The first deportation from Piaski took place shortly after March 16, 1942, probably to make room for a scheduled new influx of Jews from the Reich. Around 2,500 Polish and Stettin Jews, who had been selected as incapable of work, were marched to Trawniki, where they were held overnight in a barn at the sugar refinery together with some Jews from Biskupice. Several hundred of these people died of suffocation overnight (perhaps resulting from a gassing experiment). The next day the corpses were loaded onto a train along with the survivors, to be sent to the Bełżec extermination camp.¹⁹ Around this time, all the native Jews of Trawniki were also removed.

The wave of transports from the Reich to Piaski began on March 23, 1942, when around 1,000 Hessian Jews (from Mainz and Darmstadt) entered Piaski. According to Martha Bauchwitz, this transport arrived penniless.²⁰ Then on March 28, 1942, 985 Jews arrived from Berlin.

On April 1, 1942, 1,000 Jews arrived in Piaski from Theresienstadt. Working-age Jews from this and the March transports, such as Kurt Ticho Thomas, originally from Boskovice, Czechoslovakia, were deployed as agricultural laborers on nearby farms.²¹ The deportations from Piaski to the extermination camps via Trawniki resumed on April 6, 1942. One ghetto inhabitant, Frau E. Sch., wrote Frau Luise Lotte Hoyer-Bauchwitz on April 11, 1942, that her parents, the Bauchwitzes, "have left with many other beloved people from Piaski."²² On the same date, the German Security Police Transfer Office Piaski (Sicherheitspolizei Transferstelle Piaski) itemized property seized from Jews recently dispatched to Bełżec, including 8,300.54 złoty, 85 gold rubles, and five wedding rings, as well as 45 men's vests, two fur pelts, nine pairs of children's mittens, and other goods.²³ According to official German records, there were further transports to Piaski on April 6, when 989 Jews arrived from Munich; and on April 25, when another 1,000 arrived from Theresienstadt. However, more than 200 of the able-bodied men on each of these transports were selected in Lublin, probably for the Majdanek concentration camp.²⁴ On May 19, 1942, Ziegenmeyer reported that 6,166 Jews from Piaski had been "resettled" (murdered).²⁵

The deportations necessitated the reconstitution of Piaski's Judenrat and Jewish Police. Polisecki remained Obmann, and the Judenrat had two more long-standing members, Moses Drajblat and Josef Aschmann. The nine replacements had arrived on the recent transports. They were Moritz Israel Fried, Ernst Schlösser, Siegfried Kugelman, Fritz Sängner, Hugo Railing, Kurt Hirschmann, Ernst Böhm, Walter Guttmann, and Friedrich Wilhelm Kempner.²⁶ Three members were from Hessen, two from Berlin, two from Bavaria, one from Jägerndorf (Protectorate), and one from Vienna. The occupations of the three Hessian members, Fried, Schlösser, and Kugelman, were described, respectively, as a businessman, retired official (Amtmann i. R.), and bank officer, suggesting that Piaski's Judenrat was probably middle class.²⁷ The age range of the new Judenrat members was from 28 to 62 (with an average age of 48.6).²⁸ The Jewish Police was also reorganized, with Stefan Reinemann replacing the deported Alfred Stapler as chief. Reinemann oversaw 30 Reich and Protectorate Jews, including 1 woman, Bela Trattner.²⁹

Fanni and Jakob Liebschütz from Allgäu, Germany, and Arnold Hindls from Brno, Czechoslovakia, described Piaski's worsening situation in the spring of 1942. In a letter to her cousin on April 13, 1942, Fanni Liebschütz recounted: "We are here since the end of March and are cleaning out the ghetto. One drowns in dirt without boots. Toilet in field and pasture; manure piles in front of the houses. Sleeping, living, and cooking facilities for 16 in an old prayer hall." But she added, hopefully: "We are all Swabians and have gallows humor. It will pass."³⁰ Hindls described the inflated food prices. Selling his wedding ring for 120 złoty, he was able to augment the community kitchen's slim provisions by trading with Polish farmers. A kilogram (2.2 pounds) of dark bread cost 12 złoty; a kilogram of white bread, 18 złoty; a kilogram of potatoes, 2 złoty; butter, 100 złoty; a liter (1 quart) of milk, 4 złoty; and one egg, 1 złoty. After spending all his money on food, another problem arose: firewood cost 2 złoty and brown coal, 6 złoty.³¹

On May 15, 1942, the Reich Security Main Office (Reichssicherheitshauptamt) banned Jews in the Generalgouvernement from corresponding with relatives in the Reich or elsewhere, effectively cutting Piaski off from the world, apart from JSS Lublin-Land's cursory replies to relatives' inquiries. In June 1942, Fanni Liebschütz's mother received a detailed reply from JSS Lublin-Land, claiming that the family was well and congratulating their son, Werner, who lived with her while studying in Davos, Switzerland, on his Bar Mitzvah.³² A second reply, dated July 20, 1942, to Liebschütz's cousin, suspiciously addressed Lublin-Majdanek, was the last word the family received about them.³³

By June 1942, direct deportations of Western European and German Jews to the Bełżec and Sobibór killing centers obviated the need for collection ghettos as intermediary stations, thereby inaugurating the liquidation (fourth) phase, which lasted until November 8, 1942. By this time most of Piaski's Jews were sent to their deaths at Sobibór, but between 1,000 and 2,000 were shot in the neighboring Jewish cemetery in November 1942, after which the German authorities razed the ghetto.

Piaski's fifth and final phase, from October 1942 to March or April 1943, overlapped with its liquidation. The main deportation Aktion occurred on or around October 22, 1942, when several thousand Jews were rounded up and escorted to Trawniki by Gestapo, Gendarmerie, SS Ukrainian auxiliaries from the Trawniki training camp (SS-Ausbildungslager), and Polish (Blue) Police. From Trawniki they were soon deported on to the Sobibór extermination facility. Around this time, some 3,000 Jews from the Łęczna ghetto were marched to Piaski Luterskie and then from there shipped to Sobibór via Trawniki.³⁴

In October 1942, Higher SS and Police Leader (HSSPF) in the Generalgouvernement, Friedrich Wilhelm Krüger, designated Piaski one of just a few locations where Jews were permitted to reside in "Jewish residential districts" (remnant ghettos) in Lublin-Land, in the hopes of luring the remaining Jews from hiding for resettlement.³⁵ In late October 1942, Krüger inspected Piaski in connection with its use as a residential district.³⁶ Whether this deception worked is unclear, but starting in November 1942, a small forced labor camp for Jews (ZALfJ) operated at Piaski. Its inmates were removed to Trawniki in March or April of 1943.

On October 13, 1943, Kurt Ticho Thomas, who escaped from Sobibór, returned to the Piaski area and hid with the Polish farmer for whom he had worked before deportation, Stanisław Podsiadły. The Podsiadły family protected him until the Red Army's arrival in July 1944. In 1986, Yad Vashem recognized the Podsiadły family as Righteous Among the Nations.³⁷

SOURCES The most important secondary source for the Piaski Luterskie ghetto, including statistical information on the deportations to the killing centers, is Robert Kuwałek, "Die Durchgangsghettos im Distrikt Lublin (u.a., Izbica, Piaski, Rejowiec, und Trawniki)," in Bogdan Musiał, ed., "Aktion Reinhard": Der Völkermord an den Juden im Generalgouvernement, 1941–1944 (Osnabrück: Fibre, 2004), pp. 197–232. Additional information, including some biographical details on Ziegenmeyer and Türk, may be found in Bogdan Musiał, Deutsche Zivilverwaltung und Judenverfolgung im Generalgouvernement: Eine Fallstudie zum Distrikt Lublin, 1939–1944 (Wiesbaden: Harrassowitz, 1999). Helpful information on some Stettin deportees may be found in Jacob Peiser, Die Geschichte der Synagogen-Gemeinde zu Stettin, 2nd, expanded ed. (Würzburg: Holzner, 1965). Details on the Hessian transport may be found in Renate Dreesen and Christoph Jetter, eds., Die Deportationslisten: Veröffentlichung der vollständigen Namenslisten der 1942/43 aus dem ehemaligen Volksstaat Hessen deportierten Juden (Darmstadt: Initiative "Gedenkort Güterbahnhof Darmstadt," 2004), pp. 1–54. Background information on the town of Piaski Luterskie, some of which is contradictory, may be found in Andrzej Trzeciński, A Guide to Jewish Lublin and Surroundings (Warsaw and Lublin: Jewish Information and Tourist Bureau, 1991), pp. 53–54; "Piaski Luterskie," JHI Education, www.jewishinstitute.org.pl; and "Piaski Luterskie," in Abraham Wein, Bracha Freundlich, and Wila Orbach, eds., Pinkas ha-kehillot. Encyclopaedia of Jewish Communities: Poland, vol. 7, Lublin and Kielce (Jerusalem: Yad Vashem, 1999), pp. 384–387 (a translation by Jonathan Moss is reproduced at www.jewishgen.org/yizkor/pinkas_poland/pol7_00384.html).

Published primary sources on the Piaski ghetto include German documents in Dokumente i materiały do dziejów okupacji niemieckiej w Polsce, 3 vols. (Łódź, 1946), vol. 2, pp. 194–195; and Tatiana Berenstein et al., eds., Faschismus, Getto, Massenmord: Dokumentation über Ausrottung und Widerstand der Juden in Polen während des zweiten Weltkrieges (Berlin: Rütten & Loening, 1961). The names of the reconstituted Judenrat may be found in a document reproduced at www.death-camps.org. The provenance of this document is uncertain, but internal evidence from it is consistent with other sources. A valuable collection of letters from Pomeranian deportees in the Lublin-Land ghettos is Else Behrend-Rosenfeld and Gertrud Luckner, eds., Lebenszeichen aus Piaski: Briefe Deportierter aus dem Distrikt Lublin 1940–1943 (Munich: Deutscher Taschenbuch Verlag, 1970). The published memoir of Czechoslovak deportee Arnold Hindls, Einer kehrte zurück: Bericht eines Deportierten (Stuttgart: Deutsche Verlags-Anstalt, 1965), has detailed information on the ghetto in the spring of 1942. Anonymous but informative reports on the situation in Piaski and the Stettin deportation are found in Testaments to the Holocaust at the Wiener Library, P.II.a No. 625, Anon., "Die politische Situation in Deutschland und in den Nachbarstaaten unter besonderer Berücksichtigung der Judenfrage," ca. 1940; and P.III.c No. 622, Anon., "Evakuierung der Juden aus Stettin," September 1, 1941.

Unpublished documentation may be found at ITS ("Namen von Personen jüdischer Religion, gekommen aus Deutschland, verstorben in der Zeit vom 1.–31.1.42 in Piaski und auch dort beerdigt," KL Lublin-Majdanek OCC 13 / 200, Ord. 12, copied from the Jewish Museum, Warsaw); the Piaski "ghetto questionnaire" may be found in USHMM, RG-15.019M, AGK-IPN, "ASG, 1945," woj. lubelskie, reel 15, p. 74. An unpublished and translated collection of letters from Piaski is USHMM, RG-02.212, Werner J. Lipton, "Toward the Abyss: Cards and Letters; Mindelheim-Lublin, 1941–1943," trans. Werner Jacob Lipton (Liebschütz). Informative reports from JSS Piaski to JSS Kraków, in German and Polish, may be found in USHMM, Acc. 1997.A.0124, JSS, 1939–1944, reel 38, 211/651, 786–788. A photograph of HSSPF Friedrich-Wilhelm Krüger inspecting Piaski may be found at USHMPA, WS # 33474. A detailed series of oral testimonies on Piaski and the aftermath is USHMM, RG-50.030*0233, Oral History Interview of Kurt (Ticho) Thomas, November 9, 1990 (interviewed by Linda Gordon Kuzmack); and USHMM, RG-50.549.02*0048, Oral History Interview of Kurt (Ticho) Thomas, June 19 and 23, 1999. Other archival sources include APL (GDL, 270, 282) and AŽIH, 211/651, p. 16.

Joseph Robert White

NOTES

1. "Kwestionariusz o obozach" (Piaski), USHMM, RG-15.019M, IPN, ASG, 1945," woj. lubelskie, reel 15, p. 74.
2. Heinrich Himmler, Geheimreden 1933 bis 1945 und andere Ansprachen, ed. Bradley F. Smith and Agnes F. Peterson, intro. by Joachim C. Fest (Frankfurt am Main: Propyläen Verlag, 1974), p. 139.

3. JSS Kraków to Mandel Polisecki et al., May 2, 1941, USHMM, Acc. 1997.A.0124, JSS, 1939–1944, reel 38, 211/786, pp. 28–30; “Der Judenrat in Piaski an Kreishauptmann Lublin-Land,” April 27, 1942, Tagebuch (Tgb.) Nr. 49/42, p. 36, reproduced at www.deathcamps.org.

4. Frau A.G. to Margarethe Lachmund, April 11, 1940, in Behrend-Rosenfeld and Luckner, Lebenszeichen aus Piaski, p. 82.

5. Frau A.G. to her daughter, July 20, 1940, in ibid., p. 83.

6. Cläre Silbermann to Margarethe Lachmund, November 1940, in ibid., p. 113.

7. Kreishauptmann Ziegenmeyer an der Chef des Amtes in Lublin, September 19, 1941, in APL, GDL, 270, p. 18, cited in Musial, Deutsche Zivilverwaltung, p. 131.

8. Max and Martha Bauchwitz to Luise Lotte Hoyer-Bauchwitz, May 11, 1941, in Behrend-Rosenfeld and Luckner Lebenszeichen aus Piaski, p. 59.

9. Max and Martha Bauchwitz to Luise Lotte Hoyer-Bauchwitz, May 27, 1941, in ibid., pp. 60–61; AŻIH, 211/651, p. 16.

10. Ziegenmeyer an Abteilung Wirtschaft im Amt des Chefs des Distrikts Lublin-Land über Zuteilung von Materialien für den Gettobau, June 11, 1941, in Berenstein et al., Faschismus, Getto, Massenmord (FGM), Doc. 61, pp. 126–127.

11. Hindls, Einer kehrte zurück, p. 17.

12. Transcript of USHMM, RG-50.030*0233, Oral History Interview of Kurt (Ticho) Thomas, November 9, 1990, p. 15.

13. JSS Piaski, “Bericht für die Zeit vom 1. Juli bis 31. Juli 1941,” in ibid., Acc. 1997.A.0124, reel 38, 211/787, p. 16.

14. Siegfried Besuch, September 14, 1941, APL, GDL 282, p. 565, cited in Musial, Deutsche Zivilverwaltung, p. 174.

15. Die Aussiedler aus Krakau in Piaski an die JSS in Krakau, October 3, 1941, in USHMM, Acc. 1997.A.0124, reel 38, 211/787, n.p.

16. See, for example, JSS Piaski to JSS Präsidium, Krakau, in ibid., reel 38, 211/787, p. 57.

17. ITS, KL Lublin-Majdanek OCC 13/200 Ord. 12, “Namen von Personen jüdischer Religion, gekommen aus Deutschland, verstorben in der Zeit vom 1.–31.1.1942 in Piaski und auch dort beerdigt,” p. 1; “Kwestionariusz o obozach” (Piaski), RG-15.019M, reel 15, p. 74.

18. Fritz Reuter, Vermerk, Lublin, March 17, 1942, in Berenstein et al., FGM, Doc. 202, p. 269.

19. See www.ushmm.org/wlc/en/article.php?ModuleId=10007397.

20. Martha Bauchwitz to Luise Lotte Hoyer-Bauchwitz, March 25, 1942, in Behrend-Rosenfeld and Luckner, Lebenszeichen aus Piaski, p. 75.

21. Thomas interview transcript, p. 17.

22. Frau. E. Sch. to Luise Lotte Hoyer-Bauchwitz, April 11, 1942, in Behrend-Rosenfeld and Luckner, Lebenszeichen aus Piaski, p. 78.

23. Sipo Transferstelle Piaski to KdS für den Distrikt Lublin z.H. [zu Händen] von SS-Obersturmführer Worthoff, Lublin, April 11, 1942, Betr.: “Judenaktion in Piaski,” in Dokumenty, vol. 2, p. 194.

24. Gedenkbuch: Opfer der Verfolgung der Juden unter der nationalsozialistischen Gewaltherrschaft in Deutschland 1933–1945, 2., wesentlich erweiterte Auflage (Koblenz: Bundesarchiv, 2006), vol. 4, pp. 18–19. Kuwałek, “Die Durchgangsgghettos,” p. 207, gives different dates and figures, noting the selections in Lublin.

25. Kreishauptmann in Lublin-Land, Amt für Innere Verwaltung an die Herrn Gouverneur des Distrikts Lublin, Unterabteilung BuF, Betr.: “Aus- und Umsiedlung von Juden,” May 19, 1942, in Berenstein et al., FGM, Doc. 211, p. 277.

26. Der Judenrat in Piaski to Kreishauptmann Lublin-Land, April 27, 1942, Tgb. Nr. 49/42, p. 36.

27. The Judenrat members are listed as numbers 617, 737, and 898 on the Darmstadt transport in Dreesen and Jetter, Die Deportationslisten.

28. Calculation based on birthdates given in “Der Judenrat in Piaski to Kreishauptmann Lublin-Land,” April 27, 1942, Tgb. Nr. 49/42, p. 36.

29. APL, KH L-L, sygn. 139, Judenviertel in Piaski, Verzeichnis der jüdischen Polizisten im Ghetto Piaski, May 20, 1942, pp. 147, 150, as cited in Kuwałek, “Die Durchgangsgghettos,” p. 224 n.66.

30. Fanni Liebschütz to Viktor Bollag, April 13, 1942, USHMM, RG-02.212, Werner J. Lipton, “Toward the Abyss: Cards and Letters; Mindelheim-Lublin, 1941–1943,” trans. Werner Jacob Lipton (Liebschütz).

31. Hindls, Einer kehrte zurück, p. 23.

32. JSS, Jüdisches Hilfskomitee, L-L, to Jenny Gundelfinger, postmarked June 18, 1942, USHMM, RG-02.212, “Toward the Abyss.”

33. JSS, Jüdisches Hilfskomitee, L-L, to Viktor Bollag, July 20, 1942, in ibid.

34. Testimony of Mordechai Goldfarb, May 31, 1978, published in Towiah Friedman, ed., Sobibór: Ein NS-Vernichtungslager im Rahmen der “Aktion Reinhard”: Eine dokumentarische Sammlung (Haifa: Institute of Documentation in Israel for the Investigation of Nazi War Crimes, 1998), n.p., which dates the Piaski Aktion on October 22, 1942, as does Justiz und NS-Verbrechen, vol. 41 (Amsterdam: Amsterdam University Press, 2009), Lfd. Nr. 833a, p. 387; AŻIH, 301/1817, testimony of Izaak Rozengarten and Hersz Zylbersztajn, p. 1, dates the Łęczna Aktion on October 25—but the two Aktions may have occurred at the same time, as Goldfarb mentions some 12,000 Jews being deported together from Trawniki.

35. Berenstein et al., FGM, Doc. 266, p. 342.

36. USHMMPA, WS # 33474, Courtesy of GFH.

37. Thomas interview transcript, pp. 58–65; USHMM, RG-50.549.02*0048, Oral History Interview of Kurt (Ticho) Thomas, June 19 and 23, 1999, Tape 2, Side A.

PUŁAWY

Pre-1939: Puławy (Yiddish: Polav or Pulav), town, Puławy powiat, Lublin województwo, Poland; 1939–1944: Puławy, Kreis Pulawy, Distrikt Lublin, Generalgouvernement; post-1998: Puławy, Puławy powiat, Lublin województwo, Poland

Puławy lies almost 48 kilometers (about 30 miles) by road northwest of Lublin. Just prior to the German invasion of Poland, on September 1, 1939, about 3,600 Jews (30 percent of the overall population) were living in Puławy.¹

A Wehrmacht unit occupied Puławy in mid-September 1939. The Jewish population immediately was confronted with violence and plunder, initially carried out by individual German soldiers. Survivor Moshe Blojstein (Blustein) recalled Polish residents often assisting German officers to identify Jews. German soldiers entered Jewish houses at night and took whatever valuables they could find. They brutally beat Jews they found on the streets. Jews taken for forced labor often were humiliated. Women, for example, were ordered to take off their clothes and use them to clean the floors in German offices. Elderly Jewish men were driven from the synagogue in their prayer shawls on Shabbat and compelled to clean toilets with their bare hands. German soldiers also tore out the beards of Jewish men.²

Henryk Adler, the chairman of the kehillah and a public school director, was named head of the Jewish Council (Judenrat). Dr. Benjamin Honigsfeld, Kleinbaum, Edelstein, and Moshe Rubinstein, the pre-war secretary of the kehillah, were among the council members. The German authorities required the Judenrat to raise large “contributions.”³

By the end of October 1939, the German administration had ordered the Jews to move to a specially designated quarter, located in a pre-war neighborhood inhabited mostly by impoverished Jews. The ghetto spanned an area comprising about 20 percent of Puławy.⁴ Its streets included Piaskowa, Polna, Gdańsk, and Niemcewicz and two courtyards. Because bombardment and shelling during the first weeks of the war had destroyed many buildings in the ghetto area, Jews were ordered to live only on the undamaged sides of Gdańsk and Piaskowa Streets.⁵

The war damage in Puławy may have been among the reasons for the early establishment of the ghetto, the first in Distrikt Lublin and among the earliest ghettos created in the Generalgouvernement. Unfortunately, scholars only can speculate about why local German authorities ordered the ghetto established so early, as no documentation has survived to explain their decision.

Because the only available information about the ghetto comes from several survivor testimonies, it also is not always possible to give the exact dates for events, including the date on which Jews were required to report to the ghetto. Generally, survivors recall posters hanging throughout Puławy in early November 1939, containing orders for the Jews to report to the ghetto. The posters explained ghettoization was required because the Jews were “a destructive element,” harmful to society. One survivor recalls the Germans issued an order on November 4, hours before the Jews began reporting to the ghetto, expropriating all Jewish-owned businesses.⁶

Conditions in the ghetto were poor. There was no sewage system. There also was no electricity in the ghetto or more generally in Puławy. (German bombardment had destroyed the power plant in the first weeks of the war.) The designated ghetto area was far too small for its nearly 4,000 inhabitants. (Fewer than 3,000 people had lived in the same neighborhood before the war.) German robbers exploited the defenseless and outlawed status of the Jews by organizing nighttime raids on the ghetto to plunder Jewish residences in a search for jewelry and other valuables. Brutal beatings often accompanied the raids. The Jews had no recourse, even to flee outside, as the penalty imposed on Jews found violating the 5:00 P.M. to 7:00 A.M. curfew was to be shot on the spot.⁷

The Jewish population was reduced every day, as many people, especially the young, escaped to nearby villages and towns, because they believed the situation would be better in places where Jews were not yet been ordered to reside in ghettos. Many also tried to escape to Soviet-occupied territory. Such movement was still possible because the Puławy ghetto was an open ghetto, without a wall or a fence. Jews also were permitted to leave the ghetto for two hours every day.⁸ Perhaps for this reason, postwar Polish documentation notes a ghetto population of around 2,000.⁹

Puławy was the first ghetto ordered dissolved in Distrikt Lublin. Survivors almost all remember posters hanging throughout the Jewish quarter, on December 26, 1939, giving the Jews 48 hours to pack their belongings in preparation for resettlement. Because the temperatures hovered below freezing, the Jewish Council offered local German authorities a bribe to postpone the expulsion Aktion until the spring. Its members were ordered to return to the ghetto. A similar appeal from a group of Jewish women with young children also failed.¹⁰

The Jews did not get the “promised” 48 hours, as the Germans started the Aktion on the night of December 27–28, 1939. German police forces, likely from nearby Kazimierz Dolny, stormed the ghetto.¹¹ They searched Jewish homes with their dogs, ordered men from their beds onto the streets, and commanded women to pack up belongings. As survivors recalled, the expulsions were accompanied by much beating and screaming. The policemen ordered the men to stand in a row on Lublin Street, the main street in Puławy, facing the buildings with their arms up, and to sing in the freezing cold until morning. Because they had been dragged from their beds, many were dressed only in nightclothes. The German guards beat them mercilessly. SS men standing nearby photographed the beatings.¹² The policemen locked the infirmed and physically handicapped in the unheated synagogue, where they almost all froze to death.¹³

The resettlement did not begin until the next morning. At 8:00 A.M., the men held captive along Lublin Street were marched together to Opole. Along the way, some of the German guards brutally beat them. The women were given until noon to vacate Puławy.¹⁴ Most were forced to walk the 33 kilometers (20.5 miles) to Opole with their luggage, as only a few managed to hire wagons. Many infants died from exposure along the road. As many as 2,500 Puławy Jews arrived in Opole. However, many others decided to flee to nearby towns and villages, including Wąwolnica, Kazimierz Dolny, and Bełżyce. After German police forces surrounded Kazimierz early on December 29, likely to drive unregistered Jews from the town, most Puławy fugitives there were forced to flee across frozen fields to Bełżyce.¹⁵

After the expulsions, the only Jews officially permitted to live in Puławy were about 350 Jewish prisoners of at least four

Judenlager (Jewish camps) established between 1940 and 1942 for forced laborers. The prisoners cleaned streets, repaired railway tracks, worked on road construction, and hauled lumber at the pre-war state-owned sawmill. The camps were liquidated in 1943. Almost all the inmates were shot.¹⁶

From late 1942, some Puławy Jews fought as partisans, but this was long after the clearance of the Puławy ghetto.¹⁷ The precise number of Puławy survivors is not known.

SOURCES The yizkor book, Mordechai Wolf Bernstein (Bernshteyn), ed., Yizker bukh Polav (New York: Polaver Yizker bukh komitet, 1964), includes testimonies from several survivors. An English translation of its table of contents and of two testimonies, including the lengthy contribution by Moshe Blojstein (Blustein) about the establishment of the ghetto, are available at jewishgen.org.

Recollections from non-Jewish Poles about the war and the Jewish community of Puławy can be found in Michał Strzemiński, ed., Nasze Puławy. Kolekcja wspomnień (Lublin: Wydawnictwo Lubelskie, 1986); and in the oral history section of Filip Jaroszyński, ed., Historia i kultura Żydów Janowca nad Wisłą, Kazimierza Dolnego i Puław: Fenomen kulturowy miasteczka—sztetl. Materiały z sesji naukowej “V Janowieckie Spotkania Historyczne,” Janowiec nad Wisłą, 28 czerwca 2003 roku (Janowiec nad Wisłą: Towarzystwo Przyjaciół Janowca nad Wisłą, 2003), pp. 290–302.

Secondary sources include Sebastian Piątkowski, “Żydzi Janowca, Kazimierza i Puław w latach wojny i okupacji (1939–1945),” in Jaroszyński, Historia i kultura Żydów, pp. 199–214; and the relevant entries in Abraham Wein, Bracha Freundlich, and Wila Orbach, eds., Pinkas ha-kehillot. Encyclopaedia of Jewish Communities: Poland, vol. 7, Lublin and Kielce (Jerusalem: Yad Vashem, 1999), pp. 480–482; and its English-language counterpart, Arnon Rubin, The Rise and Fall of Jewish Communities in Poland and Their Relics Today, vol. 2, District Lublin (Tel Aviv: Tel Aviv University Press, 2007), pp. 223–225. Edward Dziadosz and Józef Marszałek, “Więzienia i obozy w dystrykcie lubelskim w latach 1939–1944,” Zeszyty Majdanka 3 (1969): 117, provide coverage of the return of a small number of Jewish forced laborers to Puławy in 1940.

