein (Eichenstein), the rabbi of Baranów, represented local Jews on the committee.⁴

Tensions created by the arrival of so many refugees came to a head on March 19, 1941, during a Judenrat meeting at which Edelist presented a plan to divide a charity shipment of herring. A group of local Jews stormed the meeting, assaulted Edelist, and threatened to abscond with the fish, unless he agreed to distribute charity items more equitably between the refugees and local Jews.⁵ Ordered by the Jewish Council to apportion the herring as the protestors demanded and then admonished by JSS authorities in Lublin and Kraków for not distributing the fish as required, Edelist and Aichenstein believed they had no choice but to resign.⁶

By late July or perhaps on August 1, 1941, an open ghetto was established in Baranów. On July 10, Edelist mentioned to Dr. Marek Alten, head of the JSS in Distrikt Lublin, that the Baranów Jews had learned that Alfred Brandt, the Puławy Kreishauptmann, had issued orders, to remain in effect until October 1, forbidding Jews from leaving their places of registration.⁷ The orders were made permanent in October, when Hans Frank forbade Jews throughout the Generalgouvernement from leaving their places of residence.

Survivor Pinchas Zajac notes the decree binding the Jews to Baranów was followed in the summer of 1941 by orders for all Jews living in houses along the main streets to move into houses located on alleys and back streets. Because the Polish owners of the houses also were required to move, Zajac describes the decree as establishing a ghetto in Baranów. (The Poles mostly took over the residences the Jews had been forced to vacate.)⁸ Hela Arbeiter, another survivor, mentions in her testimony the existence of a specifically designated Polish neighborhood in Baranów, a point that may indicate the housing reshuffle concentrated the Jews into a designated residential quarter.⁹

In mid-July 1941, on the eve of the establishment of the Baranów ghetto, the newly appointed JSS officials, all leaders of the protest movement, undermined further the material conditions of the most impoverished Jews by using the food allotment for Baranów to establish a for-profit canteen at a local labor camp. On July 20, the Judenrat dissolved the committee and, supposedly on the orders of Brandt, assumed control for all Jewish welfare relief in Baranów.¹⁰ The original JSS leaders were invited to join a reorganized committee, on which the Jewish Council chair also served. Though Aichenstein agreed, Edelist, like many refugees, had decided to leave Baranów for Lublin upon learning of the impending decree binding Jews in Kreis Pulawy to their places of registration.¹¹

Because the JSS correspondence for Baranów focuses almost entirely on the problems that beset the organization and the ongoing effort of the Jewish Council and the Kraków JSS to recover lost funding, it contains none of the documentation traditionally used to provide statistical measures of forced labor quotas, labor camp conscription, and the health and welfare of Jews confined to ghettos. Zajac recalls the only way for the Jews to secure nourishment after the ghetto's establishment was to sneak out of Baranów under cover of darkness to barter material possessions for food with peasants in nearby villages. He mentions that, by early 1942, almost all the able-bodied male population was interned in labor camps. Those who remained behind in the ghetto—mostly the elderly, women, and children—were dying of illnesses, including those associated with malnutrition and starvation.¹² Because of the poor conditions and rumors that Brandt soon would order the ghetto fenced, some Jews, beginning in 1942, began to escape from Baranów, mostly to the ghetto established in Żelechów (Distrikt Warschau).¹³

On May 8, 1942, a group of 10 to 12 SS and Ukrainian auxiliaries arrived in Baranów to expel the Jewish community. Informed about the expulsion orders days earlier, some families had found hiding places with Poles in nearby villages. Unaware of the orders, others believed the SS had come to eat an early dinner with members of the local Polish (Blue) Police.¹⁴ After the meal, the SS, the Ukrainian auxiliaries, and Polish police ordered all the Jews to assemble along Puławy Street. As many as 500 Jews, mostly young men probably already working at local labor camps, were held back from the expulsion. The rest of the Jews, at least 500 people, were ordered onto peasant carts. Zająć believes the Jews were driven to the train station in Puławy and ordered there onto trains destined for the Sobibór death camp.¹⁵ However, many scholars, including David Silberklang, maintain the Baranów Jews were sent to Sobibór via the railway station in Dęblin.

Many of the more than 100 Jews who fled from the deportation initially built hiding places in nearby forests. After some fugitives were pursued and killed by Polish partisans hostile to Jews, most sought refuge in a number of communities from which Jews had not yet been expelled, including in Kamionka (Lubartów powiat) and Adamów (Łuków powiat).¹⁶ In late summer and early fall 1942, local German authorities began ordering unregistered Jews in these two communities to report to Końskowola. Some Baranów Jews perished in a typhus epidemic there. Many others managed to escape the liquidation of the Końskowola collection ghetto in early October.¹⁷

Forced to seek refuge in the forests, the Jewish fugitives were almost all hunted down and shot during sieges of the wooded areas around Baranów and Ryki organized in late 1942 and early 1943 by the German SS, SS Ukrainian auxiliaries, and members of the Polish (Blue) Police.¹⁸ Others, including Zająć's parents and brother, perished in similar searches conducted by the SS for partisans in February 1944. Contacts with a group of Communist partisans, commanded by Dąbrowski, contributed to the Jews' survival, though tensions between Poles and Jews in the unit remained high.¹⁹ Fewer than 25 Baranów Jews survived the war.

SOURCES In addition to noting that an open ghetto and a Jewish quarter were established in Baranów in late 1941, the relevant entries in Abraham Wein, Bracha Freundlich, and Wila Orbach, eds., Pinkas ha-kehillot. Encyclopaedia of Jewish Communities: Poland, vol. 7, Lublin and Kielce (Jerusalem: Yad Vashem, 1999), pp. 116–118, and its English-language counterpart, Arnon Rubin, The Rise and Fall of Jewish Communities in Poland and Their Relics Today, vol. 2, District Lublin (Tel Aviv: Tel Aviv University Press, 2007), pp. 56–58, maintain Brandt ordered the Jews confined to a closed ghetto in April 1942, but local authorities failed to implement the decree. David Silberklang, “The Holocaust in the Lublin District” (Ph.D. diss. Hebrew University, Jerusalem, February 2003), pp. 177–178, 271, notes Brandt, in a memo on September 12, 1941, emphasized, among other points, that he had no plans to establish additional ghettos in Kreis Pulawy. The memo can be found at APL, 498/0/273, with copies at YVA. Silberklang's research also provides insight into the railway route by which the Baranów Jewish community was sent to Sobibór.

Archival documentation pertaining to the history of the Baranów Jewish community during World War II includes AŻIH (210/248, 211/137, pp. 39–43, 211/194, 301/272, 301/996); IPN; USHMM (Acc.1997.A.0124 [AŻIH, ŻSS], 211/194; Acc.1999.A.0154 [AŻIH, AJDC], 210/248; RG-50.120*0181); VHF (# 31126); and YVA.

Laura Crago

NOTES

1. USHMM, RG-50.120*0181, testimony of Pinchas Ziontz (Zająć).
2. Ibid.
3. USHMM, Acc.1997.A.0124 (AŻIH), ŻSS, 211/194, pp. 2, 5, 23, 25–30.
4. Ibid., p. 2.
5. Ibid., pp. 15–16, 21–23.
6. Ibid., p. 17; and 211/137, p. 41 (Edelist and Aichenstein to Alten, June 1, 1941).
7. USHMM, 211/137, p. 42 (Edelist to Alten, July 10, 1941).
8. USHMM, RG-50.120*018.
9. AŻIH, 301/272, testimony of Hela Arbeiter, p. 2.
10. USHMM, Acc.1997.A.0124, 211/194, pp. 44–45, 49–50, 54.
11. Ibid., 211/194, p. 54; 211/137, p. 42.
12. USHMM, RG-50.120*0181.
13. VHF, # 31126, testimony of Yehezke'l Gluzman.
14. Compare AŻIH, 301/272, p. 1, and 301/996, testimony of Pinchas Zająć, pp. 4–5.
15. Ibid., 301/996, pp. 3–4.
16. USHMM, RG-50.120*0181; AŻIH, 301/272, pp. 3–5.
17. AŻIH, 301/272, pp. 5–6.
18. Polish participation noted in USHMM, RG-50.120*0181.
19. AŻIH, 301/272, p. 6; USHMM, RG-50.120*0181.

BEŁŻYCE

Pre-1939: Bełżyce, town, Lublin powiat, Lublin województwo, Poland; 1939–1944: Bełżyce, Kreis Lublin-Land, Distrikt Lublin, Generalgouvernement; post-1998: Bełżyce, Lublin powiat, Lublin województwo, Poland

Bełżyce lies 26 kilometers (16 miles) by road southwest of Lublin. In August 1939, 2,100 Jews lived there.¹

A Wehrmacht unit occupied Bełżyce on September 16, 1939. Over the next two weeks, soldiers passing through Bełżyce on the way to Lublin broke into shops and homes to rob and beat Jews. On Rosh Hashanah (September 21), a German unit arrived to humiliate the Jews.² By January 1940, a Jewish Council (Judenrat) had been established.

From late 1939, a growing number of Jewish deportees arrived in Bełżyce. Among the first were expellees from Puławy.³ In February 1940, 300 deportees arrived from Stettin.⁴ In February 1941, 360 deportees arrived from Kraków. A March

3 transport, of 101 Kraków expellees, brought the number of deportees in Bełżyce to 681.⁵ Emil Ziegenmeyer, the Kreishauptmann of Lublin-Land, also named Bełżyce, Chodel, and probably Bychawa the three localities in Kreis Lublin-Land in which to resettle a part of the 15,000 Jews expelled from Lublin, in order to establish on March 27 a small ghetto in the city. On March 10, the deportation's first day, members of Police Battalion 306 forcibly expelled some 500 Lublin Jews to Bełżyce. More Lublin Jews arrived over the following weeks.⁶ Even after many Lublin deportees illicitly returned home, the Bełżyce Jewish population in late May stood at 3,499, including 1,199 refugees and deportees, making it the second largest in Kreis Lublin-Land. Only Piaski Luterskie, which that same month had 4,803 Jews, was larger.⁷

After the Stettin deportees arrived, German authorities ordered the Jewish Council reconstituted. Physician Adolf Flater, a former Stettin synagogue leader, was named council chairman. Paul Bauchwitz, a distinguished Stettin World War I veteran, became vice chair. Some native Jews (the wealthiest pre-war merchants), including Berek Goldsztejn (Stein) and timber merchant Szmul Arbuz (Arbus), received seats on the 12-member council. Stettin deportees filled almost all the council's administrative positions. Erich Silbermann was postmaster. His wife Cläre taught at the Jewish school. Puławy expellee Gołda Teich recalled the Stettin deportees were overrepresented on the Jewish police force.⁸ Albert (Israel) Dombrower, another Stettin deportee, headed the Bełżyce Jewish Social Self-Help (JSS) delegation.

On June 18, 1941, Stanisław Szubartowski, the Bełżyce wójt (head), proposed the expanded Jewish population be confined to a closed ghetto, near the market square. His superiors, citing material shortages, denied the request.⁹

Bełżyce nonetheless appeared on a list of ghettos Ziegenmeyer submitted to German authorities on September 19, 1941. However, Ziegenmeyer described Bełżyce as a "Jewish assembly site" (Judensammelort), rather than a ghetto. Ziegenmeyer likely named Bełżyce, Bychawa, and Chodel as Sammelorte when he permitted Jews expelled from Lublin to settle there, during a second expulsion wave in April. Because the list was compiled in response to a Reich Interior Ministry inquiry about available space in Distrikt Lublin for incoming Jews, the three localities and Piaski, which Ziegenmeyer claimed as the only ghetto in his Kreis, probably also were the places the Kreishauptmann envisioned resettling additional Jews. He cautioned that Poles would have to be expelled from the localities to accommodate any Jewish newcomers.

In Bełżyce, a formal Jewish quarter, or open ghetto, probably was not established. Gołda Teich describes her brother-in-law living in the pre-war Polish neighborhood. Jews were banned from walking on main streets and the market square. A 7:00 P.M. curfew was imposed. Some Jews were shot for ignoring the restrictions. The first were 11 men and 1 woman whom Gendarmes, probably from the post in Bychawa, found walking on streets from which Jews were banned, one day in February 1941.¹⁰ Shortly thereafter, the post was moved from Bychawa to Niedrzewica Duża. In November and December, Hans Frank ordered all Jews in the Generalgouvernement confined, on penalty of death, to the borders of the localities in which they resided.

In the spring of 1941, poor sanitary conditions, the result of overcrowding, led to a typhus outbreak, which was declared an epidemic by April 29. The sick filled the 21-bed hospital. Another 46 were quarantined. Though typhus cases initially ebbed, an epidemic again was declared in October. On November 12, Flater, also the head of the Jewish hospital, requested medical supplies from the JSS in Kraków. Flater contracted typhus but recovered. The epidemic raged until mid-December.¹¹ By January 1941, 60 Stettin expellees, some 13 percent of the 462 deportees sent to Distrikt Lublin on the third Stettin transport, had died. (A part of the transport's passengers had been resettled in Piaski and Głusk.)¹² In April 1942, the JSS distributed over 1,000 Passover meals. A charity drive collected used clothing for the needy.¹³

Twice weekly, Gendarmes from the Niedrzewica Duża post visited Bełżyce. Lublin expellee Róża Mitelman recalls their visits always cost some Jewish lives. She reports the Gendarmes used prohibitions on kosher slaughter as a "pretext" to arrest and kill Jews. Mirka Wiener remembered four members of the Zylbernadel family as among those murdered for the illegal (religious) slaughter and sale of meat.¹⁴

By 1942, many Jewish conscripts worked as agricultural labor on nearby estates, including in Jastków, or for local Poles. Others worked on local road construction projects.¹⁵

On May 11 or May 23 (the Shavuot holiday), 1942, Ukrainian SS auxiliaries, assisted by the Jewish Police, rounded up between 430 and 580 men (under age 35) and marched them to the Majdanek concentration camp.¹⁶ The deportation likely was to accommodate some 1,200 Jews from Thuringia and Saxony (mainly from Dresden and Leipzig) who arrived on May 12.¹⁷ On May 19, Ziegenmeyer recommended the Bełżyce

Gera and Alfred Borchert celebrate their wedding in Bełżyce, October 29, 1940. The photograph was sent to Walter Jacobsberg in Shanghai. USHMM WS #25773, COURTESY OF WALTER JACOBSBERG

Jews, by then some 3,639 in number, as well as Jews from five other communities, for resettlement.

On Yom Kippur or Hoshana Raba (September 21 or October 2) 1942, the 1,300 Jews in Chodel were expelled to Bełżyce and from there to killing centers.¹⁸ The next day, the SS and a group of Ukrainian auxiliaries surrounded Bełżyce. After killing the patients at the Jewish hospital, they ordered all Jews to report to the square. There, the Jewish Police identified several hundred young men and women for immediate deportation to Majdanek. Teich, among the deportees, reports that the women were the first large group of female Jews interned at the concentration camp.¹⁹

Between October 9 and 12, 1942, Jews from nearby localities were consolidated in Bełżyce. Among the deportees were all the Jews from the pre-war Bychawa, Jastków, Wojciechów, Piotrowice, Brzeziny (including 325 in Puchaczów), and Krzczonów gminy.²⁰ Dawid Białogród (Stanisław Nowakowski), a Warsaw refugee to the Piotrowice gmina, remembers the Jews, about 345 in number, were simply told to report to Bełżyce.²¹ The 59 Jews in Krzczonów probably received similar orders. In the Bychawa gmina, the SS first ordered consolidated, in Bychawa, a settlement of nearly 3,000 Jews, the Jewish residents of the pre-war Bychawa, Niemce, and Osmolice gminy. The Osmolice expellees included 107 former residents of Kraków's Ester Street asylum, deported to Distrikt Lublin in February 1941.²² The SS escorted the Jews to Bełżyce. Among the Jastków deportees were agricultural laborers from the Jastków estate, where a labor camp had been established in July 1942. After the evacuation, some 125 inmates remained.²³ The arrival in Bełżyce of more than 4,000 Jews brought the number who passed through the Sammelort to just above 10,000.

On October 13, 1942, the SS and Ukrainian auxiliaries surrounded Bełżyce. All Jews were ordered to the square. There, the SS divided men, women, and children from one another. Men fit for labor were loaded onto trucks destined for the Poniatowa forced labor camp or the labor camp established in the Piaski ghetto.²⁴ Some 300 people, including the Jewish Council and the Jewish Police, were retained for a labor camp in Bełżyce. Children, women, the elderly, and others deemed unfit for labor were ferried by truck to the Niedrzwica railway station. Chaim Grabel, among the deportees, reports that the Jews were sent to the Treblinka extermination center. He recalls 130 men and 30 women were held back at Treblinka for labor. The remaining Jews were gassed.²⁵ Most historians believe the deportees (perhaps a part) were sent to the Sobibór extermination center.

A fenced labor camp was established in Bełżyce near the old synagogue for the 300 Jews retained for labor. Another 700 to 1,000 mainly Bełżyce Jews, who had evaded deportation, entered the camp. Among them was Grabel, who had escaped from Treblinka. He and several other survivors refer to the camp as a closed ghetto. Many inmates initially sorted Jewish property in Bychawa and probably in other localities from which Jews had been deported. However, the postwar Institute of National Remembrance (IPN) Court Inquiries about Executions, Mass Graves, Camps, and Ghettos (ASG) documentation reports that the camp's raison d'être was for Jewish laborers to complete construction of the road from Bełżyce to Niedrzwica. An SS official from Lublin formally served as the camp commander. Day-to-day responsibility for the Jews fell to the private German firm overseeing the road construction project.²⁶

In early 1943, the SS sent a part of the Bełżyce inmates to the Trawniki forced labor camp, probably together with most of the agricultural laborers at Jastków. The Bełżyce deportees, all older Jews, included the Mossbachs.

In May, the Bełżyce ghetto was liquidated. SS-Oberscharführer Reinhold Feiks (Feixs), commander of the Budzyń forced labor camp from December 1942 until August 1943, oversaw the Aktion.²⁷ At 4:00 A.M., Feiks and a group of SS Ukrainian auxiliaries ordered the Jews assembled. Feiks held back for labor at Budzyń some 100 women and 200 to 300 men. He and the auxiliaries shot dead the remaining 500 to 600 inmates, including 100 men, 150 children, and 250 to 350 women.

Few Bełżyce Jews survived the deportations. At Trawniki, Cläre Mossbach (Silbermann) sent postcards to a Quaker friend and, after she failed to respond, to a mutual acquaintance to notify her of Erich's death.²⁸ Teich reports the Majdanek deportees almost all were gassed or had perished, many in a spring 1943 typhus outbreak. She and her sister are among the only known Bełżyce deportees transferred to Bliżyn in the summer of 1943. In November, during Aktion Erntefest, SS and police units executed the Jewish prisoners at Trawniki and Majdanek. In Budzyń, Feiks hanged Bauchwitz, supposedly for being so assimilated into German culture he defied the camp commander's anti-Jewish stereotypes. In May 1944, as the Red Army approached the Lublin region, the surviving Budzyń inmates were transferred to a number of camps, including Wieliczka, Skarżysko-Kamienna, Starachowice, Mielec, Ostrowiec, and Auschwitz. Many, including Szmul Arbus, perished during the evacuation of these camps.

Almost all of the approximately 100 Bełżyce Jews believed to have survived the German occupation were Budzyń deportees. Only Berek Rycer and a handful of others were sheltered by local Poles near Bełżyce.

SOURCES Secondary sources with coverage of the Bełżyce Jewish community during the war include the relevant entries in Abraham Wein, Bracha Freundlich, and Wila Orbach, eds., Pinkas ha-kebilot. Encyclopaedia of Jewish Communities: Poland, vol. 7, Lublin and Kielce (Jerusalem: Yad Vashem, 1999), pp. 98–101; and Arnon Rubin, The Rise and Fall of the Jewish Communities in Poland and Their Relics Today, vol. 2, District Lublin (Tel Aviv: Tel Aviv University Press, 2007), pp. 58–61. Adam Kopciowski, "Dzieje Żydów bełżyckich," which first appeared in Studia z dziejów Bełżyc (Bełżyce, 2006), is widely available online.

The letters of deportees Cläre and Erich Silbermann are included in Else Behrend-Rosenfeld and Gertrud Luckner, eds., Lebenszeichen aus Piaski: Briefe Deportierter aus dem Distrikt Lublin 1940–1943 (Munich: Deutscher Taschenbuch Verlag GmbH, 1970), pp. 116–130; detailed testimonies from survivors Manfred Heyman and Erich Mosbach are published, respectively, in Martin Gilbert, The Boys: The Untold Story of 732 Young Concentration Camp Survivors (New York: Henry Holt, 1997), and Jacob Peiser, Die Geschichte der Synagogen-Gemeinde zu Stettin, 2nd, expanded ed. (Würzburg: Holzner Verlag, 1965); and a transcription of an English-language interview, conducted in Israel with survivor Yaffa Reis, a daughter of Szmul Arbus, appears on the Bełżyce home page at the Wirtualny Sztetl, a Web site sponsored by Muzeum Historii Żydów Polskich. Contemporary Jewish press coverage includes “Bełżyce,” Gazeta Żydowska, May 29, 1942, no. 63, p. 6.

A discussion of the ghetto lists compiled in September 1941 by Kreishauptmänner in Distrikt Lublin appears in Dieter Pohl, Von der “Judenpolitik” zum Judenmord. Der Distrikt Lublin des Generalgouvernements 1939–1944 (Frankfurt am Main: Peter Lang, 1993), pp. 92–94; Bogdan Musiał, Deutsche Zivilverwaltung und Judenverfolgung im Generalgouvernement: Eine Fallstudie zum Distrikt Lublin 1939–1944 (Wiesbaden: Harrassowitz, 1999), pp. 137, 222–223; and David Silberklang, “The Holocaust in the Lublin District” (Ph.D. diss. Hebrew University, Jerusalem, February 2003), pp. 176–180. A German-language transcription of Ziegenmeyer’s May 19, 1942, recommendation to deport the Bełżyce community is available in Józef Kermisz, ed., Dokumenty i materiały do dziejów okupacji niemieckiej w Polsce, vol. 2, Akcje i wysiedlenia (Łódź: GKB-ZHWP, 1946), pt. 1, pp. 52–53.

Archival documentation for the Bełżyce Jewish community includes AŻIH (e.g., 211 [134, pp. 10, 62; 138, pp. 42, 73–74; 139, p. 57; 199–200; 648, pp. 16, 18, 24; 649, pp. 10–11, 19–21; 650, pp. 14, 16, 29; 651, pp. 13–14, 16, 18, 20, 28; 652, pp. 6–12, 23–24; 653, pp. 10, 16, 47; 654, pp. 3, 9, 10, 23, 27]; 301 [50, 222, 228, 715, 716, 1169, 1443, 1449, 1812, 4398, 5003]); IPN (e.g., ASG); IPN-Lu (e.g., 174/67/1-4); USHMM (e.g., Acc. 1997.A.0124 [AŻIH, 211]; RG-15.019M [IPN, ASG] [reel 15, 49/57–58]); VHF (e.g., # 23633); and YVA.

Laura Crago and Joseph Robert White

NOTES

1. USHMM, Acc.1997.A.0124 (AŻIH), 211/199, p. 42.
2. AŻIH, 301/50, testimony of Hela Foerstman (Fersztman), pp. 1–2.
3. Ibid., 301/1812, testimony of Gołda Teich, p. 2.
4. Ibid., 301/50, pp. 3–4; USHMM, Acc.1997.A.0124, 211/199, p. 6, 211/652, pp. 6–12, 23–24.
5. USHMM, Acc.1997.A.0124, 211/649, pp. 10–11, 19–21, 211/650, p. 14.
6. Ibid., 211/649, pp. 24–29; AŻIH, 301/1514, testimony of Róża Mitelman, p. 3.
7. USHMM, Acc.1997.A.0124, 211/651, p. 16.
8. AŻIH, 301/1812, pp. 2–3.
9. APL, GDL 273, pp. 46–47.
10. AŻIH, 301/1812, pp. 2–4.
11. Behrend-Rosenfeld and Luckner, Lebenszeichen, pp. 123, 125, 128; USHMM, Acc.1997.A.0124, 211/199, p. 71.
12. USHMM, Acc.1997.A.0124, 211/199, p. 6.
13. Ibid., 211/200, p. 18.
14. AŻIH, 301/1514, pp. 3–4, 301/1169, testimony of Mirka Wiener, p. 1.

15. Ibid., 301/1812, p. 3.
16. Compare ibid., 301/222, testimony of Noach Becher, p. 1, and 301/1812, pp. 3–4.
17. USHMM, Acc.1997.A.0124, 211/199, p. 29; Behrend-Rosenfeld and Luckner, Lebenszeichen, p. 129.
18. Compare AŻIH, 301/1812, pp. 4–5, and 301/222, p. 1.
19. Ibid., 301/1812, pp. 4–5.
20. Ibid., 301/4398, testimony of Berek Rycer, p. 1.
21. Ibid., 301/5003, testimony of Dawid Białogród, p. 1.
22. USHMM, Acc.1997.A.0124, 211/648, pp. 6–8, 10, 12, 32.
23. Ibid., RG-15.019M (IPN), reel 15, 49/58.
24. AŻIH, 301/1514, p. 4.
25. Ibid., 301/228, testimony of Chaim Grabel, p. 1.
26. USHMM, RG-15.019M, 49/57.
27. AŻIH, 301/1514, pp. 5–6, 301/1169, p. 2, 301/1449, testimony of Sala Feigenman, pp. 2–3.
28. Behrend-Rosenfeld and Luckner, Lebenszeichen, p. 130.

BIAŁA PODLASKA

Pre-1939: Biała Podlaska (Yiddish: Biala Podlyashe), town, Biała Podlaska powiat, Lublin województwo, Poland; 1939–1944: Biała Podlaska, Kreis center, Distrikt Lublin, Generalgouvernement; post-1998: Biała Podlaska, Lublin województwo, Poland

Biała Podlaska is located about 100 kilometers (62 miles) north-northeast of Lublin. In 1939, approximately 7,500 Jews were registered in the town, most of them working as traders, craftsmen, or artisans.¹

German troops first occupied Biała Podlaska on September 13, 1939. Since under the terms of the Molotov-Ribbentrop Pact the town was originally assigned to the Soviet Union, units of the Red Army took over from the Germans on September 26. However, the Soviet troops retreated in early October and Biała Podlaska returned to German control. About Jewish survivors stand in an open mass grave among the exhumed bodies of the victims of a shooting Aktion in Biała Podlaska, April 25–May 2, 1946. The Yiddish sign reads, “Exhumation of the Jewish martyrs who were murdered by the beastial Hitlerite murderers/Biała Podlaska, April 25, 1946.”

USHMM WS #30857, COURTESY OF ARLENE CHASIN STROWMAN

600 Jews from the town fled with the Red Army into Soviet-occupied territory.²

Shortly after reoccupying the town, the German authorities, assisted by local Poles wearing armbands, started to seize Jews from the streets for forced labor. Hundreds of Jews were requisitioned every day to clear the rubble from buildings damaged at the time of the invasion and to clean public buildings and German barracks.³

On October 26, 1939, under the new civil administration, the town became part of Distrikt Lublin, serving as the center of Kreis Biała Podlaska. From November 29, 1939, until December 20, 1942, the Kreishauptmann was SA-Standartenführer Hubert Kühn, who previously had worked in the Reich Propaganda Ministry.⁴ Other German offices in the town included posts of the Criminal Police, the Gestapo, and the SD, all subordinated to the Commanding Officer of the Security Police and SD (KdS) in Lublin. These offices were subsequently consolidated into the so-called Grenzpolizeikommissariat (Border Police Office). Serving as head of the Gendarmerie were individuals named Ruddeck, Christoph, König, and Becker. Between October 1940 and the end of 1943, part of Police Bataillon 307 was also based in Biała Podlaska.⁵

In November 1939, a Jewish Council (Judenrat) under the leadership of Izaak Pirzyc was established. The Judenrat attempted to maintain pre-war communal activities, organizing, for example, a public kitchen for the needy and a Jewish hospital. In addition, the community maintained two public libraries.⁶

From the fall of 1939, the German authorities imposed a series of discriminatory measures against the Jews. In November 1939, Jews were forbidden to leave the town without permission; on December 1, all Jews were obliged to wear armbands bearing the Star of David. German officials robbed the Jews, confiscated their businesses, imposed taxes, and demanded large "contributions."⁷ The yizkor book notes that at this time the local Housing Office began requisitioning Jewish homes for non-Jews. Local collaborators, such as Mayor Antony Walewski and his deputies S. Szczypanski and Bajlicki, actively participated in the confiscation of Jewish apartments.⁸

At the end of 1939, about 2,000 Jews who had been deported by train from Suwałki and Serock arrived in Biała Podlaska. They were permitted to bring almost no luggage with them. Some were accommodated in Jewish apartments and others in the synagogues and prayer houses, which were very cold in winter. Their presence severely aggravated the poor living conditions in the town, and some departed shortly afterwards for Warsaw.⁹

In early 1940, about 500 Jewish prisoners of war (POWs) from the Polish army were marched on foot to Biała Podlaska from Lublin, where they were placed in a POW camp located in a barracks on the road towards Brześć Litewski. Subsequently, some of these Jewish POWs managed to sneak out of the camp and join the Jews in Biała Podlaska. On May 15, 1941, most of the Jewish POWs in the camp were transferred to the west to Końskowola.¹⁰

In March 1940, the Germans ordered the systematic registration of all Jews available for work.¹¹ The conscripted Jewish workers were sent mainly to factories and workshops in Biała Podlaska and its environs. In addition, some seven labor camps were established at construction sites. For example, some Jews worked expanding the airfield at the pre-war airplane manufacturing facility, where the Luftwaffe had established a military base. Jews were paid between 3 and 10 złoty per day for forced labor, depending on their skills.¹² In July 1940, all the Jewish men were assembled, and a number were selected and sent to forced labor camps near Bełżec. After a few months the Jewish Council was able to secure their return.¹³

In December 1940, about 1,000 Jewish deportees arrived in Biała Podlaska from Mława. The expectation of more deportees arriving in early 1941 caused the authorities to consider responses in terms of Jewish residential patterns. According to the records of the Jewish Social Self-Help (JSS):

On January 4, 1941, the representatives of the Jewish community in Biała Podlaska were informed by the authorities about a project to resolve the problem of the resettlement, of what in the near future will be 4,000 people. . . . [The proposed German solution was to transfer most of the Jews, including natives, to camps.] The remainder of the Jews will be relocated to a Jewish quarter, to be comprised of just 48 properties.¹⁴

However, this ghettoization order was "postponed" because the expected deportees did not begin arriving in large numbers until March.¹⁵

On the arrival of more than 1,000 Jewish refugees from Kraków in March, the decision was made instead to disperse the Jews "voluntarily" to other places in a so-called Lublin solution. For example, 550 of the Kraków expellees were sent on March 22, 1941, to Piszczac, and older Jews from Biała Podlaska were resettled to nearby villages, including on March 27, 1941, some 350 native Jews were sent to Podedwórze-Opole. In addition, by April 1941 another 607 Kraków deportees had been sent from Biała Podlaska to Podedwórze-Opole.¹⁶ One survivor recalled: "At the beginning of 1941, the 'roundups' began. The unemployed and elderly were brought to Opole [i.e., Podedwórze-Opole]."¹⁷

In the late spring of 1941, as the Germans began to prepare for war against the Soviet Union, many Jews were requisitioned for the construction of fortifications. Other Jews had to work on road construction, building barracks, in sawmills, or installing water pipes. A large number of Jewish women worked on the Halasy estate, which had formerly belonged to Duke Potocki. Around this time the so-called Vineta barracks camp for Jewish workers was also established in Biała Podlaska.¹⁸

In June 1941, the German authorities introduced a series of measures to fight the spread of typhus, which severely affected the Jews. For example, all trade between "Aryans" and the Jewish population was banned, and non-Jews were forbidden to enter Jewish houses. These regulations severely restricted the ability of Jews to obtain food, causing prices to increase further.¹⁹ The typhus epidemic became particularly serious in the winter of 1941–1942, resulting in a number of deaths among the Jewish population.²⁰

In the meantime, many of the “voluntary deportees” had been returning to Biała Podlaska, and more refugees were arriving. This situation and the typhus epidemic probably led Kreishauptmann Kühl to establish a more formal Jewish quarter or ghetto in Biała Podlaska. Some Jewish survivor accounts date the establishment of the ghetto in the summer of 1941.²¹

The account in the yizkor book uses the term Jewish quarter when describing events in 1941 but does not describe specifically what this meant. It notes, however, that in the fall of 1941, the office of the Judenrat was moved to Grabanowska Street with the aim of eliminating the last few Jews who were still living outside the designated Jewish area (“di angemerkte grenetsn fun yidishn revir”).²² Nonetheless, the JSS records indicate that it was not until April 1942 that Kreishauptmann Kühl ordered the JSS to move its community kitchen from Stadtplatz 19 into the ghetto area, which had been accomplished by June 1942.²³

Jewish survivors also deal with the issue somewhat ambiguously: some use the term ghetto, but others use phrases such as “Jewish zone,” “Jewish residential area,” or “Jewish quarter.” The ghetto was never fully enclosed. Survivors recall that initially the ghetto inmates were able to leave and return as they pleased to buy groceries from the local peasants in exchange for clothing or other goods.²⁴ However, by the end of 1941 any Jew caught outside the Jewish quarter could be shot on sight.

A unit of Jewish Police (Jüdischer Ordnungsdienst) was also established with authority inside the Jewish quarter in the fall of 1941; by the summer of 1942, its strength had increased to 50 men.

In the spring and summer of 1942, the SS and Gestapo conducted mass shootings of Jews in the forests surrounding Biała Podlaska.²⁵ On June 6, 1942, rumors spread that the Jews of Biała Podlaska were soon to be driven from the town. The office of the Kreishauptmann ordered that all Jews without work identity cards from the labor office had to report for “resettlement” on June 10. After receiving the order, many Jews disobeyed the instruction and fled into the forests. On June 10, about 700 Jews assembled at the synagogue courtyard at 5:00 A.M. More were gathered during the course of the day with the aid of the Jewish Police and were handed over to the Sonderdienst (ethnic German police) at the railway station. The next day, the victims were forced into freight cars and deported to the extermination camp at Sobibór. In total, about 3,000 Jews from Kreis Biala Podlaska were deported.²⁶

On the night of August 4, 1942, a group of 19 Jews was shot. The area of the Jewish quarter was reduced following this Aktion. On August 7, the Judenrat reported that the Jews had until 6:00 A.M. the following morning to move into the reduced ghetto area. According to the yizkor book, the Jewish quarter—which previously had been located between Grabanowska Street (with the synagogue courtyard alleys, apart from the houses with access to the [New] Market Square [Plac Wolności]), Janowska Street (just the right side), Prosta (from the court building onward), and Cmentarna Street—was now to be enclosed within these streets: Grabanowska (without the synagogue alleys), Prosta (only from Grabanowska to Przechodnia), Janowska (the side to Przechodnia), and Przechodnia (just the right side).²⁷

On August 12, a wave of kidnapping of Jewish men by German Gendarmes and Ukrainian auxiliaries began in Biała Podlaska. The Jewish Council complained to the German authorities, and as a result about 400 Jews, including most of the members of the Jewish Council, were deported to the Majdanek concentration camp. From there most of them were sent on to a labor camp at Gołęb for work on the railroad.²⁸

On September 22, the day after Yom Kippur, a German official from Biała Podlaska gave the Jews in the Konstantynów ghetto until September 25 to report to the ghetto in Biała Podlaska. On September 25, the Jews still in Konstantynów were marched, probably together with the remaining Jews in Janów Podlaski, to the Biała Podlaska ghetto.²⁹

On September 26, the Gestapo liquidated the Biała Podlaska ghetto. On the eve of the Aktion, the ghetto was surrounded and the victims were herded to the New Market Square. Except for some Jews sent as a forced labor detail to the Małaszewicze Duże airfield, all the Jews who were rounded up were deported to Międzyrzec Podlaski and settled in the ghetto there.³⁰ The registration cards for 1,200 Jews transferred from Biała Podlaska to the Międzyrzec ghetto on September 26, 1942, can be found in the records of the International Tracing Service.³¹ Jews who did not obey orders and were caught in hiding were shot immediately. The Gestapo also shot all the patients and the two nurses in the Jewish hospital. In total, the Gestapo assisted by the Gendarmerie and local collaborators shot about 100 Jews in the town, burying them in the Jewish cemetery. The searches for those in hiding went on for several days. On September 28, the mayor of Biała Podlaska prohibited the local population from entering the “former Jewish quarter” and threatened that looting would be punished with the death penalty. On the following day, another announcement by the mayor instructed local inhabitants to intercept Jews and hand them over to the Gendarmerie.³²

The Jews deported from Biała Podlaska were held in the Międzyrzec ghetto for several days. On October 6, additional Jews from labor camps in the vicinity were assembled at the Biała Podlaska railway station and sent from there to the Treblinka extermination center. The train made a stop in Międzyrzec on the way to pick up those Jews from Kreis Biala Podlaska, who had been concentrated earlier in the Międzyrzec ghetto.

Some of the Jewish labor camps in and around Biała Podlaska continued to function for several more months. One group of Jewish workers that had remained in Biała Podlaska was employed by the Gestapo to clear out property from the former ghetto area. They also had to demolish the synagogue and other Jewish religious buildings. The Wehrmacht camp was liquidated in mid-December 1942; the remaining Jews were either sent away or shot.³³

On July 26, 1944, Soviet troops entered the town of Biała Podlaska. Of the roughly 7,000 Jews living in the town in the fall of 1939, only about 300 people survived the German occupation.

SOURCES Relevant publications include Moses Joseph Feygenboym, ed., Podlaskie in Natsi-klem: Notitsn fun burbn (Buenos Aires: Aroysgegebn durkh a haverim-komitet, 1953); Moses Joseph Feygenboym, ed., Sefer Bialab Podlaskab (Tel Aviv: Kupat gemilut hesed al sh. Kehilat Bialab Podlaskah, 1961); Abraham Wein, Bracha Freundlich, and Wila Orbach, eds., Pinkas ha-kehillot. Encyclopaedia of Jewish Communities: Poland, vol. 7, Lublin and Kielce (Jerusalem: Yad Vashem, 1999), pp. 84–89; Arnon Rubin, The Rise and Fall of the Jewish Communities in Poland and Their Relics Today, vol. 2, District Lublin (Tel Aviv: Tel Aviv University Press, 2007), pp. 65–68; and “Biała Podlaska Ghetto,” on the Aktion Reinhard Camps (ARC) Web site (www.deathcamps.org).

Documents describing the fate of the Jews of Biała Podlaska during the Holocaust can be found in the following archives: APL; AŻIH (e.g., 301/466, 4516; 211/201–209); BA-L (B 162/14275–76 [verdict of LG-Duis, 14 Ks 1/72, November 30, 1973]); USHMM (RG-15.019M; RG-15.102M; Acc.1997. A.0124 [AŻIH, JSS], reels 13–14; RG-50.120*0218 and 0244); VHF (e.g., # 6071, 13655, 18103, 18564, 26004, 40845); and YVA (e.g., collections M-1/E and O-3).

Katrin Reichelt and Martin Dean

NOTES

1. Wein, Freundlich, and Orbach, Pinkas ha-kehillot: Poland, vol. 7, Lublin and Kielce, pp. 84–89; VHF, # 18103, testimony of Golda Stiel, 1996; # 40845, testimony of Sala Bonder, 1998; and # 18564, testimony of Nina Kliger, 1996; verdict of LG-Duis, 14 Ks 1/72, against Leo Bernhard Busch (BA-L, B 162/14275–76 [II 208 AR-Z 26/62]), p. 1.

2. Joseph Pell and Fred Rosenbaum, Taking Risks: A Jewish Youth in the Soviet Partisans and His Unlikely Life in California (Berkeley, CA: RDR Books: Western Jewish History Center of the Judah L. Magnes Museum, 2004), pp. 34–48.

3. Feygenboym, Sefer Bialab Podlaskab, p. 400; APL, Gouverneur des Distrikts Lublin (GDL) 691, pp. 1–4; Wein, Freundlich, and Orbach, Pinkas ha-kehillot: Poland, vol. 7, Lublin and Kielce, pp. 84–89.

4. Bogdan Musiał, Deutsche Zivilverwaltung und Judenverfolgung im Generalgouvernement. Eine Fallstudie zum Distrikt Lublin 1939–1944 (Wiesbaden: Harrassowitz, 1999), pp. 388, 391–392. Following Kühl’s assassination by partisans on December 20, 1942, Friedrich Sauermann succeeded him from April 18, 1943, until the end of the occupation.

5. BA-L, B 162/14275–76, verdict of LG-Duis, 14 Ks 1/72, November 30, 1973, p. 13.

6. Wein, Freundlich, and Orbach, Pinkas ha-kehillot: Poland, vol. 7, Lublin and Kielce, pp. 84–89; Feygenboym, Sefer Bialab Podlaskab, pp. 402–403.

7. Feygenboym, Sefer Bialab Podlaskab, p. 401.

8. Wein, Freundlich, and Orbach, Pinkas ha-kehillot: Poland, vol. 7, Lublin and Kielce, p. 84–89; Feygenboym, Sefer Bialab Podlaskab, p. 402; Feygenboym, Podlaskie in Natsi-klem, pp. 198–199. According to the German court in Duisberg, by the end of 1939, the German authorities ordered the Jews of Biała Podlaska to move into a “Jewish residential area” or “Jewish quarter” in the northeastern section of town; see BA-L, B 162/14275–76, verdict of LG-Duis, 14 Ks 1/72, p. 14. However, on the basis of other sources, it seems unlikely that a ghetto was established this early.

9. Feygenboym, Sefer Bialab Podlaskab, p. 402.

10. David Silberklang, “The Holocaust in the Lublin District” (Ph.D. diss., Hebrew University, Jerusalem, February 2003), p. 47; Feygenboym, Sefer Bialab Podlaskab, p. 402.

11. Feygenboym, Sefer Bialab Podlaskab, pp. 404–406.

12. Ibid., p. 406; “Biała Podlaska Ghetto,” pp. 1–2.

13. Silberklang, “The Holocaust in the Lublin District,” p. 108; Feygenboym, Sefer Bialab Podlaskab, p. 405.

14. AŻIH, 211/202, p. 6.

15. Ibid., p. 61.

16. Ibid., pp. 74–75; 211/203, p. 7.

17. Ibid., 301/72, testimony of Fajgenbaum, p. 1.

18. Feygenboym, Sefer Bialab Podlaskab, p. 407; and Czesław Pilichowski et al., eds., Obozy hitlerowskie na ziemiach polskich 1939–1945: Informator encyklopedyczny (Warsaw: PWN, 1979), p. 97.

19. Bekanntmachung signed by the mayor of Biała Podlaska, June 6, 1941, reproduced in Feygenboym, Sefer Bialab Podlaskab, p. 408.

20. Feygenboym, Podlaskie in Natsi-klem, p. 199.

21. See, for example, AŻIH, 301/4516, p. 1. Pilichowski et al., Obozy hitlerowskie, p. 97, also date the establishment of the ghetto in 1941.

22. Feygenboym, Sefer Bialab Podlaskab, p. 409.

23. AŻIH, 211/205, p. 18; 211/208, p. 57; and 211/209, p. 10.

24. VHF, # 18564; # 6071, testimony of Harry Wolfe; and # 13655, testimony of Louis Hofman, 1996.

25. Feygenboym, Sefer Bialab Podlaskab, p. 412.

26. Wein, Freundlich, and Orbach, Pinkas ha-kehillot: Poland, vol. 7, Lublin and Kielce, pp. 84–89; BA-L, B 162/14275–76, verdict of LG-Duis, 14 Ks 1/72, pp. 15–16; Silberklang, “The Holocaust in the Lublin District,” p. 272; Feygenboym, Sefer Bialab Podlaskab, pp. 415–417.

27. BA-L, B 162/14275–76, verdict of LG-Duis, 14 Ks 1/72, p. 14. A plan of the Jewish quarter of Biała Podlaska under the Nazi regime can be found in Feygenboym, Sefer Bialab Podlaskab, p. 418. A photograph of Grabanowska Street with a banner reading Judenviertel spread across the street can be found at www.holocaust.myoptimus.com (3.1 Getta Biała Podlaska).

28. Feygenboym, Sefer Bialab Podlaskab, pp. 418–419; Rubin, The Rise and Fall, vol. 2, District Lublin, pp. 66–67.

29. Oscar Pinkus, The House of Ashes (Cleveland, OH: World Publishing Company, 1964), p. 100.

30. “Biała Podlaska Ghetto,” p. 3; Wein, Freundlich, and Orbach, Pinkas ha-kehillot: Poland, vol. 7, Lublin and Kielce, pp. 84–89.

31. USHMM, ITS collection, 3050, Gruppe P.P. Ordner 830.

32. Rejestr miejsc i faktów zbrodni popełnionych przez okupanta hitlerowskiego na ziemiach polskich w latach 1939–1945: Województwo białkopodlaskie (Warsaw: GKBZHWP, 1984), p. 18. This source dates the shootings on September 26–30, 1942, stating that they were in conjunction with the resettlement of the Jews to Międzyrzec. Feygenboym, Sefer Bialah Podlaskah, pp. 423–424.

33. Rejestr miejsc i faktów zbrodni popełnionych przez okupanta hitlerowskiego, p. 18: Feygenboym, Sefer Bialah Podlaskah, pp. 435–436. The Wehrmacht camp mentioned here is probably identical to the “Vineta” camp, which, according to Pili-chowski et al., Obozy hitlerowskie, p. 97, was liquidated on December 17, 1942.

BIŁGORAJ

Pre-1939: Biłgoraj (Yiddish: Bilgoray), town, Biłgoraj powiat, Lublin województwo, Poland; 1939–1944: Bilgoraj, Kreis center, Distrikt Lublin, Generalgouvernement; post-1998: Biłgoraj, Biłgoraj powiat, Lublin województwo, Poland

Biłgoraj lies 88 kilometers (55 miles) south of Lublin. In 1931, its 8,173 residents included 4,596 Jews.

Biłgoraj suffered serious damage in early fighting; then the Wehrmacht arrived on September 17. Murder, abuse, and plunder soon followed. On September 27, German forces ceded Biłgoraj to advancing Red Army forces. When the Soviets pulled out again, some 1,500 Biłgoraj Jews joined the October 5–6 evacuation behind the Bug River. Hundreds more homeless Jews moved to less devastated German-occupied localities, such as Szczepieszyn, Tarnogród, and Zamość. The Germans reoccupied Biłgoraj on October 7.

That month, Werner Ansel was appointed the head of the German civil administration, or Kreishauptmann of Kreis Bilgoraj. In April 1942, Hans Augustin succeeded Ansel. Karl Adam replaced Augustin in November 1942.

In late 1939, a Jewish Council (Judenrat) was established. Chaim Mordecai Hirszenhorn became its chairman. By April 1940, Jews over age 14 had to wear white armbands with blue Jewish stars.

Forced labor, mandatory for all adult Jews, initially centered on clearing war devastation. From late spring until November 1940, many men were imprisoned at labor camps, including in Turkowice and Bełżec and at a quarry near Kraków. At home, conscripts built barracks at the hospital and on war-devastated Jewish communal and private property. The latter formally was confiscated in the Kreis only in March 1941.¹ From the fall of 1940, many Jews worked on constructing one of the seven Luftwaffe air bases built in Kreise Zamosc, Hrubieszow, and Bilgoraj and the Luftwaffe pilot training school, built right outside of Biłgoraj.

Most survivors remember that a ghetto existed in Biłgoraj by the late summer of 1940. However, the evidence suggests Ansel did not formally establish ghettos in towns in his Kreis; rather, he ordered Jews gradually evicted from certain streets. The documentation of the Jewish Social Self-Help (JSS) organization indicates the evictions were ongoing in late October 1940. By then, the 2,600 to 2,700 Jews remaining in Biłgoraj were concentrated on four streets: Kościuszko, Piłsudski, Lublin, and May Third.²

In anticipation of the arrival of Wehrmacht and Luftwaffe forces in advance of the invasion of the Soviet Union (June 22, 1941), Ansel ordered the Biłgoraj Jewish population reduced in size. On April 6, 800 Biłgoraj Jews were forcibly expelled to Goraj. By July, some 1,900 Jews were residing in Biłgoraj.³

In January 1941, a Treuhänder (trustee), responsible for 125 confiscated Jewish sieve-making workshops, ordered Hersz Zylberberg to recruit artisans and to restart production. By November 1941, 120 Jewish craftsmen (half the pre-war total) worked at 60 workshops. About 75 percent weekly earned at least 50 złoty, the amount required to keep Jews in Biłgoraj from falling into abject poverty.⁴ Several dozen more craftsmen, mainly tailors and shoemakers, maintained small workshops to provide services to German personnel. In August 1941, the German-administered Społem food wholesaler mobilized women, the elderly, and children to pick berries and other edible plants in a nearby forest. The laborers earned 6–7 złoty daily. Another 30 Jews were interned at a water drainage camp located in the Biszcza gmina.⁵

Prior to the German invasion of the Soviet Union, German authorities forbade the Jews from leaving Biłgoraj. Yisrael Plotz, caught returning from a nearby village with potatoes, was shot dead. The orders, lifted in Distrikt Lublin by mid-July 1941, were reimposed permanently in November, when Jews throughout the Generalgouvernement were confined on pain of death to the borders of the places in which they resided. Because most Biłgoraj Jews initially ignored the restrictions, the Germans retaliated by executing Hirszenhorn and a second Jewish Council member. Szymon Bin succeeded Hirszenhorn as council chair.⁶

As three or four Jewish families lived in a single room, overcrowding bred unsanitary conditions and gave way to typhus epidemics in June 1941 and again from October 1941 until March 1942. During the first epidemic, German medical authorities ordered the JSS to establish an isolation facility. Dr. Jakob Meisels, a March 1941 Viennese deportee to Modliborzyce, became its head.⁷ The JSS organized a community kitchen to feed the sick. When the kitchen reopened in November, it provided a daily meal to 200 (of 400) impoverished.

Four men view the bodies of Jews shot in a Jewish cemetery in the vicinity of Biłgoraj, 1942.

USHMM WS #50382, COURTESY OF IPN

In September 1941, Ansel had to submit a list of ghettos to authorities in Lublin. He noted that the Jews in Biłgoraj were restricted to certain streets but reported that no ghettos or other type of Judensammelorte (gathering or concentration places for Jews) existed in Kreis Bilgoraj. In April 1942, Zylberberg, from February 15 the head of the Biłgoraj JSS, also noted on the charity organization's ghetto questionnaire that no ghetto, either open or closed, yet existed in Biłgoraj.⁸

The JSS documentation suggests Ansel stopped short of officially establishing ghettos so that he could deny resources to Jews.⁹ (In this regard, Ansel distinguished himself from other Kreishauptmänner in Distrikt Lublin.) An official ghetto required a certain level of non-Jewish and Jewish capital investment that Ansel refused to make. He may also have wanted to resist pressure from the Reich Interior Department to take more Jews. And he also probably wanted to retain the flexibility to control the Jewish population in the Kreis. After all, he, like many Kreishauptmänner in Distrikt Lublin, had created what effectively were Sammelorte by dumping unwanted Jews in less strategically important places, such as Goraj, more removed from railway lines and Luftwaffe air bases.

On May 3, 1942, the Gestapo demanded that Bin and Jewish Council member Hillel Janower compile a list of candidates for deportation. When the men refused, they were shot.¹⁰ Zylberberg probably at this time became the Jewish Council chair.

In early August 1942, German authorities instructed the Jewish Council to prepare a list of 1,000 Jews, ostensibly for deportation to a labor camp in Ukraine. Jewish Council members, craftsmen, and those employed by the Germans were exempted from deportation. On August 9, the 1,000 Jews on the list assembled at the square, some with additional family members. Some 1,500 Jewish expellees soon arrived from Tarnogród. The SS and German Schutzpolizei oversaw the expulsion, mainly on foot, of the Jews to the railway station in Zwierzyniec, some 21 kilometers (13 miles) away. Polish wagon drivers transported some deportees there. At the railway station, the Biłgoraj and Tarnogród deportees were forced onto rail cars and sent to be gassed at the extermination facility in Bełżec.¹¹

After the first deportation, a more formal remnant ghetto was established on Lublin and May Third Streets for the approximately 600 to 800 Jews held back for labor. It was an unfenced open ghetto. The Jews were permitted to leave the ghetto during allotted hours to purchase food.

On November 1, 1942, Zylberberg announced that the Gestapo had ordered 70 ghetto residents relocated to a smaller, closed ghetto. Most inmates of the new, or "small," ghetto were craftsmen, including about 30 tailors and their families.

On November 2, 1942, SS stationed in Biłgoraj, members of Reserve Police Battalion 67, and Lithuanian and Ukrainian SS auxiliaries ordered the Jews not residing in the closed ghetto to assemble on the square. Many Jews were beaten and shot.¹² The Jews were imprisoned overnight, under armed guard, in wooden barracks. Late that night, other Reserve Police Battalion 67 members and SS auxiliaries brought about 500 to 1,000 Jews from Tarnogród. The Tarnogród expellees also were imprisoned in barracks. Released from their prisons the next morning (on November 3) and ordered to march to Zwierzyniec, the Jewish captives were joined along the road to another 500 to 1,000 Jewish expellees from Goraj, Krzeszów, and Frampol. (The numbers are ranges, because some Jews, particularly in Frampol, had evaded deportation and the police had shot dead hundreds of others during the expulsions.) The remaining Jews in Józefów were not among the deportees because they had been executed on September 21, 1942. At the Zwierzyniec railway station, the Jews were forced onto cattle wagons and sent to their deaths at Bełżec. After the expulsion, the ghetto inmates collected the bodies of the approximately 200 Jews killed during the deportation Aktion.

On January 7, 1943, the ghetto was liquidated. Women, children, and the elderly were shot. A group of 15 youths was sent to a labor camp, possibly located in Janowice.¹³

Only a handful of Jews survived the Biłgoraj ghetto. Ten-year-old Rywka Wajnberg sneaked away from the march on the evening of November 3, 1942. She was among six Biłgoraj Jews sheltered by Jan Mikulski.¹⁴ A few Biłgoraj Jews participated in partisan activity in the area; such cases were comparatively rare.

SOURCES Secondary sources touching on the World War II history of the Biłgoraj Jewish community include the relevant entry in Abraham Wein, Bracha Freundlich, and Wila Orbach, eds., Pinkas ha-kehillot. Encyclopaedia of Jewish Communities: Poland, vol. 7, Lublin and Kielce (Jerusalem: Yad Vashem, 1999), pp. 93–97, with an English translation available at jewishgen.org.

Survivor accounts in English include Sara Avinun, Rising from the Abyss (Hod Hasharon, Israel: Astrolog Publishing House, 2005), originally published in Hebrew as El rafsdot ba-tehom ([Israel]: ha-Kibuts ha-me'uhad, 1998); and Joseph Ben-Or Lumer, ed., Yochvet: The Story of a Family's Survival (Los Angeles: Living Legacies, 2000). The two Biłgoraj yizkor books, Mosheh Teytlboym, ed., Bilgoray yizker bukh (Jerusalem, 1955), and Avraham Kronenberg, ed., Hurbn Bilguray (Tel Aviv, 1956), also contain survivor testimonies. The second book is available in a Polish translation, Avraham Kronenberg and Andrzej Trzciński, eds., Zagłada Biłgoraja: Księga pamięci, trans. Monika Adamczyk-Garbowska and Marzena Zawadowska (Gdańsk: Słowo/Obraz Terytoria, 2009).

Contemporary press coverage includes the relevant articles in Gazeta Żydowska, August 22, 1941, no. 7, and January 8, 1942, no. 4. The verdicts of two relevant West German trials concerning the office of the Security Police in Biłgoraj can be found in Justiz und NS-Verbrechen, vol. 42 (Amsterdam: Amsterdam University Press, 2010), respectively, Lfd. Nr. 846 and Lfd. Nr. 847.

Additional documentation may be found in the following archives: APL; AŻIH (e.g., 210/26, 211/219-224; 301/1437, 5501); BA-L (208 AR 38/62, 208 AR 1269/64); IPN (e.g., ASG); IPN-Lu (e.g., 254/67/1-2, 284/8); USHMM (e.g., Acc.1997.A.0124 [JSS]); VHF (e.g., # 13212, 31306, 32727, 35717, 43935); and YVA (e.g., M-1/Q-1423/222, O-3/3078, O-16/4617).

Avinoam Patt and Laura Crago

NOTES

1. AŻIH, 301/5501, testimony of Jerzy Markiewicz, p. 3; USHMM, Acc.1997.A.0124 (AŻIH), 211/221, pp. 25–28.
2. USHMM, Acc.1997.A.0124, 211/219, pp. 2, 6–9, 11.
3. Ibid., 211/221, p. 47; 211/220, pp. 52–54, 58.
4. Ibid., 211/220, p. 8; 211/221, p. 55.
5. Gazeta Żydowska, August 22, 1941, no. 75, p. 6.
6. Ibid., January 8, 1942, no. 4, p. 6; AŻIH, 301/5501, p. 2.
7. Gazeta Żydowska, January 8, 1942, p. 6.
8. USHMM, Acc.1997.A.0124, 211/224, p. 21.
9. Ibid., 211/220, p. 65; 211/221, pp. 14, 37, 38.
10. Kronenberg, Hurbn, p. 253 (Yisrael Geist testimony).
11. Ibid., p. 257 (Geist).
12. AŻIH, 301/1437, testimony of Rywka Wajnberg.
13. Kronenberg, Hurbn, pp. 274–275 (Geist).
14. AŻIH, 301/1437; Kronenberg, Hurbn, pp. 309–314 (Ben-Zion Rosenboim testimony).

BYCHAWA

Pre-1939: Bychawa, town, Lublin województwo, Poland; 1939–1944: Kreis Lublin-Land, Distrikt Lublin, Generalgouvernement; post-1998: Lublin województwo, Poland

Bychawa is located about 30 kilometers (19 miles) south of Lublin. In 1921, the Jewish population was 2,848 (65.9 percent of the total). Before the war, most Jews in Bychawa lived together in one neighborhood around the market square and in the northwestern part of town. In September 1939, on the eve of World War II, there were about 1,900 Jews residing in Bychawa.

About three weeks after the German invasion of Poland in September 1939, news spread that the Germans were approaching, and some local Poles robbed Jewish property. The Germans occupied the town for a few days, but then they withdrew and soldiers of the Red Army entered Bychawa from the east. A few days later the Soviets withdrew behind the Bug River, together with some Jewish youths who chose to follow them. German forces then reentered the town.¹

In the first days following the German seizure of Bychawa, the Germans forcibly shaved off the beards of some Jews, beating and humiliating them in the streets. An ethnic German, named in the yizkor book as Kelbinski, arrived and organized a local police force. Soon some of the Jews living in Bychawa were ordered to leave town.² Those remaining were required to perform forced labor and wear armbands bearing the Star of David.

From the start of the occupation, the German authorities imposed a series of “contributions” and onerous taxes on the Jews. A Jewish Council (Judenrat) was established, which had to provide large amounts of food and coffee for the local German Gendarmerie. When the Jewish Council failed to meet the required quota, the German authorities shot seven Jews as a punishment. The Jewish Council also distributed available food to Jews using ration coupons. In the summer of 1940, a number of Jewish men were selected and sent to forced labor camps near Bełżec to dig antitank ditches on the German-Soviet border. Concerned about their welfare, the Jewish Council was able to send some food assistance, and a number were able to return after several months.³

Several waves of Jewish expellees and refugees arrived in Bychawa from the end of 1939. By March 1940, around 145 deportees from Łódź had arrived. Then between February 26 and March 5, 1941, another 246 Jews were deported from Kraków to Bychawa. It is likely also that a number of those Jews who voluntarily departed from Lublin after March 1941 made their way to Bychawa. By July 1941, this influx of poor Jewish refugees had increased the town’s Jewish population to 2,750.⁴ This large influx of refugees placed considerable strain on the community. Most were housed with Jewish families, and a public kitchen was organized to provide hot meals for the needy.

In March 1941, another large contribution was imposed on the Jews by the Gestapo. Several hostages were taken and held for two weeks until the amount was paid. Around this time, the Gendarmerie post in Bychawa was moved to Niedrzwica Duża. However, an auxiliary police unit, composed of ethnic Germans and Ukrainians (apparently a Sonderdienst unit), remained in Bychawa. Józefa Seliga, a young Polish woman who lived in Bychawa during the German occupation, recalled many years later that the Ukrainian guards would sometimes raid the “ghetto” and demand ransom. During these wild Aktionen, many Jews were killed.⁵

In the late spring of 1941, as the Germans began to prepare for war against the Soviet Union, many Jews were again conscripted for the construction of antitank ditches along the Bug River. Most returned safely after a few weeks. The Germans strictly forbade Jewish doctors to treat non-Jews, and vice versa. On one occasion the Jewish felczer (physician’s assistant) was arrested and sent to Lublin for treating a non-Jewish patient. He was never heard from again. In Bychawa a Jewish medical clinic was established with 16 beds that were always fully occupied. After a severe typhus epidemic broke out in July 1941, the Kreis office of the Jewish Social Self-Help (JSS) wrote to the central office in Kraków urgently requesting money and medicine, criticizing the failure of the head of the Judenrat to respond effectively. Despite receipt of some of the requested medicine, the typhus epidemic resulted in a number of Jewish deaths before it was brought under control.⁶

During the first two years of the occupation the ethnic German mayor in Bychawa, August Schwergott (Swierkott), organized orgies, for which the Jewish Council chairman (at that time Boruch Herszman) was forced to supply Jewish girls. One Jew, who came from Lublin, named Kleinfeld, denounced him to the German authorities, and for this he was severely beaten and humiliated. Nevertheless, Schwergott subsequently was replaced as mayor in 1941.⁷

Most Jewish survivor testimonies do not refer specifically to a ghetto in Bychawa, although according to one source, from early in the occupation new arrivals were probably required to reside together with the local Jews around the synagogue.⁸ Bychawa nonetheless appeared on a list of ghettos Emil Ziegenmeyer, Kreishauptmann of Lublin-Land, submitted to German authorities on September 19, 1941. However, Ziegenmeyer described Bychawa as a “Jewish assembly site” (Judensammelort), rather than a ghetto. Ziegenmeyer likely named Bychawa, Bełżyce, and Chodel as Sammelorte when he permitted Jews expelled from Lublin to settle there during a second expulsion wave in April 1941. As the list was compiled in response to a Reich Interior Ministry inquiry about available space in Distrikt Lublin for incoming Jews, the three localities and Piaski Luterskie, which Ziegenmeyer claimed as the only ghetto in his Kreis, probably also were the places the Kreishauptmann envisioned resettling additional Jews. He cautioned that Poles would have to be expelled from the localities to accommodate any Jewish newcomers.

Jewish craftsmen continued to work secretly for Polish peasants living in the surrounding villages, exchanging goods with the aid of smugglers. As the Bet Midrash was being used as an overflow care center, people continued to pray privately in their houses. Jews also prepared hiding places in case of a German Aktion.

In December 1941, the Jews were required to turn over to the Germans all their fur items and other warm clothing. The Germans made Shmuel Nissenboim, a member of the Judenrat, responsible for ensuring that this directive was fully implemented. When the Germans discovered some Jews who had not turned over their furs, they shot them dead together with Nissenboim.⁹ By this time, as throughout Distrikt Lublin, Jews were forbidden to leave the town limits on pain of death. After Chaim Rozenberg was shot dead when he went out in search of food, others thought twice about disobeying this order. Nonetheless, some Jews persisted in foraging for food, and those caught were not always shot. In the winter the Jews had to perform forced labor clearing snow from the roads. A group of skilled laborers was sent to the Majdanek concentration camp, reportedly in 1942. Most did not return.¹⁰

In May 1942, in response to an inquiry from the Subdivision for Population Affairs and Welfare in the office of the Governor of Distrikt Lublin, concerning the number of Jews “whose resettlement appears necessary,” Kreishauptmann Emil Ziegenmeyer proposed that the 2,733 Jews from Bychawa were among those that should be given priority.¹¹ Available sources, however, indicate that the deportation of the Jews from Bychawa did not occur until the fall of 1942.