Documentation for the history of the Puławy Jewish community during World War II can be found in the following archives: APL; AŻIH (e.g., Ankiety, 301 [1512, 1513, 1812, 1815]); IPN (e.g., Ankiety); IPN-Lu (e.g., Ds [2/67/1-6, 85/67/1-3]); USHMM (RG-15.066M [IPN]; RG-15.019M [IPN] [reel 6, 16/812-815, and reel 15, 49/111-112]); VHF (# 4283, 5865, 5866, 6066, 7762, 21805, 22787, 38562, 45387); and YVA.

Andrea Löw and Laura Crago

NOTES

1. Mordechai W. Bernstein (Bernshteyn), “Di geshikhthe fun Yidn in Polav,” and Moshe Rubinstein, “Undzer Haymshtot Polav,” in Bernstein, Yizker bukh Polav, pp. 18 and 64–75, respectively.

2. Moshe Blojstein, “Khronik fun khurbn un navena’d,” in ibid., pp. 318–321.

3. VHF, # 38562, testimony of Gershon Edelman; AŻIH, 301/1513, testimony of Gerszon (Gershon) Edelman, p. 1; 301/1812, testimony of Gołda Teich, p. 1.

4. USHMM, RG-15.019M (IPN), ASG, reel 15, 49/112, p. 1.

5. Testimony of Stanisław Zadura, in Jaroszyński, Historia i kultura Żydów, p. 300.

6. Blojstein, “Khronik,” pp. 321–322.

7. Ibid., pp. 322–324, 327.

8. Ibid., pp. 331–335; AŻIH, 301/1513, p. 1.

9. USHMM, RG-15.019M, 49/112, p. 1.

10. AŻIH, 301/1815, testimony of Eta Brifman, p. 1.

11. Ibid., 301/1812, p. 1; and 301/1512, testimony of Gołda Pajek-Kupfer, p. 1.

12. Ibid., 301/1512, p. 1; 301/1815, pp. 1–2; 301/1513, pp. 1–2.

13. Ibid., 301/1513, p. 2.

14. Ibid., 301/1512, p. 1.

15. Ibid.; 301/1812, pp. 1–2.

16. USHMM, RG-15.019M, reel 15, 49/114-116, reel 6, 16/813-815.

17. M. Zeldin, “Der yidisher ontoyl in di partizanerkampfn in Polaver gegnt,” in Bernstein, Yizker bukh Polav, pp. 372–381.

RADZYŃ PODLASKI

Pre-1939: Radzyń Podlaski, town, Lublin województwo, Poland; 1939–1944: Radzyn, Kreis center, Distrikt Lublin, Generalgouvernement; post-1998: Radzyń Podlaski, Lublin województwo, Poland

Radzyń Podlaski is located 69 kilometers (43 miles) north of Lublin. In the 1930s, the general economic crisis was accompanied by an antisemitic boycott of Jewish trades and crafts. On the eve of World War II, about 3,000 Jews were living in Radzyń.¹

At the start of World War II, it was unclear whether the area would be under Soviet occupation, but by mid-October 1939 the Germans had taken control of Radzyń. Many of the younger Jews fled eastward. During the first weeks the Jewish population of the town was confronted with violence and plundering. Germans came to Jewish houses and, as Nuchim Perelman recalls, beat the inhabitants, ordering the women to undress and dance on the tables. They plundered valuables. The center of town was used for housing soldiers; the two great synagogues served as horse stables. As Joseph Schupack recalls:

The furnishings of the synagogues had been desecrated and demolished beforehand. Every new unit that marched into town seemed obligated to vandalize and destroy. After demanding contributions, seizing hostages and plundering Jewish stores, the German occupation troops established themselves. The German authorities tightened the screws on us Jews increasingly tighter. . . . Many Jews with beards wore bandages on their faces, pretending to be wounded already.”²

View of a street in the Radzyń Podlaski ghetto, 1942.
USHMM WS #57697, COURTESY OF STA. HAMBURG

On December 6, 1939, a great part of the Jewish population of Radzyń was driven from the town, but they returned the following April from the village of Sławatycze on the River Bug. A Jewish Council (Judenrat) was founded, consisting of 12 members, with David Lichtenstein, a well-known and respected person in town, as chairman. The Jewish Council had to organize Jewish life in the town but was also responsible for sending Jews to different kinds of forced labor. Shimon Kleinboim, a former representative of the American Jewish Joint Distribution Committee (AJDC) in Poland, became responsible for matters of welfare. There were also “calm” periods, when life began to “normalize.” But increasing restrictions made Jewish life in Radzyń more difficult. The removal of Jews from the economy left most of them without any means of subsistence.³

Radzyń was the capital of Kreis Radzyn, so the Kreishauptmann resided there: from October 1939 to August 1940, this was Hennig von Winterfeld; from August 1940 to October 1941, Dr. Fritz Schmiede; and after that until July 1944, Ludwig Stitzinger. The chief of the Gestapo in Radzyń was a man named Fritz Fischer.⁴ In the building of the former municipality there was a new prison that became infamous for the murder and torture of prisoners.⁵

Although there was no sealed-off ghetto, the Jews were driven out of their houses in the better parts of town and around the marketplace, and a Jewish quarter was set up in 1940 in one of the most run-down areas, where before the war the poorest part of the Jewish population had lived. It consisted of Kozia, Szkolna, Kalen, and several smaller streets.⁶ When those Jews who had been driven out of town in December 1939 returned in the spring of 1940, some of them had lost their homes, as they were not in the designated area, as Yehoshua Ron recalls: “My father hired a peasant wagon and travelled from Sławatycze to Radzyń and back to us. He returned on a frosty and snowy evening with the unhappy news. The head of the Judenrat who had been appointed in Radzyń in the meantime was not too enthusiastic to take us back. The house we had built, so he claimed, the house we had initiated on Passover in 1939, was outside the confines of the ghetto.”⁷

As Joseph Schupack recalls: “Although Radzyń was not a fenced-in ghetto with barbed wire, hardly anyone dared to leave the Jewish section. Venturing outside always brought trouble, risks and even danger to one’s life.”⁸ The Kreishauptmann reported in September 1941 that there were no sealed-off ghettos in the whole Kreis, only Jewish quarters, but that some of the Jews were still living outside of these quarters due to the lack of living space inside. But even if there was no sealed-off Jewish quarter, in Distrikt Lublin from February 1941, Jews were no longer allowed to leave their places of residence, and from October 1941, the punishment for leaving the town without official permission was the death penalty.⁹

The process of ghettoization in Radzyń does not appear to have been completed until the spring of 1942. According to an article titled “Ghetto in Radzyń” published in the regional newspaper, Nowy Głos Lubelski, in mid-April 1942: “In the last weeks, a special Jewish quarter [a ghetto] was created in Radzyń into which all Jews, who still live beyond it, soon will be moved.” Among the motivations for the German authorities was the effort to reduce black market activity, which was blamed on “corrupt Jews.”¹⁰

Regarding the reaction of the local Polish population, there are hardly any documents on Radzyń itself. As Joseph Schupack recalls, there were some Poles who wanted to help, but many of them just wanted to get their hands on Jewish possessions, and therefore they offered to look after such items until the end of the occupation.¹¹

Jews had to work for the Germans. The workers met early in the morning in front of the building of the Jewish Council on Kozia Street and were escorted to their working places. The Jewish Council tried to organize this work as effectively as possible to prevent German terror. Some Jews were forced to work; others were very poor and tried to find work to have something to eat.¹² The German employment office in Radzyń assigned Jews of the entire Kreis to various workplaces; among the most important was the Water Regulation Authority (Wasserwirtschaftsinspektion) in Biała Podlaska. From the autumn of 1940, among the most important workplaces were construction sites of military airfields; the employment office had to request Jewish workers from Lublin, as there were not enough workers in Radzyń.¹³

In Radzyń there was a group of young members of Ha-Shomer Ha-Za'ir and other Zionist organizations who met regularly and were in contact with Jews from surrounding towns, such as Międzyrzec Podlaski. Their main task was organizing escapes, and some Jews fled from Radzyń to the surrounding forests, trying to reach a group of partisans. Some Jews from Radzyń were active in partisan groups later on. One of the people supporting these escapes was Rabbi Shmuel Shlomo Leiner. After he had been betrayed in June 1942, the Gestapo arrested him and he was executed in front of the synagogue. In his poem "The Song about the Radzyner," Yitzchak Katzenelson commemorated this event.¹⁴

In August 1942, about 6,000 Jews were living in Radzyń. In October 1942, 4,000 to 5,000 Jews were deported either directly to the extermination camp in Treblinka or to the ghetto in Międzyrzec, which functioned as a collection point, from which the transports to the extermination camps were organized. Many Jews were shot in Radzyń during the Aktions. On October 1, the Germans deported 2,000 Jews from Radzyń directly to Treblinka. The final liquidation of the Jewish quarter was carried out between October 14 and 16, when the last 2,000 or so Jews were brought to Międzyrzec, and from there, on October 27, they were deported to Treblinka and killed.¹⁵ Joseph Schupack describes one of the deportation Aktions in Radzyń:

The ones who were driven together at the collection place were encircled by the SS and the police. Older people who could not walk were shot on the spot. Screaming women were beaten with rifle butts, and some children standing in the way were shot. Only a few Jews had suitcases, blankets, or coats. Watching the moving lips of some, one knew that they were reciting their last prayer. . . . That day marked the end of the Jews of Radzyn.¹⁶

SOURCES Joseph Schupack, a survivor from Radzyń, has published his memoir, which is the most detailed source of information on Radzyń itself: Joseph Schupack, The Dead Years (Holocaust Library, 1986). The original version is in German: Joseph Schupack, Tote Jahre: Eine jüdische Leidensgeschichte (Tübingen: Katzmann, 1984). Probably the most important source for the history of the ghetto in Radzyń is the yizkor book, which includes testimonies concerning the short history of the Jews in Puławy under German occupation: Yitzhak Zigelman, ed., Sefer Radzin: Yizkor-bukh (Tel Aviv, 1957). There is also an article on Radzyń in Abraham Wein, Bracha Freundlich, and Wila Orbach, eds., Pinkas ha-kebilot. Encyclopaedia of Jewish Communities: Poland, vol. 7, Lublin and Kielce (Jerusalem: Yad Vashem, 1999), pp. 543–547. On Kreis Radzyn there is an article by the author: "Zwischen Untergang und Selbsthilfe: Juden im Kreis Radzyn während des Zweiten Weltkrieges," Zeitschrift für Geschichtswissenschaft 8 (2005): 716–735.

There are testimonies of Jewish survivors from Radzyń in the archives of the Jewish Historical Institute (AŻIH) in Warsaw. Some statistical material can be found in the records of the Jewish Social Self-Help (JSS) organization in the Generalgouvernement, which are also located in AŻIH. Both the testimonies and the documents of the JSS frequently deal with the Jews of the Kreis and not just in the town of Radzyń. In Yehoshua Ron's personal memoir (Yehoshua Ron, "To Survive in the Hell: Between the Two Ghettos Radzyn Podlasky, and Mezerich," USHMM, Acc.1999.A.0224) there is only scant information on Radzyń. Contemporary German documentation can be found in the State Archives in Lublin (APL), where the collection "Gouverneur des Distrikts Lublin" (see also USHMM, RG-15.066M) holds some information about Jews in the region. Relevant German criminal investigations concerning Nazi crimes in Radzyń can be found in BA-L (B 162/2183-94, 4696, and 14423).

Andrea Löw

NOTES

1. AŻIH, JSS, 211/883, p. 17.
2. Ibid., 302/2327, testimony of Nuchim Perelman, p. 1; Schupack, The Dead Years, p. 14. See also Rachel Salzman-Freter, "In di ershte tsaytn fun umglik," in Zigelman, Sefer Radzyn, pp. 223 ff.
3. Schupack, The Dead Years, p. 33; Ron, "To Survive in the Hell," pp. 3–4.
4. Schupack, The Dead Years, p. 47.
5. Ibid., p. 53.
6. Ibid., p. 30.
7. Ron, "To Survive in the Hell," p. 4.
8. Schupack, The Dead Years, p. 27.
9. Löw, "Untergang," pp. 723–724.
10. "Getto w Radzyniu," Nowy Głos Lubelski, no. 85, April 15, 1942, p. 3, quoted in Krzysztof Czubasek, Żydzi Łukowa i okolic (Warsaw: Danmar, 2008), p. 186.
11. Schupack, The Dead Years, pp. 37–39.
12. Ibid., pp. 33–35.
13. Ibid., pp. 56–57; Löw, "Untergang," pp. 721–722.
14. Schupack, The Dead Years, p. 74; Wein, Freundlich, and Orbach, Pinkas ha-kebilot: Poland, vol. 7, Lublin and Kielce, pp. 543–547; Yitzchak Katzenelson, Dos lid vegn Radziner (Tel Aviv, 1964).
15. Löw, "Untergang," pp. 733–734; BA-L, ZStL 208 AR-Z 236/60 (Erich Langer), p. 5; Schupack, Gestohlene Jahre, pp. 79–81.
16. Schupack, The Dead Years, p. 82.

REJOWIEC

Pre-1939: Rejowiec (Yiddish: Rayvitsch), town, Lublin województwo, Poland; 1939–1944: Kreis Cholm, Distrikt Lublin, Generalgouvernement; post-1998: village, Lublin województwo, Poland

Rejowiec lies 52 kilometers (32 miles) east-southeast of Lublin. Its August 1939 population included about 2,600 Jews.

In the second half of September 1939, Rejowiec was initially occupied for about one week by the Red Army before these forces withdrew and the town came under German occupation. Some Jews exploited the opportunity and retreated eastward with the Soviets. During the first 21 months of occupation until June 1941, the Germans conducted only “small-scale” Aktionen against the Jews. They demanded contributions, seized people for forced labor, or suddenly came into town and shot 1 or 2 Jews. Only about 10 Jews were murdered during this period. Wealthier Jews were able to pay for substitutes to conduct forced labor for them.

The Jews of Rejowiec received ration cards, but very little food could be obtained with these pieces of paper. Instead, most Jews traded with local peasants who lived in the surrounding countryside, and people did not suffer from hunger.¹ Between the end of 1939 and May 1941, more than 1,000 Jewish refugees, mostly expelled from Lublin (in March 1941) and also from Kraków reportedly arrived in Rejowiec, increasing the pressure on the local Jewish social welfare institutions. Some, however, may have moved on to other locations or were recruited for forced labor camps, as in August 1941 there were 2,345 Jews residing in Rejowiec.²

The first large-scale Aktion against the Jews of Rejowiec took place on April 7, 1942. A large number of German police suddenly arrived in town, creating a very tense atmosphere. After several hours, the Judenrat instructed all Jews to assemble at the marketplace. About 80 percent of the Jews obeyed these instructions, and the rest hid in various places of concealment. Once assembled, the Jews were surrounded by Gendarmes, and after separating out the Judenrat chairman, the remaining Jews were herded away towards the railroad station, to be deported to the Bełżec extermination camp. Anyone who fell behind the column was shot. Babies were seized from their mothers and killed. Altogether about 200 of the Jews were murdered on the way, and the rest were loaded onto cattle cars. The next day, the Germans scoured the town for those in hiding. About 200 Jews were uncovered, and after being beaten, they were sent to the labor camp at Krychów, including members of the Judenrat. Many of these people were killed subsequently at the nearby Sobibór extermination camp. A few days later the Polish Community Council in Rejowiec spread word that all remaining Jews must register immediately, or they would be shot on sight if spotted. In response, about 140 more Jews crawled out of their hiding places. According to a report preserved in the Ringelblum Archive, these Jews were imprisoned for six days and then sent on carts to Chełm, where they were released. Other sources indicate that a number of Jews were retained in Rejowiec as needed laborers or returned after the Aktion from nearby labor camps, including Krychów.³

A remnant ghetto was then created in Rejowiec soon after this first Aktion. The ghetto consisted of two rows of houses along one of the streets on the edge of town, into which the 400 or so remaining Jews were concentrated. According to postwar testimony given to the German court in Verden, at some time in 1942, probably already in the summer, the ghetto was surrounded with barbed wire.⁴

On April 25, 1942, the Judenrat in the Rejowiec ghetto wrote to the aid committee in Kraków concerning around 1,800 Jews in extreme need, who had recently arrived from

Slovakia and the Protectorate of Bohemia and Moravia. The first Slovak transport had arrived on April 17. The Jews were unloaded in Lublin, and the men and women were separated. All the women were sent to Rejowiec, but the men and all the luggage went to another destination. The transport from the Protectorate was segregated in Rejowiec: youths capable of work were sent to a labor camp, and only women, children, and the elderly (people incapable of work) remained behind. The Judenrat appealed urgently for aid in the form of food, money, bedding, and medication to assist the women and children who were suffering from starvation. Children had to sleep on the bare ground, and 1 person had died from hunger already. Tools were also needed to repair the buildings in which the Jews were accommodated.⁵ Just prior to this, around April 20, a newly constituted Judenrat, headed by a man named Blatt, containing both Polish Jews and some recently arrived Jews was formed, which was subordinated to Majer Frenkiel, the head of the Kreis Judenrat in Chełm.⁶

According to the historian Robert Kuwałek, the following transports into Distrikt Lublin included Jews primarily destined for Rejowiec: April 16–17, 1,040 Slovak Jews from Nitra (of whom about 200 men were selected in Lublin for the Majdanek camp); April 18, 1,000 Czech Jews from Theresienstadt (probably also subject to selection in Lublin); April 20, 1,030 Slovak Jews from Nitra; May 5, 1,000 Jews; May 23 (or 27), 1,630 Slovak Jews from Sabinov and Prešov (the men were selected out and sent to Majdanek); May 24 (or 28), 1,022 Slovak Jews from Stropkov and Bardejov; May 25, 1,000 Slovak Jews from Poprad. It is estimated that at least 5,000 Jews of these transports passed through the Rejowiec ghetto altogether.⁷

The Jewish Social Self-Help (JSS) records do not confirm the arrival of all of these transports, nor do they mention exactly how many Jews arrived. However, the arrival of the third and fourth transports in Rejowiec are confirmed in a report dated May 8, 1942. The new leader of the JSS delegation in Rejowiec, Elżbieta Friedmann, described the terrible conditions for the Jewish deportees in Rejowiec and received 300 złoty in cash to buy medicine from the Kreis JSS in Chełm.⁸

The Rejowiec ghetto served for many of the Slovak and Czech Jews only as a transit ghetto, where they were held for a short time before being deported on to labor camps or one of the extermination camps.⁹ Precise information is not available, but, according to the historian Yehoshua Büchler, at the end of April already, some of the Jews of Nitra together with local Jews were sent away to labor camps, including those in Hańsk, Sawin, and Osowa (Ossowa), while others were sent to the Bełżec extermination camp.¹⁰

Pola Ajzensztajn reports that the Jewish Police at this time consisted mainly of Slovak and Czech Jews. In the summer of 1942, there was a confrontation between the Jewish Police and the Polish (Blue) Police, who then denounced their Jewish counterparts to the Germans. The Jewish policemen, together with other Czech and Slovak Jews, at least 24 people in total, were then executed as alleged Communists.¹¹

According to a report of the JSS for Kreis Cholm, on a June 18 visit, the Jewish population of Rejowiec numbered

2,449 people, including 830 children under the age of 14 and 409 men and 1,210 women over that age. Of these people, 185 men and 223 women were working for the Water Administration Office (Wasserwirtschaftsamt), for which they received full rations and payment in cash. A public kitchen was serving 1,300 people a breakfast (of coffee) and a lunch (of soup) every day—bread was not distributed. There was a division within the Judenrat between local Polish Jews and the recently arrived Slovak members, which was further complicating the administration of the JSS branch in Rejowiec.¹²

At some time in the summer of 1942, there was at least one more major deportation Aktion. The Jews were assembled on the market square and were then marched out of town. According to Ajzensztajn, who dates the Aktion in June 1942, a high-ranking Nazi then approached the column of Jews and ordered that those in possession of red labor cards were to return to Rejowiec, as they were needed laborers.¹³ Büchler, however, cites Slovak survivors who describe similar events taking place on August 9, 1942. About 2,000 (mostly Slovak) Jews were rounded up for deportation, of which some 700 were killed in and around the town. The rest were deported to the Sobibór extermination camp by train. Of these about 100 men and 50 women were selected for the Krychów labor camp on arrival at Sobibór, while the others were gassed.¹⁴ Probably around 300 Jews remained in the Rejowiec ghetto after the Aktion.

A number of Jews from the Rejowiec ghetto worked daily at the Budny estate (aka the Ossoliński Palace), about 1 kilometer (0.6 mile) outside the town. The estate was used by a Remonteamt (horse procurement office) of the Waffen-SS, composed of about 50 to 100 men, commanded by SS-Sturmbannführer Herbert Schönfeldt. Jews were collected every day from the ghetto and escorted to the Budny estate. Other Jews worked in Rejowiec at the distillery or on road construction. The Jews were also tasked to dismantle the synagogue.

In the fall of 1942, a female Jew named Fuhrer was shot by an SS man named Gustav Jeske, also known among the Jews as the “commandant of the Ghetto.” Jeske shot her for leaving the ghetto to obtain food by barter for her sick sister. Jeske was often responsible for overseeing the daily convoy of Jewish workers from the ghetto to the Budny estate. He was succeeded in this position by another SS man, Ostapeter.¹⁵ In the period from the summer of 1942 until the spring of 1943, a number of Jews who had escaped from the Chełm ghetto and other places made their way to the collection ghetto in Rejowiec. The Jews in Rejowiec were scared to let them in, as Jeske sometimes combed the ghetto, looking for strangers to kill.¹⁶ In November 1942, the local JSS officials reported that there were 290 Jews in Rejowiec working at various German labor sites and another 385 were assigned to forced labor camps (presumably outside the town).¹⁷

In the spring of 1943, most of the remaining Jews were working at the Budny estate. At this time, the SS surrounded the Jews and informed them that they would be taken to the Trawniki labor camp. Instead, however, they were rounded up and sent to the Majdanek concentration camp. The men were separated from the women on the way.¹⁸

In 1972, Gustav Jeske was tried by a German court in Verden for the alleged shooting of two Jews in Rejowiec in 1942. He was acquitted due to insufficient evidence.

Three Czech Jews—Gerda Piesenová (later Steinerová), Lucie Pollaková, and Zuzana Perelesová—are known to have survived from the April 1942 Theresienstadt deportation to Rejowiec.¹⁹

SOURCES Secondary sources regarding the fate of the Jews in Rejowiec during World War II include Gad Zaklikowski, ed., Rayvitsers in Medinas Isroel (Tel Aviv, 1958)—a translation by M. Porat is available via jewishgen.org; Abraham Wein, Bracha Freundlich, and Wila Orbach, eds., Pinkas ha-kehillot. Encyclopaedia of Jewish Communities: Poland, vol. 7, Lublin and Kielce (Jerusalem: Yad Vashem, 1999), pp. 548–550; and its English-language counterpart, Arnon Rubin, The Rise and Fall of the Jewish Communities in Poland and Their Relics Today, vol. 2, District Lublin (Tel Aviv: Tel Aviv University Press, 2007), pp. 229–231; David Silberklang, “The Holocaust in the Lublin District” (Ph.D. diss., Hebrew University, Jerusalem, February 2003); Yehoshua Büchler, “The Deportation of Slovakian Jews to the Lublin District of Poland in 1942,” HGS 6:2 (1991): 151–166; and Robert Kuwałek, “Die Durchgangsghettos im Distrikt Lublin (u.a. Izbica, Piaski, Rejowiec und Trawniki),” in Bogdan Musial, ed., “Aktion Reinhard”: Der Völkermord an den Juden im Generalgouvernement, 1941–1944 (Osnabrück: Fibre, 2004), pp. 197–232.

Archival documentation pertaining to the Rejowiec Jewish community during the war includes AŻIH (e.g., 210/593; 211/294, 898–900; 301/809, 1885, 3622; Ring I/29 [414], I/317 [34], I/811 [769], II/102 [225]); BA-L (B 162/14475); IPN; MA (D.1, 1266, 1288); USHMM (Acc.1997.A.0124 [AŻIH 211]; Acc.1999.A.0154 [AŻIH 210]; RG-15.079M [AŻIH, Ring]; RG-15.084 [Relacje]); VHF (e.g., # 12282, 18709, 25879); and YVA.

Martin Dean

NOTES

1. Israel Shpayzman, “The Destruction,” trans. M. Porat, from Zaklikowski, Rayvitsers in Medinas Isroel, pp. 205–208.

2. AŻIH, 210/593; and 211/899, p. 39, Sprawozdanie, August 31, 1941.

3. Ibid., Ring I/317 [34], as cited in Joseph Kermish, ed., To Live with Honor and Die with Honor!: Selected Documents from the Warsaw Ghetto Underground Archives “O.S.” (“Oneg Shabbath”) (Jerusalem: Yad Vashem, 1986), pp. 117–118; AŻIH, 301/1885, testimony of Pola Ajzensztajn, 1946; VHF, # 25879, testimony of Simon Dobner (born 1919), 1997.

4. AŻIH, 301/1885; 211/293, p. 61, notes of a telephone conversation on April 23, 1942; BA-L, B 162/14475 (LG-Ver, 2 Ks 2/68, verdict against Gustav Jeske, December 21, 1972), pp. 3, 17–19.

5. AŻIH, 211/900, pp. 23–25, Judenrat Rejowiec to JSS Kraków, April 25, 1942.

6. Ibid., 211/294, p. 19, Kreishauptmann Cholm, Bescheinigung, April 20, 1942.

7. Kuwałek, “Die Durchgangsghettos,” pp. 208, 216, 232; Büchler, “The Deportation of Slovakian Jews,” p. 156.

VOLUME II: PART A

8. AŻIH, 211/294, p. 9, JSS Kreis Cholm report, May 8, 1942.
9. BA-L, B 162/14475, p. 3.
10. Büchler, "The Deportation of Slovakian Jews," p. 158, citing MA, D.1, 1266.
11. Ibid.; AŻIH, 301/1885.
12. AŻIH, 211/294, pp. 49–50, JSS Kreis Cholm to JSS Delegatur in Rejowiec, June 28, 1942.
13. Ibid., 301/1885.
14. Büchler, "The Deportation of Slovakian Jews," p. 158.
15. BA-L, B 162/14475, pp. 8–16.
16. AŻIH, 301/3622, testimony of Chana Falkiewicz, pp. 1–2; VHF, # 12282, testimony of Nettie Adelsberg (born 1925), 1996.
17. AŻIH, 211/900, p. 74, Sprawozdanie, November 4, 1942.
18. Ibid., 301/1885; BA-L, B 162/14475, p. 8.
19. Database of the Terezín Initiative Institute.

ROSSOSZ

Pre-1939: Rossosz, village, Włodawa powiat, Lublin województwo, Poland; 1939–1944: Rossosch, Kreis Biala Podlaska, Distrikt Lublin, Generalgouvernement; post-1998: Rossosz, village, Biała Podlaska powiat, Lublin województwo, Poland

Rossosz lies approximately 23.5 kilometers (14.6 miles) south of Biała Podlaska and almost 95 kilometers (59 miles) by road northeast of Lublin. In 1939, 302 Jews resided there.¹

In September 1939, the first month of the war, Red Army soldiers briefly occupied Rossosz. As a result of the September 28 German-Soviet Treaty of Friendship, Cooperation, and Demarcation, Soviet forces in the region, including in Rossosz, began evacuating behind the Bug River. On October 7, the last troops crossed the bridge in Sławatycze. In early November, German representatives from the office of the Landkommissariat in Wisznice arrived in Rossosz to establish a local collaborationist civilian administration. The same men returned several days later to register Jewish families. At the end of the registration assembly, the Germans ordered the Holy Ark and Torah in the Bet Midrash desecrated and then destroyed the building. Following the violence, some Jews fled to Soviet-occupied Poland.

In November 1939, German authorities ordered the Rossosz Jews to form a Jewish Council (Judenrat). Szmul Teperman, its chair, soon moved to Biała Podlaska but regularly traveled to Rossosz to fulfill his obligations. However, in December 1941, Hubert Kühl, the newly appointed Biała Kreishauptmann, ordered the death penalty imposed on Jews found outside their places of registration. Stranded in Biała Podlaska, Teperman resigned.²

By then, about 150 Jews had arrived in Rossosz. Most newcomers were March 1941 deportees from Kraków or voluntary refugees with pre-war ties to Rossosz. By May, 466 Jews, including about 150 expellees, resided in Rossosz.³

In January 1942, I. Rubinsztejn and Menachym Wajnsztraub, local Jewish Social Self-Help (JSS) officials, informed the charity's leaders in Kraków about the existence of a Jewish quarter (dzielnica żydowska) in Rossosz. Since the men were responding to an inquiry about the possibilities of using rural villages to train Jews in agriculture, they did not include the date on which the ghetto was established but instead described physical conditions in the ghetto. They reported that the ghetto encompassed 45 pre-war Jewish houses, which were grouped together and straddled the main roadway leading from Biała Podlaska, via Łomazy in the north, and through Rossosz to Wisznice in the south.⁴ As with almost all ghettos in Kreis Biala, the Rossosz ghetto was not fenced. However, the Jews were forbidden to leave the ghetto without official permission.⁵

Because Rossosz did not appear on a list of ghettos Kühl submitted in October 1941 to Richard Türk, the head of the Population and Welfare Department (BuF) for Distrikt Lublin, its establishment may have been an unreported local initiative of Wisznice Landkommissar Werner. Believing Jews threatened the security of the vast territory he administered, Werner had instituted a number of anti-Jewish policies without Kühl's knowledge, such as, in January 1942, ordering 287 Jews from six other villages without ghettos consolidated in the Wisznice and Sławatycze ghettos.⁶

The establishment of the Rossosz ghetto ironically enabled native residents to return to their primary pre-war occupations as farmers raising vegetables and potatoes in fenced plots behind their houses. The gardens were some 120 meters (about 394 feet) long by 12 to 20 meters (39 to 66 feet) wide.⁷ Though arable land was included in the spring of 1940 confiscation of Jewish-owned property in Distrikt Lublin, local officials in a specific locality almost always permitted Jews to cultivate pre-war Jewish-owned land located within ghettos even after the designated Kreishauptmann had rejected an identical request, as had occurred in Radzyń.⁸

During the summer of 1941, some 60 young people, between 16 and 24 years old, officially left the Rossosz ghetto to work at nearby farms as paid laborers, mainly as plowmen and herders.⁹ From the summer of 1941, 30 Jews were sent to labor camps organized by the Wasserwirtschaftsinspektion (Water Regulation Authority) in Romaszki and Rossosz (at the school building) on the Muława River.¹⁰ After the Rossosz camp closed for the season in October, four ghetto residents were ordered to report to an unspecified labor camp located beyond the pre-war Rossosz gmina.¹¹

Because most refugees had no source of livelihood, the JSS established a community kitchen in late December 1941, to provide 130 of the most impoverished Jews a daily meal for the nominal cost of 10 groszy. Directed by Wigdor "Wolf" Lejzerzon, the kitchen expanded its operations by mid-February 1942 to serve daily meals to 200 people, including some pre-war residents. Two allotments of potatoes in the winter of 1941–1942, totaling 1,800 kilograms (3,968 pounds), which Kühl allowed the Rossosz JSS to purchase from cheaper government stores, were sufficient to prepare meals through late February. For the remainder of the winter, the kitchen depended on the benevolence of local Jews for its supplies.¹²

Unsanitary conditions from overcrowding in the ghetto were exacerbated by Landkommissar Werner's June 1941 decision to suspend soap rations to Jews.¹³ In 1941, 52 Jews in Rossosz contracted typhoid (enteric) fever; 68 developed typhus. A second typhus outbreak in January 1942 infected 35 people by March.¹⁴

On March 3, 1942, Werner ordered the confiscation of records and correspondence of the Jewish Council and the JSS in Rossosz.¹⁵ On April 23 and 25, representatives from the Wisznice Arbeitsamt, accompanied by Gendarmes from the Wisznice and Sławatycze posts, arrived to order all male Jews between 15 and 60 years old immediately transferred to labor camps located near Terespol.¹⁶ The expellees likely were sent to one of the two Luftwaffe camps just established for airport expansion projects in Małaszewicze Duże and Kobylany and to a Wasserwirtschaftsinspektion camp located in Terespol.

The deportation left just 10 adult men in the Rossosz ghetto and reduced its overall population to about 200.¹⁷ On May 13, Kreis-level JSS leaders appealed to Kühl to release Wajntraub, Lejzerzon, and 18-year-old Kisiel Żelazo, three Rossosz JSS officials swept up in the labor camp expulsion.¹⁸ By early June, the men had returned to Rossosz.

On June 13, 1942, almost all the remaining Jews in Rossosz were expelled to the ghetto in Łomazy. The expulsion was part of an area-wide deportation overseen by Gendarmes from the Wisznice and Sławatycze posts and ordered by the Landkommissar of Wisznice. A telegram, sent on June 14 by the Łomazy JSS delegation to leaders of the charity in Kraków, indicates that expellees from Rossosz, Sławatycze, and the joined communities of Podedwórze and Opole (aka Podedwórze-Opole) had arrived almost simultaneously in Łomazy.¹⁹ On August 17 or 18, members of Reserve Police Battalion 101 ordered the Jews in Łomazy, including the Rossosz, Podedwórze-Opole, and Sławatycze deportees, to assemble at the school yard. Marched from there to several collection points closer to the Hały Woods, the Jews were executed in small groups in two predug mass graves by Ukrainian SS auxiliaries and the policemen.²⁰

In early July, a small number of Jews left behind in Rossosz's remnant ghetto appear to have been threatened with consolidation into a larger ghetto if they failed to abide by a directive Kühl had issued in March 1942 for Jewish communities to establish pharmacies, isolation facilities, and infirmaries to treat those sick with infectious diseases. The JSS leadership appointed Żelazo the head of a pharmacy and then pleaded with JSS officials in Kraków to send a list of medicines, warning "unfortunate consequences" would befall the Jews if they could not establish medical-care facilities in Rossosz. On July 17, a JSS official in Kraków explained he could not legally send medicines before receiving proof of Żelazo's pharmacy qualifications.²¹

The Rossosz ghetto was liquidated between September 26 and 29, 1942, when its inmates were transferred to the ghetto in Międzyrzec Podlaski. Postwar Polish Institute of National Remembrance (IPN) Court Inquiries about Executions, Mass Graves, Camps, and Ghettos (ASG) documentation for Rossosz indicates Gendarmes from the Wisznice post oversaw the expulsion. The documentation describes Gendarmes Giering (Gering), Messal, and Pudiel shooting dead five Jews, including Moszko Gimelfarb (Gimerfarb) and his son Szulim, in the field behind the Gimelfarb house, also subsequently the victims' burial place.²² Members of Reserve Police Battalion 101 undoubtedly played an important role in the larger four-day expulsion Aktion, during which all Jews still in the Kreis, but not confined to labor camps, were marched to the Terespol-to-Międzyrzec road and escorted from there to the collection ghetto in Międzyrzec.²³

On October 6 and 9, members of Reserve Police Battalion 101 cleared the Międzyrzec ghetto. The policemen marched the ghetto inmates, including the Rossosz deportees, to the railway station and forced them onto railway cars destined for the Treblinka extermination facility. In February 1944, the SS executed the surviving prisoners at the Małaszewicze camp, including hundreds of Czech and Slovak Jews subsequently imprisoned there. In May, the SS shot the approximately 850 inmates of the Kobylany camp. The latter victims were murdered in two mass graves located by the Terespol-to-Międzyrzec road in Kobylany.²⁴

There are no known survivors of the Rossosz ghetto.

SOURCES Almost all secondary sources mentioning the Rossosz Jewish community during World War II appear to base their accounts on the absence of an entry for a ghetto in Czesław Pilichowski et al., eds., Obozy hitlerowskie na ziemiach polskich 1939–1945: Informator encyklopedyczny (Warsaw: PWN, 1979), and therefore conclude no ghetto existed in Rossosz. Here, see among others the relevant entries in Abraham Wein, Bracha Freundlich, and Wila Orbach, eds., Pinkas ha-kehilot. Encyclopaedia of Jewish Communities: Poland, vol. 7, Lublin and Kielce (Jerusalem: Yad Vashem, 1999), pp. 547–548; and Arnon Rubin, The Rise and Fall of the Jewish Communities in Poland and Their Relics Today, vol. 2, District Lublin (Tel Aviv: Tel Aviv University Press, 2007), pp. 232–233.

The two-page description of Jewish life in Rossosz, including the mention of the open ghetto, which served as the basis for the community's inclusion here, is located at USHMM, Acc.1997.A.0124 (AŻIH), 211/906, p. 57 (one leaf). Coverage of some of the more important issues raised in the entry is elucidated more clearly in the second JSS file for the Jewish community of Piszczac, 211/806, pp. 7, 21, and p. 48, respectively, for Kreishauptmann Kühl's March 1942 orders on medical facilities and on the Jewish labor camp in Małaszewicze, provisioned by the Piszczac Jewish community.

Kühl's discovery of Werner's January 1942 transfer of Jews to Wisznice and Sławatycze and a stenographic record of the Kreishauptmann's September 26, 1942, telephone directive naming the Międzyrzec ghetto as the collection ghetto for Jews still remaining in Kreis Biała Podlaska and describing the deportation route appears in Józef Kermisz, ed., Dokumenty i materiały do dziejów okupacji niemieckiej w Polsce, vol. 2, Akcje i wysiedlenia (Łódź: CŻKHwP, 1946), pt. 1, pp. 5–7, 57–58, respectively.

Additional archival documentation pertaining to the Rossosz Jewish community during World War II can be found in APL (e.g., 498 [273]); AŻIH (e.g., 210/598, 211 [201, p. 87; 206, pp. 38–38a, 63–65, 70, 75; 207, pp. 7, 48–49; 208, pp. 17, 67, 78–81; 209, pp. 2, 5–6, 47; 665, p. 52; 906]; IPN (e.g., ASG); IPN-Lu (e.g., 284/432–433); USHMM (e.g., Acc.1997.A.0124 [AŻIH 211]; Acc.1999.A.0154 [AŻIH 210]; RG-15.019M [IPN ASG] [reel 4 (12/27–28, 32, 47–48) and reel 15 (49/7–8)]); and YVA.

Documentation is insufficient to determine if ghettos existed for several communities mentioned in the entry. Because no Jews from Podedwórze-Opole are believed to have survived under the German occupation, knowledge of Jewish life there comes mainly from JSS records. The documentation indicates the 14 extended Jewish families (126 people) in Podedwórze-Opole were overwhelmed by the arrival in March 1941 of 530 to 600 Jewish deportees. The local Jews accommodated as many as 65 expellees in their houses and still other deportees in their barns and cowsheds. However, the Podedwórze-Opole JSS correspondence, which notes the Jewish population had fallen to 383 by October 1941, never mentions the existence or absence of a ghetto. Here, see, for example, USHMM, Acc.1997.A.0124 (AŻIH), 211/134, pp. 46, 48, 211/811, with the Łomazy deportation covered in 211/209, pp. 34, 37, 45, 49, 51, 53, but no precise figure of expellees provided.

In Terespol, another community in which no Jews are believed to have survived under the German occupation, an April 1940 list of Jewish inhabitants indicates that as about 1,500 Jews departed voluntarily for Soviet-occupied Poland or were forced across the border in a January 1940 Aktion in which 29 perished, the 289 Jews remaining in Terespol were concentrated together in a few houses located close to each other but on a handful of noncontiguous streets. Here, see USHMM, Acc.1999.A.0154 (AŻIH), 210/687, pp. 1–10, and p. 22, for the April 1942 JSS ghetto questionnaire, mistakenly placed in the same file, which reports that neither an open nor a closed ghetto existed in Terespol. The JSS file for Terespol, at USHMM, Acc.1997.A.0124 (AŻIH), 211/1028, p. 66, suggests 78 Terespol Jews were transferred to labor camps in August, a month before the community was sent to the Międzyrzec collection ghetto.

Laura Crago

NOTES

1. USHMM, Acc.1997.A.0124 (AŻIH), 211/906, p. 2.
2. Ibid., pp. 48–49, 55, 64.
3. Ibid., 211/906, p. 2.
4. Ibid., p. 57.
5. Ibid.
6. Kermisz, Dokumenty, vol. 2, pt. 1, p. 4.
7. USHMM, Acc.1997.A.0124, 211/906, p. 57.
8. Ibid., 211/890, p. 62.
9. Ibid., 211/906, p. 57.
10. Ibid., RG-15.019M (IPN), reel 15, 49/7–8.
11. Ibid., Acc.1997.A.0124, 211/906, pp. 8, 17, 21, 39.
12. Ibid., pp. 51, 60, 63; and 211/207, p. 42.
13. Ibid., 211/906, p. 8.
14. Ibid., p. 62.
15. Ibid., 211/208, p. 17.
16. Ibid., 211/906, p. 67.
17. Ibid.
18. Ibid., p. 69; 211/208, p. 78; 211/209, pp. 2, 5–6.
19. Ibid., 211/665, p. 52.

20. Ibid., RG-15.019M, reel 4, 12/32.

21. Ibid., Acc.1997.A.0124, 211/906, pp. 71–75.

22. Ibid., RG-15.019M, reel 4, 12/47.

23. Kermisz, Dokumenty, vol. 2, pt. 1, pp. 57–58.

24. USHMM, RG-15.019M, reel 15, 49/4–5.

RYKI

Pre-1939: Ryki (Yiddish: Riki), village, Garwolin powiat, Warsaw województwo, Poland; 1939–1944: Kreis Pularwy, Distrikt Lublin, Generalgouvernement; post-1998: town, Ryki powiat, Lublin województwo, Poland

Ryki lies 64 kilometers (40 miles) northwest of Lublin, on the main railway line to Warsaw. Its pre-war 1939 population of 4,500 included 3,000 Jews.

On September 10 and 12, 1939, Luftwaffe bombardment killed 500 Jews, destroyed 169 Jewish-owned houses, and left 169 Jewish families (869 people) homeless. Jews fleeing greater devastation in Kurów and Garwolin nonetheless settled in Ryki.¹

Upon occupying Ryki on September 17, 1939, the Wehrmacht established a small military garrison (Stadtkommandantur).² Captain Falke, its commander, imposed forced labor quotas on the Jews. Some 400 men were marched to Dęblin to unload armaments from Polish military warehouses. Others cleared rubble in Ryki. Several Jews perished during German searches for valuables; Jewish shops and homes were vandalized. On Yom Kippur (September 23), German soldiers humiliated Jews in the synagogue. Some Poles robbed Jews at night, despite a curfew from 6:00 P.M. to 6:00 A.M.³

After the military's departure, a Sonderdienst unit, composed of ethnic Germans and some Ukrainians, and a unit of Polish (Blue) Police, recruited mainly from local pre-war Polish policemen, exercised authority in Ryki. Both were subordinated to the Gendarmerie post in Dęblin. Landwirtschaftskommissar Wagner, supervisor of agricultural estates around Ryki, also implemented anti-Jewish policies, initially demanding the Jews furnish his new residence, a palace in Ułęż.⁴

In January 1940, authorities ordered the establishment of a Jewish Council (Judenrat) and a 10-member Jewish police force.⁵ Shmuel Gutwajder, the first council chair, ameliorated the plight of Ryki Jews who had to report to labor camps. That summer, he negotiated a reduction from 200 to 45 men in an SS-imposed quota for the labor camp in Bełżec. On an official visit there, he secured the Ryki prisoners' release.⁶ Gutwajder died of a heart attack in early May 1942. Mojsze Wajsfisz succeeded him.

Survivors date the Ryki ghetto's establishment to early 1941, with January or February the most frequently cited months.⁷ Barbara Kwiatkowska, a historian of Ryki, believes the ghetto was established in March. The order probably came about because of the decision to settle 889 Jewish prisoners of war (POWs) from Stalag II B Hammerstein in Ryki; nearly half of them arrived in March.⁸ The quartering of Hungarian troops in Ryki, in preparation for the German invasion of the Soviet Union, also may have played a role.

The ghetto was located in the most devastated part of Ryki: the old Jewish neighborhood surrounding the main square. Its borders stretched from 11 Listopad Street to before the Buks Reservoir and included Kanał, Kapitulna, and Łuków Streets. Initially, it was not fenced. However, Jews were forbidden, on penalty of death, from leaving its borders without permission or being on its streets after curfew. Several were shot for violating the orders.⁹

By the spring of 1941, about 370 Jews left the ghetto daily to fulfill forced labor quotas: 100 for projects organized by the Ryki administration, 90 for agricultural labor on Wagner's estate, 30 at the train station to load timber for a private German lumber company, and 150 for Organisation Todt (OT) projects. Another 300 to 500 men were interned weekly in local labor camps: 200 to 300 at a camp established by the Schalinger Company just outside Ryki; and 100 to 200 from late June 1941 at a Wehrmacht camp organized at an armaments depot in Stawy. Another 100 men were rotated monthly through an SS camp established in Janiszów (pre-war Janów Lubelski powiat), on the Wisła River, for flood-control projects.¹⁰ Because of the labor camp drafts, the ghetto population in late September 1941 stood at 2,920.¹¹

Gendarmes from Dęblin and Gestapo officials from Puławy entered the ghetto to terrorize and rob the Jewish population. Accompanied by the Gendarmes, Wagner ordered the Jewish Council to surrender contributions and oversaw the executions of Jews for refusing to turn over goods, including leather. Two shochtim were executed for practicing kosher slaughter.¹²

The extensive fire damage and the ghetto's small size required about 40 families to live together in each of its habitable structures. The resulting poor sanitation led to a typhus epidemic in April 1941. The Judenrat ordered the Bet Midrash transformed into a 24-bed medical clinic (officially a quarantine facility), directed by Dr. Rafał Kestenbaum. At least 50 people perished.¹³ In August, a trachoma outbreak reached epidemic proportions.¹⁴

Quarantine orders prevented the resettlement of additional refugees in the ghetto. From May 1941, the Ryki Jewish Council was required to pay to transport newly arrived refugees to other towns and villages.¹⁵

Tighter quarantine procedures likely included fencing the ghetto. On July 28, 1941, Jewish Social Self-Help (JSS) leaders in Ryki reported that because of the epidemic, officials temporarily had "close[d] the Jewish quarter a few weeks prior" and were now threatening to close it off permanently.¹⁶ The barbed-wire fence, a quarantine measure, was erected around the three sides of the ghetto bordering the non-Jewish residential area. The side of the ghetto bordering the reservoir initially was not fenced. The ghetto's gate was guarded externally by members of the Sonderdienst.

In an unsuccessful bid to suspend the closure orders, the JSS and Judenrat stopped food assistance to the indigent in August and September 1941 and instead channeled its charitable resources into purchasing medicines. The Judenrat appealed to wealthier Jews to purchase talons, which poorer Jews could exchange for a bowl of soup and a small piece of bread at one of the private restaurants in the ghetto.¹⁷ The aid was too little; survivors all remember hunger as an endemic problem of ghetto life.

From early 1942, the poor material conditions and rumors of the community's impending evacuation provoked many to flee to the ghetto in Żelechów. To secure the fugitives' return, the Sonderdienst began taking their family members as hostages.¹⁸ One survivor suspects the new Jewish Council chair was arrested and executed on May 6, 1942, for sending his family to Żelechów. Others believe he was killed to secure the community's compliance to the impending ghetto liquidation orders.¹⁹

The next day, on May 7, 1942, at 5:00 A.M., Gendarmes from Dęblin, representatives from the Puławy Kreishauptmann's office, including Bartel, head of its criminal division, and Wagner arrived to oversee the liquidation of the ghetto. Jakow Mandelbaum remembers Obersturmführer Grosser, the head of the Puławy Gestapo, joining Bartel and Wagner to supervise the expulsion of the Ryki Jewish community. Symcha Wajnberg also recalled substantial SD participation. Local police forces—including the Sonderdienst and Polish (Blue) Police—assisted in clearing the ghetto.²⁰

The Germans ordered the Jews to assemble on the market square and then, on pain of death, to surrender their watches, rings, and gold and silver items. Some were beaten or shot for refusing to comply.²¹ About 30 to 70 men had to remain behind to work for Schalinger. After the elderly and small children were loaded onto peasant wagons, the remaining Jews were ordered into marching formation behind the wagons. During the 13-kilometer (8-mile) trip to Dęblin, about 150 stragglers (80 men, 50 women, and 20 children) were shot dead.

At the train station, Arbeitsamt officials from Dęblin held back another 200 mostly young, male Jews for labor at a local Luftwaffe camp, located at the airport. The rest of the Ryki Jewish community, some 1,500 to 2,466 people, were ordered onto trains destined for the Sobibór extermination camp. Some Ryki Jews assigned to Stawy, but not interned there, had evaded the deportation, because they had left for work before the Germans arrived to liquidate the ghetto. On May 8, in Stawy, the SS retained a group of men for labor and sent the remaining Jews to their deaths at Sobibór.²² In late May 1942, the 30 to 60 Jews working for Schalinger were transferred to the Stawy camp. Upon the liquidation of the Żelechów ghetto in September 1942, some Ryki Jews fled to Dęblin and entered the camps there.

On July 22, 1944, the day the Red Army liberated Lublin, the Jewish inmates of the Luftwaffe camp in Dęblin, including a number of former Stawy inmates consolidated there, were evacuated to labor camps in Częstochowa. Some 50 to 70 Ryki Jews survived the war.

SOURCES Some APL documentation has appeared in Tatiana Berenstein et al., eds., Faschismus, Getto, Massenmord: Dokumentation über Ausrottung und Widerstand der Juden in Polen

während des zweiten Weltkrieges (Berlin: Rütten & Loening, 1961), p. 438.

Published survivor testimonies can be found in the yizkor book, Shimon Kants, ed., Yisker-bukh tsum fareybikn dem ondenk fun der khorev-gevorner yidisber kebile Ryki (Israel: Irgun Yotz'e Ryki, 1973). The Jakob Handshtok contribution appears in English translation as Jakov Handshtok, "In the Tracks of the Jewish Life That Disappeared," in Jack Kugelmass and Jonathan Boyarin, eds., From a Ruined Garden: The Memorial Books of Polish Jewry, 2nd ed. (Bloomington: Indiana University Press and USHMM, 1998), pp. 262–266. An almost complete Polish translation of the Holocaust sections of the yizkor book, by Andrzej Cieśła, is available at jewishgen.org. Based on an earlier Czech translation by Judith Dunayevsky and Michael Dunayevsky, it also served as the basis for the English-language translation of the B. Brankacz (or Bronkacz) yizkor book contribution on JewishGen. Interviews with Ryki survivor Szlomo Judensznajder (Solly Irving) appear in Martin Gilbert, The Boys: Triumph over Adversity (London: Weidenfeld & Nicolson, 1996).

Secondary accounts include Abraham Wein, Bracha Freundlich, and Wila Orbach, eds., Pinkas ha-kehillot. Encyclopaedia of Jewish Communities: Poland, vol. 7, Lublin and Kielce (Jerusalem: Yad Vashem, 1999), pp. 550–553, in English and Polish translations on JewishGen, with a second English translation in Arnon Rubin, The Rise and Fall of Jewish Communities in Poland and Their Relics Today, vol. 2, District Lublin (Tel Aviv: Tel Aviv University Press, 2007), pp. 233–236; and Barbara Kwiatkowska et al., eds., Historia—kultura—tradycje: Żydzi w Rykach (Ryki: Towarzystwo Przyjaciół Ryk, 2006), pp. 31–37, with an English translation available at the Wirtualny Sztetl, on the Web site of the Museum of the History of Polish Jews, www.sztetl.org.pl.

The Jewish POWs resettled in Ryki and Biała Podlaska from Stalag II B Hammerstein are discussed by Janina Kiełboń in Migracje ludności w dystrykcie lubelskim w latach 1939–1944 (Lublin: Państwowe Muzeum na Majdanku, 1995) and "Deportacja Żydów do dystryktu lubelskiego (1939–1943)," in Dariusz Libionka, ed., Akcja Reinhardt. Zagłada Żydów w Generalnym Gubernatorstwie (Warsaw: IPN, 2004), pp. 161–175, with the number of Jewish prisoners drawn from German documentation at APL; Rejestr miejsc i faktów zbrodni popełnionych przez okupanta hitlerowskiego na ziemiach polskich w latach 1939–1945. Województwo lubelskie (Warsaw: GKBZHWP and IPN, 1985), pp. 218–221, outlines the scope of anti-Jewish violence during the expulsion to Dęblin. Though Tatiana Berenstein reports more than 2,000 Slovak Jews arrived in the Ryki ghetto on May 15, 1942, in "Martyrologia, opór i zagłada ludności żydowskiej w dystrykcie lubelskim," BŻIH, no. 21 (1957): 79, postwar German documentation, cited by Kiełboń above, and survivors' testimonies note the 2,008 expellees, from Prešov, arrived in two transports on May 13–14 in Dęblin and were transferred to labor camps in Dęblin and Stawy. Here, see, among others, AŻIH, 301/1443, testimony of Maria Abramowicz-Rozencweig, p. 2, and the testimonies from Ryki survivors, cited in the notes below.

Documentation about the fate of the Ryki Jewish community during World War II can be found in the following archives: APL (e.g., 498 [273]); AŻIH (e.g., 210/608, 211/916, 301/1298); BA-L (B 162/5939); IPN; IPN-Lu (e.g., 57/09/Zn); USHMM (Acc.1997.A.0124 [AŻIH 211]; Acc.1999.A.0154 [AŻIH 210]; RG-15.019M [IPN] [reel 12, 41/284]); VHF (# 1434, 3910, 23790, 30406, 43083); and YVA. Contemporary press coverage appears in "Ryki (powiat puławski)," Gazeta Żydowska, February 4, 1941, no. 10, p. 7, and in the May 29, 1942, edition of the publication known as the Bulletin (Polish Biuletyn) of Oneg Shabat, with this particular edition, titled Di megile fun payn un oysrotung, available at AŻIH and USHMM, on C-D, in Ring I/1062/1 (1381).