At dawn on October 10, 1942, SS men and Ukrainian auxiliaries broke into Jewish homes and ordered the Jews to assemble in the town square. After all of the Jews had been counted, the SS men opened fire into the crowd, killing many of them. Afterwards the Jews returned to their homes. The Bychawa ghetto was liquidated on October 11, 1942, and its occupants were transferred to the ghetto in Bełżyce. Józefa Seliga reported having witnessed the murder of several Jews during the deportation Aktion, including one Jew who was limping and was then shot and killed by the Germans.¹² Most of the Jews from Bychawa were then deported from Bełżyce to the Bełżec extermination camp shortly thereafter.¹³

Several hundred Jews were sent from Bełżyce to Bychawa a few days after the final Aktion in Bychawa. These Jews were imprisoned in a closed and secure labor camp in the Bet Midrash. Some Jews in hiding made contact with the Jews in the camp, but most were advised to stay in hiding if they could. The Jews in the labor camp were made to dismantle all the Jewish houses in the town.¹⁴ The labor camp in Bychawa was dissolved on May 8, 1943. At this time there were about 500 Jews there who were transferred to the labor camp in Budzyń. The surviving Jews from Budzyń were moved to Majdanek, and a few of them survived until the camp was liberated by the Red Army. Only about 50 of the Jews living in Bychawa at the start of World War II survived the German occupation.

SOURCES Published sources on the history of the Jews of Bychawa include the following: Ya’akov Adini, ed., Bychawa: Sefer Zikkaron (Tel Aviv: Irgun yotze’e Bychawa be-Yisrael, 1969); “Bychawa,” in Abraham Wein, Bracha Freundlich, and Wila Orbach, eds., Pinkas ha-kebilot. Encyclopaedia of Jewish Communities: Poland, vol. 7, Lublin and Kielce (Jerusalem: Yad Vashem, 1999), pp. 91–93; Robert Kuwałek, “Żydzi Bychawscy w czasie II wojny światowej,” Głos Ziemi Bychawskiej, no. 10 (29) (1997); and Ryszard Szczygieł, ed., Dzieje Bychawy (Bychawa-Lublin: Bychawskie Towarzystwo Regionalne, 1994).

Czesław Pilichowski et al., eds., Obozy hitlerowskie na ziemiach polskich 1939–1945: Informator encyklopedyczny (Warsaw: PWN, 1979), p. 122, refers to a ghetto in Bychawa but does not cite strong evidence in support of this. Bychawa is included here primarily on account of its status as a Judensammelort. Some available testimonies refer to the concentration of the Jews in Bychawa or even use the term ghetto, but this evidence remains debatable.

Documents describing the fate of the Jews of Bychawa during the Holocaust can be found in the following archives: AZIH (210/287; 211/273, 652; 301/1449, 3278, 4398); USHMM (RG-15.019M; Acc.1997.A.0124 [JSS]; Acc.1999.A.0154 [AJDC]; RG-15.084 [Relacje]; RG-50.488*0055); VHF (e.g., # 26182); and YVA.

Stephen Ricks, Laura Crago, and Martin Dean

NOTES

1. Moshe Brun, “Yorn fun peyn un umkum,” in Adini, Bychawa: Sefer Zikkaron, pp. 542–543.

2. Ibid., p. 543.

3. Moshe Orlid, “In di shrekliche teg,” p. 569; and Shmuel Rubin, “In di teg fun leydn un peyn,” p. 577—both in Adini, Bychawa: Sefer Zikkaron.

4. AŽIH, 210/287, pp. 3, 52; 211/273, p. 4; 211/649, pp. 2–18; and Brun, “Yorn fun peyn un umkum,” p. 542.

5. USHMM, RG-50.488*0055, oral testimony with Józefa Seliga from Bychawa.

6. Brun, “Yorn fun peyn un umkum,” pp. 544–546; USHMM, Acc.1997.A.0124, reel 33 (AŽIH, 211/652, p. 17), JSS Lublin-Land to JSS Praesidium in Kraków, Betr.: Die Lage in Bychawa, July 31, 1941.

7. AŻIH, 301/3278, testimony of Ryfka Akierman; see also Adini, Bychawa: Sefer Zikkaron, pp. 536–537, 543–544.

8. Waleria Jakubiak, oral history testimony on the Web site of the Lublin theater group Ośrodek Brama Grodzka—Teatr NN in Lublin, available at www.tnn.pl/himow_fragment.php?idhr=2005.

9. Rebekah Akerman, “Bekheve meyn heym,” in Adini, Bychawa: Sefer Zikkaron, p. 537; Orlid, “In di shrekleche teg,” p. 569; and Brun, “Yorn fun peyn un umkum,” p. 548.

10. Brun, “Yorn fun peyn un umkum,” pp. 549–550; Orlid, “In di shrekleche teg,” p. 569–570; Rubin, “In di teg fun leydn un peyn,” p. 579.

11. Bogdan Musial, Deutsche Zivilverwaltung und Judenverfolgung im Generalgouvernement: Eine Fallstudie zum Distrikt Lublin 1939–1944 (Wiesbaden: Harrassowitz, 1999), p. 399.

12. USHMM, RG-50.488*0055, oral testimony with Józefa Seliga from Bychawa.

13. AŻIH, 301/4398, testimony of Berek Rycer, p. 1; Pili-chowski et al., Obozy hitlerowskie, p. 122.

14. Adini, Bychawa: Sefer Zikkaron, pp. 561, 588; AŻIH, 301/1449, testimony of Sala Feigenman, p. 2.

CHEŁM (LUBELSKI)

Pre-1939: Chełm (Yiddish: Chelem), town, Chełm powiat, Lublin województwo, Poland; 1939–1944: Cholm, Kreis Cholm, Distrikt Lublin, Generalgouvernement; post-1998: Chełm, Lublin województwo, Poland

Chełm lies 69 kilometers (43 miles) east-southeast of Lublin and 25 kilometers (15.5 miles) west of the Bug River. Its August 1939 population of 33,622 included 15,000 Jews.

Luftwaffe bombardment from September 8, 1939, claimed about 200 lives, including at least 30 Jews. However, on September 25, in accordance with the Molotov-Ribbentrop Pact, the Red Army occupied Chełm. After a subsequent border demarcation, on September 28, designated the Bug River the German-Soviet frontier, hundreds of Jews joined the Red Army's October 7 evacuation. On October 9, 1939, the Germans occupied Chełm.

On October 25, 1939, the SS newly stationed in Chełm took some 20 wealthy Jews hostage, demanding 100,000 złoty for their release. Once freed, the “hostages” served as the intermediaries between the authorities and the Jewish community. The SS chose from among the hostages almost all 18 members of the Jewish Council (Judenrat), including its chair, industrialist Majer Frenkiel. Survivors disagree over whether the council was constituted in November or December.¹ The council organized a 150-person unit of Jewish Police.

On November 30, 1939, SS-Obersturmbannführer Hager, the newly appointed Stadtkommissar of Chełm, demanded the Jewish Council the next day assemble 1,000 to 2,000 adult male Jews on Plac Łuczkowski for an inspection by a visiting delegation, including Hans Frank, head of the Generalgouvernement, and SS-Gruppenführer Friedrich Wilhelm Krüger, Higher SS and Police Leader (HSSPF) of the east.² At the square, members of the 5th Squadron of the 1st SS-Reiterstandarte surrounded the assembled Jews and ordered them to march to Hrubieszów. The SS shot half the men dead during the march there. (German reports note 440 of 1,018 Jews were shot for escape attempts.) In Hrubieszów, the police the next day added more than 1,000 men to the survivors' ranks, divided the column in half, and then compelled the men to cross the Soviet frontier near Bełżec and Sokal. Hundreds perished near Sokal when Soviet border guards initially refused the men passage.³ Wartime Jewish sources noted 400 Chełm expellees returned home. Another 1,600 died on the Chełm death march.⁴

On October 30, 1940, Miller, the newly appointed Stadtkommissar, effectively established a ghetto in south-central Chełm by banning Jewish residence in northern and central neighborhoods. Miller's order prohibited Jews from residing on 17 streets, including Narutowicz, Browarna, Nadrzeczna, Jordańska, Piromowicz, Ogrodowa, Strażacka, Reformacka, and Kopernik. Jews living on the named streets had until November 10 to report to what Miller called the ghetto. On November 27, Miller ordered Jews to evacuate Lublin Street.⁵ A March 1941 article in Gazeta Żydowska noted the Jewish Council had averted the authorities' plan to fence the ghetto.

Miller's orders left for the ghetto a small sliver of the old Jewish neighborhood, from which Christians were never evicted.⁶ In April 1941, 11,000 Jews, including 400 refugees, resided there. That month, Frenkiel reported: “The Jewish population in Chełm is confined residentially to an extremely narrow area in which space is limited. Several dozen reside in a single room.”⁷ By December, its Jewish population was 12,500.

The Germans permitted Jewish craftsmen, businessmen, and health professionals to establish small private enterprises in the ghetto. In June 1941, 1,400 craftsmen (100 fewer than before the war) held artisanal licenses. They established 300 workshops, mainly tailoring, shoemaking, and carpentry enterprises. Another 540 Jewish-owned enterprises, mostly stores, employed 1,736 Jewish workers.⁸ Non-Jews entered the ghetto to order services from the craftsmen. They used specially marked front doors on the business establishments. Jews entered through back doors.

Meager rations required most to depart the ghetto to find food and heating fuel. Death was the penalty for leaving the ghetto's boundaries without permission and for transactions in food officially denied Jews. Though severe beatings were more common, several Jews found outside the ghetto were executed. The victims included three women discovered purchasing milk on a market day.⁹

Questions nonetheless remain about whether a ghetto existed in Chełm, mainly because, in September 1941, Hans Augustin, the newly appointed Kreishauptmann of Cholm, maintained that no ghettos existed anywhere in his Kreis. The fact that Augustin was responding to a Reich Interior Ministry inquiry about available space for incoming Jewish deportees undoubtedly shaped his response. Augustin explained he was contemplating a ghetto for Chełm but had postponed its establishment, as no room existed there (or elsewhere in the Kreis) for additional Jews.

On May 31, 1941, 1,800 Chełm Jews worked for several large German concerns on road and railway construction projects, in forestry labor, at a quarry, at a sawmill in Zawadówka village, and for the military. Another 250 were interned at labor camps, most at a camp established by the Inspectorate of Water Regulation (Wasserwirtschaftsinspektion) in Kamień. In June, 100 additional ghetto residents became the first inmates of another Water Inspectorate camp, established in Chełm to reclaim swampland.¹⁰

Another 1,200 Chełm Jews performed forced labor each day. Women worked as domestic servants for German civilian and military authorities. Men labored on public works projects, unloading coal at the railway station, removing matzevot (gravestones) from the cemetery to use as sidewalk paving stones, and extending the municipal water system. In the spring of 1942, when the authorities moved Stalag 319 from Okzowska Street, conscripts dismantled the old prisoner-of-war camp and buried hundreds, if not thousands, of dead Soviet soldiers in the nearby forest.¹¹ The Jewish Council permitted wealthier Jews to purchase exemptions from forced labor obligations. The council, in turn, offered volunteers (poorer Jews) 3 złoty for a day of substitute labor.

To establish a welfare system for the impoverished, the Jewish Council and the Jewish Social Self-Help (JSS) branch, also led by Frenkiel, used profits from a jam factory, and when the authorities closed it in mid-1940, they imposed an income tax on ghetto residents. By late 1941, three community kitchens, a medical clinic, and a 25-bed hospital for infectious diseases, established in November during a typhus epidemic, cared for 6,828 (of 8,500) impoverished prisoners. The child welfare programs established by JSS activist Chaja-Róża Oks, the wife of a physician murdered in the December 1939 expulsion, to care for the neediest of the ghetto's 5,000 children were considered the most developed of their kind in Distrikt Lublin.¹² By May 1941, they included a public school for 700 impoverished pupils (aged 7 to 12), free medical care, free meals daily for another 600 children, and a summer camp to provide special nutritional care to 110 of the most impoverished. Served two meals daily, the campers gained 2 kilograms (4.4 pounds) on average. A Drop-of-Milk (Kropla mleka) initiative provided pre- and postnatal care (usually a cod-liver oil milk substitute) to 450 infants and their mothers. Volunteers organized games at a playground to provide 500 impoverished children a daily opportunity for play.

German rationing policies undermined the welfare programs, threatened Jews' physical existence, and—when beneficent—increasingly accelerated authorities' direct interference in Jews' private lives. In March 1942, the Kreishauptmann's office, for example, extended to Jews (for 12 groszy) a bar of soap and enough detergent to launder one outfit. It was the first time Jews in Chełm had received these items. However, the authorities tied their distribution to a Kreis-wide "Cleanliness Week," advertised under the slogan, "We are destroying lice!" (Tępiemy wszy). From March 22 to 27, 1942,

Jewish authorities and German officials supervised Jews throughout the Kreis as they cleaned their persons, belongings, and homes and removed items from attics, basements, and storage facilities.¹³ Abram Cytron noted that this last order made it more difficult to hide during the expulsions.¹⁴

In April 1942, during the opening phase of Operation Reinhard in Kreis Cholm, the SS, according to survivor Gitla Libhaber, began marching through Chełm Jewish expellees from nearby communities as distant in the north as Sawin (home in January to 841 Jews) and in the south as Wojsławice. The April 20 Wojsławice deportation included 209 (of 1,450) Jews. The expellees were all over 60 years old.¹⁵ On April 10 or 11, a group of the expellees were sent to their deaths at the Bełżec extermination camp. Because later deportees, sent to Włodawa, never arrived there, they are presumed to have perished at the new Sobibór extermination facility. In late April, the SS ordered the Chełm Jewish Council to prepare a list of 3,000 elderly for immediate "resettlement."¹⁶

On May 11 and 12, 1942, 2,000 Slovak Jews from Humenné and Žilina arrived in Chełm. The SS confiscated the deportees' baggage, making them dependent on the Jewish Council. On May 18, the SS marched through Chełm nonworking Jews from Siedliszcze (nad Bugiem), a Jewish community, which in January had numbered 2,026. Because the 1,000 to 3,000 Slovak deportees sent to Siedliszcze in April for labor at the Wasserwirtschaftsinspektion (Water Regulation Authority) camp almost all were camp inmates, they formed an insignificant part of the expellees destined for Sobibór.¹⁷

The retention of labor camp inmates and working Jews motivated Frenkiel to attempt to blunt the forthcoming Chełm deportation's scope. He offered to recruit immediately for Holzheimer, the Wasserwirtschaftsinspekteur for Kreis Cholm, 7,000 conscripts (men and women) from the ghetto for the organization's eight labor camps.¹⁸ When the Cholm Landkommissar offered to shield from deportation volunteers for agricultural labor on his estate in Ruda-Opalin, it became a refuge for the native elderly.¹⁹ The Jewish Council protected others considered vulnerable, including 600 orphans it began placing in early May with foster families and probably also sending to Ruda.²⁰

Frenkiel's protection of native Jews and the fact many Slovak expellees were older sealed their fate. On May 22–23, 1942, the Shavuot holiday eve, they were sent by rail to Sobibór together with 1,000 elderly Chełm Jews during the first deportation. The deportation was much larger, as it included small-scale expulsions from nearby eastern communities. In Dubienka, for example, a part of the town's 2,700 Jews were expelled on May 22.²¹ Gitlabiner recalls Dubienka Jews among the expellees who passed through Chełm in the spring of 1942.

In Chełm, a raid of work sites in June or July enveloped about 1,000 underage and elderly public works conscripts and Wasserwirtschaftsinspektion camp inmates deemed unfit for labor. Holzheimer may have intervened to reduce to 300 the number sent to Sobibór.²² In a larger Aktion, in mid-August, remembered as the second or children's deportation, the SS sent to Sobibór 3,000 to 4,000 Jews, including most of the ghetto's children, the unemployed with many children, and the remaining elderly.

The ghetto area was reduced in size to establish what German authorities had planned in June 1942 as a "compact quarter."²³ It was composed of Szkolna, Uściługska, Pocztowa, Siedlce, and Katowska Streets. Jews living outside its borders were required to report to the ghetto in late August. The ghetto was unfenced. The Jewish and Polish (Blue) Police patrolled its internal and external borders. Some 5,000 Jews resided there.

On October 25, 1942, SS from Lublin and Ukrainian auxiliaries ordered all ghetto residents assembled on the Siedlce Street square. In a two-day Aktion, 2,000 to 3,000 Jews, officially the unemployed, were marched, via Włodawa, to Sobibór. Thousands evaded deportation by hiding in ghetto bunkers or with local Christians.

On November 5–9, 1942, the ghetto was liquidated. Late on November 5, the SS began transferring 500 to 1,000 laborers, craftsmen, Jewish Council members, and the craftsmen's and councilmen's family members outside the ghetto to labor camps and to vacant public buildings and barracks. The next morning, after surrounding the ghetto, SS and Ukrainian auxiliaries ordered its inhabitants assembled on the square. The deportees were marched to the railway station. The first to arrive went immediately to Sobibór. Others, held in a fenced holding facility established at the Kolejowa Street construction camp, went to Sobibór over the next several days.²⁴ While searching for almost a thousand people hidden in bunkers, the SS set fire to many ghetto buildings. Some uncovered during the searches were marched to the transit camp and sent to Sobibór. Others were killed on the spot. By November 13, the SS announced all Jews could enter a camp established on Katowska Street (at the pre-war Staszic public school) for 370 laborers held back from expulsion. Several hundred fugitives who reported there were executed.²⁵

Jews retained for labor resided mainly at the Staszic School (laborers' camp) or the railway station barracks (craftsmen's camp). When typhus engulfed both camps a few weeks after the ghetto liquidation, the SS executed in the Borek woods hundreds of sick inmates. The Jewish Council members, initially held at the Wasserwirtschaftsinspektion camp, also were shot. In January 1943, the prisoners at the school, including the Jewish Police, were sent to their deaths at Sobibór. In the spring, after the SS transferred to Sobibór for labor the craftsmen in construction trades, 28 Jews, mainly tailors, shoemakers, and their families, were left in Chełm. On March 31, the Gestapo executed 20 of the Jews. In October 1943, the Chełm craftsmen at Sobibór joined the prisoners' revolt.²⁶ Officially, only 8 Jews, all craftsmen, remained alive, incarcerated at the Chełm prison.

A number of fugitives had escaped from Chełm or jumped from the deportation trains. Some with false identity papers made their way to other localities to attempt to survive as Poles.²⁷ A few were sheltered by local Christians. Many more entered the collection ghetto in Rejowiec.²⁸ In addition to the 8 craftsmen at the Chełm prison and at least 3 participants of the Sobibór revolt, another approximately 50 ghetto residents survived the war.

SOURCES Secondary sources providing coverage of the life and death of the Chełm Jewish community during World War II include the relevant entries in Abraham Wein, Bracha Freundlich, and Wila Orbach, eds., Pinkas ha-kehillot. Encyclopaedia of Jewish Communities: Poland, vol. 7, Lublin and Kielce (Jerusalem: Yad Vashem, 1999), pp. 221–228; and its English-language counterpart, Arnon Rubin, The Rise and Fall of the Jewish Communities in Poland and Their Relics Today, vol. 2, District Lublin (Tel Aviv: Tel Aviv University Press, 2007), pp. 82–87.

English-language memoirs include Felicia B. Hyatt, Close Calls: Memoirs of a Survivor (New York: Holocaust Library, 1991); Ana Sherman, with I. Lewis Schneider, Ana's Story. A Holocaust Memoir (Potomac, MD, 2000); and Kalmen Wewryk, with Howard Roiter, To Sobibor and Back: An Eyewitness Account (Montreal: Concordia University Chair in Canadian Jewish Studies and the Montreal Institute for Genocide and Human Rights Studies, 1999).

Two yizkor books, Yizker-bukh Khelm (Johannesburg: Khelmer Landsmanshaft, 1954) and Sefer ha-zikaron li-kehillat Helm (Tel Aviv: Irgun yots'e Helm be-Yisrael uve-Artsot ha-Berit, 1980 or 1981), contain survivor testimonies, with the first including originals and translations of many of the Polish-language testimonies from the AŻIH 301 collection. Gitla Libhaber's testimony is available in the English translation of the yizkor book available at jewishgen.org. The chapter devoted to Chełm in Michał Grynberg and Maria Kotowska, eds., Życie i zagłada Żydów polskich, 1939–1945: Relacje świadków (Warsaw: Oficyna Naukowa, 2003), pp. 69–88, includes excerpts of memoirs from the AŻIH 302 collection, with the Yiddish-language testimony of Joel Ponczak (Ponczek) appearing there in Polish translation.

Letters sent from Chełm to Warsaw, found in the Ringelblum Archives, appear in their original language, and when appropriate in Polish translation, in Archiwum Ringelbluma, vol. 1, Ruta Sakowska, ed., Listy o zagładzie (Warsaw: ŻIH and PWN, 1997), pp. 87–89, 160–163 (both Ring I/568). Scanned images of some Jewish Council proclamations are available electronically at the Digital Library of Chełm. Contemporary press coverage includes "Chełm," Gazeta Żydowska, March 11, 1941, no. 20, p. 29. Chełmer Narichten, a bilingual German-Polish newspaper, also is an important source.

David Silberklang, "The Holocaust in the Lublin District" (Ph.D. diss., Hebrew University, Jerusalem, February 2003), pp. 176–180, summarizes the ghetto lists submitted in September 1941 by the Kreishauptmänner of Distrikt Lublin.

Archival documentation pertaining to the Chełm Jewish community during the war includes APL (e.g., 43/0 [830, 498 (273)]); AŻIH (e.g., 210/293, 211/284–294, 301 [666, 2072, 2192, 3039, 3058, 3067, 3322, 3385, 3622, 4384, 4392, 4979, 5368, 5373, 5408], 302 [104, 119, 306, 308], Ring [I/568, (707) I/817, (708) I/818, (709) I/1006, (1144) I/3]); BA-MA (RS 4/540, p. 51); FVT (HVT [416, 419, 570, 1301, 1304, 2234]); IPN (e.g., ASG); IPN-Lu (e.g., 3/71/Ch/1-3, 98/67/1-5, 378/67/1-2, 396/67/1-2, SOL [22, 61, 65]); USHMM (Acc.1997.A.0124 [AŻIH 211], Acc.1999.A.0154 [AŻIH 210], RG-15.079M [AŻIH Ring], RG-50.042*0023, RG-50.030*0069, RG-50.030*0184); VHF (e.g., # 446, 8994, 11205, 15999, 16311, 18144, 21900, 27965, 28827, 34801, 43591, 46050, 47692); and YVA (e.g., M-1/E [494, 1463, 1527], O-3 [409, 1169, 4138]).

Laura Crago

NOTES

1. Compare AŻIH, 302/104, testimony of Joel Ponczak, in Grynberg and Kotowska, Życie, p. 73, and AŻIH, 301/4384, testimony of Abram Cytryn, pp. 1–3.
2. AŻIH, 301/3039, testimony of Brucha Sznajder, p. 1.
3. USHMM, RG-15.079M (AŻIH), (709) I/1006, pp. 1–3; AŻIH, 301/2072, testimony of Szlojme Klajman, pp. 1–3, 301/5441, testimony of Hersz Furleiter, p. 2.
4. USHMM, Acc.1997.A.0124 (AŻIH), 211/286, p. 30.
5. Ibid., RG-15.079M, (707) I/817, pp. 1, 4.
6. AŻIH, 302/306, testimony of Lipman Sznajder, p. 7; 302/119, testimony of Aurelia Jaworska, pp. 24, 31, 33.
7. USHMM, Acc.1997.A.0124, 211/287, p. 24.
8. Ibid., 211/288, pp. 57–58.
9. AŻIH, 302/306, p. 11, 302/119, p. 26.
10. Ibid., 301/3039, p. 1; USHMM, Acc.1997.A.0124, 211/288, pp. 65–66.
11. AŻIH, 302/119, pp. 2, 3, 6, 38–39; 302/306, pp. 10, 14–15.
12. USHMM, Acc.1997.A.0124, 211/288, p. 50; 211/289, pp. 37–38.
13. Ibid., 211/293, pp. 30–31, 34; 211/294, p. 24.
14. AŻIH, 301/4384, p. 6.
15. Ibid., 301/2192, testimony of Gitla Libhaber, p. 5; USHMM, Acc.1997.A.0124, 211/1124, pp. 8, 23.
16. AŻIH, 301/4384, p. 2.
17. Ibid., 301/458, testimony of Zelda Metz, p. 1.
18. AŻIH, 302/104, in Grynberg and Kotowska, Życie, p. 74.
19. AŻIH, 302/119, pp. 14, 41.
20. USHMM, Acc.1997.A.0124, 211/294, p. 35.
21. Ibid., RG-15.079M, I/568, pp. 1–2.
22. Compare AŻIH, 302/306, pp. 14–20, 23, and 302/104, in Grynberg and Kotowska, Życie, p. 75, and AŻIH, 301/2192, p. 5.
23. USHMM, Acc.1997.A.0124, 211/294, p. 45.
24. AŻIH, 302/306, p. 40.
25. Ibid., 301/4384, p. 7; 301/5407, testimony of Stanisław Niedźwiński, p. 1.
26. Ibid., 301/666, testimony of Mosze Kornfeld, pp. 4–16; 301/5368, testimony of Mottel Samet, p. 1.
27. Ibid., 301/3067, testimony of Marek Stock, p. 1; 301/3385, testimony of Henryk Bergman, pp. 2–3; 302/306, pp. 33–122.
28. Ibid., 301/3622, testimony of Chana Falkiewicz, pp. 1–2.

CHODEL

Pre-1939: Chodel, village, Lublin powiat, Lublin województwo, Poland; 1939–1944: Kreis Lublin-Land, Distrikt Lublin, Generalgouvernement; post-1998: Opole Lubelskie powiat, Lublin województwo, Poland

Chodel lies 39 kilometers (24 miles) by road southwest of Lublin. In August 1939, 776 Jews were residing there.

A Wehrmacht unit had occupied Chodel by September 16, 1939. By January 1940, a 13-person Jewish Council (Judenrat) had been established. Chil Grinberg, its first chair, was replaced in mid-August by Icek-Mendel Erlich.¹

In the spring of 1940, 102 Chodel Jews were interned at local labor camps established for agricultural and carpentry work. Another 100 were inmates of a camp in Józefów (nad Wisłą). In mid-August, the SS conscripted 50 Jews for fortification labor at Bełżec. In the fall, 13 Jews were ordered to a winter camp in Sawin.² By then, Chodel had filled with Jewish refugees, including deportees from Łódź, expellees from Puławy, and voluntary refugees from Warsaw.³ Judith Tenia Reuven (née Teresa Wasserman), the daughter of Puławy expellees, recalls that the forced labor drafts and increasing incidents of arbitrary violence by German officials required her parents to flee Chodel (for Gniewosów) in late 1940.

On December 3, 1940, Emil Ziegenmeyer, Kreishauptmann of Lublin-Land, recognized a Jewish Social Self-Help (JSS) delegation for Chodel. Szmul Wolman, head of the JSS in Kreis Lublin-Land, speculated that the handwritten directive, issued while Ziegenmeyer was visiting Kraków, indicated he had agreed to accept additional deportees from that city.⁴ Physician Otto Bornstein initially headed the Chodel JSS. A refugee from Bielsko and a Jewish Council member, Bornstein also directed Chodel's Jewish medical clinic and 10-bed quarantine facility.⁵ He oversaw the resettlement of 203 Kraków expellees (deported on March 6 and 7, 1941).⁶

Ziegenmeyer also designated Chodel, along with Bełżyce (and probably Bychawa) as the localities in Kreis Lublin-Land to receive some of the 15,000 Jews expelled from Lublin to establish a small ghetto on March 27, 1941, in the city's old Jewish neighborhood. (Most Lublin expellees were deported to more distant localities in Kreis Cholm and Kreis Radzyn.) On May 1, 1941, 1,738 Jews, including 947 refugees, were residing in Chodel. Among the refugees were at least 300 Lublin deportees.⁷

On September 19, 1941, Ziegenmeyer included Chodel on a list of ghettos in his Kreis but designated it, Bychawa, and Bełżyce as Judensammelorte (Jewish assembly places). Ziegenmeyer may have established the Sammelorte in response to a January 17, 1941, recommendation by Ernst Zörner, governor of Distrikt Lublin, for Kreishauptmänner to designate a few communities in which to concentrate Jews (to curtail illicit Jewish trade and thereby better control smuggling). Because Ziegenmeyer did not use the term for other Jewish communities, including Biskupice, Piotrowice, and Trawniki, which had more than doubled in size from the resettlement of Kraków deportees, he may have used “Sammelorte” to identify the places in which Jews expelled from Lublin could reside. Ziegenmeyer also may have used the term to indicate localities where he was willing to resettle additional Jews. (The lists in part were a response to a Reich Interior Ministry inquiry about available space for incoming Jews.) Ziegenmeyer suggested Poles would need to be evacuated from Chodel, Bełżyce, Bychawa, and Piaski to make room for new Jewish arrivals.

Historians Bogdan Musiał and David Silberklang take Ziegenmeyer at his word and maintain no formal ghetto existed in Chodel, Bychawa, or Bełżyce. The author of the relevant entry in Pinkas ha-kehillot does not mention Ziegenmeyer's list but believes the arrival of hundreds of deportees resulted in the establishment of an open ghetto in Chodel's pre-war Jewish neighborhood. He reports the resulting "congestion" increased mortality rates, leaving just 1,398 Jews in Chodel by May 1942.

Unfortunately, the documentation available says little about restrictions on Jews residing in Chodel. In April 1941, some 550 new arrivals temporarily received free lodging in private homes and at the synagogue. According to Bornstein, the wójt, or head, of the Chodel administration had located housing for other deportees. In November, the JSS winterized the mass housing (presumably the synagogue) for homeless deportees.⁸

The most immediate crisis the Chodel Jews faced was food shortages. Because of local supply problems, deliveries of rye flour were nonexistent at times, as in February 1941, and almost 40 percent short from May. As a result, nonworking Jews received daily 40 to 50 grams (1.4 to 1.8 ounces) of bread, instead of the allotted 100 grams (3.5 ounces). A JSS community kitchen daily provided 300 breakfasts and lunches to 600 deportees. However, the arrival of Wehrmacht troops in Distrikt Lublin, in anticipation of Germany's invasion of the USSR in June, made kasha and potatoes exorbitantly expensive and often impossible to obtain. The price spikes and shortages forced the JSS to close the kitchen on June 20.⁹ "For the past two weeks," Bornstein explained, "the deportees have been sentenced to starvation and to begging from house-to-house, most often times unsuccessfully."¹⁰

In early July 1941, when the kitchen reopened, an absence of Jewish Council funding and a typhus outbreak required the JSS to stop providing meals to the expellees and to serve instead 80 typhus patients and children, as well as the elderly recovering from the disease. That month, one Jew perished from typhus. Another 288 expellees voluntarily departed Chodel, bringing its Jewish population to 1,450.¹¹

Claims that the JSS and Jewish Council members were responding inadequately to the deportees' plight led to several leadership changes. Shortly after June 25, 1941, Dawid Akerman replaced Bornstein as JSS head. Erlich, the Jewish Council chair, was named to the JSS delegation.¹² Josef Siegfried, the deputy director of the JSS in Distrikt Lublin and a Lublin Jewish Council member, reported that during an August 25 visit to Chodel, the wójt had met with him personally before reorganizing the Jewish Council to recommend candidates more amenable to the needs of the refugees and the locally impoverished.

In September 1941, when the rye flour shortages were overcome, the Jews received full bread rations for the first time.¹³ From November, Ziegenmeyer permitted the JSS to purchase and sell to Jews a limited supply of potatoes and kasha from cheaper government stores. The JSS could retain 80 groszy from each cubic meter of potatoes it sold. In the meantime, Hans Frank had permitted JSS organizations throughout the Generalgouvernement to keep 50 groszy from each locally sold bread-ration card. The Chodel JSS used the revenue to expand its kitchen to feed 200 to 250 impoverished Jews. On November 1, the Jewish population stood at 1,446.¹⁴ It is unknown whether the decline was due to the typhus epidemic or to individuals responding to rumors that Jews throughout Distrikt Lublin (and in the Generalgouvernement as a whole) soon would be forbidden to leave the borders of the places where they resided.

In late 1941, some 32 craftsmen worked as tailors, shoemakers, and masons. Another 148 Jews worked in forestry labor. On June 23, 1942, the JSS reported 450 (of 1,300) men and women had been employed from March as agricultural laborers at several nearby estates, including in Ratoszyn and in a number of villages.¹⁵

On May 19, 1942, Ziegenmeyer recommended the Chodel Jewish community, then numbering 1,398, and five other communities for immediate resettlement. Shortly thereafter, some 100 young men were transferred to the Opole ghetto and probably sent from there to the Poniatowa labor camp. On June 28, deportees from Saxony (mainly Leipzig) and Thuringia, expelled in May to Bełżyce, arrived in Chodel.¹⁶ In mid-July, German authorities renewed labor camp conscription.¹⁷

On either Yom Kippur or Hoshana Raba (September 21 or October 2, 1942), the Jews were expelled from Chodel. Like almost all the Jews in the southern part of Kreis Lublin-Land, save those living near Piaski, the deportees probably first were consolidated in Bełżyce. From there, they were transported to the railway station in Niedrzwica Duża and forced onto trains destined for either the Sobibór or Bełżec extermination center. Gołda Teich recalls many Chodel Jews hid in Bełżyce but indicates almost all were swept up in an Aktion the next morning, during which a large group of Jews was sent to the Majdanek concentration camp.¹⁸ Some Jews likely were held back from the deportation for labor in Chodel. The Chodel gmina Web site reports Jews remained in Chodel until 1943, when they were deported to the Poniatowa forced labor camp.

A handful of Chodel Jews survived the German occupation.

SOURCES Secondary sources touching on the World War II history of the Chodel Jewish community include the relevant entries in Abraham Wein, Bracha Freundlich, and Wila Orbach, eds., Pinkas ha-kehillot. Encyclopaedia of Jewish Communities: Poland, vol. 7, Lublin and Kielce (Jerusalem: Yad Vashem, 1999), pp. 220–221; and Arnon Rubin, The Rise and Fall of the Jewish Communities in Poland and Their Relics Today, vol. 2, District Lublin (Tel Aviv: Tel Aviv University Press, 2007), pp. 87–88. Survivor Judith Tenia Reuven touches briefly on Jewish life in Chodel during the occupation's first year in a testimony available in an English-language transcript on the Wirtualny Sztetl, a Web site sponsored by the Muzeum Historii Żydów Polskich. Contemporary press documentation appears in "Chodel pow[ia]t lubelski," Gazeta Żydowska, March 27, 1942, no. 37, p. 5.

A discussion of the ghetto lists compiled in September 1941 by Kreishauptmänner in Distrikt Lublin appears in Dieter Pohl, Von der "Judenpolitik" zum Judenmord. Der Distrikt Lublin des Generalgouvernements 1939–1944 (Frankfurt am Main: Peter Lang, 1993), pp. 92–94; Bogdan Musiał, Deutsche Zivilverwaltung und Judenverfolgung im Generalgouvernement: Eine Fallstudie zum Distrikt Lublin 1939–1944 (Wiesbaden: Harrassowitz, 1999), pp. 137, 222–223; and David Silberklang, "The Holocaust in the Lublin District" (Ph.D. diss. Hebrew University, Jerusalem, February 2003), pp. 176–180. A German-language transcription of Ziegenmeyer's May 19, 1942, recommendation to deport the Chodel community is available in Józef Kermisz, ed., Dokumenty i materiały do dziejów okupacji niemieckiej w Polsce, vol. 2, Akcje i wysiedlenia (Łódź: CŻKHWP, 1946), pt. 1, pp. 52–53.

Two deportation dates appear in the entry because Bełżyce survivors Gołda Teich and Noach Becer, in AŻIH, 301/1812 and 222, respectively, recall different dates for the second Bełżyce Aktion, or the second Majdanek deportation, with Teich specifically remembering that the deportation occurred the day after the Chodel Jews were sent to their deaths. Ewa Kurek, Poza granicą solidarności: Stosunki polsko-żydowskie 1939–1945 (Kielce: Wyższa Szkoła Umiejętności, 2006), pp. 222–223, 276n.387, offers some coverage of Jewish survivors from Chodel.

Archival documentation includes APL (e.g., 43/0/[830], 498 [273]); AŻIH (e.g., 210/298–299; 211 [138, pp. 48, 76; 647, pp. 15–16, 22–23; 648, pp. 5, 16–18, 24, 30, 39; 649, pp. 34–39; 650, pp. 14, 17; 651, pp. 4, 7, 16, 18, 21–24, 28, 33, 36; 652, pp. 16, 18–19, 25; 653, pp. 6, 10, 16, 18; 654]; 302 [1514, 1812]); IPN; IPN-Lu (e.g., 174/67/1–4); USHMM (e.g., Acc.1997.A.0124 [AŻIH 211]; Acc.1999.A.0154 [AŻIH 210]); VHF (e.g., # 37348); and YVA.

Laura Crago

NOTES

1. USHMM, Acc.1999.A.0154 (AŻIH), 210/298, pp. 3, 21–22, 25ff.
2. Ibid., pp. 31, 36, 44; 210/299, p. 3.
3. Ibid., 210/299, pp. 1–2.
4. Ibid., Acc.1997.A.0124 (AŻIH), 211/647, pp. 15–16.
5. Ibid., pp. 22–23.
6. Ibid., 211/649, pp. 34–39; 211/650, p. 14.
7. Ibid., 211/305, p. 9; 211/651, p. 18.
8. Ibid., 211/305, pp. 8, 11, 67.
9. Ibid., pp. 15, 40a, 41, 43.
10. Ibid., p. 43.
11. Ibid., pp. 25, 44–46.
12. Ibid., 211/651, p. 33; 211/652, p. 19.
13. Ibid., 211/305, p. 51.
14. Ibid., pp. 61, 65; 211/306, p. 23.
15. Ibid., 211/305, p. 61; 211/306, p. 18.
16. Ibid., 211/306, p. 27.
17. Ibid., p. 21.
18. AŻIH, 301/1812, testimony of Gołda Teich, p. 4.

CIESZANÓW

Pre-1939: Cieszanów, village, Lubaczów powiat, Lwów województwo, Poland; 1939–1944: Cieszanów, Kreis Zamosc, Distrikt Lublin, Generalgouvernement; post-1998: Cieszanów, town, Lubaczów powiat, województwo podkarpackie, Poland

Cieszanów lies 142 kilometers (88 miles) south-southeast of Lublin. Nearly 1,000 Jews resided there on the eve of World War II.

German forces occupied Cieszanów on September 12, 1939, but soon ceded it to Soviet occupation. After Soviet-German negotiations, concluded on September 28, returned Cieszanów to Germany, the local Red Army commander informed the Cieszanów Jews of the impending frontier shift and recommended they join the Soviet military evacuation.¹ The Jews almost all heeded his advice, with at least some relocating to Lwów.

Upon reoccupying Cieszanów in early October 1939, the Germans probably forced the remaining Jews across the border, located just outside of Cieszanów, expelling them south near Lubaczów into Soviet-occupied territory. In March 1942, Mieczysław (Mendel) Garfinkel, the head of the Jewish Council in Zamość and of the committee that oversaw the Jewish Social Self-Help (JSS) organization in the Kreis, reported that because of "the complete absence of Jews," neither a Jewish Council nor a JSS office had ever been created for Cieszanów.²

When, in May 1940, as many as 3,800 Jews, most from Distrikt Radom, were interned at a forced labor camp established in Cieszanów in May 1940, they, too, discovered no native Jews resided there.³ Survivor Hymie Kirsch, from Wolbórz, recalls he and many other prisoners were ordered to live in the Jews' abandoned, vandalized homes.⁴ The inmates, officially beginning in August, were part of a subcamp of the Bełżec forced labor camp and built border fortifications and a fence along the frontier. They also may have expanded a 28.6-kilometer (17.8-mile) stretch of the main road, which at Żuków connected Cieszanów, via Narol, to Bełżec. (Conscripts on the last project, completed by early spring, ground up matzevot (gravestones) from the Cieszanów and Narol Jewish cemeteries to use as paving material.) In mid-October, the SS closed the camp. Some inmates were transferred to Bełżec and to a camp located in Dzików Stary. The majority of prisoners were escorted to the railway station in Tomaszów Lubelski and sent home.⁵

Local officials responsible for completing Polish postwar Institute of National Remembrance (IPN) Court Inquiries about Executions, Mass Graves, Camps, and Ghettos (ASG) documentation nonetheless reported a ghetto was established in Cieszanów in December 1941.⁶ The first Jews known to have lived in the ghetto were some 700 to 817 deportees expelled from Tomaszów Lubelski on February 25, 1942.⁷ Another 465 to 500 expellees, among 2,000 Jews from Mielec to arrive in Zamość on March 16, were transferred by sled to Cieszanów. (The transport's remaining Jews were destined for localities in Kreis Hrubieszów.)⁸

The arrival of the expellees prompted Helmuth Weißenmaier, the Kreishauptmann of Zamosc, to establish a Jewish Council (Judenrat) for Cieszanów. The council was chaired by Filip Floh. On March 29, 1942, Floh became the head of the Cieszanów branch of the JSS. Pejsach Franblau and Srul Fajfer also served on the JSS delegation.⁹

Though historians consider the Cieszanów ghetto a transit or collection ghetto, a place in which deportees temporarily were consolidated to facilitate mass killing operations at nearby extermination centers, contemporary observers offered conflicting interpretations for the repopulation of Cieszanów with Jews and by extension the ghetto's establishment. In fretting about the new arrivals' welfare, Garfinkel suggested the ghetto may have been created to protect Jews from local non-Jews: "The native population, both urban and rural, is Ukrainian, preeminently hostile to Jews generally, and to Jewish settlers in particular."¹⁰ An article in Gazeta Żydowska, published on April 22, 1942, indicated that German authorities had decided to resettle Jews in Cieszanów to provide non-Jews access to artisanal services and agricultural labor. The article noted the Tomaszów Lubelski expellees almost all were craftsmen; their Mielec counterparts, mainly from rural areas, were farmers.¹¹

The article's publication also coincided with the murder, at the Bełżec extermination facility, of the first large transports of Jews, including, in March 1942, from Lublin, Piaski Luterskie, Izbica, Opole, and Lwów and, in April, from Rejowiec, Zamość, Kraśnik, Lublin, and communities in eastern Galicia. Because of Cieszanów's proximity to Bełżec, the article unintentionally may have provided the false impression that deportees were being resettled in the pre-June 1941 German-Soviet borderlands.

The Cieszanów ghetto encompassed the former Jewish residences located along the part of Skorupka Street by the synagogue and leading to the main market square and most of the houses fronting the square. (German and ethnic German settlers occupied the residences located along half of one side of the square.) The only building on another side of the square was the police station, at which a Sonderdienst unit, composed of ethnic Ukrainians, was stationed. The Gazeta Żydowska article reported that 1,200 Jews resided in Cieszanów.

Though the ghetto was unfenced, its inmates were forbidden to move beyond the square and synagogue. The death penalty was imposed on Jews found outside the ghetto's borders. Many were shot for disobeying the orders.¹²

Conditions in the ghetto were poor. The ghetto residences, the vandalized homes of the pre-war Jewish community, lacked doors, window glass, stoves (furnaces), and furniture. Most inmates slept on blankets spread out on the floor. Several families were crowded into each room, with even larger numbers living together in former stores, bars, and restaurants.¹³

On March 16, 1942, Garfinkel reported to JSS leaders in Kraków that he twice had purchased 800 kilograms (almost 1,764 pounds) of flour and 10,000 kilograms (about 22,046 pounds) of potatoes for the Cieszanów expellees. Floh pleaded for additional assistance, reminding officials of the catastrophic material conditions in which the Cieszanów Jews lived. By April 28, Kraków officials had sent 4,000 złoty in aid.¹⁴

Survivor Ira Mechlowitz recalled that peasants were permitted to come to the market square once a week to sell food to ghetto inmates, the only time Jews were permitted to mingle with the local population. However, most Jews had few possessions to barter. The half loaf of bread distributed daily to each ghetto resident was insufficient to stave off hunger. By early May, as the ghetto residents hovered on starvation's brink, many Jews illicitly left the ghetto to beg for food. Mechlowitz's mother appealed to the small number of Cieszanów Poles for potato peels and the water in which the potatoes had been boiled. Some ghetto residents died of diseases related to starvation. Others perished from typhus.

In April 1942, local authorities permitted children and younger adolescents to leave the ghetto to work as cow herders, shepherds, agricultural laborers, and domestic servants for peasants in nearby villages. The children were paid in food. Craftsmen, according to the Gazeta Żydowska article, were employed at several nearby estates. The SS sought volunteers for conscription at a labor camp located in Lubaczów. Because of the poor conditions in the ghetto, many inmates, perhaps half the population, fled to Tomaszów Lubelski.¹⁵

In May or perhaps in mid-June 1942, the Jews were expelled from the Cieszanów ghetto and sent to their deaths at Bełżec. (Though most scholars believe the deportation occurred contiguous with the May 22, 1942, deportation to Bełżec of almost all the remaining Jews in Tomaszów, Mechlowitz recalls the ghetto liquidation took place three months after the Mielec Jews arrived in Cieszanów.)

The Cieszanów ghetto probably was "restocked" with new expellees when the gas chambers were reconstructed at Bełżec from about June 20 to July 1942 or killing operations bogged down. The ASG documentation notes some 5,000 Polish Jews passed through the ghetto. Because Friedrich Wilhelm Krüger, the Higher SS and Police Leader of the Generalgouvernement, excluded Cieszanów from his October 28 list of the places where Jews living outside of labor camps legally could reside, the Security Police by then may have considered the ghetto a subcamp of Bełżec.

According to an unverified source, in May 1943, the SS assembled the Jews still resident in the ghetto, marched them to Wierzbica, and executed them.

The survivors of the Cieszanów ghetto, a handful in number, almost all were Mielec deportees.

SOURCES Secondary sources touching on the Cieszanów Jewish community during the war include the relevant entry in Danuta Dabrowska, Abraham Wein, and Aharon Weiss, eds., Pinkas ha-kehillot. Encyclopaedia of Jewish Communities: Poland, vol. 2, Eastern Galicia (Jerusalem: Yad Vashem, 1980), pp. 450–451. Testimonies from Cieszanów survivors appear in the yizkor book David Ravid, ed., Sefer zikaron de-kehillah kedoshah Tsieshinov (Tel Aviv: Irgun Yots'e Tsyeshinov be-Yisrael, [1969 or 1970]), available in English translation as The Cieszanow Memorial Book, trans. Jacob Salomon Berger (Mahwah, NJ: Jacob Salomon Berger, 2006). Contemporary press coverage includes "Cieszanów," Gazeta Żydowska, April 22, 1942, no. 47.

Documents pertaining to the fate of the Cieszanów Jews and the ghetto established in Cieszanów can be found in the following archives: APL; AŻIH (e.g., 211 [141, pp. 86–87; 142, pp. 1–3, 12–13, 26, 45; 143, pp. 2–4, 38, 54, 61–62; 277; 1152, p. 20]; IPN (e.g., ASG); IPN-Rz; USHMM (e.g., Acc.1997.A.0124 [AŻIH 211]; RG-15.019M [IPN ASG] [reel 17, 58/102]); VHF (e.g., #2418, 13077, 47545); and YVA.

Laura Crago

NOTES

1. VHF, # 38058, testimony of Leon Nebyl.
2. See USHMM, Acc.1997.A.0124 (AŻIH), 211/143, p. 3.
3. Compare with AŻIH, 301/60, testimony of Tejwie Frydman, p. 6.
4. VHF, # 27539, testimony of Hymie Kirsch.
5. AŻIH, 301/1691, testimony of Chaim Szaja Rywynowicz-Lisoprawski, p. 1.
6. USHMM, RG-15.019M (IPN), reel 17, 58/102.
7. Ibid., Acc.1997.A.0124, 211/141, pp. 86–87; 211/142, pp. 1–3, 12–13, 45; 211/1152, p. 20.
8. Ibid., 211/1152, p. 20; 211/142, p. 29; 211/143, p. 38.
9. Ibid., 211/143, p. 61.
10. Ibid., p. 3.
11. Gazeta Żydowska, April 22, 1942, no. 47, pp. 3–4.
12. VHF, # 13077, testimony of Ira Mechlowitz.
13. Ibid.
14. USHMM, Acc.1997.A.0124, 211/143, pp. 3, 54; 211/277, p. 1.
15. VHF, # 13077.

DUBIENKA

Pre-1939: Dubienka, town, Hrubieszów powiat, Lublin województwo, Poland; 1939–1944: Kreis Hrubieszow, Distrikt Lublin, Generalgouvernement; post-1998: village, Chełm powiat, Lublin województwo, Poland

Dubienka is located 94 kilometers (58 miles) east-southeast of Lublin. In 1921, the Jewish population of the town was 1,204, out of a total population of 2,964. On the eve of World War II, there were 2,160 Jews residing in the town.

Dubienka was initially occupied by the Soviet army, which invaded Poland on September 17, 1939. However, with the implementation of the Molotov-Ribbentrop Pact, the Bug River became the border between the German- and Soviet-occupied zones. At the end of September, Dubienka was transferred into German hands. A few, mostly young and impoverished Jews left the town with the Soviet forces, but most stayed put.¹

The abuse of the Jewish population began immediately, including the kidnapping of Jews for forced labor and many forms of harassment. German troops stormed the synagogues and forced the worshipers into the street, cutting off their beards and side locks.² Jewish survivor Sam Szor recalls that in the first weeks some Jewish families, including his own, were evicted on only three hours' notice from the better houses on the main streets to make way for German officials. The evicted Jews had to move in with other Jewish families. He was also no longer permitted to go to school. Szor remained in Dubienka until 1941 and notes that during that period at least the Germans did not establish a ghetto.³

The Germans ordered the formation of a Jewish Council (Judenrat), but initially no one volunteered. A second order required people who had worked for the community to serve, and a council of 12 members was organized. The chairman was Moishe Helfman. The other members were Velvel Vinek, Yoni Pines, Itzik Sobel, Shepsil Bernstein, Itzi Danziger, Aaron Mastbaum, Bunish Krempel, Yitzhak Segal, Chaim Lemberger, Avrum Mandel, and Yonah Zuckerman (Jona Cukierman, who survived).⁴ Subsequently Mandel became the chairman.

The Judenrat was instructed to provide a daily quota of forced laborers and to turn over furs and other valuables. On December 1, 1939, German soldiers ordered all Jews into the market square, where they were surrounded. The younger and stronger men were sent off to Hrubieszów. Many were shot and killed along the way. Upon arrival they were forced into the town square, which was surrounded by barbed wire, along with several hundred local Jews. From there they were force-marched to the Soviet border on December 2. This became a death march, as half of the Jews were murdered en route. Those who reached the Bug River were forced into the water and told to swim to the Soviet side. A large number drowned, and only a few managed to get across.⁵

At the start of 1940, refugees from Wieliczka, near Kraków, were resettled in Dubienka. The Jews were forced to work on German-managed farms in the vicinity and at a brick factory in Białopole. In 1940, all Jews aged 10 and above were ordered to wear armbands with a blue Star of David. The Germans also prohibited Jewish prayer, destroyed the large synagogue and study center, and burned the Torah scrolls. In the spring of 1940, hundreds of Jews aged 17 and above were sent to labor camps around Bełżec. They stayed there until the spring of 1941, building fortifications.

In the spring of 1941, the Jews of Dubienka became aware of German preparations for the invasion of the Soviet Union, as the town was only a couple of miles from the Soviet border. At this time the Jews suffered economic hardship, as most stores were closed, and many people were dependent on welfare support from the Judenrat. The Judenrat also had to collect any remaining valuables from the Jews, to meet onerous contributions demanded by the German authorities.⁶ In November 1941 about 100 Jews from Kraków were deported to Dubienka, as part of a larger group expelled into Kreis Hrubieszow.

In March 1942, another 843 Jews arrived from Mielec, composed almost completely of women and children. They were transported by Polish cart drivers from the nearby town of Hrubieszów.⁷ Among them was Eda Lichtman. She reports: "At Dubienka, we were lodged in synagogues where the Jewish community gave us food and straw. Some days later we were housed with families, and compelled to work on Aryan properties. A group of Jews wearing their prayer shawls were led towards a hill, and told to tread and dance on holy books. Nobody returned alive."⁸

Lichtman notes also that senior German officers, accompanied by Ukrainian volunteers, often visited the "ghetto" to steal from the Jews, leaving behind a trail of wounded and dead. Some secondary sources also refer to the existence of a ghetto in Dubienka; most primary sources, however, do not refer to a formal ghetto existing in Dubienka at this time.⁹

In May 1942, the German authorities reported that there were 2,907 Jews in Dubienka, who “needed to be resettled.”¹⁰ Another Mielec survivor, Szaje Altman, in Dubienka recalls that in May a number of Jews were selected at the main square and sent to labor camps in the area. According to a letter from Dubienka, preserved in the Ringelblum Archive, there was a further Aktion on May 22 during which a number of Jews were shot at the Jewish cemetery. As this correspondence reveals, several of the Mielec Jews remained in postal contact with relatives elsewhere within the Generalgouvernement. Several were able to escape from Dubienka, some even subsequently joining a sizable group of Mielec Jews in the Połaniec ghetto, in Distrikt Radom.¹¹

At the end of May, or on June 1, 1942, up to 40 Jews from the nearby village of Skryhiczyn were rounded up by German police and transferred to Dubienka.¹² By then, orders had been issued to the Judenrat that no Jews were permitted to leave Dubienka during the three days leading up to June 2, 1942. The Jews were informed of their impending resettlement and that they could take with them only up to 20 kilograms (44 pounds) of luggage and food for three days.¹³

On June 2, 1942, the Germans conducted a deportation Aktion. The Judenrat was informed that the Jews would be sent on a labor assignment near Pińsk. On that morning about 400 local farmers came to town with horses and wagons. SS men and auxiliary police dragged 2,670 Jews from their houses for transport on horse-drawn carts to Hrubieszów. On arrival, they were placed in an area surrounded with barbed wire and held for two days with almost no food or water. A number of elderly and exhausted Jews were shot. Then the remaining Jews were loaded onto freight trains and sent to the Sobibór extermination camp. A few managed to escape to the forests, but most of these people were turned in by local farmers.

The Germans retained in Dubienka just over 200 Jews, who had been issued with special cards because of their work skills.¹⁴ According to postwar German investigative sources, the retention of the laborers was partly on account of the intervention of the Ukrainian mayor, who was concerned about the economic impact of removing all the Jews.¹⁵ Only scant information is available about the living conditions for these Jews. It is likely that some form of remnant ghetto or artisans’ camp was established for them, as was the case in the nearby towns of Hrubieszów and Grabowiec, where ghettos were set up for the remaining workers after deportation Aktions in June 1942.¹⁶

According to records of the Jewish Social Self-Help (JSS), in August 1942, there were 247 Jews registered in Dubienka. Of these, 161 were craftsmen and 86 were laborers. Fifty of these Jews were employed at various German offices, and another 40 were in a labor camp.¹⁷ On August 15, 1942, the remaining craftsmen and specialists in Dubienka were transferred to the Hrubieszów ghetto, which was liquidated in turn on October 22, 1942. A group of about 17 Jews who had gone into hiding in Dubienka, but had been captured by local police forces, was executed at the Jewish cemetery in Dubienka in October.¹⁸ Of the group of craftsmen retained after June 2, only 15 people are known to have survived.

SOURCES Publications concerning the fate of the Jewish population of Dubienka during the Holocaust include the following: “Dubienka,” in Abraham Wein, Bracha Freundlich, and Wila Orbach, eds., Pinkas ha-kehillot. Encyclopaedia of Jewish Communities: Poland, vol. 7, Lublin and Kielce (Jerusalem: Yad Vashem, 1999), pp. 129–130; its English-language counterpart, Arnon Rubin, The Rise and Fall of the Jewish Communities in Poland and Their Relics Today, vol. 2, District Lublin (Tel Aviv: Tel Aviv University Press, 2007), pp. 94–95; and the yizkor book, Gershon Shahar, ed., Sefer zikaron le-kehillot Dubyankah, Skaritsin, Dorobusk (Tel Aviv: Former Residents of Dubienka, Skariczyn, and Dorohusk in Israel and the United States, 1994).

Published testimonies and memoirs by Jewish survivors with information concerning the fate of the Jews in Dubienka include Miriam Novitch, ed., Sobibor: Martyrdom and Revolt: Documents and Testimonies (New York: Holocaust Library, 1980); and Mark Verstandig, I Rest My Case (Evanston, IL: Northwestern University Press, 2002).

Relevant documentation can be found in the following archives: AŻIH (211/372 [JSS]; 301/2973, 4471 [Relacje]; Ring I/568 and 812); BA-L (B 162/4329); USHMM (Acc.1997.A.0124 [JSS]; RG-15.079M [AŻIH, Ring]; RG-15.084 [Relacje]); VHF (e.g., # 21057); and YVA (e.g., O-3 [707, 846], M-1/E/754).

Martin Dean

NOTES

1. Shahar, Sefer zikaron le-kehillot Dubyankah, p. iv (in English).
2. Wein, Freundlich, and Orbach, Pinkas ha-kehillot: Poland, vol. 7, Lublin and Kielce, pp. 129–130.
3. VHF, # 21057, testimony of Sam Szor (born 1924), 1996.
4. Shahar, Sefer zikaron le-kehillot Dubyankah, p. v (in English).
5. Wein, Freundlich, and Orbach, Pinkas ha-kehillot: Poland, vol. 7, Lublin and Kielce, p. 130; see also M. Cüppers, Wegbereiter der Shoah. Die Waffen-SS, der Kommandostab Reichsführer-SS und die Judenvernichtung 1939–1945 (Darmstadt, 2005), p. 51.
6. VHF, # 21057.
7. Bericht von Türk, Leiter der Abteilung für Bevölkerungswesen und Fürsorge im Amt des Distrikts Lublin für März 1942, Lublin, April 7, 1942, published in Tatiana Berenstein et al., eds., Faschismus, Getto, Massenmord: Dokumentation über Ausrottung und Widerstand der Juden in Polen während des zweiten Weltkrieges (Berlin: Rütten & Loening, 1961), p. 271; Verstandig, I Rest My Case, pp. 139–140.
8. “From Mielec to Sobibor,” testimony of Eda Lichtman, in Novitch, Sobibor: Martyrdom and Revolt, p. 54.
9. Czesław Pilichowski et al., eds., Obozy hitlerowskie na ziemiach polskich 1939–1945: Informator encyklopedyczny (Warsaw: PWN, 1979), p. 163. The only primary source given here is an unspecified reference to the ITS archives.

10. KH Busse an U-Abt. Bevölkerungswesen und Fürsorge in Lublin, May 22, 1942, published in Leon Poliakov and Josef Wulf, eds., Das Dritte Reich und die Juden: Dokumente und Aufsätze (Berlin-Grunewald: Arani, 1955), p. 196.

11. Wein, Freundlich, and Orbach, Pinkas ha-kehillot: Poland, vol. 7, Lublin and Kielce, p. 130; AŽIH, 301/2973, testimony of Szaje Altman; Ring I/568, letter dated May 23, 1942; Verstandig, I Rest My Case, p. 147.

12. BA-L, B 162/4329 (208 AR-Z 91/61), closing report of Sta. Hannover, 2 Js 369/62, in the case against Max Stöbner (crime location: Hrubieszów), April 15, 1965, p. 122. See also Joseph Kermish, ed., To Live with Honor and Die with Honor!: Selected Documents from the Warsaw Ghetto Underground Archives "O.S." ("Oneg Shabbath") (Jerusalem: Yad Vashem, 1986), pp. 209–210, which dates the expulsion on November 22, 1941.

13. Shahr, Sefer zikaron le-kehillot Dubyankab, p. vi (in English).

14. AŽIH, Ring I/568; see also 301/4471, testimony of Jona Cukierman, who puts the number of craftsmen at 150.

15. BA-L, B 162/4329, closing report of Sta. Hannover, 2 Js 369/62, April 15, 1965, pp. 122–123.

16. See Baruch Kaplinsky, ed., Pinkas Hrubieszów: Memorial to a Jewish Community in Poland (Organization of Former Jewish Inhabitants of Hrubieszów in Israel, 1962), p. xvi; and Shimon Kanc, ed., Sefer ha-zikaron li-kehillat Grabovitz (Tel Aviv: Irgun yots'e Grabovits be-Yisrael, 1975), p. 19.

17. USHMM, Acc.1997.A.0124 (JSS), 211/372, p. 48.

18. BA-L, B 162/4329, closing report of Sta. Hannover, 2 Js 369/62, April 15, 1965, pp. 149–150, 298, 306–310.

GRABOWIEC

Pre-1939: Grabowiec (Yiddish: Grabovitz), town, Lublin województwo, Poland; 1939–1944: Kreis Hrubieszów, Distrikt Lublin, Generalgouvernement; post-1998: Lublin województwo, Poland

Grabowiec is located 82 kilometers (51 miles) east-southeast of Lublin. In 1921, the Jewish population was 1,721 (in a total of 2,750). It is estimated that in 1939 the Jewish population was about 2,400.

As news of the German invasion reached Grabowiec on September 1, 1939, the local Jewish population feared the worst. Although the majority of Polish inhabitants did not turn hostile, the Jews were apprehensive of a possible outburst of Polish or Ukrainian antisemitism. Rumors of Nazi atrocities reached the town with the first Jewish refugees. Although four Polish policemen remained in the city, they were powerless to stop local hooligans from looting Jewish shops. Witnesses recall favorably the influence of the local Catholic priest, who urged his flock not to plunder the Jews or attack them.

The arrival of the Red Army brought order and a semblance of security on September 20, 1939. The Soviets organized a mixed Jewish-Polish militia, a move welcomed both by the Jewish inhabitants of Grabowiec and by Polish Communists. After two weeks, however, the Red Army withdrew, and several hundred Jews left with them as German forces occupied the town.¹

With the creation of the Generalgouvernement in October 1939, the German military handed authority over to a civil administration. Grabowiec became a town in Kreis Hrubieszów, in Distrikt Lublin. Dr. Behrend was the first Kreishauptmann in Hrubieszów, from October 1939 to June 1940. He was succeeded by Karl Heinrich Franke, from June 1940 to February 1941, and then by Otto Busse, from March 1941 to July 1944.

Once the Gestapo had established its headquarters (a Grenzpolizeiposten or office of the Border Police) in Hrubieszów on November 13, 1939, the harsh anti-Jewish measures were accompanied by Gestapo raids that sometimes entailed random shootings of Jews on the streets of the town.² Soon after the start of the occupation, a Jewish Council (Judenrat) was established in Grabowiec, headed by Jankiel Szlajer, which was obliged to supply a number of forced laborers every day. All those over 12 years old were deemed able to perform forced labor, although sometimes replacements were sent for those who were sick. The tasks were mostly arduous manual labor, such as cleaning streets, or cleaning toilets. The labor initially was unpaid, and the workers were often beaten by the German and non-German overseers. The Germans also set up a forced labor camp some 10 kilometers (6 miles) from the town. Young people from Grabowiec were sent to this and other camps, and the Judenrat attempted to supply them with food and even obtain their return, sometimes with the aid of bribes.³

During the first months of German occupation a number of anti-Jewish measures were implemented. Jews were forced to wear patches on their clothes 10 centimeters (about 4 inches) across bearing a Star of David 8 centimeters (3 inches) across, and some Jewish businesses were closed down. Initially Jews were ashamed to be seen wearing these patches on the street. Due to the economic hardship, Jews sold their last remaining possessions to feed their families. They were able to continue trading with the local peasants, as the restrictions on leaving the town were not strictly enforced. The German authorities also imposed heavy “contributions” on the Jewish community, which had to be collected by the Judenrat by a certain date. The Jews somehow managed to scrape together the large sums demanded by tapping their last reserves.⁴

The news from former inhabitants of Grabowiec who had left with the Soviets was not that encouraging, as people there described the many hardships that befell them. A number of refugees arrived in Grabowiec during 1940 and 1941, from Lublin, Warsaw, Kraków, and other places, including Germany, which intensified the overcrowded conditions and impoverishment among the Jewish community. The Jewish population of the town rose from 1,500 in April 1941 to 1,758 in October 1941. To assist the new arrivals, the Judenrat set up a soup kitchen that served up to 200 meals per day.⁵

Some time after the German invasion of the Soviet Union in June 1941, the Germans conducted a first Aktion. Following the murder of a German officer by partisans nearby, the Germans ordered all the Jews of Grabowiec to assemble on the marketplace (Targowica Square). They then selected 20

Jews, escorted them out of the town, and shot them as a “reprisal” for the murder. This incident was known among the Jews as “black Wednesday.” The German authorities subsequently requested the Jewish Council to bury the bodies.⁶

In response to an inquiry by the Interior Department of the Generalgouvernement administration in Hrubieszów about the progress of ghettoization, Kreishauptmann Otto Busse responded on September 27, 1941, that he was planning ghettos or camps in Hrubieszów and Grabowiec.⁷ The end of 1941 saw a tightening of Gestapo control, and new economic restrictions were imposed on the Jews, causing further impoverishment and pushing them to the verge of starvation. At the same time, the Nazi terror intensified, as they arrested many Jews on the pretext of alleged Communist sympathies.