Laura Crago and Michael McConnell

NOTES

1. USHMM, Acc.1999.A.0154 (AŻIH), AJDC, 210/608, pp. 1, 3, 7–8, 20–27.
2. BA-L, B162/5939, p. 847 (deposition, Rafał Kestenbaum).
3. Kants, Yisker-bukh Ryki, pp. 411–412, 436 (testimonies, respectively, Jakow Mandelbaum, B. Brankacz).
4. BA-L, B 162/5939, pp. 847–849, 835–836, 875–876 (depositions, Kestenbaum, Jakow Mandelbaum, Jeremiahu Handshtok, respectively).
5. Gazeta Żydowska, February 4, 1941, p. 7.
6. Kants, Yisker-bukh Ryki, pp. 413–414 (Mandelbaum).
7. BA-L, B 162/5939, pp. 891 (deposition, Symcha Wajnberg), 847, 836.
8. USHMM, Acc.1997.A.0124 (AŻIH), ŻSS, 211/916, p. 13.
9. BA-L, B 162/5939, pp. 836, 891.
10. See, among others, all testimonies from Ryki survivors at BA-L, B 162/5939; Kants, Yisker-bukh Ryki, pp. 419–422, 414–415 (testimonies, Jakob Handshtok and Mandelbaum, respectively); Gazeta Żydowska, February 4, 1941; USHMM, Acc.1997.A.0124, 211/916, pp. 1–6; AŻIH, 301/1298, testimony of Hersz Suchodolski, p. 1.
11. USHMM, Acc.1997.A.0124, 211/916, p. 57.
12. Kants, Yisker-bukh Ryki, p. 438 (Brankacz); BA-L, B 162/5939, pp. 848–849, 876, 831–832 (deposition, Dow Blizinski).
13. USHMM, Acc.1997.A.0124, 211/916, pp. 23–24, 28–32, 37–38.
14. Ibid., pp. 49–52.
15. Ibid., p. 13.
16. Ibid., p. 28.
17. Ibid., pp. 58, 75.
18. Kants, Yisker-bukh Ryki, pp. 430–431 (Mosze Openhajm testimony).
19. Compare in ibid., pp. 438–439, 415 (Brankacz and Mandelbaum, respectively).
20. BA-L, B 162/5939, pp. 837, 892–893.
21. Kants, Yisker-bukh Ryki, p. 416 (Mandelbaum).
22. Ibid., pp. 434–435 (testimony, B. Lajtman); BA-L, B 162/5939, pp. 838–839 (Mandelbaum).

SŁAWATYCZE

Pre-1939: Sławatycze (Yiddish: Slavatitch), town, Włodawa powiat, Lublin województwo, Poland; 1939–1944: Sławatycze, Kreis Biała Podlaska, Distrikt Lublin, Generalgouvernement; post-1998: Sławatycze, Biała Podlaska powiat, Lublin województwo, Poland

Sławatycze, now located on the Polish border with the Republic of Belarus, lies on the Bug River, some 111 kilometers (69 miles) by road northeast of Lublin. In August 1939, some 1,600 Jews resided there.¹

The Germans occupied Sławatycze on September 21–22, 1939, but soon abandoned it to Soviet occupation. Soviet forces arrived before September 25. With the demarcation, on September 28, of the Soviet-occupation zone as east of the Bug River, the Red Army began evacuating troops through Sławatycze, leaving the settlement last, on October 7. Many Jews followed the soldiers. On October 5–9, a Wehrmacht unit reoccupied Sławatycze.

German authorities established a local Polish collaborationist administration. It was subordinated to the Landkommissariat of Wisznice, led, from at least late 1941, by a German surnamed Klemmer. German Gendarmerie and Border Police posts were established. The Gendarmerie post was subordinated to its sister post in Wisznice. A Sonderdienst force, composed mainly of local Ukrainians, and a unit of auxiliary Polish (Blue) Police assisted the Gendarmes. In November 1939, the Sławatycze Jews were ordered to form a Jewish Council (Judenrat). On December 1, the Jews were required to wear white armbands with a blue Star of David.

Jewish refugees, hoping to cross into Soviet-occupied territory, flooded Sławatycze initially. In November 1939, the town also served as a place of resettlement for Jewish expellees from Lubartów and Radzyń Podlaski, towns in which the only authorized Jewish residents were craftsmen and their families. By February 1940, 1,168 Jewish newcomers had arrived in Sławatycze. They included 457 Radzyń expellees, 185 Lubartów deportees, expellees from Puławy, and some 500 unregistered refugees.²

In February 1940, a German unit executed 41 to 50 Jews, including 3 Radzyń expellees. Radzyń native Yehoshua Rosenkrantz believes the victims were killed because the Border Police suspected them of smuggling goods and people across the Bug River. Henry Gitelman, a Sławatycze native, reported that the executions targeted the most prominent Sławatycze Jews, including his grandfather and uncle.³

The killings and the Radzyn Kreishauptmann's spring 1940 decision to permit expellees to return home resulted in the refugees' mass departure. By April 1940, only 192 remained. In May 1941, some 50 Jewish deportees from Kraków (expelled first to Terespol and Kodeń) were resettled in Sławatycze. By the end of 1941, the Jewish population stood at 1,326.⁴

Sources give differing dates for the establishment of the ghetto in Sławatycze. Survivor Chaim Lerer asserts the Germans established a ghetto a few months after occupying Sławatycze.⁵ Henoch Lisak (Henryk Piekarski) recalls that by the summer of 1941 most Jews already were living on one or two streets located along the Bug River.⁶ However, the residential concentration and orders from November and December imposing the death penalty on Jews found without permission outside their places of registration were insufficient reason for Biała Podlaska Kreishauptmann Herbert Kühn to include Sławatycze on a list of ghettos he compiled in December. Institute of National Remembrance (IPN) researchers, led by Czesław Pilichowski, report the ghetto was created in January 1942. They likely chose the date because Wisznice Landkommissar Klemmer that month ordered about 150 Jews from nearby Hanna, Dołhobrody, and Holeszów villages expelled to Sławatycze.⁷ Klemmer, moreover, explained to Kühn that he had ordered the expulsions to Sławatycze (and Wisznice) in part because his experience with a closed ghetto in Wisznice had demonstrated that Jews worked more efficiently when confined to a Jewish quarter.⁸ Others believe the ghetto was established in mid-June 1942.

Overcrowding posed problems from 1941 on, as 14 or 15 people lived in a single house, with most sleeping 4 or 5 per bed.⁹ Lisak, a summer 1941 arrival from the Warsaw ghetto, mentioned that the tile maker with whom he lived held a concession to produce and sell finished goods but found his work impeded by weather conditions at the river bank and directives limiting Jews' access to heating fuel and raw materials. A Jewish Social Self-Help (JSS) report, from July 1941, notes 24 tailors and shoemakers held such concessions. Another 215 Jews were conscripted for forced labor.¹⁰ Because of food shortages, Lisak found work as an agricultural laborer in a nearby village. On a Sunday visit, he learned a local ethnic German had falsely denounced a large group of Jews, including the tile maker and his wife for stealing. The Jews were executed, perhaps behind the public school, where Arië Flaksberg remembers the police shooting 45 to 50 Jews in November or December 1941.

Flaksberg describes an SS officer, an ethnic German from Poznań, arriving on May 3 or 4, 1942, to order young men immediately interned at a nearby labor camp. Among the conscripts were his two older brothers. JSS records indicate the labor camp roundups, which began in Sławatycze in late April and continued through mid-May, enveloped even the organization's officers, individuals officially exempt from forced labor conscription.¹¹

In June 1942, an Aktion reduced the size of the Jewish community. Scholars associated with the museum established after the war on the site of the Sobibór extermination camp maintain that German records document the arrival that month of a transport of some 1,000 Sławatycze Jews. The deportation probably occurred between June 11 and 14, the dates on which JSS leaders reported a "resettlement" Aktion had impacted the entire Kreis, including the town of Biała Podlaska proper, from whence, on June 11, more than 3,000 Jews went to Sobibór.¹²

Two prominent Polish-Jewish historians reject the claim of a Sobibór deportation. The first, Tatiana Berenstein, examined JSS records and concluded a small group of Sławatycze Jews was expelled to Łomazy on June 13, 1942. A June 14 telegram from Łomazy records JSS leaders requesting immediate assistance for deportees (about 650 in number) who just arrived from Sławatycze, Rossosz, and Podedwórze-Opole which indicates some part of the community was expelled there.¹³ The second historian, Sławatycze native Michał Grynberg, after interviewing Jewish survivors and Polish-Christian eyewitnesses, concluded the June Aktion had devolved into a mass killing, as local Polish and Ukrainian police held the Jews captive at the market square, stripped them of valuables, selected victims for execution, and offered, for enormous sums, to release those slated for death. The Germans overseeing the Aktion killed hundreds of victims at the Jewish cemetery. Hundreds more were shot dead fleeing the roundup or during the three-day search for those in hiding. Some 600 to 1,000 Jews perished during the violence.

A remnant ghetto was established on Pielwaki [sic] Street for those held back from execution. The unfenced ghetto was heavily guarded day and night. Because the three interpretations of the June Aktion at present are mutually exclusive, the overall ghetto population is difficult to ascertain. It stood somewhere between 300 and 1,200.

On August 17 or 18, 1942, members of Reserve Police Battalion 101 shot almost all the 2,187 Jewish inhabitants of Łomazy, including the Sławatycze expellees.

On September 26, 1942, Kühl informed civilian authorities that all Jews in Kreis Biała Podlaska not interned in labor camps would be brought to the ghetto in Międzyrzec Podlaski some time between September 25 and 29.¹⁴ Grynberg and Krzysztof Gruszkowski describe the local Polish (Blue) Police overseeing the Sławatycze expulsion. Gendarmes from the Sławatycze and Wisznice posts, and members of Reserve Police Battalion 101, temporarily stationed in Wisznice, and a number of other nearby localities to provide manpower during the expulsions, likely played some role. At the market square, the main assembly point, women and children were ordered onto peasant carts. Likely to reduce escape attempts along the 77-kilometer (48-mile) route, the men were compelled to walk barefoot to Międzyrzec. Those who fell behind along the way were shot dead. Once in Międzyrzec, the surviving Jews were imprisoned at the synagogue. On October 6–9, members of Reserve Police Battalion 101, SS Ukrainian auxiliaries from Trawniki, and members of the SS office in Radzyń marched the prisoners to the railway station and forced them onto wagons destined for the Treblinka extermination camp. The deportees were gassed on arrival.

Though many Jews evaded deportation, most fugitives were rounded up and executed in the months following the ghetto's liquidation. Twelve-year-old Philip Garen is the only person from a group of forest fugitives to have survived German-ordered searches of the forest and the denunciations of the local population. A few local Poles assisted the fugitives. Lisak, working outside the ghetto at the time of the expulsion, was sheltered first by his Polish employers and then by the Artecki family in Piszczac. Just outside of Sławatycze, Anna and Dominik Parczewski sheltered Wewe (Wewel) Grynszpan (Greenspan) and his son Chaim-Joszke (later, Henry). Marianna and Józef Krzymowski, from Liszna, hid Chaja Szumacher. Lerer fled east and made his way to Soviet forces.

Less than 10 former residents of the Sławatycze ghetto survived the war. Counted among them is Wewe Grynszpan, whom unknown Polish assailants murdered in Sławatycze less than a year after the July 1944 liberation.

SOURCES Secondary sources with coverage of the history of the Sławatycze Jewish community during World War II include the relevant entries in Abraham Wein, Bracha Freundlich, and Wila Orbach, eds., Pinkas ha-kehillot. Encyclopaedia of Jewish Communities: Poland, vol. 7, Lublin and Kielce (Jerusalem: Yad Vashem, 1999), pp. 355–356; its English-language counterpart, Arnon Rubin, The Rise and Fall of the Jewish Communities in Poland and Their Relics Today, vol. 2, District Lublin (Tel Aviv: Tel Aviv University Press, 2007), pp. 256–257; Michał Grynberg, Sławatycze, Domu mój: O życiu i zagładzie Żydów w Sławatyczach: Losy autora (Warsaw: KiW, 2000), which is part history and part memoir and serves as the basis for Krzysztof Gruszkowski, “Sławatycki okręg bóżniczy,” on the Sławatycze homepage on the Wirtualny Sztetl, a Web site sponsored by the Museum of Polish Jews, and Krzysztof Bielawski, “Sławatycze,” on the Cmentarze Żydowskie w Polsce (Jewish cemeteries in Poland) Web site, at www.kir.kuty.xip.pl/slawatycze.htm. At present, the last source is the only widely available English-language summary of Grynberg's work.

Also important for understanding historians' interpretations and the context of events in Sławatycze are Czesław Pilichowski et al., eds., Obozy hitlerowskie na ziemiach polskich 1939–1945: Informator encyklopedyczny (Warsaw: PWN, 1979), p. 456; Tatiana Berenstein, “Martyrologia, opór i zagłada ludności żydowskiej w dystrykcie lubelskim,” BŻIH, no. 21 (1957): 40, 59; and Christopher R. Browning, Ordinary Men: Reserve Police Battalion 101 and the Final Solution in Poland (New York: HarperCollins, 1992).

A number of memoirs are available from survivors, including Henry Gitelman, “Drenched in the Dew of Childhood, a Shtetl Called Sławatycze,” available on the Sławatycze homepage of the Wirtualny Sztetl; Michał Grynberg testimony, in Marian Turski, ed., Losy żydowskie: Świadectwo żywych, vol. 1 (Warsaw: Wydawnictwo Stowarzyszenia Żydów Komбатantów i Poszkodowanych w II Wojnie Światowej, 1996), pp. 231–235; “Henoch Rafael Lisak,” in Wiktoria Śliwowska, ed., The Last Eyewitnesses: Children of the Holocaust Speak, trans. Julian Bussgang and Fay Bussgang (Evanston, IL: Northwestern University Press, 1998), vol. 1, pp. 99–104; and the reminiscences in speeches given during the 2008 rededication of the Sławatycze Jewish cemetery, available in English on the Sławatycze Landsmanschaft Web site, www.slawatycze.org. Gitelman is the author of an unpublished yizkor book, “The Personal Memoirs of Descendants of Sławatycze,” and is completing an English translation of Grynberg's book. Coverage of the first months of the German occupation is provided in the accounts of survivors Yehoshua Rosencrantz and Sarah Bashe Voyazsher (Wojazer) in the Radzyń yizkor book, Yitshak Zigelman, Sefer Radzin (Tel Aviv: Va'ad yots'e Radzin (Podlaski) be-Yisrael, 1957), pp. 227–244 and 245–248, respectively. The book's Holocaust sections are available in English translation on jewishgen.org.

Published German documentation can be found in Józef Kermisz, ed., Dokumenty i materiały do dziejów okupacji niemieckiej w Polsce, vol. 2, Akcje i wysiedlenia (Łódź: CŻKHwP, 1946), pt. 1, pp. 5–7, 57–58.

Archival documentation for the Jewish community of Sławatycze includes APL; AŻIH (e.g., 210/637; 211 [204, pp. 8, 32–33; 205, p. 19; 206, pp. 4, 38, 38a; 207, p. 51; 208, pp. 11, 78, 80–81; 209, pp. 3, 5–6, 37, 64; 665, p. 52], 301 [2327]); FVA

(HVT-1638); IPN-Lu (i.e., 362/67/1-2); USHMM (e.g., Acc.1997.A.0124 [AŻIH 211]; Acc.1999.A.0154 [AŻIH 210]); VHF (e.g., # 3894, 3924, 20493, 33524, 46024); and YVA.

Laura Crago

NOTES

1. USHMM, Acc.1997.A.0124 (AŻIH), 211/970, p. 58.
2. AŻIH, 301/2327, testimony of Nachum Perelman (Perlman), p. 2; USHMM, Acc.1999.A.0154 (AŻIH), 210/637, pp. 2, 8, 33.
3. Zigelman, Sefer Radzin, pp. 231–232; Gitelman, “Drenched,” p. 38.
4. USHMM, Acc.1997.A.0124, 211/970, pp. 31, 33, 61.
5. VHF, # 3924, testimony of Chaim Lerer.
6. Ibid., # 20493, testimony of Henryk Piekarski.
7. USHMM, Acc.1997.A.0124, 211/970, p. 69.
8. Kermisz, Dokumenty, vol. 2, pt. 1, pp. 5–7.
9. VHF, # 33524, testimony of Arië Flaksberg.
10. USHMM, Acc.1997.A.0124, 211/970, p. 44.
11. Ibid., 211/208, pp. 78, 80–81; 211/209, pp. 3, 5–6.
12. Ibid., 211/209, p. 17.
13. Ibid., 211/665, p. 52.
14. Kermisz, Dokumenty, vol. 2, pt. 1, pp. 57–58.

SZCZEBRZESZYN

Pre-1939: Szczebreszyn (Yiddish: Shebreshin), town, Zamość powiat, Lublin województwo, Poland; 1939–1944: initially Kreis Zamosc then Kreis Bilgoraj, Distrikt Lublin, Generalgouvernement; post-1998: Zamość powiat, Lublin województwo, Poland

Szczebreszyn lies 85 kilometers (53 miles) south-southeast of Lublin. In August 1939, its 7,496 inhabitants included about 3,200 Jews.

German forces occupied Szczebreszyn from September 13–26, 1939, before relinquishing it to Soviet occupation. After a border renegotiation returned Szczebreszyn to Germany's sphere of influence, 500 to 800 Jews joined the October 5–6 Soviet military evacuation. On October 8, the Germans reoccupied Szczebreszyn.

On October 14, 1939, Major von Bassewitz-Behr, military commander of Szczebreszyn for 10 days, appointed a local collaborationist administration. He named 60 Poles members of an auxiliary police force (Hilfspolizei). A civilian Gendarmerie post was established shortly before Szczebreszyn's transfer on March 16, 1940, from Kreis Zamosc to Kreis Bilgoraj.

On November 15, 1939, German soldiers torched the synagogue and set Jewish residences afire. Blamed for the arson attacks, the Jews were fined 20,000 złoty.

A council of Jewish elders, established during the fires, was transformed into a Jewish Council (Judenrat) in April 1940. Cudyk Mejler became its chair. The Jewish Council raised “contributions” demanded by the authorities and organized forced labor conscription. From the spring of 1940, it ordered more than 500 men to labor camps, including some 300 to Bełżec in mid-August.

Luftwaffe troops publicly humiliate a group of elderly, religious Jews in Szczebreszyn, n.d.

USHMM WS #18828, COURTESY OF IPN

Some 300 local Jews displaced by war devastation in Fram-pol (149 people), Biłgoraj, and Janów (Lubelski) moved to Szczebreszyn. In December 1939, 210 expellees arrived from Włocławek (180) and Łódź (30). On January 15, 1940, 126 Włocławek men, imprisoned in Zamość, were expelled to Szczebreszyn. By September, 2,800 Jews, including 400 refugees and deportees, were residing in Szczebreszyn.¹

From late August 1940, a ghetto gradually emerged in the so-called Zatylny neighborhood. It began at the rear cellar apartments of the buildings fronting the market square on Zamość Street and stretched back to Targowa Street and the Wieprz River.

The need to house 1,000 Polish-Christian Warthegau deportees from Gostynin expelled to Szczebreszyn in late July 1940 likely sparked the first consolidation of Jews in the future ghetto. On August 22, Jews were expelled from front-facing apartments on Zamość Street. On August 29, Jewish businesses were auctioned. As Mejler explained to American Jewish Joint Distribution Committee (AJDC) officials in Warsaw in September, while most Jewish men were interned in labor camps, authorities had expropriated their businesses, ordered their families to move to residences on rear streets, and permitted the new Polish business owners to take over the evicted Jews' homes.²

Halina Witting, a Polish-Christian expellee from Poznań, recalls the ghetto was established after she arrived in Szczebreszyn in the winter of 1940–1941. The Kawerszok family, required to report to the ghetto, offered Witting their fabric store, 1 of 35 Jewish shops still open, in exchange for promises of material assistance.³ The timing suggests preparations for the German invasion of the Soviet Union (June 22, 1941), and the garrisoning of Luftwaffe troops in Szczebreszyn on April 3 may have contributed to the ghetto's formation. The Polish physician Zygmunt Klukowski, director of the Szczebreszyn hospital, first used the word ghetto (dzielnicza żydowska) in his diary on July 8, noting a German airman had shot dead a 21-year-old Jewish woman in the ghetto. Before Witting's arrest (for underground activities) in the summer of 1941, a wall was erected on one side of the ghetto.

Required in September 1941 to report on ghettos in Kreis Bilgoraj, Kreishauptmann Werner Ansel excluded Szczepieszyn from the list. Survivor Dworja Flajszer mentions a small number of Jews continued to live outside the ghetto mainly on Zielona Street and in a few buildings fronting the square by the church.⁴ These Jews included families of medical personnel (such as dentists Natan Bronsztein and his wife) and some of the 109 Jewish craftsmen permitted to operate 94 workshops to provide services to the non-Jewish population.⁵

From October 1940, several hundred Jews labored for the Luftwaffe at airfield construction sites in Klemensów and Mokre, earning 3 to 4 złoty a day. Determined to finish the projects, the Luftwaffe from May 1941 conscripted daily from the Szczepieszyn, Sułów, and Radechnica gminy some 4,000 Jews (and Christians) at Klemensów. During the summer, Szczepieszyn Jews were interned at a Water Regulation Authority (Wasserwirtschaftsinspektion) camp in Bortatycze.

Barracks were erected in the ghetto for the homeless. Poor sanitation contributed to typhus epidemics in October 1941 and January 1942. Permitted to leave the ghetto during the day, the Jews had relatively ready access to food.⁶ From October 1941, when Jews throughout the Generalgouvernement were subject to the death penalty for leaving their places of residence, villagers arrived to barter with the Jews.

Witting remembered the Jews permitting Poles wanted by German authorities to hide in ghetto bunkers. By the spring of 1942, Klukowski noted Poles cultivated relationships with Jews mainly for material gain. On March 25, he reported villagers came to Szczepieszyn to sell food specifically to Jews, because the restrictions on Jewish movement meant they would pay exorbitant prices. In April, the Jewish Social Self-Help (JSS) organization provided a daily meal to 340 impoverished at a community kitchen.⁷

Anti-Jewish violence intensified from late December 1941. By February 18, 1942, Jews had been killed for refusing to surrender furs, leaving town, not wearing armbands, and smuggling livestock into the ghetto. On April 8, paid informants (probably Polish railway men) confirmed rumors circulating from March 26 that Jews from Lublin and Izbica (nad Wieprzem) had been gassed at the Bełżec extermination facility.⁸

Shortly thereafter, a more formal ghetto was established on Targowa Street.⁹ It probably was created around April 12, 1942, the day Klukowski noted local antisemites descended on Szczepieszyn in anticipation of a deportation. When none materialized, they plundered abandoned Jewish residences.

On April 22, 1942, the Jewish Council organized an eight-member Jewish police force probably to meet increased labor camp conscription quotas. On April 24, just 63 of 350 conscripts reported for a Wasserwirtschaftsinspektion camp in Kulików. With the quota still unmet, the Gestapo on May 7 ordered 13 prominent Jews arrested. On May 8, Bronsztein, his father, and 5 other prisoners were shot dead fleeing a transport carrying them to Zwierzyniec for execution. That afternoon, the Gestapo gave the Jewish Council one hour to locate 100 Kulików conscripts. Before the deadline had passed, the Gestapo and Gendarmes began rounding up and shooting about 100 Jews. The next morning, 60 Kulików conscripts reported. The Gestapo required the Jews to pay 2,000 złoty and 3 kilograms (6.6 pounds) of coffee for the ammunition used in the massacre.¹⁰

On June 22, 1942, the Gestapo marched conscripts to a labor camp at the Klemensów airfield and then returned to arrest 53 additional Jews. On June 23, Gendarmes shot 20 to 26 of the oldest prisoners at a vacant lot on Frampol Street.¹¹

In early August 1942, the Jewish Council was required to submit a list of 2,000 people for deportation supposedly to Reichskommissariat Ukraine. From 1:00 A.M., on August 8, the Gestapo, Gendarmes, Sonderdienst (ethnic German and Ukrainian police), Polish (Blue) Police, and Jewish Police began arresting the Jews on the list and imprisoning them at the trading hall on the square. Most evaded arrest; German police shot 13 others. At 8:00 P.M., 280 deportees were marched to the train station, locked into wagons with 170 Jews from Zwierzyniec, and sent the next day to Bełżec.

To root out fugitives, the Gestapo prohibited Christians from harboring Jews or selling them food. As the police rounded up and shot Jewish fugitives, the Jews officially retained for labor soon hovered on starvation's brink.¹² On September 29, 1942, 400 Jews from the Radechnica gmina (mainly from Radechnica and Gorajec villages) were expelled to Szczepieszyn.

On October 21, 1942, from 6:00 A.M., SS, Ukrainian SS auxiliaries, Gendarmes, Sonderdienst, and Polish police began expelling Jews from the ghetto. Ordered to search for fugitives, Jewish Council member Hersz Gercel Hochbaum committed suicide. Some 500 Jews were killed during the Aktion. Mayor Andreas Kraus reported 934 Szczepieszyn Jews, imprisoned overnight at the Alwa (Waligóra) factory in Brody Małe, were sent (together with Zwierzyniec deportees) to Bełżec on October 22.¹³

Over the next two weeks, 1,000 Szczepieszyn Jews, all fugitives from the deportation, were hunted down by police and Polish civilian volunteers, such as Jan and Władysław Małysz. Most were shot at the cemetery by Gendarmes, including Gendarme Sering (Syring), and Polish auxiliary policemen, including (Stanisław) Hajduczak (Germanized, Haik) and Jan, Tadeusz, and Michał Gołębiowski.¹⁴ Gestapo assistant Stanisław Majewski (a Pole from Biłgoraj), Szczepieszyn Gendarmerie commander Freimeier (Frymer), and Polish police commander Marunowski oversaw the executions.¹⁵

Sering, sentenced to death by a postwar Polish court, was hanged in Zamość in 1945.¹⁶ The aforementioned Polish policemen (except Majewski) and civilians also were tried: the latter, for signing the German nationality list and taking actions, including murder, harmful to Polish citizens, the former, for extricating Jews from hiding places.

Released from Warsaw's Pawiak prison in the summer of 1942, Witting settled in Otwock. There, she and her husband sheltered Maria, Aleksandra, and Ryszard Spielrein. In 1987, Yad Vashem recognized the couple as Righteous Among the Nations.