On May 1, 1942, the German authorities in Hrubieszów resettled several hundred Jews living in Miączyn, Werbkowice, and Mołodziatycze to Grabowiec. Shortly afterwards they began to issue special passes to those Jews urgently needed as workers.⁸ Then on May 22, 1942, the Kreishauptmann in Hrubieszów, Otto Busse, reported to the department for population and welfare of the Distrikt Gouverneur, Ernst Zörner, in Lublin that there were 2,026 Jews in Grabowiec, “whose resettlement appeared necessary.”⁹

At the beginning of June 1942, the remaining Jews from surrounding villages were concentrated in Grabowiec. Some of them were shot on the way, revealing the murderous intentions of the Germans. A letter from one of the Jews brought into Grabowiec, dated June 5, 1942, reflects the mood at this time: “Here we are confronted with death. An order has been issued that we must leave the town within seven days. We live in anxious fear of a major disaster! Either we will be sent further on a senseless march, to a labor camp, or to our deaths.”¹⁰ Then on June 8, 1942, the deputy Kreishauptmann in Hrubieszów, Josef Fieback, organized a deportation Aktion in Grabowiec. The Jews were gathered on the marketplace and kept there throughout the night. Money and valuables were taken from the Jews. Some of the old and sick Jews as well as children were killed on the spot during the roundup. Then the remaining old and sick persons were piled onto peasant’s carts, while the able-bodied Jews were marched on foot to the train station at Miączyn, 10 kilometers (6 miles) south of Grabowiec. At the Miączyn station, the Jews were placed in an area surrounded with barbed wire, where a selection was conducted and about 800 Jews fit for work were sent back to Grabowiec. The others (about 1,200) were packed into overcrowded freight cars and transported to the Sobibór extermination camp under the guard of the auxiliary police (Trawniki men).¹¹

Those men who were escorted back to Grabowiec were forced to live in a “ghetto,” which was established between the bathhouse and the house of Neta, the tailor.¹² The emptied Jewish houses were soon robbed by the local Polish population. Every day the Jews were taken to perform forced labor. Food was scarce and difficult to obtain, but the Jews continued to sell their few remaining belongings to the peasants illegally in exchange for food. Reports of the local branch of the Jewish Social Self-Help (JSS) from July 1942 indicate that there were 850 Jews in Grabowiec. After the resettlement, those who remained were all workers.¹³

After four months, the inhabitants of the ghetto were called to assemble at the market square again, and from there they were all escorted to Hrubieszów. On arrival there, they were subjected to another Aktion on October 21, 1942, that targeted the Jews of Hrubieszów and the surrounding area. Most of the Jews were loaded onto crowded cattle cars and sent to the Sobibór extermination camp. At least one of the men from Grabowiec, Ben Zion Fink, managed to escape from the train during the journey. However, on his way back to Grabowiec he was stopped by a local peasant and taken to the police. He was subsequently sent to the forced labor camp in Budzyń but survived the war in a number of different concentration camps.¹⁴

Some Jews from Grabowiec participated in the fight against the German occupiers as partisans. Most of the Jews who had fled to the Soviet Union in the fall of 1939 survived the war, but only a small number of those who came under German occupation managed to survive in hiding, in the forests, or in the camps.

SOURCES Much of the information collected for this article was taken from the yizkor book, Shimon Kanc, ed., Sefer ha-zikaron li-kehillat Grabovitz (Tel Aviv: Irgun yots’e Grabovits be-Yisrael, 1975), which also includes a short section in English. There is also a short article on the town in Abraham Wein, Bracha Freundlich, and Wila Orbach, eds., Pinkas ha-kehillot. Encyclopaedia of Jewish Communities: Poland, vol. 7, Lublin and Kielce (Jerusalem: Yad Vashem, 1999), pp. 122–124. The Grabowiec ghetto is also mentioned in Czesław Pilichowski et al., eds., Obozy hitlerowskie na ziemiach polskich 1939–1945: Informator encyklopedyczny (Warsaw: PWN, 1979), p. 189; and in BŻIH, no. 21 (1957): 65.

Documents on the persecution and extermination of the Jews of Grabowiec can be found in the following archives: APL (GDL, 270); AŻIH (e.g., 211/425–427; 301/1297); BA-L (B 162/4329 [208 AR-Z 91/1961]); IPN (ASG); USHMM (Acc. 1997.A.0124 [JSS]; RG-15.084 [Relacje]); VHF; and YVA (e.g., TR.11/02138).

Ksenia Krimer, Adam Kopciowski, and Martin Dean

NOTES

1. Ben Zion Fink, “Under Bloodthirsty Rule,” in Kanc, Sefer ha-zikaron li-kehillat Grabovitz, pp. 16–22, here pp. 16–18. The research of Adam Kopciowski indicates that probably considerably more than the 200 Jews mentioned by Fink left with the Soviets. See Adam Kopciowski, “Żydzi w Grabowcu” (MSS, March 2007).

2. Justiz und NS-Verbrechen, vol. 27 (Amsterdam: Amsterdam University Press, 2003), Lfd. Nr. 674, p. 175; Fink, “Under Bloodthirsty Rule,” p. 18.

3. Fink, “Under Bloodthirsty Rule,” pp. 18–19; Yita Kaplan-Shisler, “Teg, Yorn fun Pein un Umkum,” in Kanc, Sefer ha-zikaron li-kehillat Grabovitz, pp. 316–324, here pp. 318–319.

4. Kaplan-Shisler, “Teg, Yorn fun Pein un Umkum,” pp. 318–319.

5. Fink, "Under Bloodthirsty Rule," pp. 18–19; Kopciowski, "Żydzi w Grabowcu."

6. Kaplan-Shisler, "Teg, Yorn fun Pein un Umkum," p. 321. Fink, "Under Bloodthirsty Rule," p. 19, gives a somewhat different account of this "first Aktion."

7. APL, Gouverneur des Distrikts Lublin, 270, Letter of Busse to U-Abt. Bevölkerungswesen und Fürsorge in Lublin, September 27, 1941.

8. JuNS-V, vol. 27, Lfd. Nr. 674, pp. 176–177.

9. KH Busse an U-Abt. Bevölkerungswesen und Fürsorge in Lublin, May 22, 1942, published in Leon Poliakov and Josef Wulf, eds., Das Dritte Reich und die Juden: Dokumente und Aufsätze (Berlin-Grunewald: Arani, 1955), p. 196. USHMM, Acc.1997.A.0124 (JSS), 211/427, p. 25, indicates that there were 1,808 Jews in the town of Grabowiec in May 1942.

10. Walter Zwi Bacharach, ed., Dies sind meine letzten Worte . . . Briefe aus der Schoah (Göttingen: Wallenstein, 2006), p. 310.

11. AŻIH, 301/1297, testimony of Sala Zylberman; BA-L, B 162/4329 (208 AR-Z 91/61), Closing report of Sta. Hannover, 2 Js 369/62, in the case against Max Stöbner (crime location: Hrubieszów), April 15, 1965, pp. 118–121; Kanc, Sefer ha-zikaron li-kehillat Grabovitz, pp. 321–323, 326, 349–350.

12. Fink, "Under Bloodthirsty Rule," pp. 19–20. Wein, Freundlich, and Orbach, Pinkas ha-kehillot: Poland, vol. 7, Lublin and Kielce, p. 124, mention the existence of a ghetto from early in 1941, which was enclosed during the fall of 1941, but this is not confirmed in eyewitness testimonies.

13. USHMM, Acc.1997.A.0124, 211/427, pp. 30–33.

14. Fink, "Under Bloodthirsty Rule," pp. 20–22.

HRUBIESZÓW

Pre-1939: Hrubieszów, town, Lublin województwo, Poland;

1939–1944: Hrubieszów, Kreis center, Distrikt Lublin, Generalgouvernement; post-1998: Hrubieszów, Lublin województwo, Poland

Hrubieszów is located about 80 kilometers (50 miles) south-east of Lublin. In 1921, there were 5,679 Jews living in Hrubieszów (59.35 percent of the total population). In 1939, prior to the start of World War II, there were about 7,500 Jews living in the town.

German armed forces occupied the town on September 14, 1939. On September 17, 1939, the German forces withdrew, handing the town over to the Red Army as originally agreed under the Molotov-Ribbentrop Pact. On October 3, 1939, however, the town again changed hands and was occupied by German forces as a result of a subsequent agreement. As the Red Army retreated, part of the Jewish population evacuated to the east, especially young Jewish men.

With the creation of the Generalgouvernement on October 26, 1939, Hrubieszów became a Kreis center within Distrikt Lublin. Dr. Behrend became the first Kreishauptmann in Hrubieszów, from October 1939 until June 1940. He was succeeded by Karl Heinrich Franke, from June 1940 to February 1941, and by Otto Busse, from March 1941 to July 1944.

A religious Jew in Hrubieszów suffers the humiliation of having his beard cut off, 1939–1941.

USHMM WS #06213, COURTESY OF RAPHAEL ARONSON

The Germans set up a Border Police post (Grenzpolizei-posten) and a Gendarmerie post. Serving under these offices in Hrubieszów were an auxiliary police unit (Sonderdienst) composed of a number of local German speakers and also units of Ukrainian and Polish police.

In 1939–1941, the German occupying authorities implemented a series of anti-Jewish policies in Hrubieszów. Much of Jewish property was confiscated; all Jews were registered and had to wear white armbands bearing the Star of David; Jews were prohibited from leaving the limits of the town; and they were obliged to pay large "contributions" to the German authorities. In November 1939, the Germans established a Jewish Council (Judenrat) consisting of 12 men, with Szmuel Brand at its head and Joel Rabinowicz as his deputy. The Judenrat was tasked with organizing Jews for forced labor and was made personally responsible by the occupying authorities for ensuring the implementation of the anti-Jewish regulations. It was assisted in its task by a Jewish police force.

On December 2, 1939, the first Aktion took place. On the day before, December 1, the 5th Squadron of the 1st SS-Reiterstandarte had picked up 1,018 Jews in Chełm and force-marched them under brutal conditions to Hrubieszów. On the road, the SS shot 440 Jews “for attempting to escape.” Then in Hrubieszów, over 1,000 Jewish men were added to the 578 survivors from Chełm, and the German police drove them up to the demarcation line at the Bug River, with the aim of forcing the Jews across into Soviet territory. However, the Soviet guards across the border did not permit the Jews to enter, and the German plan did not work. During the attempted border crossing, which lasted more than nine hours, a number of Jews were murdered, others drowned in the Bug River from exhaustion, and a small group successfully crossed into Soviet territory. The remaining Jews returned to Hrubieszów.¹

A number of refugees arrived in Hrubieszów during 1940 and 1941 from western Poland and other places, including Germany, which increased the pressure on limited resources within the Jewish community. The Judenrat took on the task of finding shelter for the new refugees and attempting to provide a minimum level of support.² On August 13, 1940, a second Aktion was carried out. German and Polish policemen arrested 800 Jews, and after three days, 600 of them were deported to forced labor camps near Bełżec for the construction of fortifications. Half of these Jews died in the camps from hunger and disease, and the remaining Jews in Hrubieszów lived in great fear of being sent to these camps.³ A registration conducted in October 1940 indicated there were 4,858 Jews in Hrubieszów.

According to some sources, a form of open ghetto was established in Hrubieszów close to the marketplace at some time between the summer of 1940 and June of 1942. This area had previously been inhabited mainly by Jews; the Poles and Ukrainians who lived there had to move out, while all the Jews residing outside the demarcated area had to move in.⁴ Contemporary documentation indicates that in October 1940 the Jews could only use certain streets if issued with special passes by the Judenrat.⁵ In response to an inquiry by the Interior Department of the Generalgouvernement administration in Kraków about the progress of ghettoization, Kreishauptmann Otto Busse responded on September 27, 1941, that he was planning ghettos or camps in Hrubieszów and Grabowiec.⁶ However, the report of the local branch of the Jewish Social Self-Help (JSS), dated April 1, 1942, indicated that at that time there was no Jewish quarter (dzielnica żydowska) in Hrubieszów.⁷

In September 1941, after the return of many Jews from the labor camps, the total Jewish population had risen to around 5,500 Jews. In April 1942, the JSS reported that there were 5,849 Jews in the town, including 1,194 refugees and deportees.⁸

The JSS records indicate that a surprisingly large number of newcomers in Hrubieszów had arrived from Warsaw in 1940 and 1941. Among them were many Zionist activists, from groups such as Dror and Betar, who came to the Hrubieszów area to work on farms, which served also as Zionist training camps. Some of these Zionist activists remained in postal contact with other activists in the Warsaw ghetto. A few of the activists even returned to Warsaw to take part in the resistance there, following the deportations from Hrubieszów in the summer and fall of 1942.⁹

In Kreis Hrubieszów, the Jews from many surrounding villages were ordered in mid-April 1942 to relocate to Hrubieszów by April 30, 1942.¹⁰ Then in May 1942, the German authorities in Hrubieszów began to issue special passes to those Jews urgently needed as workers.¹¹ On May 22, 1942, the Kreishauptmann in Hrubieszów, Otto Busse, reported to the department for population and welfare of the Distrikt Gouverneur in Lublin that there were 5,690 Jews in Hrubieszów, “whose resettlement appeared necessary first.” For the whole Kreis he reported that 1,233 Jews were to be kept as skilled workers, and the remaining 14,188 Jews were to be deported.¹²

Between June 1 and June 10, 1942, the Kreishauptmann assisted by the German police organized the first deportations from Kreis Hrubieszów. The Jewish Council in Hrubieszów was ordered to assemble those Jews not registered as skilled workers in the marketplace on June 1, 1942. They would be permitted to take with them only 20 kilograms (44 pounds) of personal possessions. When it was clear that not all Jews had responded, the German head of the local section for police affairs in Hrubieszów, Meyer, ordered the Gendarmerie, the Sonderdienst, a squad of Trawniki men, and the Jewish Police to collect additional Jews from the ghetto. From the marketplace the Jews were then loaded onto trains. A second Aktion was carried out about a week later, and because many Jews hid on this occasion, the auxiliary police forces, especially the Sonderdienst, applied considerable brutality in pulling Jews from the houses and driving them to the railway station, murdering a number on the way. During the process, most Jews with work passes were selected out and retained in the town. More than 5,000 Jews were deported by train from Hrubieszów to the extermination camp at Sobibór by June 10, 1942. In the searches for Jews in hiding in the days that followed, several hundred Jews were uncovered, and the Germans and their collaborators shot them at the Jewish cemetery. The Jewish Council was instructed to organize a team of about 30 “specialist workers” to bury these Jews.¹³

On June 15, 1942, the remaining 2,600 or so Jews were moved into a reorganized smaller remnant ghetto comprising the streets of Metalowa, and Nowy Rynek and the alleys leading towards the Jewish cemetery. The ghetto served mainly to dupe the Jews into believing they would be kept alive as useful workers and thereby reduce their willingness to offer resistance.¹⁴ In October 1942, a number of Jews were brought to Hrubieszów from Grabowiec and Uchanie, signaling a further deportation Aktion. On October 22, 1942, the third deportation Aktion took place. This time, around 3,000 Jews were deported to the extermination camp at Sobibór. On November 16–18, 1942, a few hundred Jews, mostly those found in hiding, were shot at the Jewish cemetery in Hrubieszów.¹⁵ About 200 Jews remained in the town to sort through the belongings of those who had been deported and assist with burying those who had been shot. These Jews were housed in what became known as the Jatkowa camp.¹⁶ One Jew who emerged from hiding described the doors standing open and smashed windows he found in the empty ghetto area. He then joined the Jatkowa camp laborers and worked 12 hours “muscling furniture down flights of stairs and into trucks, yanking down draperies, piling up pots and pans, dishes, utensils, linens, and lamps, dumping out drawers of shirts, socks, underwear, and baby clothes. He felt ashamed as he and the others handled, even evaluated, the personal belongings of their faceless owners.”¹⁷ In May 1943, most of the Jews that remained in Hrubieszów (about 450) were sent to the labor camp at Budzyń, although some were shot on the spot.

On May 3, 1968, a local court (Landgericht) in Hildesheim, Germany, sentenced Johann Demant, who had served as a Kriminalsekretär at the Grenzpolizeiposten in Hrubieszów, to life in prison. In 1942, he participated in the shooting of more than 100 Jews from Hrubieszów at the time of the deportations to Sobibór.¹⁸

SOURCES Publications dealing with the persecution and murder of the Jews in Hrubieszów include the following: Baruch Kaplinsky, ed., Pinkas Hrubieshov: Memorial to a Jewish Community in Poland (Organization of Former Jewish Inhabitants of Hrubieszow in Israel, 1962); Justiz und NS-Verbrechen, vol. 28 (Amsterdam: Amsterdam University Press, 2003), Lfd. Nr. 674a and 674b; Sborashim shelanu: Le-zekher kedoshei Hrubieszow, 1939–1945, 5 vols. (Tel Aviv: Organization of Former Jewish Inhabitants of Hrubieszow in Israel, 1990–1995); and Abraham Wein, Bracha Freundlich, and Wila Orbach, eds., Pinkas ha-kehillot. Encyclopaedia of Jewish Communities: Poland, vol. 7, Lublin and Kielce (Jerusalem: Yad Vashem, 1999), pp. 147–152.

Published memoirs relating to Hrubieszów include the following: Henry Orenstein, I Shall Live: Surviving Against All Odds, 1939–1945 (New York: Beaufort Books, 1988); Meyer Megdal, My Holocaust Testimony (Van Nuys, CA: Meyer Megdal, 1994); and Michael Korenblit and Kathleen Janger, Until We Meet Again (New York: G.P. Putnam’s Sons, 1983).

Documents on the extermination of the Jews in Hrubieszów can be found in the following archives: APL (GDL, 270, 283); AŻIH (211/445 [JSS]; 301/649, 1129, 1134, 2182, and 4333 [Relacje]; 302/125; and Ring I/550, 810, 811, 814, 815, 1132); BA-L (ZStL, 208 AR-Z 91/1961); FVA (# 9, 942, 943, 944); IPN; USHMM (Acc.1997.A.0124 [AŻIH, JSS]; RG-15.019M; RG-15.079M [AŻIH, Ring]; RG-15.084 [AŻIH, Relacje]); VHF; and YVA (e.g., O-3/2140, 3135, 4237, 4238, 4328, 7158, 10488, and M.10.AR1/814).

Alexander Kruglov and Martin Dean
trans. Steven Seegel

NOTES

1. BA-MA, RS 4/540, reports of 5th Squadron on December 1, 2, and 6, 1939; M. Cüppers, Wegbereiter der Shoah. Die Waffen-SS, der Kommandostab Reichsführer-SS und die Judenvernichtung 1939–1945 (Darmstadt, 2005), p. 51; AŻIH, 301/2182, testimony of Motel Kaufman.

2. Megdal, My Holocaust Testimony, p. 11.

3. Wein, Freundlich, and Orbach, Pinkas ha-kehillot: Poland, vol. 7, Lublin and Kielce, p. 151.

4. JuNS-V, vol. 28, Lfd. Nr. 674a, p. 176, dates the formation of the “ghetto” in the late summer of 1941; Megdal, My Holocaust Testimony, p. 11, dates it in the summer of 1940;

AŻIH, 301/2182, dates it shortly before the deportation Aktion in June 1942, which appears to be most likely.

5. USHMM, RG-15.079M, Ring I/1132 [767].

6. APL, Gouverneur des Distrikts Lublin, 270, letter of Busse to U-Abt. Bevölkerungswesen und Fürsorge in Lublin, September 27, 1941.

7. USHMM, Acc.1997.A.0124 (JSS), 211/445, p. 29.

8. T. Berenstein, “Martyrologia, opór i zagłada ludności żydowskiej w dystrykcie lubelskim,” BŻIH, no. 21 (1957), table 5.

9. On Zionist activity in the region, see, for example, David Silberklang, “The Holocaust in the Lublin District” (Ph.D. diss., Hebrew University, Jerusalem, February 2003), pp. 170–172; USHMM, RG-15.079M, Ring I/550 [771.]; Barbara Engelking and Jacek Leociak, The Warsaw Ghetto: A Guide to the Perished City, trans. Emma Harris (New Haven, CT: Yale University Press, 2009), p. 762, referring to members of Betar.

10. YVA, M.10.AR1/814, “Hrubieszów—spichrz Polski,” June 30, 1942.

11. JuNS-V, vol. 28, Lfd. Nr. 674a, pp. 176–177. A copy of one of these work certificates dated May 12, 1942, is reproduced in Kaplinsky, Pinkas Hrubieshov, p. 17.

12. KH Busse an U-Abt. Bevölkerungswesen und Fürsorge in Lublin, May 22, 1942, published in Leon Poliakov and Josef Wulf, Das Dritte Reich und die Juden: Dokumente und Aufsätze (Berlin-Grunewald: Arani, 1955), p. 196; APL, GDL, 893.

13. AŻIH, 301/2182; USHMM, RG-15.079M, Ring I/810 [768], Ring I/811 [769], Ring I/814 [770], Ring I/815 [774].

14. Kaplinsky, Pinkas Hrubieshov, p. 107, 16.

15. Ibid., p. xvi; Silberklang, “The Holocaust in the Lublin District,” pp. 281–282. Orenstein, I Shall Live, pp. 108–109, dates the Aktion on October 20, 1942.

16. AŻIH, 301/2182; Megdal, My Holocaust Testimony, pp. 17–19.

17. Korenblit and Janger, Until We Meet Again, p. 85.

18. JuNS-V, vol. 28, Lfd. Nr. 674a and 674b, pp. 211–212, 215–218.

IRENA (DĘBLIN-IRENA)

Pre-1939: Irena (Yiddish: Modzhitz), town, Puławy powiat, Lublin województwo, Poland; 1939–1944: initially Kreis Garwolin, Disrikt Warschau, then Kreis Puławy, Distrikt Lublin, Generalgouvernement; post-1998: Dęblin, Puławy powiat, Lublin województwo, Poland

Irena was located 68.7 kilometers (42.7 miles) northwest of Lublin. In 1953, it was incorporated into neighboring Dęblin. The two settlements popularly were long considered one, partly because Irena was established for civilians to provide services to the military stationed in Dęblin. In 1927, Dęblin-Irena’s civilian population of 4,860 included 3,060 Jews.

Luftwaffe bombardment, from September 2 to 7, 1939, forced civilians to flee before the Wehrmacht occupied Irena on September 12. Ordered by regional military authorities to return, the Jews discovered their residences and businesses plundered. Military authorities fined the Jews 20,000 złoty and mandated forced labor, initially clearing devastation and reconstructing the air base's landing fields.

In late 1939, the Germans ordered the Jews to wear arm-bands and to establish a Jewish Council (Judenrat). Its first chair was Leizer Teichman (Tajchman). He and subsequent council chairs softened German demands, mainly by establishing relations with the local Polish administration. Its members sometimes forewarned of searches and permitted some activities, including kosher slaughter, to continue illicitly for a while. An internal border shift resulted in Irena's incorporation, on April 1, 1940, into Distrikt Lublin. That summer, the Jewish Council sent conscripts to labor camps in Janiszów, Bełżec, and Pawłowice.¹

Most survivors date the Irena ghetto's establishment to the winter of 1941. Kalman Fris (Fries) attributed ghettoization to the arrival in January 1941 of Kurt Lenk, the newly appointed Landkommissar of Dęblin and Ryki.² Maria Abramowicz-Rozencweig and Zvi Eichenbrenner remembered Lenk first ordering Jews evicted from certain streets before formally establishing the ghetto.³ Eichenbrenner recalled Lenk initially banned Jewish residence between Warszawa and Sochacki Streets and then from all but the northern edge of the market square. Jewish Social Self-Help (JSS) and American Jewish Joint Distribution Committee (AJDC) correspondence also suggest the formal ghettoization decree was issued ex post facto, shortly after March 20, 1942.⁴ Because Jews initially were banned from the neighborhoods closest to roads leading to the two military bases and from the business district, the ghetto's establishment likely was related to the quartering of Wehrmacht and Luftwaffe soldiers in Dęblin prior to the German invasion of the Soviet Union in June. Placards, demarcating the ghetto's external borders, warned: "Typhus Danger! Strictly forbidden for Germans to enter!"⁵

Teichman oversaw the Jewish community for only part of the ghettoization process, as the JSS documentation notes the Jewish Council's membership was changed between January 20 and March 24, 1941.⁶ Survivors report he and Karyn fogel, the council secretary, were banished with their families to Wąwolnica for bribing several Gendarmes to expel from Irena an inebriated Kreis official searching a Jewish-owned house for textiles.⁷ In late spring, Lenk was transferred to Kraśnik. Osternak, the Landkommissar in Chełm, was moved to Dęblin. Kalman Fris, appointed Jewish Council chair by Lenk, served a few months before arranging under Osternak to resign. He was succeeded in August by Vevel Shulman. In September, Drayfish, a refugee from Konin, replaced Shulman.

The Irena ghetto consisted of about six streets in the so-called Starówka (in colloquial Polish, Old Town) neighborhood, near Staromiejska Street. Its internal boundaries were composed of the part of Okólna Street just above the square, the Irenka River, Bankowa, and Staromiejska Streets. In September 1942, Staromiejska Street was excluded from the ghetto. Its residents were resettled on Bankowa Street. The ghetto was not fenced. Signs warned that the penalty for Jews leaving the ghetto without authorization was death.⁸

A Jewish police force guarded the ghetto from the inside. Gendarmes from the Dęblin post, commanded by Franz Filippi, were responsible for its external borders. In practice, members of a Sonderdienst unit, subordinated to the Gendarmerie, physically guarded the ghetto. Composed initially of local ethnic Germans (Volksdeutsche), the unit was reinforced with Ukrainians. A Polish auxiliary police force, mostly local pre-war policemen, assisted. German Gendarmes Rudolf Knappheider (Knapheide, Knapajder) and Johann Peterson and local resident Edward Brok (Brokov), the Sonderdienst's Volksdeutsche commander, were noted for humiliating, beating, and killing a number of ghetto residents.⁹

In March 1941, the ghetto population stood at 3,750. It included 565 refugees, mostly expellees from Puławy and the Warthegau and family of Dęblin-Irena natives who had fled ghettoization in Warsaw. In October, 85 families from nearby villages were resettled in the ghetto.¹⁰ Overcrowding forced 7 to 15 people to share a room. Because Poles could enter the ghetto and Zaheva Amitz remembers some even residing there, the Jews survived by exchanging material goods with them for food. A secular school established by Aida Milgroijm-Citronbojm instructed (in Polish) 70 to 100 children.

Some ghetto conscripts worked for private German and Austrian firms, including the Schultz, Schwartz, and Hochtief construction companies, which oversaw various phases of the Warsaw-to-Lublin railway expansion. Most, though, labored either for the Wehrmacht or Luftwaffe. Women and children grew food for military canteens at the former agricultural school. Women and men unloaded coal from rail cars or cleaned the cars at the Wehrmacht's Dęblin railway inspectorate. About 200 to 300 male Jews conscripted by the Wehrmacht reported daily to the fortress. Another 200 to 400 worked at the air base repairing radios, altering airmen's uniforms, shoveling coal, and cutting wood. (Some conscripts were sent to work in similar capacities at smaller Luftwaffe bases, including in Ułęż and Zamość.) Until late in 1942, Jewish conscripts at the above work sites earned forced labor wages. Those conscripted for municipal tasks, such as street cleaning and snow clearing, received no remuneration.¹¹

In May 1941, about 1,000 Jews from the Warsaw, Częstochowa, and Opole ghettos arrived in Dęblin to work at various work sites, including at the Luftwaffe air base, where 500 to 600 Warsaw Jews and a smaller number of Viennese deportees to Opole leveled land. When the camp closed in October, the Warsaw Jews were ordered to the Irena ghetto, and the Jews from Opole returned to their ghetto. (The Viennese paid bribes to remain at the camp.) In late December, another camp, established on the same site, interned 300 nonnative Jews to expand the air base's fuel storage facilities. The Viennese deportees provided the camp's Jewish administrative cadre.¹²

Conditions deteriorated in the ghetto from the winter of 1941–1942. The Germans requisitioned winter clothing, curtailed fuel rations, and suspended the use of stoves. Orders banning Poles from the ghetto resulted in waste collectors suspending services there. Latrines overfilled and trash piled up. Dysentery and typhus outbreaks followed. The sick received treatment at an isolation facility and a 30-bed hospital, headed by Konin refugee Dr. Isaar Kawa. As black market trade dwindled, many left the ghetto to find food and fuel. Some 20 women caught outside the ghetto foraging were executed. Another 20 unregistered ghetto residents, all Warsaw ghetto escapees, met the same fate.¹³ In April 1942, Drayfish, among a group of local Jews sent to a penal camp in Kazimierz Dolny reportedly for registering complaints with the Pulawy Kreishauptmann's office, was shot. Timber merchant Yisrael Weinberg replaced him. A fire left 50 families homeless.¹⁴

On May 6, 1942, German-led security forces arrived to order the Jews assembled by 9:00 A.M. at the market square. Jews still living in several nearby villages, including Bobrowniki, also were marched there. Surrounded by an armed guard of German and Ukrainian police, a small German SS contingent, and a force of SS Ukrainian auxiliaries, the Jews waited hours, likely because a Luftwaffe officer was obtaining permission to expand the construction camp's inmate population to 1,200.¹⁵ At 2:00 P.M., about 1,000 conscripts and labor camp inmates were marched from work sites to the square and ordered into a separate line. Local employers' representatives began designating about 200 to 500 others to remain in Irena. The "resettlement" lines became composed overwhelmingly of the sick, the elderly, mothers and their infants and dependent children, and those left homeless by the fire. About 42 to 50 people were killed, mainly trying to join the laborers' line. At about 6:00 P.M., the Ukrainian auxiliaries marched 2,300 to 2,500 Jews to the Dęblin train station. From there, the deportees were sent to the Sobibór extermination facility.¹⁶

On May 13–14, 1942, 2,042 deportees from Prešov, Slovakia, were resettled into the ghetto. In August, the JSS noted 5,800 Jews were residing in Irena: 1,800 native and 4,000 nonnative Jews. Many of the additional 2,000 residents had been designated for labor in Dęblin-Irena during their communities' expulsions. This group included about 200 people from Ryki, 300 from Gniewosów and Zwoleń (100 of which were sent to a labor camp in Staw and the remainder assigned to work for the Schultz firm in Dęblin), and a similarly sized group from Stężycza. Others were fugitives from deportations in Baranów nad Wieprzem, Ryki, Gniewosów, and from October, Adamów.¹⁷

Because local Jews were convinced only the employed would survive another deportation, they filled the best available jobs, leaving 200 Prešov deportees positions as unpaid municipal conscripts. About 180 to 200 Slovaks were included in a quota expansion at the Schultz firm. Some skilled Slovaks found work at the Luftwaffe construction site camp, where, in late May, 400 locals and 300 Prešov, Viennese, and Warsaw deportees worked.¹⁸ Unaccustomed to the ghetto's poor sanitation, many Slovak deportees contracted typhus and perished.

By May 31, 1942, about 900 ghetto residents, including 250 from Prešov, 350 from Ryki, and 300 from Dęblin-Irena, were ordered to reside permanently at their work sites and officially forbidden to leave them. JSS officials reported all ghetto inhabitants soon would be required to live similarly, but in July it noted only 1,000 presently did so, because barracks had not been constructed at most work locations.¹⁹

On October 15, 1942, members of the German Gendarmerie, police auxiliaries, airfield Luftwaffe troops, and SS-Obersturmführer Grossman, commander of the Puławy SD, arrived to clear the ghetto. Some 215 to 500 people, mostly Prešov deportees still packing their belongings, were shot dead during house-to-house searches. About 2,000 to 2,500 Jews, mainly Slovak expellees, were sent to the Treblinka extermination facility. Ordered the previous evening confined to workplaces, approximately 2,500 to 2,700 laborers, including the 1,000 labor camp inmates, were retained. Another 100 people, mostly Judenrat members, Jewish Police, and their families, were designated to clear the deportees' belongings from the ghetto.²⁰ Many evaded deportation including by attempting to enter the Luftwaffe camp. Some were shot dead at the camp's gates. About 500 people, including 60 to 90 children (under age 12) and laborers from other work sites without barracks, entered the camp, usually in exchange for bribes.

The ghetto ceased to exist on October 28, 1942, when the Jewish Police, Judenrat members, and their families were marched to the Schultz camp and the approximately 2,800 remaining Jews were ordered to reside permanently at their work sites (now all labor camps). A third deportation, either that same day or about two weeks later, encompassed about 1,000 people, including the Wehrmacht conscripts from the fortress and 200 to 500 of the 1,500 Luftwaffe camp inmates. The deportees were murdered, most likely at Treblinka. In May or perhaps July 1943, most surviving inmates at the railway inspectorate, or Ostbahn camp, were sent via Końskowola to the Poniatowa labor camp.²¹ The deportees likely were mostly railway construction laborers as Stamphian Fidelis remembers the camp's remaining inmates, those assigned to the railway inspectorate, being deported in the fall of 1943.

The last deportation left 1,000 to 1,200 Jews in Dęblin-Irena, all inmates at the Luftwaffe construction camp, one of the longest-lived Jewish labor camps in Distrikt Lublin.²² On July 22, 1944, the day the Red Army liberated Lublin, the camp's 800 to 900 surviving inmates, including 400 to 600 Dęblin-Irena Jews, were evacuated to Częstochowa. Incarcerated initially at the Hugo Schneider AG (HASAG) camps, about half the deportees, including all but about 20 children, survived the war.

SOURCES Published testimonies from survivors are in the yizkor book, David Sztokfisz, ed., Sefer Demblin-Modz'its (Tel Aviv: Irgune Demblin-Modz'its ba-Arets uve-hul, 1969), which has appeared in English translation as Demblin-Modzjitz [Memorial] Book (Tel Aviv, 1994). The second is available electronically at the Dorot Jewish Division, New York Public Library, and at jewishgen.org.

Published autobiographies or memoirs by survivors include Ignatz (Yisrael) Bubis, Ich bin ein deutscher Staatsbürger jüdischen Glaubens: Ein autobiographisches Gespräch mit Edith Kohn (Cologne: Kiepenheuer & Witsch, 1993), pp. 51–64, 67; Stanley Hochmann, Mr. Fate, or, My Personal World War II Memoirs (Toronto, 1998); Charles Schulman, Ne dis jamais que tu vas ton dernier chemin, 2nd ed. (Paris: Publieur, 2003); and for a juvenile audience, Samuel R. Harris, Sammy: Child Survivor of the Holocaust, ed. Cheryl Gorder (Mesa, AZ: Bluebird, 1999). Hermann Wenkart, Befehlsnotstand Anders Gesehen: Tatsachenbericht eines jüdischen Lagerfunktionärs (Vienna, 1969), by the Austrian deportee to Opole who served as the Jewish “commander” of the Dęblin-Irena Luftwaffe construction camp, is controversial.

Secondary works include Abraham Wein, Bracha Freundlich, and Wila Orbach, eds., Pinkas ha-kehillot. Encyclopaedia of Jewish Communities: Poland, vol. 7, Lublin and Kielce (Jerusalem: Yad Vashem, 1999); Arnon Rubin, The Rise and Fall of the Jewish Communities in Poland and Their Relics Today, vol. 2, District Lublin (Tel Aviv: Tel Aviv University Press, 2007); and Josef Edmund Lucinski, Homoe-Homini: Czyli martyrologia [sic] Żydów w Dęblinie (Association of Friends of Deblin, 1987), a work available at some libraries but an archival holding at USHMM, listed at RG-03.003*01, which draws on survivors’ recollections to map the location of the ghetto, the labor camps, the two Soviet POW camps in Dęblin, and the mass graves of World War II victims.

Important tables, contextualizing the first two Dęblin-Irena deportations, appear in Tatiana Berenstein, “Martyrologia, opór i zagłada ludności żydowskiej w dystrykcie lubelskim,” BŻIH, no. 21 (1957): 76; and David Silberklang, “The Holocaust in the Lublin District” (Ph.D. diss., Hebrew University, Jerusalem, February 2003), pp. 261, 271, 280, 344–347.

Documentation on the fate of the Dęblin-Irena Jewish community during World War II can be found in the following archives: APL (e.g., 498 [273]); AŻIH (e.g., 210/318, 211 [141, pp. 47, 49, 71, 73; 450–451; 646, pp. 23, 26], 301 [112, 639, 789, 1168, 1443, 1444, 1447, 3682, 4389, 4488, 4498, 4886, 5099]); BA-L (B 162/5939); FVA (e.g., HVT [# 648, 717, 1065, 1366, 1888, 3164, 3870]); IPN (Ankiety, ASG); IPN-Lu (e.g., S-57/09/Zn); USHMM (e.g., Acc.1995.A.0249; Acc.1997.A.0124 [AŻIH 211]; Acc.1999.A.0154 [AŻIH 210]; RG-02.163; RG-03.003*01; RG-15.019M [IPN] [reel 6, 61/43, 46, 47]); VHF (e.g., # 3071, 3600, 3910, 14342, 18951, 23790, 43083); YVA (e.g., M-1/E [874, 1327, 1328, 1372, 1627]; O-3 [2951, 9077, 9295]).

Laura Crago

NOTES

1. USHMM, Acc.1997.A.0124 (AŻIH, JSS), 211/450, pp. 11–12.
2. BA-L, B 162/5939, p. 854 (deposition, Kalman Fris).
3. AŻIH, 301/1443, p. 1.
4. USHMM, Acc.1997.A.0124, 211/450, pp. 13, 40; Acc.1999.A.0154 (AŻIH, AJDC), 210/318, p. 44.
5. Quoted by Z. Eichenbrenner in Demblin-Modzjitz, p. 342.
6. USHMM, Acc.1997.A.0124, 211/450, p. 13.
7. Compare Demblin-Modzjitz, pp. 402–403, 517–521 (testimonies, respectively, of Binyamin Stamler and Kalman Paris).
8. AŻIH, 301/1444, testimony of Josek Rosenblum, p. 2.
9. BA-L, B 162/5939, pp. 856, 860–861, 864–865 (respectively, depositions of Fris, Awraham Abenstein, and Jakow Malchi); AŻIH, 301/1168, testimony of Majer Salzman, pp. 1–2.
10. USHMM, Acc.1999.A.0154, 210/318, pp. 1, 2, 11, 14, 44; and Acc.1997.A.0124, 211/450, pp. 2, 11, 44, 46.

11. AŻIH, 301/112, testimony of Izak Fischfeld, p. 10; USHMM, Acc.1997.A.0124, 211/451, p. 38.

12. USHMM, Acc.1997.A.0124, 211/450, pp. 22, 26; AŻIH, 301/112, pp. 4–6.

13. BA-L, B 162/5939, pp. 854–855, 1024 (depositions, Pesia Konner and Fris, respectively).

14. USHMM, Acc.1997.A.0124, 211/451, pp. 25–26, 29, 30.

15. AŻIH, 301/112, pp. 6–7.

16. Deportation figures from USHMM, Acc.1999.A.0154, 211/451, pp. 32, 30, 38.

17. AŻIH, 301/4137, testimony of Mojżesz Zilberszpan; 301/18, testimony of Perec Szapiro, pp. 6–7; 301/1447, testimony of Zygmunt Motek, pp. 1–2; and 301/639, testimony of Rubin Rosenberg, pp. 1–2.

18. USHMM, Acc.1999.A.0154, 211/451, pp. 30, 32.

19. Ibid., pp. 32–33, 38, 53–54.

20. AŻIH, 301/1444, pp. 2–3.

21. Ibid., 301/4488, Sztanbuch testimony, pp. 2–3; 301/3682, testimony of Ber Zalcman, p. 3.

22. Ibid., 301/112, pp. 9–10.

IZBICA (NAD WIEPRZEM)

Pre-1939: Izbica (nad Wieprzem), town, Krasnystaw powiat, Lublin województwo, Poland; 1939–1944: Kreis Krasnystaw, Distrikt Lublin, Generalgouvernement; post-1998: Krasnystaw powiat, Lublin województwo, Poland

Izbica (nad Wieprzem) is located 58 kilometers (36 miles) southeast of Lublin. The last census taken before World War II recorded around 4,500 Jews living in Izbica (92 percent of the total population).

The Germans first occupied Izbica on September 15, 1939. Immediately on entering the town, they seized goods from Jewish shops as a tribute. After a few days, the German army withdrew, permitting the Soviet army to occupy part of the Lublin region for several days. The Jewish residents of Izbica welcomed the Soviets as liberators. On September 28, 1939, the Soviet army retreated from Izbica under the revised terms of the Nazi-Soviet agreement. Some Jewish residents, mainly young men, left with the Soviet army. In the brief period after the Soviets left and before the Germans reentered, a group of local Poles threw stones at some Jews who had allegedly collaborated with the Soviets, killing one person and wounding several others.¹

Jewish men are forced to load a munitions train under German supervision near Izbica (nad Wieprzem), July 3, 1941. USHMM WS #07713, COURTESY OF NARA

By early October 1939, German forces again had occupied Izbica. Another wave of looting ensued, in which the Jews were especially badly affected. At the end of 1939, the German authorities prohibited the Jews from engaging in trade and also from leaving the town to barter with the surrounding population. Nevertheless, an illicit trade continued between Jews and Christians. Since Jewish children under the age of 14 were not required to wear white armbands bearing the Star of David, they sneaked out to exchange goods and personal possessions for food.²

From the end of 1939, the Germans began resettling Jews into Izbica from Polish towns further to the west that had been incorporated into the Third Reich, including Koło, Kalisz, and Łódź. In March 1941, more than 1,000 Jews from Kreis Konin were deported via Łódź to Izbica.³ By August 1941, around 7,000 Jews were living in Izbica, including nearly 2,000 refugees and expellees.⁴ As one survivor recounts, “[D]ozens of people lived in every Jewish residence. Fifteen people, including small children, were compressed into one room with my family. It was impossible to get anything to sleep on. Everyone lay on the bare floor. There was no fuel for heating; there was only hunger and filth. An epidemic of typhus fever broke out.”⁵

At the start of 1940, a Jewish Council (Judenrat) was formed in Izbica. Abraham Blatt was appointed as its head, and his deputy was a merchant named Schneidermesser. Other members of the Judenrat were Mosser Sznajd, Milsztajn, Zylberberg, Bron, and Klajner.⁶ In the view of some Jews who survived, chairman Blatt and his deputy Schneidermesser collaborated with the occupying authorities rather too eagerly.⁷ At first, the main task of the Judenrat in Izbica was to select people for labor, so its members put together a list of able-bodied men and women. Assisted by the Judenrat, the Germans established a unit of Jewish Police (Jüdischer Ordnungsdienst), which at its inception had 40 members.⁸

In November 1939, the Nazis installed a civil administration in Izbica. Its local representative was the ethnic German (Volksdeutscher) Johann (Jan) Schulz, who had been an assistant to a Jewish watchmaker before the war. From the start, he issued a series of regulations severely restricting the rights of Jews and Poles. At the end of 1940, an SD detachment was established in Izbica, headed by Kurt Engels; his deputy was Ludwik Klemm. The detachment served the entire Kreis Krasnystaw, arresting and carrying out other punitive measures against Jews and Poles.⁹

Besides the Judenrat, the Jewish Social Self-Help (JSS) organization also functioned in Izbica. It managed a communal kitchen and a makeshift Jewish hospital, which was located in the synagogue. The hospital had to serve the entire Kreis Krasnystaw but was only capable of treating around 40 patients at a time.¹⁰

From the start of the German occupation, Jews were forced to perform heavy labor in the town. The work tasks included street cleaning. In the spring of 1940, a few hundred Jews were sent off to labor camps located within Distrikt Lublin. Some went to Szczepanów, others to Ruda-Opalin (close to Chełm). The largest group was deported to Bełżec, the largest camp in the Distrikt. There Jews had to work digging trenches close to the German-Soviet border.¹¹

The last wave of Polish Jews who were resettled into Izbica came in March and April 1941 when the Germans resettled around 1,000 people from the city of Lublin. A closed ghetto did not exist in Izbica at the time. However, Jews were not allowed to leave the designated borders of the town, and this regulation has led some observers to conclude that the entire town resembled a large “open ghetto.” It was bordered on three sides by hills and, on the fourth (Tarnogór) side, by the Wieprz River. Jews could not even move freely within the town. However, Izbica was not listed as a ghetto in the report of Kreishauptmann Schmidt to Distrikt-level authorities in September 1941, although it was clearly viewed as a Judenstadt (or place of Jewish concentration) by German authorities.

Despite the restrictions, a few Jewish groups carried on clandestine exchanges of goods with the help of Poles, for example, at a local tannery, where the Jews prepared hides for sale.¹² At the end of 1941 and in early 1942, the Germans confiscated furs and woolen goods from the Jews in Izbica for the Wehrmacht.

After the Wannsee Conference in January 1942, Izbica became the initial destination for Jews deported from the Protectorate of Bohemia and Moravia (the Theresienstadt ghetto), Germany, Austria, and Slovakia. The choice of Izbica reflected its location on the main line between Lublin and Bełżec, where the Nazis established an extermination camp in November 1941.

The first transport to Izbica arrived on March 13, 1942. It carried 1,001 Czech Jews who had been deported from Theresienstadt. In total, there were 16 transports scheduled to reach Izbica, although some of these Jews were soon sent on to other locations. The last transport arrived in early June 1942.¹³ The following table (see next page) indicates the scheduled deportations to Izbica from German documentation.¹⁴

Since the foreign Jews arrived in Izbica while there were still Polish Jews in the town, overcrowding was severe, and there was no space for the deportees. The German authorities simply crammed them into the houses occupied by Polish Jews. As one survivor recalled: “First they ordered us to stand up. Then they pushed us into one house. Thirty people were crammed together into one place. Sheets of paper were glued over the broken windows. It was impossible to breathe. We could not sit. We were packed so tightly that we had to stand up all day and all night.”¹⁵

After a few days, the first mass deportation Aktion was carried out. The Germans took some of the Polish Jews “abroad” to an unknown location. As further transports arrived in Izbica, the new arrivals had to wait for an available place to stay, and all the buildings were overcrowded. Living and especially hygiene conditions were appalling. The deport-

Date of Transport's Arrival in Izbica (Where Known)	Number of Persons	Place of Origin for Those Deported
March 13, 1942	1,001 (500 Jews from this transport were sent on to Kraśniczyn)	Theresienstadt
March 19, 1942	1,003 (500 Jews from this transport were sent on to Krasnystaw and 500 to Gorzków)	Theresienstadt
March 25, 1942	955	Germany (probably Aachen, Koblenz, Kassel)
March 27, 1942	1,008 (part may have been sent to Kraśniczyn)	Germany (Franconia: Nürnberg, Würzburg, Bamberg, Fürth)
Departed Vienna April 9, 1942	998	Austria (Vienna)
Departed Breslau (Wrocław) April 13, 1942	1,000	Breslau
April 24, 1942	942	Germany (Düsseldorf, Duisburg, Essen, Krefeld, Oberhausen, Wuppertal, Mönchengladbach)
April 29, 1942	628	Germany (Baden-Württemberg, Stuttgart)
April 30, 1942	600 (transport underwent a selection process in Lublin)	Theresienstadt
May 9, 1942	784 (transport underwent a selection process in Lublin)	Germany (Frankfurt am Main)
May 15, 1942	1,001	Austria (Vienna)
May 18, 1942	1,006	Austria (Vienna)
May 26, 1942	835 (transport underwent a selection process in Lublin)	Germany (Frankfurt am Main)
May 29, 1942	1,052 (transport underwent a selection process in Lublin)	Slovakia (Spišská Nová Ves)
May 30, 1942	1,000 (transport underwent a selection process in Lublin)	Slovakia (Poprad)
June 5, 1942	1,001	Austria (Vienna)

ees also suffered severely from hunger. Not until the summer of 1942, when Jews were being sent to the extermination camps, did the occupation officials provide rations for the Jews. The situation was scarcely ameliorated by the actions of the JSS. The majority of the deportees were women, children, and the elderly. Many of them had left all their possessions in Lublin and had nothing to live on in Izbica. Deaths from starvation and exhaustion occurred daily. Only a few people were more fortunate, managing to obtain food and survive by working on estates in Tarnogór or in one of the two labor camps close to Izbica at Augustówka and Bzite.¹⁶

Cultural conflicts were common between the Polish Jews and the Jews who arrived in Izbica from other countries. A majority of the non-Polish Jews was assimilated, had liberal attitudes towards religion and tradition, and did not speak Yiddish. The conflict was exploited and deepened by the Germans, who deliberately set the groups against each other. In 1942, they set up one Judenrat for the Polish Jews and one for the Jews transported to Izbica. Only the members of the non-Polish Judenrat are known: Dr. A. Lob Pauner, Ludwig Wienheber, Dr. Nathan Rosenthal, and Hugo Kolb.¹⁷ Separate branches of the JSS for each group were established.

During the course of the various Aktionen the non-Polish Jewish policemen arrested Polish Jews, and vice versa.¹⁸

The first deportation Aktion in Izbica took place on March 24, 1942. Around 2,200 Polish Jews were deported to the extermination camp at Bełżec. Several dozen Jews were also shot on the spot, mainly by the local SS officers Kurt Engels and Ludwik Klemm. The bodies of those who were shot were taken to the Jewish cemetery and buried there.¹⁹ The deportations were supervised by officers from the SS training camp (SS-Ausbildungslager) in Trawniki and by the Gendarmerie from Krasnystaw, with the assistance of the Polish (Blue) Police.

The next Aktion took place on May 12–15, 1942. The Germans organized a mass deportation Aktion for Kreis Krasnystaw. First, several hundred Jewish men—both Polish and non-Polish—were taken from Izbica to the concentration camp in Majdanek. A second group consisting of around 400 people was deported to the extermination camp in Sobibór.²⁰

After a short time, the Polish Jews began to comprehend the fate of the deportees to Bełżec. During subsequent Aktionen, many people tried to escape and hide in Izbica or in the nearby forests. Most of the non-Polish Jews at this time obediently assembled on the Izbica marketplace, then were led away in columns to the Izbica railway station. These Jews only recognized more slowly the fate of those deported.²¹

On June 8, 1942, another deportation Aktion took place, this time directed against those deemed unfit for work. There were many Jews in Izbica who fell into this category. Around 2,000 Polish and non-Polish Jews were deported, probably to Bełżec.²²

On July 6–7, 1942, the Germans rounded up Jews found hiding in Izbica. Many Jews had been hiding with families. On July 8, an unknown number were discovered and deported to Sobibór.²³

From mid-July until the fall of 1942, the situation in Izbica was relatively calm. No further deportations were carried out. But within the town, mainly in the meadows and in the area where the Jewish cemetery was located, Jews were arrested by the SD. There were several executions of Jews ordered personally by Kurt Engels and Ludwik Klemm. The executions were carried out on the grounds that Jews were trading illegally, having contacts with Poles, storing weapons, or corresponding with co-religionists. This last accusation was commonly made against the non-Polish Jews after May 1942.²⁴

An example of such clandestine correspondence is the letter sent by Ernst Krombach in Izbica to his fiancée back in Germany, dated August 22–23, 1942. Uncensored, Krombach provides a uniquely frank and detailed description of conditions in Izbica. He notes: “Everything is forbidden; the penalty as above [death]. Leaving the ordained district [Verlassen des vorgeschriebenen Quartiers] before 7:00 A.M. or after 7 P.M. Bartering, buying or selling or speaking to Polish Aryans. . . . Sending letters or other messages. Leaving the city limits.” This seems to imply that a separate Jewish quarter (open ghetto) with its own curfew rules existed by this time, in addition to the law confining Jews to the town.

Krombach notes also the previous deportations: “Many transports have left here. Of the approximately 14,000 Jews who arrived, only 2,000 to 3,000 are still here. They go off in cattle trucks, subject to the most brutal treatment.” Even though these deportations had by then ceased for a while, things were not all rosy or calm: “We have become used to shootings. No week goes by without something happening: evacuation, roundups of people on the street for work in the vicinity, visits from outside SS, house searches, confiscation of particular items, etc.” Regarding living conditions: “‘Hygiene’ is a joke. Everything is filthy, lice (particularly clothes lice that spread typhus), fleas, bugs. There are few latrines. Sewage flows through unpaved streets (stench, illness).”²⁵

The last wave of forced resettlement into Izbica and deportations from there to the concentration and extermination camps took place in the fall of 1942. Starting in October 1942, Izbica became the central (or collection) ghetto for Polish Jews in Kreis Krasnystaw. Several thousand Jews were brought to Izbica from Krasnystaw, Żółkiewka, and Turobin and also from places within the Zamość district. The last Jews from Zamość and Krasnobród were driven to Izbica on foot. It is not known exactly how many Jews were in Izbica at that time, but one may estimate that around 6,000 Jews came to Izbica from the surrounding towns.²⁶ The Judenrat was also reorganized. Chairmen and representatives from other Judenräte now became part of the Judenrat in Izbica.²⁷

On October 19, 1942, more than 5,000 Jews were deported from Izbica in the largest of the “resettlement” Aktions. The operation was directed by the Security Police from Izbica, Zamość, and Lublin. The German civil administration from Krasnystaw also took part. The Germans used the Polish (Blue) Police to round up the Jews. The policemen received monetary rewards for finding Jews in hiding. This Aktion was particularly bloody. At least 500 Jews were shot on the platform of the railway station in Izbica. The Germans liquidated the orphanage in Izbica and shot all the children there. The Jews who remained alive were transported to Bełżec and Sobibór.²⁸

During the Aktion, many Jews escaped from Izbica, hiding in the nearby fields. Afterwards they returned and fell into the German trap. On November 2, 1942, more than 4,000 Jews were deported to Bełżec and Sobibór. The trains for the resettlement shuttled back and forth nonstop. Those for whom there was no space in the wagons, or who were captured while in hiding, were taken into a barn by the guards. After a few days they were taken to the Jewish cemetery, where under the supervision of Kurt Engels they were shot. More than 1,000 Jews were killed in this fashion.²⁹ At the end, Engels personally shot the chairman of the Judenrat, Abraham Blatt, and his deputy, Schneidermesser.

On October 28, 1942, the Higher SS and Police Leader (HSSPF) in the Generalgouvernement, Friedrich Wilhelm Krüger, ordered the creation of a remnant ghetto (Restghetto) in Izbica. All those Jews who had managed to survive the last deportation were collected in this ghetto, namely, those found hiding in Izbica or the nearby wooded areas and also the Jews who had escaped from other ghettos. The ghetto consisted of several buildings near the Altmanów Tannery on Stokowa and Cicha Streets, near the former brick factory at Kulik Street. The remnant ghetto was also an open ghetto. Jews worked there in the tannery and the brick factory. A new Judenrat was formed, and it was headed by Leon-Lejb Blatt and Tadeusz Cwekin. Its purpose was to attract Jews who were hiding elsewhere in the region.³⁰

In January 1943, 700 Jews were deported from this ghetto to Sobibór. The final liquidation of the ghetto took place on April 28, 1943. The last 200 Jews were packed onto trucks and sent to Sobibór.³¹

Between 1940 and early 1943, more than 20,000 Polish and non-Polish Jews passed through the Izbica ghettos. From Izbica itself, a mere 14 Jews managed to survive the war in hiding.³²

Although Kurt Engels and Ludwik Klemm were arrested, they were never tried. Following their arrests, in Hamburg and Limburg, respectively, they both committed suicide. The main German trial record concerning Izbica was the case before the regional court in Kassel (LG-Kass, 3a Ks 1/51), which resulted in an acquittal in 1952.

SOURCES Until recently there were no publications about the ghetto in Izbica. Robert Kuwałek has published two articles: “Getta tranzytowe w dystrykcie lubelskim,” in D. Libi-onka, ed., Akcja Reinhardt. Zagłada Żydów w Generalnym Gubernatorstwie (Warsaw: IPN, 2004), pp. 138–160; and “Das Durchgangsghetto in Izbica,” in J. Milotova, U. Rathgeber, and M. Wörgebauer, eds., Theresienstädter Studien und Dokumente (Sefer: Prague, 2003), pp. 321–352. Information on the Izbica ghetto can also be found in the memoirs of a survivor of Sobibór who originally came from Izbica, Thomas-Toivi Blatt, From the Ashes of Sobibor: A Story of Survival (Evanston, IL: Northwestern University Press, 1997); and in David Silberklang, “The Holocaust in the Lublin District” (Ph.D. diss., Hebrew University, Jerusalem, February 2003). The book by Mark Roseman, A Past in Hiding: Memory and Survival in Nazi Germany (New York: Metropolitan, 2001), also contains valuable information on the Izbica ghetto from the perspective of the German-Jewish deportee, Ernst Krombach, who wrote two detailed letters to his fiancée, Marianne Ellenbogen (née Strauss).

Relevant documentation can be found in the following archives: APL (e.g., GDL, 897-898; and RZ, 169); AŻIH (301/10, 29, 1518, 5953 [Relacje]; 211/138 and 607 [JSS]); IPN-Lu (OKL, 252/46; and OKL/Ds. 3/67); USHMM (Acc. 1997.A.0124 [JSS]; RG-15.084 [Relacje]); VHF; YVA (e.g., JM/10454); and ŻmP.

Robert Kuwałek and Martin Dean
trans. Steven Seegel

NOTES

1. R. Adamski, “Izbica nad Wieprzem” (memoir), MSS in the collection of the Bełżec Memorial Museum, p. 44.
2. AŻIH, 301/1518, testimony of Henocho Nobel, p. 4.
3. APL, RZ, 169; and GDL, 897-898, as cited by Silberklang, “The Holocaust in the Lublin District,” p. 140.
4. AŻIH, 211/138, report about the situation in Izbica, August 16, 1941, pp. 24–25.
5. Ibid., 301/1518, p. 4.
6. Ibid., p. 3.
7. Ibid., 301/10, testimony of Salomon Podchlebnik, p. 3.
8. Ibid., 301/1518, p. 3.
9. J. Janeczka, “Zbrodnicza działalność Kurta Engelsa i Ludwika Klemma na terenie powiatu krasnostawskiego w okresie okupacji niemieckiej w latach 1941–1943,” in Byliśmy sercem wsi. Materiały z sesji popularnonaukowej w Krasnymstawie 19 września 2003 (Warsaw: Ludowe Towarzystwo Naukowe-Kulturalne Oddział LTN-K w Krasnymstawie, Muzeum Historii Polskiego Ruchu Ludowego w Warszawie, 2004), pp. 67–68.
10. AŻIH, 211/138, p. 24.
11. Ibid., 301/1518, pp. 3–5.
12. Ibid., 301/5953, testimony of Stefan Sendłak: “Ostatni etap przed śmiercią,” pp. 3–4; PARK, testimonies of Janina Kić and Halina Błaszczuk.
13. Kuwałek, “Getta tranzytowe w dystrykcie lubelskim,” pp. 143–144.
14. The table is based on Kuwałek, “Das Durchgangsghetto,” pp. 326–327; and Gedenkbuch: Opfer der Verfolgung der Juden unter der nationalsozialistischen Gewaltherrschaft in Deutschland 1933–1945, 2nd ed. (Koblenz: Bundesarchiv, 2006), vol. 4, pp. 18–19.
15. ŻmP, Collection of Memoirs, Tape no. 162, interview with Hela Danielova (née Troller).
16. For further details about conditions in Izbica, see Kuwałek, “Das Durchgangsghetto,” pp. 328–332; about labor camps for the Jews in Augustówka and Bzite, see AŻIH, 211/607, letter of the members of the Camp Council in Augustówka, June 24, 1942.

17. AŻIH, 301/29, testimony of Chaskiel Menche; A. Müller, Geschichte der Juden in Nürnberg 1146–1945 (Nürnberg: Stadtbibliothek Nürnberg, 1968), p. 288.

18. PARK, interview given by Thomas-Toivi Blatt to the author, 2000.

19. T. Berenstein, “Martyrologia, opór i zagłada ludności żydowskiej w dystrykcie lubelskim,” BŻIH, no. 21 (1957): 70; IPN-Lu, OKL/Ds. 3/67, statement of Irena Pańko.

20. Z. Leszczyńska, Kronika obozu koncentracyjnego na Majdanku (Lublin: Wydawnictwo Lubelskie, 1983), p. 76; Y. Arad, Bełżec, Sobibor, Treblinka. The Operation Reinhard Death Camps (Bloomington: Indiana University Press, 1999), p. 390.

21. PARK, interviews with Thomas-Toivi Blatt, 2000, and Janina Kić and Halina Błaszczuk, 2003.

22. Berenstein, “Martyrologia,” p. 70; PARK, interview with Thomas-Toivi Blatt, 2000.

23. AŻIH, 301/29, p. 2.

24. Kuwałek, “Das Durchgangsghetto,” p. 334.

25. For the full translated text (in English), see Roseman, A Past in Hiding, pp. 186–197. For other examples of correspondence from Izbica, see Karl H. Misteel, The End of a Community: The Destruction of the Jews of Bamberg, Germany, 1938–1942, trans. Jacob Feuchtwanger (Hoboken, NJ: KTAV, 1995), pp. 164–168.

26. AŻIH, 301/72, testimony of Leon Feldhendler. According to Feldhendler, the Kreishauptmann wanted the (collection) ghetto in Krasnystaw. The Gestapo wanted to create the Judenstadt in Izbica. In the end the compromise was that a ghetto was established in the Judenstadt of Izbica. From Zamość alone, some 3,000 to 4,000 Jews were forcibly transferred to Izbica.

27. Ibid.

28. Ibid.; Justiz und NS-Verbrechen, vol. 9 (Amsterdam: Amsterdam University Press, 1972), Lfd. Nr. 316a, LG-Kass, 3a Ks 1/51 (trial of R., former official of the German Kreishauptmannschaft in Krasnystaw, other mass destruction crimes at Izbica near Lublin), pp. 607–618.

29. AŻIH, 301/72 (Feldhendler was deported at that time to Sobibór); PARK, interviews with Janina Kić and Halina Błaszczuk, 2003.

30. Adamski, “Izbica nad Wieprzem” p. 64; PARK, interview with Thomas-Toivi Blatt, 2000.

31. T. T. Blatt, Sobibor: The Forgotten Revolt—A Survivor’s Report (H.E.P. Issaquah, 1998), p. 31.

32. PARK, interview with Thomas-Toivi Blatt, 2000.

JANÓW PODLASKI

Pre-1939: Janów Podlaski (Yiddish: Yanov), town, Biała Podlaska powiat, Lublin województwo, Poland; 1939–1944: Janów Podlaski, Kreis Biala Podlaska, Distrikt Lublin, Generalgouvernement; post-1998: Janów Podlaski, village, Biała Podlaska powiat, Lublin województwo, Poland

Janów Podlaski, now located on the Polish border with the Republic of Belarus, lies by road some 143 kilometers (89 miles) northeast of Lublin. In 1938, the larger Janów Podlaski gmina counted 4,010 inhabitants, including 1,947 Jews. In August 1939, 1,713 Jews resided in the town of Janów Podlaski.¹

In September 1939, the first month of World War II, Red Army forces occupied Janów. Because of the territorial provisions in the September 28 German-Soviet treaty, the soldiers abandoned the town to German forces on October 9 and joined the larger Soviet withdrawal behind the Bug River, located 2 kilometers (1.2 miles) east of Janów. Some 200 to 400 Janów Jews followed the soldiers.