SOURCES Secondary sources covering the history of the Szczebrzeszyn Jewish community during the Holocaust include the relevant entry in Abraham Wein, Bracha Freundlich, and Wila Orbach, eds., Pinkas ha-kehillot. Encyclopaedia of Jewish Communities: Poland, vol. 7, Lublin and Kielce (Jerusalem: Yad Vashem, 1999), pp. 577–580, available in an English translation by Morris Gradel at jewishgen.org.

The yizkor book, Dov Shuval, ed., Sefer zikaron li-kehillat Shebreshin (Haifa: Irgun yots'e Shebreshin be-Yisrael uva-tefutsot, 1984), available in an English translation by Jacob Salomon Berger as The Szczebrzeszyn Memorial Book (Mahwah, NJ: Jacob Salomon Berger, 2005), contains testimonies from survivors. Correspondence between Fryd and Ester Fiszel, from Szczebrzeszyn, and Moszek Wulf, in the Warsaw ghetto, found after the war in the Ringelblum Archive, now at AŻIH, Ring, I/545, appears in a Polish translation in Ruta Sakowska, ed., Archiwum Ringelbluma, vol. 1, Listy o zagładzie (Warsaw: ŻIH and PWN, 1997), pp. 89–96.

The diary of Zygmunt Klukowski has appeared in various forms, with the passages pertaining to Jews extracted and first published in Yiddish translation in Bleter Far Geschichte 45:4 (1951) and subsequently in the yizkor book. A Polish-language equivalent, “Niedola i zagłada Żydów ze Szczebrzeszyna (Kartki z pamiętnika z okresu okupacji),” BŻIH, nos. 19–20 (1956): 207–241, preceded the publication of the full chronicle, Dziennik z lat okupacji zamojszczyzny 1939–1944 (Lublin: Lubelska Spółdzielnia Wydawnicza, 1958), which also has appeared under the title Zamojszczyzna, 2 vols. (Warsaw: Karta, 2007). The diary is available in English as Diary from the Years of Occupation 1939–44, trans. George Klukowski (Urbana: University of Illinois Press, 1993), but the translation at times is uneven.

Of the Lublin-area Jewish communities mentioned in the entry but not covered elsewhere in this volume, little is known about the specific World War II experiences of Jews from the villages of Radechnica and Gorajec. Klukowski provides the most information for Gorajec, and when seen from the larger local context, it may suggest a ghetto existed there. In a June 3, 1941, diary entry, he notes the SS unleashed a pogrom on the Christian feast of Pentecost (Whitsun), during which 3 Jews were killed. On December 31, 1941, he mentions Jews were expelled from their homes, which were turned over to (Christian) deportees, presumably to some of the at least 2,240 Warthegau expellees resettled in the Szczebrzeszyn area. Though a pogrom that same day in Zwierzyniec and evictions in Szczebrzeszyn, probably at around the same time, gave rise to ghettos in both localities, Klukowski does not say whether almost identical actions culminated in the creation of a ghetto in Gorajec. He does report on January 27, 1942, that the Gorajec Jews were forbidden to move 10 meters (33 feet) beyond their residences, a point worth noting because the movement restrictions were the stiffest known to have been imposed on any Jewish community in Distrikt Lublin. Survivor Hayim Gorkah, born in Gorajec, does not mention a ghetto existing there in his testimony at VHF, # 33370.

Documents pertaining to the Szczebrzeszyn, Gorajec, and Radechnica Jewish communities can be found in the following archives: APL; AŻIH (e.g., 210/672, 211 [e.g., 219, pp. 7, 10, 18; 220, pp. 1, 58, 76–77, 81; 221, pp. 20, 32, 47, 58, 64; 222, pp. 1, 11, 20, 37–38, 44, 53–54; 224, pp. 1, 28–30, 54, 55; 1000, pp. 1–4], 301/5503, Ring I/545); IPN (e.g., ASG, SAL 121–124, SOZ [6, 50]); IPN-Lu (e.g., 142/68); USHMM (e.g., Acc.1997.A.0124 [AŻIH 211]; Acc.1999.A.0154 [AŻIH 210]; RG-15.019M [IPN ASG], reel # 6 [19/1331–1332]; RG-15.079M [AŻIH Ring]); VHF (e.g., # 32877, 33370, 48035, 48383); and YVA (e.g., O-3 [3082, 3052]).

Laura Crago

NOTES

1. USHMM, Acc.1999.A.0154 (AŻIH), 210/672, pp. 1–12, 12–18, 24, 27, 41, 61.
2. Ibid., p. 40.
3. VHF, # 32877, testimony of Halina Witting.
4. Dworja Flajszer, “Szczebrzeszyn,” in Szczebrzeszyn, p. 151.
5. USHMM, Acc.1997.A.0124 (AŻIH), 211/222, p. 44.
6. Ibid., 211/221, p. 47.
7. Ibid., 211/224, p. 28.
8. Klukowski, Dziennik, pp. 238, 243, 248, 251–256.
9. AŻIH, 301/5503, testimony of Zofia Skoczek, p. 2.
10. Klukowski, Dziennik, pp. 257, 259–260; Itchek Shtemmer, “Between Life and Death,” in Szczebrzeszyn, p. 91.
11. Klukowski, Dziennik, pp. 270–271; Flajszer, “Szczebrzeszyn,” p. 153.
12. Klukowski, Dziennik, pp. 277–279, 285–288; Flajszer, “Observations on Klukowski,” in Szczebrzeszyn, pp. 147–148.
13. Klukowski, Dziennik, p. 294.
14. IPN, SOZ 59.
15. IPN, SAL 121–124; AŻIH, 301/5503, p. 3.
16. Klukowski, Dziennik, pp. 292–293.

TARNOGRÓD

Pre-1939: Tarnogród, town, Biłgoraj powiat, Lublin województwo, Poland; 1939–1944: Tarnograd, Kreis Bilgoraj, Distrikt Lublin, Generalgouvernement; post-1998: Tarnogród, Biłgoraj powiat, Lublin województwo, Poland

Tarnogród lies 105 kilometers (65 miles) south of Lublin. In August 1939, its 5,016 residents included 2,515 Jews.

Upon occupying Tarnogród on September 15, 1939, a Wehrmacht unit set the local administration (gmina) building on fire, blamed the Jews for recent combat losses, and threw 16 Jewish hostages into the blaze. Some 35 Jewish-owned structures were incinerated.¹ About 10 days later, the Germans ceded Tarnogród to advancing Soviet forces. After September 28 German-Soviet border negotiations returned the settlement to German occupation, approximately 400 Jews joined the Red Army on October 5 in evacuating behind the Bug River. Shortly thereafter, the Germans reoccupied Tarnogród.

The Germans appointed a local collaborationist administration. Polish and Ukrainian police forces were recruited. From April 1941 to mid-October 1943, a German detachment of Gendarmerie was stationed in Tarnogród. Lieutenant Michael (Karl) Gerhard was the post commander. The jurisdiction of the Gendarmes extended approximately 20 kilometers (12.5 miles) beyond Tarnogród.

Postcard from the Obmann of the Tarnogród Judenrat, E. Nissenbaum, to Dr. Karol Fein, Litzmannstadt, October 20, 1942. The note reads: "The Polatschek family lives here in Tarnogród, Biłgoraj District, and is healthy."

COURTESY OF EDWARDVICTOR.COM

On November 23, 1939, the Jews were required to wear armbands with a Star of David. In late December, a Jewish Council (Judenrat) was established. Hersz Blutman became its chair.

In December 1939, 371 expellees arrived from Łódź and Kalisz. In April 1940, just 166 of these expellees remained. By the summer of 1941, additional December 1939 expellees, from Włocławek and Kalisz, brought the total number of Warthegau deportees to 250. Local Jews displaced by war devastation arrived, including by April 1940 some 327 burned out of residences in Biłgoraj, 99 in Frampol, and 61 in Janów Lubelski. In June 1941, the local Jewish Social Self-Help (JSS) organization reported 2,730 Jews were living in Tarnogród.²

In the winter of 1940–1941, the Jews, including children, were ordered to clear snow from roads. From the early spring of 1941, Jewish men repaved the road from Tarnogród to Różaniec. Gravestones (matzevot) from the cemetery were used for the project. In August, 98 Jews were interned at a labor camp, probably at the Luftwaffe camp near Biłgoraj, some 21 kilometers (13 miles) away. Others worked in agricultural and forestry labor on a nearby estate under Forestry Service administration.³ Many children worked as farm help for local Poles and Ukrainians. That fall, Wehrmacht troops mobilized Jews to bring in the harvest and to gather hay. Because the settlement had sustained relatively little war devastation, the initial 300-gram (10.6-ounce) daily bread ration was three times greater than elsewhere, and agricultural labor provided access to additional food, Boruch (Bronisław) Fabrykant, the head of the JSS in Kreis Biłgoraj, named Tarnogród in July 1941 the second-most livable place for Jews in the Kreis.⁴

In September 1941, Werner Ansel, the Biłgoraj Kreishauptmann, excluded Tarnogród from a list of ghettos he submitted to authorities in Lublin. In October 1941, Hans Frank imposed the death penalty on Jews throughout the Generalgou-vernement found without permission outside their designated places of residence.

On October 16, 1941, young shepherds, both Christians and Jews, accidentally ignited a large stockpile of hay. The Gestapo blamed the fire on 12 Jewish shepherds, ordered the Jews to pay a 40,000-złoty fine, and seized 15 adult hostages, including several Jewish Council members. On October 18, the community surrendered the sum, but the Gestapo never released the hostages.⁵ The Germans replaced the entire Jewish Council. Syna Gruer succeeded Blutman as chairman. By October 1942, E. Nissenbaum had succeeded Gruer.

After a late June 1941 typhus epidemic, German authorities ordered a medical clinic established. They appointed Dr. R. Polatschek, a Viennese physician expelled in March 1941 to Modliborzyce, its director. In October, during another epidemic, Polatschek, by then also a Jewish Council member, organized a 5-person sanitation force to help contain the disease.⁶ In late December, the JSS established a community kitchen to serve the impoverished. When 600 people qualified for the program, the JSS limited the daily meal to 250 elderly and children.⁷

On March 22, 1942, Kreishauptmann Ansel ordered the 57 most impoverished Jewish families (221 people) in Biłgoraj evicted to Tarnogród. Security Police, a Sonderdienst (ethnic German police) unit, and members of the Biłgoraj Jewish sanitation force oversaw the expulsion. The Biłgoraj JSS provisioned the deportees and paid for Poles to transport them on carts. Though the JSS provided an additional 1,000 złoty in assistance, 4 expellees had perished by April 5 from diseases related to starvation.⁸

Some sources report the Tarnogród ghetto was established in May. JSS leaders in Biłgoraj, in reports about the expellees, never mentioned its existence. Documentation from other parts of southern Kreis Biłgoraj, specifically from Krzeszów, indicates that Jews, still needed for agricultural labor, continued to live outside of ghettos. However, by April 1942, restrictions on nonworking Jews leaving Tarnogród, additional fines, the absence of paid winter work, and the arrival of the Biłgoraj deportees had transformed the Jewish community into the most impoverished in the Kreis.⁹

In May or June 1942, at 1:00 A.M., members of the provincial Gestapo office in Biłgoraj arrived to order Lieutenant Gerhard and his men to help pull male Jews from their homes. At 5:00 A.M., the Security Police and the Gendarmes shot 40 to 49 of the captives in pits at the Roman Catholic cemetery.¹⁰

In early August 1942, the Judenrat was ordered to prepare two lists: the first of 1,500 Jews, supposedly for deportation to a labor camp in Reichskommissariat Ukraine, the second, of those exempted from expulsion, including craftsmen, Jewish Council members, and those with certificates of employment. On August 9, members of the first and second platoon of the 3rd Company of Reserve Police Battalion 67 expelled the Jews on the deportation list. The expellees were transported to Biłgoraj on peasant carts. From there, they were joined to a large group of Biłgoraj Jews and taken to the railway station in Zwierzyniec. Forced onto cattle wagons, the Jews were sent to be gassed at the Bełżec extermination camp.¹¹

In Tarnogród, a ghetto was created to contain the approximately 1,000 Jews retained for labor and to consolidate the Jews living in as many as 50 different villages under the jurisdiction of the Gendarmerie post. The existing documentation does not indicate precisely where the Jews lived. It notes only that from September 1942 Jews were ordered to the ghetto from the following gminy: Wola Różaniecka, Księżpol, Łukowa, Babice (including Obsza, Olchowiec, and Zamch villages), Potok (Górny), and Biszczka.¹² (Though some of the gminy no longer exist, each was named for a village within it.) The 50 Jewish families living in 7 different villages in the pre-war Kuryłówka gmina probably also were ordered to the ghetto.¹³ Whether Jews from the Dzików Stary gmina were consolidated in the ghetto is unknown. Some 500 to 800 Jews were covered by the expulsion order, bringing the total ghetto population to around 1,800.

The ghetto consisted of the area surrounding the main market square between Luchów, Różaniec, and Rynek Streets. The ghetto was not fenced, but the movement of Jews was restricted to the square.¹⁴

The Jews experienced overcrowding, poor sanitary conditions, food shortages, and a high death rate. Gendarmes Wittmark and Franz Hilsche particularly were noted for terrorizing the ghetto residents. Wittmark reportedly boasted of daily killing a Jew to work up an appetite for breakfast.¹⁵

On November 2, 1942, Gendarmes, SS stationed in Biłgoraj, and members of the 3rd Company of Reserve Police Battalion 67 arrived before 7:30 A.M. to liquidate the ghetto. The expulsion turned bloody after a Jew, pulled from hiding, attacked a German. Hundreds of corpses piled up on the streets and in the fields.¹⁶ Members of Reserve Police Battalion 67 and Gendarmes, including allegedly Reinhold Witt, shot another 300 Jews on the march to Biłgoraj. The victims were among 500 to 1,000 Jews believed killed during the ghetto liquidation.¹⁷ On November 3, the surviving Jews were marched from Biłgoraj to the railway station in Zwierzyniec and sent from there to be gassed at the Bełżec extermination facility.

Some local Christians, including the Hałas family, sheltered a handful of fugitives from the deportation. Others helped Jews procure false identity papers and to volunteer as Poles for forced labor in the Reich.¹⁸ A few fugitives subsequently joined the partisans.

At a postwar trial in Hannover, Witt was found not guilty of participating in the November 1942 deportation of 1,000 Tarnogród Jews to Bełżec. The legal proceedings of Gerhard were suspended. Little is known about the case against the commander of the Potok (Górny) Polish auxiliary police force, investigated and tried in Zamość for crimes related to the liquidation of the larger Tarnogród Jewish community.¹⁹

SOURCES Secondary sources providing coverage of the destruction of the Jewish community of Tarnogród during World War II include the relevant entry in Abraham Wein, Bracha Freundlich, and Wila Orbach, eds., Pinkas ha-kehillot.

Encyclopaedia of Jewish Communities: Poland, vol. 7, Lublin and Kielce (Jerusalem: Yad Vashem, 1999), pp. 250–253.

Published memoirs from survivors include Mala Kacenberg, Alone in the Forest (New York: C.I.S. Publishers, 1995); and Joseph Schorer and Sheldon Schorer, A Dream Fulfilled: Return to Tarnograd (Israel: Joseph Schorer, 1989), originally published in Hebrew, which contains several valuable eyewitness accounts, most notably the transcript of the taped interview with the local Polish Christian Józef Szunert. Additional accounts by survivors presumably can be found in the yizkor book edited by Shimon Kanc, available in Hebrew as Sefer Tarnograd: Le-zikbron ha-kehillah ha-Yehudit she-nebrevah (Tel Aviv: Irgun yots'e Tarnograd yeha-sevivah be-Yisrael, be-Artsot ha-berit uve-Angliyah, 1965) and in Yiddish as Yizker-bukh: Nokh der borev-gevorener yidishe kehillah Tarnograd (Tel Aviv: Tarnogroder Landslayt in Yisrael, 1966), neither of which is available online at the Dorot Division, New York Public Library, or in the USHMM collections.

Published contemporary documentation includes an April 1942 German memorandum about the expulsion (the previous month) of the Biłgoraj impoverished to Tarnogród, in Tatiana Berenstein et al., eds., Faschismus, Getto, Massenmord: Dokumentation über Ausrottung und Widerstand der Juden in Polen während des zweiten Weltkrieges (Berlin: Rütten & Loening, 1961), p. 271; and Tatiana Berenstein, “Tarnogród,” Gazeta Żydowska, February 6, 1942, no. 16, p. 2.

The verdicts of the West German trials of Michael Gerhard and Reinhold Witt can be found in Justiz und NS-Verbrechen, vol. 42 (Amsterdam: Amsterdam University Press, 2010), respectively, Lfd. Nr. 844 and Lfd. Nr. 845.

Additional documentation can be found in the following archives: APL; AŻIH (e.g., 211 [219, pp. 7, 9, 14, 18; 221, pp. 12, 47, 64; 222, pp. 7–8, 11, 19, 27, 29; 223, p. 44; 224, pp. 7, 11–12, 15, 22–23, 28, 30, 40, 49, 55, 57], 301 [5542, 5504]); BA-L (e.g., B 162/14192); IPN (e.g., ASG, SOZ 99); IPN-Lu (e.g., 4/71/Bi/1-2); USHMM (e.g., Acc.2005.121.1; Acc.1997.A.0124 [AŻIH 211]; Acc.1999.A.0154 [AŻIH 210]; RG-15.019M [IPN ASG] [reel 5, 12/81-83, 85, 145, 157]); VHF (e.g., # 5987, 10269, 24479, 29403, 47568, 50876); and YVA (e.g., O-16 /4616, 5504).

Of the Distrikt Lublin Jewish communities mentioned in the entry but not covered elsewhere in this volume, the evidence is insufficient to determine whether similar remnant/collection ghettos were established in either Frampol or Krzeszów. Frampol was almost entirely obliterated by Luftwaffe bombardment on September 13, 1939. Because only one Jewish-owned house was left standing, its approximately 538 Jews were dispersed across the gmina, with fewer than 100 renting rooms from Roman Catholics (presumably Poles) in Frampol and the remaining Jews living similarly in seven other villages in the gmina. See, among others, USHMM, Acc.1999.A.0154 (AŻIH), 210/331, pp. 17–18, and Acc.1997.A.0124 (AŻIH), 211/220, p. 60; 211/221, p. 47. It is unknown whether a collection ghetto, similar to the Tarnogród ghetto, was established for the Jews in and around Frampol on the eve of their expulsion on November 2, 1942, to the Bełżec extermination camp.

In Krzeszów, a community numbering 434 Jews in July 1942 (and not subject to an earlier expulsion), JSS officials reported that the consolidation orders were issued shortly before September 25, 1942, and that by then some 208 Jews had arrived from nearby localities. The authors of the report did not mention whether a ghetto was established. Here, see AŻIH, 211/625, p. 43. Jewish survivors, almost all fugitives from the earlier liquidation of other communities, also did not subsequently recall either consolidations or a ghetto in Krzeszów. See, for example, VHF, # 50640, testimony of Meyer Zinn.

Laura Crago

NOTES

1. AŻIH, 301/5504, testimony of Franciszek Hulaś and Leon Rak, p. 1.
2. USHMM, Acc.1999.A.0154, 210/684, pp. 33–36, 40, 55, 92.
3. Ibid., Acc.1997.A.0124, 211/1016, p. 3; 211/224, p. 30.
4. Ibid., 211/221, p. 47.
5. Ibid., 211/222, pp. 7–8, 19, 27; Acc.1999.A.0154, 210/684, p. 59.
6. Ibid., Acc.1997.A.0124, 211/221, p. 12; 211/222, pp. 11, 29.
7. “Tarnogród,” Gazeta Żydowska, February 6, 1942, no. 16, p. 2.
8. USHMM, Acc.1997.A.0124, 211/224, pp. 11–12, 15, 30.
9. Ibid., 211/224, p. 29; JuNS-V, vol. 42, Lfd. Nr. 845, p. 474, argues that the Jews of Tarnogród were forced to move together into an open Jewish quarter (Judenwohnviertel) at some time between September 1940 and the summer of 1942.
10. BA-L, B 162/14192, pp. 53–56, 58, 60; AŻIH, 301/5504, p. 3.
11. BA-L, B 162/14192, pp. 16, 39–40.
12. AŻIH, 301/5504, p. 2.
13. USHMM, Acc.1997.A.0124, 211/220, pp. 3–4.
14. AŻIH, 301/5504, p. 2.
15. Ibid.
16. Ibid., pp. 3–4; Józef Szunert deposition, in Schorer and Schorer, A Dream, pp. 242–248.
17. USHMM, RG-15.019M (IPN), 12/145, 147; AŻIH, 301/5504, pp. 4–5.
18. AŻIH, 301/5504, pp. 5–6.
19. IPN, SOZ 99, pp. 1–395.

TOMASZÓW LUBELSKI

Pre-1939: Tomaszów Lubelski (Yiddish: Tomashov Lubelsk), town, Tomaszów Lubelski powiat, Lublin województwo, Poland; 1939–1944: Tomaszow, Kreis Zamosc, Distrikt Lublin, General-gouvernement; post-1998: Tomaszów Lubelski, Lublin województwo, Poland

Tomaszów Lubelski is located 123 kilometers (76 miles) south-east of Lublin. In 1931, its 10,403 inhabitants included 5,669 Jews. By August 1939, 6,000 to 7,000 Jews were residing in Tomaszów, then a town of around 13,000.

On September 7 and 9, 1939, more than 200 Jews perished in fires from a Luftwaffe bombardment. A Wehrmacht unit occupied Tomaszów on September 13. The soldiers incinerated another part of the town to drive out Polish soldiers hiding there. Some 500 Jewish-owned residences were destroyed. The German military commander ordered a large group of Jewish men rounded up. He held them responsible for German combat casualties; some were killed immediately and others were marched (together with as many as 20,000 Polish combatants) to a prisoner-of-war (POW) camp near Sieniawa.¹

In Tomaszów, German soldiers subjected the Jews to humiliations before ceding the town on September 25 to advancing Soviet forces. After the September 28 German-Soviet border renegotiation returned Tomaszów to German occupation, the war devastation and earlier German violence prompted 4,000 to 5,000 Jews to join the Red Army's October 8 evacuation to Rawa Ruska. Others moved to less devastated German-occupied localities, including Komarów and Zamość, and to many smaller places, such as Majdan Górny, Rachanie, Woźuczyn, Michałów, and Jarczów.

On reoccupying Tomaszów, the Germans ordered the Jews to wear armbands with the Star of David. By early 1940, civilian authorities had appointed a Jewish Council (Judenrat), chaired by Szyja Fiszelson. A Jewish police force was never established. In October 1940, the Jewish Social Self-Help (JSS) organization estimated that 1,000 to 2,000 Jews were residing in Tomaszów.²

In 1940, the Germans destroyed the fire-devastated synagogue, imposed the first of several contributions, and expropriated Jewish-owned businesses. Jews were conscripted for forced labor, including clearing war damage, building border fortifications, and improving the road to Bełżec, located 8.1 kilometers (5 miles) south-southeast of Tomaszów. Survivor Chana Wajsleder-Szpicrajzen reports that the conscripts used matzevot (gravestones) from the cemetery for the last project. A number of Jews were employed by the municipal administration. Some tailors and shoemakers worked for the Gestapo, which opened a branch office in Tomaszów. The Jewish Council assigned foster parents for the youngest orphaned by war devastation. Older orphans, aged 12 to 14, lived together in several vacated residences.³

As thousands of Jews from Distrikt Lublin, Radom, and Warsaw were sent in the spring and summer of 1940 to the Bełżec forced labor camp to build the Eastern Rampart of the Otto Line, the Germans required the Tomaszów Jewish Council to care for inmates sick with infectious diseases. The council picked up some 20 to 30 prisoners daily in a horse-drawn wagon. The majority died. The council buried them at the Jewish cemetery.

The October 1940 population count occurred as the surviving Bełżec inmates were returning home, via the Tomaszów railway station. It therefore notes 9,306 Jews present in the town. Some former Bełżec inmates, mainly from Warsaw, remained in Tomaszów. However, by March 1941, no more than 215 Jewish refugees resided there. Some refugees, moreover, were Warthegau deportees from Włocławek, Łódź, and Koło transported to Zamość and Izbica (nad Wieprzem) in December 1939. In February 1941, Fiszelson reported 1,400 Jews residing in Tomaszów.⁴ The 100 to 200 remaining newcomers probably were returnees from the Soviet-occupied territories.

On a certain Saturday, probably in the early spring of 1941, several different German police units arrived to arrest the Jewish (and Christian) mentally and physically handicapped. After imprisoning the Jewish arrestees in a basement, the Germans rounded up 10 Jews and ordered them to flood the cellar until the victims drowned.⁵

In September 1941, Helmuth Weißenmaier, the Zamosc Kreishauptmann, excluded Tomaszów from a list of ghettos he was required to submit to Distrikt-level authorities. In November, Hans Frank imposed the death penalty on Jews in the Generalgouvernement found without permission outside the borders of their designated places of registration. Wajsleder-Szpicażen notes that at the time of Frank's orders a ghetto had yet to be established in Tomaszów. The survivor further indicates that no ghetto existed through mid-May 1942, the month Matuszkiewicz, a notorious Gestapo informant, began proceedings to expropriate her home. Matuszkiewicz's murder stopped the expropriation. After a Polish neighbor informed police that Wajsleder-Szpicażen had pleaded with Matuszkiewicz on the day he was killed not to evict her family, she was imprisoned on suspicion of murder.⁶

On February 25, 1942, in preparation for the first large-scale gassings of Jews at the Bełżec killing center, 700 to 817 Tomaszów Jews were evacuated to Cieszanów.⁷ Officially, all Jews older than 32 and their dependent family members were removed from Tomaszów. The transfer probably aimed to reduce the Jewish population along the main railway line into Bełżec. The Gestapo frequently searched for fugitives from the Cieszanów deportation. Unregistered Jews found during the searches were shot.⁸

The Jews in Tomaszów realized immediately that the Germans were killing Jews at Bełżec.⁹ Mieczysław (Mendel) Garfinkel, the Zamość Jewish Council chair, recalled that in March 1942 Jewish officials in Tomaszów (and several other nearby places) had informed him that the Germans murdered the 10,000 to 20,000 Jews daily arriving at Bełżec, including 18,000 Lublin deportees sent there between March 17 and 28.¹⁰

In May 1942, Fiszelson was executed by the Gestapo for refusing to submit a list of prospective Tomaszów deportees. Aba Bergenbaum became the Jewish Council chair. On May 22, Gestapo from branch offices in Tomaszów and Zamość ordered the Jews assembled on the square. As local Polish auxiliary policemen guarded the Jews, the Germans killed the lame, sick, and elderly. Some 200 young men and women were retained for labor. The remaining Jews were loaded onto trucks, transported to Bełżec, and gassed on arrival.

The Jews retained for labor in Tomaszów were ordered to reside in an unfenced, open ghetto. The ghetto included Piekarska Street and probably the part of neighboring Lwów Street, which paralleled Piekarska and ran north around the square where it became Zamość Street, some of which also was within the ghetto's boundaries.

Some ghetto inhabitants worked for the Gestapo or for the Gendarmerie. Others left the ghetto to labor and live on the largest farms and estates of German colonists, including in Werachanie. In Tomaszów, conscripts cleared the houses of the recently deported, bringing furniture, clothing, and bedding to a large, fenced square. Peasants were forbidden to enter the ghetto to offer food for barter.¹¹

In mid-August 1942, the Polish auxiliary police transferred to Tomaszów the permanent Jewish residents of Bełżec, not imprisoned at the camp. The deportees were held at the Tomaszów prison. According to Janusz Peter, a Polish-Christian resident of Bełżec and director of the Tomaszów hospital, a few dozen of the Bełżec prisoners escaped from jail.¹² In late September, in anticipation of an impending expulsion, the Gestapo promised to stop killing unregistered Jews, ordered all fugitives to report to the ghetto, and designated for the new arrivals six vacant houses on Piekarska Street.¹³

On October 27, 1942, Gendarmes and the Polish auxiliary police liquidated the Tomaszów ghetto. Some 100 Jews were shot either for fleeing or for evading the roundup.¹⁴ Walter Panzer, the Tomaszów Landrat, personally pursued Bergenbaum, hidden in the basement of the magistrate's office, and shot him.¹⁵ The agricultural laborers were executed in Werachanie that same day.¹⁶ The Jews on the square were transported to the Bełżec killing center. The Bełżec Jews incarcerated at the Tomaszów prison also were transferred to the extermination camp.¹⁷ The Jews were gassed on arrival.

Most fugitives were killed in the months following the ghetto's liquidation, some by local residents. The victims included Shava Kempinsky-Krieger's husband and three children killed by "six gentile hooligans."¹⁸ Sholom Licht's yizkor book summary mentions the deaths, at Polish hands, of partisans Szymon Goldsztajn and Meir Kalachmacher (Korenwerfel). Provided false identity papers by Bazyli Chmielewski and sent to live with an acquaintance in Skarżysko-Kamienna, Klara Post worked as a Polish laborer at the Hugo Schneider AG (HASAG) factory to supply partisans with the ammunition manufactured there.

Chmielewski assisted another 11 Jews in Rawa Ruska and Tomaszów, including Dawid, Abram, and Abisz Post. Elżbieta Ważna, incarcerated for illegal butchering, befriended Wajsleder-Szpicażen in prison, abetted her escape, and provided her shelter. The Czechoński family hid seven-year-old Szlomo Gorzyczański, a Łódź deportee, whose father had been born in Tomaszów. Three Eizensztejn family members lived outside the ghetto on false identity papers. One, an engineer, was killed shortly after Tomaszów's liberation on July 21, 1944.¹⁹

Fewer than 15 Tomaszów ghetto residents survived the war.

SOURCES Secondary works covering the World War II history of the Tomaszów Lubelski Jewish community include Abraham Wein, Bracha Freundlich, and Wila Orbach, eds., Pinkas ha-kehillot. Encyclopaedia of Jewish Communities: Poland, vol. 7, Lublin and Kielce (Jerusalem: Yad Vashem, 1999), pp. 237–241, with an English translation available at jewishgen.org; and the accounts, available in English translation, on the Tomaszów Lubelski homepage at the Wirtualny Sztetl, a Web site sponsored by Muzeum Historii Żydów Polskich.

Testimonies from survivors, including from a number who survived in and around Rawa Ruska, can be found in the yizkor book Tomashover Lub[elsk] yizker bukh (Brooklyn, NY: Tomashover Relief Committee, 1965), which has been translated into Hebrew and English, with the latter prepared and published by Jacob Solomon Berger as The Tomaszów-Lubelski Memorial Book (Mahwah, NJ, 2008). Testimonies from Bazyli Chmielewski and Szlomo Gorzyczański are available in Polish and English translation at Światło w ciemności. Sprawiedliwi Wśród Narodów Świata, a Web site sponsored by Ośrodek Brama Grodzka—Teatr NN in Lublin.

Additional primary documentation is located in the following archives: APL; AŻIH (e.g., 210/689; 211 [141, pp. 86–87, 95; 142, pp. 1–3, 12–13, 26, 45; 1143, pp. 2–4; 1147, pp. 6, 8, 10–11; 1148, pp. 6–7, 38, 46, 50; 1149, pp. 27–28; 1150, pp. 11, 36; 1151, pp. 34, 65, 68; 1152, pp. 8, 14–15, 20]; IPN (e.g., ASG); IPN-Lu (e.g., 36/67/1–2, 275/67/1–2); VHF; USHMM (e.g., Acc.1997.A.0124 [AŻIH 211]; Acc.1999.A.0154 [AŻIH 210]; RG-15.019M [IPN ASG] [reel 6, 18/1165–1168]; RG-15.084M [Relacje]; RG-50.488*0015); and YVA (e.g., O-3/2098, 2969).

Laura Crago

NOTES

1. Tomaszów-Lubelski, pp. 362–371 (Asher Herbstman testimony).
2. USHMM, Acc.1997.A.0124 (AŻIH, JSS), 211/1147, p. 8.
3. AŻIH, 301/4139, testimony of Chana Wajsleder-Szpicrajzen, p. 1.
4. USHMM, Acc.1997.A.0124, 211/1150, p. 11; Acc.1999.A.0154 (AŻIH, AJDC), 210/689, pp. 1, 5.
5. Tomaszów-Lubelski, p. 375 (Shmuel Ehrlich testimony).
6. AŻIH, 301/4139, p. 5.
7. USHMM, Acc.1997.A.0124, 211/1152, p. 20; 211/141, pp. 86–87; 211/142, pp. 1–3, 12–13, 26, 45; 211/143, pp. 2–4.
8. Tomaszów-Lubelski, pp. 376–380 (Sheva Kempinsky [Kempińska]-Krieger testimony).
9. AŻIH, 301/4139, p. 3.
10. Ibid., 302/122, testimony of Mieczysław Garfinkiel, pp. 34–35.
11. Ibid., 301/4139, pp. 2–3.
12. Ibid., 302/221, testimony of Janusz Peter, p. 33.
13. Tomaszów-Lubelski, p. 377.
14. USHMM, RG-15.019M (IPN), 18/1167–1168.
15. Tomaszów-Lubelski, pp. 450–451 (Maria Kopiecka deposition).
16. AŻIH, 301/4139, p. 5.
17. Ibid., 302/221, p. 33.
18. Tomaszów-Lubelski, p. 378.
19. AŻIH, 302/221, p. 33; 301/4149, p. 3.

TYSZOWCE

Pre-1939: Tyszowce (Yiddish: Tishivits), town, Tomaszów Lubelski powiat, Lublin województwo, Poland; 1939–1944: Kreis Zamosc, Distrikt Lublin, Generalgouvernement; post-1998: Tomaszów Lubelski powiat, Lublin województwo, Poland

Tyszowce is located 125 kilometers (78 miles) southeast of Lublin. In 1939, its 7,548 inhabitants included 3,311 Jews.

Luftwaffe bombardment on September 12–13, 1939, sparked fires that destroyed about 60 percent of Tyszowce. The Germans occupied the town on September 17 but eight days later ceded it to Soviet forces. The extensive fire damage and Tyszowce's anticipated return to German occupation, the result of the September 28 German-Soviet border renegotiation, prompted some 2,000 Jews to join the Red Army's October 8 evacuation behind the Bug River.

Upon reoccupying Tyszowce days later, the Germans appointed a Polish collaborationist administration, initially headed by Józef Zarębski, the pre-war wójt (mayor). A Polish auxiliary police force also was appointed. Little is known of its activities. A Gendarmerie post was established. Ernst Schulz, assigned there shortly before Christmas 1940, was named the post's commander in June 1941. Between 1942 and 1943, Robert Golka also was assigned to the post.¹

By February 1940, Zarębski had appointed Zylo (Zelig) Cukier head of a Jewish Council. Cukier also led the Tyszowce branch of the Jewish Social Self-Help (JSS) organization.² A Jewish police force was recruited. It was commanded by Meier Szek, a restaurateur and co-owner (with a local Polish-Christian) of the pre-war cinema.

Jews burned out of their homes were permitted to rent rooms from local Poles. (Whether they could rent from the town's numerous ethnic Ukrainians is unknown.) Survivor Berko Finger (Berisz or Tsvi Fingier) complained that the Poles charged inflated rents. However, he and others acknowledge Zarębski ameliorated some of the German authorities' anti-Jewish decrees, for example, by refusing to ban the Jewish community from access to cheaper food rations and municipal funding. They believe these efforts were why Zarębski and Józef Piprowski, the gmina secretary, were sent to the Dachau concentration camp in May 1940.³

In the spring of 1940, hundreds of Tyszowce Jews joined the thousands of Jews from throughout the Generalgouvernement interned at the Bełżec forced labor camp and its 10 or more subcamps to build the Eastern Rampart of the so-called Otto Line, the 140-kilometer-long (87-mile-long) trench the Germans ordered constructed between the Bug and San Rivers. The Tyszowce Jews were interned at the subcamp located closest to Lubycza Królewska (at that time in Soviet-occupied territory). Another 120 Tyszowce Jews were imprisoned at a labor camp established in Zamość for water melioration work.⁴ Others were interned at a second water drainage camp, established in the spring of 1940 in Mikulin, which from late June 1941 became a camp for Soviet prisoners of war (POWs).⁵ A smaller number of Jews left Tyszowce to live and labor on an estate in Miętkie, the wartime property of a German named Reimack.⁶

In the spring of 1940, German authorities ordered the Jewish Council in Lublin to finance a forced labor camp in Tyszowce. The camp was located at a large burned-out mill on the outskirts of southeast Tyszowce, opposite the school on Kościelna Street. Its initial 600 inmates, mainly from Lublin, Otwock, and Warsaw, worked on road construction and drainage projects designed to regulate the Huczwa River.⁷ After the prisoners were returned home in the fall of 1940, the Tyszowce inmates in Zamość were transferred to the camp. The camp closed in the fall of 1941.⁸

As some former camp inmates opted to remain and many voluntary refugees escaping ghettoization in Warsaw arrived, the Jewish population increased. By November 1940, more than 2,000 Jews resided in Tyszowce.⁹

In 1941, Cukier informed American Jewish Joint Distribution Committee (AJDC) officials that the Jewish Council the previous year had devoted half its 19,000 złoty in financial resources to providing food, shoes, and other welfare assistance to local Jews interned at labor camps.¹⁰ Finger recalls the JSS organized a kitchen in Tyszowce to feed the most impoverished. Because Cukier and his associates sold the kitchen's flour allotments and retained the profits, the kitchen distributed only a watery soup made from a few cabbage leaves.¹¹ Unfortunately, no JSS files have survived for Tyszowce, making it impossible to confirm or deny Finger's claims.

At midnight on May 22 or 24, 1942, German Gendarmes, led by Schulz, informed the Jewish Council that the Jews were to be expelled that day. Security Police and SS Ukrainian auxiliaries soon arrived to oversee the Aktion. They may have brought from Komarów a Jewish police unit, composed of Czech Jews.¹² Some 800 to 1,000 Tyszowce Jews were transported by peasant cart to a railway loading dock in Zamość, from where they were sent by train to the Sobibór extermination camp. Another 200 Jews, considered too old or feeble to make the trip or who refused to comply with orders to assemble on the square, were shot on the spot. Included among the victims were all the members of the Jewish Council.¹³ Several hundred Jews evaded expulsion. Another 500 were retained for labor in Tyszowce.

A remnant ghetto was established for the Jews held back from expulsion. It was located in a few homes by the river, probably near the site of the former labor camp. The ghetto was an unfenced, open ghetto. However, its inmates were permitted to walk only a few yards beyond the houses in which they lived.¹⁴

The ghetto residents included a few dozen Czech Jews and probably some German Jews, mainly from Dortmund and its environs. The Protectorate and Reich Jews, who had arrived in Zamość on April 30 and May 2–3, 1942, were among some 700 newcomers transferred from May 2 to Komarów, located some 15 kilometers (9.3 miles) from Tyszowce.¹⁵ It is unknown when, precisely, the expellees arrived in Tyszowce.

Immediately after the expulsion, a new Jewish Council was appointed. It was led by Markus Fischleiber, a German Jew.¹⁶ Within a few hours, Jews who had evaded deportation were permitted to report to the newly established ghetto. Fischleiber required that the fugitives pay an exorbitant fee to legitimize their residence. Some days later, the SS raided the ghetto and shot some 47 to 60 still unregistered ghetto residents.¹⁷

Between 10 and 14 people lived in each of the rooms in the ghetto. The overcrowding increased incidents of illness, including typhus.¹⁸

At around the time of the October 16, 1942, liquidation of the Zamość ghetto, Gendarmes and SS, probably auxiliaries from Rachanie, also liquidated the Tyszowce ghetto. They mobilized local Poles and Ukrainians to help round up Jews attempting to flee.¹⁹ About 100 Jews were shot. Fischleiber, his mother, and sister committed suicide. Another 480 Jews evaded expulsion by hiding in bunkers in forests near Miętkie (in the so-called Mikucki Woods). A Christian eyewitness reports that most of the 500 Jews assembled on the square were expelled. Likely consolidated in Komarów, the expellees were marched together with Jews from Komarów to the ghetto in Izbica (nad Wieprzem), where, on October 19, they were sent to their deaths at Bełżec and Sobibór. However, postwar Polish Court Inquiries about Executions, Mass Graves, Camps, and Ghettos (ASG) documentation also suggests that a part of the Tyszowce Jews may have been shot nearby. It notes that between June 16, 1942, and the end of 1943, Gendarmes, commanded by Schulz, and members of a Rachanie-based Schutzpolizei unit, led by SS surnamed Olaszewski and Rogalski, shot some 1,000 Jews from Tyszowce and nearby villages.²⁰

Most Tyszowce fugitives perished during German searches of the forests, expelled (by what Finger recalls as Soviet, but may have been Ukrainian) partisan groups operating there or denounced by the local population.²¹ By April 1943, only 15 of the 480 forest fugitives were still alive. A group of the survivors, including Finger, escaped to Hrubieszów, where Jewish inmates at the forced labor camp hid them until October. Fearing Security Police soon would liquidate the camp, Finger and his companions escaped to Kraśnik and entered the concentration camp in Budzyń. Another 8 fugitives, including 6 members of the Szakmajer family, Ester Singer, and her child, perished in 1944 after the neighbors of Jakub Kopytko, their aid giver, informed Gendarmes of the Jews' hiding place. Kopytko's wife died several weeks later. When Kopytko evaded arrest, frustrated Gendarmes ordered his neighbors to dismantle all the structures on his property.²²

A handful of Tyszowce ghetto residents survived the war. Among them was Jeszajahu Sztengiel, murdered a month after the Red Army's liberation of Tyszowce in July 1944.²³

Schulz, tried in 1964 in Ellwangen (Jagst), West Germany, for the shooting deaths of 12 Jews in Komarów, received a life sentence.

SOURCES Secondary sources touching on the history of the Tyszowce Jewish community during World War II include the relevant entry in Abraham Wein, Bracha Freundlich, and Wila Orbach, eds., Pinkas ha-kebilot. Encyclopaedia of Jewish Communities: Poland, vol. 7, Lublin and Kielce (Jerusalem: Yad Vashem, 1999), pp. 244–247, an English translation of which can be found at jewishgen.org. A similar entry, available on the Tyszowce homepage of the Wirtualny Sztetl, a Web site sponsored by the Muzeum Historii Żydów Polskich (Museum of the History of Polish Jews), also incorporates Polish-Christian eyewitness testimonies from Robert Horbaczewski, W blasku świateł: Opowieści tyszowieckie (Lublin: EL-Press, 2005). The yizkor book Pinkas Tishivits (Tel Aviv: Irgun yots'e Tishivits be-Yisrael, 1970) includes memoirs from survivors. Justiz und NS-Verbrechen, vol. 20 (Amsterdam: Amsterdam University Press, 1979), Lfd. Nr. 575, pp. 217–247, describes the investigation and trial of Ernst Schulz.

Additional documentation can be found in the following archives: APL; AŻIH (e.g., 210/695, 211 [1147, pp. 8, 11; 1148, pp. 9, 41–42, 50; 1149, p. 27; 1150, p. 11; 1151, pp. 34, 40, 51; 1152, pp. 24, 50], 301 [2535A, 2926, 2985, 4333, 5836]); FVA (HVT-1963); IPN (e.g., ASG, SOZ [76, 85], SSKL 225); IPN-Lu (e.g., 111/67, 1-2, 346/67/1-2); USHMM (Acc.1997.A.0124 [AŻIH 211]; Acc.1999.A.0154 [AŻIH 210]; RG-15.019M [IPN ASG] [reel 15 (49/185-187), reel 6 (18/1089, 1172)]); RG-50.120*0111); VHF (e.g., 3400, 9322, 13951, 19229, 25544, 32094, 36193); and YVA (e.g., O-3/2780).

Laura Crago

NOTES

1. IPN, SOZ 76, pp. 1–286.
2. USHMM, Acc.1997.A.0124 (AŻIH), 211/1148, p. 9.
3. AŻIH, 301/2985, testimony of Berko Finger, pp. 1–2. See also 301/5836, p. 1.
4. Ibid., 301/2985, p. 1.
5. Ibid., 301/5836, p. 2; USHMM, RG-15.019M (IPN), 49/185.
6. AŻIH, 301/2535a, testimony of Jakub Cukier, p. 1.
7. USHMM, Acc.1997.A.0124, 211/1147, p. 8.
8. Ibid., RG-15.019M, 49/187.
9. Ibid., Acc.1997.A.0124, 211/1147, p. 11.
10. Ibid., Acc.1999.A.0154, 210/695, p. 4.
11. AŻIH, 301/2985, p. 1.
12. Ibid., 301/5836, testimony of Augustyn Dudziński, p. 2.
13. Ibid., 301/2535a, p. 1.
14. Ibid., 301/2985, p. 2.
15. USHMM, Acc.1997.A.0124, 211/1152, p. 34.
16. Ibid., p. 50.
17. AŻIH, 301/2985, p. 2.
18. Ibid.
19. Ibid., 301/5836, p. 3.
20. USHMM, RG-15.019M, 18/1172.
21. IPN, SSKL 143, pp. 1–42; SOZ 85, pp. 1–614.
22. AŻIH, 301/5836, p. 2; 301/2926, testimony of Jakub Kopytko, p. 1.
23. Ibid., 301/5836, p. 1.

UCHANIE

Pre-1939: Uchanie (Yiddish: Uchan), town, Lublin województwo, Poland; 1939–1944: Kreis Hrubieszow, Distrikt Lublin, Generalgouvernement; post-1998: Lublin województwo, Poland

Uchanie is located about 88 kilometers (55 miles) southeast of Lublin. In 1921, the Jewish population of the town was 1,010. On the eve of war in August 1939, between 1,450 and 1,700 Jews were residing in Uchanie.

After the September 1939 campaign, in early October, the Germans consolidated their occupation of Uchanie, following the withdrawal of the Red Army from the region.

By early in 1940, the German authorities had established a Jewish Council (Judenrat) in Uchanie, which had to supply a quota of forced laborers each day. Some of the Jews worked in agriculture, and others worked for German military units or other German offices in the region. In addition, the Judenrat had to meet repeated German demands for specific amounts of silver, gold, and other valuables.

Evidence for the existence of an open ghetto in Uchanie comes mainly from survivor testimony. For example, the family of Czesława Serafin, together with four other Jewish families, was living in the village of Staszic Kolonia, a few kilometers to the south of Uchanie, during the winter of 1939–1940. In April 1940, they received an order from the sołtys (village head) that they had to move to Uchanie. In Uchanie, Serafin's family moved in with their uncle; they were unable to find another apartment, because all the Jews from the neighboring villages had also been ordered to move to Uchanie.¹

Czesława Serafin notes that the local peasants, when they made their prescribed deliveries to the Germans in Uchanie, also risked bringing in some additional food products (e.g., bread, milk, potatoes, kasha, and eggs), which they traded with the Jews in exchange for possessions, such as shoes, sheets, and clothing. Czesława and her husband, because of their good contacts, supplied all their relatives (more than 20 people) with food, mainly from her village of Staszic Kolonia.

According to Czesława, in January 1941, the Germans issued an order that the Jews in Uchanie had to move from their houses on the main streets to just three other streets: Cerkiewna, Cmentarna, and the Rynek (main square). This in effect established a Jewish residential area (or open ghetto) in Uchanie.²

This testimony is corroborated by Rubin Shafran, a native of Uchanie, who recalls that in 1941 the Germans brought in the Jews from the surrounding small towns and villages and created a ghetto in Uchanie. The ghetto was not enclosed—there was no barbed-wire fence—but the Jews lived in overcrowded conditions, with three or four families to each apartment. The Jews were only permitted to leave the ghetto to go to work.³

In June 1941, there were 1,253 Jews residing in Uchanie. Just prior to the German invasion of the Soviet Union, a number of Jews were conscripted to work for the Wehrmacht forces concentrated along the nearby border to the Soviet Union.

In late November 1941, around 100 Jewish expellees from Kraków arrived in Uchanie. These impoverished Jews received some meager financial support over the ensuing months from the headquarters of the Jewish Social Self-Help (JSS) organization in Kraków.⁴ In January 1942, there were 1,290 Jews in the town. In March or April 1942, several hundred men (aged 25 to 45 years old) were sent to the Jewish forced labor camp in Trawniki.⁵

In May 1942, around 680 Jews from the village of Horodło arrived in Uchanie. Their arrival is noted in the JSS records, but no reference is made as to where they had come from. At this time there was no community kitchen, but some cash was distributed to the new arrivals as welfare support.⁶ The account in the Horodło yizkor book, however, confirms that the Jews of that village and several surrounding places, including Strzyżów, were transferred to Uchanie around this time, where they were held in a sheep pen with very little to eat for some two weeks before most were deported to the railway station at

Miączyn, 10 kilometers (6 miles) south of Grabowiec.⁷ Also at some time in May 1942, a group of about 300 young women and 100 men reportedly were sent to the Majdanek concentration camp.⁸

The JSS report for May 1942 states that there were 1,950 Jews in Uchanie. Of the 575 Jews requesting assistance, 420 were receiving it. The same report indicates that 43 Jews had died during that month but does not state the cause.⁹ At the end of May or in early June 1942, German forces assisted by the local auxiliary police rounded up more than 40 Jews in Uchanie and shot them. The Jews were buried in a mass grave between the Jewish and Polish cemeteries in Uchanie. Sara Mostysser, who recalls arriving in the Uchanie ghetto from Strzyżów in May 1942, is among those who described this incident. She claims that the expulsion of the Jews took place only about two weeks after her arrival in Uchanie.¹⁰

German forces deported the Jews from Uchanie just before or on June 10, 1942. According to JSS records, 1,650 Jews were taken in wagons and on foot to the railroad station at Miączyn.¹¹ Just prior to the roundup, signs were posted all over the ghetto informing the Jews that they would be deported. They were permitted to take with them only 25 kilograms (55 pounds) of personal belongings.¹² Some of the Jews were shot by the guards during the transport to Miączyn.¹³

At the Miączyn station, the Jews were placed in an area surrounded with barbed wire, where a selection was conducted. A number of able-bodied Jews from the Uchanie ghetto were sent to a forced labor camp at Staw (about 30 kilometers [19 miles] from Uchanie), and another 350 or so remained in Uchanie (or were sent back there) as needed laborers or to clear out the ghetto area. From Miączyn, the remaining Jews were sent by train to the extermination camp in Sobibór.

The Jews that returned to Uchanie remained there until October 1942. At the end of August, the number of Jews registered there was 382. At this time the local JSS branch reported that it was still sending food and clothing to support the Jews who had been transferred to the forced labor camp at Staw. According to testimony given in West German criminal investigations, a number of Jews were shot at the Jewish cemetery in Uchanie by members of the Gestapo from Hrubieszów on their regular visits between June and October 1942. Among the victims were a woman and her child who had broken the curfew and about 30 elderly Jews who were shot as a group. Four days before the remaining Jews were transferred to the ghetto in Hrubieszów in October 1942, the grandfather of Jewish survivor Benito Mehl was also shot. The ghetto in Hrubieszów was liquidated in turn on October 22, 1942.¹⁴

Rubin Shafran managed to escape from Uchanie before the transfer to Hrubieszów and found refuge on a Polish farm. Czesława Serafin learned later that her aunt and two cousins (Pesia Goldfarb, Sura Rajchman, and Stel Lerner) had escaped from the deportation transport to Miączyn and hid for about a year, mostly in the forest. However, subsequently they were caught by the SS and shot in the Jewish cemetery in Uchanie.¹⁵ There were only a few survivors from the Uchanie ghetto.

SOURCES Publications concerning the fate of the Jewish population of Uchanie during the Holocaust include “Uchanie,” in Abraham Wein, Bracha Freundlich, and Wila Orbach, eds., Pinkas ha-kehillot. Encyclopaedia of Jewish Communities: Poland, vol. 7, Lublin and Kielce (Jerusalem: Yad Vashem, 1999), p. 44—an English translation is available at jewishgen.org; see also Arnon Rubin, The Rise and Fall of the Jewish Communities in Poland and Their Relics Today, vol. 2, District Lublin (Tel Aviv: Tel Aviv University Press, 2007), p. 107 (Horodło) and p. 290 (Uchanie); Yosef Hayim Zavidovitch, ed., Di kehileh fun Horodla: Yizker-bukh nokh di kdoysim fun Horodla (Poyln) un di kdoysim fun di noente derfer (Tel Aviv: Va’ ad yots’e Horodlah be-Yisrael, 1966); and Tatiana Berenstein, “Martyrologia, opór i zagłada ludności żydowskiej w dystrykcie lubelskim,” BŻIH, no. 21 (1957): 65–66.

Relevant documentation can be found in the following archives: AŻIH (210/696 [AJDC]; 211/140, 1051 [JSS]; 301/5779 [Relacje]); BA-L (B 162/4329); USHMM (Acc.1997.A.0124 [JSS]; Acc.1999.A.0154 [AJDC]; RG-15.084 [Relacje]); and VHF (# 9561, 13068, 25227).

Martin Dean

NOTES

1. AŻIH, 301/5779, testimony of Czesława Serafin.
2. Ibid. Serafin does not say that there was a ghetto, only that the Jews could live only on these three streets.
3. VHF, # 25227, testimony of Rubin Shafran (born 1927), 1997.
4. AŻIH, 211/140, p. 38; 211/1051, pp. 2, 5, 7, 11, 15.
5. Ibid., 301/5779.
6. Ibid., 211/1051, p. 19, report of JSS Uchanie, May 12, 1942.
7. Zavidovitch, Di kehileh fun Horodla, pp. 185–186; see also Rubin, The Rise and Fall, vol. 2, District Lublin, p. 107.
8. AŻIH, 301/5779. This may, however, be a mistaken reference to the transfer of Jews to the labor camp at Staw, as it is not mentioned in other sources.
9. Ibid., 211/1051, pp. 19, 22, 24.
10. VHF, # 25227; # 13068, testimony of Sara Mostysser (born 1924), 1996; AŻIH, 301/5779.
11. AŻIH, 211/1051, p. 26.
12. VHF, # 25227. Shafran dates the expulsion on June 8.
13. BA-L, B 162/4329 (208 AR-Z 91/61), Closing report of Sta. Hannover, 2 Js 369/62, in the case against Max Stöbner (crime location: Hrubieszów), April 15, 1965, p. 117.
14. Ibid., pp. 149–150, 298.
15. AŻIH, 301/5779.