Polish-Christian eyewitness Franciszka Olesiejuk (née Iwaniuk) recalled that the Germans, upon occupying Janów, ordered Jews and Christians separated from one another. She suggested that Jews from nearby villages were ordered to reside in Janów at this time. Survivor Mosheh Pakman described the Germans as imposing numerous housing restrictions on the Jews.² In late 1939, the Germans ordered a Jewish Council (Judenrat) established. Its chair was Maks Kaminer.³

The arrival of German Border Police (Grenzpolizei), concerns about border security, and the Wehrmacht's decision to send veterinarians and equine specialists to reestablish the renowned Arabian horse breeding program on the nearby farm in Wygoda (pre-war Biała Podlaska powiat) all likely contributed to the early establishment of a ghetto in Janów. In April 1942, Josel Pinkus, the head of the Janów Podlaski Jewish Social Self-Help (JSS), reported the ghetto had existed since 1940. He described it as a Jewish quarter (dzielnica żydowska) or an unfenced open ghetto. The ghetto included 121 residential buildings, comprising 420 rooms. Its population of 2,011 included 300 refugees.⁴

Overcrowding posed less of a health risk than in some ghettos. On average, five people resided in each room in the ghetto. Contamination of the ghetto's only water source required residents to boil water before drinking.

From the spring of 1940, local inhabitants could contract Jewish labor. Young children working as shepherds or cow herders were permitted to live outside the ghetto with their non-Jewish employers.⁵ Few opportunities other than unpaid forced labor, including at the Wygoda horse farm, likely existed for adult wage earners. In September 1940, the JSS's organizational predecessor reported: "Jewish residents are denied any possibility of earning."⁶ With the German invasion of the USSR in June 1941, a large number of male craftsmen, mostly shoemakers and tailors, were ordered to a labor camp established in Biała Podlaska to provide services to Wehrmacht troops stationed there.⁷

In August 1941, Kreis-level JSS officials sought permission from the Biała Podlaska Kreishauptmann for the Janów dentist Hendla Poswonska and dental laboratory worker Mordko Listgarten to travel beyond the ghetto to care for Jews in communities such as Konstantynów (nad Bugiem), located along the road to Biała Podlaska.⁸ After several dozen Jews contracted typhus in the winter of 1940–1941, the Jewish Council arranged for a physician, an expellee from Vienna, to settle in Janów. He likely arrived in late 1941.⁹

Because it could not afford to purchase food on the free market, the JSS established a community kitchen, but only after Herbert Kühl, appointed Biała Podlaska Kreishauptmann in December 1941, allotted the charity winter rations from cheaper government stores. In January 1942, the first month of kitchen operations in Janów, the charity used its 2,700-kilogram (5,953-pound) potato ration to provide subsidized daily meals to 300 of the most impoverished ghetto residents, including 90 children (about 22.5 percent of all Jews were under 18 years of age). Twice as many people qualified for the meals.¹⁰

In May 1942, the SS ordered a large group of Jewish men to the Wehrmacht camp in Biała Podlaska and to camps the Luftwaffe had established in and around Małaszewicze Duże for airfield expansion projects. The labor drafts were part of a coordinated regional effort by German civilian, military, and SS authorities to retain a small number of "useful Jews" for labor before the liquidation of the Jewish communities of Kreis Biała Podlaska.

The June 8–11, 1942, deportation of some 3,000 Jews in the Biała Podlaska ghetto to the Sobibór extermination center likely prompted a Janów ghetto resident, probably surnamed Hirsberg, to bid written farewell on June 11 to his son and brothers in the Warsaw ghetto. He and his sister's family, he explained, would soon move from Janów to a still unknown address.¹¹

On September 19, 1942, an SS commander, perhaps Gett (Glatt), the head of the Gestapo in Kreis Biała Podlaska, ordered all Jews working outside of Janów Podlaski to report to the ghetto on September 23–24. Over the course of those two days, the Jews were marched and driven in peasant carts to the ghetto in Biała Podlaska. Beginning on September 25, the deportees were transferred to the ghetto in Międzyrzec Podlaski. Some Jews, perhaps those on carts, were transported directly to the Międzyrzec ghetto.¹² On October 6 and 9, members of Reserve Police Battalion 101 cleared the Międzyrzec ghetto, sending its inmates, including almost all the Janów Podlaski Jews, to be gassed at the Treblinka extermination facility.

David Guterman, Mosheh Pakman, and Dwora Zielona are some of the Janów Jews known to have evaded the Treblinka deportation by hiding in the Międzyrzec ghetto. Upon the ghetto's final liquidation in the spring of 1943, the three were among a group of Międzyrzec inmates sent first to the Majdanek and then to the Auschwitz concentration camps. From early December, Gendarmes also sent to Majdanek almost all the prisoners at the Biała Podlaska labor camp. On November 3, 1943, the SS shot the Jewish inmates at Majdanek, as part of Aktion Erntefest (Operation Harvest Festival).

A relatively large number of Janów Jews fled from the liquidation of the region's ghettos or from nearby labor camps and sought shelter with local Christians. Perec Rydlewicz, Szaja Ruzal (born 1925), and Chaim Blusztajn, all Janów escapees from the Biała Podlaska labor camp, were aided first by Józef Janulewicz, then likely by Paulina Brzeska, both in Janów Podlaski, before finding permanent shelter with the Misiejuk family in Bubel Granna village.¹³ Mikołaj Iwaniuk and his daughters Franciszka and Paulina, residents of Romanów (pre-war Biała Podlaska powiat) village, are attributed with contributing to the survival of 60 Jews, mainly from Janów and Biała Podlaska.¹⁴ Iwaniuk and the family of his sister Juliana Mironiuk, including her son Józef and daughters Marianna and Weronika, sheltered 11 Jews from both towns in Jakówki village. Those aided included Wolf Englander, Herszko Goldberg, Noach Rodzynek (from Biała), Mendel Rybkowski, Gedali Rydlewicz (Perec's uncle, from Biała), Perła Goldszept, and her brothers Motel and Szloma. The Goldszept brothers had escaped from one of the Małaszewicze labor camps as the SS began executing many of its inmates in the fall of 1943. Because of the efforts of the Iwaniuk and Mironiuk families to locate hiding places for Jewish fugitives, residents from villages near Janów Podlaski sheltered about two thirds of the 116 survivors, including 61 locally born Jews, officially registered as residents of the postwar Biała Podlaska powiat in August 1945.

However, Oscar Pinkus, a fugitive from the ghetto liquidation in Łosice and also hidden by a family near Janów Podlaski, reports many Jews perished in local villages and forests, particularly as parts of the Polish Home Army (Armia Krajowa, AK) openly hunted for Jews from early 1944. Unfortunately, the postwar Institute of National Remembrance (IPN) Court Inquiries about Executions, Mass Graves, Camps, and Ghettos (ASG) documentation, which details the wartime deaths of just 16 Janów Jews, lists as perpetrators only local German collaborators (almost all of whom perished during the war). It, for instance, attributes to Hetmański, a local ethnic German, the December 1942 shooting deaths in a Janów field of brothers Szaja (born 1906), Szloma, and Aron Ruzel. It notes that in April 1943 Zenon and Benedykt Kalichowicz, members of the Janów Schutzpolizei (Schupo), shot Szyja, Jankiel, and Dawid Grubman and 3 other Jews in the woods on the Cieleśnica estate near Kajetanka village.¹⁵

The exact number of Janów Podlaski survivors is unknown.

SOURCES Secondary sources touching on the history of the Janów Podlaski Jewish community during World War II include the relevant entries in M.J. Fajgenbaum, Podlaskhe in unikum: Noṭitsn fun ḥurban (Munich: Aroysgegebn fun der Tsentraler Historisher Komisy baym Ts. K. fun di bafrayte Yidn in der Amerikaner Zone in Daytshland, 1948), pp. 21–27; and Abraham Wein, Bracha Freundlich, and Wila Orbach, eds., Pinkas ha-kehillot. Encyclopaedia of Jewish Communities: Poland, vol. 7, Lublin and Kielce (Jerusalem: Yad Vashem, 1999), pp. 265–266. English translations of the latter appear on jewishgen.org; and in Arnon Rubin, The Rise and Fall of the Jewish Communities in Poland and Their Relics Today, vol. 2, District Lublin (Tel Aviv: Tel Aviv University Press, 2007), pp. 121–122.

“Dwojra Zielona,” a chapter in the important work by Zofia Nałkowska, Medalliony (Warsaw: Czytelnik, 1946), available in English as Medallions, trans. Diana Kuprel (Northwestern, IL: Northwestern University Press, 2000), pp. 29–34, provides an account of the Janów Podlaski ghetto liquidation.

A transcript of a joint interview conducted with Iwaniuk and Mironiuk family members appears in both Polish and English translation, under the persons tab, on Światło w ciemności. Sprawiedliwi wśród narodów świata, a Web site sponsored by Ośrodek Brama Grodzka, Teatr NN in Lublin, <http://sprawiedliwi.tnn.pl/index.php>. Interviews with Józef Mironiuk are located on the Web site of the Organization of Polish Righteous; in the bilingual (Polish-English) work Polscy bohaterowie. Ci, którzy ratowali Żydów (Kraków: Muzeum Galicja, Centrum Żydowskie Oświęcimiu, Polish American Jewish Alliance for Youth Action, 2006); and in Bill Tammus and Jacques Cukierkorn, They Were Just People: Stories of Rescue in Poland during the Holocaust (Columbia: University of Missouri Press, 2009), pp. 183–187.

Archival documentation about the Janów Podlaski Jewish community during World War II includes: AŻIH (e.g., 210/373, 211 [201, pp. 57, 87; 202, p. 12; 203, pp. 10, 30, 34–35; 204, p. 50; 205, p. 19; 206, p. 44; 208, p. 71; 463, pp. 1–43], 301 [1827, 1871, 4477, 5423], Ring I/578); IPN (e.g., ASG); IPN-Lu (e.g., 94/69/BP/1-2; 055/11/14); USHMM (Acc.1997.A.0124 [AŻIH 211]; Acc.1999.A.0154 [AŻIH 210]; RG-15.019M [IPN ASG] [reel 4, 12/20, 43–44, reel 15, 49/1, 3–5]; RG-15.079M [AŻIH Ring]); VHF (# 16819, 19251, 50786); and YVA.

Laura Crago

NOTES

1. USHMM, Acc.1997.A.0124 (AŻIH), 211/463, p. 40.
2. VHF, # 19251, testimony of Mosheh Pakman.
3. USHMM, Acc.1999.A.0154 (AŻIH), 210/373, p. 3.
4. Ibid., Acc.1997.A.0124, 211/463, p. 40.
5. AŻIH, 301/1827, testimony of Basia Ogórek, p. 1.
6. USHMM, Acc.1999.A.0154, 210/373, p. 9.
7. VHF, # 16819, testimony of David Guterman.
8. USHMM, Acc.1997.A.0124, 211/204, p. 50.
9. Ibid., 211/463, pp. 30–31, 33–34, 36.
10. Ibid., pp. 42, 37–38.
11. Ibid., RG-15.079M (AŻIH), Ring I/578, pp. 1–2.
12. AŻIH, 301/5423, testimony of Dwora Zielona, p. 3.
13. Ibid., 301/466, testimony of Gedali Rydlewicz, p. 5; 301/1871, testimony of Grzegorz Misiejuk, p. 1.
14. Ibid., 301/466, pp. 5–7.
15. USHMM, RG-15.019M (IPN), reel 4, 12/20, 43.

KAZIMIERZ DOLNY

Pre-1939: Kazimierz Dolny (Yiddish: Kuzmir), town, Puławy powiat, Lublin województwo, Poland; 1939–1944: Kazimierz, Kreis Pulawy, Distrikt Lublin, Generalgouvernement; post-1998: Kazimierz Dolny, Lublin województwo, Poland

Kazimierz Dolny lies 45 kilometers (28 miles) west-northwest of Lublin. Its pre-war 1939 population of 4,641 included about 1,800 Jews.

A Wehrmacht unit, which occupied Kazimierz before September 13, 1939, commandeered all its Jewish-owned hotels and boarding houses. In late 1939, the Germans ordered a Jewish Council (Judenrat) and a Jewish police force established. Chaim Fajersztajn led the council from 1940.¹

In December 1939, 80 SS men on rest-and-recreation leave assembled the Jews and then beat several dozen men severely. The beatings may have been inflicted to expose fugitives fleeing the expulsion of the Jewish community of Puławy to Opole.² From 1940, Jewish forced laborers removed matzevot (gravestones) at the two cemeteries for use as a walkway around the German civil administration and the SS headquarters, located at the pre-war Franciscan monastery.

Kazimierz's use for military leave and its strategic location on the Vistula River border with Distrikt Radom likely contributed to orders in early 1940 banning Jews from the main square and establishing a ghetto in March. The December 17, 1940, issue of Gazeta Żydowska mentioned the ghetto in explaining the Kazimierz Jewish Council's decision to use the synagogue to house a school, which it had just received permission to establish.³

The ghetto's initial internal boundaries stretched from one side of Nadrzeczna Street to Lubelska Street (including Nadwiślańska Street). The ghetto was not fenced. However, Jews were forbidden to leave its borders without permission. Poles and Germans initially could enter the ghetto to order finished goods from Jewish craftsmen.⁴

About 50 to 60 ghetto residents had to report to labor camps in Puławy. An equal number were imprisoned at a Kazimierz labor camp established in 1940 at the former Elbaum works on Puławy Street. The inmates dug rock from the hill-sides, cut them at a quarry in Bochońca village, transported them to Kazimierz, and loaded them onto barges. Gravel was reserved for local road improvement projects, which depended on the forced labor of Kazimierz Jews, conscripts from nearby Jewish communities, including Józefów (nad Wisłą), and about 100 Warsaw Jews.⁵ Another 100 to 200 ghetto residents daily swept and cleared streets of snow or worked for the Wehrmacht or the SS, cleaning stables, cutting wood, and performing other tasks. Though uncouned in the labor quota, women conscripts prepared meals at the military canteen and cleaned the offices and residences of the Germans. Because craftsmen maintained workshops in the ghetto, the council established a substitution system to enable another person, typically a family member, to fill the place of someone designated for forced labor.⁶

In March 1941, the ghetto's existence was threatened by plans of Puławy Kreishauptmann Alfred Brandt to transform Kazimierz into a spa town for German soldiers. (Jews in Kreis Pulawy were banned from such resorts.) Brandt ordered a newly appointed mayor to expel the Jews. To forestall complete eviction, the Jews offered Horst Göde, Puławy's deputy Kreishauptmann and subsequently Landkommissar of Opole and Kazimierz, a half kilogram (1.1 pounds) in gold.⁷ On March 10, 200 to 500 newcomers were expelled to Józefów. In April, Kurów refugees were returned home. In March 1942, Fajersztajn mentioned that the same mayor a year before had established a "separate district" for the Jews.⁸ Because the ghetto already existed, the comment likely indicates the timing of orders prohibiting Poles and Germans from entering the ghetto.

In July 1941, a new mayor, an ethnic German from Silesia, perhaps surnamed Sieradzki or Szaniowski, again threatened to dissolve the ghetto. J.F. Listig, head of the Kazimierz Jewish Social Self-Help (JSS), held the new mayor responsible for previously expelling the Jews from Puławy and Nałęczów. On Brandt's orders, Sieradzki gave the Jews 24 hours to leave Kazimierz. A kilogram (2.2 pounds) in gold, paid again to Göde, enabled 1,000 Jewish craftsmen, labor camp inmates, who had been conscripted by the Wehrmacht and the SS, to remain in Kazimierz with their families. After Sieradzki's departure several months later, many expellees returned, bringing the ghetto population to 1,400 by early March 1942.⁹

With each eviction, the ghetto area likely was reduced. In December 1941, Listig described the Jews as several times experiencing "re-housing" or "transplantation" (przesiedlenie).¹⁰ The smallest ghetto area coincided with the boundaries of the historic Jewish quarter (rewir), known in Polish as the na tyłach (at-the-rear) neighborhood, for its location behind the main square.

Conditions deteriorated in the ghetto in the winter of 1941–1942. The Germans cut heating rations. The collaborationist Polish town council refused to sell the JSS food at government prices or to include Jews in soap rations. As a result, the community kitchen served only 50 to 60 dinners, three times weekly, in October 1941. Monetary aid from the JSS and the American Jewish Joint Distribution Committee (AJDC) enabled it to prepare 100 meals, six times weekly, by February 1942. By then, 680 to 800 Jews required nutritional assistance.¹¹ Overcrowding, unsanitary conditions, and the poor diet contributed in December 1941 to a typhus epidemic, which claimed many lives.¹² Several local residents were among 36 Jews shot by the Kazimierz-based SS in mass graves at the new cemetery on Czerniawy Street or in the monastery gardens.¹³

Because Sieradzki returned to Kazimierz in the late winter of 1941–1942, supposedly determined to secure spa town status, the Jews were forewarned that all but 100 local labor camp inmates in early spring would be resettled to the ghetto in Opole. (Paradowski, a local artist, secretly told the Jewish Council about the plans.)¹⁴ On March 6 and 11, Fajersztajn asked regional JSS leaders for help to stop the expulsion. On March 11, Marek Alten, head of the JSS in Distrikt Lublin, appealed to Richard Türk, chief of Distrikt Lublin's Abteilung für Bevölkerungswesen und Fürsorge (Population and Welfare Department, BuF). Involved in planning the deportation of Distrikt Lublin's Jews, Türk informed Alten on March 14 that he could do little, because "unofficially" he had learned that Ernst Zörner, Governor of Distrikt Lublin, had recognized Kazimierz as a spa town. Since Brandt would make the announcement, Türk advised the Kazimierz Jewish Council to appeal to him to soften the expulsion order.¹⁵

On March 24, 1942, Fajersztajn convened a secret meeting of representatives from all families in Kazimierz to discuss the impending expulsion. Following the meeting, many Jews escaped from the ghetto. Some found refuge in other ghettos in Distrikt Lublin. Others paid guides to navigate (on foot and by boat) the melting Vistula River and made their way to Janowiec, Zwoleń, Gniazdków, and Chotcza.¹⁶

Two days later, members of the local SS detachment marched about 300 to 400 Kazimierz Jews to the Opole ghetto. A similar-sized group departed for Opole on March 29. Those who could afford the 200-złoty fare traveled in peasant carts.¹⁷ On March 30, the Kazimierz deportees and other expellees consolidated in Opole, including some from Wąwolnica, were sent mainly by narrow gauge railway to Nałęczów. That same day, the SS marched another approximately 500 Kazimierz Jews directly to Nałęczów. Transferred there onto larger trains, the 2,400 Jews, including the Kazimierz expellees, left at 5:00 A.M., on March 31, destined for the Bełżec extermination camp.¹⁸ The deportees were gassed on arrival.

On April 9, 1942, Listig, retained for labor in Kazimierz, appealed to regional JSS leaders for help locating the families of the 100 or so Kazimierz camp inmates: "We are all broken hearted because despite the passage of 11 days, we do not know where our families were sent."¹⁹ Listig made similar appeals on April 24, May 5, and May 6. JSS leaders initially requested more information but on May 9 admitted they, too, had been unable to discover the expellees' whereabouts.²⁰ These were among the last communications in the JSS files from Listig. A Warsaw survivor who had contact with the Kazimierz inmates recalled that they were sent to the Majdanek forced labor camp where they all perished. Postwar Polish documentation mentions only that the camp's inmates (including about 50 Slovak deportees brought from Opole in late April) were marched in October to an unknown destination.²¹

Fewer than 20 Kazimierz Jews survived the war. In Distrikt Radom, Paul Schneiderman was deported from Zwoleń to the Skarżysko-Kamienna forced labor camp. Moshe Kershbaum fled the Janowiec expulsion and was sheltered there by the Andzelm family. In Distrikt Lublin, Max Buchbinder and five family members, fugitives from the Bełżyce ghetto liquidation, were hidden near Kazimierz by Wiktor Górecki. Bolesław Cytryn (Zieliński), an escapee from the October 1942 liquidation of the collection ghetto in Końskowola, found shelter in Warsaw.

SOURCES Secondary sources include the relevant entries in Abraham Wein, Bracha Freundlich, and Wila Orbach, eds., Pinkas ha-kehillot. Encyclopaedia of Jewish Communities: Poland, vol. 7, Lublin and Kielce (Jerusalem: Yad Vashem, 1999), pp. 485–488; Arnon Rubin, The Rise and Fall of Jewish Communities in Poland and Their Relics Today, vol. 2, District Lublin (Tel Aviv: Tel Aviv University Press, 2007), pp. 130–139; and Israel Gutman and Sara Bender, eds., The Encyclopedia of the Righteous among the Nations: Rescuers of Jews during the Holocaust, vol. 2, Poland, 2 pts. (Jerusalem: Yad Vashem, 2004), pt. 1, pp. 57–58. Also important are Sebastian Piątkowski, "Żydzi Janowca, Kazimierza i Puław w latach wojny i okupacji (1939–1945)," in Filip Jaroszyński, ed., Historia i kultura Żydów Janowca nad Wisłą, Kazimierza Dolnego i Puław: Fenomen kulturowy miasteczka—sztetl. Materiały z sesji naukowej 'V Janowieckie Spotkania Historyczne' Janowiec nad Wisłą 28 czerwca 2003 roku (Janowiec nad Wisłą: Towarzystwo Przyjaciół Janowca nad Wisłą, 2003), pp. 189–214.

A March 29, 1942, letter from Pesach Goldbaum, a Kazimierz expellee to the Opole ghetto, cited below at AŻIH, [943.] Ring I/587, appears in its original Yiddish and Polish translation in Archiwum Ringelbluma, vol. 1, Ruta Sakowska, ed., Listy o Zagładzie (Warsaw: ŻIH and PWN, 1997), pp.

136–141. Contemporary press coverage includes "Kazimierz Dolny" and "Opole Lubelskie," in Gazeta Żydowska, December 17, 1940, no. 48, and April 10, 1942, no. 42, respectively; and "Kazimierz," Warschauer Zeitung, April 8, 1942. Memoirs from survivors appear in the yizkor book, David Sztokfisz, ed., Pinkas Kozamyer (Tel Aviv: Irgun yots'e Kozamyer bi-Medinat Yisrael uva-tefutsot, 1970).

Archival materials documenting the fate of the Kazimierz Dolny community during the Holocaust includes: APL (e.g., 498/0/270); AŻIH (e.g., Ankiety, 211 [137, pp. 70, 74–75; 142, pp. 22–24, 30; 528], 301 [1513, 1812, 2275, 2915, 4420], [943.] Ring I/587); IPN (e.g., Ankiety, ASG); IPN-Lu (e.g., 2/67/1-6, 585/67/1-2, 3284/471); USHMM (e.g., Acc.1997.A.0124 [AŻIH 211]; Acc.1999.A.0154 [AŻIH 210]; RG-15.079M [AŻIH Ring]; RG-15.019M [IPN ASG] [reel 6, 16/775-776, 780-781; reel 15, 49/98-100]); VHF (e.g., # 991, 2277, 3909, 12221, 18805, 21805, 44230); and YVA.

Laura Crago

NOTES

1. USHMM, Acc.1999.A.0154 (AŻIH), 210/396, p. 3.
2. Compare AŻIH, 301/4420 and 1912, respectively, testimonies of Bolesław Cytryn (Zieliński), p. 1, and Gołda Teich, p. 2.
3. Gazeta Żydowska, December 17, 1940, p. 4.
4. VHF, # 3909 and 991, respectively, testimonies of Max Buchbinder and Paul Sznajdermann.
5. AŻIH, 301/4420, p. 1; VHF, # 2277, testimony of Fred Gilbert.
6. VHF, # 3909, 991, 12221, testimony of Esther Engelhardt.
7. AŻIH, 301/4420, pp. 1–2.
8. USHMM, Acc.1997.A.0124 (AŻIH), 211/142, p. 24.
9. Ibid., 211/528, pp. 41–42, 44–45.
10. Ibid., p. 14.
11. Ibid., pp. 13–24, 36, 39.
12. Ibid., pp. 25, 29; VHF, # 991.
13. USHMM, RG-15.019M (IPN), reel 15, 49/100, reel 6, 16/776.
14. AŻIH, 301/4420, p. 2.
15. USHMM, Acc.1997.A.0124, 211/142, pp. 22–24; 211/528, pp. 44–45.
16. AŻIH, 301/2275, testimony of Lucjan Majraniec (Kowalski), pp. 4–5; 301/4420, pp. 2–3; 301/1513, testimony of Gerszon Edelman, p. 4.
17. Gazeta Żydowska, April 10, 1942, p. 5; USHMM, RG-15.079M (AŻIH), [943.] Ring I/587, pp. 1–4.
18. USHMM, Acc.1997.A.0124, 211/528, p. 47.
19. Ibid.
20. Ibid., pp. 49, 50, 51, 53, 57.
21. AŻIH, 301/2275, p. 5; USHMM, RG-15.019M, reel 6, 16/775, reel 15, 49/98.

KOCK

Pre-1939: Kock (Yiddish: Kotsk), town, Łuków powiat, Lublin województwo, Poland; 1939–1944: Kreis Radzyn, Distrikt Lublin, Generalgouvernement; post-1998: Lubartów powiat, Lublin województwo, Poland

Kock is located about 45 kilometers (28 miles) north of Lublin. In 1937, its population of 4,463 included 2,213 Jews.

A Wehrmacht unit occupied the town on October 9, 1939. In November, the Germans burned the synagogue. In December, the Jews were ordered to form a Jewish Council (Judenrat).

In November 1939, Landrat Hennig von Winterfeld, the Radzyn Kreishauptmann, effectively transformed Kock and Ostrów Lubelski into ghettos by announcing that almost all of the Kreis's 32,430 Jewish inhabitants would be expelled there. (Only a few craftsmen were to reside outside the two towns.) Winterfeld designated Kock for Jews from the northern part of the pre-war Lubartów powiat, an area incorporated into Kreis Radzyn. The first deportees, from Firlej, could bring with them only 150 złoty and limited quantities of clothing and bedding. The expulsions ebbed in December, when the SS unit involved, presumably the 1st SS-Reiterstandarte, was called away to expel Jews from Chełm and Hrubieszów.

By then, 2,000 local expellees may have resided in Kock. Among them was a large part of the community of Lubartów, ordered to Kock in December 1939. Though an expulsion order, issued for the town of Radzyń, specifically banned Jews from moving to Kock, many nonetheless reported there. In December 1939, transports carried to Kock some 1,200 to 3,000 Jews expelled from Nasielsk, Serock, Suwałki, and other localities attached to the Reich. By early December, the Kock Jewish population stood at 8,000.

As war devastation and overcrowding forced several dozen Jews to reside in a single room, the resulting poor sanitation led to a typhus epidemic. Local villagers, fearing they would contract the disease, banned Jews from seeking food or finding work in their localities. The bans effectively confined the Jews to Kock. Mojżesz Apelbaum reports many Jews, particularly children, perished from typhus or starvation.

In early 1940, Winterfeld offered to permit some Jews in Kock to return home in exchange for a 2-kilogram (4.4-pound) gold payment.¹ In early 1940, German authorities appointed a new Jewish Council. Its chair, Saperstein, was a refugee from Poznań. The new council organized a Jewish police force. By April 1941, the Jewish population had declined to 3,191 (775 families), including 814 refugees. Newcomers included 100 deportees from Nowy Dwór Mazowiecki.²

Many Jews were resettled in the old Jewish neighborhood, mostly in residences on Żydowska Street. Some 60 people became ill during a March 1941 typhus outbreak. Another 55 contracted tuberculosis that year.³ By December 1941, decrees imposed the death penalty on Jews throughout the Generalgouvernement whom the Germans found outside their places of registration without permission. In April 1942, Szlomo Topel, Lejb Rubinstein, and Moszek Oberklajd, the leaders of the local Jewish Social Self-Help (JSS) organization, reported on the charity's ghetto questionnaire that neither an open nor a closed ghetto existed in Kock.⁴

In the winter of 1941–1942, SS from Radzyń arrived to order the Jews to surrender fur coats. Cobbler Abram Wodyński was killed in a subsequent search for hidden coats. The Jews were conscripted for forced labor, including draining local swamps, hewing trees, and cutting timber at a sawmill in Poizdów village. By May 1942, 158 Kock Jews were among the 407 inmates of a labor camp established in Ossowa for water irrigation work.⁵

The JSS established a community kitchen to feed the impoverished. Dr. Fritz Schmiede, the Radzyn Kreishauptmann from August 1940 until December 1941, permitted the Kock organization to purchase weekly from cheaper government stores just a dozen eggs and 20 liters (21.1 quarts) of skim milk. In August 1941, the kitchen closed because its organizers could no longer afford to buy food at free market prices for the 689 people, mostly refugees, under its care.⁶ After a new Kreishauptmann, Ludwig Stitzinger, released potato and heating fuel rations to the Kock organization in January 1942, a reopened kitchen served daily meals to 1,200 people. In July, Saperstein reduced working Jews' 120-gram (4.2-ounce) daily bread ration to establish a supplemental bread allotment for 425 impoverished children.⁷

With the May and June 1942 expulsion to extermination camps of almost all the Jewish communities in neighboring Kreis Pulawy, Security Police from Radzyń regularly searched Jewish residences in Kock for fugitives from Baranów nad Wieprzem, Markuszów, and Michów. During a May search, 27 Jews were shot dead. Between August 16 and 19, 1942, the Jewish Council designated 100 families (400 to 500 people), mostly refugees, for immediate transfer to Parczew. The deportees were sent to their deaths at the Treblinka extermination camp during the Parczew expulsions on August 19–20 and October 8.⁸

Members of the 2nd Platoon of Reserve Police Battalion 101, stationed in Kock to provide manpower during the deportations, likely oversaw the expulsion of another 1,700 Jews. One such deportation probably occurred on September 10, 1942, the date on which Institute of National Remembrance (IPN) (Court Inquiries about Executions, Mass Graves, Camps, and Ghettos, ASG) documentation notes members of a Schupo unit assigned to Kock shot 10 Jews dead.⁹ Survivor Harry Jacobs recalls German soldiers, probably the reserve policemen, almost daily designated hundreds of men for internment in various labor camps.¹⁰ Hundreds more Jews were transferred to the ghetto in Łuków after October 8.

A remnant ghetto of several streets for Jews designated for labor in Kock was established during the expulsions. The ghetto was located in the area now bounded by 1 Maja Street and parts of Warszawa Street and Wojska Polskiego Alley. It included Żydowska and Polna Streets. The ghetto was not fenced. Its inhabitants mainly cleared and sorted Jewish property or worked at the Poizdów sawmill. Deprived of rations, the inmates left the ghetto nightly to search deportees' houses for food.

Susan Weiss remembered that the reserve policemen stormed the ghetto one day, rounded up hundreds of non-working Jews, and shot them dead.¹¹ Weiss likely was recalling the mass killing of 161 to 189 Jews on September 26, 1942. Major Wilhelm Trapp, the commander of Reserve Police Battalion 101, ordered the execution in retaliation for the murder of one of his men in Talczyn village. After his men shot dead 78 to 81 Poles in Talczyn, including six large refugee families, he decided not to alienate the Polish-Christian population further, accused the Kock Jews of complicity in the crime, and ordered the rest of the 200-victim retaliation quota be filled with Jews from the ghetto.¹² After the execution and the October transfers to Łuków, the ghetto population likely stood at 400 to 500.

On November 6, 1942, members of the 2nd Platoon of Reserve Police Battalion 101 began liquidating the Kock ghetto. The policemen likely transferred some 200 Jews to a labor camp established at the Poizdów sawmill. They then marched 120 to 500 inmates to the Łuków ghetto. Reportedly because so many Jews fled along the road to Łuków, Sergeant Jurich shot Saperstein dead. Several days later, the last ghetto residents—the clearing crew—were sent by train to Parczew to sort Jewish property.¹³

The Kock deportees in the Łuków ghetto were sent to their deaths at Treblinka in the Łuków deportations of October 26–27 and November 7–10, 1942. In early January 1943, the clearing crew in Parczew was shot dead. On November 30, 1943 (or more likely, 1942), 200 laborers at the Poizdów sawmill were executed. Among the victims were Dr. Frihofer (Friehofer) and Moszek Kleinbaum.¹⁴ Others escaped execution by fleeing to the forest a day earlier.

Fewer than 30 Kock Jews survived the German occupation. Before her death, Apolonia Świątek-Machczyńska gave false identity papers to 11 Kock Jews, including survivor Ryfka Goldfinger, and arranged their transfer to her in-laws' house in Warsaw. In Wola Skromowska village, Kaznecka and her husband Czesław sheltered Grzebień, Arye Goldman, and Izrael Rozenblat. Gedalia Grosman mentions local villagers sheltered at least another 6 Kock Jews.¹⁵ Chai Rybarczuk Liss, among the survivors, was killed shortly after Kock's liberation in July 1944 while retrieving possessions she had hidden with another villager.¹⁶

In 1948, a Polish court convicted 4 former members of Reserve Police Battalion 101. Wilhelm Trapp was sentenced to death and executed for ordering mass killings of Polish civilians, including the Talczyn executions, and of Soviet prisoners of war. Gotthelf Heinz Bumann (aka Buchmann) received an eight-year sentence for commanding the platoon and participating in the mass executions in Talczyn. Helmut Kadler (aka Kammer) received a three-year sentence for arresting Polish civilians and participating in mass executions. A fourth man was tried for crimes in Łódź.¹⁷ In 1967, a West German court tried 11 former members of the same unit for crimes committed during the liquidation of Jewish communities in Kreise Cholm, Biała Podlaska, and Radzyn. None of the 5 men found guilty were convicted of committing crimes in Kock.

SOURCES Secondary sources touching on the Kock Jewish community during the German occupation include the relevant entries in Abraham Wein, Bracha Freundlich, and Wila Orbach, eds., Pinkas ha-kehillot. Encyclopaedia of Jewish Communities: Poland, vol. 7, Lublin and Kielce (Jerusalem: Yad Vashem, 1999), pp. 477–480; Arnon Rubin, The Rise and Fall of the Jewish Communities in Poland and Their Relics Today, vol. 2, District Lublin (Tel Aviv: Tel Aviv University Press, 2007), pp. 134–139; Israel Gutman and Sara Bender, eds., The Encyclopedia of the Righteous among the Nations: Rescuers of Jews during the Holocaust, vol. 2, Poland, 2 pts. (Jerusalem: Yad Vashem, 2004), pt. 2, p. 768; and Rejestr miejsc i faktów zbrodni popełnionych przez okupanta hitlerowskiego na ziemiach polskich w latach 1939–1945: Województwo lubelskie (Warsaw: GKBZHP, 1985), pp. 96–97, 197–198.

For another perspective on the killings in Kock, see Christopher R. Browning, Ordinary Men: Reserve Police Battalion 101 and the Final Solution in Poland (New York: HarperCollins, 1992); Daniel J. Goldhagen, Hitler's Willing Executioners: Ordinary Germans and the Holocaust (New York: Knopf, 1996); Hannah Krall, "Pola," Gazeta Wyborcza, April 11, 1997.

The yizkor book Sefer Kotsk ([Tel-Aviv]: Vaad Irgun yots'e Kotsk be-Yisrael, [1961]) includes testimonies from survivors. An interview with Leonarda Kazanecka is available in Polish and English translation at <http://sprawiedliwi.tnn.pl/persons.php>.

Archival documentation about the Kock Jewish community during the war includes APL; AŻIH (211 [134, p. 56; 542; 646, pp. 25–26; 885, p. 14; 887, p. 91; 888, pp. 17, 30, 37; 889, pp. 3, 11; 890, pp. 5, 13, 17, 22, 46, 54, 71; 891, pp. 39, 48], 301 [2013, 3363]); BA-L; FVA (HVT [e.g., # 2270]); IPN (e.g., ASG, SOS BP 41-45); IPN-Lu (e.g., 129/67/1-2, 131/61/1-57); USHMM (Acc.1997.A.0124 [AŻIH 211]; RG-15.019M [IPN ASG] [reel 5 (16/660, 672, 697-698, 700, 814)]); VHF (e.g., # 15478, 16686, 48207); and YVA.

Of the communities mentioned in the entry but not covered elsewhere in this volume, no entry appears for Firlej because Mojżesz Apelbaum explicitly states in his testimony, at AŻIH, 301/2013, p. 10 (typescript), that no ghetto was established there. There is, however, an entry for the other Firlej in Distrikt Radom.

Laura Crago

NOTES

1. AŻIH, 301/2013, testimony of Mojżesz Apelbaum, pp. 1–2.
2. USHMM, Acc.1997.A.0124 (AŻIH), 211/542, pp. 2, 51; 211/888, p. 37; 211/887, p. 91.
3. Ibid., 211/542, pp. 2, 52.
4. Ibid., p. 51.
5. Ibid., 211/890, p. 54.
6. Ibid., 211/646, pp. 24–25; 211/884, p. 15; 211/885, p. 14; 211/888, pp. 17, 30; 211/890, p. 5.
7. Ibid., 211/542, pp. 40, 53; 211/888, p. 34; 211/890, p. 46.
8. AŻIH, 301/2013, p. 11.
9. USHMM, RG-15.019M (IPN), reel 5, 16/697.
10. VHF, # 16686, testimony of Harry Jacobs.
11. Ibid., # 48027, testimony of Susan Weiss.
12. USHMM, RG-15.019M, 16/672, 698.
13. VHF, # 48027.
14. Ibid., USHMM, RG-15.019M, 16/814.
15. Sefer Kotsk, p. 176 (Gedalia Grosman testimony).
16. AŻIH, 301/3363, testimony of Marysia Liss, p. 2.
17. IPN, SOS BP, 41, 42, 43, 44, 45.

KOMARÓW

Pre-1939: Komarów, village, Tomaszów Lubelski powiat, Lublin województwo, Poland; 1939–1944: Komarow, Kreis Zamosc, Distrikt Lublin, Generalgouvernement; post-1998: Komarów-Osada, Tomaszów Lubelski powiat, Lublin województwo, Poland

Komarów is located 100 kilometers (62 miles) southeast of Lublin. In 1921, its 2,895 residents included 1,752 Jews.

Germans troops occupied Komarów on September 13, 1939. About two weeks later, they ceded it to advancing Soviet forces. After the September 28 German-Soviet border renegotiation returned Komarów to Germany, 500 to 800 Jews joined the October 8 Soviet evacuation behind the Bug River.

Upon reoccupying Komarów several days later, the Germans appointed a wójt (head) to lead a local Polish collaborationist administration. Members of a German Gendarmerie post in Tyszowce, some 15 kilometers (9 miles) away, and Polish auxiliary police, stationed in Komarów, exercised local police authority. Ernst Schulz, assigned to the Tyszowce post before Christmas 1940, was named post commander in June 1941.

In late 1939, German civilian authorities ordered that a Jewish Council (Judenrat) be established. Abram Elbaum was its chair. From April 1941, Elbaum also headed the Komarów branch of the Jewish Social Self-Help (JSS) organization. In July, Keilman Fogiel assumed the JSS chairmanship. A Jewish police force was recruited.

The shochet, arrested for violating prohibitions on kosher slaughter, perished from beatings in a Zamość prison. Twenty children attended an illegal cheder, probably organized by Rabbi Szyja Alterman.¹ From the spring until late October 1940, 350 men were interned in labor camps, including at Narol, a subcamp of the Bełżec extermination camp, and a water drainage camp in Bortatycze.

From 1940, about 200 Jewish expellees from in or around Włocławek, Koło, Sierpc, and Częstochowa (mainly deportees from Płock) were ordered to Komarów. Local Jews, rendered homeless during September war operations, mostly from Krasnobród, Tyszowce, Łaszczów, and Tomaszów Lubelski, also resettled in Komarów.² As part of the German plan to reduce the Jewish population of Lublin to create a small ghetto there, about 200 Jews arrived from that city in March 1941. On April 5, the SS forcibly expelled to Komarów some 400 Jews considered too impoverished to pay rents in the soon-to-be-established Zamość ghetto. The expellees almost all were December 1939 deportees from Łódź, Włocławek, and Koło.³ On May 1, the SS transferred to Komarów 250 Jews who had refused to report to the Zamość ghetto. In September, Fogiel noted 3,000 Jews resided in Komarów: 1,200 expellees and 1,800 permanent residents. The latter included displaced locals and about 1,000 native Jews. Several hundred Warsaw ghetto fugitives, unable to legalize their residency, went uncounted.⁴

On October 1, 1941, Kreis Zamosc Kreishauptmann Helmuth Weißenmaier reported that 1,800 Jews resided in Komarów.⁵ Because the Kreishauptmann in May had extended to nonworking and impoverished expellees in Komarów (and Krasnobród) rations from the city of Zamość, he probably included them in the Zamość Jewish population. Weißenmaier likely provided the rations to keep Warthegau deportees from returning to Zamość. In November 1940, the Zamość Landwirt had refused similar rations to Jews living outside the city.⁶

Feldman, an ethnic German settler and beneficiary of the 1940 expropriation of Jewish businesses, employed Jewish craftsmen at his Komarów tannery. Others worked on the Komarów-to-Zamość road construction project, completed before Germany's June 22, 1941, invasion of the Soviet Union. Some 1,000 Jews daily traveled to work sites near and in Zamość; some worked at a sawmill. Most worked for two Czech construction firms, the recipients of Air Force Construction Office (Bauleitung der Luftwaffe) contracts to build airports in Łabunie and Mokre. Many Komarów (and Zamość) Jews subsequently worked at the Luftwaffe base in Łabunie or were interned there or in Zamość at Bauleitung der Luftwaffe labor camps. In the spring of 1941, children departed Komarów to work for Polish and Ukrainian villagers as domestic and farm servants. They returned home on Saturdays, usually with food their employers provided to supplement wages they paid to the Arbeitsamt (labor office).

In the spring of 1941, Schulz shot dead 19-year-old Mordechai "Motel" Temper, remembered by Zvi Sohar (Tsevi Zohar) as the first Jewish fatality of German violence in Komarów.

Because of tight housing, ethnic German newcomers to Komarów were assigned rooms in the homes of the wealthiest Jewish families.⁷ Required in September 1941 to inform Distrikt-level authorities about the locations of ghettos in his Kreis, Weißenmaier excluded Komarów from his list. In November 1941, Hans Frank imposed the death penalty on Jews in the Generalgouvernement found without permission outside their places of registration.

As the Jewish Council assigned two to three families to live in the homes of native Jews, overcrowded conditions contributed to a May 1941 typhus outbreak. A September-to-November epidemic claimed many lives. In October, the JSS established a 30-bed hospital and isolation ward. JSS officials transferred a physician to Komarów to oversee the facilities. In November, the Jewish Council mandated regular bathing; the JSS paid to heat the mikveh. The measures ended the epidemic but failed to prevent another outbreak in January 1942.

Two transports carrying some 2,000 Jews from the Theresienstadt ghetto arrived in Zamość on April 30 and May 2, 1942. On May 2, 729 deportees from the first (Theresienstadt-As) transport were transferred to Komarów. The newcomers, mainly Czechs from Prague and Vienna, established a welfare committee and a Jewish police force.⁸

On May 20 or 23, 1942, Gendarmes and SS surrounded Komarów and ordered the Jews all to report to the marketplace. The Germans probably relied on the Jewish-Czech police to search for fugitives. (A unit of Czech deportees, believed from Komarów or Izbica, provided similar assistance in Tyszowce.)⁹

Those employed by the Germans and most Czech newcomers were excluded from the expulsion. The elderly, children, women with dependent children, and the unemployed were ordered onto wagons and escorted by German police to Zamość. Imprisoned in barracks at a railway cargo loading dock (the so-called beet platform), located between Peowiak and Orlicz-Dreszer Streets, the expellees on May 27 were sent together with Zamość deportees to be gassed at the Sobibór extermination camp. In Komarów, Gendarmes, led by Schulz, in June rounded up and executed all Jews without a work permit (Ausweis) and the Jewish Council members.¹⁰

The postwar Polish Court Inquiries about Executions, Mass Graves, Camps, and Ghettos (ASG) documentation reports a remnant ghetto was established in June 1942 for those retained for labor. The 1,500 square-meter (1,794 square yards) unfenced, open ghetto was located along one side of the Zamość-to-Tyszowce road.¹¹ On July 5, Fogiel informed JSS officials about “the new ghetto” (dzielnica żydowska). Its 1,723 inmates included 650 Czech deportees. Fogiel reported 7 ghetto inmates already were sick with typhus. Two Czech physicians anticipated an epidemic, as the Jews were forbidden to bathe because the mikveh was located beyond the ghetto’s borders.¹² Peasants were forbidden to enter the ghetto to sell Jews food. Some inmates died from diseases related to starvation.¹³

The Jews sustained beatings, especially from Schulz. One day, he ordered about 50 young men and women to the square for municipal cleaning duties. Surrounded there by a Gestapo unit, the Jews were executed.¹⁴ Zygmunt Klukowski may have related the same incident in his diary, noting on October 5, 1942, that the Germans had retaliated for an ethnic German’s murder by executing 50 Jews (and 50 Poles) in Komarów.

On October 15, 1942, Gendarmes from Tyszowce and German police units from Zamość surrounded the ghetto. The ASG documentation reports that between October 15 and 31, 1942, Gendarmes, Gestapo, and SS shot the ghetto inmates as part of a larger group of 2,500 Jews executed in mass graves located just outside of Komarów. (The victims included Jews rounded up from nearby villages and some brought from Tyszowce.)¹⁵ However, a Polish-Christian eyewitness recalls the old, young, and sick were shot; the remaining Jews from Komarów (and Tyszowce) were expelled, probably on October 15, to the ghetto in Izbica.¹⁶ The Komarów deportees were sent to their deaths at Bełżec and Sobibór, most likely on October 19, during what survivors remember as the great deportation, so named because 5,000 Jews, mainly from the Zamość region, were cleared that day from the ghetto.

In Komarów, several days after the October 15, 1942, expulsion, Jews in nearby villages were ordered to report to the Tyszowce Gendarmerie post. At least 12 young Komarów Jews, working for peasants at the time of the deportation, fled. Their survival was made difficult by the expulsion from late December 1942 of some 110,000 Poles from 197 localities in the Zamość region, including from villages near Komarów. Rounded up during the expulsions, Abram Szttybel passed as one of the 30,000 Polish children orphaned during the expulsions and was among those transported to Siedlce.

Counted among the handful of Komarów survivors are several young natives; Moshe Bahir, originally from Płock, a May 1942 deportee to Sobibór and participant in the October 1943 uprising, and five deportees from the Theresienstadt-As transport.

Tried in 1964 in Ellwangen (Jagst), West Germany, for the shooting deaths of 12 Komarów Jews, including Temper, Schulz received a life sentence.

SOURCES Secondary works touching on the history of the Komarów Jewish community during World War II include the relevant entry in Abraham Wein, Bracha Freundlich, and Wila Orbach, eds., Pinkas ha-kebilot. Encyclopaedia of Jewish Communities: Poland, vol. 7, Lublin and Kielce (Jerusalem: Yad Vashem, 1999), pp. 467–468. For the arrival of the Theresienstadt deportees, see Adam Kopciowski, Zagłada Żydów w Zamościu (Lublin: Wydawnictwo Uniwersytetu Marii Curie-Skłodowskiej, 2005), pp. 58–64. Details about survivors from the April 30, 1942, transport appear in Jan Osers, “Flucht aus Zamosc,” Theresienstädter Studien und Dokumente, no. 5 (1998): 288–321.

Moshe Bahir’s testimony at the 1961 Eichmann trial, a transcript of which is widely available online, provides the destination of the first Komarów (and second Zamość) deportation. The testimony of Abram Szttybel, cited in the entry as AŽIH, 301/3683, hitherto used by all scholars to date the Komarów ghetto’s establishment, has been beautifully translated into English, Adam Shtibel, Testimony of a Survivor (Montreal: Concordia University Chair in Canadian Jewish Studies and Montreal Institute for Genocide and Human Rights Studies [MIGS], 2002) and also is available online at the MIGS Web site. Other published accounts by survivors include Tsevi Zohar, Me-ofel le-or: Toldot hayim ([Israel], 2003), available in English as Zvi Sohar, From Darkness to Light: My Life Story, trans. Judy Grossman ([Israel]: Zvi Sohar, 2009); the testimonies in the yizkor book, Frida Kaplan-Shulman, ed., ‘Edut me’uberet (Haifa: Kovets zikaron shel yots’e Komarov Lubelski, Polin, 1995); Moshe Bahir with David Avidan, ha-Mered be-ya’ar-ha-yanshubim (Tel Aviv: Sifre ha-me’ah ha-sheloshim, 1983); and Bahir’s testimony in Miriam Novitch, ed., Sobibór, Martyrdom, and Revolt: Documents and Testimonies (New York: Holocaust Library and Schocken Books, 1980).

Important for its chronology for the deportations of Jews from the Zamość region and its reporting of some events in Komarów is Zygmunt Klukowski, Dziennik z lat okupacji Zamojszczyzy (1939–1944) (Lublin: Lubelska Spółdzielnia Wydawnicza, 1958), available in English as Diary from the Years of Occupation, 1939–1944, trans. George Klukowski (Urbana, IL: University of Illinois Press, 1993).

Justiz und NS-Verbrechen, vol. 20 (Amsterdam: University Press Amsterdam, 1979), Lfd. Nr. 575, provides coverage of the postwar investigation and trial of Ernst Schulz.

Additional documentation can be found in the following archives: APL (e.g., 498 [273]); AŽIH (e.g., 210/417, 211 [553–554; 1147, pp. 8, 11; 1148, pp. 6–7, 38–39, 50; 1149, pp. 17, 27–28; 1150, pp. 11, 14; 1152, p. 34], 301/3683); IPN (e.g., ASG); IPN-Lu (e.g., 44/67/1-3); USHMM (e.g., Acc.1997.A.0124

[AŻIH 211]; Acc.1999.A.0154 [AŻIH 210]; RG-15.019M [IPN] [reel 6 (18/1089), reel 15 (49/177-178)]; VHF (e.g., #4997, 15595, 27270, 27659, 43782); and YVA (e.g., M-1/Q/531, O-3/3109).

Laura Crago

NOTES

1. AŻIH, 301/3683, testimony of Abram Szybel, pp. 1–4.
2. USHMM, Acc.1999.A.0154 (AŻIH), 210/417, pp. 8–9, 17, 19.
3. Ibid., pp. 32, 35; Acc.1997.A.0124 (AŻIH), 211/553, pp. 1–4, 30.
4. Ibid., Acc.1997.A.0124, 211/553, pp. 8, 23; 211/554, p. 26.
5. APL, GDL, 260, pp. 23–24.
6. USHMM, Acc.1997.A.0124, 211/1149, pp. 11–12.
7. VHF, #43782, testimony of Szymon Frydliński.
8. USHMM, Acc.1997.A.0124, 211/1152, p. 34; 211/554, pp. 38, 41–43, 45.
9. AŻIH, 301/5836, testimony of Augustyn Dudziński, p. 2.
10. Ibid., 301/3683, pp. 8–10.
11. USHMM, RG-15.019M (IPN), 49/177-178.
12. Ibid., Acc.1997.A.0124, 211/554, pp. 45–48.
13. VHF, #15595, testimony of Adam Shtibel.
14. Sohar, From Darkness to Light, p. 49.
15. USHMM, RG-15.019M, 18/1089.
16. AŻIH, 301/5836, p. 2. See also AŻIH, 302/81, Mojżesz Frank, p. 8.

KOMARÓWKA PODLASKA

Pre-1939: Komarówka Podlaska, village, Radzyń powiat, Lublin województwo, Poland; 1939–1944: Komarowka Podlaska, Kreis Radzyn, Distrikt Lublin, Generalgouvernement; post-1998: Komarówka, village, Radzyń powiat, Lublin województwo, Poland

Komarówka Podlaska lies some 80 kilometers (50 miles) by road north-northeast of Lublin. Its 1921 population of 1,038 included 412 Jews.

Luftwaffe bombardment in the first weeks of World War II sparked fires, which left 120 Jews homeless. After a brief occupation by Soviet forces, a Wehrmacht unit arrived in Komarówka in October 1939. By January 1940, German civilian authorities in Kreis Radzyn had ordered Jews to wear white armbands, with Blue Stars of David, and to establish Jewish Councils. Szama Lonszajn (Lonschein) served as the Komarówka Jewish Council chair.¹

Because the Komarówka Jews were permitted to remain in their homes and to work in their pre-war occupations, 476 newcomers, mostly expellees from Radzyń Podlaski, settled there. Most returned to Radzyń when the expulsion orders were rescinded in April 1940. In May 1941, another “mass” of new arrivals brought the refugee population to 175. A group of widows and orphans appeared in January 1942. By July 1942, some 623 Jews were residing in Komarówka.²

In March 1940, a Warsaw refugee and eight witnesses complained to the American Jewish Joint Distribution Committee (AJDC) in Warsaw about the 12 members of the Jewish Council, the wealthiest men in Komarówka, dividing charity food allotments between themselves and overrepresenting monetary aid distributed to refugees. Mojżesz Apelbaum, the former head of the Jewish Social Self-Help (JSS) in Firlej, subsequently attributed such shortfalls to the Gestapo regularly ordering the Kreis Radzyn JSS to surrender a part of each charity allotment.³

In the spring of 1941, Komarówka authorities ordered Jewish-owned businesses transferred to non-Jews. Almost 80 percent of the approximately 200 Jews conscripted for forced labor worked at a Wehrmacht base near Komarówka. Others performed agricultural labor on a nearby estate.⁴ By September, 20 Jews were interned at a labor camp established in Ossowa for canal work on the Białka River. The Komarówka Jews provided food and clothing to the approximately 407 camp inmates.⁵ In July 1941, a small SS contingent arrived to terrorize the Jews. The SS shot dead some 25 people, including Szama Zunszajn.⁶

Dr. Fritz Schmiede, Radzyn Kreishauptmann from August 1940 to October 1941, and his successor Ludwig Stitzinger provided monthly (until May 1942) 5,000 to 12,000 złoty in relief for impoverished Jews and permitted all Jews access to limited rations from cheaper government stores. In October 1941, working Jews could purchase monthly 50 kilograms (110 pounds) of potatoes, 4.35 kilograms (9.6 pounds) of bread, 400 grams (14.1 ounces) of sugar, and 400 grams of meat. Nonworking Jews were limited to 50 kilograms of potatoes and 1.6 kilograms (3.5 pounds) of bread. From January 1942, the Komarówka JSS received permission to purchase daily 10 to 20 liters (10.6 to 21.1 quarts) of skim milk (depending on the season). The cheaper rations and absence of a ghetto likely contributed to the relative health of the Komarówka community. In March 1942, JSS leaders reported there had been no outbreaks of any infectious diseases since the beginning of the war.⁷

From the winter of 1941–1942, increasing numbers went hungry because the Komarówka agronomist cut potato rations to 30 and 25 kilograms (66.1 and 55.1 pounds) for working and nonworking Jews, respectively.⁸ Continuing shortages brought a suspension in the ration. By August 1942, local authorities also had reduced bread rations to 2.6 and 1.3 kilograms (5.7 and 2.9 pounds), respectively, for working and nonworking Jews. From June 1941 to June 1942, the number of people needing JSS food assistance grew from 140 to 200.⁹

Some survivors recalled that the Germans expelled almost all the Komarówka Jews in June or July 1942. However, postwar officials in Komarówka remembered the expulsion occurred either in August or September. An August JSS report, submitted by local officials on September 6, supports the second version of events, as it notes 615 Jews resided in Komarówka.¹⁰

The postwar officials in Komarówka also described how the Germans expelled about 600 local Jews south to the ghetto in Parczew and then several weeks later marched the same expellees north (via Komarówka) to the transit ghetto in Międzyrzec Podlaski. However, several members of the 2nd Company of Reserve Police Battalion 101 remembered escorting the Komarówka Jews in late September directly to Międzyrzec. There, they joined expellees from the Biała Podlaska and Parczew ghettos. The Biała deportees included about 3,000 Jews from Janów Podlaski and Konstantynów. The Parczew expellees mainly were Jews consolidated there from Wołyń and Czemierniki. The Międzyrzec ghetto was cleared on October 6 and 9. Its residents were sent to their deaths at the Treblinka extermination camp.

A small number of Komarówka Jews, mostly Wehrmacht laborers, were retained for a remnant ghetto in Komarówka. Icek Lerner remembered the detainees were ordered to a ghetto: a single house, surrounded by barbed wire.¹¹ Polish Institute of National Remembrance (IPN) researchers, led by Czesław Pilichowski, describe the ghetto as located in an olejarnia, or mill, for cooking oil production. Józef Juszczyński, a non-Jewish Pole, remembered the ghetto occupying a formerly Jewish-owned mill located some 4.8 kilometers (3 miles) south of Komarówka, near where the Parczew road turned east to Wisznice. He recalled the SS (likely members of Reserve Police Battalion 101) initially guarded the ghetto. Its inmates were assigned small 2-meter-by-2-meter (6.6-foot-by-6.6-foot) cells, in which entire families resided.

Lerner estimated that fewer than 25 people lived in the ghetto.¹² The IPN researchers maintain its population stood at 600. The discrepancy may stem from the researchers imposing their timing of the first expulsion on Lerner's memory of the ghetto being established in mid-1942.

On November 30, 1942, Gendarmes surrounded the Komarówka ghetto and ordered its inhabitants onto waiting peasant carts. The expellees were taken to the Międzyrzec ghetto.

A large number of Jews escaped from the first and second Komarówka expulsions. Juszczyński recalled many joined partisan groups in the nearby forests. However, Lerner described escaped Soviet prisoners of war hiding there as anti-semites, who robbed Jews of their possessions and attempted to drive many to an execution site deeper in the forest. Many Jewish fugitives as a result sought refuge in the Międzyrzec ghetto, where some, including Lerner's brother-in-law Josef Zylberstein, decided to tie their families' fates to future German "resettlement" orders.¹³ Other escapees, including Lerner and Estera Rybak, secured false identity papers. Assisted by Piotr Kapczuk, the two found shelter in Warsaw after the second deportation. Rybak also paid Kapczuk 10,000 złoty for his father and brother, residents of Rudno village, to shelter her almost three-year-old daughter.¹⁴

Still other Komarówka Jews escaped the final liquidation of the Międzyrzec ghetto in April 1943 by hiding in bunkers or by jumping from trains carrying the deportees to the Majdanek concentration camp. Among the fugitives were six members of Lerner's family (and two Międzyrzec natives), who were offered shelter in exchange for money by Jan Sadowski.¹⁵

Kapczuk and Sadowski enlisted family and friends to murder the Jews they had promised to protect. Before the 1943 New Year, Kapczuk, his father, and brother reportedly had murdered Rybak's daughter. In July, Kapczuk paid Rybak's aid provider to murder her and Lerner. Rybak perished. Left for dead, Lerner fled to the apartment of Natalja Konarzewska, a distant cousin of Kapczuk, with whom he initially had lived in Warsaw.¹⁶ In October, Sadowski and four other Poles, including Franciszek Uzdowski, the owner of the farm in Przegaliny colony where the Lerner family bunker was located, ordered the Jews to reveal the hiding places of their remaining valuables. When they refused, Sadowski and his thugs attempted to solicit the information by torturing one Jew after another to death. Sadowski next offered Konarzewska 100,000 złoty to surrender Lerner, but she refused.

As a result of the attacks, Lerner and Szloma Zysman were two of the only known Komarówka survivors. Around November 1944, about five months after Komarówka was liberated by Soviet forces, Sadowski allegedly murdered Zysman to prevent him from helping Lerner obtain justice for the wartime loss of his family members.¹⁷

Lerner thrice filed police reports in Poland before immigrating to Sweden. In Stockholm, he submitted two additional affidavits to the Polish consulate in Stockholm before departing for Palestine. Lerner's allegations were investigated, but Polish prosecutors believed the evidence insufficient to charge the suspects. After Lerner died in 2004, his son Rony visited Poland and discovered the copies of his father's two affidavits at the Jewish Historical Institute (ŻIH) archives. He hired researchers and a film crew to locate and interview a 92-year-old man, alleged to be the last surviving perpetrator of the Przegaliny murders. In 2006, the Israel office of the Simon Wiesenthal Center requested that IPN investigate the murders. Prosecutors at IPN—Lublin branch (IPN-Lu) discontinued the investigation in December 2007 upon the death of the last known suspect.

SOURCES Secondary sources about the Komarówka Podlaska Jewish community during World War II include the relevant entries in Abraham Wein, Bracha Freundlich, and Wila Orbach, eds., Pinkas ha-kehillot. Encyclopaedia of Jewish Communities: Poland, vol. 7, Lublin and Kielce (Jerusalem: Yad Vashem, 1999), p. 468; Arnon Rubin, The Rise and Fall of the Jewish Communities in Poland and Their Relics Today, vol. 2, District Lublin (Tel Aviv: Tel Aviv University Press, 2007), pp. 141–142; and Czesław Pilichowski et al., eds., Obozy hitlerowskie na ziemiach polskich 1939–1945: Informator encyklopedyczny (Warsaw: PWN, 1979), p. 239.

Tatiana Berenstein, "Martyrologia, opór i zagłada ludności żydowskiej w dystrykcie lubelskim," BŻIH no. 21 (1957): 80, depends on the questionnaire submitted by postwar Polish officials in Komarówka, cited below as AŻIH Ankiety, to conclude some 600 Komarówka Jews were expelled via the Parczew ghetto to Międzyrzec. Christopher R. Browning, Ordinary Men. Reserve Police Battalion 101 and the Final Solution in Poland (New York: HarperCollins, 1992), pp. 91, 105, 108, 154, 157, relies on postwar depositions from former members of the 101st Police Battalion, including some stationed in Komarówka from July to late September 1942, to describe a direct expulsion to the Międzyrzec ghetto. Justiz und NS-Verbrechen, vol. 27 (Amsterdam: Amsterdam University Press, 2003), case no. 670, provides an overview of the postwar West German investigation and trials used by Browning.

Józef Juszczyński's testimony is available under the Komarówka Podlaska section of the virtual oral history archive at the Lublin: Pamięć Miejsca Web site, created by the Ośrodek "Brama Grodzka—Teatr NN" (Grodzka Gate—NN Theatre Centre). The electronic English translation of a part of the Juszczyński testimony available on several different Web sites is inaccurate.

Rony Lerner's investigation into his relatives' murder is the subject of numerous journal and newspaper articles, including Laurie Copans, "Seeking Jewish Family's Fate in Rural Poland," Los Angeles Times, May 14, 2006; Aharon Granot, "Quest of a Lifetime," Mispacha, no. 108, May 17, 2006, pp. 22–27; and Paweł P. Reszka, "Kto zabił rodzinę Lernerów?" Gazeta Lublin, January 21, 2008, which summarizes the IPN investigation. The film footage was used in a 2007 documentary, Lerner's Revenge, directed and produced by Gilad Tocaty and distributed in the United States by Digibeta.

Primary documentation pertaining to the Komarówka Jewish community in World War II includes APL (e.g., 498 [273]); AŻIH (e.g., Ankiety, 210/416, 211 [555], pp. 1–59; 885, pp. 22, 35–36, 47; 887, pp. 49, 77, 83, 85, 91; 888, pp. 23–25; 890, pp. 12, 26, 28, 42, 54, 56; 891, pp. 14–15, 30, 48, 39, 58], 301/2802-2803); BA-L (e.g., 8 AR-Z 236/60, AR-Z 26/62); IPN (e.g., ASG); IPN-Lu (e.g., 284/466/1-3); USHMM (e.g., Acc.1997.A.0124 [AŻIH 211]; Acc.1999.A.0154 [AŻIH 210]); and YVA.