URZĘDÓW

Pre-1939: Urzędów, village, Janów Lubelski powiat, Lublin województwo, Poland; 1939–1944: Urzedow, Kreis Janow Lubelski, Distrikt Lublin, Generalgouvernement; post-1998: Urzędów, Kraśnik powiat, Lublin województwo, Poland

Urzędów lies 55 kilometers (34 miles) southwest of Lublin. In August 1939, almost 250 of the gmina’s 326 Jewish inhabitants resided in Urzędów. The remaining Jews lived in smaller villages.

VOLUME II: PART A

A Wehrmacht unit occupied the gmina on September 15, 1939. By October 10, a German civil administration had been established for Kreis Janów Lubelski, including Urzędów.

In late December 1939, the Urzędów Jews were ordered to establish a Jewish Council (Judenrat). Its chair was Moszek Rychtenberg. A Kraśnik native commanded a 10-member Jewish police force. Manis Szajnbrun, an Urzędów confectioner named deputy police commander, used brutality to requisition gold, silver, bicycles, and other items demanded by the German authorities.¹ A December decree required Jewish Council representatives throughout the Kreis to sell white armbands with a blue Star of David for 2 złoty and for adult Jews to wear them by January 5, 1940.

The arrival of 40 newcomers, mainly December 1939 expellees from Łódź and voluntary refugees from Warsaw, increased the Jewish population to 402 by April 1941. The Jewish Social Self-Help (JSS) branch, led by Moszek Wajngarten, rented rooms in Polish-Christians' homes for 9 impoverished refugee families (37 people). On May 4, Jewish expellees arrived from Wąwolnica. Most originally were from Janów Lubelski and Puławy, plus some Viennese Jews, deported to Opole in February. Additional expellees arrived from Lublin the next day. On May 28, 60 Jewish refugees (including deportees) were residing in the gmina.²

The expropriation of businesses, escalating food prices with the massing of troops in Distrikt Lublin in the spring of 1941 in preparation for Germany's June invasion of the Soviet Union, and a decree confining Jews to their places of residence (from March 1 to July 1) rapidly impoverished the community. In July, the JSS asked wealthier Jews to prepare daily meals for 156 (of 220) impoverished Jews. The wealthy included 10 craftsmen permitted to operate workshops and nine business licensees, such as Jewish Council member Hersz Ajdelsztejn and Viennese refugee Dr. Laschke. Ajdelsztejn opened a bakery; Laschke established a dental practice.³

By August 1941, 40 Jews reported daily for forced labor in Urzędów; 71 others worked on unfinished construction projects at two pre-war building sites straddling the road between Urzędów and Kraśnik. The construction laborers initially worked at a residential building site (from 1954, Kraśnik Fabryczny), planned by the pre-war Polish government to house employees of its new ammunition factory in Dąbrowa-Bór. From July 1941, they also built foresters' barracks and stables near the woods at Dąbrowa. When, in the summer of 1942, Odilo Globocnik, the SS- und Polizeiführer (SSPF) in Distrikt Lublin, decided to establish the Budzyń forced labor camp there, these structures became part of the camp. From the late summer of 1941, Urzędów labor crews, supervised by Jewish prisoners of war (POWs) from the Lipowa 7 camp in Lublin, retrofitted the ammunition factory for the Heinkel Company (Heinkel Werke), which in early 1942 established an aircraft repair facility (Heinkel Flugzeugwerke). Some Urzędów Jews worked at the facility.⁴

The need for an immediately accessible labor pool probably led Hans Lenk, the Janów Lubelski Kreishauptmann, from August of 1941, to order Jews from villages in the Urzędów gmina concentrated into a ghetto. On September 4,

Wajngarten noted: "The location for the ghetto [dzielnica żydowska] already has been chosen; the state of housing is so wretched, it is impossible to imagine."⁵ The ghetto was unfenced. On May 14, 1942, Maks Kaminer, the JSS chief for Kreis Janów Lubelski, noted that no closed ghettos existed in the Kreis.⁶

Whether all 143 Jewish residents of Bęczyn, Boby, Ewunin, Moniaki, Ostrów (pre-war Janów Lubelski powiat), Popkowiec, and Zadworze reported to the ghetto on October 1, 1941, as ordered is unknown.⁷ Wajngarten always had included them in gmina population figures. The Urzędów Jewish population peaked in late October. However, the increase came after the JSS extended aid to the 146 Jews in the Dzierzkowice gmina (the location of the construction projects), including meals for the Lipowa 7 POWs at Heinkel. To impress on JSS leaders the organization's new responsibilities, Wajngarten included the Dzierzkowice Jews within the Urzędów population and thus noted an expanded Jewish population for the pre-war Urzędów gmina of 466 and of 549 for October 1941. A Jewish Council, led by Hersz Fogiel, continued to represent the Dzierzkowice Jews through at least late November.⁸

Most ghetto inmates arrived with few personal belongings. Inadequate clothing and housing, primitive conditions at the work sites, and November 1941 orders forbidding Jews in the Generalgouvernement from leaving the area of their places of residence without permission increased incidences of frostbite, typhus, and hunger-related illnesses. Cold and hunger claimed the lives of 6 Urzędów Jews in November. Another 18 were patients at Jewish hospitals in Lublin, Janów Lubelski, and Kwiatkowiec. Two Jews sent to Lublin arrived with such severe cases of frostbite that they died of complications from gangrene.⁹

From mid-October 1941, the JSS raised funds from nonghettoized Jews in Urzędów to buy materials to transform one ghetto residence into a winterized, heated shelter.¹⁰ Because Hans Frank, by December, had ordered the death penalty imposed on Jews found violating the proscriptions on movement, JSS leaders seized an opportunity created by Kreishauptmann Lenk's October extension of potato and kasha rations to nonworking Jews to establish a community kitchen. It opened on January 1, 1942. However, after Lenk suspended rations to nonworking Jews (and Poles) in February, the JSS, forced onto the free market, could afford to feed only 30 people daily.¹¹ To provide the impoverished access to food, the Jewish Council in April arranged agricultural employment on a nearby estate for some 70 to 100 children, women, elderly, and unemployed.¹²

The Jewish Council likely believed the labor, which began on around April 15, 1942, might shield the community from a selective deportation, as had occurred in Kraśnik three days before, during which 2,040 mostly elderly, children, and unemployed were sent to Bełżec. Helen (Ajdelsztejn-) Erlich recalls that the Lipowa 7 POWs, regular guests at her house, informed the Jewish Council that the Germans were killing Jews at Bełżec. As a result, Ajdelsztejn's father purchased false identity papers for her and arranged in October for the POWs to smuggle her to Lublin to find work.¹³

With the extension of Operation Reinhard into Kreis Janów, the Arbeitsamt (labor office) in Lublin increased labor camp quotas to retain “useful” Jews. On May 25, 1942, it ordered 30 Urzędów Jews to a water irrigation camp in Janiszów (Janów Lubelski powiat). Upon the establishment in Kraśnik of the town’s first closed labor camp (the artisans’ or synagogue camp) that same week, some 12 Urzędów Jews were among 180 craftsmen (mainly carpenters) ordered interned there. The inmates initially completed construction projects and built furniture for the Schmitt & Junke firm, which held the contract to erect an office building and to refurbish other offices needed for the Kreis administration’s planned move to Kraśnik. Another 35 Urzędów Jews were sent that month to more distant labor camps.¹⁴

In mid-October, likely on October 14, 1942, the German authorities ordered the Jews to assemble the next morning on the square. A large number failed to appear. Because survivors’ accounts diverge, the two SS men at the square probably ordered the Heinkel workers and construction laborers to report with their families to the recently completed Budzyń camp and the remaining Jews to the ghetto in Kraśnik.¹⁵ The following day, the SS marched the Urzędów Jews in Kraśnik (together with Jews ordered there from other nearby communities) to the railway station and forced them onto trains destined for Bełżec. The Jews were all gassed on arrival.

One or two days later at Budzyń, the SS retained the Urzędów construction laborers, the Heinkel workers, and a number of others, including young women, as camp inmates. The prisoners’ families were ordered to sleep in a group of barracks, designated a “special camp.” Several days later, the SS marched the inmates’ families to the Kraśnik railway station and sent them to their deaths at Bełżec.¹⁶ Within a few weeks, the women inmates were ordered onto trucks, driven to the Kraśnik railway station, and also sent to Bełżec.¹⁷

Most fugitives were killed in the months immediately following the deportations.¹⁸ Only a few found shelter with the local Polish population or survived on false identity papers as forced laborers in the Reich.¹⁹ More than half of the approximately 15 Urzędów Jews who survived the war under the German occupation had been inmates of Budzyń—or of camps, such as Janiszów, whose prisoners subsequently were sent to Budzyń—or of the Kraśnik artisans’ camp. None appear ever to have lived in the Urzędów ghetto.

SOURCES Secondary sources providing coverage of the Urzędów Jewish community during World War II include the relevant entries in Abraham Wein, Bracha Freundlich, and Wila Orbach, eds., Pinkas ha-kehillot. Encyclopaedia of Jewish Communities: Poland, vol. 7, Lublin and Kielce (Jerusalem: Yad Vashem, 1999), pp. 42–44; and its English-language counterpart, Arnon Rubin, The Rise and Fall of the Jewish Communities in Poland and Their Relics Today, vol. 2, District Lublin (Tel Aviv: Tel Aviv University Press, 2007), pp. 290–292. The Urzędów homepage on the Wirtualny Sztetl, a Web site sponsored by the Muzeum Historii Żydów Polskich, contains a secondary account, available in English translation, and a large bibliography of Polish-language works.

Published eyewitness accounts, available only from Polish Christians, include in Michał Grynberg and Maria Kotowska, eds., Życie i zagłada Żydów polskich, 1939–1945: Relacje świadków (Warsaw: Oficyna Naukowa, 2003), pp. 118–126, excerpts from AŻIH, 302/277, testimony of Kazimierz Cieśllicki; and “Wspomnienia Aleksandra Marciniaka,” Głos Ziemi Urzędowskiej—Czasopismo Towarzystwa Ziemi Urzędowskiej (Urzędów, 2003), a series of letters written by Aleksander Marciniak, a wartime deportee from Poznań. The second account is most accessible in its complete form on the Web site of the Urzędów gmina, at www.urzedow.pl. A transcription of the specific letter in which Marciniak recalls Dr. Laschke and postal carrier Jusek Weinman can be found at the Wirtualny Sztetl. The published accounts are better considered together with the oral testimonies of Jewish survivors Helen (Ajdelstzejn-) Erlich and Gary Flumenbaum, at VHF, respectively, # 11358 and # 1861, as the authors’ memories considerably diverge, particularly when it comes to Laschke and the Ajdelstzejn family.

Unfortunately, none of the above works discuss the ghetto, for which coverage, outside of this entry, so far is known to exist only in archival documentation, specifically in the second JSS files for Urzędów, located at AŻIH, 211/1064. Additional documentation for the Urzędów Jewish community can be found in the following archives: APL; APL-Kraśnik; AŻIH (e.g., 210/701; 211 [140, pp. 64–66, 71; 141, pp. 31, 33, 34; 142, pp. 21, 46; 460, pp. 23–24, 31; 462, pp. 7–8; 1063; 1065]; 301 [426, 4348, 4403]); IPN (e.g., SOL 65, 107-108); IPN-Lu (e.g., 357/67/1-3); USHMM (e.g., Acc.1997.A.0124 [AŻIH 211]; Acc.1999.A.0154 [AŻIH 210]); and YVA.

Laura Crago

NOTES

1. AŻIH, 302/277, testimony of Kazimierz Cieśllicki, pp. 11, 20–21.
2. USHMM, Acc.1999.A.0154 (AŻIH), 211/1063, pp. 8, 11, 13, 19–20, 26.
3. Ibid., 211/1064, pp. 17–18, 20; VHF, # 11358, testimony of Helen (Ajdelstzejn-) Erlich.
4. USHMM, Acc.1999.A.0154, 211/1064, p. 29; VHF, # 1861, testimony of Gary Flumenbaum; # 11358.
5. USHMM, Acc.1999.A.0154, 211/1064, p. 32.
6. Ibid., 211/462, p. 34.
7. Ibid., 211/1064, p. 37.
8. Ibid., 211/1064, pp. 56–57; 211/460, p. 23; 211/461, p. 49; VHF, # 11358.
9. USHMM, Acc.1999.A.0154, 211/1064, pp. 58–59.
10. Ibid., 211/1064, p. 51.
11. Ibid., 211/1065, pp. 5–6, 27–28, 38.
12. Ibid., pp. 32–33.
13. VHF, # 11358.
14. USHMM, Acc.1999.A.0154, 211/1065, pp. 37, 41; 211/462, p. 41.
15. Compare VHF, # 1861, and AŻIH, 301/4403, testimony of Icek Mandelbaum, p. 1.
16. VHF, # 1861.
17. AŻIH, 301/4403, p. 1.
18. Ibid., 302/277, pp. 23–29.
19. Ibid., 301/436, testimony of Sydzia Konis, pp. 1–8.

WĄWOLNICA

Pre-1939: Wąwolnica (Yiddish: Vonvolitz), village, Puławy powiat, Lublin województwo, Poland; 1939–1944: Wawolnica, Kreis Pulawy, Distrikt Lublin, Generalgouvernement; post-1998: Wąwolnica, Puławy powiat, Lublin województwo, Poland

Wąwolnica lies 35 kilometers (22 miles) northwest of Lublin. In 1939, on the eve of World War II, almost 900 Jews resided there.¹

A Wehrmacht unit briefly occupied Wąwolnica from September 15, 1939. A small contingent of Austrian soldiers left behind to establish a local German civilian administration did not humiliate the Jews or conscript them for labor. The new mayor, Anton Müller, a writer and local ethnic German, initially permitted the Jews to carry on their pre-war occupations and to observe the Sabbath. Few German troops arrived to harass the Jews, perhaps because of Wąwolnica's location, atop a steep hill, a distance away from the highway connecting Warsaw to Lublin.²

Because it was considered a relative "safe haven" for Jews, Wąwolnica became flooded with Jewish refugees. Among the 800 Jewish refugees residing in Wąwolnica in January 1940 were hundreds of Jews from war-devastated Kurów.³

The relative peace ended in 1940 when the local administration in January created registration requirements for Jews and forbade them from engaging in trade. Before March, the Jews were ordered to form a Jewish Council (Judenrat). Its chair was Naftalia Rozenperl.⁴ On a Sabbath that year, a group of Germans stormed the synagogue to beat and humiliate the Jews they found there. In early spring, another group of soldiers searched Jewish homes for valuables. A third contingent of Germans entered Wąwolnica on a summer night to conscript Jews for local forced labor assignments. The Germans compelled the conscripts to run sprints up and down the Wąwolnica hill.⁵

In the early spring of 1940, the local administration reordered residential patterns in Wąwolnica by expelling Jews from Christian-owned residences. Whether the Jews were required to mark their houses is unknown. Survivor Helen Kotlar, a refugee from Kurów, only recalls the shochet among those expelled from his residence, which was ordered returned to its non-Jewish owner.⁶

A more formal 2-square-kilometer (494-acre) Jewish quarter was subsequently established in Wąwolnica. The sources differ on the date of its creation. The Polish official responsible for completing the postwar Court Inquiries about Executions, Mass Graves, Camps, and Ghettos (ASG) questionnaire on camps and ghettos reported that the Wąwolnica ghetto was established in April but erred in reporting the year as 1942. (By then, almost all of the 2,000 Jews listed as inmates of the ghetto already had been sent to their deaths.) A Polish researcher at the Institute of National Remembrance (IPN) later claimed the ghetto was created in February 1942.⁷

Local officials imposed new anti-Jewish decrees from the early spring of 1941, probably to pressure local refugees to return home. On March 15, they suspended all food rations to Jews.⁸ (Prior to the announcement, every adult Jew in Wąwolnica had been allotted 120 grams [4.2 ounces] of bread daily, 200 grams [7 ounces] of sugar monthly, and 200 kilograms [about 441 pounds] of potatoes yearly.) In April, all the remaining Kurów refugees were expelled.⁹

The Jewish Social Self-Help (JSS) and the Judenrat established a communal kitchen to provide a daily meal to every Jewish inhabitant of Wąwolnica. In July, 1,200 people paid for the dinners, 60 received subsidized meals, and another 440, the most indigent, were provided free meals. In July, the sugar ration was restored. On August 31, officials announced a 100-gram (3.5-ounce) daily bread ration.¹⁰

By then, the poor sanitary conditions bred by overcrowding and the absence of food had contributed to the outbreak of a typhus epidemic. On May 31, 1941, 525 Jews (40 percent) were ill. Quarantine procedures, mandated by German authorities in Puławy for Jews sick with typhus, may have given rise to the existence of a de facto Jewish quarter, or ghetto, as they required sick Jews be separated from the non-Jewish population in a designated building or cluster of residences.¹¹ However, the evidence is too sparse to say for certain why some local Poles believed a ghetto existed in Wąwolnica by April.

From June until September 1, 1941, 280 Wąwolnica Jews were interned in labor camps located in the pre-war Wąwolnica gmina, mostly at a brick-making concern in Łopatki and at a camp established for agricultural labor in Błonice. Some 70 others were sent to camps outside the pre-war gmina, mostly in Puławy. During this same period, the Judenrat was required to provide an additional 200 Jews daily for forced labor in Wąwolnica. About 25 craftsmen labored at a shoemaking workshop established in the ghetto.¹²

On March 22 or 24, 1942, an SS unit stormed the Wąwolnica ghetto, rounded up 120 Jews, including several Judenrat members, and executed them at the Jewish cemetery. According to the Pinkas ha-kehilot entry for Wąwolnica, the Jews were murdered in reprisal for the killing, probably by the Polish underground, of a local ethnic German employed in the Wąwolnica civil administration. However, reports in the Underground Archives of the Warsaw Ghetto note the Jews were killed during a "resettlement" Aktion.¹³ Unfortunately, German sources, which report 80 Jews were shot in Wąwolnica on March 24, do not indicate the reason for the shootings.¹⁴

Generally, scholars who maintain that the March 1942 killings were unrelated to the expulsion of the Jews believe an SS unit returned to Wąwolnica on March 29, 1942, to liquidate the ghetto. The Germans, joined by Ukrainian auxiliaries, expelled the entire Jewish community—some 2,000 people—to the ghetto in Opole, located 24 kilometers (15 miles) southwest of Wąwolnica. A March 29 letter, from Mosze Goldbaum, an expellee to the Opole ghetto from Kazimierz Dolny, appears to corroborate this version of events in stating that "all of Wąwolnica today was chased to Opole."¹⁵ On either March 30 or 31, the Wąwolnica Jews were marched from Opole (via Wąwolnica) to the Nałęczów railway station and ordered onto trains destined for the Bełżec extermination camp.¹⁶

Others maintain the killings were part of a two-stage liquidation of the Wąwolnica ghetto. In this version of events, on March 24, 1942, the day of the executions, the SS expelled those Jews—about 1,450 people—whom they deemed unfit for labor. The expellees were placed on peasant carts and transported directly to the railway station in Nałęczów, located 5.8 kilometers (3.6 miles) east of Wąwolnica. There, they were forced onto trains and sent to Bełżec. On March 29, the SS returned to Wąwolnica to march the approximately 800 Jews predesignated for labor to the Opole ghetto. From there, the expellees were sent to the Poniatowa labor camp. Unfortunately, the existing German documentation, a March 30 memo about the ongoing Juden Umsiedlungsaktion (Jewish Resettlement Action), does not corroborate either version of events completely, as it notes only that 1,950 Jews from Wąwolnica and Opole had already been resettled via the Nałęczów railway station.¹⁷

A small number of Jews—perhaps 40 to 50 people—were held back from the deportations for a remnant ghetto in Wąwolnica. Tatiana Berenstein maintains the ghetto was liquidated in May 1942, when its inmates were sent outside of Wąwolnica for seasonal labor, including to the brickworks in Łopatki and for agricultural labor in Buchałowice. In October 1943, as part of the larger Aktion to murder almost all the surviving Jews in Distrikt Lublin, a small SS contingent from Lublin shot the laborers in front of mass graves located just outside the villages where they worked. Documentation for Łopatki, for instance, describes the October 1943 execution of 14 Jews who had been brought from Wąwolnica five months earlier for labor at the brickworks. Similar documentation for Buchałowice provides the location of the mass grave of 16 to 30 Wąwolnica Jews executed in the forest, just outside the village.¹⁸

Documentation for the village of Rogałów suggests some Jews may have remained in the Wąwolnica ghetto until October 1943. It describes the SS bringing nine Jews that month from Wąwolnica to Rogałów and executing them there as part of the liquidation of the remaining Jews in Distrikt Lublin.¹⁹

The precise number of Wąwolnica survivors is unknown. Although some adults did survive the war, only the youngest later recorded testimonies detailing their wartime experiences. Barbara Hofman was under a year old when her father Abraham left her on the doorstep of Maria Połkowska on Christmas Eve 1942.²⁰ The parents of eight-year-old Hela Szternblic instructed her to find shelter with their Polish friends, Wiktor and Pelagia Dobraczyński. Also counted among Wąwolnica survivors are Danuta Winnik and her son, Eugeniusz, refugees from Warsaw, aided by Józef Gorajek, a priest at St. Wojciech Church in Wąwolnica.

SOURCES Some documentation has appeared in publications such as Rutka Sakowska, ed., Archiwum Ringelbluma. Konspiracyjne Archiwum Getta Warszawskiego, vol. 1, Listy o Zagładzie (Warsaw: PWN, 1997), pp. 136–141 (AŻIH, Ring [943] I/587/b, photostatic copy, Yiddish orig., Yiddish transcription, Polish trans.); Joseph Kermesh, ed., To Live with Honor and Die with Honor! Selected Documents from the Warsaw Ghetto Underground Archives “O.S.” (“Oneg Shabbath”) (Jerusalem: Yad Vashem, 1986), pp. 116–120 (AŻIH, Ring [23] I/259, English trans.); and Tatiana Berenstein et al., eds., Eksterminacja Żydów na ziemiach polskich w okresie okupacji hitlerowskiej: Zbiór dokumentów (Warsaw: ŻIH, 1957), pp. 282–283 (APL, 498/0/273, Vermerk to Türk, March 30, 1942, German transcription and Polish trans.). The latter document also appears in the German-language edition of the same collection, Tatiana Berenstein et al., eds., Faschismus, Getto, Massenmord: Dokumentation über Ausrottung und Widerstand der Juden in Polen während des zweiten Weltkrieges (Berlin: Rütten & Loening, 1961).

Because Helen Kotlar initially sought refuge in Wąwolnica, her testimony, “Un dokh bin ikh geblibn lebn,” in the Kurów yizkor book, Moisheh Grosman, ed., Yizker-bukh Koriv. Sefer yizkor, matsevet-zikaron le-ayaratenu Koriv (Tel Aviv: Irgun yots’e Koriv be-Yisrael, 1955), touches on Jewish life in Wąwolnica during the first months of the war. It has been translated and published in English as We Lived in a Grave (New York: Shengold, 1980).

Most secondary works maintain the Wąwolnica ghetto was established in February 1942, likely because it is the date cited in Czesław Pilichowski et al., eds., Obozy hitlerowskie na ziemiach polskich 1939–1945: Informator encyklopedyczny (Warsaw: PWN, 1979), p. 558. The IPN research presented for Wąwolnica in Rejestr miejsc i faktów zbrodni popełnionych przez okupanta hitlerowskiego na ziemiach polskich w latach 1939–1945. Województwo lubelskie (Warsaw: GKBZHWP and IPN, 1985), pp. 256–257, is confusing and at points contradictory.

Secondary accounts suggesting a single-stage ghetto liquidation include David Silberklang, “The Holocaust in the Lublin District” (Ph.D. diss., Hebrew University, Jerusalem, 2003), p. 272; Abraham Wein, Bracha Freundlich, and Wila Orbach, eds., Pinkas ha-kehillot. Encyclopaedia of Jewish Communities: Poland, vol. 7, Lublin and Kielce (Jerusalem: Yad Vashem, 1999), pp. 165–167; and its English-language counterpart, Arnon Rubin, The Rise and Fall of Jewish Communities in Poland and Their Relics Today, vol. 2, District Lublin (Tel Aviv: Tel Aviv University Press, 2007), pp. 291–294. Tatiana Berenstein, “Martyrologia, opór i zagłada ludności żydowskiej w dystrykcie lubelskim,” BŻIH, no. 21 (1957): 78, however, outlines a two-stage liquidation and a remnant ghetto.

Also helpful are Israel Gutman and Sara Bender, eds., The Encyclopedia of the Righteous Among the Nations: Rescuers of Jews during the Holocaust, vol. 2, Poland (Jerusalem: Yad Vashem, 2004), pp. 176–177, 246, 630–631; Bob Pool, “Holocaust Hero—Jews Honor Polish Priest for Saving Lives in World War II,” Los Angeles Times, April 15, 1988; and Ewa Czerwińska, “Mój sprawiedliwy wujek z Wąwolnicy,” Kurier Lubelski, March 11, 2006.

Archival sources documenting the history of the Wąwolnica Jewish community during World War II include AAN (e.g., Delegatury Rządu RP na Kraju, 202/II-29, pp. 17–19 (Ring [38] I/1220 [complete]); APL (e.g., 498 [273]); AŻIH (e.g., Ankiety, Ring [23] I/259, [24] I/262, [38] I/1220); 210/707; 211/1089); IPN (Ankiety [e.g., ASG]); IPN-Lu (e.g., Ds-2/67/1-6); USHMM (Acc.1997.A.0124 [AŻIH] 211/1089;

Acc. 1999.A.0154 [AŻIH] 210/707; RG-15.019M [IPN] [reel 6, 16/838, 840, 845, and reel 15, 49/120]; VHF (# 41853); and YVA (e.g., O-53/82 [APL 498]).

Laura Crago

NOTES

1. USHMM, Acc.1997.A.0124 (AŻIH), ŻSS, 211/1089, pp. 8, 12.
2. Kotlar, We Lived in a Grave, pp. 16–18.
3. USHMM, Acc. 1999.A.0154 (AŻIH), AJDC, 210/707, p. 8.
4. Ibid., pp. 8, 47.
5. Kotlar, We Lived in a Grave, pp. 19–21, 24.
6. Ibid., pp. 22–24.
7. Compare USHMM, RG-15.019M, reel 15, 49/120, p. 1; with Pilichowski et al., Obozy, p. 558.
8. USHMM, Acc.1997.A.0124, 211/1089, pp. 8, 10.
9. Ibid., pp. 2, 6.
10. Ibid., pp. 9, 12, 14, 17, 18.
11. Ibid., p. 8.
12. Ibid., pp. 12, 17, 23–24.
13. Ibid., RG-15.079M (AŻIH), Ring [24] I/262, [38.] I/1220, [23] I/259, respectively, Wiadomości, April 3 and 12, 1942, and Mitteilungen, May 5–6, 1942.
14. APL, 498 (Urząd Okręgu Lubelskiego [Amt des Distrikts Lublin—Landamt]), 0/273 (Judenaussiedlung, 1941–1942), p. 47, as cited in Rejestr miejsc. Województwo lubelskie, p. 256, for 80 victims.
15. USHMM, RG-15.079M, [943] Ring I/587, Mosze Goldbaum to Josel Goldbaum, March 29, 1942.
16. Latest expulsion date from Silberklang, “The Holocaust,” p. 271.
17. APL, 498/0/273, Vermerk to Türk, March 30, 1942.
18. USHMM, RG-15.019M, reel 6, 16/838, 16/840.
19. Ibid., 16/845.
20. VHF, # 41853, testimony of Barbara Jenkins.