Laura Crago

NOTES

1. USHMM, Acc.1999.A.0154 (AŻIH), 210/416, pp. 4, 15.
2. Ibid., p. 12; Acc.1997.A.0124 (AŻIH), 211/555, pp. 8, 12; 211/888, p. 24; 211/891, p. 48.
3. Ibid., Acc.1999.A.0154, 210/416, pp. 13–14; AŻIH, 301/2013, testimony of Mojżesz Apfelbaum, p. 6.
4. AŻIH, 301/2803, testimony of Icek Lerner, pp. 5–6; USHMM, Acc.1997.A.0124, 211/555, pp. 12, 55.
5. USHMM, Acc.1997.A.0124, 211/885, p. 35; 211/555, p. 21; 211/890, pp. 54–55; Acc.1999.A.0154, 210/416, p. 28.
6. AŻIH, 301/2802, testimony of Icek Lerner, p. 2.
7. USHMM, Acc.1997.A.0124, 211/887, p. 77; 211/890, p. 5; 211/891, p. 71; 211/555, p. 38.
8. Ibid., 211/555, p. 28; 211/888, p. 24; 211/886, p. 36.
9. Ibid., 211/555, pp. 12, 55; 211/891, p. 30.
10. Ibid., Acc.1997.A.01, 211/555, pp. 55–56.
11. AŻIH, 302/2803, p. 7.
12. Ibid., 301/2802, p. 3.
13. Ibid., pp. 4–5; 301/2803, pp. 9–10.
14. Ibid., 301/2802, pp. 2–3.
15. Ibid., 301/2803, pp. 1–2, 7–10.
16. Ibid., 301/2802, pp. 5–14.
17. Ibid., 301/2803, pp. 1–3, 11–18.

KOŃSKOWOLA

Pre-1939: Końskowola, village, Puławy powiat, Lublin województwo, Poland; 1939–1944: Kōnskowola, Kreis Puławy, Distrikt Lublin, Generalgouvernement; post-1998: Końskowola, Puławy powiat, Lublin województwo, Poland

Końskowola lies about 42 kilometers (26 miles) northwest of Lublin and 6 kilometers (3.7 miles) east of Puławy. Its pre-war 1939 population, of around 2,500, included approximately 1,100 Jews.

On September 15, 1939, German troops occupied Końskowola. The German military command immediately imposed forced labor obligations on the Jews. By January 1940, German authorities had ordered a Jewish Council (Judenrat) established. In the fall of 1941, its chair was Abraham Pomeranz. The Germans also established a 12-man Gendarmerie post and a Polish auxiliary militia. Both units were commanded by Gendarmerie Oberleutnant Jammer. A collaborationist municipal council, administered by local Poles, also was formed. It was subordinate to Kreishauptmann Oskar Ulrich (replaced in 1940 by Alfred Brandt).

During the first months of the occupation, the Jews moved relatively freely beyond Końskowola's borders to barter with Poles for food. In late December 1939, many Jews expelled from Puławy, the Kreis administrative center, arrived in Końskowola, fleeing forced resettlement in Opole.¹

Because ghettoization occurred in stages, through a series of decrees issued by Brandt over many months, scholars offer a variety of dates, ranging from late 1940 to late 1941, for the establishment of an open ghetto in Końskowola. By the fall of 1940, owners of houses inhabited by Jews were required to paint large Stars of David on their exteriors. Końskowola resident Joanna Dylewicz recalled her parents pleading with their Jewish tenants to move, because they feared visiting German authorities would confuse them for Jews if they marked their house. The tenants moved to the Jewish neighborhood located roughly between the market square and Starowiejska Street, including Kurowska Street.² In late 1940, more Jews were concentrated in a smaller section of the neighborhood after German authorities ordered Jews expelled from residences on Ogrodowa Street, in order for the German firm Baumer and Loesch to use their houses for a labor camp to hold Jews brought from outside of Końskowola to work on road construction projects. In early 1941, the camp's prisoners included a Jewish labor brigade from Warsaw.

Jewish men are forced to carry sections of barbed-wire fencing along a road in Końskowola, n.d.

USHMM WS #18599, COURTESY OF IPN

In 1941, Brandt several times forbade Jews in Kreis Puławy from leaving their places of registration without permission. Jewish Social Self-Help (JSS) officials in Baranów nad Wieprzem mention Brandt forbade Jews throughout the Kreis from leaving their places of registration for three months in late July. The orders were made permanent in October, when Hans Frank issued similar orders to all Jews in the Generalgouvernement. In January 1942, 1,400 Jews resided in Końskowola.³

From the spring of 1940, the Jewish Council filled forced labor quotas for local road construction projects and agricultural labor on a number of nearby estates confiscated by the Germans and also sent hundreds of conscripts daily to Puławy to complete tasks that remained unfinished because of the expulsion of that city's Jews. Pomeranz noted that the high quotas required all adult Końskowola Jews, both men and women, from 12 to beyond 60 years old, to work daily at forced labor. (Jewish Council members also worked.) Because craftsmen were unable to engage in the types of private enterprise tolerated by the authorities elsewhere in Distrikt Lublin, Pomeranz believed the Końskowola Jews stood apart from other Jewish communities in Distrikt Lublin as they early on had been forced to survive exclusively on the meager wages paid for forced labor. The highest hourly wage was 52 groszy.⁴ To fill quotas for nonremunerated municipal labor, including street cleaning and snow clearing in Puławy, the council recruited young children and elderly women by offering them free meals.

The provisioning office in Puławy refused to sell the Jewish Council food and heating materials, which were difficult for most Jews to obtain because of proscriptions on movement beyond Końskowola.⁵ From January 1941, the council was required to surrender 3,000 złoty monthly on 179 local pre-war Jewish society loans.⁶ The arrival, in March, of 267 Jewish prisoners of war (POWs) from Stalag II-B in Hammerstein placed additional pressures on the council. Many deportees were sick with typhoid. None had adequate shoes or clothing. The council transported 14 men to the infectious disease hospital in Puławy. However, it refused to feed the deportees because they were interned at the labor camp, which was operated under a separate Jewish administration.⁷ By July, the provisioning office provided rations to the prisoners but still refused to offer them to the council.⁸

Because of the absence of provisions, the Jewish Council initially could not establish a community kitchen to feed the impoverished. Instead, it divided all the JSS charity monies it received among the needy.⁹ In October and November 1941, 1,000 Jews required assistance, but the council lacked resources even to feed or to provide clothing to the 150 to 200 laborers sent daily to clean Puławy's streets.¹⁰ By January 1942, the first German food allotments enabled the Jewish Council to establish a community kitchen to feed daily 850 of the most impoverished. The kitchen initially provided double portions to heads of households with more than 5 people, because large families with young children were starving.¹¹

On May 1, 1942, German Gendarmes arrested the members of the Jewish Council. They are presumed to have been executed. On May 8, the Gendarmes, assisted by Ukrainian militia, evacuated almost the entire Końskowola Jewish community, together with the Jews from several nearby villages, including Starowiejska, to Puławy. About 300 to 600 Jews were retained for labor in Końskowola. Another 10 Jews were shot dead during the evacuation. In Puławy, the Jews, about 800 to 1,100 people, were ordered onto trains, destined for the extermination camp in Sobibór. On May 20, a new Jewish Council chair, Israel Goldberg, a pre-war expellee from Munich, informed the regional JSS leadership about the deportation.¹²

Shortly after May 20, 1942, 1,025 Jewish expellees from Slovakia, including 700 elderly and children, were resettled in the vacated Jewish houses in Końskowola. The arrival, by June 2, of another 1,630 Slovak Jews expanded the ghetto population to more than 2,500. The Slovaks mostly were from Medzilaborce, Borov, and Bardejov.¹³

From the late summer of 1942, the Germans used Końskowola as a regional collection ghetto, though Friedrich Wilhelm Krüger, the Höherer SS und Polizeiführer (Higher SS and Police Leader, HSSPF) for the Generalgouvernement, designated it one of eight remaining Jewish residential areas (Judenwohnbezirke) in Distrikt Lublin only on October 28. A number of fugitives from the May 8–9, 1942, deportations of the Baranów, Kurów, and Markuszów Jewish communities recalled German authorities in the places to which they had fled, mostly in Kreis Radzyn, ordering their expulsions and suggesting they report to Końskowola.

Bolesław Cytryn (later Zieliński), a Kazimierz Dolny fugitive, remembered the desperate conditions in Końskowola from the late summer of 1942. The Slovak Jews, employed mostly in agriculture, were swollen and dying from hunger. Several times, the SS arrived from Puławy for ghetto inspections and punished Jews for the poor sanitation by rounding up ghetto inmates and shooting them dead.¹⁴ Hela Arbeiter, a Baranów fugitive ordered from Adamów to Końskowola in early fall, mentions five people shared a single bed. The only food available was ersatz coffee. A typhus epidemic claimed tens of lives daily.¹⁵ Cytryn, Arbeiter, and Pinchas Zajac (Ziontz), another Baranów fugitive, all recall fleeing Końskowola after rumors circulated in the first days of October of German plans to liquidate the ghetto.¹⁶

In early October 1942, the three platoons of the 3rd Company, 101st Reserve Police Battalion, led by Hauptmann Wolfgang Hoffmann, arrived to clear the ghetto. The police received assistance from Jammer's Gendarmerie; a roving motorized Gendarmerie unit, commanded by First Lieutenant Messmann; 3 members of the Lublin Gestapo; and about 100 Ukrainian auxiliaries from the SS Trawniki training camp. The Jews were ordered assembled at the square. Members of the 3rd Company and Messmann's unit shot dead 100 to 500 people, including all 40 to 50 patients at the ghetto hospital, because they were too weak to proceed to the assembly point. Between 500 and 1,000 craftsmen and skilled workers, almost all men, were marched to Puławy. Some 100 people were shot on the way there. The survivors were sent by train to labor camps in Distrikt Lublin. The 800 to 1,100 remaining Jews, mostly women, children, and elderly men, including Goldberg, were marched off the square in small groups to a small birch forest, located just off the road to Rudy village. Messmann's Gendarmerie and the 3rd Company's 1st Platoon, led by Lieutenant Oscar Peters, executed the Jews in several ravines.

Survivor Avigdor Mandelbaum's Yad Vashem testimony on behalf of his Polish aid givers indicates a small number of Jews, likely all labor camp inmates, were excluded from the deportations and executions. Evidence also indicates the Germans in the early spring of 1943 transformed the Końskowola labor camp into a transit ghetto, to hold Jews deported from Warsaw, and a collection ghetto, to assemble local Jewish survivors of forest manhunts in the winter of 1942–1943. The Końskowola entry in Pinkas ha-kehillot notes that during the Warsaw ghetto uprising in April, the Germans deported about 1,100 Warsaw Jews to Końskowola before sending them to their deaths. Helen Kotlar (Kotlarz), a Kurów survivor, remembers local German authorities some time around Passover 1943 announcing to Poles that Jewish fugitives could report safely to the labor camp in Końskowola.¹⁷ The postwar Court Inquiries about Executions, Mass Graves, Camps, and Ghettos (ASG) documentation also suggests the labor camp was used subsequently as a ghetto, in noting some 6,000 Jews passed through the Końskowola collection ghetto before its final liquidation in the summer of 1943.¹⁸ Mandelbaum's testimony and the depositions of Polish Christians, collected by Institute of National Remembrance (IPN) after the war, date the ghetto's (and the labor camp's) final liquidation to May, when Gendarmes executed its 18 remaining inmates.

A handful of native Końskowola Jews survived the war. Avigdor and Faiga Mandelbaum were sheltered by Aleksander and Helena Wijek. Aleksander was executed in May 1944 on suspicions he was hiding Jews. A relatively larger group of Jews from several nearby communities and labor camps also are counted as survivors because they lived for a short time in one of the two collection ghettos established in Końskowola.

SOURCES Some German documentation for Końskowola, including Krüger's October 26, 1942, orders establishing the Judenwohnbezirke in the Generalgouvernement, can be found in German transcription and Polish translation in Tatiana Berenstein et al., eds., Eksterminacja Żydów na ziemiach polskich w okresie okupacji hitlerowskiej: Zbiór dokumentów (Warsaw: ŻIH, 1957), pp. 311–314; and the German-language edition, by the same authors, Faschismus, Getto, Massenmord: Dokumentation über Ausrottung und Widerstand der Juden in Polen während des zweiten Weltkrieges (Frankfurt: Röderberg-Verlag, 1960), pp. 342–344, containing the same documentation but unfortunately erring editorially in explaining the order was issued in 1939, though the second work also includes (on p. 438) Brandt's May 13, 1942, assessment of the number of Jews remaining in Kreis Pulawy, with 500 to 600 noted for Końskowola.

There is no yizkor book or other published testimonies from native Końskowola survivors. Two testimonies from Polish Christians describing the wartime fate of the Jewish community can be found under the Końskowola section of the Lublin: Pamięć Miejsca Web site, an oral history archive created by the Ośrodek 'Brama Grodzka—Teatr NN' (Grodzka Gate—NN Theatre Centre), at www.tnn.pl/pamie.php. Helen Kotlar, We Lived in a Grave (New York: Shengold, 1980), provides information about local German authorities using the Końskowola ghetto as a collection ghetto.

Secondary sources touching on the Końskowola Jewish community during the Holocaust include the relevant entries in Abraham Wein, Bracha Freundlich, and Wila Orbach, eds., Pinkas ha-kehillot. Encyclopaedia of Jewish Communities: Poland, vol. 7, Lublin and Kielce (Jerusalem: Yad Vashem, 1999), pp. 471–474; Arnon Rubin, The Rise and Fall of Jewish Communities in Poland and Their Relics Today, vol. 2, District Lublin (Tel Aviv: Tel Aviv University Press, 2007), pp. 143–146; and Israel Gutman and Sara Bender, eds., The Encyclopedia of the Righteous among the Nations: Rescuers of Jews during the Holocaust, vol. 2, Poland, 2 pts. (Jerusalem: Yad Vashem, 2004), pt. 2, pp. 864–865, for the Mandelbaum and Wijek families.

Some coverage of the German and to a lesser extent the Polish administration in Końskowola is provided by Bogdan Musiał, Deutsche Zivilverwaltung und Judenverfolgung im Generalgouvernement: Eine Fallstudie zum Distrikt Lublin 1939–1944 (Wiesbaden: Harrassowitz, 1999). Christopher R. Browning, Ordinary Men: Reserve Police Battalion 101 and the Final Solution in Poland (New York: HarperCollins, 1992), includes in chapter 13 coverage of the October 1942 liquidation of the collection ghetto; Justiz und NS-Verbrechen (Amsterdam: Amsterdam University Press), vols. 27 (2003, case no. 670) and 37 (2007, case no. 772), provides an overview of the postwar investigation and trials on which most of Browning's research is based. Early postwar IPN witness depositions describing German executions of pre-war Polish citizens in Distrikt Lublin are listed in Leszek Semion, "Egzekucje na Lubelszczyźnie," Zeszyty Majdanka 3 (1969): 154–212.

Documents describing the fate of the Jews of Końskowola can be found in the following archives: APL (e.g., 498 [68, 88, 273, 749]; AŻIH (e.g., APL 498 [891–93, 895], 210/421, 211/566–67, 301 [272, 996, 4420]); BGH (700407, 730313); FVA (1513, 3084); IPN; IPN-Lu (2/67/1–6, 85/67/1–3); LG-Hamb (680408, 720424); USHMM (Acc.1997.A.0124 [AŻIH] 211/566–67; Acc.1999.A.0154 [AŻIH] 210/421; RG-15.019M [IPN] [reel 15, 49/102]; RG-50.120*0181); VHF (e.g., # 722, 18373, 31126, 31584, 33048, 35421); and YVA.

Laura Crago

NOTES

1. USHMM, Acc.1997.A.0124 (AŻIH), ŻSS, 211/567, p. 2.
2. Lublin: Pamięć Miejsca, testimony of Joanna Dylewicz.
3. USHMM, Acc.1997.A.0124, 211/567, p. 2.
4. Ibid., 211/566, pp. 42–44.

5. Ibid., pp. 27, 44.
6. Ibid., pp. 1–8, 211/567, p. 7.
7. Ibid., 211/566, pp. 12–14.
8. Ibid., p. 27.
9. Ibid., pp. 18–24, 27–28.
10. Ibid., pp. 39–40, 42–45.
11. Ibid., 211/567, pp. 1–2.
12. Ibid., p. 14.
13. Ibid., pp. 14, 17–18, 21.
14. AŻIH, 301/4420, testimony of Bolesław Cytryn (Zieliński), pp. 3–4.
15. Ibid., 301/272, testimony of Hela Arbeiter, pp. 5–6.
16. USHMM, RG-50.120*0181, testimony of Pinchas Ziontz.
17. Kotlar, We Lived in a Grave, pp. 78–80.
18. USHMM, RG-15.019M (IPN), ASG, reel 15, 49/102.

KONSTANTYNÓW (NAD BUGIEM)

Pre-1939: Konstantynów (Yiddish: Kostentin), village, Biała Podlaska powiat, Lublin województwo, Poland; 1939–1944: Konstantynow, Kreis Biała Podlaska, Distrikt Lublin, General-gouvernement; post-1998: Konstantynów, Biała Podlaska powiat, Lublin województwo, Poland

Konstantynów lies about 145 kilometers (90 miles) by road north-northeast of Lublin and 9.2 kilometers (5.7 miles) west of Janów Podlaski. Approximately 1,150 Jews resided there in August 1939.

In World War II, Soviet forces initially occupied Konstantynów but abandoned it on October 9, 1939, to German occupation. Worried about the Germans' impending arrival, many Jews crossed the Bug River, located just east of Janów Podlaski, into Soviet-occupied territory.

In late 1939, the Germans ordered a four-member Jewish Council (Judenrat) established. Its chair was Monko (Mozes) Rojzman.¹ A March 1940 list of 96 families (432 people) ruined as a result of the war indicates German civilian authorities circumscribed the public practice of Judaism and confiscated Jewish-owned businesses. Those deprived of livelihoods included the families of Jankiel Szejnkind (Jacob Scheinkind), the rabbi of Konstantynów, two shochtim, and a community religious teacher. Among the dispossessed were Jankiel Goldryng (Goldring), holder of the local vodka concession, and three nearby mill owners ordered to reside in Konstantynów.²

In December 1939, the Germans deported to Konstantynów 245 Jews from Błaszki, near Łódź. By January 1940, another 105 Jewish newcomers included voluntary refugees from Warsaw and expellees from Łódź, Włocławek, and Suwałki.³ By May 1941, the Konstantynów Jewish population stood at 1,102, including 190 refugees.⁴

Concerns about border security caused German authorities to assume more direct responsibility for administering Konstantynów. In January 1940, the SS arrested and sent Prince Plater-Zyberk, Konstantynów's noble landowner, to a concentration camp. His estate (and palace) likely were assigned to the local Border Police Office (Grenzpolizeikommissariat, GPK) commander. The SS (or perhaps the border guards) ordered the local auxiliary Polish (Blue) Police to arrest several Jewish families for recrossing the Bug River and returning to Konstantynów. Sent to the Neuengamme concentration camp, the Jews perished. The Luftwaffe built an observation tower and stationed a small contingent in Konstantynów to spot Soviet aircraft. A Gendarmerie post also was established.

Ongoing border security concerns probably played a role in the establishment of the ghetto. Jakób Dobrysz, the head of the local Jewish Social Self-Help (JSS), indicated the ghetto was created in January 1941. He listed its establishment as the reason for the Jewish Council providing the JSS just 48 złoty in subsidies that month.⁵ It would seem likely the ghetto occupied only a small part of Konstantynów because Dobrysz, on May 20, held overcrowding in the ghetto responsible for a precipitous decline in hygiene standards.⁶ The ghetto was an unfenced, open ghetto or what Dobrysz called a Jewish quarter (dzielnica żydowska).

German authorities may have hesitated to officially designate the Jewish quarter a ghetto. After May 20, 1941, Dobrysz never again mentioned the ghetto. Instead, he referred to the increasing impoverishment of the Konstantynów Jews and from January 1942 to decrees, issued in November and December 1941, forbidding Jews on penalty of death from leaving their places of registration without permission.⁷ Hubert Kühl, the Biała Podlaska Kreishauptmann, also excluded Konstantynów from a list of ghettos he submitted in October 1941 to Richard Türk, the head of the Population and Welfare Department (BuF) for Distrikt Lublin.

Upon the ghetto's establishment, German authorities imposed much higher forced labor quotas, which required the daily conscription of almost all adult male Jews.⁸ Most conscripts hewed trees in the Konstantynów forest and transported them to nearby sawmills, at which Jewish laborers also worked. About 200 agricultural laborers worked in local villages, including Serpelice. Hundreds more agricultural laborers toiled on the grounds of the Konstantynów (Plater-Zyberk) Palace.⁹ SS (or perhaps border guards) and Gendarmes overseeing Jewish labor gangs in the forest and on the estate routinely beat their charges. In the summer of 1941, ghetto inmates also worked on road construction projects.¹⁰

The Jewish Council devoted its financial resources to provisioning Jews it sent to labor camps and to supporting their families in the ghetto. Most Konstantynów Jews were interned at a local labor camp established in Leśna Podlaska for flood control projects on the Klukowa River and for forestry and agricultural labor on the estate in Worgule village. In 1941, almost all the Leśna inmates were transferred to a camp established in Rogoźnica. Some Konstantynów Jews were interned in labor camps in Lublin.¹¹

From August 1941, the JSS reported that "nearly all the refugees here and the greater part of the local Jewish inhabitants walk around almost barefoot and naked as a result of forced labor."¹² In May 1941, a community kitchen could provide subsidized or free daily meals to just 300 people, mostly to refugees.¹³ When Kühl in October permitted the JSS in Kreis Biała Podlaska to purchase from cheaper government stores a limited number of potatoes for its community kitchens, the Konstantynów JSS reported a 1,000-złoty debt made it impossible to buy its 2,700-kilogram (5,952-pound) allotment. The JSS in Kraków sent 1,600 złoty for the purchase.¹⁴

Overcrowding and the resulting poor sanitation in the ghetto sparked a typhus outbreak in the winter of 1941–1942. By December, 80 Jews had contracted the disease. Another 56 were ill by February. In mid-January, Dobrysz reported that a local Christian doctor's refusal to treat sick Jews had contributed to the death of 10 young people. JSS officials in Kraków sent medicine and money to help establish a pharmacy and an isolation facility and may have arranged for a physician to treat the sick.¹⁵

In May 1942, an SS unit ordered all male Jews between 15 and 65 years of age to assemble at the main market square. Assisted by the local Polish (Blue) Police, the SS chose about 100 men for immediate deportation to the Rogoźnica labor camp. A second draft, also in May, sent an additional 20 men to what JSS officials described only as a nearby labor camp. The Jewish Council was required to send weekly 70 kilograms (154 pounds) of bread and other food items to help provision the second camp. To meet the requirements, or perhaps because, as JSS leaders reported on May 29, German authorities had informed them that all the Jews soon would be transferred to the same camps, the JSS and Jewish Council sent almost all their food stores along with the deportees.¹⁶

In June, local authorities in Konstantynów withdrew an offer to sell supplementary potato rations to the JSS, announced that only working Jews would receive ration cards, and threatened to deport nonworking Jews. Women and children joined the forced labor pool but discovered a day of labor entitled them to just 100 grams (3.5 ounces) of bread (previously the ration for nonworking Jews).¹⁷ Though nearly 75 percent of the Jews were starving, an insolvent JSS closed its community kitchen on August 11, 1942.¹⁸

On September 22, the day after Yom Kippur, a German official from Biała Podlaska gave the Konstantynów Jews until September 25 to report to the ghetto in Biała Podlaska. Oskar Pinkus, a fugitive from the August 1942 ghetto liquidation in Łosice, described the Konstantynów Jews voluntarily reporting to the railway station to be transferred to the ghetto.¹⁹ On September 25, the Jews still in Konstantynów probably were marched together with the remaining Jews in Janów Podlaski to the Biała Podlaska ghetto.

Between September 26 and October 1, a combined German security force composed of local Gendarmes, SS from Kreis Biała Podlaska and Kreis Radzyn, and members of Reserve Police Battalion 101 liquidated the Biała Podlaska ghetto. Small groups of “useful Jews” were sent to labor camps, mostly to the camps in Kobyłany and Małaszewicze Duże. At least 1,000 others deemed unfit for labor (mostly the sick, elderly, and young children) were executed at the Jewish cemetery. In the last week of September (mainly on September 26), members of Reserve Police Battalion 101 marched the remaining Jews to the nearly empty ghetto in Międzyrzec Podlaski.

On October 6 and 9, 1942, members of Reserve Police Battalion 101 cleared the Międzyrzec ghetto, sending its inmates, including almost all the surviving Konstantynów deportees, by rail to the Treblinka extermination facility. The SS shot dead the surviving prisoners at the Małaszewicze and Kobyłany camps in February and May 1944. On March 15, partisans liberated the Rogoźnica camp, enabling some of its 400 prisoners to flee before the SS arrived and ordered the remaining inmates to march to an unknown destination.²⁰

A number of Konstantynów Jews evaded the expulsion Aktions, jumped from the deportation trains to Treblinka, or escaped from either the final liquidation Aktions in the Międzyrzec ghetto in the spring and early summer of 1943 or the labor camps, to which they had been sent. The fugitives almost all were rounded up and killed. In June 1944, the nascent Polish anti-Communist underground murdered three Konstantynów Jews hidden in a forest bunker. Only a handful of Jews were alive upon Konstantynów's liberation in July. Most of the approximately 30 Konstantynów survivors spent the war in the Soviet interior.

SOURCES Secondary works touching on the history of the Konstantynów Jewish community during the Holocaust include Abraham Wein, Bracha Freundlich, and Wila Orbach, eds., Pinkas ha-kehillot. Encyclopaedia of Jewish Communities: Poland, vol. 7, Lublin and Kielce (Jerusalem: Yad Vashem, 1999), pp. 547–548; which appears in English translations in Arnon Rubin, The Rise and Fall of the Jewish Communities in Poland and Their Relics Today, vol. 2, District Lublin (Tel Aviv: Tel Aviv University Press, 2007), pp. 142–143; and on jewishgen.org. Meir Garbarz Gover, the translator of the JewishGen account, has added explanatory footnotes, based in part on interviews he conducted with survivors from Konstantynów and nearby communities. Some coverage of Konstantynów also appears in M.J. Fajgenbaum, Podlaskie in umkum: Nótitsn fun ħurben (Munich: Aroysgegebn fun der Tsentraler Historisher Komisy baym Ts. K. fun di bafrayte Yidn in der Amerikaner Zone in Daytshland, 1948), pp. 21–27, 46.

The published memoir by Łosice survivor Oscar Pinkus, The House of Ashes (Cleveland, OH: World Publishing Company, 1964), provides an account of Jewish life in Konstantynów in late August and September 1942 and depicts the struggle of Jews hidden in forests and villages near Konstantynów to survive after the liquidation of the region's ghettos. A contemporary press account appears in “Konstantynów n/B.,” Gazeta Żydowska, May 22, 1942, no. 60, p. 5.

Archival documentation pertaining to the Konstantynów Jewish community during World War II includes APL; AŻIH (e.g., 210/419, 211 [201, pp. 57, 87; 207, p. 42; 208, p. 63; 557–559]); IPN (ASG); IPN-Lu (e.g., 12/70/BP/1–2, 24/67/1–2, 39/67/1–3, 247/67/1–2, 270/69/BP/1–2); USHMM (e.g., Acc.1997.A.0124 [AŻIH 211]; Acc.1999.A.0154 [AŻIH 210]; RG-15.019M [IPN ASG], reel 15 [49/3–5, 14–15, 130]); and YVA (e.g., M-1/E [1281, 3371]; O-3 [2181, 2230, 2723]).

Laura Crago

NOTES

1. Gazeta Żydowska, May 22, 1942, no. 60, p. 5.
2. USHMM, Acc.1999.A.0154 (AŻIH), 210/419, pp. 5–8.
3. Ibid., pp. 9–12.
4. Ibid., Acc.1997.A.0124 (AŻIH), 211/557, pp. 26–27.
5. Ibid., p. 12.
6. Ibid., p. 20.
7. Ibid., pp. 35–36; 211/559, p. 2.
8. Ibid., 211/557, pp. 12, 20.
9. Ibid., p. 23; 211/559, p. 13; Pinkus, The House of Ashes, pp. 97–99.
10. USHMM, Acc.1997.A.0124, 211/558, p. 2.
11. Ibid., pp. 33–34.
12. Ibid., p. 2.
13. Ibid., 211/557, pp. 20, 23, 27.
14. Ibid., 211/558, pp. 20–22, 24, 27, 30–31, 35; 211/207, p. 42.
15. Ibid., 211/559, pp. 2–3, 8–10, 15–24.
16. Ibid., pp. 38, 45.
17. Ibid., pp. 44–45.
18. Ibid., pp. 49, 53.
19. Pinkus, The House of Ashes, p. 100.
20. USHMM, RG-15.019M (IPN), reel 15, 49/130.

KRAŚNIK

Pre-1939: Kraśnik (Yiddish: Krasbnik), town, Janów Lubelski powiat, Lublin województwo, Poland; 1939–1944: Krasnik, Kreis Janow Lubelski, Distrikt Lublin, Generalgouvernement; post-1998: Kraśnik, Lublin województwo, Poland

Kraśnik lies 50 kilometers (31 miles) south-southwest of Lublin. In August 1939, its 16,747 residents included 5,132 Jews.

The Germans occupied Kraśnik on September 15, 1939. With the October 10 appointment of Otto Stössenreuther as Kreishauptmann of Janow Lubelski, the task of establishing a civilian administration for Kraśnik was almost complete. In August 1940, Stössenreuther was succeeded by Hennig von Winterfeld; then in October 1940, by Hans-Adolf Asbach; and finally in August 1941, by Kurt Lenk.

In December 1939, the Germans ordered a 12-member Jewish Council (Judenrat) established. Its chair in the spring of 1942 was Jankiel Wajsbrot. A 12-member unit of Jewish Police (Jüdischer Ordnungsdienst) was recruited.

Hundreds of Jews displaced by war devastation, mainly in Janów (Lubelski), resettled in Kraśnik. In December 1939, 1,230 Jewish expellees arrived from Łódź. By January 1941, 6,300 Jews, including 800 refugees, were residing in Kraśnik.

Plans to concentrate German troops in Kraśnik, for the June 1941 invasion of the Soviet Union, saw Asbach reduce, rather than ghettoize, the Jewish population. On January 23, the Kreishauptmann ordered 1,000 Jews expelled to Radomyśl nad Sanem, whose 350-member Jewish community already had swelled to 550 in September and October 1939 with the arrival of San River expellees, including Jews from Tarnobrzeg, Rozwadów, and Nisko. Between February 1 and 10, 1941, Polish (Blue) Police transferred 700 Kraśnik Jews to

A Jewish man, wearing an armband, carries a large piece of furniture on his back in Kraśnik, n.d.

USHMM WS #18602, COURTESY OF ŻIH IMIENIA EMANUELA RINGELBLUMA

Radomyśl. Most expellees (90 percent) were Łódź deportees. Conditions were dire. Some 600 expellees slept in the synagogue, on wooden bunks built one atop another. During the final February 20 transport, several hundred deportees fled. The police arrived with fewer than 50 people.¹

Upon becoming Kreishauptmann, Lenk demanded the police close 66 private Jewish enterprises and insisted German firms mobilize Jewish labor directly. The orders and the decision to transfer the Kreis administration from Janów to Kraśnik translated into a plan for the Schmitt & Junk construction firm to harness Jewish labor to build and refurbish buildings required for the move. By the late summer of 1941, the Heinkel Company mobilized additional Jews to convert a pre-war munitions factory in Dąbrowa-Bór, just north of Kraśnik, into an airplane repair facility. Other Jews built forestry service barracks and stables in the woods by Dąbrowa. When, in the summer of 1942, Odilo Globocnik, SS- und Polizeiführer (SSPF) for Distrikt Lublin, decided to transform the site into the Budzyń forced labor camp, Kraśnik Jews were mobilized to build the camp.

Probably because Lenk wanted to create residential living space for officials slated to be transferred to Kraśnik, the Jewish community was the first in the Kreis impacted by the deportations. In early April 1942, the Arbeitsamt (labor office) ordered Jews employed by German firms to have their work cards restamped. On April 12, the Gestapo, led by Gestapo chief Erich Augustin, and Gendarmes, assisted by Sonderdienst and Polish (Blue) Police units, forced the Jews to assemble at the market square. About 2,040 Jews without the stamps—mainly the elderly, children, and mothers with dependent children—were marched to the railway station and sent to be gassed at the Bełżec extermination facility. Another 500 Jews were shot in Kraśnik.² Some 2,671 Jews survived the deportation Aktion.

In late May 1942, Schmitt & Junk established the first closed labor camp in the Kreis at several buildings near the synagogue. The camp's 180 inmates, all artisans, were selected from throughout the Kreis to build furniture for the new offices of the Kreis administration. By July, 250 craftsmen were interned at the camp.³ In late September, Schmitt & Junk opened another closed labor camp, for 300 Jews mainly from Kraśnik. The inmates built fuel storage tanks near the railway station.

In late September 1942, the SS transformed the artisans' camp into a ghetto.⁴ Triangular in size, the ghetto included Bóznicza, Szkolna, Strażacka, Ogrodowa, and Gęsia Streets. To secure the area, a unit of Ukrainian SS auxiliaries took over a building on Olejna Street, opposite the ghetto.⁵ The artisans for whom the camp was constructed lived for most of September and October outside the ghetto, in private homes. (The Kraśnik Jews most impacted initially by the establishment of the ghetto were those whose residences were located behind its fence.)

The ghetto was used first to consolidate Jews from other parts of Kreis Janów Lubelski. The first Jews to arrive in late September were the residents of the expanded wartime Radomyśl nad Sanem gmina.⁶ Though Radomyśl was located much closer to a similar collection ghetto established in Zaklików, the Radomyśl Jews probably were ordered to Kraśnik because of the 400 Kraśnik expellees still residing there. The Gestapo also may have treated the gmina differently, as Lenk had used it from the spring of 1941 to resettle Jewish deportees to the Kreis, including in November some 384 expellees from Kraków, ordered to live in Radomyśl, Antoniów, and Chwałowice.⁷

Almost all the remaining Jews consolidated in the ghetto came from the northern half of the Kreis, defined roughly by an axis running east from Annopol (Annopol-Rachów) to Batorz. In Annopol, a Jewish community numbering 1,814 in August 1941, some 200 men were retained for labor at the Janiszów and Gościeradów labor camps before the October 15, 1942, expulsion. The Jewish residents of the neighboring Gościeradów and Kosin gminy probably were ordered to the ghetto at the same time.

In the Zakrzówek gmina, the approximately 1,100 Jews, mainly living in Zakrzówek, Bystrzyca, Studzianki, and Rudnik, learned on October 13, 1942, that they were to report to the ghetto by October 15. Adam Ulrich, the Polish technical director and site manager (Bauleiter) of the water melioration camp in Zakrzówek, reminded Arbeitsamt officials in Kraśnik of paperwork filed to retain the Jews for labor. The officials claimed they had never received it. Ulrich left for Lublin to procure the authorization. The Jews opted to wait, rather than report to the ghetto as ordered.⁸

As several dozen people crowded together in a single room in the ghetto, the Security Police began using the not-yet-opened Budzyń forced labor camp as a second collection ghetto for the Jews living in settlements north of Kraśnik, including in the Urzędów (375 Jews) and the Dzierzkowice (146 Jews) gminy. At Budzyń, men, destined to be the first inmates at the camp, and a few women resided in the stables. The remaining Jews, slated for deportation, lived at a heavily guarded family camp or ghetto established in another set of barracks.⁹

The SS began sending the Jews consolidated in the Kraśnik ghetto to their deaths at Bełżec around October 15, 1942. (Nuchim Rozenel mentions the deportations began in late September; Hersz Broner dates them to October 17.) All the Jews from the provinces were enveloped in the deportations, about which little is known. Immediately after the deportation, the Dzierzkowice and Urzędów Jews, imprisoned in the family ghetto in Budzyń, were brought (on truck and by foot) to the Kraśnik ghetto. They were sent the next day to their deaths at Bełżec.¹⁰

The Zakrzówek Jews were forcibly transferred to Kraśnik late on October 16, 1942. Upon returning the next day, Ulrich discovered the 250 Jews that Lublin officials had promised would be retained at the Zakrzówek camp had been imprisoned instead at Budzyń. The remaining Jews had been sent to the Kraśnik ghetto. Kazimierz Cieśllicki, a Polish-Christian, recalled the SS executed all the Zakrzówek Jews for defying orders and arriving in the ghetto late.¹¹

After the execution, Kraśnik Jews living at work sites and in other places in town were ordered to reside permanently in the ghetto.¹² On November 1, 1942, Lenk invited 300 Jews, mainly the artisan camp inmates, to meet at a local school. The invitees were held captive for 24 hours while German Sicherheitspolizei (Security Police, or Sipo), under the leadership of Hantke, organized the final deportation. Hantke ordered the remaining ghetto inmates, mainly the wives and children of the school captives, to report to the mikveh (ritual Jewish bath) for showers and inoculations. The German police drove their half-naked victims from the building and forced them onto peasant carts waiting on the other side. Transported to Zaklików, the Jews were sent several days later to be gassed at Bełżec.¹³

As part of the expulsions, SS-Unterscharführer Otto Hantke, commandant of the Budzyń forced labor camp, chose about 150 Jewish men to be incarcerated at the camp but then sent 50 back to be expelled to Zaklików. He shot dead others, such as teenager Baruch Krumholz.¹⁴ Some 30 women, mainly the daughters and wives of Jewish Council members and Jewish policemen, probably also were transferred to Budzyń at this time.¹⁵ Removed from Budzyń by truck several weeks later, the women were sent to the Lublin airfield camp, by then used as the off-loading ramps for the Majdanek concentration camp.

In Kraśnik, Hantke announced that unemployed Jews defying orders to report to Zaklików would be shot. The Germans and Ukrainian SS auxiliaries rounded up Jews, including 6 women employed at the Społem food wholesaler, and executed them at the Jewish cemetery. Hundreds tried to escape. Those caught were imprisoned at the synagogue. On November 4, 1942, some 120 prisoners, including 25 female servants of German officials added to the group, also were shot at the cemetery.

Lenk required construction laborers in Kraśnik to finish the German police and trade association building on Piłsudski Street. On November 15, 1942, Hantke ordered the laborers and a ghetto-clearing crew assembled at the square. Some 500 men were marched to Budzyń. The 230 remaining Jews, imprisoned at the synagogue, were shot the next day at the Jewish cemetery.¹⁶

By late November 1942, 300 Jews officially remained in Kraśnik, including about 200 mainly artisans confined to the former ghetto. On November 23, the SS in Lublin assumed control of the ghetto, which officially became a forced labor camp. In late June 1944, the 295 surviving Jews in Kraśnik's two labor camps were sent to the Płaszów concentration camp.

Of the approximately 7,500 Jews who passed through the Kraśnik ghetto, 400 to 500 survived. Almost all were native or wartime residents of Kraśnik.

A West German court convicted Hantke of many crimes, including murders committed during the Kraśnik deportations. In 1974, he received a life sentence.

SOURCES Secondary sources touching on the wartime history of the Kraśnik Jewish community include Abraham Wein, Bracha Freundlich, and Wila Orbach, eds., Pinkas bakhilot. Encyclopaedia of Jewish Communities: Poland, vol. 7, Lublin and Kielce (Jerusalem: Yad Vashem, 1999), pp. 519–523; and its English-language counterpart, Arnon Rubin, The Rise and Fall of the Jewish Communities in Poland and Their Relics Today, vol. 2, District Lublin (Tel Aviv: Tel Aviv University Press, 2007), pp. 153–158.

Among the few published testimonies from survivors are Fiszel Swerdszarf, Testimonio (La Paz: Círculo Israelita, 1988); and those published in the yizkor book, David Shtokfish, ed., Sefer Krasnik (Tel Aviv: Irgun yots'e Krashnik be-Medinat Yisrael uva-tefutsot, 1973). Part of the book, translated in English on jewishgen.org, is a scholarly survey by Tatiana Berenstein, particularly valuable for those interested in Jewish life in Kraśnik before the establishment of the ghetto in September 1942.

Contemporary wartime press documentation includes a discussion of the April 1942 deportation in “Jüngste Kreishauptstadt im GG,” Krakauer Zeitung, May 5, 1942. Verdicts of postwar German trials can be found in DDR-Justiz und NS-Verbrechen, vol. 1 (Amsterdam: Amsterdam University Press, 2002), Lfd. Nr. 1005; and in Justiz und NS-Verbrechen (Amsterdam: Amsterdam University Press, 1972, 2008, 2009), vols. 8, 39, and 40, Lfd. Nr. 289, 812 (for Hantke), and 813.

Additional documentation on the fate of the Kraśnik Jews and of the Jews from the communities consolidated in the Kraśnik ghetto can be found in the following archives: APL; APL-Kraśnik; AŻIH (e.g., 210/435, 211 [459, pp. 2, 8, 13, 16–20, 25, 42, 63, 66, 77; 460, pp. 8–9, 20–23, 31, 34, 38; 461, pp. 1–3, 6, 12, 15, 32–33, 37, 40–43; 462, pp. 2, 34, 41; 608–610], 301 [275, 542, 1292, 1516, 2221, 2544, 2845, 3324, 4348, 4399], 302/277); BA-BL (R 52III/30); BA-L (208 AR-Z 74/60, 8 AR-Z 384/61); IFZ (Gm 07.94/9; Ga 02.05; Gy 35; Gh 02.38/2; Gh 02.45/1+2); IPN (e.g., ASG, SAL [107–108, 185], SOL 171, SSKL 292); IPN-Lu (e.g., 34/67); LG-Hamb (147 Ks 2/72, 147 Ks 1/74, 147 Ks 3/72, [50] 23/73); LG-Mü I (1 Ks 2/51); Sta. Amberg (2 Js 930/64); Sta. München (116 Js 2/67); USHMM (e.g., Acc.1997.A.0124 [AŻIH 211]; Acc.1999.A.0154 [AŻIH 210]); VHF (e.g., # 1861, 24001); and YVA (e.g., M-49/1516; O-3 [2184, 2780, 2941, 3603, 4242, 4245, 4312, 5004, 5224]).

Of the Jewish communities mentioned in the entry and located during the war in Kreis Janow Lubelski but not receiving coverage elsewhere in this volume, in Zakrzówek, leaders of the local branch of the Jewish Social Self-Help (JSS) reported on the organization's April 1942 ghetto questionnaire that no ghetto, either open or closed, existed anywhere in the gmina. Here, see USHMM, Acc.1997.A.0124, 211/1145, p. 48. The evidence is insufficient to determine whether ghettos were established in Batorz, Kosin, or Gościeradów, communities for which almost no documentation has survived.

The JSS in Annopol-Rachów did not return a ghetto questionnaire, but scholars have long held that an open ghetto existed there, based on the testimony of Eli Fishman in the Annopol yizkor book, Shemu'el Nitsan, ed., Raḥov-Annopol: Pirke 'edut ve-zikaron (Tel Aviv: Irgun yots'e Raḥov-Annopol vehasevivah, 1978), available in a complete English translation at jewishgen.org. However, the reference probably was added by the editor, as Fishman in a subsequent testimony, at VHF, # 14967, went out of his way to emphasize that the Jews in Annopol were not confined to a ghetto but rather were subjected to limitations on movement, which applied to Jews throughout the Generalgouvernement from November 1941. After surveying all the available Jewish documentation for Annopol in the USHMM and VHF collections and finding no mention of a ghetto, the editors decided to exclude it from this volume.

The documentation is more mixed for Radomyśl nad Sanem. On one level, Lenk, upon ordering the November 1941 Kraków expellees resettled there, also dispersed the new arrivals and a part of the Kraśnik expellees among the three major Jewish communities (Radomyśl, Antoniów, and Chwałowice) in the expanded wartime Radomyśl nad Sanem gmina. The arrival of so many Jews in the smaller communities may have resulted in ghettoization orders, as Henryk Proper notes occurred in Antoniów, in the testimony at AŻIH, 301/2544, pp. 1–2. Unfortunately, the Radomyśl JSS, which represented the Jews in the entire gmina, never once mentioned any ghettos existing there and did not return the organization's April 1942 ghetto questionnaire. In the absence of corroborating testimonies from survivors or German documentation mentioning the presence of a ghetto, the editors had little choice but to conclude the evidence insufficient at this point to include entries for Radomyśl, Antoniów, and Chwałowice.

Laura Crago

VOLUME II: PART A

NOTES

1. USHMM, Acc.1999.A.0154 (AŻIH), 210/284, pp. 5–8; Acc.1997.A.0124 (AŻIH), 211/870, pp. 8–20, 27.
2. AŻIH, 301/2221, testimony of Nuchim Rozenel, p. 2; 301/1516, testimony of Abraham Olender, p. 2; USHMM, Acc.1997.A.0124, 211/608, p. 34.
3. USHMM, Acc.1997.A.0124, 211/610, pp. 16, 30, 34.
4. AŻIH, 301/3324, testimony of Hadasa Mincberg, p. 4.
5. Ibid., 302/277, testimony of Kazimierz Cieśllicki, p. 33.
6. Ibid., 301/2544, testimony of Henryk Proper, p. 2; 301/4399, testimony of Szulim Garen, p. 1.
7. USHMM, Acc.1997.A.0124, 211/871, p. 49.
8. AŻIH, 301/2845, testimony of Adam Ulrich, p. 18.
9. VHF, # 1861, testimony of Gary Flumenbaum.
10. Ibid.; AŻIH, 301/2221, pp. 2–3; 301/275, testimony of Hersz Broner, p. 1.
11. AŻIH, 302/277, p. 34; VHF, # 24001, testimony of Abraham Ehrenberg.
12. AŻIH, 301/275, p. 1.
13. Ibid., 301/3324, pp. 2–3; 301/2221, p. 3.
14. IfZ, Gh 02.38/2, verdict of LG-Hamb, (50) 23/73, pp. 43–44, 144ff.
15. AŻIH, 301/1516, p. 4.
16. Ibid., 301/2221, pp. 3–4.

KRASNYSTAW

Pre-1939: Krasnystaw (Yiddish: Krasnistov), town, Krasnystaw powiat, Lublin województwo, Poland; 1939–1944: Kreis Krasnystaw, Distrikt Lublin, Generalgouvernement; post-1998: Lublin województwo, Poland

Krasnystaw lies 54 kilometers (33.5 miles) southeast of Lublin. In August 1939, its approximately 10,000 residents included about 2,500 Jews.

The Germans occupied Krasnystaw after combating Polish troops on September 18, 1939. Seven Jews were blamed for this resistance and hanged. When the Poles renewed hostilities the Jews are forced to stack munitions under German army supervision in Krasnystaw, July 4, 1941.

USHMM WS #81512, COURTESY OF NARA

next day, the German military commander placed 40 Jewish hostages on the German front line. Thirteen were killed; many more were wounded. Around September 26, the Germans ceded Krasnystaw to Soviet forces. After a border demarcation returned the town to Germany, almost 1,000 Jews joined the Soviet military evacuation. Before the last Soviet troops crossed the Bug River on October 7–8, the Germans had reoccupied Krasnystaw.

Krasnystaw became the center of the German civilian administration for Kreis Krasnystaw. From October 1939, Hartmut Gerstenhauer was the Kreishauptmann. In October 1940, Hennig von Winterfeld succeeded him, then Claus Volkmann in April 1941, and Adolf Schmidt in August 1941. In November 1940, 13,500 to 14,500 Jews resided in the Kreis. The Krasnystaw Jewish community, numbering 1,200 to 1,500, was the third or fourth largest, behind Izbica (5,000 to 6,000), Turobin (2,600), and perhaps Żółkiewka (1,400).

In January 1940, Gerstenhauer ordered that Jewish Councils (Judenräte) were to be established. Lipa Rajchman and Dawid Zylbercan served as the chair and deputy chair of the Krasnystaw Jewish Council. The council organized forced labor conscription and collected contributions demanded by German authorities. Gerstenhauer also ordered Jews throughout the Kreis to Germanize their surnames. In a September 10, 1940, situation report, he explained to Hans Frank that the change, made to simplify record keeping, did not jeopardize German interests, for “when they go to Madagascar after the war, the Jews can get themselves Madagascan names there.”¹

On August 9, 1940, Gerstenhauer gave the Jews three days to report to a ghetto located in the Grobla neighborhood. Known for its small wooden homes and absence of electricity and central plumbing, Grobla was the poorest Jewish neighborhood in Krasnystaw. Gerstenhauer limited the items the Jews could bring to small quantities of clothing and bedding.²

The unfenced, or open, one-street ghetto was among the earliest established in Distrikt Lublin. It was more isolated than most, because the Wieprz River separated Grobla from the rest of the town. Gerstenhauer gradually restricted the Jews to the ghetto. In the aforementioned situation report, the Kreishauptmann explained he had banned Jews from his offices, because the German administration was “besieged . . . with Jews naturally excited about the relocation of the Jews to the ghetto.”³ Gerstenhauer soon prohibited Jews from entering central Krasnystaw, except for work.

There were not enough residences in the ghetto to accommodate all the Jews. The homeless crowded into the synagogue or slept outside. No place existed for the Jewish Council to re-establish its medical clinic. Conscripted for forced labor, the ghetto inmates cleared war devastation, reconstructed burned-out buildings, and rebuilt a bridge over the Wieprz. Zylbercan admitted more than half the Jews did not have a crumb of bread to eat. Rather than establish welfare institutions, the Jewish Council from October 1940 protested and delayed until late April 1941 the appointment of Michał Szolsohn, a popular Talmud Torah activist, to head the Krasnystaw branch of the Jewish Social Self-Help (JSS) organization.⁴

In a February 11, 1941, report in Gazeta Żydowska, the Jewish Council avoided mentioning the ghetto, while nonetheless indicating one existed. The report noted the Jews “had taken up residence in Grobla, where a Jewish ghetto [getto] was located many centuries ago.”⁵ Readers familiar with Polish history would recognize that bans on Jewish residence from 1569 to 1862 meant no Jewish quarter (rewir) ever had existed in Krasnystaw. The use of the word getto, rather than the more historically accurate rewir, presumably was intended.

Changes in German policies likely necessitated the bending of history. Generally, German authorities in Distrikt Lublin were required to provide Jews in ghettos limited rations. From December 2, 1940, they also could exclude Jews from the ration pool. Gerstenhauer and his successors chose the second option for the unemployed. Only from November 1941, when Jews throughout the Generalgouvernement were confined, on pain of death, to their places of registration, did the Kreishauptmannschaft (Kreis authorities) permit the 15,708 unemployed Jews (out of an expanded population of 18,493) to purchase potatoes (once) and very small amounts of bread (or flour) and sugar (regularly) from cheaper government stores.⁶

Though the Gazeta Żydowska report mentioned the community soon would be allowed to return to central Krasnystaw, Kreishauptmann Claus Volkmann permitted only a few Jews, probably craftsmen, to live in some buildings on May Third Square and just outside the ghetto on Mostowa and Kolejowa Streets.⁷ The Jews probably provided services to the local population and to Wehrmacht troops, concentrated in Krasnystaw before the June 22, 1941, invasion of the Soviet Union. On May 6, Volkmann ordered 950 to 1,250 ghetto inhabitants resettled in 15 villages in the Zakrzew gmina, located on the southwestern border of the Kreis, some 47 kilometers (29 miles) from Krasnystaw. Attacks on Jews by German soldiers and the burning of the synagogue probably provided the public rationale for the expulsions. By mid-June, just 250 to 300 Jews were residents of Krasnystaw.⁸

The Krasnystaw JSS provided services to the larger community, known as Zakrzew-Krasnystaw.⁹ Discovering subsistence difficult in Zakrzew, a gmina hitherto home to 30 Jews, the Krasnystaw expellees almost all departed just before the November 1941 orders permanently consigned Jews to their places of registration. About a fourth moved to Wysokie (koło Krasnegostawu). The rest settled closer to home, mainly in Kraśniczyn and Gorzków. By March 1942, just half the 200 Jews in the Zakrzew gmina were Krasnystaw expellees.¹⁰

By February 1942, 800 Jews were living in Krasnystaw. The fact that they received almost no charity assistance suggests only that the employed were permitted to reside with their immediate families in the ghetto. Some Jews worked for the municipal administration. Others labored at a munitions depot the Wehrmacht established outside of Krasnystaw by the Borek Woods.

On April 12, 1942, as many as 600 Krasnystaw Jews were expelled to Izbica together with Jews from nearby communities. Some 272 (of 435) Jews from the Siennica Różana gmina, 200 (of 378) in the Rybczewice gmina, and 556 (of 715) in Kraśniczyn were among the expellees. On April 16, Szalomon Griffen, head of the JSS in Fajslawice, reported the 220 Jews in his gmina, half of them employed at a German estate, were unscathed by a deportation, which had impacted Jews in every town and settlement in the Kreis and in the neighboring Łopiennik Górny and Rybczewice gminy.¹¹ The expellees probably were marched directly to the Izbica railway station and then sent to be gassed at the Bełżec extermination center.

Objections Kreishauptmann Schmidt raised to a March 1942 proposal by SS-Hauptsturmführer Hermann Höfle, one of the main architects of Operation Reinhard, to use Izbica to resettle Reich and Protectorate Jews help explain the early (for Distrikt Lublin) timing of the Krasnystaw deportations and perhaps why Jews in some places, most notably Krasnystaw and Kraśniczyn, almost all were murdered by April 1942. To overcome Schmidt's protests, Höfle promised to create room for the newcomers by first “relieving” certain localities of native Jews.¹² Höfle at least initially responded to Schmidt's concerns about overcrowding in Izbica by ordering thousands of the first Reich and Protectorate arrivals to several locations where most native Jews had been sent to their deaths.

After the April 1942 expulsions, 150 to 200 Jews remained in Krasnystaw. Probably at this time, the ghetto and the Wehrmacht armory were fenced with barbed wire. The latter was designated a Jewish labor camp.

In late April 1942, the Germans ordered 23 Reich Jews from Izbica to Krasnystaw. On April 28, a transport of 853 to 1,000 Reich Jews, officially destined for Izbica, arrived in Krasnystaw. The passengers—Jews from Bamberg (103 people), Fürth, Nuremberg, Schweinfurt, and Würzburg—were resettled instead in Kraśniczyn. On May 3, another Krasnystaw transport of 1,000 Reich Jews was ordered to Kraśniczyn. In late April, 250 German expellees, some from Breslau, were transferred from Izbica to Kraśniczyn. They joined 500 Czech and Slovak Jews, from a March 13 Terezín transport to Izbica, ordered to Kraśniczyn on March 18. Some 400 Czech and Slovak Jews probably were imprisoned at the Wehrmacht camp outside of Krasnystaw. On May 7, Schmidt ordered the Krasnystaw JSS to establish a kitchen for workers, including 40 Reich deportees.¹³

Before May 12, 1942, the Gestapo established a fenced collection, or transit, ghetto in Krasnystaw. Abutting the Grobla ghetto, the collection ghetto included an unfinished school and barracks for railway laborers.

On May 13, the Gestapo, Ukrainian SS auxiliaries, Polish police and civilian guards, local Jewish Police, and Czech Jewish Police reinforcements (probably from Izbica) transferred most of the Jews from the southern part of the Kreis to the collection ghetto.¹⁴ Survivor Dov Freiberg, among 2,000 (of 3,500) expellees from Turobin, recalls first marching to Wysokie to pick up the Jewish community (approximately 800 people), then to Żółkiewka, where some 1,300 (of approximately 2,200) Jews were joined to the column. Among the latter were the remaining 178 to 200 Jews from Rybczewice ordered to Żółkiewka on May 7. In Gorzków, 1,000 (of 1,800) Jews were added to the march. Some 248 Jews from the Rudnik gmina, 200 from the Zakrzew gmina including 100 Krasnystaw expellees, and all the Jews in the Łopiennik Górny gmina also were expelled to the ghetto.

Almost all the approximately 5,800 Jews imprisoned in the collection ghetto slept outside. The next day, on May 14, 1942, the Gestapo chose some 600 to 700 inmates for deportation to the Majdanek concentration camp.¹⁵ The remaining 5,100 to 5,200 Jews were sent to be gassed at Sobibór on May 14 and 15.

Among the May 15 deportees were Michał Szolsohn and his wife, added to the fifth Sobibór transport in an act of “personal retribution.” Szolsohn’s son defied a gag order and sent two telegrams that day, appealing to JSS leaders in Kraków to obtain his parents’ release.¹⁶ The JSS could do little, as the Szolsohns were gassed on arrival. Postal officials in Krasnystaw, moreover, sent the second telegram, in which Sobibór was listed as the couple’s destination, only on May 31. The telegram nonetheless is historically significant as it is the first time Sobibór was named as the place of deportation for the Krasnystaw Jews. It also is the earliest known direct reference to the killing center in any Polish-language documentation.

After the Jews were sent to their deaths, the SS consolidated in the collection ghetto almost all the Jews from Kraśniczyn. (Several hundred Jews were retained for labor at an estate in Bończa; 300 Reich and Protectorate deportees were interned at the so-called Augustówka labor camp, actually located in Surhów and Małochwiej Duży.) Some 1,000 Czech and Slovak Jews, transferred from Izbica to Gorzków in mid-March 1942, were included in the expulsion.¹⁷ The approximately 3,000 to 4,000 Jews were sent to their deaths at Sobibór.

On June 18, 1942, Szolsohn’s deputy reported to JSS leaders in Kraków that no Jews remained in Kraśniczyn, Wysokie, and Rudnik or in the Łopiennik, Rybczewice, and Zakrzew gminy. Of the 8,000 Jews held back from the expulsion residing outside of labor camps, 45 percent were Reich or Protectorate deportees (3,500 in Izbica and 70 in Krasnystaw).¹⁸ In Krasnystaw, Turobin, Żółkiewka, and Gorzków, only remnant native communities remained. The 221 Jews in the Fajslawice gmina were untouched by the deportation. Some Jews remained in the Siennica Różana gmina. Approximately 4,500 surviving Jews were employed.¹⁹

Following the deportation, the Krasnystaw Jews mainly cleared possessions from the ghetto. Some clearing crew laborers were sent to the Trawniki labor camp, probably in late August 1942, during the next major expulsion (mainly of agricultural laborers to Sobibór).

In October, the Krasnystaw ghetto was liquidated. All Jews in the Kreis living outside of labor camps were ordered to the Izbica ghetto. From there, the Jews were sent to be gassed, mainly at Bełżec but also Sobibór. A small group, including former Jewish Council members Leon Feldhändler (from Żółkiewka) and Moszek Merenstein (from Gorzków), were retained for labor at Sobibór.

A handful of Jews survived the Krasnystaw ghettos. Almost all the Grobla survivors were spring 1941 expellees who never reported to the Krasnystaw collection ghetto. The survivors of the Krasnystaw collection ghetto mainly were men, such as Dov Freiberg, retained for labor at Sobibór, who joined the October 1943 prisoners’ uprising.

SOURCES Secondary sources with coverage of the Krasnystaw Jewish community and the communities consolidated in the Krasnystaw collection ghetto include the relevant entries in Abraham Wein, Bracha Freundlich, and Wila Orbach, eds., Pinkas ha-kehillot. Encyclopaedia of Jewish Communities: Poland, vol. 7, Lublin and Kielce (Jerusalem: Yad Vashem, 1999), pp. 515–518 (Krasnystaw), pp. 118–119 (Gorzków), pp. 169–179 (Wysokie), pp. 196–198 (Żółkiewka), pp. 241–244 (Turobin), all available in English translations, by Morris Gradel, at jewishgen.org, and pp. 518–519 (Kraśniczyn).

A contribution by Robert Kuwałek about the Krasnystaw ghetto is located on the Web sites of the Holocaust Education & Archive Research Team and the Aktion Reinhard Camps (ARC). Kuwałek provides an overview of the Reich and Protectorate Jews expelled to Distrikt Lublin in “Getta tranzytowe w dystryktie lubelskim,” in Dariusz Libionka, ed., Akcja Reinhardt. Zagłada Żydów w Generalnym Gubernatorstwie (Warsaw: IPN, 2004), pp. 138–160, with the book also available in a German translation. It is best read together with the relevant table in Tatiana Berenstein, “Martyrologia, opór i zagłada ludności żydowskiej w dystryktie lubelskim,” BŻIH no. 21 (1957): 70–72.

A published English-language testimony from survivor Maria Binder Greber can be found in Wiktoria Śliwowska, ed., The Last Eyewitnesses: Children of the Holocaust Speak, trans. Julian and Fay Bussgang (Evanston, IL: Northwestern University Press, 1998), vol. 1, p. 75. The most compelling account of the Krasnystaw collection ghetto can be found in the memoir of Turobin survivor Dov Freiberg, To Survive Sobibor (Jerusalem and New York: Gefen, 2007). Additional testimonies from Krasnystaw survivors can be found in the yizkor book, Aryeh Shtuntsaiger, ed., Yizker tsum ondenk fun di kedoyshyey Krasnistov (Munich: Farlag “Bafrayung” baym Ts. K. “Po’ale-Tsiyon,” 1948); and also include Mordechai Puterman, Lebns-geshikhte fun a pshtutn Yid (Tel Aviv: H. Leyvik-Farlag, 1983). There also is a yizkor book for Turobin: Me’ir Shim’on Geshuri, ed., Sefer Turbin: Pinkas zikaron (Tel Aviv: Irgun yots’e Turbin be-Yisrael).

Published documentation includes in Józef Kermisz, ed., Dokumenty i materiały do dziejów okupacji niemieckiej w Polsce, vol. 2, Akcje i wysiedlenia (Łódź: CŻKHWP, 1946), pt. 1, p. 51, an April 16, 1942, telegram from officials at the Department of Population and Welfare (BuF) in Kraków to the Krasnystaw Kreishauptmann and the Governor of Distrikt Lublin outlining ground rules for better communication between the SS and civilian officials during future expulsions, which scholars use to date the deportation to Bełżec of a large part of the Krasnystaw Jewish community. Contemporary press coverage includes “Krasnystaw,” Gazeta Żydowska, February 11, 1941, no. 12, p. 7.

Additional documentation for the Krasnystaw Jewish community and the Jewish communities consolidated in the Krasnystaw collection ghetto can be found in the following archives: APL (e.g., GDL 273, p. 19); AŻIH (e.g., 210 [433 (Krasnystaw), 347 (Gorzków), 434 (Kraśniczyn), 605 (Rybczewice)], 211 [600–607 (Krasnystaw and Kreis Krasnystaw), 381–382 (Fajslawice), 423 (Gorzków), 597 (Kraśniczyn), 914 (Rybczewice), 954 (Siennica Różana), 1047 (Turobin), 1134–1136 (Wysokie), 1187–1188 (Żółkiewka), 301 [e.g., 1303, 1885, 5390 (Krasnystaw), 2785 (Gorzków), 11 (Turobin), 72, 104, 1204 (Żółkiewka)]; BA-BL (R 52III/23, pp. 76–81); IPN (e.g., ASG, SAL [12 (Żółkiewka, Poperczyn), 112 (Zakrzew gmina), 118 and 177 (Krasnystaw, Jaślików), 130 (Turobin), 148–149 (Łopiennik Górny), 164 (Kraśniczyn, Brzeziny)], SOL [62 and 76 (Krasnystaw), 114 (Żółkiewka), 149 (Łopiennik Górny)]; IPN-Lu (e.g., 98/67/1-5 [Krasnystaw], 192/67/1-3 [Krasnystaw collection ghetto], 245/67/1-2 [Fajslawice], 414/67/1-2 [Łopiennik Górny], 286/67 [Rudnik], 258/67 [Rybczewice gmina, aka Piłaskowice], 348/67/1-2 [Siennica Różana aka Wierzchowiny], 19/67/1-2 [Surhów-Augustówka], 369/67 [Turobin], 297/67/1-2 [Żółkiewka]); USHMM (e.g., Acc.1997.A.0124 [AŻIH 211]; Acc.1999.A.0154 [AŻIH 210]); VHF (e.g., # 5789, 10690, 12282, 25543, 31407, 32182 [Krasnystaw], 40445 [Gorzków], 27443 [Siennica Różana], 7829, 12564, 25359, 45226 [Turobin], 1609 [Żółkiewka]); and YVA (e.g., O-16/1885 [Krasnystaw], O-3 [2923, 2940] [Turobin], O-3 [230, 11687, 2309, 2940], and O-16 [464, 1204] [Żółkiewka]).

Of the Krasnystaw communities mentioned in the entry but not accorded separate treatment in this volume, most survivors agree that no ghettos were established prior to the May 1942 deportations in Turobin, Żółkiewka, Gorzków, and Wysokie. Icek Lerer is an exception. In VHF, # 1609, he reports the November 1941 proscriptions on movement transformed all of Żółkiewka into an open ghetto. The Jews in Siennica Różana, Fajslawice, and Zakrzew lived dispersed across the three gminy and were never consolidated in ghettos. In Fajslawice, Szalomon Griffen responded negatively on the April 1942 JSS ghetto questionnaire, at USHMM, Acc. 1997.A.0124, 211/382, p. 35. Little is known about the specific conditions in which Jews lived in the Rudnik and Łopiennik Górny gminy prior to the May expulsions.

Though it seems likely remnant ghettos were established in communities such as Żółkiewka, Gorzków, and Turobin, where small numbers of Jews were retained for labor after the May 1942 expulsions, Leon Feldhändler and Moszek Merenstein do not recall such ghettos existing in either Żółkiewka or Gorzków. Feldhändler, the former head of the Jewish Council in Żółkiewka, in a testimony at AŻIH, 301/72, written shortly before his murder in Lublin in March 1945, noted: “The Jewish Council negotiated with officials from the Kreishauptmann’s office to overcome the threatening insecurity of a ghetto.” Merenstein, in his testimony at AŻIH, 301/2785, reported he resided and worked at Baranica (his former estate outside of Gorzków) until the Jews in the Kreis were ordered to Izbica in October 1942. There are no testimonies from survivors of the Turobin remnant community. Given the absence of documentation for Turobin and of corroborative documentation for Feldhändler’s and Merenstein’s claims, the editors of the volume concluded the evidence at this point insufficient to determine that remnant ghettos were established in Żółkiewka, Gorzków, and Turobin.

Laura Crago

NOTES

1. BA-L, R 52III/23, p. 81.
2. USHMM, Acc.1999.A.0154 (AŻIH, AJDC), 210/433, pp. 35–36.

3. BA-L, R 52III/23, p. 81.
4. USHMM, Acc.1997.A.0124 (AŻIH, JSS), 211/601, pp. 1–2, 5–8, 12–14, 25–26, 70; 211/602, p. 1.
5. “Krasnystaw,” Gazeta Żydowska, February 11, 1941, no. 12, p. 7.
6. USHMM, Acc.1997.A.0124, 211/600, pp. 18–19; 211/601, p. 39; 211/604, pp. 6, 26; 211/605, pp. 1, 6, 8, 26–27; 211/606, p. 9.
7. Ibid., 211/602, p. 15.
8. Ibid., pp. 5, 9–10, 39–40, 62–63.
9. Ibid., p. 67.
10. Ibid., 211/954, p. 2; 211/606, pp. 69–70.
11. Ibid., 211/606, pp. 65, 73, 88; 211/382, p. 20.
12. APL, GDL, 273, p. 19, Richard Türk BuF Lublin notes, “Removal of Jews” (Judenaussiedlung), March 20, 1942, cited in Kuwałek, “Getta tranzytowe,” p. 142.
13. USHMM, Acc.1997.A.0124, 211/606, pp. 31 66, 73, 84, 86, 88.
14. Ibid., 211/1188, p. 21a, for date.
15. AŻIH, 301/1204, testimony of Icek Lichtmann, p. 1.
16. USHMM, Acc.1997.A.0124, 211/606, p. 89; 211/607, pp. 4, 27–28.
17. Ibid., 211/606, pp. 33, 40; 211/607, pp. 10, 40–41.
18. Ibid., 211/607, pp. 3, 15.
19. Ibid., 211/382, pp. 20, 23, 27.

KURÓW

Pre-1939: Kurów (Yiddish: Koriv), village, Puławy powiat, Lublin województwo, Poland; 1939–1944: Kurow, Kreis Pulawy, Distrikt Lublin, Generalgouvernement; post-1998: Kurów, Puławy powiat, Lublin województwo, Poland

Kurów lies 33 kilometers (20.5 miles) northwest of Lublin. Its pre-war 1939 population of 4,635 included 2,571 Jews.

On September 9, 1939, fires sparked by Luftwaffe bombardment destroyed about 120 (all but 3) Jewish-owned buildings in Kurów. Left homeless, the Jews fled to a number of towns and villages, including Wąwolnica, Kazimierz Dolny, Ryki, Opole, and Lublin. On September 15, a Wehrmacht unit briefly occupied Kurów. The soldiers compelled the few Jews remaining there to clear rubble. Some local Poles helped the soldiers search devastated Jewish homes for valuables.

Some 300 Jewish families never returned to Kurów. However, from January 1940, local officials in several localities began to order the Kurów refugees home. Former Kurów residents made up almost all the 40 Jewish families expelled from Wąwolnica and Kazimierz Dolny to Kurów in April 1941. A few families from Lublin were also among the April expellees.¹ The wealthiest among the early returnees purchased abandoned stables from peasants, salvaged the lumber, and built wooden sheds in which to live. Most Jews lived in the cellars of burned-out houses or in holes dug in fields.

A German civil administration was established for Kurów, perhaps not until January 1940. It was headed by Ulrich, a local ethnic German. Also in January, the Jews were ordered to form a six-member Jewish Council (Judenrat). Its chair was Abraham Goldberg.

The Judenrat collected taxes and contributions demanded by German authorities. From June 1940, it was ordered to organize forced labor brigades to raze central Kurów and to pulverize bricks from the war-devastated structures, including the synagogue and ultimately the matzevot (gravestones) from the Jewish cemetery. The materials were used to pave the road from Kurów to Klementowice and to improve the railway track bed near Klementowice. In June 1940, the Judenrat conscripted laborers for a Judenlager in Janiszów (pre-war Janów powiat), on the Vistula River, to dig trenches for a flood control project. In June 1941, the council was required to send 28 men to a labor camp in Lublin. Thirteen of the conscripts were the most impoverished Jews in Kurów.²

Restrictions imposed on Jewish movement beyond Kurów in the early spring of 1941, probably several months before the German invasion of the Soviet Union, on June 22, 1941, effectively transformed Kurów into an open ghetto. The orders forbade Jews from leaving Kurów without permission. Moty Glazer was shot for disobeying the order.

With the arrival of more than 1,000 deportees from Warsaw in July 1941, a Jewish quarter was established. The Warsaw Jews more than tripled the Jewish population to 1,522 in September and 1,700 by October.³ They likely were resettled in Kurów for road and railway labor. The expellees were confined to a specifically designated neighborhood set apart from the Polish neighborhood. It was composed of just a few streets. The absence of housing likely provided a reason for establishing the ghetto. The Jewish Council received permission in November to construct additional shelter for a number of homeless deportee families.⁴ Some Kurów Jews also resided in the Jewish quarter. Survivor Helen Kotlar (Kotlarz), for example, remembers local Jews sneaking out in late summer and early fall of 1941 from what she described as the “prescribed area” to form minyanim at her house on the outskirts of Kurów and to say Kaddish for her mother-in-law.⁵ Kotlar’s remarks indicate ghettoization was not total; some native Jews continued to live outside the ghetto.

Many of the Warsaw Jews had contracted typhoid fever during the deportations. Several died within days of resettlement. To curb the spread of the disease, the Jewish Council established a quarantine facility for new arrivals in July 1941.⁶ Hundreds of Jews, including many native Kurów Jews, nonetheless became ill. The Kurów Jewish Social Self-Help (JSS) provided free medicines to treat the sick. Because Kurów’s only physician was banned from seeing Jews, the JSS secured permission and paid to transport the most critical patients to an infectious disease hospital in Puławy. As scores perished, the JSS ended the practice of financially assisting local families to feed the most impoverished refugees. From the late fall of 1941, a communal kitchen offered reduced-cost dinners for the sick and indigent. In February 1942, the kitchen served 5,750 subsidized meals.⁷

By the winter of 1941–1942, a tannery and a workshop established by Ulrich to transform rabbit skins into winter coats and gloves for the Wehrmacht employed about 20 Kurów Jews. (These workshops employed mostly non-Jews.) Almost all the Jewish tannery laborers from Kurów were family members of Judenrat officials.⁸ Kotlar remembers Ulrich appointing a Lubliner Jew, who had saved his life during World War I, to head the tannery, which employed another 20 Jews from Lublin.⁹ Conscripted to remove snow from the road from Kurów to Markuszów, a part of the main highway leading from Warsaw to Lublin, the ghetto inmates were subjected to exhausting work while being humiliated and beaten by the German soldiers supervising the work.

Denunciations by local Poles led to the arrest of several Jews for bartering material goods for food. German Gendarmes searched the lean-to of Mirl Merimberg, a woman with an illicit shoemaking workshop, confiscated her tools, and beat her severely. In late March 1942, on the eve of Passover, orders forbade Jews from baking matzot, which was a “privilege” accorded to Jews in Kreis Lublin. A Pole offered his oven to Jewish women to bake the unleavened bread illicitly. The women sneaked over to his house after midnight to cleanse the oven. Several Poles assisted in baking the matzot.¹⁰

On April 8, or perhaps May 8, 1942, a small SS contingent, including Ukrainian auxiliaries, arrived in Kurów to liquidate the ghetto. (Most Jewish survivors remember the expulsions as occurring in April, during Passover.) The Jews were ordered to assemble in front of the Judenrat building for “resettlement.” About 32 people, including 20 Kurów Jews, were retained for labor at the tannery. Only 1 woman, a cook, was held back from the expulsion. The remaining Jews were marched to Końskowola, about 9.6 kilometers (6 miles) west-northwest of Kurów.¹¹ About 20 people were murdered during the march. Imprisoned overnight in wooden barracks in Końskowola, the Kurów Jews were marched to the train station (located closer to Puławy) the next morning and forced onto trains destined either for the Sobibór or the Bełżec extermination camp.¹²

In July 1942, the 32 Jews officially held back for labor were ordered to reside in a closed ghetto. The postwar Polish Court Inquiries about Executions, Mass Graves, Camps, and Ghettos (ASG) documentation on ghettos describes the ghetto as located in a small house on Bóźnicza (Synagogue) Street on a fenced property measuring 12 by 8 meters (39.4 by 26.2 feet). Kotlar remembers the ghetto including several residences.¹³ Ulrich permitted Jews who had evaded the liquidation Aktion to report to the remnant ghetto, in exchange for a bribe, or entrance fee, of approximately 500 złoty. Some 20 to 30 Jews paid the fee to legalize their status and to enter the ghetto. Among the fugitives were the wives and children of several inmates. Many others lived illicitly outside the ghetto.¹⁴

The 45 to 50 ghetto inmates could leave the ghetto only for work, mostly at the tannery.¹⁵ Contacts with local Poles and with Czech or perhaps Slovak Jews imprisoned at a larger, neighboring camp were forbidden.

On November 13, 1942, a small SS contingent of about 12 men—6 Germans and 6 Ukrainian auxiliaries—arrived from Końskowola to liquidate the ghetto.¹⁶ Some Jews managed to flee. The SS rounded up another 36 Jews and executed them at the Jewish cemetery.¹⁷

A local tax collector denounced 25 Jewish fugitives hidden in an abandoned cellar. On December 19, 1942, the Germans, perhaps Gendarmes from the Michów and Puławy posts, executed the Jews in their hiding places. (Local Poles were ordered to bury the bodies at the Jewish cemetery.)¹⁸ Another large group of fugitives was hunted down and executed during a two-month encirclement of the forested areas surrounding Klementowice, Markuszów (Borek Woods), and Wola Przybysławska (Garbów Forest), beginning in early December 1942.¹⁹ Several Jewish partisans from Kurów were among the victims. Others reported to a collection ghetto in Końskowola 1943.²⁰

Local Poles sheltered approximately 10 Kurów Jews. Andrzej and Katarzyna Zarzycki, recognized in 1978 as Righteous Among the Nations, were two of at least six aid givers of the Kotlar family. A handful of Kurów Jews survived the liquidation of ghettos subsequently established in the towns and villages in which they found refuge after the 1939 bombardment of the village.²¹ Survivor Simcha Ritzer (Sam Rice) exploited the confusion during the attack to claim a false identity as a Polish Christian to evade ghettoization.²²

SOURCES Published testimonies from survivors, in the yizkor book Moisheh Grosman, ed., Yizker-bukh Koriv. Sefer yizkor, matsevet-zikaron le-ayaratenu Koriv (Tel Aviv: Irgun Yots'e Koriv in Yisroel, 1955), include a long contribution by Helen Kotlar, "Un dokh bin ikh geblibn leb'n," which was translated and published subsequently in English as We Lived in a Grave (New York: Shengold, 1980).

Secondary sources include the relevant entries in Abraham Wein, Bracha Freundlich, and Wila Orbach, eds., Pinkas bakehilot. Encyclopaedia of Jewish Communities: Poland, vol. 7, Lublin and Kielce (Jerusalem: Yad Vashem, 1999), pp. 480–482; its English-language counterpart, Arnon Rubin, The Rise and Fall of Jewish Communities in Poland and Their Relics Today, vol. 2, District Lublin (Tel Aviv: Tel Aviv University Press, 2007), pp. 159–162; and the extensive entry for Kurów in Polish at the Wirtualny Sztetl, on the Web site of the Muzeum Historii Żydów Polskich (Museum of the History of Polish Jews), www.sztetl.org.pl. Some coverage also appears in Israel Gutman and Sara Bender, eds., The Encyclopedia of the Righteous among the Nations: Rescuers of Jews during the Holocaust, vol. 2, Poland, 2 pts. (Jerusalem: Yad Vashem, 2004), pt. 2, p. 925.

David Silberklang, "The Holocaust in the Lublin District" (Ph.D. diss., Hebrew University, Jerusalem, 2003), p. 272, notes all the Kurów Jews were expelled to Końskowola on May 8, 1942, a point that challenges several long-held assumptions of Polish scholars and IPN investigators about the Kurów expulsions, including the belief they occurred on April 8, exactly a month earlier. The second date comes from the testimonies of Jewish survivors and local Polish police authorities interviewed by Polish investigators immediately after the war.

Much confusion exists about whether the remnant ghetto in Kurów was a ghetto or a labor camp, with the cited ASG documentation for ghettos describing it as both a ghetto and a camp. Non-Jews, including Helena Boguszevska, in Nigdy nie zapomnę (Warsaw: Wiedza, 1946), p. 145, describe the ghetto as the "small camp," as do some survivors. The same confusion marks the academic literature: Tatiana Berenstein, "Martyrologia, opór i zagłada ludności żydowskiej w dystrykcie lubelskim," BŻIH no. 21 (1957): 77, mentions a ghetto in Kurów; Edward Dziadosz and Józef Marszałek, "Więzienia i obozy w dystrykcie lubelskim w latach 1939–1944," Zeszyty Majdanka 3 (1969): 25, 67, 113, 197, call it a labor camp; and Czesław Pilichowski et al., eds., Obozy hitlerowskie na ziemiach polskich 1939–1945: Informator encyklopedyczny (Warsaw: PWN, 1979), p. 262, list the Kurów ghetto twice, first as a ghetto and then as a labor camp.

Archival documentation for the Kurów Jewish community during World War II includes APL (e.g., 498/0/270); AŻIH (e.g., Ankiety, 210/608, 211/631, 301/4398); FVA (1065); IPN-Lu (e.g., Ds-2/67/1-6); USHMM (e.g., Acc.1997.A.0124 [AŻIH] 211/631; Acc. 1999.A.0154 [AŻIH] 210/608; RG-15.019M [IPN] [reel 6, 16/789, 792, 786, and reel 15, 49/103]; RG-50.002*0051); VHF (# 23, 700, 2062, 5342, 21629, 22297, 22674, 27633); and YVA (e.g., 0-3/3555).

Laura Crago

NOTES

1. Kotlar, We Lived in a Grave, pp. 9–17, 23–26, 31, 36; USHMM, Acc.1997.A.0124 (AŻIH), ŻSS, 211/631, pp. 3, 8.
2. Kotlar, We Lived in a Grave, pp. 26–29, 33; USHMM, 50.002*51, testimony of Joseph Weinbuch; Acc.1997.A.0124, 211/631, p. 23.
3. USHMM, Acc.1997.A.0124, 211/631, pp. 23, 26.
4. Ibid., p. 38.
5. Kotlar, We Lived in a Grave, pp. 27, 38.
6. USHMM, Acc.1997.A.0124, 211/631, p. 24.
7. Ibid., pp. 23–24, 50, 55.
8. Ibid., RG-50.002*51.
9. Kotlar, We Lived in a Grave, pp. 42–44.
10. Ibid., pp. 31–32, 41–44.
11. USHMM, RG-15.019M (IPN), ASG, reel 15, 49/103, p. 1; VHF, # 21629, testimony of Joseph Chanesman; Kotlar, We Lived in a Grave, pp. 44–47.
12. USHMM, RG-50.002*51.
13. Ibid., RG-15.019M, 49/103, p. 1; Kotlar, We Lived in a Grave, pp. 50–52, 54.
14. USHMM, RG-50.002*51.
15. Ibid., RG-15.019M, 49/103.
16. VHF, # 21629.
17. USHMM, RG-15.019M, 49/103.
18. Ibid., reel 6, 16/789.
19. Kotlar, We Lived in a Grave, pp. 46–47; USHMM, RG-50.002*51; RG-15.019M, reel 6, 16/792, 796.
20. Kotlar, We Lived in a Grave, pp. 78–80.
21. VHF, # 2062, testimony of Nachemia Wurman.
22. Ibid., # 5342, testimony of Sam Rice.

ŁĘCZNA

Pre-1939: Łęczna (Yiddish: Lentcha), town, Lubartów powiat, Lublin województwo, Poland; 1939–1944: Lentschna bei Lublin, Kreis Lublin-Land, Distrikt Lublin, Generalgouvernement; post-1998: Łęczna, Łęczna powiat, Lublin województwo, Poland

Łęczna lies on the confluence of the Wieprz and Świnka Rivers, some 25 kilometers (15.5 miles) east-northeast of Lublin. Its 1935 population of 4,162 included 2,273 Jews.

VOLUME II: PART A

A Wehrmacht unit occupied Łęczna around September 18, 1939. By January 1940, the Germans had established a civil administration, led by Mayor Schultze, an ethnic German. The Polish (Blue) Police and a Sonderdienst unit were recruited. The latter unit was composed of local ethnic Germans and Ukrainians.

On September 23, 1939, the Day of Atonement, uniformed Germans evicted Jews from the synagogue. Several people were shot dead; many more were severely beaten. Two weeks later, the Germans arrived to order 200 Jews to remove the Torah and Holy books from the synagogue and Bet Midrash. The Germans set the works on fire.¹ Abraham Rachil Bromberg, the rabbi of Łęczna, died in late 1939, and Hugo "Ogen" Alter, a refugee from Warsaw, suggests the Germans drowned him in the Wieprz.² Jews were also rounded up for forced labor. In January 1940, a 12-person Jewish Council was established. Its chair, Icek Chaim Frochtman, was a 50-year-old tailor. That month, a decree required Jews to wear a yellow patch on the chest. Six months later, the order was changed to white armbands with a blue Star of David.

Icek Zylbersztajn, the head of the local Jewish Social Self-Help (JSS), reported on the charity's April 1942 ghetto questionnaire that an unfenced open ghetto (dzielnica żydowska) had been established in Łęczna on January 1, 1940.³ A February 7, 1941, article about Łęczna in Gazeta Żydowska mentioned the Jewish Council's first duty in January 1940 was to house "several tens of Jewish families" expelled from "several Aryan streets."⁴ The ghetto may have been established because Emil Ziegenmeyer, the Kreishauptmann of Lublin-Land, claimed the estate at Łęczna as his home.⁵

Situated in the old Jewish neighborhood in northwestern Łęczna, the ghetto was composed of all the streets surrounding II, III, and Zielony squares. It also included the area south of the synagogue bounded by what now are Bożniczna (Synagogue), Partyzantka, and 11 Listopada Streets. In May 1941, some 150 refugees, mainly voluntary transplants, resided in the ghetto. In April 1942, the ghetto population stood at 2,250.⁶

Jews were forbidden to leave the ghetto without permission. Survivor Hersz Zylbersztajn (Icek's brother) notes everyone ignored the restrictions but admits that those found illicitly outside the ghetto were beaten severely.⁷ As six people crowded into each of the ghetto's 400 rooms, hygiene standards declined. In May 1940, the Jewish Council established an eight-person sanitation force. A typhus epidemic erupted in December 1942.⁸

Ghetto inmates were conscripted for forced labor, including agricultural work on the Kreishauptmann's estate, at a quarry in Karolin (pre-war Lubartów powiat), and at the Fischereigenossenschaft (fisheries' cooperative). In the summer of 1941, the Arbeitsamt (labor office) permitted Poles to contract Jews as agricultural laborers. Some 65 tailors and shoemakers received concessions to maintain small craft workshops.

In August 1940, the SS arrived in consecutive weeks to conscript Jewish men for labor in camps. Local ethnic Germans, led by Becker and Milke, rounded up conscripts during the first raid in which they were marched to a nearby labor camp, likely in Milejów, established for road construction work. In the second raid, carried out in Jewish communities throughout Distrikt Lublin on August 12–13 and 13–14, on the orders of SS- und Polizeiführer (SSPF) Odilo Globocnik, an SS contingent at 1:00 A.M. rounded up conscripts for the Belżec forced labor camp. The Polish police surrounded the ghetto to prevent escapes. A handful of Łęczna conscripts survived to be released in November.⁹ In the spring of 1941, additional conscripts were interned at a Lublin labor camp, known by Łęczna survivors as Plage-Laśkiewicz (for the pre-war airplane manufacturer on whose grounds the camp was established) but better known today as the Flugplatz (Airfield) camp. In May 1941, Icek Zylbersztajn reported that labor camp conscription made it impossible to maintain a JSS delegation or to assist the impoverished.¹⁰

By early 1941, the Germans had established a labor camp in Łęczna, probably by designating a block of ghetto residences on Bożniczna and Partyzantka Streets for the camp. The Gazeta Żydowska article reported Łęczna Jews provided clothing and shoes to inmates at the neighboring camp. Among the inmates were Jewish deportees from Slovakia.¹¹ These Jews arrived some time after March 1942, when deportations from Slovakia commenced.

In late February or early March 1941, an SS contingent, perhaps led by Goldfarb, executed 30 young Jews on an escarpment overlooking the Wieprz. (A few victims, only lightly wounded, fell into the river and drowned.) Zylbersztajn remembers conditions deteriorated after Germany's invasion of the Soviet Union in June: "There constantly were repressive measures against Jews. There constantly were sacrifices in human lives."¹² The Germans raided homes at night, pulled men from their beds, and shot them dead in a gully by the synagogue.

Before July 1941, the JSS established a community kitchen. It provided a daily meal to 682 impoverished ghetto residents.¹³ In autumn, the Jewish Council established a 25-person unit of Jewish Police. Its commander was Szmul Puterman. In December, the police and the Jewish Council collected fur coats the SS ordered surrendered. Zylbersztajn recalls in early 1942 that an SS contingent from Lublin and Lubartów beat some Jews to death and shot others dead. Alter may be describing the same event relating that the SS took 21 hostages and then summoned the Jewish Council. When council members did not appear, the hostages were tortured. A 100,000 złoty contribution failed to save the surviving hostages' lives.¹⁴ Between August 19 and 22, 1942, a delegation described by Zylbersztajn as from the Landwirtschaftskommissariat, led by Wilczek, but also including members of Gendarmerie Battalion I (motorized) commanded by Major Erich Schwieger, randomly chose every tenth person from a brigade of agricultural conscripts. The 12 victims were shot dead atop the gully near the synagogue in a larger Aktion during which the police were ordered to round up partisans, their helpers, and "wandering Jews."¹⁵

On October 25, 1942, an SS contingent, led perhaps by Kurt Engel, then head of the SS in Kreis Cholm, and SS

Ukrainian auxiliaries from Trawniki, liquidated the ghetto. The Jews were ordered to assemble on square II. The Jewish Council then designated 400 individuals to be held back for labor. Zylberstajn and Izaak Rozengarten recall some 3,000 deportees were marched to Piaski Luterskie. From there, the expellees were sent to the Sobibór extermination facility, where they were gassed on arrival. Jaczyński, an eyewitness cited in some secondary accounts, remembers the SS ordered young couples separated from their children and shot dead mothers who refused to relinquish children. The children, elderly, and others considered unfit for labor were marched to Piaski and from there sent to Sobibór. The other deportees were taken to the Trawniki forced labor camp.¹⁶

In Łęczna, the Jews retained for labor resided at the labor camp, which was fenced with barbed wire. Some have called the camp a closed ghetto, because about 100 Łęczna fugitives, including entire families, entered the camp and all the Jewish Council members and Jewish policemen also were inmates there. Another 300 Jews retained for labor in Lubartów and other localities were interned at the camp. Some 500 to 800 of the camp's 1,200 to 1,500 inmates were unregistered fugitives from the liquidation of nearby Jewish communities.¹⁷

On November 11, 1942, the SS and Ukrainian auxiliaries stationed in Piaski liquidated the camp. The SS executed 970 to 1,200 Jews in the synagogue gully. The next day, 23 Jews found hiding in the dairy on Kanałowa Street and another 50 discovered in bunkers on Łancuchowska Street were shot dead.¹⁸ The camp's prisoner census, reduced to 120, soon rose to 300 as fugitives from the November 9, 1942, liquidation of the Majdan Tatarski ghetto arrived in Łęczna.¹⁹ On April 29, 1943, the camp was liquidated. Some 120 inmates were removed to Trawniki. The remaining prisoners were sent to their deaths at Sobibór.

On November 3, 1943, SS and police units shot dead all the Trawniki inmates during Akcja Erntefest (Harvest Festival). Hersz Zylbersztajn, Izaak Rozengarten, and Szajner and his son escaped before the mass killing. The Szajners joined a partisan unit. After his son perished, Zelman hid at a local villager's farm.²⁰ Wiktoria Choma and her husband Feliks sheltered Zylbersztajn and Rozengarten in Ostrów Nadrybski village. Sara and Rachela Rajs (Reiss) escaped a roundup of seven family members and the Marciniak family, their aid givers, in Rachów village. A couple in Łańcuchów village sheltered Rachela; the Cyganiewicz family in Abramów (pre-war Lubartów powiat) hid Sara. A handful of Łęczna ghetto inmates survived the war.

SOURCES Secondary sources with coverage of the history of the Łęczna Jewish community during World War II include the relevant entries in Abraham Wein, Bracha Freundlich, and Wila Orbach, eds., Pinkas ha-kebilot. Encyclopaedia of Jewish Communities: Poland, vol. 7, Lublin and Kielce (Jerusalem: Yad Vashem, 1999), pp. 287–289; Arnon Rubin, The Rise and Fall of the Jewish Communities in Poland and Their Relics Today, vol. 2, District Lublin (Tel Aviv: Tel Aviv University Press, 2007), pp. 169–171; Israel Gutman and Sara Bender, eds., The Encyclopedia of the Righteous among the Nations: Rescuers of Jews during the Holocaust, vol. 2, Poland, 2 pts. (Jerusalem: Yad Vashem, 2004), pt. 1, pp. 142–143, 152; and Rejestr miejsc i faktów zbrodni popełnionych przez okupanta hitlerowskiego na ziemiach polskich w latach 1939–1945: Województwo lubelskie (Warsaw: GKBZHP, 1985), p. 149.

Because Łęczna today is home to the Lublin województwo's most well-preserved synagogue, now the Regional Museum in Łęczna, with a permanent exhibition documenting Jewish life in the town, a large number of articles, almost all by well-known historians, have appeared in Merkuriusz Łęczyński, the journal of the local cultural and historical society, on Jewish life during the war. See, for example, Janina Kiełboń, “Z dziejów łęczyńskich Żydów” and Emil Horoch, “Łęczna—spojrzenie w przeszłość miasta,” in Merkuriusz Łęczyński, respectively (1993), (1997), no. 10. Still valuable is Józef Marszałek, “Łęczna w latach wojny i okupacji,” in Emil Horoch, ed., Łęczna—studia z dziejów miasta (Łęczna, 1989). The extensive coverage provided on the Łęczna homepage at the Wirtualny Sztetl, a Web site sponsored by the Museum of Polish Jews in Warsaw, is drawn from these publications and another 25 sources cited in the bibliography, all of which remain difficult to find in the United States. The author of the Polish-language entry for Łęczna on the Światła w ciemności—Sprawiedliwi wśród narodów świata Web site, available at <http://sprawiedliwi.tnn.pl/index.php>, established by the Ośrodek Brama Grodzka—Teatr NN in Lublin, relies mainly on unpublished testimonies from Jewish survivors, cited below at AŻIH 301.

Unfortunately, no yizkor book or other published work with survivors' accounts has appeared for Łęczna. Krystyna Modrzewska, a Lublin survivor who lived and worked under a false identity in nearby Mełgiew, relates the story of a young Łęczna fugitive, rescued by a Polish policeman, in the second part of her diary published in BŻIH (1959), nos. 31 and 32, and in English in the translation of Władysław Bartoszewski and Zofia Lewin, eds., Righteous among Nations: How Poles Helped the Jews, 1939–1945 (London: Earls Court Publications, Ltd., 1969), pp. 145–146. The Światła w ciemności Web site includes interviews in Polish and English translation with Weronika Choma and Edward Cyganiewicz, both recognized by Yad Vashem as Righteous Among the Nations. Contemporary press coverage appears in “Łęczna Lubelska,” Gazeta Żydowska, February 7, 1941, p. 7.

Archival documentation for Łęczna includes APL; AŻIH (e.g., 211/668; 301 [1, 2018, 2183, 2184, 4879]; IPN (e.g., ASG, Kommandeur der Gendarmerie Lublin [KdGL] records); IPN-Lu (e.g., 42/67, 162/67/1-2, 174/67/1-4, 199/67/1-2, 282/67); USHMM (e.g., Acc.1997.A.0124 [AŻIH 211]; Acc.1999.A.0154 [AŻIH 210]; RG15.011M [IPN, KdGL] [reel 21, 276, p. 135]; RG-15.019M [IPN ASG] [reel 5 (14/467-470), reel 15 (49/56)]; VHF (e.g., # 8764, 28343, 35072); and YVA.

Laura Crago

NOTES

1. AŻIH, 301/2183, testimony of Hersz Zylbersztajn, p. 1.
2. Ibid., 301/1, testimony of Hugo “Ogen” Alter, p. 1.
3. Misfiled in USHMM, Acc.1999.A.0154 (AŻIH), 210/469, p. 8.
4. Gazeta Żydowska, February 7, 1941, p. 7.
5. USHMM, RG-15.019M (IPN), reel 15, 49/56.

6. Ibid., Acc.1999.A.0154, 210/469, pp. 5, 8.
7. AŻIH, 301/2183, p. 3.
8. USHMM, Acc.1999.A.0154, 210/469, p. 8.
9. AŻIH, 301/2183, pp. 2–3.
10. USHMM, Acc.1999.A.0154, 210/469, p. 3.
11. Ibid., RG-15.019M, 49/56.
12. AŻIH, 301/2183, p. 4.
13. USHMM, Acc.1997.A.0124 (AŻIH), 211/668, p. 4.
14. AŻIH, 301/1, p. 1.
15. Ibid., 301/2183, p. 4; USHMM, 15.011M (IPN), reel 21, 276, p. 135.
16. AŻIH, 301/1817, repeated at 4879, testimony of Izaak Rozengarten and Hersz Zylbersztajn, p. 1.
17. Ibid.
18. USHMM, RG-15.019M, reel 5, 14/468-70; but date from AŻIH, 301/1817, p. 1.
19. AŻIH, 301/2184, testimony of Zelman Szajner, p. 5.
20. Ibid.

ŁOMAZY

Pre-1939: Łomazy (Yiddish: Lomaz), village, Biała Podlaska powiat, Lublin województwo, Poland; 1939–1944: Łomazy, Kreis Biala Podlaska, Distrikt Lublin, Generalgouvernement; post-1998: Łomazy, Biała Podlaska powiat, Lublin województwo, Poland

Łomazy lies 17 kilometers (11 miles) south of Biała Podlaska and 107 kilometers (66 miles) northeast of Lublin. In August 1939, some 1,152 Jews resided there.¹

A Wehrmacht unit occupied Łomazy on September 13, 1939, but quickly abandoned it to Soviet occupation. Tensions between Jews and Poles erupted during the time that the Soviets occupied the town and afterwards, leading to at least two Jewish deaths and prompting many Jews to flee to Parczew or Soviet-occupied territory.²

On reoccupying Łomazy on October 15, 1939, the Germans appointed Bronisław Zdancewicz head (wójt) of a local,

Jews are held on a sports field in Łomazy, August 18, 1942, as part of a round-up by Reserve Police Battalion 101 in preparation for a shooting Aktion.

USHMM WS #57621, COURTESY OF STA. HAMBURG

Polish collaborationist administration. A force of Polish (Blue) Police was recruited. The Polish administration and police were subordinated to German authorities in the Biała Podlaska Landkommissariat. In March 1942, Łomazy was transferred to the Wisznice Landkommissariat, then overseen by Landkommissar Klemmer.

In late 1939, the local administration ordered the Łomazy Jews to form a Jewish Council (Judenrat). Its chair was Josel Sklarz.³ A Jewish police force was established.

From late 1939, German authorities designated Łomazy to receive expellees from territories soon to be attached to the Reich. By April 1940, 404 Jewish newcomers had arrived, mainly from Jeleniewo (near Suwałki), Serock, Suwałki, and Wiśniowa Góra (near Łódź).⁴ In May 1942, Gazeta Żydowska reported that 45 percent of the 1,461 Jews in Łomazy were expellees.

A survivor remembers “ghetto conditions” being established in Łomazy in early 1940. The “ghetto” was not surrounded by a fence, but the Germans imposed a strict curfew. They forbade Jews from leaving their residences, except for work, to prevent them from trading or speaking with their non-Jewish neighbors.⁵ The Pinkas ha-kehilot entry for Łomazy, in contrast, mentions that the Germans from early 1940 expelled Jews from their homes and required them to live in a distinct residential area, which subsequently was designated the ghetto.

An unknown number of Jews were evicted from their homes, mainly to make way for Polish-Christian expellees from Kujawy and Pomorze. The Jews were concentrated in residences located on Małobrzaska Street, but other Jews continued to reside in their pre-war houses. Jewish residents of Szkolna, Wisznice, and Kościuszko Streets, moreover, lived amid new Polish-Christian neighbors, the beneficiaries of the anti-Jewish eviction policies.⁶ Because the process of ghettoization was partial, Łomazy was excluded from a list of ghettos Hubert Kühl, the Biała Podlaska Kreishauptmann, submitted in December 1941 to Richard Türk, head of the Population and Welfare Department (BuF) for Distrikt Lublin. Jewish Social Self-Help (JSS) officials also never used the word ghetto to describe living conditions in Łomazy. Instead, they mentioned restrictions (from November and December 1941), which imposed the death penalty on Jews in Kreis Biala Podlaska found outside their places of registration without permission.⁷

A number of Łomazy Jews worked as domestics or agricultural laborers for their Christian neighbors. Antoni Kutnik, employed as a translator for the Łomazy administration from March 1942, paid wages (likely to the Wisznice labor office [Arbeitsamt]) for his servant Sala Goldwasser. He also provided Goldwasser a daily meal and permitted her to take leftovers home to her parents.⁸

From the spring of 1940, the Luftwaffe drafted 112 Łomazy Jews for a nearby construction project (probably reconstructing landing fields at the airplane manufacturing plant near Biała Podlaska).⁹ In July, another 107 Jews were sent to a labor camp established by the Biała Podlaska Water Regulation

Authority (Wasserwirtschaftsinspektion) in Szenejki, near Studzianka village.¹⁰ Shortly after March 1942, the Szenejki inmates were forced to grind the matzevot (gravestones) from the Łomazy cemetery for use in a cement overcoat for nearly finished construction projects, including a bridge over the Zielawa River and a dyke. The Łomazy Jews probably also were conscripted for local road improvement projects. (Kutnik hints of such projects in describing the administration subsequently using its road construction wagons to transport and consolidate the Jews' belongings.)

On May 2, 1942, the local Polish administration received orders to prepare for the "resettlement" of the Łomazy Jews. Though secret, the Jews learned of them immediately. Klemmer exempted 12 craftsmen and their families from deportation by ordering them transferred to Wisznice to work for the German civilian administration.¹¹

After the SS retracted the resettlement orders, Zdancewicz, on May 19, 1942, ordered a formal ghetto established. The Jewish Council paid more than 12,000 złoty to postpone the decree's implementation by one year. Enraged because Zdancewicz had acted without authorization, Landkommissar Klemmer demanded the money be turned over to the German administration.¹²

On June 13, 1942, Gendarmes from Wisznice and Sławatycze expelled to Łomazy some 200 Jews from Rososz, 250 from Opole-Podedwórze, and another 200 from Sławatycze.¹³ The deportees mainly were women, the elderly, children, and other "nonuseful" Jews.

On July 22–23, 1942, a unit from the Peasants' Battalions (Bataliony Chłopskie), a Polish underground group, raided the Polish police post, the local administration office, Zdancewicz's home, and the dairy. A roving Gendarmerie unit retaliated the next day by shooting 30 Jews at the Szenejki camp. On August 8, an SS officer from Biała Podlaska arrested additional Jews for Bolshevism. The arrestees were shot dead near a shrine on the road to Biała Podlaska.

After the raid, a succession of German police forces was stationed at the pre-war public school, including a 15- to 18-man squadron from the 2nd Company of Reserve Police Battalion 101 brought to liquidate the Jewish community on August 13, 1942. The day after arriving, the policemen pulled 30 Jews from their homes, forced them to perform hours of exhausting physical exercises in front of the administration building, and then executed the captives at the Jewish cemetery.¹⁴

At 4:00 A.M. on August 17 or 18, 1942, the entire 2nd Company of Reserve Police Battalion 101, Gendarmes from the Wisznice and Sławatycze posts, a small SS contingent from Biała Podlaska, and eventually a contingent of Ukrainian SS auxiliaries from Trawniki began rousting Jews from their residences. As the policemen drove the Jews towards the school grounds, they shot dead those too old or frail to walk there unaided. Once assembled, the 2,187 Jews sat for hours waiting. Shortly after 7:00 A.M., a number of officials, including the deputy Kreishauptmann, the Wisznice Landkommissar, and the chief of the Biała Podlaska Gestapo, arrived to breakfast with Poles from the local administration. (The Poles reportedly had not been forewarned about their arrival or of the impending Aktion.) After breakfast, the Biała Podlaska SS chief asked Zdancewicz for shovels and the August 1 Jewish registration list.¹⁵

At the school, the police chose a labor brigade to dig three mass graves in the Hały Woods. After they were completed, the reserve policemen marched the Jews in small groups to the edge of the Woods, where they were separated by sex and sent on to collection points to surrender valuables and undress. Driven from there into the pits, the victims were shot by the SS auxiliaries and the policemen. About 100 Szenejki inmates also were executed at the same killing site. The inmates were brought there either that same day to help dig the graves and to clear dirt from three sides of the pits to fulfill a plan proposed by one of the policemen to facilitate the killing Aktion or early the next morning to remove the dirt surrounding the graves.

Baruch Goldszer, a Szenejki inmate from Łomazy, was the only person to escape from the forest.¹⁶ A day after the killings, the German reserve policemen still in Łomazy searched for Jews hiding in their homes. Kutnik reports they found several scores of fugitives. Postwar German court testimony places the number at 20 to 30. Held overnight at the school, the Jews were marched the next day by German and Polish police to the forest and executed. In the fall of 1942, the Szenejki camp's 32 remaining prisoners were shot dead.¹⁷

Only a handful of Łomazy Jews, mainly those who had fled to other localities at the war's outset or escaped subsequently from labor camps, survived the German occupation. Another approximately 100 Łomazy Jews were repatriated from the Soviet Union after the war.

In 1967, the Office of the State Prosecutor in Hamburg indicted 14 former members of the Reserve Police Battalion 101 for a large number of crimes related to the liquidation of Jewish communities in Kreise Cholm, Biała Podlaska, and Radzyn. Among the 11 men tried in April 1967, 5 were found guilty, including the leader of the squadron stationed in Łomazy in August 1942. A lengthy appeals process, concluded in 1972, upheld his guilty verdict but resulted in no prison time.

SOURCES Secondary sources touching on the history of the Łomazy Jewish community during the World War II German occupation include the relevant entries in M.J. Fajgenbaum, Podlaskie in umkum: Noṭitsn fun ḥurban (Munich: Arzoysgegebn fun der Tsentraler Historisher Komisy baym Ts. K. fun di bafrayte Yidn in der Amerikaner Zone in Daytshland, 1948), pp. 114–121; and Abraham Wein, Bracha Freundlich, and Wila Orbach, eds., Pinkas ha-kebilot. Encyclopaedia of Jewish Communities: Poland, vol. 7, Lublin and Kielce (Jerusalem: Yad Vashem, 1999), pp. 273–274. An English translation of the latter is available at jewishgen.org; and in Arnon Rubin, The Rise and Fall of the Jewish Communities in Poland and Their Relics Today, vol. 2, District Lublin (Tel Aviv: Tel Aviv University Press, 2007), pp. 172–179.

The yizkor book, Yitzhak Alperowitz and Simcha Appelbaum, eds., Sefer Lomaz: 'Ayarah be-hayebab uve-kbilyonah (Tel Aviv: Irgune Lomaz be-Yisrael uve-Artsot ha-Berit, 1994), includes testimonies from survivors. "Łomazy pow. Biała Podl.," Gazeta Żydowska, May 24, 1942, no. 61, p. 4, offers contemporary coverage.

The murder of the Łomazy Jewish community is detailed in Christopher R. Browning, Ordinary Men: Reserve Police Battalion 101 and the Final Solution in Poland (New York: HarperCollins, 1992), pp. 78–87; and in the diarylike memoir by Antoni Kutnik, now available uncensored as "Miasto i powiat Biała Podlaska podczas II wojny światowej," Podlaski Kwartalnik Kulturalny (PKK), 9 (1996), no. 2, pp. 3–25, no. 3, pp. 3–11, no. 4, pp. 3–18; 10 (1997), no. 1, pp. 18–30, no. 2, pp. 50–61, no. 3, pp. 57–72, no. 4, pp. 16–32; 11 (1998), no. 1, pp. 76–82, no. 2, pp. 57–69. The first work dates the murders to August 17, 1942; the second, a day later. The memorial, erected at the killing site in 1989 by a group of survivors, their descendants, and the Union of Jews in Poland, uses the date of August 18–19 because of the chronology in the latter work, the yizkor book testimonies, and the research of Romuald Szudejko, most recently presented in "Społeczność żydowska w Łomazach— przyczynek do dziejów," BŻIH, no. 188/4 (December 1998): 79–90.

Archival documentation pertaining to the Łomazy Jewish community during the German occupation includes: APL AŻIH (e.g., 301 [167, 987, 2327, 4419, 5680], 302/1, 210/470, 211 [206, pp. 19–24, 64; 209, pp. 34, 37, 50–51, 53, 64; 663–665]); BA-L (e.g., B 162/14281–14282); IPN (e.g., ASG, SOS BP [23, 41, 43, 45]); IPN-Lu (e.g., 24/67/1–2, 131/67/1–57, 219/67/1–2, 284/204/1–2); USHMM (Acc.1997.A.0124 [AŻIH 211]; Acc.1999.A.0154 [AŻIH 210]; RG-15.019M [IPN ASG] [reel 4 (12/31–35), reel 15 (49/6)]); VHF, # 5517; and YVA (e.g., TR-10/764; 0–16 [201, 389]).

Laura Crago

NOTES

1. Gazeta Żydowska, May 24, 1942, no. 61, p. 4.
2. Testimony of Abraham Wunderbojm, in Alperowitz and Appelbaum, Sefer Lomaz, p. 38; VHF, # 5517, testimony of Adam Winder (Abraham Wunderbojm).
3. USHMM, Acc.1997.A.0124 (AŻIH), 211/206, pp. 19–24, 64.
4. Ibid., Acc.1999.A.0154 (AŻIH), 210/470, pp. 5–19.
5. Alperowitz and Appelbaum, Sefer Lomaz, pp. 167–170.
6. Kutnik, "Miasto," PKK, 10 (1997), no. 2, pp. 55, 59.
7. USHMM, Acc.1997.A.0124, 211/665, p. 39.
8. Kutnik, "Miasto," PKK, 10 (1997), no. 2, p. 61.
9. USHMM, Acc.1997.A.0124, 211/663, p. 14.
10. Ibid., pp. 36–39.
11. Kutnik, "Miasto," PKK, 10 (1997), no. 2, p. 58.
12. Ibid., p. 59.
13. USHMM, Acc.1997.A.0124, 211/665, p. 52, 211/209, pp. 45, 53.
14. Ibid., RG-15.019M (IPN), reel 4, 12/35, 31.
15. Kutnik, "Miasto," PKK, 10 (1997), no. 3, pp. 62–64.
16. AŻIH, 301/167, testimony of Baruch Goldszer, pp. 1–2.
17. USHMM, RG-15.019M, reel 15, 49/6.

LUBARTÓW

Pre-1939: Lubartów (Yiddish: Levertov), town, Lubartów powiat, Lublin województwo, Poland; 1939–1944: Lubartow, Kreis Lublin-Land, Distrikt Lublin, Generalgouvernement; post-1998: Lubartów, Lublin województwo, Poland

Lubartów is located about 24 kilometers (15 miles) north of Lublin. In 1939, 3,411 Jews were residing in Lubartów. In total, there were 8,121 persons inhabiting the town.¹

The Germans invaded Lubartów on September 19, 1939. The majority of the Jews did not evacuate but remained there waiting vainly for the Soviet army to arrive. Only a small number of Jews escaped from Lubartów before the Nazi occupation began.

Born in the Lubartów ghetto in April 1942, Elke Plech (later Elke Bozena, now Ellen Echeverria) is pictured with her rescuer, Janina Wysocka, during an Easter holiday event, April 1946. Plech's mother, Maria, entrusted the baby to Wysocka before fleeing the ghetto and assuming a Polish identity.

USHMM WS #30781, COURTESY OF ELLEN W. ECHEVERRIA

From the start of the occupation, German forces plundered Jewish shops. They forcibly cut off the beards and side locks (payot) of religious Jews on the streets. At first these actions were taken by soldiers of the Wehrmacht on an individual basis. But on October 12, 1939, German soldiers carried out an organized mass Aktion. The Germans ordered all the Jews of Lubartów to assemble at the first marketplace square (Rynek I). The soldiers then surrounded the Jews and held them captive. The Jews remained in this state all day long, while at the same time other German soldiers plundered their homes and shops, taking anything of value. During this Aktion, many Jewish houses were demolished.²

Shortly after this mass looting, another act of persecution took place, which would have an even greater effect. One source recounts that this took place on October 20, 1939, while another notes the date as sometime in early November. The local German authorities ordered most of the Jews of Lubartów to leave the town. After the forced removal, only 818 Jews were left in Lubartów. They were assigned to different forms of labor for the Germans in the town. Meanwhile, 850 persons were forcibly resettled to Ostrów (Lubelski), 634 were taken to Parczew, and small groups were brought to Kamionka (Lubartów powiat) and Firlej. All of these places were not far from Lubartów. The Jews of Lubartów remained in these places until September 1940, although some bribed their German captives and thereby succeeded in escaping and returning to their hometown. The details of how this happened are not known, but it may have been a local initiative by the German authorities.³ Some Jews attempted to return to Lubartów illegally, but the German police checked documents frequently. In the best case, persons in Lubartów illegally were simply sent back to where they had come from. In the worst case, they were arrested and sent to prison at the castle (zamek) in Lublin.⁴

For those Jews who remained in Lubartów, at the start of 1940 a Jewish Council (Judenrat) was established. Mosze Joel Edelman was appointed as its chairman, and Szlomo Ber Cieśla was his deputy. The Germans also named other members of the Judenrat, including Moszek Sruł Danemark, Jakub Lichtenfeld, Szlomo Rubinstein, Menasze Kassman, Sruł Reinsilber, Ber Reichnudel, Pinkwas Duman, Szyja Suchowolski, and Chil Weinberg.⁵ The Judenrat of Lubartów was reorganized several times. For instance, in November 1941 Dawid Peretz resigned as vice-chairman.⁶ In 1940, an 11-person Jewish police force was established.

In September 1940, the Kreishauptmann in Janów Lubelski, Winterfeld, was assigned to Kreis Krasnystaw and replaced by Fritz Schmiede. In consequence, about half of the Jewish families expelled from Lubartów were able to return to their native town. The Judenrat started a kitchen to provide hot meals to the Jewish residents, which was supported by the American Jewish Joint Distribution Committee (AJDC) until 1941. It served not only the local poor but also many refugees and evacuees whom the Germans had resettled in Lubartów in 1940 and 1941.

On December 16, 1940, more than 1,000 additional Jews arrived in Lubartów from Mława in Regierungsbezirk Zichenau. A visit by an official of the Jewish Social Self-Help (JSS), Naftali Birnheck, in late December, noted the existence of an open ghetto in Lubartów at this time:

This small town presently counts 350 Jewish families. At the beginning of the war, 80 percent of the Jewish population was evacuated and their apartments in part occupied. After two months, 170 families managed to return, some legally, a part are here illegally. None of the re-emigrants secured their apartments and they are living in overcrowded streets designated as the Jewish quarter [or ghetto, i.e., dzielnica żydowska]. To this place [meaning the ghetto] have been sent 1,028 deportees from Mława.⁷

In March 1941, a few hundred Jews were resettled from Lublin to Lubartów.⁸ Lubartów was one of the first places in the Lublin region from which the Germans started to deport the Jews in 1942. In April 1942, 250 Jews were removed from Lubartów and resettled in Kamionka, Ostrów, and Firlej. It is unclear if this happened before or after the first mass deportation Aktion.⁹

The first deportation Aktion against the Jewish population began on April 9, 1942. The local German Gendarmerie seized all the Jews and brought them to a synagogue, where the process of selection began. Some Jews were allowed to remain in Lubartów to carry out work for the Germans. The German authorities selected 814 people for transport and sent them to the railway station. The Germans loaded them onto wagons all through the night and sent them to the extermination camp in Bełżec.¹⁰

Three days later, large groups of Slovak Jews started to arrive in Lubartów. On April 13, 1942, 900 persons arrived; on April 15, 1942, 680 persons arrived; and on May 7, 1942, 841 persons arrived, bringing the total to 2,421 Slovak Jews.¹¹ Initially they were made to live in the synagogue and a military barracks, essentially a stables built by the Germans on the grounds of the Jewish cemetery. As one witness recalls:

They differed from our Jews. They did not wear traditional headgear and yarmulkes. Their women had wavy hair and instead of wigs, wore hats. They were dressed in fashionable, woolen costumes and their husbands in suits. They did not put on armbands with the blue star, but they had stars made from yellow material on their breasts. Despite being forced to sleep in the dirty straw left by the horses, every morning they went from the barrack clean and neat. The Poles from Lubartów as well as the local Jews were very interested in them. And, the Jewish policemen, armed with sticks and quite often brutal toward the Lubartów Jews, lost self-assurance when meeting with the Slovak Jews. The inhabitants of the barrack on Legiony Street [Jews from Slovakia] were not in Lubartów for very long. Suddenly they disappeared.¹²

After their arrival, the Slovak Jews were resettled again from Lubartów to other nearby places, mainly to Firlej and Ostrów.

Because Jews could not leave Lubartów to obtain food, hunger quickly ensued. The Germans organized teams to perform heavy labor within the town. This went on until October 1942, when another general resettlement of the Jews of Lubartów was ordered. This second cleansing operation took place on October 11, 1942. The Jews from Kamionka, Firlej, Ostrów, and Tarło were brought to Lubartów. In total there were about 6,000 or 7,000 Jews, counting the ones already in Lubartów. According to one account, “[T]he people stood four abreast on Lublin Street and were taken to be loaded onto the train. Then the Jews, arranged like a troop of soldiers, were driven from the first zone of the marketplace [Rynek I] to the railway station. Those people were compressed into freight cars, in which they could not breathe. When the wagons were full, the Germans shot anyone left stranded on the platform.”¹³

The transport then brought the Jews to the extermination camp in Treblinka.¹⁴ During this mass “resettlement” the Germans continued with the mass murder of any Jews who remained in their homes or on the streets of Lubartów. Some 300 unfortunate people, including the elderly and children, were shot on the grounds of the new Jewish cemetery. The Jews who were shot on the streets and by the railway platform were also taken to the cemetery and buried in a mass grave. The Jewish Police and sanitation workers dug the graves. Several days later, in spite of German guarantees that there would be no more Aktions, another several hundred Jews were deported to the ghetto in Piaski Luterskie and taken from there to the extermination camp in Sobibór. The members of the Judenrat in Lubartów were also resettled into the ghetto in Łęczna.¹⁵

In the town of Lubartów, a few hundred Jewish craftsmen initially were spared. They worked for the local Gendarmerie. On January 29, 1943, they were shot at the new Jewish cemetery in Lubartów.¹⁶

Along with the annihilation of the Jewish community, the Germans destroyed the buildings and all traces of Jewish presence. The synagogue was converted into a stable. The cemeteries were devastated. The old Jewish cemetery in the center of the city became a gallows, where Germans carried out public executions of Jews from Kamionka and other places. The tombstones from both cemeteries were taken to be sorted for building purposes in the school, where Wehrmacht soldiers were stationed.¹⁷

Only 40 Jews from Lubartów survived the Nazi occupation. They did so mainly by hiding in the villages around the town. In the town itself, two Polish families saved the lives of 5 Jews.¹⁸

SOURCES Information on the fate of the Jews of Lubartów can be found in the yizkor book, Barukh Tshubinski, ed.,

Hurben Levertov: A matseyve Levertov un Levertov kdotsim (Paris: fun di fraynt fun Levertov, 1947). Further information can be found in an article by J. Kiełboń, “Martyrologia ludności Lubartowa w latach okupacji hitlerowskiej,” in Lubartów i ziemia lubartowska (Lubartów: Lubartowskie Towarzystwo Regionalne, 1993), and in R. Kuwałek and P. Sygowski, “Z dziejów społeczności żydowskiej w Lubartowie,” in Lubartów i ziemia lubartowska (Lubartów: Lubartowskie Towarzystwo Regionalne, 2000). A number of articles, including accounts by Polish witnesses who lived in Lubartów during the occupation, have also been published since 1990 in the local daily press in Lubartów.

Relevant documentation on the fate of the Jews of Lubartów under Nazi occupation can be found in the following archives: APL (e.g., GDL; and Kreishauptmannschaft Lublin-Land); AŻIH (211/646 [JSS]); USHMM (e.g., Acc.1997.A.0124 [JSS]; RG-15.076M; RG-50.030*0185); and YVA.

Robert Kuwałek
trans. Steven Seegel

NOTES

1. Kiełboń, “Martyrologia,” p. 224.
2. Tshubinski, Hurben Levertov, p. 7.
3. Ibid., pp. 7–8; Kiełboń, “Martyrologia,” p. 224.
4. APL, Polizei Battalion Zamość, 104.
5. Ibid., Kreishauptmannschaft Lublin-Land, 111, p. 4. This list of Judenrat members is from November 1941.
6. Ibid.
7. USHMM, Acc.1997.A.0124 (JSS), 211/646, p. 47.
8. Kuwałek and Sygowski, “Z dziejów społeczności,” pp. 81–82.
9. Ibid.
10. Tshubinski, Hurben Levertov, p. 7; Kuwałek and Sygowski, “Z dziejów społeczności,” p. 82.
11. APL, Gouverneur des Distrikts Lublin (GDL), 749, 893; Kreishauptmannschaft Lublin-Land, 141, pp. 114, 137.
12. M. Derecki, “Kromka chleba,” Gazeta Lubelska, April 23, 1993, p. 5; translation cited as in Robert Kuwałek, “Lubartow Ghetto,” on holocaustresearchproject.org Web site.
13. Tshubinski, Hurben Levertov, p. 34.
14. Chiel M. Rajchman survived from this transport and the extermination camp in Treblinka. He was deported from Ostrów via Lubartów to Treblinka. See his oral history interview: USHMM, RG-50.030*0185.
15. On the mass shootings at the new Jewish cemetery in Lubartów, see M. Danielkiewicz, “Oczy pełne łez,” Dziennik Lubelski, July 30, 1990, p. 5; Derecki, “Kromka chleba”; on the fate of the Jews in the town after the deportation, see Tshubinski, Hurben Levertov, pp. 7–8.
16. Tshubinski, Hurben Levertov, p. 8.
17. Testimonies of Halina Domańska and Janina Stelmazenko in the private collection of Paweł Sygowski.
18. In Lubartów, in the shelter prepared by the Czekański family, Josef Honigsblum and his wife Bluma survived. The Sienkiewicz family rescued Debora Erlich and her five-year-old son Michał and her sister-in-law Noemi Erlich. Others were rescued by Polish families in neighboring villages or survived in hiding places in the forests; see Tshubinski, Hurben Levertov, pp. 8–9.

LUBLIN

Pre-1939: Lublin, city, Lublin województwo, Poland; 1939–1944: Kreis Lublin-Land, Distrikt Lublin, Generalgouvernement; post-1998: Lublin województwo, Poland

Lublin lies about 160 kilometers (99 miles) southeast of Warsaw. In August 1939, around 37,000 Jews were living there among a total population of some 122,000.

In September 1939, following the German invasion, thousands of Jewish refugees fled to Lublin. The aerial bombardment of the city was quite heavy, resulting in around 1,000 civilian deaths and leaving thousands more homeless. German forces reached Lublin on September 17. Soon after their arrival they started to seize Jews for forced labor and rob Jewish property. In the fall of 1939, the Jewish community was required to pay several very large contributions to the German authorities. Initially the Jews were forced to wear yellow stars on their clothing, but in December 1939, these were replaced with white armbands bearing a blue Star of David.¹

At the end of 1939, the German authorities ordered the establishment of a Jewish Council (Judenrat). It consisted of 24 members, headed by Henry Becker. Under him served two deputies, Dr. Marek Alten and Shlomo Kastenbergl. The German authorities confirmed its membership in January 1940. Subsequently Alten became the dominant figure within the Lublin Judenrat.

During the winter of 1939–1940, a number of Jews were evicted from their apartments, especially near the city center, and were resettled into the worst neighborhood. Starting in the spring of 1940, a number of Jews were rounded up and sent to work at various forced labor camps in Distrikt Lublin.² In December 1940 and January 1941, more than 3,000 Jewish-Polish prisoners of war (POWs), who could not be released as they came from parts of Poland then still occupied by the Soviet Union, were transferred to Lublin and confined within a POW camp at Lipowa Street no. 7. Some of these prisoners were used subsequently to help construct the Majdanek concentration camp.

Deportation from the Lublin ghetto, ca. 1942.
USHMM WS #02597, COURTESY OF JERZY FICOWSKI

On or just before January 11, 1941, the five-man presidium of the Jewish Council in Lublin met with Dr. Walter Bausenhardt, the head of the Housing Department within the German administration of Distrikt Lublin. The meeting was to discuss a “voluntary” transfer of Jews out of Lublin, in preparation for placing the remaining Jews into a ghetto.³

In March, however, the Germans resorted to force to reduce the city’s Jewish population. Between March 10 and March 13, 1941, around 12,000 Jews were rounded up and resettled from Lublin to at least 11 separate localities within the Distrikt, including Bełżyce, Chodel, Lubartów, Rejowiec, Siedliszcze, and Sosnowica. The transfer was conducted to make space for the Wehrmacht in the city, as Poles were then moved into the former Jewish areas, as well as reducing the Jewish population to be moved into the ghetto in Lublin. Smaller deportations continued into April, but most of the subsequent transfers were voluntary, in connection with the ghetto’s establishment.⁴ At this time the Jewish Police (Jüdischer Ordnungsdienst) was established in Lublin, initially consisting of 10 officers but later increasing to more than 100.

On March 24, 1941, Gouverneur Ernst Otto Zörner, as the head of Distrikt Lublin, issued a proclamation concerning the establishment of a consolidated Jewish residential area (geschlossener jüdischer Wohngebiet [ghetto]) in the city of Lublin. The proclamation included a plan of the ghetto area. All Jews were to reside inside the ghetto. Non-Jews living there were given until April 10 to move out. Jews living outside the ghetto boundaries had to leave their residences by April 15, with the exception of those in the Kalinów and Sieraków neighborhoods, who had until May 1. Jews failing to make these deadlines were to be forcibly expelled from the city of Lublin.⁵

At a meeting on March 31, Zörner noted that to force an additional 15,000 Jews to leave the city voluntarily, some pressure needed to be exerted. It was reported that so far only about 2,500 Jews had registered for resettlement. Regierungsrat Bausenhardt therefore declared that he would attempt again to get the military to lift their opposition to the resettlement of Jews to a number of locations within the Distrikt.⁶

To encourage more Jews to leave, those who left were permitted to take all of their belongings, while those moving into the ghetto could bring in only 25 kilograms (55 pounds) of possessions. The ghetto was situated in the old Jewish quarter, where many Jews already were living, but the small area assigned only had room for some 20,000 people. Nevertheless, a new housing department established by the Judenrat had to find space in the ghetto for at least 6,000 additional Jews, and the actual number that moved in was almost 10,000 more, as only a few thousand decided to leave.⁷ In mid-April, the deadline for Jews to move into the ghetto was extended by a few days until April 24. Living conditions continued to deteriorate, as additional Jews came into the ghetto after its establishment, including some who returned after the initial resettlement.

Initially the Lublin ghetto remained an open ghetto. On May 1, 1941, Zörner imposed a strict curfew on the ghetto between 9:00 P.M. and 6:00 A.M. Outside the ghetto, the curfew applied to the Jews at 7:00 P.M.⁸ The Germans changed the boundaries of the ghetto several times followings its establishment. Subsequently, probably in early 1942, the ghetto was surrounded by a fence, and two guarded gates were established to control exit and entry.

In July 1941, the Jewish Social Self-Help (JSS) received 24,000 applications for welfare support; but it was only possible to help 15,063 people. In that month, more than 78,000 meals were served, some 22,000 of them free of charge and the rest at a subsidized rate. At this time there were 34,149 Jews living in the ghetto. Daily rations consisted only of 100 grams (3.5 ounces) of bread per person, half that of the Polish population.⁹ Religious services were banned, as was schooling for Jewish children, but both were continued on a smaller scale clandestinely inside the ghetto.

Starting in May 1941, there was a serious outbreak of typhus in the Lublin ghetto. In July, the German authorities ordered 87 buildings (out of 348 in the ghetto) to be quarantined. At this time the Jewish hospital for infectious diseases was moved into the ghetto and expanded. The Jewish Council also had to find new sources of revenue, including even a 50 groszy fee for ration cards, to cover the extra expenses involved. By October, the quarantine hospital had some 380 beds, but this remained inadequate to deal with the more than 500 new cases per month at the peak of the epidemic. One survivor, who arrived in the ghetto in November, noted that people were dying of hunger, cold, and exhaustion in the streets. In December, there were 1,000 Jews sick with typhus, and all three available hospitals were overflowing.¹⁰

On December 9, 1941, on account of the typhus epidemic, Zörner announced that any Jew caught outside the ghetto or their assigned labor camp without permission would face the death penalty. Non-Jews were also forbidden to enter the ghetto, except for necessary official tasks.¹¹ At this time, about 7 percent of the Jewish population, mainly doctors, members of the Judenrat, and other privileged people, were still living outside the ghetto. In December 1941, the Jews learned of German plans to split the ghetto into two sections: Ghetto A and Ghetto B.¹² At the end of December 1941, the Germans demanded that the Jews surrender their furs and other items of warm clothing. Several members of the Judenrat were taken hostage to ensure that additional German demands for wool and woolen garments were also met.

At the end of February 1942, the extension of the Lublin ghetto by the establishment of a separate Ghetto B section was implemented.¹³ The newly created Ghetto B was separated from Ghetto A by barbed wire, and Jews from the two ghettos were not permitted to visit each other.

On March 16, 1942, German forces subordinated to the SS- und Polizeiführer (SSPF) in Distrikt Lublin, Odilo Globocnik, assisted by several SS and police detachments (including more than 200 non-German Trawniki men), started the liquidation of the Lublin ghetto. The deportation of most of the Jews to the Bełżec extermination camp also marked the beginning of the state-organized mass murder of the Jews in the Generalgouvernement. Among the officers assigned to conduct the ghetto liquidation, SS-Obersturmführer Hermann Worthoff played an especially active role. Shortly after the start of the Aktion, the Judenrat was informed that selections would be conducted in the synagogue and only Jews with a Sicherheitspolizei (Security Police, Sipo) work stamp would be transferred to Ghetto B, while the others would be deported by train. Jews found in apartments after they had been cleared were to be shot. Security Police instructions for the Aktion indicated also that the elderly, sick, and disabled were to be shot on the spot. The Germans planned to deport 1,400 Jews to the Bełżec extermination camp each day.¹⁴ The deportations were conducted with great brutality, especially by the Trawniki men, who drank too much and also seized Jews with valid Sipo work stamps. Hundreds of Jews were left dead on the streets. On March 24, around 200 children from the orphanage at Grodzka Street no. 11 were murdered at a pit prepared on the northern edge of town.¹⁵ Two hospitals and an old-age home were liquidated between March 24 and March 27, with the patients shot nearby.

On March 29, there was a brief break in the Aktion. Rumors spread that the Germans would stop the deportations in return for a large ransom payment. The Judenrat soon organized 500,000 złoty in gold and delivered it to Worthoff. However, the Germans took the money and shot the 2 Judenrat members who delivered it. Then on March 31, Worthoff ordered a special meeting of the Judenrat. At the meeting, he announced that the Judenrat would be reduced from 24 members to 12, and he added 6 new, more compliant members, such that 16 former members and their families were now added to the deportees. At the same time, the Jewish Police was reduced in size from 113 to 78 men, with the others subject to deportation. It was also announced that henceforth only those Jews with a "J" permit would remain, as opposed to the Sipo work stamps, used for the selections up to this point. Far fewer Jews had these J permits, which had only been issued in March.¹⁶ The deportation Aktion continued until April 16, 1942. Many more Jews now went into hiding, and even more brutality was employed to extract them. In total, at least 25,000 Jews were murdered during the entire period of the Aktion.

The Jews remaining in Ghetto B, about 3,000 to 4,000 people with so-called J permits, and almost as many "illegals" were transferred on April 17–19, 1942, to the remnant ghetto in Majdan Tatarski, which was surrounded by a fence.¹⁷ Then on April 20, a roll call was conducted and almost 4,000 Jews were permitted to return to the camp, but some 3,000 Jews found to be without J permits were sent to the Majdanek concentration camp, where they were killed shortly afterwards.¹⁸

Conditions for the surviving Jews in the Majdan-Tatarski ghetto were somewhat better than in the former ghetto area. Officially it was described as an "exemplary Jewish estate" and was located in a suburb of the city, from which all the Poles had been removed. Each house had a small garden, which the Jews used to grow vegetables. However, it was also overcrowded, with some 8 to 10 people sharing each room.¹⁹ Two hospitals functioned within the ghetto. Everyone living in the ghetto was supposed to be working. Some worked at various sites in Lublin, a few became domestic servants for the Germans based nearby, and others worked in the ghetto. The Germans searched the ghetto frequently, looking for illegal Jews and killing those they discovered.

Three transports, two from Terezín and one from towns in the Reich, including Weimar, arrived in Lublin in May 1942, carrying some 3,000 Jews.²⁰ Many were sent to the Majdan Tatarski ghetto, but some may have been transferred to other camps, such as Majdanek. Laura Hillman, who arrived in the ghetto from Weimar, recalled that some of the Jews were nicely dressed, while others wore only rags and appeared hungry and defeated. Nonetheless, she saw children carrying books and singing Hebrew songs that raised her spirits. She also recalled that the ghetto had its own currency and that it was possible to buy food from a store with this money that resembled play money. Near the store there was a crowd of people bartering their clothes for food.²¹ Hillman and other survivors note that there were frequent roundups in the ghetto as well as new arrivals. However, between May and September 1942, the number of Jews receiving rations in the Majdan Tatarski ghetto remained fairly stable at around 4,000 people.

On September 2, 1942, the Germans surrounded the ghetto and conducted a selection. Around 500 elderly men, women, and children were sent towards Majdanek and killed on the way. Another 500 were sent to various labor camps. Another selection on October 25 saw around 1,000 Jews transferred to the Majdanek concentration camp, including some of those with work cards. Following the announcement of eight remnant ghettos in Distrikt Lublin by the Higher SS and Police Leader (HSSPF) of the Generalgouvernement, Friedrich Wilhelm Krüger, on October 28, which did not include Lublin as a place where Jews were permitted to reside, the Jews feared another Aktion would soon follow. On November 7, the Germans demanded that the Jewish Police participate in the ghetto's liquidation, offering to protect the policemen and their families.²² Two days later, the elderly, the sick, and any children were deported to Majdanek and killed, while some able-bodied Jews were transferred to labor camps. At this time the head of the Judenrat, Dr. Alten, and the head of the Jewish Police, Moniek Goldfarb, were both murdered. The "protected" policemen were also shot or deported to Majdanek. Some Jews were kept alive to clean out the ghetto area until the end of the month, when they in turn were killed.

During the Aktion to liquidate the first ghetto in April and again during the Aktions against the Majdan Tatarski ghetto in the fall of 1942, many Jews knew what to expect and went into prepared hiding places or tried to escape to the Aryan side.²³ Due to the detailed searches of the ghetto area and draconian punishments for anyone caught hiding a Jew, only some of those who evaded capture during the Aktions managed to survive. A few of those who escaped fled from Lublin and survived in the Warsaw suburbs or in the countryside. Among the non-Jews who risked their lives to help Jews escaping from the ghetto was Zofia Młodawska-Socha, who smuggled two children out of the first ghetto, just before the transfer to Majdan Tatarski. Ryszard Postowicz, a member of the Polish underground, also assisted 2 Jews to find a safer hiding place outside the city, after they had fled from the Majdan Tatarski ghetto.²⁴ One estimate is that only about 230 Jews from Lublin returned at the end of the war, including a number who had escaped to the Soviet Union in 1939.

The furnishings of Jewish homes are collected and unloaded in a public square in the Wieniawa district after the liquidation of the Lublin ghetto, ca. 1942.

USHMM WS #73202, COURTESY OF IPN

SOURCES Secondary sources regarding the fate of the Jewish community of Lublin during World War II include the following: Abraham Wein, Bracha Freundlich, and Wila Orbach, eds., Pinkas ha-kehillot. Encyclopaedia of Jewish Communities: Poland, vol. 7, Lublin and Kielce (Jerusalem: Yad Vashem, 1999), pp. 13–38; and Arnon Rubin, The Rise and Fall of the Jewish Communities in Poland and Their Relics Today, vol. 2, District Lublin (Tel Aviv: Tel Aviv University Press, 2007), pp. 14–52; Bogdan Musiał, Deutsche Zivilverwaltung und Judenverfolgung im Generalgouvernement: Eine Fallstudie zum Distrikt Lublin 1939–1944 (Wiesbaden: Harrassowitz, 1999); Czesław Pili-chowski et al., eds., Obozy hitlerowskie na ziemiach polskich 1939–1945: Informator encyklopedyczny (Warsaw: PWN, 1979), pp. 275–276; Dieter Pohl, Von der "Judenpolitik" zum Judenmord. Der Distrikt Lublin des Generalgouvernements 1939–1944 (Frankfurt am Main: Peter Lang, 1993), pp. 92–94; Tadeusz Radzik, Zagłada lubelskiego getta (Lublin: Wydawn. Uniwersytetu Marii Curie-Skłodowskiej, 2003); and David Silberklang, "The Holocaust in the Lublin District" (Ph.D. diss., Hebrew University, Jerusalem, February 2003).

The yizkor books for Lublin—M. Lerman, ed., Dos bukh fun Lublin: Zikbroynes, gvies-eydes un materyaln ibern lebn, kamf un martirertum fun Lubliner Yidishn yishuv (Paris, 1952); and N. Blumenthal and M. Korzen, eds., Encyclopedia of the Jewish Diaspora: Poland Series—Lublin Volume (Jerusalem, 1957) [in Hebrew]—contain accounts concerning the ghetto and some relevant documents.

Published sources include Nachmun Blumenthal, ed., Te'udot mi-geto Lublin: Yudenrat le-lo derekh (Jerusalem: Yad Vashem, 1967); Joseph Kermish, ed., To Live with Honor and Die with Honor!: Selected Documents from the Warsaw Ghetto Underground Archives "O.S." ("Oneg Shabbath") (Jerusalem: Yad Vashem, 1986); and Tatiana Berenstein et al., eds., Faschismus, Getto, Massenmord: Dokumentation über Ausrottung und Widerstand der Juden in Polen während des zweiten Weltkrieges (Berlin: Rütten & Loening, 1961) (hereafter cited as FGM). Among the personal memoirs of survivors, there is: Laura Hillman, I Will Plant a Lilac Tree: A Love Story amidst the Destruction of the Holocaust (New York: Writers' Club, 2003). The verdicts of three relevant West German trials can be found in Justiz und NS-Verbrechen, vols. 38, 40, 41 (Amsterdam: Amsterdam University Press, 2008–2009), Lfd. Nr. 790, 826, and 833.

Relevant archival documentation includes APL (Fond 22); AŻIH (e.g., 211/644–654; 301/801, 1291, 1295, 2184, 2232; 302; Ring II/305 and 307); IPN (e.g., ASG; Fond 185); USHMM (e.g., Acc.1997.A.0124 [JSS]; RG-15.019M [IPN, ASG]; RG-15.034M [IPN, Fond 185, Records of the KdS Lublin]; RG-15.075M [APL, Records of the City of Lublin]; RG-15.079M [Ring]; RG-15.101M [Jewish Council in Lublin, 1939–1942]); VHF (e.g., # 14326, 43812, 45132); and YVA (e.g., O-3).

Martin Dean

NOTES

1. AŻIH, 301/1295, testimony of Franciszka Mandelbaum.
2. USHMM, RG-15.079M, Ring II/305, as cited in Ker-mish, To Live with Honor, pp. 181–188.
3. Blumenthal, Te'udot mi-geto Lublin, p. 211.
4. USHMM, Acc.1997.A.0124, 211/649, pp. 26–29; 211/650, p. 14; Werner Präg and Wolfgang Jacobmeyer, eds., Das Diensttagebuch des deutschen Generalgouverneurs in Polen 1939–1945 (Stuttgart, 1975), p. 338.
5. Krakauer Zeitung, no. 73, March 30–31, 1941, p. 3.
6. Note of a meeting with the Gouverneur of Distrikt Lublin, Zörner, March 31, 1941, in Berenstein et al., FGM, pp. 123–124.
7. Silberklang, “The Holocaust in the Lublin District,” pp. 155–156.
8. Bekanntmachung reprinted in Blumenthal and Korzen, Encyclopedia of the Jewish Diaspora, p. 700.
9. USHMM, Acc. 1997.A.0124, 211/652, p. 2.
10. Isaiah Trunk, Judenrat: The Jewish Councils in Eastern Europe under Nazi Occupation (Lincoln: University of Nebraska Press, 1996), pp. 167–169; Silberklang, “The Holocaust in the Lublin District,” p. 162; AŻIH, 301/801, testimony of Bolesław Kopelman; USHMM, Acc. 1997.A.0124, 211/654, p. 39.
11. USHMM, Acc. 1997.A.0124, 211/654, p. 5.
12. Ibid., pp. 39–40; AŻIH, 301/1295.
13. Gazeta Żydowska, February 27, 1942, no. 25, p. 5.
14. ŻuNS-V, vol. 41, Lfd. Nr. 833a, pp. 258–259.
15. Berenstein et al., FGM, pp. 272–273.
16. Blumenthal, Te'udot mi-geto Lublin, pp. 314–318; ŻuNS-V, vol. 41, Lfd. Nr. 833a, p. 256.
17. Gazeta Żydowska, April 19, 1942, no. 46, p. 8; ŻuNS-V, vol. 41, Lfd. Nr. 833a, p. 260.
18. AŻIH, 301/1291, testimony of Anna Bach; 301/2184, testimony of Zelman Szajner.
19. Ibid., 301/2232, testimony of Mina Beinsdorf.
20. Gedenkbuch: Opfer der Verfolgung der Juden unter der nationalsozialistischen Gewaltherrschaft in Deutschland 1933–1945, 2nd ed. (Koblenz: Bundesarchiv, 2006), vol. 4, p. xix.
21. Hillman, I Will Plant a Lilac Tree, pp. 29–35. VHF, # 45132, testimony of Kitty Hart-Moxon, 1998, also mentions the ghetto currency.

22. Police Decree issued by HSSPF Krüger, October 28, 1942, in Berenstein et al., FGM, pp. 342–344; USHMM, RG-15.079M, Ring II/307 [353.].

23. VHF, # 43812, testimony of Nechama Tec, 1998; # 14326, testimony of Victor Cynamon, 1996.

24. Shmuel Krakowski and Sara Bender, eds., The Encyclopedia of the Righteous among the Nations: Rescuers of Jews during the Holocaust—Poland (Jerusalem: Yad Vashem, 2004), pp. 524, 635–636.

ŁUKÓW

Pre-1939: Łuków (Yiddish: Lukov), town, Łuków powiat, Lublin województwo, Poland; 1939–1944: Lukow, Kreis Radzyn, Distrikt Lublin, Generalgouvernement; post-1998: Łuków, Łuków powiat, Lublin województwo, Poland

Łuków lies 90 kilometers (56 miles) north-northwest of Lublin. In August 1939, its Jewish population stood at around 6,000.

On September 17, 1939, a Wehrmacht unit occupied Łuków. In retaliation for Polish soldiers ambushing a reconnaissance patrol, its military commander ordered 70 Jews executed and some 1,000 Jewish and Christian men marched to a penal camp located near Ostrów Mazowiecka. By the time of the prisoners' September 29 release, the Germans had ceded Łuków to Soviet occupation. However, a border negotiation, concluded the previous day, had assigned the town to Germany. On October 4, 500 Jews joined the Soviet evacuation behind the Bug River. Upon reoccupying Łuków, the Germans devastated the synagogue, humiliated Jews, and compelled them to clear rubble from the fighting.

In October 1939, the Łuków powiat was incorporated into Kreis Radzyn. A German became Landrat of Łuków. Gendarmerie and Eisenbahnpolizei (Railway Police) posts were established. The Polish (Blue) Police and an ethnic German Sonderdienst unit were recruited. The Lublin SS established a Kreis-level branch office, under SS-Untersturmführer Fritz Fischer, and claimed the Polish army base (with railway station) in suburban Łapiguz. In May 1940, the SS moved its office to Radzyń but left some six employees behind to secure its Łapiguz warehouses.¹

Members of Reserve Police Battalion 101 publicly humiliate a group of religious Jewish men in Łuków, 1942. Two of the men are forced to pose in their prayer shawls in a crouching position with their hands up. Among those pictured is Motl Hershberg [with white beard].

USHMM WS #49189, COURTESY OF YIVO

In November and December 1939, 5,000 Jewish deportees arrived from Suwałki, Nasielsk, and Serock. On December 7, between 850 and 1,000 newcomers were forcibly expelled to Kock.² By December 31, 3,550 Jewish deportees were residing in Łuków.

In December 1939, Landrat Fischel appointed a 12-person Jewish Council (Judenrat). He named kehillah president Mosze Aron Wajntraub (Weintraub) its chair. In November 1940, when the SS arrested Wajntraub, Hersz Lejzor Lendor became council chair. The council established a Jewish police force, commanded by Salomon "Salek" Cukierman.

Jewish forced labor conscripts reconstructed the war-damaged railway station. From the fall of 1940, 1,000 laborers employed by the Reckmann construction firm cleared an interior section of a forest near Łapiguz, extended railway tracks there, and built a concealed armory.³ Craftsmen added barracks to the Łapiguz base. In April 1941, German troops, amassed in Distrikt Lublin for the June invasion of the USSR, were billeted there.

Łuków's militarization likely prompted authorities in May 1941 to establish a ghetto. Local Jewish Social Self-Help (JSS) leaders noted the unfenced, open ghetto (dzielnica żydowska) occupied a pre-war Jewish neighborhood but described its boundaries as fluid.⁴ Maps show the ghetto encompassed most of the area within Staropijarska, Pastewnik, Kanałowa, Browarny, and Szopen Streets. To retain access to the magistrate's office and to permit traffic along major arteries, all but a block on the western side of Międzyrzec Street and what now is Wyszyński Street were excluded from the ghetto. As a result, the ghetto was composed of three separate areas.

Initially, the Jews were permitted much freedom of movement but were required to return to the ghetto by curfew. From the summer of 1941, the mayor forbade Jews from leaving Łuków. Some were shot for violating the order.⁵ Because the ghetto was overcrowded, many refugees departed for nearby villages.⁶ In April 1942, the ghetto population stood at 8,093. On May 8–9, 1942, 2,031 Jews (many of them identifying themselves as Hungarian Jews) arrived from Slovakia.

Jewish conscripts unloaded and loaded cargo at the railway station, the armaments depot, and the SS warehouses. They extended municipal water lines and built a locomotive repair facility for Reckmann. Craftsmen worked for the SS, the Gendarmerie post, and the municipal administration. Women labored at the Dietz (Dieter) poultry firm, preparing chickens for shipment to the Eastern Front. In the spring of 1941, 1,500 Jews became prisoners at water irrigation camps in Rogoźnica and Zarzec Ulański and at a wood-cutting camp in Łapiguz. Some Łapiguz inmates worked at a nearby sawmill.

The 2 złoty Reckmann paid Jews for 10 hours of labor was insufficient to purchase a loaf of bread. During Passover 1942, the JSS doubled (to 882) the families served by its community kitchen. In March, a day-care program provided 300 children (under 14) free daily meals, with milk, and religious instruction.⁷

In March or April 1942, police from the Commanding Officer of the Security Police and SD (KdS) Radzyń branch office, killed between 15 and 47 Jews during a search for fur coats. Among the victims was Mr. Węger, shot by Anton Neumann, an ethnic German SS recruit from nearby Łazy. Josef Bürger, assigned from October 1939 to KdS Radzyn, and Neumann, his translator, planned a raid, in some accounts in April and in others in June or July, during which Security Police and local ethnic Germans killed between 44 and 89 ghetto residents. The next morning, Fischer threatened to murder half the ghetto population if he did not receive 20 kilograms (44 pounds) in gold. When the Jews could not raise the sum, Fischer agreed to a down payment of half as much.⁸

In June 1942, as part of Operation Reinhard, the Security Police assumed control of the ghetto. Bürger became the ghetto's SS administrator (or commandant). Neumann was his deputy. In late July, a part of the 1st Company of Reserve Police Battalion 101 was moved to Łuków to assist in the impending ghetto liquidation.

To shield "useful" Jews from deportation, many newly arrived Slovak deportees were interned at Łapiguz. In the summer of 1942, conscripts from Łuków and the Stanin gmina were sent to the Hochtief camp in Dęblin to work on constructing a railway bridge over the Wieprz River. Reckmann also transferred some laborers to its Dęblin construction site.⁹ In Łuków, most Jewish laborers were required to reside at work sites.

From the summer of 1942, ghetto inmates realized that the Germans were sending Jews to the Treblinka extermination camp; however, they mistakenly believed it was a place of resettlement beyond the Bug River. Because Polish railway workers had described German mass killings of Jews in Ukraine, most nonetheless feared deportation.¹⁰ On August 25, an empty train pulled into the railway station but soon departed for Międzyrzec Podlaski to transport Jews from there to Treblinka. Shortly thereafter, Lender announced that the authorities had informed him that the Łuków Jews would be spared deportation, as some 80 percent worked for German employers. In mid-September, the Security Police ordered the ghetto surrounded by a barbed-wire fence. When, on October 1, transports to Treblinka resumed in Kreis Radzyn, with the deportation of 2,000 Jews from Radzyń, many Łuków Jews prepared to evade expulsion.

Early on October 5, 1942, the ghetto was surrounded by Security Police from Radzyń, members of the Reserve Police Battalion 101, SS auxiliaries (Ukrainians, Lithuanians, and Latvians), Gendarmes, and local ethnic German and Polish police units. After ordering the Jews assembled at the trading square on Międzyrzec Street, the German police and SS auxiliaries entered the ghetto and shot dead the patients and staff at the hospital and those who refused to leave the ghetto. At the square, men able to work were separated from women, the elderly and children from those able to work. German employers read lists of those exempted from deportation. Eleven Jewish Council members were shot. They were among 500 Jews murdered on that day. Some 4,000 mainly women, children, and the elderly were marched to the railway station and sent from there to be gassed at Treblinka.¹¹

Trains carrying Jews to Treblinka, from Parczew and Irena-Dęblin, stopped to pick up those located during searches of the ghetto and lured from hiding on October 8, 1942, by promises of permanent work.¹² Some 640 of 2,000 deportees may have been retained to dig mass graves at a clearing near Malcanów, where they, too, were executed.¹³ During the searches, Bürger shot dead older and child fugitives he uncovered. He ordered others to form a fire brigade to help the Polish (Blue) Police guard and clear houses of the deported and a sanitation force to assist Jewish Police and Chevra Kadisha (Burial Society) members to bury the dead at Malcanów. Some 2,000 to 3,000 Jews evaded expulsion.

The ghetto was reduced in size to Kanałowa, Jatkowa, and Międzyrzec Streets. Some 2,500 to 3,500 Jews from the Łuków Landkommissariat then were consolidated there. The consolidations, completed by October 25, 1942, included as many as 1,300 to 1,700 Jews from the Gułów gmina, mainly from Adamów, Okrzeja, and Wola Okrzejska; almost 460 from the Stanin and Mysłów gminy, including in the latter from Kamień, Wandów, and Wandów-Antoniówka; 350 from the Tuchowicz gmina, including from Anonin, Kij, Celiny, and Tuchowicz; and 432 from the Ulan gmina, where in the spring of 1942 Jews had lived in Kępki, Paskudy, Sętki, Sobole, Stok, Ulan, Wierzchowiny, Zakrzew, Zarzec, and Żyłki.

An unstudied September 1942 mass killing in Wojcieszków makes it impossible to determine how many of the gmina's 214 Jewish residents were consolidated in the ghetto.¹⁴ Some September executions, including 98 Jews in Okrzejska by SS and Ukrainian auxiliaries responsible for sawmill operations in Korwin, targeted fugitives from deportations in Żelechów and Kreis Pulawy. However, Reserve Police Battalion 101's September 22 mass killing of 200 to 300 Jews from Serokomla and Charlejew left a handful of the Serokomla gmina's 295 Jewish residents to transport to Łuków.¹⁵ An execution in Krzywda, that day or on September 29, in which 125 railway conscripts perished, also murdered most Jewish inhabitants from the pre-war Radoryż gmina.¹⁶ A volunteer civilian guard rounded up and transported the Jewish residents of Trzebieszów to Łuków.¹⁷ On October 10, another 70 of the Trzebieszów gmina's 142 residents were shot in Grochówka. Only in Stanin and Wola Okrzejska were some Jews retained for work outside a labor camp.

On October 27, 1942, the Security Police, Reserve Police Battalion 101, and their collaborators again cleared the Łuków ghetto. Approximately 2,000 newcomers were sent to their deaths at Treblinka.

The next day, Friedrich Wilhelm Krüger, the Higher SS and Police Leader (HSSPF) of the Generalgouvernement, named Łuków one of the eight Jewish residential areas where Jews in Distrikt Lublin legally could reside. Near Łuków, Krüger's orders sparked searches for fugitives from the ghetto consolidation. Some 25 Adamów Jews located during an October 30 search in forests near Burzec village were shot. Another search occurred on November 5 in Siedliska village.¹⁸ On November 6, Reserve Police Battalion 101 transferred 600 Jews from Kock to Łuków.

On November 5 and 7, 1942, the Łuków ghetto again was cleared. The November 5 expulsion targeted ghetto residents. The November 7 deportation enveloped some 3,000 Jews, including hundreds of Łuków laborers marched directly from work sites to the deportation train. These Jews were later gassed at Treblinka.

The German police and their collaborators once more searched the ghetto for those in hiding. They offered Polish civilians sugar and vodka to locate fugitives outside of Łuków. A "peasant gang" gathered some 250 train jumpers by the railway tracks and forced the captives to surrender their clothing and shoes before requesting that the railway police claim the prisoners.¹⁹ Captives were incarcerated in the prison at the magistrate's office, the synagogue, and the Łapiguz barracks. Late on November 7, 1942, Bürger and another German executed 80 to 200 children (all central prison inmates under age six) in the inner courtyard of the magistrate's office.²⁰ The remaining captives were shot in groups of 200 at Malcanów, with the last central prison inmates, all men, killed on November 10.²¹ A yizkor book testimony, describing the Chevra Kadisha's activities, estimates the society's members buried 1,500 to 2,000 victims.²²

About 10 to 17 days later, the ghetto's fence, dismantled during the expulsion, was reconstructed. The remaining Jewish laborers, mainly at Dietz, Reckmann, and the SS warehouses, were ordered to reside permanently in the ghetto. The Stanin Jews probably were marched to the ghetto at this time. Upon the Reckmann laborers' return from Dęblin in January 1943, Łuków natives composed 20 to 30 percent of the approximately 3,000 to 4,000 ghetto residents. Ryszka Huberman-Iwan recalls Slovak and Hungarian deportees formed a significant part of the population.²³ However, most survivors report the majority of the ghetto's inmates came from nearby villages and towns.

Conditions in the ghetto were overcrowded. Some 15 to 25 people lived in a room. The ghetto's only pump frequently broke, and rations were practically nonexistent. In late winter 1942–1943, unsanitary conditions caused a typhus epidemic.

Some Jews worked at Dietz or Reckmann. Others likely dismantled 100 mostly Jewish residences located outside the ghetto.²⁴ Most survived by sneaking from the ghetto to barter material possessions for food. Water became more plentiful after Jewish craftsmen began repurposing the mikveh, located opposite the ghetto. The construction site also became an illicit market, at which Jews and non-Jews intermingled with laborers to exchange goods.

Bürger shot tens of people dead, including a Łuków teenager surnamed Rybak, found outside the ghetto, and venders and water carriers at the mikveh.²⁵ Construction firm owner Richard Reckmann asked Security Police from Radzyń, including his brother, to enforce labor discipline. In 1942, at least 20 conscripts, many too sick to report to work, were shot. In December, Bürger ordered 500 to 600 Jews executed in Malcanów. In Wola Okrzejska, an execution, on December 28, overseen by the SS and Ukrainian and Lithuanian auxiliaries, claimed 36 victims, mainly children and women older than 39.²⁶

On May 2, 1943, the Łuków ghetto was liquidated. To force Jews from hiding, SS and SS Ukrainian auxiliaries set many buildings afire. Hundreds fled to nearby forests. The remaining 2,000 to 3,000 Jews were sent to their deaths at Treblinka. On learning of the ghetto liquidation, the 40 surviving Jews in Wola Okrzejska escaped to the forest.

Upon Łuków's liberation in July 1944, 60 survivors returned to the town.

In 1970, Josef Bürger received a life sentence for the shooting deaths of individual Jews before, during, and after the Łuków ghetto liquidation.

SOURCES Secondary sources providing coverage of the World War II history of the Łuków Jewish community and of the other Jewish communities consolidated in the Łuków ghetto include Krzysztof Czubaszek, Żydzi Łukowa i okolic (Warsaw: Danmar, 2008); and the relevant entries in Abraham Wein, Bracha Freundlich, and Wila Orbach, eds., Pinkas ha-kebilot. Encyclopaedia of Jewish Communities: Poland, vol. 7, Lublin and Kielce (Jerusalem: Yad Vashem, 1999), p. 39 (Adamów), pp. 67–68 (Okrzeja), pp. 275–280 (Łuków), p. 347 (Stok), pp. 349–350 (Stanin), p. 378 (Serokomla), pp. 477–448 (Kock); and its English-language counterpart, Arnon Rubin, The Rise and Fall of the Jewish Communities in Poland and Their Relics Today, vol. 2, District Lublin (Tel Aviv: Tel Aviv University Press, 2007), pp. 52–53 (Adamów), pp. 134–139 (Kock), pp. 183–190 (Łuków).

An English translation of a testimony authored by two Finkelsztajn siblings describing the fall 1942 Łuków ghetto liquidation, cited in the entry as AŻIH, Ring [352] II/306, is available as “The Destruction of Łuków,” in Joseph Kermish, ed., To Live with Honor and Die with Honor!: Selected Documents from the Warsaw Ghetto Underground Archives “O.S.” (“Oneg Shabbath”) (Jerusalem: Yad Vashem, 1986), pp. 210–213. Though used by almost all scholars to date the Łuków deportations, the testimony unfortunately contains a calendar error in recalling the deportation on Saturday, November 8. In 1942, Saturday fell on November 7. This entry used the November 7 date because survivors and other eyewitnesses report the deportation occurred on a Saturday.

Memoirs and testimonies from survivors include Eta Wrobel, with Jeanette Friedman, My Life My Way: The Extraordinary Memoir of a Jewish Partisan in WW II Poland (New Milford, NJ: Wordsmithy LLC and Yad Vashem, 2006); the transcript of Lily Fenster's testimony, accessible electronically at the Voice/Vision Holocaust Survivor Oral History Archive, University of Michigan, Dearborn; Sonia Hurman and Abram Hurman, with Halina Birenbaum, Pod osłoną nocy. Wspomnienia z lat 1939–1945 (Kraków and Oświęcim: Fundacja Instytutu Studiów Strategicznych and Państwowe Muzeum Auschwitz-Birkenau w Oświęcimiu, 2007), which provides coverage of the fall 1942 Łuków ghetto consolidations through its treatment of the experiences of the Jewish communities of Okrzeja and to a lesser extent of Stanin. Additional testimonies can be found in the yizkor book Binem Heller, ed., Sefer Lukov: Geheylikt der borev-gevorener kehileh (Tel Aviv: Irgun yots'e Lukov be-Yisrael un der Lukover Landsmanshat in di Fareynikte Shtatn, 1968), available in a French translation by Alain Zylbering and Françoise Rudetzki, Le Livre de Lukow, 1200–1945 (Paris, 1987). The above-cited Czubaszek Żydzi Łukowa work contains a 150-page document appendix that includes Polish translations of Yiddish-language testimonies from AŻIH 301; depositions, memoirs, and letters from survivors to the IPN and the Regional Museum in Łuków (Muzeum Regionalne w Łukowie); and testimonies from Jewish survivors, their descendants, and local Polish Christians collected by the author during his research. The book also includes photographs of a map of the ghetto, in the collections of the Regional Museum in Łuków.

Excerpts from the diary of Stanisław Żemiński, the Polish-Christian chronicler of the fall 1942 Treblinka deportations, first appeared in publication as “Kartki dziennika nauczyciela w Łukowie z okresu okupacji hitlerowskiej,” BŻIH, no. 27 (1958): 105–112, with an English translation widely available on the Internet; however, the excerpt in Michał Grynberg and Maria Kotowska, eds., Życie i zagłada Żydów polskich, 1939–1945: Relacje świadków (Warsaw: Oficyna Naukowa, 2003), pp. 108–111, may be more valuable, as it appeared after the collapse of communism in Poland and therefore was not subject to censorship.

An overview of Polish IPN research into murders perpetrated by German forces in and around Łuków is provided in the relevant volumes of Rejestr miejsc i faktów zbrodni popełnionych przez okupanta hitlerowskiego na ziemiach polskich w latach 1939–1945 (Warsaw: GKBZHWp and IPN, 1985–), with the volume for the Siedlce (siedleckie) województwo covering the largest part of the region. Christopher R. Browning's Ordinary Men: Reserve Police Battalion 101 and the Final Solution in Poland (New York: HarperCollins, 1992) and Daniel J. Goldhagen's Hitler's Willing Executioners: Ordinary Germans and the Holocaust (New York: Knopf, 1996) discuss the role members of Reserve Police Battalion 101 played in the liquidations of the region's Jewish communities, including in the fall of 1942 in Łuków. Justiz und NS-Verbrechen, vol. 34 (Amsterdam: Amsterdam University Press, 2005), Lfd. 737, discusses the criminal investigation and trial of Josef Bürger.

Additional documentation for the Jewish community of Łuków is located in the following archives: APL; AŻIH (e.g., 210/477, 211 [675–677; 885, pp. 43, 53–55; 886, pp. 31, 43, 56, 62; 887, pp. 56–57, 91, 99; 888, pp. 12, 26, 38, 48–49, 51; 889, pp. 10, 15, 22–27, 43, 51, 62, 64; 890, pp. 21, 25, 46, 59, 72], 267, 301 [43, 44, 789, 1198, 3880, 4265, 4747, 5628, 6242], 302/30, 310/L, 303/V/709, Ring [352] II/306); BA-L (B 162/2188–2190, e.g., pp. 1029–1035, 1169–1177, 1283–1296, 1321–1332, 1380–1422, 1461–1483); FVA (HVT [e.g., 265, 717, 721, 733, 734, 1366]); IPN (e.g., ASG, SAL [76, 144, 153, 165, 173–174, 179, 188]); IPN-Lu (e.g., 05-142, 98/67/1-5, 131/67/1-57, 151/67/1-5, 284/436/1-2); USHMM (e.g., Acc.1997.A.0124 [AŻIH 211]; Acc.1999.A.0154 [AŻIH 210]; RG-15.019M [IPN ASG] [reel 6 (16/684, 688–689, 703, 724, 738, 742), reel 15 (49/83)]; RG-15.079M [AŻIH Ring]; RG-50.120*0201); VHF (# 1642, 3210, 5897, 6118, 6146, 8327, 9775, 10911, 10912, 11663, 11932, 13813, 17693, 23342, 24067, 24208, 26955, 27870, 32079, 36916, 41057, 42816); and YVA (e.g., O-3 [1649, 2860, 3153, 4052], O-33/1315). The Holocaust Memorial Center Zerkelman Family Campus, Farmington Hills, MI, includes in its collections the Klein-Biegel oral history, one of the only known testimonies from a Slovak deportee to the Łuków ghetto.

Laura Crago

NOTES

1. VHF, # 11663, testimony of Hershel Prengler; BA-L, B 162/2188-2190 (208 AR-Z 236-60), pp. 1029–1030 (Jakob Keselbrener deposition).
2. USHMM, Acc.1999.A.0154 (AŻIH), 210/477, p. 2.
3. AŻIH, 301/3880, testimony of Abram Sylbersztejn, p. 1.
4. USHMM, Acc.1997.A.0124 (AŻIH), 211/677, p. 17.
5. AŻIH, 302/30, testimony of Stanisław Żemiński, p. 2.
6. Ibid., 301/4265, testimony of Pinia Fuksman, pp. 1–3.
7. USHMM, Acc.1997.A.0124, 211/677, p. 14; 211/890, p. 46.
8. BA-L, B 162/2188-2189 (208 AR-Z 236-60), p. 1031 (Keselbrener), and pp. 1284–1290 (Sol [Szłoma] Prengler deposition).
9. AŻIH, 301/4265, pp. 4–5; VHF, # 11663.
10. USHMM, RG-15.079M (AŻIH), Ring II/306, p. 1; VHF, # 11663.
11. Le Livre, pp. 40–43 (Laibish [Lajbisz] Barn testimony).
12. AŻIH, 302/30, p. 3. See also USHMM, RG-15.079M, Ring II/306, p. 3.
13. BA-L, B162/2189 (208 AR-Z 236-60), p. 1285.
14. Czubaszek, Żydzi, pp. 173–174.
15. Hurman et al., Pod, pp. 33–37; Marianna Kurchand-Adamczek testimony, in Czubaszek, Żydzi, pp. 231–233.
16. AŻIH, 301/1198, testimony of Mała Połosecka, p. 2.
17. Ibid., 302/30, pp. 4–5.
18. Ibid., pp. 6, 8.
19. USHMM, RG-15.079M, Ring II/306, p. 4.
20. BA-L, B 162/2190 (208 AR-Z 236-60), p. 1482 (Anszel Kac deposition).
21. USHMM, RG-15.079M, Ring II/306, p. 5.
22. Le Livre, p. 104.
23. Ibid., pp. 53–71.
24. Nowy Głos Lubelski, April 16, 1943, p. 3.
25. BA-L, B 162/2189 (208 AR-Z 236-60), pp. 1321–1322 (Mosze Grajcer deposition).
26. Hurman, in Czubaszek, Żydzi, pp. 239–240.

MARKUSZÓW

Pre-1939: Markuszów (Yiddish: Markushov), village, Puławy powiat, Lublin województwo, Poland; 1939–1944: Markuszów, Kreis Pulawy, Distrikt Lublin, Generalgouvernement; post-1998: Markuszów, Puławy powiat, Lublin województwo, Poland

Markuszów lies 27 kilometers (17 miles) northwest of Lublin. Its pre-war 1939 population of approximately 3,000 included some 2,000 Jews.

Luftwaffe bombardment on September 8, 1939, sparked fires that destroyed all but eight houses in central Markuszów, a neighborhood inhabited exclusively by Jews. On September 11, the Germans occupied the town.

The local military commander immediately imposed forced labor obligations on the Jews. Within a few weeks, German authorities mandated the wearing of white armbands, with a blue Star of David. By early 1940, the Germans ordered a Jewish Council (Judenrat) established. Its chair was Shlomo Goldwasser. The council created a Jewish police force to help organize forced labor conscription.

In the several months it took to establish a German civilian administration, many homeless Jews moved to Opole and other places. Twelve Jews, mostly from even more war-devastated Kurów, settled permanently in Markuszów. In July 1940, the Jewish population stood at 1,320. By late fall 1940, it topped 1,500, mainly because Jews from Warsaw with ties to Markuszów fled there rather than report to the Warsaw ghetto, which had been established during October.¹ In March 1941, the Jewish population crested at 1,643, including 133 refugees.

Because of the war devastation in Markuszów, the local German administration established its offices in Garbów. A wójt (head), surnamed Spolck, oversaw affairs in Markuszów. A locally recruited unit of Polish (Blue) Police exercised day-to-day police authority. Wehrmacht units occasionally were billeted in Markuszów.²

Some survivors mention that because local German authorities did not initially ban Jews from engaging in trade, many Markuszów Jews began, during the first months of the German occupation, to rebuild their houses and a large part of their pre-war lives. To assist them, the Jewish Council paid bribes for an informal suspension of orders forbidding Jews from moving more than 5 kilometers (3.1 miles) beyond Markuszów's borders.³

Anti-Jewish decrees became harsher from the spring of 1940. The Jewish Council filled SS-imposed quotas for labor at camps in Janiszów, for flood-control projects on the Vistula River, and in the summer in Bełżec, for building border fortifications. From July on, the council had to organize between 300 and 360 Jews daily for local forced labor: 120 for road construction projects under Kreis administration; 100 to widen the Kurów-Markuszów-Garbów stretch of the Warsaw-to-Lublin highway, and 100 for projects organized by the local German administration, including at the Garbów sugar refinery and for clearing snow on the Markuszów-to-Garbów road.⁴ German authorities suspended Jewish home building, ordering the council by autumn to erect wooden barracks for 650 still homeless Jews.⁵

Leopold Lind, a Jewish physician from Lublin who was resettled in Markuszów in June 1940 to treat a typhoid epidemic, describes local German authorities placing endless demands on the Jews, including orders for the Jewish Council to surrender a long list of goods ranging from butter and chickens to a large number of luxury items.⁶ In December 1941, the Jews were required to turn over their fur (or winter) coats.⁷

Sources vary on the date an open ghetto was established in Markuszów. The Pinkas ha-kehillot entry notes it was created in May 1941. Lind remembered authorities issuing the orders forbidding Jews from leaving Markuszów that same year, but in October. He recalled the Germans, the day after establishing the ghetto, shooting dead Goldwasser's mother for being 0.5 kilometer (0.3 mile) outside of Markuszów.⁸

The orders limiting the Jews to Markuszów created immediate food supply problems. The ability to locate food narrowed further from the summer of 1941, when another 100 Jews were imprisoned at a labor camp established in Kłoda to gather and pulverize stones for the ongoing highway construction projects.⁹ From time to time, Horst Göde, the deputy Kreishauptmann, and from 1942 the Opole Landkommissar, arrived to impose contributions. At assemblies, Göde ordered Jews, including children, humiliated, beaten, and sometimes shot dead.¹⁰ Lind also describes local German authorities beating Jews during frequent visits to Markuszów, ostensibly for hiding from them. In April 1941, inebriated German soldiers broke into a Jewish residence and attempted to rape several young women. After the women escaped, the soldiers opened fire on the house's residents, killing one girl's brother and injuring several others, including a Polish medical assistant aiding the wounded.¹¹ Poor sanitary conditions, compounded by overcrowding, provoked a typhus epidemic in April 1942.

Survivors describe a two-stage liquidation of the Markuszów ghetto.¹² In April 1942, the SS deported about 500 Jews, mostly the elderly and the sick. Assisted by the local Polish (Blue) Police, the SS ordered the Jews into marching formation. A group of elderly Jews was shot dead for refusing the orders. The remaining expellees were marched to Nałęczów, about 12.9 kilometers (8 miles) south of Markuszów, and there ordered onto trains, most likely destined for the Bełżec extermination camp. (The Pinkas ha-kehillot entry for Markuszów suggests the expellees were sent to the extermination camp in Sobibór; however, deportations to Sobibór did not begin in Distrikt Lublin until May 1.) The SS limited the residence of the Jews remaining in Markuszów to Lubelska Street.

Five trucks of German Gendarmes, SS, and SS Ukrainian auxiliaries arrived in Markuszów on May 8, 1942, to expel the rest of the Markuszów Jewish community. After Goldwasser was ordered to surrender a list of Jewish residents, he urged all those who were able to flee to the forest. Only a few hundred people reported the next day to the market square for "resettlement." About 70 men were held back for labor at camps in Kłoda, Kurów, and Końskowola. Survivors are divided over whether the rest of the Markuszów Jews were sent to their deaths at Sobibór from the train station in Nałęczów or spent the night in the empty ghetto in Końskowola, about 14.7 kilometers (9 miles) north-northwest of Markuszów, before being sent to Sobibór the next morning from the railway station in Puławy.

In late May 1942, a labor camp, also referred to as a ghetto in postwar Polish Court Inquiries about Executions, Mass Graves, Camps, and Ghettos (ASG) documentation, was established for approximately 100 to 150 Slovak Jews brought to Markuszów to dig up stones in local fields to use in road construction projects. The camp was liquidated on September 2, 1943. Its prisoners were marched to the train station in Nałęczów. Nothing is known of their precise fates.¹³

Almost all the Markuszów fugitives from the Sobibór deportation were rounded up and killed. Two days after scores of Markuszów escapees arrived in Bełżyce, the SS and Ukrainian auxiliaries surrounded the settlement and then oversaw the deportation of about 50 unregistered Markuszów Jews to the labor camp in Majdanek.¹⁴ Another group, of about 60 Markuszów Jews, led by Mordechai Kierstzenbaum and brothers Jerucham (or Jankiel) and Jacob Gothelf, had obtained arms before the expulsion and were determined to protect the more than 1,000 Jews, including hundreds from Markuszów, hidden in the Wola and Borek Forests. Joined subsequently by escaped Soviet prisoners of war (POWs) and fugitives from the deportations of the Garbów and Kamionka Jewish communities, they formed three partisan units. However, the partisans mostly were in forests closer to Lublin in December 1942, when a large group of SS and Ukrainian auxiliaries arrived to search the two forests closer to Markuszów for hidden Jews. On December 2, the first day of the search, about 400 Jews were killed. Another 600 perished before the sweep ended on January 20, 1943.¹⁵

The Adamczyk family, in Wola village, a forest gateway, was determined to assist Dora Wasserstrum after discovering her sister among the Jews murdered in the forest. (Like many Wola families, the Adamczyks belonged to the Polish underground Bataliony Chłopskie, an organization that assisted the Jewish partisans.) However, on December 10, 1942, and February 18, 1943, the Germans executed at least 14 Wola Poles for aiding Jews. Four others, similarly accused, disappeared without a trace.¹⁶ Unfortunately, the postwar documentation is ambiguous for Jan Nalewajek and Aniela Kamińska, two villagers mentioned as among the murdered in the Markuszów yizkor book. On December 22, 1942, Nalewajek was shot along with 5 other Poles, accused mostly of Polish patriotism. No reason is provided for the June 1943 executions of Kamińska, her husband, son, and 5 other Poles.¹⁷ After the executions, many Poles ordered Jews they were protecting to find other hiding places. Most ended up in the forests and fell victim to subsequent forest sweeps, including in the Borek Forest during the winter of 1942–1943, which claimed the lives of 42 Jews.¹⁸

Fewer than 30 Markuszów Jews survived the war. They included Wasserstrum; a few of the approximately 40 partisan survivors; and Leopold Lind, his wife Janina, and their children, Robert and Kamila. The Linds, who fled to Warsaw, were aided by Zofia Sokołowska, a friend, and Zofia Socha (later Młodawska), their nanny, who lived with the family until the war's end.¹⁹

SOURCES The yizkor book, David Sztokfisz, ed., Hurbn un gvure fun shtetl Markushov (Tel Aviv: Farayn fun Markushoyer landslayt in Yisrael, 1955), includes many testimonies by survivors. It has been translated into Hebrew, Hurbanah u-gevuratab shel ha-'ayarah Markushov (Tel Aviv: Irgun yots'e Markushov, 1989).

Secondary accounts touching on the Markuszów Jewish community under German occupation and the ghetto include Abraham Wein, Bracha Freundlich, and Wila Orbach, eds., Pinkas ha-kehilot. Encyclopaedia of Jewish Communities: Poland, vol. 7, Lublin and Kielce (Jerusalem: Yad Vashem, 1999), pp. 315–317; and its English-language counterpart, Arnon Rubin, The Rise and Fall of Jewish Communities in Poland and Their Relics Today, vol. 2, District Lublin (Tel Aviv: Tel Aviv University Press, 2007), pp. 190–192.

On the partisan movement, see Shmuel Krakowski, The War of the Doomed: Jewish Armed Resistance in Poland, 1942–1944, trans. Orah Blaustein (New York: Holmes & Meier Publishers, Inc., 1984); and Adam Puławski, “Postrzeganie żydowskich oddziałów partyzanckich przez Armię Krajową i Delegaturę Rządu RP na Kraj,” Pamięć i Sprawiedliwość, no. 2 (4) (2003): 271–300.

Of the communities mentioned in the entry but not given their own entry, the documentation is too sparse to determine whether a ghetto existed there. Garbów, a gmina, in November 1940 was home to 110 Jews (30 families). Here, see the letter from the Garbów Jewish Council chair in the Markuszów AJDC documentation at USHMM, Acc.1999.A.0154 [AŻIH], 210/486, p. 21. A discussion of Jewish life in Garbów after the deportations appears in IPN-Kat, S 61/01/ZK, pp. 2156–2173, 2316–2327, a controversial case involving the immediate postwar activities of the partisan and Garbów survivor Salomon Morel.

Archival documentation pertaining to the history of the Markuszów Jewish community during World War II includes APL (e.g., 498 [273]); AŻIH (e.g., 210/486, 211/685, 301/1478); IPN (e.g., Ankiety, ASG); IPN-Lu (e.g., 2/67/1-6, 284 [394/1-2, 397/1-2, 469/1-2, 473/1-2]); USHMM (Acc.1997.A.0124 [AŻIH 211]; Acc.1999.A.0154 [AŻIH 210]; RG-15.019M [IPN ASG]; RG-15.084 [AŻIH 301]); VHF (# 28528, 31955); and YVA.

Laura Crago

NOTES

1. USHMM, Acc.1999.A.0154, AJDC, 210/486, pp. 24, 27, 58.
2. Ibid., p. 27; Sztokfisz, Hurbn, p. 163.
3. Sztokfisz, Hurbn, pp. 163–164.
4. Ibid., pp. 163, 257; USHMM, Acc.1999.A.0154, 210/486, p. 27.
5. USHMM, Acc.1999.A.0154, 210/486, pp. 3, 57.
6. AŻIH, 301/1478, p. 4 (typescript).
7. Sztokfisz, Hurbn, p. 258.
8. AŻIH, 301/1478, p. 4.
9. Sztokfisz, Hurbn, p. 257.
10. AŻIH, 301/1478, pp. 4–5.
11. Ibid., p. 4.
12. Sztokfisz, Hurbn, pp. 258–259.
13. USHMM, RG-15.019M (IPN), ASG, reel 15, 49/104.
14. Sztokfisz, Hurbn, p. 260.
15. USHMM, RG-15.019M, reel 6, 16/796.
16. Ibid., 16/794–95.
17. Ibid., 16/797 and 16/793, respectively.
18. Ibid., 16/792.
19. VHF, # 31955, testimony of Zofia Młodawska.

MIĘDZYRZEC PODLASKI

Pre-1939: Międzyrzec Podlaski (Yiddish: Mezritsch or Mezrych), town, Radzyń Podlaski powiat, Lublin województwo, Poland; 1939–1944: Meseritz, Kreis Radzyn, Distrikt Lublin, General-gouvernement; post-1998: Międzyrzec Podlaski, Biała Podlaska powiat, Lublin województwo, Poland

Międzyrzec Podlaski lies 100 kilometers (62 miles) north of Lublin. The town's August 1939 population of around 16,000 included 12,000 Jews.

A Wehrmacht unit occupied Międzyrzec on September 13, 1939, but soon abandoned it to Soviet occupation. Soviet forces arrived on September 25, 1939. Ten days later, they joined the regional Soviet evacuation behind the Bug River. Approximately 2,000 Międzyrzec Jews followed them. On October 9, the Germans reoccupied Międzyrzec.

From the occupation's outset, German authorities evicted Jews from the wealthiest neighborhoods in central and northern Międzyrzec.¹ The evictees almost all were resettled in the poorest Jewish neighborhood, known as Szmulowizna. Located in eastern Międzyrzec, the neighborhood stretched from Brzeska Street to the Krzna River. About 1,800 of the town's Jews were relocated there.

The residents of Szmulowizna also sheltered thousands of Jewish deportees. By April 1940, 3,500 expellees—from Nasielsk, Gdynia, Kalisz, Łódź, Pułtusk, Rybnik, and Serock—resided in Międzyrzec. In November 1940, 350 deportees arrived from Kraków and another 1,400 from Mława. In January 1941, the SS brought 300 former prisoners of war (POWs) to Międzyrzec. By then, Międzyrzec was home to some 4,000 Jewish newcomers, both voluntary refugees and expellees. After the arrival of 780 expellees from Mielec on March 14, 1942, the Jewish population of 16,555 included 5,480 refugees. The Jewish population crested at 17,546 with the May arrival of 1,025 Slovak deportees.²

Because so many Jews were concentrated in Szmulowizna, many survivors believe an open ghetto existed in Międzyrzec

A section of the Międzyrzec Podlaski ghetto, as seen through the barbed-wire fence surrounding it, October 1942 to May 1943. USHMM WS #46319, COURTESY OF STA. HAMBURG from the early fall of 1940. However, Gitel Donath, a September 1941 voluntary arrival from Siedlce, recalls that some Jews, including wealthier deportees, lived in southern neighborhoods in Polish-owned and -occupied buildings. In April 1942, moreover, Jewish charity officials reported on the Jewish Social Self-Help (JSS) ghetto questionnaire that neither an open nor a closed ghetto existed in Międzyrzec.³ (In Distrikt Lublin, open ghettos were defined territorially, rather than by Hans Frank's November 1941 orders imposing the death penalty on Jews found outside their places of registration without permission.)

Officially, a ghetto was established in Międzyrzec only after the first deportation Aktion on August 25–26, 1942. During the Aktion, members of Reserve Police Battalion 101, Ukrainian SS auxiliaries from Trawniki, local Gendarmes, and SS from Radzyń, rounded up and forced 8,000 to 11,000 Jews onto trains destined for the Treblinka extermination camp. A surviving railway schedule indicates the deportation train of 50 wagons departed Międzyrzec at 9:30 A.M., only to return at 9:42 P.M. for another trip to Treblinka the next morning.⁴ Almost all the deportees were gassed on arrival. Another 960 to 1,800 Jews were shot dead in Międzyrzec. The victims accounted for one third to more than one half of the 3,000 Jews killed in Międzyrzec during the deportations.⁵

An enclosed ghetto immediately was created for approximately 6,000 to 7,000 Jews retained for work outside the labor camp system. The ghetto encompassed 6 hectares (14.8 acres) of land, including the Szmulowizna neighborhood and some of the Polish neighborhood, near Jatkowa and Warszawska Streets.⁶ Most survivors recall its sole residents initially were members of the Jewish Council, led by Szymon Klarberg, and the Jewish Police. Ordered to sleep at work sites during the deportation, the remaining Jews were ordered to the ghetto only in early September.

A barbed-wire fence surrounded the ghetto. Initially, Ukrainian SS auxiliaries guarded the fence from the outside; local auxiliary Polish (Blue) Police soon replaced them.⁷ The Jewish Police maintained security inside the ghetto. Inmates left for work under Jewish Police escort through two gates, including one on Brzeska Street. Otherwise, Jews were forbidden, under penalty of death, to leave the ghetto. SS-Untersturmführer Franz Adolf Fischer, head of the Radzyń office of the Security Police, was responsible for the ghetto. In practice, Kurt Heine and Karl Leiter, two junior officers, oversaw its day-to-day operations. Members of the Międzyrzec Gendarmerie post, most notably Franz Bauer, also exercised considerable authority.⁸

After several Treblinka escapees returned to Międzyrzec, the ghetto inmates learned that the deportees had been murdered. Some fell into deep despair. Others, determined to evade a future deportation, constructed elaborately concealed hiding places. Most inmates labored in their previous jobs, including at a tannery and a brush-making workshop in Międzyrzec, on local road construction crews, as agricultural laborers on an estate in Aleksandrówka, digging and drying peat at a farm in Wysokie, in water irrigation labor in Rogoźnica, hewing trees in forests near Sokule, and cutting the timber at local sawmills and loading it onto trains. Others worked as domestic or agricultural servants for local ethnic Germans and Poles. About 40 inmates, mostly craftsmen, maintained the Gendarmerie post. Others staffed a kitchen at a canteen established for the members of Reserve Police Battalion 101, stationed in Międzyrzec from September to liquidate the Jewish communities of Kreise Biała Podlaska and Radzyń.

The Międzyrzec ghetto also served as a collection and transit ghetto. Between September 26 and 29, 1942, members of Police Battalion 101, the SS auxiliaries, Security Police, and Polish police transferred to the ghetto almost all the approximately 12,300 surviving Jews of Kreis Biała Podlaska, except those incarcerated in labor camps.⁹ Imprisoned at the synagogue (and probably other buildings), the 5,000 to 6,000 expellees, mainly women, children, and the elderly, were sent to Treblinka on October 6. Another 150 were killed at the Jewish cemetery.

That same day, around the midday meal, security forces rounded up nonworking women, children, and the elderly from the Międzyrzec ghetto and imprisoned them at the synagogue. Laborers from the sawmill and some road construction crews also were brought there. The prisoners were held under Jewish Police and armed SS auxiliary and German police guard.¹⁰ On October 7 or 8, almost all the Jews from smaller communities in northern Kreis Radzyń (consolidated earlier in Parczew) were transferred to Międzyrzec. On October 9, the synagogue prisoners and the Parczew deportees were sent to Treblinka. The October 7–9 deportation included about 7,000 Jews in Międzyrzec. (The overall number probably was greater. Biała Podlaska survivor Mojsze Fajgenbaum recalls the October 6 train originated at that town's railway station, where mainly labor camp inmates were forced onto the wagons.)¹¹

Because hundreds had evaded the deportations or jumped from the trains, the ghetto population, which likely stood at 5,000 to 7,000, included a significant number of women and children from Międzyrzec and fugitives from the Kreis Biała Podlaska and Parczew deportations. The ghetto area was then reduced by half, forcing some 10 to 25 people to reside in a single room. Rations were suspended. Some 30 people perished daily, mainly from illnesses related to starvation and from typhus.¹² The Gendarmes and Polish (Blue) Police shot Jews found illegally outside the ghetto bartering material possessions for food. Labor crews were established to clear and sort the belongings of the deported.

In mid-October 1942, 219 older family members and children of agricultural laborers in Wohyń were transferred to Międzyrzec.¹³ Between October 14 and 16, another 1,000 to 2,000 Jews arrived from Radzyń. The expellees were imprisoned at the synagogue and in buildings outside the ghetto. Late one night, inebriated Gendarmes, including Bauer, Heine, and a group of ethnic Germans, opened fire on one makeshift prison, a barracks at a sawmill, killing more than 100 Radzyń deportees. The next morning, Fischer promised to spare the lives of survivors, if they came out of hiding, by marching them to the ghetto.¹⁴ On October 27, members of Reserve Police Battalion 101 and an SS contingent led by Heine sent the Wołyń expellees and almost all the other Radzyń deportees to their deaths at Treblinka, in the third Międzyrzec deportation.

The next day, on October 28, 1942, Wilhelm Krüger, the Higher SS and Police Leader of the Generalgouvernement, named Międzyrzec one of eight Jewish residential areas in Distrikt Lublin. Around October 30, additional Jews arrived in Międzyrzec under armed escort. The deportees included children of labor camp inmates in Suchowola and others, presumably members of property clearing crews and labor camp inmates from a geographic area spanning from Łuków to Terespol.¹⁵ Incarcerated at the synagogue and in abandoned Jewish properties just beyond the ghetto, many deportees, deprived of food and water, perished before members of the Reserve Police Battalion 101 cleared the buildings on November 7–9 by sending the survivors to their deaths at Treblinka.¹⁶ Some of the Międzyrzec ghetto inmates were included in the deportation, which aimed to retain just 1,000 young, male inmates for labor.¹⁷ Because so many hid, the ghetto population likely stood closer to 3,000.

After the deportation, the ghetto was again reduced to half its size. A seven-month period of relative calm encouraged a large number of fugitives hiding in forests or among the local population to enter the ghetto voluntarily. Jews from some 70 different localities resided there. The Jewish Council restored a tiny part of its extensive preghetto welfare institutions, including a sanitation commission and medical clinic.

In late December 1942, German officials from the Trawniki concentration camp established a temporary registration office to recruit Jews for “voluntary” deportation. An SS officer overseeing the road construction crews informed ghetto residents that Trawniki offered the only hope for survival.¹⁸ Some 500 to 550 employees of the brush-making workshop, whose industrial plant was disassembled and sent to Trawniki, were given three days to register for deportation. Included in the December 30, 1942, voluntary resettlement were a number of involuntary deportees, including the remaining Jews in Wołyń (save for about 50 killed during the deportation). The next day, New Year’s Eve 1942, inebriated Security Police from Biała Podlaska “celebrated” the holiday by dragging ghetto residents from their beds and shooting them. Some 56 to 65 people were killed. Scores more were wounded.

On May 1–4, 1943, members of Reserve Police Battalion 101, Ukrainian SS auxiliaries, and the Radzyń SS renewed deportations from Międzyrzec. The Germans and Ukrainians surrounded the ghetto, relied on informants to locate ghetto bunkers, and demolished walls to uncover hidden Jews. All the Aleksandrówka and Suchowola labor camp inmates were included in the expulsion.¹⁹ Most of the 2,000 to 3,000 deportees were gassed at Treblinka. A small group was sent to Majdanek. Some 200 to 800 Jews were executed at the Jewish cemetery. (The figures vary in survivors’ accounts.) Among the victims were the Jewish Council members and most of the Jewish Police.

After the Aktion, the ghetto was reduced to about two streets. Many more of its approximately 1,500 inmates worked for the office of property liquidation sorting “abandoned” Jewish belongings at the synagogue. Lubicz, a longtime SS informant, now named the Jewish “ghetto commander,” recruited a Jewish police force. Most survivors blame him for turning over unregistered fugitives to the Gendarmerie. (These Jews were shot.) Survivor Lejb Goldberg maintains Lubicz suggested the Germans rely on chicanery, which left inmates unprepared for another deportation on May 26, 1943, and institute strip search (ostensibly for property stolen from the synagogue) at a railway station barracks.²⁰ That day, some 700 to 1,000 Jews arrived nearly naked at Majdanek.

Officially, only 300 Jews—a small clearing crew and the Jewish Police—remained in the ghetto. (The actual population was probably double.) On July 17 or 18, 1943, the Polish underground killed two Germans. Maintaining the Jews also were responsible for the murders, Leutnant Dreyer, a member of the Schutzpolizei unit assigned to Międzyrzec, ordered the ghetto liquidated.²¹ Some 23 to 35 ghetto inmates were killed during the Aktion. Four German policemen transported (by truck) another 120 to 179 Jews and 3 Polish-Christian suspects to Piaski, a local livestock burial ground, and killed them.²²

Only a small part of the Międzyrzec deportees retained for labor at Majdanek were transferred to other camps (mainly Skarżysko-Kamienna and Auschwitz) before November 1943, when the Germans shot dead the Jewish inmates of Majdanek and Trawniki during the “Aktion Erntefest” massacres. A smaller group of fugitives attempted to survive by adopting false identities as Polish Christians and working as forced laborers in the Reich or by hiding locally, some with Poles, but many more in vacated Jewish residences in Międzyrzec or in nearby forests. Many local fugitives perished in forest raids organized by the Germans, as a result of denunciations by the local population, and at Polish hands. Of the at least 30,000 Jews who passed through the Międzyrzec ghetto, only 300 survived the war.

At least 16 Germans, 6 Poles, and 1 Jew suspected of contributing to the liquidation of the Międzyrzec Jewish community or the ghetto were tried after the war in either Poland or West Germany, though in four cases for mass killings of non-Jews. Ten Germans were found guilty. Most served little or no prison time. Three of the 5 suspects tried in Poland, including Franz Fischer and Wilhelm Trapp, the commander of the Reserve Police Battalion 101, received death sentences. Trapp, though, was convicted of mass killings of Poles in Talcyn and of Soviet prisoners of war. He was executed in 1948.²³ Fischer, convicted of numerous mass killings, including of Jews in Międzyrzec, was hanged in 1949. The outcomes of the Polish collaborators’ trials are largely unknown.²⁴ A 10-person court appointed by Jewish survivors sentenced 1 Pole to death for murdering a fugitive from the ghetto liquidation. It submitted to Polish prosecutors its findings for 3 Jewish suspects. Two of the men, Lubicz and Szymon Tob (Topf), a former Jewish policeman, were arrested but escaped from prison in 1946 and joined the third suspect abroad.²⁵ Because Tob disappeared during his trial, a Polish court waited six months before resuming the proceedings without him in July. In January 1949, Tob was sentenced to death for revealing to the Gestapo the hiding places of Jews during the deportations.²⁶

SOURCES Secondary sources about the Międzyrzec Jewish community during the German occupation or about the collection and transit ghetto of Międzyrzec include the relevant parts of Christopher R. Browning, Ordinary Men: Reserve Police Battalion 101 and the Final Solution in Poland (New York: HarperCollins, 1992); Artur Domański, Żydzi w Międzyrzeczu Podlaskim (Międzyrzec Podlaski: Towarzystwo Przyjaciół Nauk w Międzyrzeczu Podlaskim, 2009); M.J. Fajgenbaum, Podlaskie in umkum: Notitsn fun ħurban (Munich: Aroysgegebn fun der Tsentraler Historisher Komisye baym Ts. K. fun di bafrayte Yidn in der Amerikaner Zone in Daytshland, 1948); H. Rylski, “Międzyrzec in the Period of the Hitlerite Occupation,” Bleter far Geszichte 9:3–4 (1955); Abraham Wein, Bracha Freundlich, and Wila Orbach, eds., Pinkas ba-kebilot. Encyclopaedia of Jewish Communities: Poland, vol. 7, Lublin and Kielce (Jerusalem: Yad Vashem, 1999), pp. 305–310; and its English-language counterpart, Arnon Rubin, The Rise and Fall of the Jewish Communities in Poland and Their Relics Today, vol. 2, District Lublin (Tel Aviv: Tel Aviv University Press, 2007), pp. 194–200.

Survivors contributed memoirs to all four Międzyrzec yizkor books, among them, Yosef Horn, Mezritsh: Zamlbukh in beylikn ondenk fun di umgekumene Yidn in undzer geboyrn-shtot in Poyln (Buenos Aires: Aroysgegebn fun Mezritsher landslayt-farayn in Argentine, 1952); and Nathan Livneh, ed., Pinkas ba-kebilah Mez'irish (Tel Aviv: Hutsa le-or 'al yede Va'ad yots'e Mezirish be-Yisrael, 1973). Additional memoirs include Moshe Brezniak and Naphtali Brezniak, Atse ba-livneh ba-zekufim: Lohem Yebudi ba-tsava ba-Polani, be-Geto Mezerits' uvva-mahanot (Jerusalem: Yad Vashem, 2003); the testimony of Lejb Goldberg, in Michał Grynberg and Maria Kotowska, eds., Życie i zagłada Żydów polskich, 1939–1945: Relacje świadków (Warsaw: Oficyna Naukowa, 2003), pp. 113–118, a translation of part of the 68-page Yiddish-language testimony cited below at AŻIH, 302/95; Joe Rosenblum, with David Kohn, Defy the Darkness: A Tale of Courage in the Shadow of Mengele (Westport, CT: Praeger, 2001); Rywka Rybak, A Survivor of the Holocaust (Cleveland, OH: Tricycle Press, 1993); Gitel Donath, My Bones Don't Rest in Auschwitz: A Lonely Battle to Survive German Tyranny (Montreal: Kaplan Publishing, 1999); and “Irena (Agata) Bołdok (Likierman),” in Jakub Gutenbaum and Agnieszka Latała, eds., The Last Eyewitnesses: Children of the Holocaust Speak, trans. Julian Bussgang and Fay Bussgang, 2 vols. (Evanston, IL: Northwestern University Press, 1998), vol. 2, pp. 27–35.

For memoirs and published interviews by survivors from communities consolidated in the Międzyrzec transit ghetto or by those who sought temporary shelter there, see, among others, Oscar Pinkus, The House of Ashes (Cleveland, OH: World Publishing Company, 1964); Joseph Schupack, Tote Jahre: Eine jüdische Leidensgeschichte (Tübingen: Katzmann, 1984), in English translation as The Dead Years, trans. Paul Kleinbart (New York: Holocaust Library, 1986); and “Dwojra Zielona,” in Zofia Nałkowska, Medaliony (Warsaw: Czytelnik, 1946), available in English as Medallions, trans. Diana Kuprel (Northwestern, IL: Northwestern University Press, 2000), pp. 29–34.

Relevant German trial verdicts can be found in Justiz und NS-Verbrechen vol. 27 (Amsterdam: Amsterdam University Press, 2003), Lfd. Nr. 670, and vol. 41 (2009), Lfd. Nr. 833.

Contemporary press coverage includes from Gazeta Żydowska, December 20, 1940, no. 44, p. 4; October 17, 1941, no. 99, p. 2; November 19, 1941, no. 113, p. 2; February 11, 1942, no. 18, p. 3; March 6, 1942, no. 28, p. 4; March 18, 1942, no. 33, p. 3; March 22, 1942, no. 35, p. 4. Biała Podlaska Kreishauptmann Hubert Kühl's directive forewarning that Jews throughout the Kreis were to be deported to Międzyrzec between September 25 and 29, 1942, can be found in Józef Kermisz, ed., Dokumenty i materiały do dziejów okupacji niemieckiej w Polsce, vol. 2, Akcje i wysiedlenia (Łódź: CŻKHWP, 1946), pt. 1, pp. 57–58.

Archival documentation includes AŻIH (e.g., 210/492, 211 [132, pp. 7, 50; 142, pp. 19, 27, 29, 32, 49–55; 143, pp. 25–26; 646, pp. 49, 51; 699; 886, p. 29; 890, pp. 14, 21, 59, 66, 72; 891, pp. 30, 45, 48, 81, 88–91, 94], 214, 301 [71, 1946, 2019, 2091, 2236, 2397, 2404, 2940, 3237, 3502, 4371, 4477, 4516, 5423], 302/95); BA-L (e.g., B 162/2190 [ZStL, 208 AR-Z 236/60, vol. 8]); FVA (HVT [730, 1638, 1721, 1869, 2751, 3237, 3502]); IPN (e.g., ASG, SAL [72, 139], SOS BP [12, 15, 15a, 15b, 16–19, 20, 20a, 23, 41, 43–45]; IPN-Lu (e.g., 131/61/1–57, 415/67/1–2); USHMM (e.g., Acc. 1996.A.0227 [AŻIH 214]; Acc.1997.A.0124 [AŻIH 211]; Acc.1999.A.0154 [AŻIH 210]; RG-15.006 [IPN]; RG-15.019M [IPN ASG] [reel 5, 12/888–891, reel 15, 49/6–8, 14–15, 125, 129–130]; RG-50.030*0073; RG-50.120*0218); VHF (e.g., # 214, 401, 479, 677, 2964, 9390, 13752, 17927, 51694, 12734, 13741, 14339, 16395, 17006, 18103, 30275, 30422, 49629); and YVA.

Laura Crago

NOTES

1. Rosenblum, Defy the Darkness, pp. 12–15.
2. USHMM, Acc.1997.A.0124 (AŻIH), 211/132, p. 50; 211/142, pp. 25–26, 49–55; 211/891, p. 48; Acc.1999.A.0154 (AŻIH), 210/492, p. 1.
3. Ibid., Acc.1997.A.0124, 211/699, p. 11.
4. Ibid., RG-15.006 (IPN), pp. 139–140.
5. Ibid., RG-15.019M (IPN), reel 5, 12/888.
6. Ibid., reel 15, 49/125.
7. VHF, # 14339, testimony of Dora Abend.
8. BA-L, B 162/2190, pp. 1438–1443 (deposition, Edward Bleiweiss).
9. Kermisz, Dokumenty, vol. 2, pt. 1, pp. 57–58.
10. AŻIH, 301/2019, testimony of Elias Magid, pp. 6–7; Lejb Goldberg testimony, in Grynberg and Kotowska, Życie, pp. 113–114.
11. AŻIH, 301/71, testimony of Mojsze Josef Fajgenbaum, pp. 3–4, 6.
12. USHMM, RG-15.019M, reel 15, 49/125.
13. AŻIH, 301/2091, testimony of Halina Petruszka, p. 1.
14. Ibid., 301/2019, pp. 7–8; Goldberg, in Grynberg and Kotowska, Życie, p. 114.
15. AŻIH, 301/2767, testimony of Michał Himmelblau, p. 3; 301/2019, p. 8.
16. Goldberg, in Grynberg and Kotowska, Życie, p. 114.
17. AŻIH, 301/2019, pp. 8–9.
18. Donath, My Bones, pp. 121–123; Goldberg, in Grynberg and Kotowska, Życie, pp. 114–115.

19. USHMM, RG-15.019M, reel 15, 49/129; AŻIH, 301/2767, p. 3.
20. AŻIH, 301/3502, testimony of Lejb Goldberg, pp. 1–2.
21. Ibid., 301/2019, pp. 9–10.
22. Goldberg, in Grynberg and Kotowska, Życie, pp. 116–117; USHMM, RG-15.019M, reel 5, 12/889.
23. IPN, SOS BP, 15–19.
24. Ibid., 12, 20, 20a, 23; SAL 72, 139.
25. AŻIH, 301/3502, pp. 3–4.
26. IPN, SOS BP, 15, 15a, 15b.

OPOLE

Pre-1939: Opole (Yiddish: Apla), town, Puławy powiat, Lublin województwo, Poland; 1939–1944: Kreis Pulawy, Distrikt Lublin, Generalgouvernement; post-1998: Opole Lubelskie, Puławy powiat, Lublin województwo, Poland

Opole lies 51 kilometers (32 miles) southwest of Lublin. In 1939, its pre-war population of 6,500 included 4,325 Jews.

On occupying Opole in mid-September 1939, the Germans ordered Jews to surrender a monetary “contribution.” They released 20 to 50 hostages on its receipt.¹ Additional anti-Jewish decrees mandated wearing white armbands and forced labor. Jews fleeing war devastation in Kurów and Markuszów settled in Opole.²

The Germans ordered a Judenrat established before April 1940. Jakob Nussbaum was its first chair.³ The 18-person council organized a Jewish police force, composed of 30 men, to help organize labor conscription.

On December 29–30, 1939, the Jewish community from Puławy, the Kreis center, and some 300 Jews (150 families) from Józefów nad Wisłą were expelled to Opole. In May 1940, 847 of the 1,965 Jewish refugees in Opole were Puławy expellees.⁴ The refugees included many Nałęczów expellees. Nałęczów youth, ordered to a labor camp in Antopol (Puławy powiat), joined their families in Opole in the fall of 1940.⁵ On February 15 and 26, 1941, 2,006 mostly elderly Jews arrived from Vienna.

The Viennese Jews’ arrival prompted Puławy Kreishauptmann Alfred Brandt to order a ghetto established in Opole. Survivor Zrubawel Werba remembers his parents trading apartments with a Pole living in western Opole, the area designated for the ghetto, and moving their belongings there.⁶ On March 15, 1941, local German authorities gave Poles still living in the ghetto 24 hours to vacate their residences and Jews several hours to relocate there.

The ghetto, roughly a rectangular shape, spanned 121,500 square meters (30 acres), bounded in the west by Nowa Street, in the south by Józefów, Nowy Rynek, and Stary Rynek Streets, and in the east by Lublin Street. In June 1941, a 2.5-meter-high (8.2-foot-high) wooden fence replaced the barbed wire surrounding the ghetto. The fence’s three gates were on Józefów and Nowa Streets, at the corner of Stary and Nowy Rynek Streets, and on Długa Street. In May 1941, the Krakauer Zeitung maintained the Opole ghetto’s establishment had furthered the Germanization and “beautification” of Distrikt Lublin.⁷ That month, regional Jewish Social Self-Help (JSS) authorities listed the ghetto’s population at 8,000: 4,500 native Jews and 3,500 refugees, including 2,000 Viennese.⁸

Horst Göde, from 1942 the Opole Landkommissar, served as the German ghetto “commissar.” The Krakauer Zeitung lauded him as a model National Socialist administrator who cut bureaucratic red tape and sent Jews to work for a “useful purpose.”⁹ However, Jewish survivors recall Göde demanding craftsmen remodel the palace in Niezdów for his personal residence, ordering valuables surrendered, and organizing attacks, including the July 1941 execution of 30 ghetto hospital patients, and in 1942, the kidnapping, rape, and murder of young Jewish teenagers. Survivors remember German Gendarmes, Ukrainian Sonderdienst, and the Polish auxiliary police at various times guarding the ghetto and its gates from the outside. The Jewish Police patrolled the same areas from inside the ghetto.

Ghetto residents were conscripted for numerous forced labor projects, including in Opole for road construction, train station labor, and sugar refinery work. Women cleaned the residences and offices of German authorities and cooked at SS and police mess halls. Some conscripts worked at agricultural or forestry labor in villages near Opole. Many male Jews were sent to labor camps, including in Gołab (Puławy powiat) for railway construction, outside of Józefów nad Wisłą for quarry labor, and in Józefów for a dam building project on the Wyżnica River.¹⁰

Overcrowding forced between 7 and 10 people to live in each of the 950 rooms located in the ghetto’s 300 residential dwellings. Because the Viennese had been permitted only 50 kilograms (110 pounds) of luggage each and were stripped of their German currency and issued just 40 złoty on arrival, half could not pay to rent rooms in the ghetto. The Jewish Council provided materials for them to construct wooden Jews line up to receive packages at the post office in Opole, shortly before the ghetto’s enclosure, May 1941.

USHMM WS #45836, COURTESY OF LILLI SCHISCHA TAUBER

barracks in which to live.¹¹ Photographs sent in June and July 1941 to Lilli Schischa Tauber by her parents show families sleeping in double- and triple-tiered wooden bunks.¹²

The overcrowding and poor sanitary conditions created by the lack of indoor plumbing and the presence of just two wells resulted in a typhus epidemic in the winter of 1941–1942. “H.E.,” a deportee from Vienna, reported that some 300 inhabitants had died from typhus by mid-November 1941.¹³ Another 200 people perished before the epidemic was controlled.

Meager rations required ghetto residents to develop illegal trading networks to survive. Initially, Poles, permitted to enter the ghetto to seek the services of Jewish craftsmen, smuggled food to barter. However, in June 1941, orders forbade Poles entrance to the ghetto. A drastic decline in ghetto living standards followed, forcing almost all families to find other means to barter material possessions or services for food. Some survivors note it was relatively easy to escape from the ghetto because the Polish and Ukrainian guards accepted bribes, though they acknowledge hundreds were shot dead for taking similar risks.¹⁴ Bribes also enabled Poles to barter food at openings in the ghetto fence. However, as hunger among the Jewish population intensified, food prices also increased.¹⁵

The Viennese refugees’ situation was particularly dire. Lacking local connections, they depended on the most expensive forms of black market trade for survival. One evacuee estimated she needed 45,000 złoty per month to subsidize her daughter and herself.¹⁶ As many as 200 younger Viennese escaped from the ghetto in small groups in the summer of 1941 and attempted to return home. Most were arrested. After serving brief prison sentences for possessing sums in Polish złoty, considered for them a foreign currency, those under the age of 18 were sent to forced labor camps in Distrikt Krakau. The others were returned to Opole.¹⁷

In Opole, the needs of the Viennese refugees limited the Jewish Council’s and the local JSS’s assistance to local refugees and impoverished Jews. From June to August 1941, the organizations spent 77,271 złoty to provide the Viennese blankets, bedding, and two daily meals; to build barracks; to outfit a kitchen and a 25-bed medical clinic; and to bury the dead. Because the JSS and the American Jewish Joint Distribution Committee (AJDC) covered just 7,300 złoty in costs, the organizations financed the projects by suspending aid to 1,500 local refugees and using funds designated for a community kitchen for all ghetto residents.¹⁸

From the spring of 1942, the SS consolidated in the ghetto Jews from the southern and western parts of the Kreis to facilitate their expulsion to extermination camps or to the forced labor camp in Poniatowa. (A narrow-gauge railway ran from Opole to Poniatowa and to Nałęczów. The latter was the transfer point to the main railway leading to the extermination camps in Bełżec and Sobibór.) From March 19–26, 200 labor camp inmates from near Nałęczów, 900 to 2,000 Jews from Kazimierz Dolny, and 800 to 1,000 Wąwolnica Jews were brought to the ghetto. In April, Jews arrived from small villages around Opole, including Lubomirka and Wólka Kątna.¹⁹ That month, a report in Gazeta Żydowska placed the Opole ghetto population at 11,200.²⁰ On May 7, 1,400 to 2,000 Jews from Józefów were marched to the ghetto; about 100 were killed on the way. Between April 22 and May 25, five transports carried 4,302 Slovak Jews to Opole. Some Polish eyewitnesses also recall French Jews arriving in the ghetto during the same period; however, the only documentation for French transports to Distrikt Lublin is from 1943. Most Slovak Jews were sent to labor camps; some 1,400 were consolidated in the ghetto.

Most new ghetto arrivals were sent within weeks to their deaths. On March 30, 1942, the first 1,950 Jews, including all the Kazimierz Dolny deportees, were held prisoner overnight in three barracks located about a kilometer (0.6 mile) outside the ghetto. The next day, they were expelled to Nałęczów: women and children via the railway and men on foot. There, they were ordered onto trains destined for Bełżec. On May 25, 2,000 more Jews were expelled to Nałęczów. Because no trains were waiting there, the expellees were imprisoned for two days at a transit camp, located in Strzelce, about 1 kilometer (0.6 mile) north of Nałęczów, before being sent to Sobibór.²¹ The deported included the Józefów Jews, those from smaller nearby villages, and longer-term ghetto residents without work documents. On October 15, some 600 ghetto inmates were sent to the Poniatowa labor camp. From October 24–26, almost all the remaining 8,000 ghetto inhabitants were ordered to the Strzelce transit camp: women and children in peasant carts and men on foot. The deportees were sent to their deaths at Sobibór. Several hundred Jews were held back for labor at Poniatowa.

Historian Bogdan Musiał maintains Brandt rejected SS support to liquidate the ghetto; instead, he relied on Göde and German and Polish (Blue) Police. However, survivors recall Ukrainian forces playing a major role and maintain the SS shot 500 people dead in searches for hidden Jews during the final ghetto liquidation. The bodies were packed into the deportation barracks and incinerated.

The number of Opole ghetto survivors is unknown. Of the approximately 100 Opole Jews retained for labor at Sobibór, only 2, Hersz Cukierman and his son, survived until the uprising in October 1943 and lived to see the war’s end. Almost all other Opole survivors had sought shelter with Poles on the eve of the ghetto liquidation. The family of forester Stanisław Stankiewicz assisted 65 Opole Jews hidden in four forest bunkers and on their property in the Głodno Woods; however, a denunciation led to the murder of those in the bunkers. Six fugitives, including Jan Śmulewicz, concealed in the family’s outbuildings, survived the war. A number of Opole Jews fled to Warsaw, where they contributed militarily to the August 1944 Polish insurrection against German rule.

In 1943, a Nazi Party Court in Lublin convicted Göde of murdering two Polish women. He received an 18-month prison term. The Russians killed Brandt in 1945 at Stolp (now Słupsk, Poland).

SOURCES Most of the JSS materials document the Viennese refugees. The photography collections at USHMMPA and YVA also are from Viennese refugees. Photographs taken by members of the Werba family, from Opole, appear in Zrubawel Werba's VHF testimony. (Because the Germans arrested the only Polish photographer in Opole, the Werba family received a concession to provide limited photographic services in the ghetto to local German officials.)

Several contemporary press articles appeared on the Opole ghetto, including "Die Stadt Opole schuf Judenghetto: Um den alten Marktplatz gelegen—Verschönerung des Stadtbildes im Gange," and G[ustav] A[ndraschko], "'Verlängerter Arm' der Verwaltung: Beim Landkommissar von Opole—Die 'Stadt im Grünen'—Gemüseanbau im Ghetto," Krakauer Zeitung (hereafter cited as KrZ), May 16, 1941, and April 26, 1942; "Opole Lubelskie," Gazeta Żydowska, April 10, 1942, p. 5. Some German documentation for Opole can be found in Tatiana Berenstein et al., eds., Faschismus, Getto, Massenmord: Dokumentation über Ausrottung und Widerstand der Juden in Polen während des zweiten Weltkrieges (Frankfurt: Röderberg-Verlag, 1960), pp. 62–63, 271–272.

The yizkor book, David Shtokfish, ed., Sefer Opolah-Lubelski (Tel Aviv: Irgun yots'e Opolah bi-medinat Yisrael uva-tefutsot, 1977), includes testimonies from survivors, including Werba. Letters from expellees to the ghetto can be found in Else Behrend-Rosenfeld and Gertrud Luckner, eds., Lebenszeichen aus Piaski: Briefe Deportierter aus dem Distrikt Lublin 1940–1943 (Munich: Deutscher Taschenbuch Verlag GmbH, 1970), pp. 132–141, for Viennese refugees; Archiwum Ringelbluma, vol. 1, Listy o Zagładzie, ed. Ruta Sakowska (Warsaw: ŻIH and PWN, 1997), pp. 136–141, from a Kazimierz Dolny expellee; and the AJDC documentation for Opole, cited above, for correspondence from Puławy refugees.

Secondary sources for the Opole ghetto include Eugeniusz Kosik, "Martyrologia i zagłada Żydów w Opolu Lubelskim," BŻIH 150:2 (1989): 73–83, with a synthesized English translation by Opole Lubelskie schoolchildren available on the Web site of the Foundation of the Preservation of Jewish Heritage in Poland (Fundacja Ochrony Dziedzictwa Żydowskiego); and the relevant entry in Abraham Wein, Bracha Freundlich, and Wila Orbach, eds., Pinkas ha-kehilot. Encyclopaedia of Jewish Communities: Poland, vol. 7, Lublin and Kielce (Jerusalem: Yad Vashem, 1999), pp. 64–67, available in English translation on Jewishgen, at www.jewishgen.org/yizkor/pinkas_poland/pol7_00064.html; and Arnon Rubin, The Rise and Fall of Jewish Communities in Poland and Their Relics Today, vol. 2, District Lublin (Tel Aviv: Tel Aviv University Press, 2007), pp. 205–208.

Horst Göde's publicity while Landkommissar is discussed in Lars Jockheck, Propaganda im Generalgouvernement: Die NS-Besatzungspresse für Deutsche und Polen 1939–1945 (Osnabrück: Fibre, 2006). Additional information, particularly about the careers of Brandt and Göde, is in Bogdan Musial, Deutsche Zivilverwaltung und Judenverfolgung im Generalgouvernement: Eine Fallstudie zum Distrikt Lublin, 1939–1944 (Wiesbaden: Harrassowitz, 1999).

Of the towns and villages mentioned in the entry but not treated independently in this volume, confusion exists about whether a ghetto existed in Józefów nad Wisłą. Because Józefów was destroyed by fire during war operations in September 1939, some 1,168 homeless Jews (258 families), in January 1940, mostly were accommodated in the synagogue and Bet Midrash. In April 1940, they became the first inmates of a labor camp established there. ITS researchers refer to the camp, which averaged about 800 inmates, as a ghetto. The IPN, ASG documentation, available too at USHMM, RG-15.019M, reel 15, 49/117–118, and reel 6, 16/824–25, is similarly confusing, with the first group of questionnaires containing no documentation for a ghetto in Józefów but instead noting the synagogue and Bet Midrash were designated one of two Jewish forced labor camps, but the second group, the records for mass graves, documenting 7 Jews executed on two different dates in March 1943 (more likely in 1942), for escaping from the Józefów ghetto. Why some accounts maintain the Józefów Jews were sent to the extermination camps via the Dęblin ghetto, rather than Opole, is unknown. Further documentation for Józefów includes AŻIH (e.g., 210/390, 301/4985); with copies available at USHMM.

No ghetto existed in Nałęczów, because its German mayor used Nałęczów's status as a resort town to expel its Jewish residents before the start of the 1940 tourist season. The ban probably was related to using the Nałęczów railway station from June 1940 to off-load 5,007 Polish (non-Jewish) expellees from the Warthegau and another 991 from lower Silesia. The first rationale was more important than the second in determining ghetto policy elsewhere in the Kreis, most notably in Kazimierz Dolny. Survivors do not mention ghettos existing in either Lubomirka or Wólka Kątna. For Jewish life in the three places during the war, see the testimonies, cited below, respectively, of Rose Welner, Fajn Brandla, and Hersz Cukierman.

Documentation pertaining to the history of the Opole Jewish community during World War II includes APL (e.g., 498 [273, pp. 21–23]); AŻIH (e.g., Ankiety, 210/527; 211 [134 (pp. 2–3, 10, 20), 135 (pp. 21, 55, 59, 64, 68), 136 (pp. 1, 3, 6, 12, 33–35, 38, 40–41, 47, 49, 97–98), 137 (pp. 3, 25, 44), 138 (pp. 7, 13–15, 18, 42, 64–65, 76, 82–87), 139 (pp. 6, 17, 21, 43), 140 (pp. 41, 43, 48–49), 141 (pp. 10, 34, 36, 47, 49, 53–55, 79–81, 89–90, 95), 142 (pp. 35, 37), 143 (p. 109), 646 (pp. 23, 43), 650 (pp. 1–8), 651 (pp. 38–39), 653 (p. 20)]; 301 [14, 1187, 5818, 5817, 5819]; [943.] Ring I/587); BA-BL (BDC, Akte Göde); ITS (1.2.1.1, VCC 148, Ord. 28); FVA (HVT-78); IPN; IPN-Lu (i.e., 2/67/1-6, 85/67/1-3); USHMM (Acc.1997.A.0124 [AŻIH 211]; Acc.1999.A.0154 [AŻIH 210]; RG-15.079M [AŻIH, Ring]); USHMPA (WS [18349-50, 18624-27, 27119, 45836-44, 77558]; VHF (e.g., # 751, 10209, 18373, 18896, 29824, 31584, 39945, 42114, 51744); and YVA (e.g., O-3 [3554, 4847]; O-16 [1815, 5817]).

Laura Crago and Joseph Robert White

NOTES

1. VHF, # 39945, testimony of Morton Berman.
2. USHMM, Acc.1999.A.0154 (AŻIH), AJDC, 210/527, pp. 5, 105.
3. Ibid., p. 26.
4. Ibid., pp. 4, 17, 56–63.
5. VHF, # 31584, testimony of Rose Welner.
6. Ibid., # 51744, testimony of Zygmunt Werba.
7. KrZ, May 16, 1941.
8. USHMM, Acc.1997.A.0124 (AŻIH), JSS, 211/136, pp. 3, 47.
9. KrZ, April 26, 1942.
10. VHF, # 18373, testimony of Ervin Greenwood.

11. USHMM, Acc.1999.A.0154, 210/527, p. 105.
12. USHMPA, WS # 45840, 45837.
13. H.L. letter, November 19, 1941, in Behrend-Rosenfeld and Luckner, Lebenszeichen, p. 140.
14. VHF, # 39945 # 51744.
15. Ibid., # 31584.
16. J.E. letter, February 21, 1941, in Behrend-Rosenfeld and Luckner, Lebenszeichen, p. 137.
17. VHF, # 751, testimony of Regine Cohen.
18. USHMM, Acc.1999.A.0154, 210/527, pp. 105, 109–115; and Acc.1997.A.0124, 211/138, p. 65; 211/141, pp. 47, 49, 53–55, 79–81, 89–90.
19. AŻIH, 301/1300, testimony of Fajn Brandla, p. 2; and 301/14, p. 1, testimony of Hersz Cukierman, p. 1.
20. Gazeta Żydowska, April 10, 1942, p. 5.
21. USHMM, RG-15.019M (IPN), reel 15, 49/110, pp. 1–2, reel 6, 16/808, pp. 1–2.

OSTRÓW

Pre-1939: Ostrów (Yiddish: Ostruv), town, Włodawa powiat, Lublin województwo, Poland; 1939–1944: Ostrow, initially Kreis Radzyn then Kreis Lublin-Land, Distrikt Lublin, Generalgouvernement; post-1998: Ostrów Lubelski, Lubartów powiat, Lublin województwo, Poland

Ostrów lies 41 kilometers (25.5 miles) northeast of Lublin. In July 1939, its 5,034 inhabitants included 1,994 Jews.

On September 22, 1939, the Red Army occupied Ostrów. With the September 28 demarcation of the Soviet-occupation zone east of the Bug River, the soldiers (and many Jews) abandoned Ostrów. The Germans occupied Ostrów shortly thereafter. In October, German civilian authorities ordered a Jewish Council (Judenrat) established.

That month, Landrat Hennig von Winterfeld, the Kreishauptmann of Radzyn, began establishing a so-called Jewish reservation (Judenreservat) in Ostrów (and Kock) for the Kreis's 32,430 Jewish inhabitants.¹ On October 20, 850 Jews from Lubartów were expelled to Ostrów. On December 15, 851 (of 1,500) Jews arrived from Poznań, including the residents of the Jewish home for the aged.²

Winterfeld appointed Poznań refugee Isidor “Józef” Flanter (or Flatner) the new Jewish Council chair.³ By 1941, a 13-member Jewish police force also had been established. Its commander was Mendel Zyman. Emil Hecht, another Poznań deportee, headed the Ostrów branch of the Jewish Social Self-Help (JSS). In October 1938, he had organized relief for the 17,000 German-Polish Jews expelled by the Germans across the border to Polish Zbąszyń.⁴

Mojżesz Apelbaum, a survivor from Firlej, recalled the German authorities established the Ostrów ghetto just before the Poznań expellees arrived. On the April 1942 JSS ghetto questionnaire, Hecht reported an unfenced open ghetto (dzielnica żydowska) “always” had existed in Ostrów.⁵

The ghettoization order limited new arrivals to 295 residences in the pre-war Jewish neighborhood, located in southwestern Ostrów, including on the market square, Plac

Wolności, and Floriańska, Garbarska, Lubartów, 3 Maja, Minister Pieracki, and Żaba Streets. Before the war, 1,817 Jews had resided there. Apelbaum recalls a simultaneous decree forbade Jews from leaving Ostrów. To reinforce the order, a German Gendarme soon shot a Jew outside the town and then ordered Flanter to dig the man's grave. When the victim regained consciousness, the Gendarme demanded that Flanter bury the man alive.

By early summer 1940, Winterfeld permitted local expellees to leave Ostrów. About 500 Lubartów Jews and 500 Poznań deportees remained. In April 1941, Hecht reported 200 “voluntary deportees” from Lublin, among that city's poorest residents, had arrived so infested with lice and scabies that native Jews had refused them accommodation. The JSS housed the deportees in two large halls. Immediately after the Lublin Jews' arrival, the town council ordered the Jewish Council to establish in a separate building a medical clinic to accommodate 50 sick, elderly, and “incompetent” (niedołężni) deportees and a separate quarantine facility for new arrivals. By August 1941, 3,249 Jews inhabited the Ostrów ghetto's 572 rooms.⁶

In a May 1941 report, Hecht noted 2,441 (of 3,333) ghetto residents were unemployed. Another 830 workers probably were interned in labor camps. (Hecht mentioned 668 Jews were inmates of local labor camps and another 162 were interned at more distant camps.) Another 40 tailors and shoemakers had received concessions to work as craftsmen. Some 50 others officially recognized as craftsmen were denied the concessions.⁷

Chiel (Chil) M. Rajchman mentions living conditions in Ostrów were still tolerable upon his legal transfer from the Warsaw ghetto after the summer of 1941. To survive, he and his sister bartered their possessions with local Poles for food.⁸ Because only the employed received daily rations of 40 grams (1.4 ounces) of bread, many Jews by then had few possessions left to trade. In August, at a school the Germans had permitted the Jews to establish the previous year, one third of the 400 pupils were too malnourished or poorly clothed to register for the new term.⁹

By May 1941, three nutritional centers, a community kitchen, and several additional welfare programs aided all 1,842 of the elderly, sick, young, and unemployed seeking assistance. In August, 130 (of 800) children from age four to seven received two daily meals, including for breakfast a piece of bread with cheese, a glass of milk, and fruit (when available). The kitchen served 600 to 700 adults daily meals. The relatively large welfare program depended on subsidies from Jewish charity organizations and from the German authorities. From October 1940, the Kreislandwirt permitted the Ostrów JSS to purchase monthly from cheaper government stores at least 700 kilograms (1,543 pounds) of kasha and potatoes.¹⁰

Ostrów's September 1, 1941, transfer to Kreis Lublin-Land dismantled the welfare programs, because Kreishauptmann Emil Ziegenmeyer refused to provide the same access to cheaper food sources. An October outbreak of a virulent form of typhus quickly became an epidemic in which initially half the sick perished. Describing the epidemic as “catastrophic,” Marek Alten, the head of the JSS in Distrikt Lublin, secured a 750-złoty subsidy to help pay for medicines. Because the ghetto residents had no access to pharmaceuticals, Hecht asked JSS officials in Kraków to purchase and send a long list of medicines. New sanitary measures forbade Jews to gather. From mid-January 1942, Hecht distributed meals house to house twice daily but could afford to feed just 200 adults and 32 children. In February 1942, 34 new cases of typhus were reported, but the death rate had substantially decreased. Overall, the epidemic likely claimed 75 to 100 lives. In April, some 2,778 Jews resided in the ghetto.¹¹ (Because of the impending deportations, 300 to 400 ghetto residents likely had been interned permanently at labor camps.)

In March 1942, with Operation “Reinhard” tentatively under way in Distrikt Lublin, German authorities consented to several JSS proposals to finance the Ostrów organization’s welfare programs. Ziegenmeyer permitted the JSS to collect a 2-złoty room tax. The Ostrów mayor agreed to an additional income tax, of between 0.25 and 1 złoty weekly, for medical and sanitation costs. That month, Hans Frank’s office began remitting to JSS organizations throughout the Generalgouvernement 50 groszy from each prepaid bread ration card. The Ostrów JSS used the money to restore its welfare programs and to supplement its nutritional programs by purchasing ration cards (available to nonworking Jews after the transfer to Kreis Lublin-Land) for all those in its programs.

On April 13 and 15, 1942, as part of Operation Reinhard, 307 Slovak Jews—mainly women and small children—were deported (via Lubartów) to Ostrów. Another 200 of 300 Slovak deportees on the May 27 and 29 Lubartów transports subsequently arrived in Ostrów.¹² On May 19, Ziegenmeyer designated Ostrów, then with 3,062 Jews, among six Jewish communities that could be “resettled” (murdered). In September, German officials noted 3,250 Jews resided in Ostrów. On September 15, Jews in Distrikt Lublin again were prohibited from corresponding with residents of the Reich, the Protectorate, or abroad. JSS officials in Kraków, not covered by the ban, forwarded 50 postcards on behalf of the Slovak deportees.¹³

On October 7 or 10, 1942, a group of SS, SS Ukrainian auxiliaries, and German Gendarmes ordered the Jews assembled at the market square. A ghetto-clearing force went house to house, searching for those hiding. The postwar Institute of National Remembrance (IPN) Court Inquiries about Executions, Mass Graves, Camps, and Ghettos (ASG) documentation indicates 50 people were killed for refusing to heed the assembly order.¹⁴ About 30 deemed too frail to march to Lubartów were brought to the synagogue to await transfer by peasant cart. In Ostrów, the SS shot dead the Jews at the synagogue. According to Rajchman, on October 10, the surviving expellees were forced onto transports destined for the Treblinka extermination center. Some 105 men, including Rajchman, were retained for labor at Treblinka. The remaining deportees were gassed. In a yizkor book testimony, Mechi (Mischa) Eckhaus describes another survivor telling him that some Ostrów deportees, including Eckhaus’s two brothers, were sent to the Majdanek concentration camp.

Before the ghetto’s liquidation, a number of Ostrów Jews escaped to the Parczew Forest. Only a few survived the more than 18 searches the Germans conducted in the forest beginning in November 1942. Most joined the Parczew partisans, a Jewish partisan and family group subsequently associated with the Polish Communist underground’s Gwardia Ludowa (People’s Guard). The partisan Josef Cynowiec mentions in a frequently cited Yad Vashem testimony that the antisemitism of prominent Ostrów Poles, including the local Roman Catholic priest, diminished chances for Jewish survival. Perhaps for this reason and also likely too because the Germans retaliated against the local population for aiding the partisans, most notably in Białka village, where all 96 men were killed in December 1942, and for partisan attacks, Ostrów’s Roman Catholics sheltered just a few Jewish children.¹⁵ Rajchman escaped from Treblinka during the August 1943 uprising. On July 19, 1944, the Parczew partisans unsuccessfully fought Wehrmacht forces for control of Ostrów.¹⁶ Four days later, when Soviet forces liberated the town, a handful of former Ostrów ghetto residents were alive.

SOURCES Secondary sources pertaining to the history of the Ostrów Jewish community during the World War II German occupation include the relevant entries in Abraham Wein, Bracha Freundlich, and Wila Orbach, eds., Pinkas ha-kehillot. Encyclopaedia of Jewish Communities: Poland, vol. 7, Lublin and Kielce (Jerusalem: Yad Vashem, 1999), pp. 50–52; Arnon Rubin, The Rise and Fall of the Jewish Communities in Poland and Their Relics Today, vol. 2, District Lublin (Tel Aviv: Tel Aviv University Press, 2007), pp. 209–211; and the more detailed contributions by Isidore Last, “History of Ostrow-Lubelski,” in the yizkor book, David Sztokfisz, ed., Sefer-yizkor Ostrov-Lubelski ([Israel]: Irgun yots’e Ostrov-Lubelski be-Yisrael, [1987]); Janina Kielboń, “Ostrów Lubelski w latach II wojny światowej,” Lubartów i ziemia lubartowska 11 (1990): 59–78; Janina Kielboń, “Ostrów Lubelski w latach okupacji hitlerowskiej,” in Ryszard Szczygieł, Dzieje Ostrowa Lubelskiego (Ostrów Lubelski: Multico, 1998), pp. 225–270; and Robert Kuwałek, “Społeczność żydowska w Ostrowie Lubelskim,” available on the Żydzi w Lublinie—Jews in Lublin Web site, at www.jews-lublin.pl/?page_id=154, a particularly important contribution because it summarizes Kielboń’s works, which remain virtually unobtainable in the United States.

The aforementioned yizkor book also contains testimonies from survivors. Unfortunately, the only two available in English translation on the Nizkor Project Web site are by Mechi (Mischa) Eckhaus and Bronya Wasserman-Eckhaus, who both fled Ostrów in 1939 for then Soviet-occupied Kowel. Particularly important is the brief coverage accorded Ostrów in the published accounts by Chil Rajchman, including Un grito por la vida: Memorias (Montevideo: Ediciones de la Banda Oriental, 1997); Je suis le dernier juif: Treblinka (1942–1943) (Paris: Arènes, 2009), forthcoming in English translation as The Last Jew of Treblinka: A Memoir (New York: W.W. Norton & Co. Inc., 2011); and Rajchman’s March 1987 testimony at the trial of John (Ivan) Demjanjuk, with English-language transcripts widely available online, which provides the most specific date for the Ostrów community’s expulsion to Treblinka.

Primary documentation for the Ostrów Jewish community includes APL (e.g., 43/0/[830, 833], 498 [273]); AŻIH (e.g., 210/531, 211 [139, p. 59; 650, p. 2; 653, pp. 35, 45–50; 654, pp. 20–22; 766–768, 887, p. 20], 301 [5567, 2013]); IPN (e.g., ASG); IPN-Lu (e.g., 174/67/1-4, 283/67/1-2); USHMM (e.g., Acc.1997.A.0124 [AŻIH 211]; Acc.1999.A.0154 [AŻIH 210]; RG-15.019M [IPN ASG] [reel 6, 18/1174, 1195–1198]; RG-15.076M [APL 35/43/0/833]; RG-50.030*0185); VHF (e.g., # 5, 16316); and YVA (e.g., O-3 [2937, 3009]).

Laura Crago

NOTES

1. AŻIH, 301/2013, testimony of Mojżesz Apelbaum, pp. 1–3.
2. USHMM, Acc.1997.A.0124 (AŻIH), 211/766, pp. 2, 15.
3. AŻIH, 301/2013, p. 5.
4. USHMM, Acc.1997.A.0124, 211/653, pp. 46–47.
5. Ibid., 211/768, p. 42.
6. Misfiled in USHMM, Acc.1999.A.0154 (AŻIH), 210/531, p. 23.
7. USHMM, Acc.1997.A.0124, 211/766, pp. 14, 39; 211/768, p. 23.
8. Ibid., RG-50.030*0185, testimony of Chiel (Chil) Rajchman.
9. Ibid., Acc.1997.A.0124, 211/766, p. 39; 211/767, p. 11.
10. Ibid., 211/766, pp. 14, 37; 211/767, p. 10.
11. Ibid., 211/768, p. 42.
12. Ibid., pp. 44, 63, 73.
13. Ibid., pp. 99–105.
14. Ibid., RG-15.019M (IPN), reel 6, 18/1197.
15. Ibid., 18/1174, 1195.
16. AŻIH, 301/5567, testimony of Marek Dworecki, pp. 1–12.

PARCZEW

Pre-1939: Parczew (Yiddish: Partchev), town, Włodawa powiat, Lublin województwo, Poland; 1939–1944: Kreis Radzyn, Distrikt Lublin, Generalgouvernement; post-1998: Parczew powiat, Lublin województwo, Poland

Parczew lies almost 62 kilometers (38.5 miles) northeast of Lublin. Its pre-war 1939 population of about 10,200 included some 5,000 Jews.

German forces occupied Parczew in early October 1939. In late December, the German civil administration for Kreis Radzyn ordered Jews to wear white armbands and to form a Jewish Council (Judenrat). The Parczew Jewish Council members included L. Mandelkiern, M. Elkenbaum, and Szlomo Fuks. A Jewish police force was also established. Its commander, Rudy Kresch from Berlin, was a 1938 expellee to Poland.

In November 1939, an SS contingent demanded the Jews pay 60,000 złoty to construct a prison. In February 1940, a commander of an antitank unit ordered the Jewish Council to transform the Elbaum (Öhlbaum) house into a brothel, to pay for the services its prostitutes provided German soldiers, and to pay Jewish workers to clean the facility. An SS unit stationed at an estate in Jabłoń demanded the council send and pay the wages of 60 women laborers. In August, the same unit ordered the wealthiest Jews to a forced labor camp in Bełżec. The council paid bribes to secure the men's release.¹ In February 1940, the council raised a large gold payment, the price an SS commander had demanded for permission to bury 200 to 350 Jewish prisoners of war (POWs) shot dead by his men. (About half the victims were executed in Juliopol.)²

In January 1940, nearly 1,000 Jewish refugees had settled in Parczew, including 604 expellees from Lubartów, 30 from Radzyń, and many fleeing ghettoization in Wisznice.³ Most local refugees returned home in the spring of 1940. The refugee population nonetheless remained constant because newcomers continued arriving, including expellees from Suwałki, Łódź, Kalisz, Poznań, and other territories attached to the Reich by August of 1940. In late December, 425 deportees from Mława spent a month in Parczew awaiting transportation to Wisznice. Many subsequently returned to Parczew.⁴ In March 1941, some "voluntary" Lublin refugees ordered to Sosnowica fled instead to Parczew. That month, the Lubartów Jewish Council expelled 200 Lublin Jews to Parczew. In April, the Biała Podlaska Jewish Council sent 70 Suwałki refugees.⁵ In November 1941, 6,200 Jews (1,550 families) were residing in Parczew.⁶

During this same period, orders banning Jews from living on specific streets gradually resulted in their concentration in Parczew's old Jewish neighborhood.⁷ Bounded by the Konotopa and Piwonia Rivers, the neighborhood included Bóżniczna, November 11, Koński Rynek, Kościelna, Nadwalna, Nowowiejska, Piłsudski, Piwonia, Szeroka, Warsaw, Żabia, and Żydowska Streets. In April 1942, the Parczew Jewish Social Self-Help (JSS) reported that neither an open nor a closed ghetto had been established for the town's 6,316 Jews.⁸

The Jews nonetheless experienced declining material conditions. In the spring of 1940, Jewish-owned businesses in Kreis Radzyn were ordered transferred to non-Jews, and forced labor quotas were increased. In Parczew, 100 to 200 of the 2,000 forced labor conscripts hewed trees in the Parczew Forest. Others worked at a sawmill in Pohulanka village or on various projects for municipal authorities, including "paving" sidewalks with matzevot (gravestones). From September 1940, 180 Parczew Jews were interned at a labor camp established in Ossowa. In May 1942, the Jewish Council was required to send 600 men to camps in Ossowa, Suchowola, and Romaszki.⁹

Poor sanitation from overcrowding caused numerous typhus outbreaks, including an epidemic in January and February 1941. Dr. Josef Hechter cared for the sick in a two-room, 35-bed hospital. In the winter of 1941–1942, accounting errors and shortfalls in winter potato rations forced JSS administrators to suspend operations at the community kitchen for days at a time, leaving 1,200 of the poorest Jews (mainly refugees) with nothing to eat. Because of complaints about the kitchen, Kreis-level JSS leaders conducted a surprise inspection in late November. In April 1942, Müller, the Jewish Affairs Officer in the Kreis Radzyn Population and Welfare Department (BuF) admonished JSS leaders in Parczew, warning them that if it were not for the heavy burdens under which they operated, he would have sent them to forced labor camps.¹⁰ By early 1942, many refugees were sick and some had died from diseases related to starvation.¹¹ In January, the JSS opened an orphanage for 17 (of 30) children of deceased refugees. It provided 200 of the most impoverished children free daily breakfasts, typically 100 grams (3.5 ounces) of bread and a quarter to a half liter (1 to 2 cups) of milk or sweetened coffee. In February, another 100 children were included in the program.

In the winter of 1941–1942, some refugees arrived after fleeing the liquidation of many ghettos in the Wilno region. On May 1, 1942, German authorities executed 12 leftists, including the female Bundist leader Sternówna. Many Jews began constructing hiding places to evade a future roundup. Leftists discussed resistance but concluded it was wiser to join Jews volunteering for forestry labor and to flee deep into the Parczew Forest. Chaim Szczeplicki (Pszeplikier) had helped a group of escaped Soviet POWs there to purchase arms. He likely convinced the unit's commander, Lieutenant Fyodor Kovalev (Kovalyov), to establish a separate Jewish unit for the fugitives, known as the Pushkin group. After 400 young Jews disappeared into the forest, the SS began taking some of their parents as hostages and executing them when the children failed to return to Parczew.¹²

On August 18, 1942, the commander of the Gendarmerie post in Parczew ordered the Jewish Council and Jewish Police to assemble the Jews the next day on the market square for "resettlement." On August 19, the 1st and 2nd Companies of Reserve Police Battalion 101 and a unit of Trawniki auxiliaries arrived to oversee the expulsion. During a two-day Aktion, the 1st Company and the Trawniki men extricated Jews from hiding places and killed the sick and elderly in their beds. Several Poles searched for Jewish neighbors or informed the Trawniki of their absences.¹³ Some 400 Jews were killed during the searches. Another 3,000 to 4,000, including all but two Jewish Council members, were sent from the Parczew railway station in two transports, on August 19 and 20, to the Treblinka extermination facility. A relatively large number of Jews jumped from the trains and returned to Parczew.¹⁴

After the expulsions, an open ghetto was established for 700 to 800 Jews retained for labor in Parczew. Survivor Nuchim Perelman reported it was located "on a few of the worst streets."¹⁵ Authorities appointed Kresch, the police commander, the Jewish Council chair.

From late August, residents of nearby localities were consolidated in the ghetto. The new arrivals included about 800 deportees from Wołyń, 100 mostly refugee families from Kock, 600 deportees from Komarówka Podlaska, 1,030 expellees from Czemierniki, and the Jews from smaller villages surrounding these settlements. Most expellees were required to pay wagon drivers to transport them to Parczew. They could bring with them their remaining possessions, except for furniture.¹⁶ Michał Himmelblau recalled that authorities informed the Czemierniki Jews on October 2 that they were being sent to the ghetto to shield them from future expulsions, as Parczew soon would be named a "Judenstadt" (Jewish town), one of a few places in Kreis Radzyn where Jews would be permitted to live.¹⁷

With the arrival of 3,000 to 4,000 Jews, more than 25 people were crowded together in a single room in the ghetto. Because of violence during the first expulsion, almost all the ghetto houses lacked window glass and doors. In late September, members of the 3rd Platoon of the 2nd Company of Reserve Police Battalion 101 renewed their anti-Jewish violence. They surrounded groups of Jewish laborers at workplaces, including about 200 forestry conscripts, and deported them (by truck and peasant cart) to the ghetto in Międzyrzec. The same unit joined by members of the Gendarmerie executed 108 Jews in Parczew by October 2. The victims were shot in small groups over several days. Many Jews purchased false identity papers, sold by either a local Polish Socialist-Party (PPS) activist or a Ha-Shomer Ha-Za'ir youth from Częstochowa, and fled from the ghetto.¹⁸ The fugitives mostly attempted to reach Warsaw.

Late at night, on October 7, 1942, German forces, commanded by SS-Untersturmführer Fritz Fischer, head of the Security Police in Kreis Radzyn, surrounded the ghetto and ordered its residents assembled at the square. The 2,000 to 3,000 Jews were required to kneel and hold their arms above their heads for hours on end. The Germans shot 300 to 800 dead, mostly for defying the orders. On October 8, the surviving Jews were sent to their deaths at Treblinka.¹⁹ On October 6 and 9, the expellees in Międzyrzec also were deported to Treblinka.

Three days after the expulsion, the Gendarmerie commander ordered members of the Polish auxiliary police and the fire department to search the ghetto for Jews still hiding. The 1,000 people they discovered were ordered to bury the dead, to bring the belongings of the deported to the Piwonia Street synagogue, and to repair vacated houses. Between October 9 and 16, 1942, German security forces shot 50 to 120 Jews dead, mainly for shirking work. Almost all the Jews were soon transferred to labor camps, including Suchowola, or to the ghetto in Międzyrzec. When German authorities declared Parczew a Judenwohnbezirk (Jewish residential area) in late October, only a 150 to 200 person cleanup crew remained in the ghetto. Its members brought Jewish property from nearby localities to the synagogue and sorted and packed it for shipment to the Reich. The ghetto, reduced in size, occupied six houses by the synagogue.²⁰

In early 1943, the Parczew Gendarmerie commander forewarned the Jews the ghetto was to be liquidated and they were to be deported the next day. Most fled to the forest rather than gather at the synagogue as ordered. Those who did appear were executed.²¹ In May, the Międzyrzec ghetto and the Suchowola camp were liquidated. Their inmates were transferred to the Majdanek concentration camp. Only a handful of Parczew deportees were sent on to other concentration camps before Majdanek was liquidated in November 1943.

More than 400 Jews from Parczew perished during the more than 18 searches the Germans conducted in the Parczew

Forest beginning in November 1942. The Pushkin group's ranks were decimated in the Easter 1943 search. The survivors mainly joined the Parczew partisans, the best-known Jewish partisan group in Distrikt Lublin. (Named for the forest, the unit was led by Jews from Włodawa and Sosnowica.)²²

Another approximately 20 Jews survived on false identity papers, including 8 of 9 people assisted by Parczew native Ludwik Golecki in Warsaw. In Parczew, Jan and Juliana Sz waj successfully sheltered 4 members of the Farbsztajn family. The Kowalski family hid 5 members of the Krelenbaum family.²³ About 100 Jews from Parczew and 25 to 40 Jews from the localities consolidated in the ghetto lived to see the Red Army liberate Parczew in July 1944.

SOURCES Published memoirs by Parczew survivors include the contributions to the yizkor book, Shelomh Zunnshin et al., eds., Partsev: Sefer zikaron li-qedoshe Partsev veba-sevivah (Haifa, Israel, 1977); and Benjamin Mandelkern, Escape from the Nazis (Toronto: James Lorimer, 1988). The second account is complemented by a testimony from Marek Golecki, the son of Ludwik, available in Polish under the Parczew section of the Lublin: Pamięć Miejsca Web site, an oral history archive created by the Ośrodek “Brama Grodzka—Teatr NN” (Grodzka Gate—NN Theatre Centre), and in a truncated English translation on the “Polish Righteous” section of the Web site of the Museum of the History of Polish Jews. Though about the partisan movement, the relevant memoirs and documents in Zygmunt Mańkowski and Jan Naumiuk, eds., Ruch oporu na Lubelszczyźnie, vol. 1, Gwardia Ludowa i Armia Ludowa na Lubelszczyźnie, 1942–1944. Źródła i materiały do dziejów ruchu oporu na Lubelszczyźnie (1939–1944) (Lublin, 1960) nonetheless provide insight into the complex relationships between Jews in Parczew and escaped POWs (both Jewish-Polish and Soviet soldiers) before and after the ghetto's liquidation.

Secondary sources focusing on the various communities consolidated in the Parczew ghetto include the relevant entries in Abraham Wein, Bracha Freundlich, and Wila Orbach, eds., Pinkas ha-kehillot. Encyclopaedia of Jewish Communities: Poland, vol. 7, Lublin and Kielce (Jerusalem: Yad Vashem, 1999), pp. 155–156 (Wohyń), pp. 408–412 (Parczew), pp. 421–422 (Czemierniki), p. 468 (Komarówka Podlaska), pp. 477–480 (Kock); Arnon Rubin, The Rise and Fall of the Jewish Communities in Poland and Their Relics Today, vol. 2, District Lublin (Tel Aviv: Tel Aviv University Press, 2007), pp. 88–89 (Czemierniki), pp. 134–139 (Kock), pp. 141–142 (Komarówka Podlaska), pp. 211–215 (Parczew), pp. 305–306 (Wohyń); and the Polish-language entry for Parczew at the Wirtualny Sztetl, on the Web site of the Museum of the History of Polish Jews, which offers the earliest date (March 1941) for the ghetto's establishment. For the question of assistance by non-Jews from Parczew, see Israel Gutman and Sara Bender, eds., The Encyclopedia of the Righteous among the Nations: Rescuers of Jews during the Holocaust, vol. 2, Poland, 2 pts. (Jerusalem: Yad Vashem, 2004), pt. 1, pp. 243–244, pt. 2, pp. 798–799.

More general overviews of the region or of the perpetrators—including by Tatiana Berenstein, “Martyrologia, opór i zagłada ludności żydowskiej w dystrykcie lubelskim,” BŻIH, no. 21 (1957): 32, 41–43, 51, 79–81; David Silberklang, “The Holocaust in the Lublin District” (Ph.D. diss., Hebrew University, Jerusalem, February 2003), p. 280; and Christopher R. Browning, Ordinary Men: Reserve Police Battalion 101 and the Final Solution in Poland (New York: HarperCollins, 1992), pp. 88–90, 95, 104–105, 107, 123–124, 133—provide conflicting accounts of the timing and direction of the second Parczew expulsion and ultimately the date for the ghetto's liquidation. Shmuel Krakowski, The War of the Doomed: Jewish Armed Resistance in Poland, 1942–1944, trans. Orah Blaustein (New York: Holmes & Meier Publishers, Inc., 1984), describes the challenges Jewish fugitives encountered in the Parczew Forest in a chapter surveying the accomplishments of the Pushkin group and of the Parczew partisans.

The extant archival documentation suggests no ghetto was established in Czemierniki. The documentation for Wohyń is too sparse to draw a definitive conclusion. Even more difficult to discern are the specific fates of the 300 Jewish residents from small villages west and north of Parczew, including in the Biała, Jabłoń, Milanów, Siemień, and Suchowola gmina, communities that geographically should have been among those consolidated in August 1942 in the Parczew ghetto. In September and October 1941, the head of the JSS in Siemień informed Kreis-level JSS leaders in Radzyń that the Jewish residents in the five gminy had been expelled from their homes but did not mention whether they were ordered to reside in a ghetto. Here, see USHMM, Acc.1997.A.0124 (AŻIH), 211/885, p. 66; 211/887, pp. 27–28.

Archival documentation pertaining to the World War II history of the Parczew Jewish community includes APL; AŻIH (210/539–540, 211 [134, p. 53; 135, p. 60; 142, pp. 8–9, 18–19, 25, 29; 646, pp. 47–48; 780–783; 884, p. 56; 886, pp. 3–4, 19, 32, 46–48; 887, pp. 91, 98–101; 888, pp. 9–10, 17; 890, pp. 10, 13, 17, 21–22, 34–39, 44, 46–48, 54, 71; 891, pp. 14–15, 24, 29–30, 48], 301 [103, 514, 608, 757, 1165, 2013, 2327, 2372, 2767]); FVA (HVT [# 18, 2270]); IPN (e.g., ASG); IPN-Lu (e.g., 37/67/1–4, 73/07/Zn, 131/67/57, 141/67/1–2); USHMM (e.g., Acc.1997.A.0124 [AŻIH, 211]; Acc.1999.A.0154 [AŻIH, 210]; RG-15.019M [IPN ASG] [reel 6, 18/1199–1201]); VHF (e.g., # 1923, 7289, 13378, 25669, 36330, 37873, 48207); and YVA (e.g., O-3 [1824, 2019, 2080], O-33/24).

Laura Crago

NOTES

1. AŻIH, 301/608, testimony of Nuchem Perlman (Nuchim Perelman), pp. 1–2.
2. Ibid., 301/757, testimony of Zurech Piekarski, pp. 1–3.
3. USHMM, Acc.1999.A.0154 (AŻIH), 210/539, p. 3; Acc.1997.A.0124 (AŻIH), 211/646, pp. 47–48.
4. Ibid., Acc.1997.A.0124, 211/1099, p. 8; 211/780, pp. 3–20, 24–29, 34–45.
5. Ibid., 211/781, pp. 17–18, 34–35.
6. Ibid., 211/887, p. 91.
7. VHF, # 13378, testimony of Isadore Farbstein.
8. USHMM, Acc.1997.A.0124, 211/783, p. 41.
9. Ibid., 211/890, p. 54; 211/783, p. 34.
10. Ibid., 211/782, pp. 30, 40; 211/886, p. 3; 211/888, pp. 9–10; 211/890, pp. 10, 34–40.
11. AŻIH, 301/2327, testimony of Nuchim Perelman, p. 4.
12. Ibid., 301/2372, testimony of Józef Perelman, pp. 1–8.
13. Ibid., p. 9.
14. Ibid., 301/608, pp. 3–4; VHF, # 13378.

15. AŻIH, 301/2327, p. 3.
16. Ibid., 301/ 2013, testimony of Mojżesz Apelbaum, p. 11.
17. Ibid., 301/2767, testimony of Michał Himmelblau, p. 2.
18. Compare Ibid., 301/608, p. 5, with 301/2327, p. 6.
19. Ibid., 301/2767, pp. 2–3; USHMM, RG-15.019M, reel 6, 18/1201.
20. VHF, # 48207, testimony of Susan Weiss.
21. AŻIH, 301/608, p. 5.
22. Ibid., 301/1165, testimony of Chuna Sobol, p. 1.
23. VHF, # 37873, testimony of David Krelenbaum.

PIASKI LUTERSKIE

Pre-1939: Piaski Luterskie, town, Lublin województwo, Poland; 1939–1944: Piaski, Kreis Lublin-Land, Distrikt Lublin, Generalgouvernement; post-1998: Piaski Luterskie, Lublin województwo, Poland

Piaski Luterskie is located about 32 kilometers (20 miles) south-east of Lublin. When the Germans and Soviets invaded Poland in September 1939, Piaski had 4,165 Jews, but many fled at the time of the invasion and the brief Soviet occupation. An average of 4,000 to 5,000 Jews inhabited the Piaski ghetto during its existence.¹

The history of the Jews in Piaski and the ghetto may be subdivided into five partially overlapping phases: (1) initial arrivals of deportees and Jewish Council (Judenrat) organization; (2) open ghetto; (3) closed ghetto; (4) “transit” or collection ghetto; and (5) liquidation, establishment of the remnant ghetto and forced labor camp for Jews (ZALfJ).

During the first phase, from February to December 1940, Piaski Luterskie was a destination with Głusk and Bełżyce for the expulsion of Pomeranian Jews. In mid-February 1940, the German authorities removed approximately 1,000 Jews from Stettin (after 1945: Szczecin) to Lublin-Land. Although earlier studies blamed this deportation on Pomerania’s Gauleiter, Franz Schwede-Coburg, historian Götz Aly argues that it was part of the ongoing Baltic German resettlement to Stettin. Reichsführer-SS Heinrich Himmler and Commanding Officer of the Security Police and SD Reinhard Heydrich initiated the deportation. In a speech in Berlin on February 29, 1940, Himmler attempted to stave off his Nazi audience’s “false hopes,” dismissing the possibility that this step was the first in the overall removal of Greater Germany’s Jews.² A smaller transport of Jews from the Pomeranian city of Schneidemühl took place in March 1940. The original Piaski Judenrat was also organized in this phase. The Judenrat’s director (Obmann) from 1940 to 1942 was Mandel Polisecki.³

In letters to relief workers, friends, and family, the Pomeranian Jews documented life in Piaski between the first and fourth phases. Among them was Frau A.G., a mother who converted to Judaism upon marrying her husband, Arthur. Her daughter, a practicing Christian, had already been imprisoned at Ravensbrück for “defilement of the race” (Rassenschande), then released, and had emigrated by the time Frau A.G. was deported to Piaski with her ailing husband and son Adolf. In letters written in the spring and summer of 1940 to Margarethe Lachmund, a Quaker who arranged relief for the Stettin deportees, Frau A.G. wrote that “the circumstances here are so bitter” and complained about sharing a domicile with 10 other people.⁴ Her son was separated from the family for weeks at a time, performing forced labor.⁵ In November 1940, in an indication that Piaski was still not yet a ghetto, Bełżyce ghetto inhabitants Erich and Cläre Silbermann happily reported to Lachmund that the Stettin synagogue’s cantor, Rainowitz, then in Piaski, participated in religious services in Bełżyce.⁶

During the second phase, from December 31, 1940, to early June 1941, Piaski became an open ghetto on the order of the Kreishauptmann of Lublin-Land, Emil Ziegenmeyer.⁷ For the Jews, the change initially meant their residential confinement to the area around the synagogue, already overcrowded because of the Pomeranian deportations. Travel outside the ghetto was still possible, as evidenced by a letter from Max and Martha Bauchwitz, which mentioned that the sick originally could be bussed to Lublin for care but by May 1941 were dispatched by straw-covered wagons.⁸ At this time, an epidemic of louse-borne typhus had already broken out in Piaski. Max Bauchwitz, a dentist, alongside several Jewish doctors, treated typhus patients in the ghetto’s hospital and two medical clinics. In June 1941, Piaski numbered 4,803 Jewish inhabitants, including 852 expellees, some having come from Kraków, as well as those from Stettin.⁹

During the third phase, from June 11, 1941, to March 1942, Piaski became an enclosed ghetto. On Ziegenmeyer’s orders, the ghetto was enclosed with barbed wire, and a second closed ghetto was opened opposite the first on Lublin Street.¹⁰ Piaski’s limited water sources were found in the first ghetto near the synagogue.¹¹ The second ghetto’s inhabitants thus had to cross the street to secure water and other necessities, but the Jewish Police (Jüdischer Ordnungsdienst) only permitted crossings every two hours until curfew.¹² The Piaski Judenrat supervised both parts of the ghetto. A Jewish Social Self-Help (JSS) report indicated that just over 10 percent of the Jews (496) were described as skilled or unskilled workers or as professionals.¹³ In September 1941, Dr. Siegfried of the Jewish Aid Committee (Jüdisches Hilfskomitee) Lublin-Land reported that, for the 4,900 Jewish inhabitants, Piaski’s available space amounted to 5,887 square meters (63,367 square feet), or 1.1 square meters (11.8 square feet) per inhabitant, as historian Bogdan Musial has noted.¹⁴ In October 1941, a small group of Jews from Kraków was deported to Piaski. Twenty-seven of them sent a letter to the JSS headquarters in Kraków, signed “The Evacuees from Kraków to Piaski,” importuning Jewish welfare authorities to send winter clothing as soon as possible, because they had none.¹⁵ Overcrowding and chronic hunger made the ghetto vulnerable once more to epidemics. Between October 1941 and January 1942, louse-borne typhus overwhelmed Piaski’s resources. A JSS Piaski member, Szaje Lindner, repeatedly requested medication and disinfection agents from JSS Kraków for combating the epidemic.¹⁶ A list of 3 Jews from the Reich who died in Piaski during the month of January 1942 included 2, one male and one female, who succumbed to typhus. Altogether, perhaps as many as 1,500 Jews in Piaski perished in epidemics.¹⁷

The ghetto's fourth phase lasted from the end of February to November 1942. As part of Operation Reinhard, the annihilation of Jews in the Generalgouvernement, Piaski, Izbica (nad Wieprzem), Krasnystaw, Rejowiec, and other places in Distrikt Lublin, functioned as collection points (referred to by some historians as "transit ghettos") for German, Austrian, Czech, and Slovak Jews. The head of Lublin's Population and Welfare Department (BuF), Richard Türk, ordered that Jews from the Old Reich and the Reich Protectorate of Bohemia and Moravia replace the ghettos' Polish and Pomeranian Jewish populations, which were being dispatched to the Bełżec killing center. In a file note, Fritz Reuter of BuF quoted an order from SS-Hauptsturmführer Hermann Höfle: "Piaski will be made free of Polish Jews and become the assembly point for Jews coming from the Reich."¹⁸