WISZNICE

Pre-1939: Wisznice (Yiddish: Visbnitza), village, Włodawa powiat, Lublin województwo, Poland; 1939–1944: Wischnitze, Kreis Biala Podlaska, Distrikt Lublin, Generalgouvernement; post-1998: Wisznice, Biała Podlaska powiat, Lublin województwo, Poland

Wisznice lies on the Zielawa River, almost 89 kilometers (55 miles) northeast of Lublin. Some 1,100 Jews resided there on the eve of World War II.¹

The Germans occupied Wisznice on September 21–22, 1939, but immediately abandoned it to Soviet occupation. Red Army forces, which arrived on September 25, left on October 6, in the larger Soviet evacuation behind the Bug River. As many as 269 Wisznice Jews followed them.² A Wehrmacht unit reoccupied Wisznice on October 7–8. The soldiers cut off the beards of older Jews and rounded up younger Jews for forced labor. On October 11, the soldiers departed Wisznice. Two days later, a sapper unit arrived to repair the bridge over the Zielawa. In November 1939, the German civil administration ordered Jewish Councils (Judenräte) established in Kreis Biala Podlaska. By early 1940, Jews throughout the Kreis were required to wear white armbands.

A group of Jews poses in front of the Wisznice ghetto entrance, 1942. The sign above the gate, written in German and Polish, reads, “Jewish quarter, non-Jews forbidden entry.” In the lower righthand corner, a legible portion of the placard attached to the sign reads, “Spotted Typhus.” USHMM WS #03839, COURTESY OF ELIEZER AND JENELLY ROSENBERG

In Wisznice, Jan Michalczyk, a local Pole, was appointed sołtys. In early summer, the Germans designated Wisznice for future Ukrainian resettlement and invited several ethnic Ukrainians (pre-war Polish citizens) to form a municipal council under Mayor (wójt) Teodor Bahdaj. German authorities elevated Wisznice to an administrative center within Kreis Biala Podlaska, by establishing a Landkommissariat (Rural Administration) and an Arbeitsamt (labor office) there. Wisznice Landkommissar Klemmer’s administration covered the parts of the pre-war Włodawa powiat incorporated into Kreis Biala Podlaska and included localities with significant Jewish populations such as Podedwórze-Opole, Rossosz, and Sławatycze. To police the territory, Gendarmerie posts were established in Wisznice and Sławatycze. Leutnant Buchholtz, the first commander of the Wisznice post, subsequently was replaced by Leutnant Schruck (Sruk). Gendarmes assigned to Wisznice included men surnamed Gering, Messal, and Pudel. A Sonderdienst force, composed mainly of local Ukrainians, and a unit of auxiliary Polish (Blue) Police assisted the Gendarmes.

In November 1940, Bahdaj and the town council ordered the Jews confined to an enclosed ghetto. The ghetto was located about 100 meters (328 feet) north of the market square on 2 hectares (about 5 acres) of land between what now are Kościelna, Fabryczna, and Polna Streets.³ Among the earliest ghettos and the first enclosed ghetto established in Distrikt Lublin, the Wisznice ghetto was surrounded by a 2-meter-wide (6.6-foot-wide) ditch and a barbed-wire fence. A sign above the fence’s only gate forbade non-Jews entrance to the Jewish quarter. Jews with resources evaded ghettoization by moving from Wisznice. About 70 of the most impoverished families (466 to 500 people) reported to the ghetto. They resided in 22 to 26 mostly one-room houses.⁴

Six members of the Jewish Council pose on a snow-covered street in the Wisznice ghetto, 1942.

USHMM WS #03842, COURTESY OF ELIEZER AND JENELLY ROSENBERG

To oversee the ghetto's day-to-day administration, the Gendarmerie commander appointed a local Ukrainian "commissar" of the ghetto. The commissar replaced the Jewish Council with a three-person Jewish ghetto administration and established a Jewish police force.⁵

When 925 to 970 expellees from Mława arrived in Wisznice in mid-December 1940, local authorities released the Wisznice Jews from the ghetto and designated it instead for the new arrivals. The native Jews were confined to an open ghetto of 20 mostly two-room houses, situated in a Jewish neighborhood just beyond the enclosed ghetto's fence.⁶ Because the houses there had sustained extensive devastation while the Jews were imprisoned in the enclosed ghetto, most lacked doors and window glass.⁷

Naftali Birnhack, a member of the Kraków city Jewish Assistance Committee sent by Jewish Social Self-Help (JSS) leaders in late December 1940 to visit refugees resettled in 15 localities in Distrikt Lublin, was most appalled by the plight of the Mława deportees in the enclosed Wisznice ghetto. He reported that they lacked the most primitive of utensils, bedding, and furniture. Those who could not be accommodated in ghetto housing slept directly on the ground in 35 earthen pits. Birnhack accused the Jewish ghetto administration of colluding with the ghetto's Ukrainian commissar to redirect relief earmarked for the refugees to native Jews and to torment the Mława expellees. He noted some 350 refugees had fled persecution in the ghetto. The 550 remaining inmates were mainly children (two thirds of the ghetto population) and elderly, left as hostages by family members unable to pay the Jewish authorities for "permission" to leave the ghetto. The Jewish ghetto administration required 350 underage children (girls younger than 14 and boys younger than 12) and the elderly to fulfill the forced labor obligations of their absent family members. Birnhack secured promises from the German Arbeitsamt director and the non-Jewish ghetto commissar to end the practice. They also "unofficially" agreed to permit the JSS to transfer children, the sick, and the elderly from the ghetto.⁸

Likely because the Wisznice JSS reported the "obligation" to assist the refugees was "too great," as most native Jews were freezing, had nothing to eat, and were ineligible for assistance, Birnhack asked the Sławatycze Jewish community to fill the void. By February 1940, the Sławatycze Jews had purchased and paid to transport to the ghetto some 2,100 kilograms (4,630 pounds) of potatoes, 640 kilograms (1,411 pounds) of bread, 436 kilograms (961 pounds) of kasha, 227 used pots, pans, and kitchen utensils, and 300 pieces of donated clothing.⁹ Birnhack organized in Parczew three JSS relief committees to aid the refugees in Wisznice. The Parczew JSS received American Jewish Joint Distribution Committee (AJDC) and JSS funding to establish a community kitchen in the ghetto. It daily served a free meal to all 500 Mława refugees.¹⁰

Kreis-level JSS leaders visited the refugees on January 22, 1941, but mainly attempted to obtain permission from the Biała Podlaska Kreishauptmann for a release from the ghetto of the children, women, and elderly among the Mława refugees. JSS leaders in Biała Podlaska and Parczew indicated that the Kreishauptmann supported a proposal to transfer children and women from the ghetto, but the existing documentation does not indicate whether he officially permitted their departure. In mid-January 1941, the Wisznice ghetto commissar met with Kreis-level JSS leaders in Biała Podlaska to establish the terms of the inmate release.¹¹ Though the JSS never acknowledged an agreement, 150 inmates left the ghetto in February 1941.¹²

On February 14, 1941, hundreds more deportees from Kraków were resettled into the enclosed Wisznice ghetto.¹³ The Gendarmes began imposing death sentences on Jews in the two Wisznice ghettos. Three native Jews were executed in February 1941, likely for being found outside the open ghetto's borders without permission. In April, the Gendarmes executed another eight Jews from the enclosed ghetto for not reporting for forced labor.¹⁴ That month, the most corrupt JSS members resigned, enabling JSS leaders to restore funding directly to Wisznice.

Typhus epidemics in June and July 1941 and again in October infected at least 400 people and claimed more than 20 lives.¹⁵ Between May and October, 168 to 172 Jews were interned at labor camps. All but 16 were imprisoned at camps located in the pre-war Wisznice gmina, including at a camp established in Horodyszcze (pre-war Wisznice gmina, Włodawa powiat) to dig water retention and irrigation ditches for flood-control projects. The remaining Jews were required to perform forced labor, including street cleaning and building barracks for German policemen, SS, and soldiers sometimes billeted in Wisznice. How these obligations were shared between Jews in the open and enclosed ghettos is not known.

On January 28, 1942, Landkommissar Klemmer ordered 138 Jewish residents from nearby villages, including Rozwadówka, Motwica, and Czepotka, to consolidate in the enclosed ghetto. Accompanied to Wisznice by local Gendarmes, the expellees arrived naked and barefoot. Twenty died the next day.¹⁶ In April, the Wisznice ghetto populations crested at 1,020, including 463 refugees and about 120 local expellees in the enclosed ghetto. In September 1942, 10 Jews were shot dead in two executions in the neighboring Wisznice colony. At least 4 of the victims were killed for escaping from the ghetto.¹⁷

The Germans liquidated the two ghettos in Wisznice in late September 1942. German security forces, including the Gendarmes and members of the 2nd Platoon of Reserve Police Battalion 101, stationed in Wisznice since late July, marched almost all the Jews some 51 kilometers (32 miles) to the ghetto in Międzyrzec Podlaski. Because of the distance, the deportees likely spent the night in Komarówka Podlaska. On October 6 and 9, members of Reserve Police Battalion 101 cleared the Międzyrzec ghetto, sending its inmates, including as many as 1,000 Wisznice deportees, to be gassed at the Treblinka extermination camp.

The 20 to 120 Jews retained for labor in Wisznice were held in a remnant ghetto, just a single house located just beyond the enclosed ghetto's gates.¹⁸ Mostly craftsmen, the inmates provided services to the German authorities. In November 1942, the Gendarmes and a small SS detachment liquidated the ghetto. The 108 inmates were executed, some in a mass grave near the Zielawa River in Dubica Górna and others at the Jewish cemetery in Wisznice.¹⁹

No inhabitants of the Wisznice ghettos are believed to have survived the war.

SOURCES Secondary sources touching on the history and destruction of the Wisznice Jewish community during World War II include Abraham Wein, Bracha Freundlich, and Wila Orbach, eds., Pinkas ha-kebilot. Encyclopaedia of Jewish Communities: Poland, vol. 7, Lublin and Kielce (Jerusalem: Yad Vashem, 1999), pp. 174–176; and Arnon Rubin, The Rise and Fall of the Jewish Communities in Poland and Their Relics Today, vol. 2, District Lublin (Tel Aviv: Tel Aviv University Press, 2007), pp. 298–300. IPN research into the German executions of Jews in and around Wisznice is summarized by Kazimierz Leszczyński, “Eksterminacja ludności na ziemiach polskich w latach 1939–1945,” Biuletyn GKBZHWP (Warsaw) 9 (1957): 223, 245.

The Web site of the Wisznice gmina, located at www.wisznice.pl, contains a local history section, titled “Dzieje Wisznice,” with the World War II coverage found under the “II wojna światowa w Wisznicach” (World War II in Wisznice) and “Pamiętniki” (Memoirs) links. The latter includes, under “Pamiętnik z II wojny światowej” (Memoir from World War II), a chronicle of the first and last days of the war written by the then-17-year-old Marian Romanowicz. The former contains an outline of the German administration in Wisznice, a brief history of the ghetto, and a link to a gallery of 17 photographs documenting the ghetto and Jewish life in and around Wisznice. Many of the same photographs appear on the Yad Vashem Web site. They also are available at USHMM, RG-05.006*01. The USHMM documentation includes captions for the photographs and a list, compiled in the fall of 1940 on the orders of sołtys Jan Michalczuk, of the names of the 834 Wisznice Jews slated to enter the ghetto. Józef Kermisz, ed., Dokumenty i materiały do dziejów okupacji niemieckiej w Polsce, vol. 2, Akcje i wysiedlenia (Łódź: CŻKHWP, 1946), pt. 1, pp. 5–7, contains an exchange between the Wisznice Jewish ghetto administration and the Jewish Affairs Officer in the Kreis Biala Podlaska BuF about the conditions under which Jews from nearby villages were consolidated in the ghetto and the responses of the Wisznice Landkommissar and the Biala Podlaska Kreishauptmann to Jewish authorities' claims the deportees were mistreated.

Documentation pertaining to the Wisznice ghetto can be found in the following archives: APL; AŻIH (210/721, 211 [132, pp. 45–47; 133, p. 36; 201, pp. 87, 91–92, 98, 100–101; 202, pp. 3–7, 13, 19–21, 23, 26, 27, 35–36, 42, 47–48, 52, 60, 66, 69; 203, pp. 19, 25, 43, 61; 204, pp. 31, 58; 205, p. 41; 206, pp. 38–38a, 79; 207, pp. 11, 42, 51, 90; 208, pp. 11, 44, 66, 72, 79; 646, p. 48; 970, pp. 1–24; 1099], 301/4417); IPN (e.g., ASG); IPN-Lu (e.g., 124/67/1-2, 126/67/1-2); USHMM (e.g., Acc.1997.A.0124 [AŻIH 211]; Acc.1999.A.0154 [AŻIH 210]; RG-05.006*01; RG-15.019M [IPN ASG] [reel 6 (18/1223-1225, 1233-1235, 1241), reel 15 (49/199)]); VHF; and YVA. The JSS materials mainly document the assistance rendered to Mława deportees in the Wisznice ghetto during what likely was the largest grassroots effort by Jews in Distrikt Lublin to assist deportees. Though the VHF index lists testimonies from survivors of the Wisznice ghetto, in fact they are almost all from survivors of Nowy Wiśnicz.

Laura Crago

NOTES

1. USHMM, Acc.1997.A.0124 (AŻIH), 211/1099, p. 13.
2. Ibid., RG-05.006*01, pp. 1–11.
3. Ibid., RG-15.019M (IPN), reel 15, 49/199.
4. Ibid., Acc.1999.A.0154 (AŻIH), 210/721, pp. 20–21.
5. Ibid., Acc.1997.A.0124, 211/646, p. 48.
6. Ibid., 211/1099, p. 21.
7. Ibid., Acc.1999.A.0154, 210/721, pp. 20–21.
8. Ibid., Acc.1997.A.0124, 211/646, p. 48.
9. Ibid., 211/970, pp. 1–24.
10. Ibid., 211/780, pp. 3–20, 24–28, 34–38, 43–50, 65–72.
11. Ibid., pp. 18–19; 211/202, pp. 13, 20, 23, 211/970, p. 12.
12. Ibid., Acc.1999.A.0154, 210/721, p. 27.
13. Ibid., Acc.1997.A.0124, 211/202, p. 69.
14. Ibid., RG-15.019M, reel 6, 18/1241, 18/1233.
15. Ibid., Acc.1997.A.0124, 211/1099, pp. 7, 21; 211/205, p. 41.
16. Ibid., 211/207, p. 51.
17. Ibid., RG-15.019M, reel 6, 18/1234-1235.
18. AŻIH, 301/4417, testimony of Icchak Frydman, pp. 1–2.
19. USHMM, RG-15.019M, reel 6, 18/1225, reel 15, 49/199.

WŁODAWA

Pre-1939: Włodawa, town, Lublin województwo, Poland; 1939–1944: Włodawa, Kreis Cholm, Distrikt Lublin, Generalgouvernement; post-1998: Włodawa, Lublin województwo, Poland

Włodawa is situated on the current Polish border with Belarus, about 100 kilometers (62 miles) northeast of Lublin. On the eve of World War II, there were 5,650 Jews living in the town.

After heavy bombing at the start of the war, German forces occupied Włodawa in mid-September 1939. Soon German security forces rounded up hundreds of Jewish men and herded them into the Great Synagogue, threatening to burn it down. However, the men were released the next day in exchange for a selected group of hostages, who were also released after a beating, as the German forces suddenly retreated.¹ The Red Army then occupied Włodawa for a few days before withdrawing again behind the Bug River in accordance with the revised terms of the Nazi-Soviet Pact. This brief interlude gave some Jews the opportunity to flee into the Soviet-occupied zone.

The Germans reoccupied the town in October, setting up a civil administration several weeks later. With the establishment of the Generalgouvernement, the town lay within Kreis Cholm, Distrikt Lublin. The Kreishauptmänner were Werner Kalmus (October 1939 to February 1940), Gerhard Hager (May 1940 to July 1941), Hans Augustin (September 1941 to March 1942), Dr. Werner Ansel (April 1942 to November 1942), Claus Harms (December 1942 to May 1944), and once more Werner Ansel (July 1944). By 1941 a Landkommissariat (local outpost) of the Kreishauptmannschaft had been established in Włodawa.² Furthermore, there was a Grenzpolizei-posten (Border Police post), which was subordinated to the Commanding Officer of the Security Police and SD (KdS) in Lublin. From late 1939, the Włodawa Border Police post was headed by SS-Untersturmführer Nitschke; his deputy from January 15, 1942, was SS-Oberscharführer Schönborn. They were responsible for the town and its surroundings, up to the village of Sobibór 11 kilometers (7 miles) to the south.³

A Jewish Council (Judenrat) was established by the German authorities in October 1939. Members of the committee were Szyja Somer (president), Abram Kahan (vice president), Szyja Lichtenberg, Rabbi Mendel Morgenstern (only for a short period), Mejr Borensztejn, Jankiel Richtman, Ignacy Bransztäter, Dr. Springer, Hersz Buchbinder, Hersz Bober, and Antoni Gruber.⁴ The Judenrat and its small Jewish police force were responsible not only for collecting money but also for providing German officials with jewelry, leather boots, furs, and other luxury items, which of course were available only on the black market.⁵

The Germans immediately instituted a series of economic measures against the Jews. In the spring of 1940, all Jewish stores were expropriated or placed under trusteeship. Thus, the Nazis rapidly proceeded with the elimination of the Jews from economic life. The Jews were also subjected to extortion: in October 1939, the community had to raise a “contribution” of 50,000 złoty within 24 hours.⁶ Early in 1942, the Kreishauptmann demanded 3 kilograms (6.6 pounds) of gold from the Włodawa Judenrat to avert a planned “resettlement Aktion.” The Jews collected the required gold, apparently delaying the Aktion by several months.⁷

At some point early in the occupation, possibly in late 1939, the Jews were removed from some of the main streets in the town and were given only 10 minutes to leave. Jewish survivor Sara Umelinsky recalls that her family had to move in with another family in a district that became the “Jewish quarter,” but she does not call it a ghetto. Other survivors also mention the existence of a Jewish quarter but do not give any details.⁸ However, in a report from May 1942, the Jewish Social Self-Help (JSS) branch in Włodawa replied negatively to a questionnaire asking whether a Jewish residential area (dzielnica żydowska) existed in the town.⁹ The survivor accounts in the yizkor book do not mention the existence of a ghetto in Włodawa until the fall of 1942.

Several waves of Jewish deportees were sent to Włodawa, which is described in at least one account as a “Judenstadt” or collection point for Jews.¹⁰ In December 1939, several hundred Jews deported from Kalisz arrived in Włodawa, where the local community had to provide them with assistance. In mid-March 1942, another train with 785 Jews (515 female and 270 male, including 283 children) arrived from Mielec in Distrikt Krakau, where the local Jewish population had been completely resettled.¹¹ A further transport saw Jews from Vienna arriving at the Bug River. The train had left Aspang station near Vienna on April 27, 1942, with 1,000 men, women, and children. Only 3 of them are known to have survived the Holocaust.¹²

The Nazi administration had a strong interest in the workforce of the local population and thus established an Arbeitsamt (labor office) soon after the conquest of Włodawa, under the supervision of Gutsche and Gröh. The office was also in charge of the Jews—or, rather, handed the responsibility for supplying workers on to the Judenrat, where Brettmehl was responsible.¹³ The Jewish Council also had to pay meager salaries and distribute food rations among the Jewish workers. Moreover, with the money received from “hiring” out ghetto inhabitants to interested companies, the council was able to organize food for the ghetto inhabitants.¹⁴ Possible jobs besides cleaning and housekeeping for Germans existed mainly at the many formerly Jewish handicraft businesses and stores, which could not easily be operated without their former owners and employees.

The largest employer in town was the German company Rohde, which conducted drainage projects for the Wasser-

Three young Jews pose at a sawmill near the Włodawa ghetto, May 20, 1942. Pictured from left to right are Ester Rajs, Isaac Ejber, and Jacob Rajs. Ester perished at Sobibór; Isaac and Jacob were resistance fighters who were killed in Adampol.

USHMM WS #07784, COURTESY OF RACHEL EJBEB BIRNBAUM

wirtschaftsamt (Water Administration Office) Chełm;¹⁵ the local executive was Bernhard Falkenberg. First, he employed 180 Jews, but by 1942 their number had increased to some 1,500. They still lived in the Jewish section of town and walked to the work site southwest of Włodawa in the morning.¹⁶ At the site, Falkenberg was known for his generosity in providing food for the Jews and especially for protecting them against abuses. The labor camp had many more Jews than were really needed for the workload there. Thus, Falkenberg was honored as a Righteous Among the Nations by Yad Vashem in 1969 for his humane treatment of the Jews working for him.¹⁷

Between May 18 and 23, 1942, Kreishauptmann Werner Ansel ordered the first anti-Jewish Aktion in Włodawa.¹⁸ About 1,300 Jews who were unable to work were forced by the German police and Ukrainian auxiliaries to assemble by the Kino Zachęta (cinema) at gunpoint. Then they were escorted to the railroad station and deported to the nearby Sobibór extermination camp, which had been erected with the assistance of 150 Jews from Włodawa.¹⁹ During the deportation Aktion, the Germans and their collaborators staged a massacre in the town, which claimed an even larger number of Jewish victims. Roughly one week later, some of the survivors wrote a coded letter to the “Oneg Shabbat” archive in Warsaw filled with biblical allusions regarding the recent deportation.²⁰

A further deportation Aktion in the summer of 1942 targeted children aged between 10 and 14. With severe violence, several hundred children were separated from their parents and transported to Sobibór. To calm them down, Rabbi Mendel Morgenstern accompanied them and went to his death with the children.²¹

In late October 1942, the Germans conducted another large-scale Aktion against the Jews of Włodawa. About a week before the Aktion, Nitschke ordered that the Jews from the surrounding villages, including Hańsk and Suchawa, and some from nearby work camps (including many malnourished German-speaking Jews) be brought to Włodawa. The town became so full that many Jews were sleeping outside in the rain. Then early in the morning of October 24, members of the SD, the Gendarmerie, Schutzpolizei, and mostly non-German auxiliaries from the Trawniki camp started arresting the Jews. They were collected in the sports stadium and then taken to the station. Only about 500 workers were exempted and allowed to remain, most of them working for Falkenberg; more than 7,000 Jews were transported to Sobibór and gassed there on arrival. At this time, more than 2,000 Jews from Chełm were marched to Sobibór via Włodawa.²²

At the end of October, the German authorities announced that Włodawa would be one of the few remaining towns in Distrikt Lublin where Jews would be permitted to reside in a “Jewish residential area” (Judenwohnbezirk). However, the purpose of this announcement was mainly to lure Jews back out of hiding.²³ A remnant ghetto was created in Włodawa, which consisted of only two streets, Wyrykowska and Jatkowska. It was directly next to a new camp that had been established to hold the more than 500 remaining Jews with work permits (craftsmen). Both camps were surrounded by high barbed-wire fences. The ghetto gradually filled up with hundreds of Jews who emerged from hiding. In one or two further Aktions at the end of October or early November, the Germans rounded up several hundred more Jews from the ghetto and deported them to Sobibór. The SS already murdered some of them at the station due to insufficient space in the railcars.²⁴

After this Aktion the Jews in the labor camp received larger monthly food rations consisting of 7.5 kilograms (16.5 pounds) of bread, 400 grams (14 ounces) of semolina, 400 grams of sugar, 400 grams of Polish poppy-bread, 200 (7 ounces) grams of jam, and 500 grams (17.6 ounces) of horsemeat. They were subjected to heavy forced labor for the Water Administration Office; getting to work required a march of 10 to 16 kilometers (6 to 10 miles). A small number of Jews were permitted to practice their old trades, but their rations were much smaller. The ghetto on Jatkowska Street continued to exist as a holding place for Jews brought in from the countryside, but conditions there were much worse. On April 30, 1943, the camp and ghetto were both liquidated, and most of the remaining Jews were deported.²⁵ Of 50 Jewish girls who were retained to sort out Jewish property from the ghetto after the Aktion, some escaped to a nearby manor, and the rest were killed on the spot shortly afterwards. Jewish Włodawa had ceased to exist. Only a few Jews managed to evade the roundups and flee to join partisan groups, for instance, the group led by Mosze Lichtenberg.²⁶ When the Red Army liberated the town in July 1944, no Jews were living there.

SOURCES There is only limited literature specifically on Włodawa during the Holocaust. Several detailed accounts of the fate of the Jewish community can be found in the yizkor book: Shimon Kants, ed., Yisker-bukh tsu Vlodave (Tel Aviv: Irgun yots’e Vlodovah vеха-sevivah be-Yisrael, 1974), which is mostly in Yiddish, with a shorter section in English. Justiz und NS-Verbrechen, vol. 20 (Amsterdam: Amsterdam University Press, 1979), Lfd. Nr. 582, contains the judgment of Landgericht Hannover issued on October 29, 1964, focused on the deportations from Włodawa.

Documents on the fate of the Jews of Włodawa can be found in the following archives: AŻIH (301/277, 2202, 2426, and 2766; 211/1109-1113); LG-Hamb (147 Ks 1/72); LG-Hann (2 Js 165/61 and 2 Ks 4/63); OKBZpNPL (Ds 16/67); USHMM (Acc.1997.A.0124 [JSS]; RG-15.084 [Relacje]; RG-50.120 # 160); VHF; and YVA (e.g., TR.11/01238; M.10. AR.1/563).

Stephan Lehnstaedt

NOTES

1. USHMM, RG-50.120 # 160, oral history with Sara Umelinsky; Kants, Yisker-bukh tsu Vlodave (English section), p. 53.
2. Bogdan Musial, Deutsche Zivilverwaltung und Judenverfolgung im Generalgouvernement. Eine Fallstudie zum Distrikt Lublin 1939–1944 (Wiesbaden: Harrassowitz, 1999), p. 93.
3. JuNS-V, vol. 20, Lfd. Nr. 582, pp. 531–532.
4. AŻIH, 301/2202, testimony of Motel Rabinowicz, p. 2; Kants, Yisker-bukh tsu Vlodave (English section), p. 33.

5. AŽIH, 301/2202, p. 2.
6. Ibid., p. 2, dates this in October 1939; Kants, Yiskerbukh tsu Vlodave (English section), p. 33, dates this in December.
7. OKBZpNPL, Ds 16/67, interview with Bernhard Falkenberg, July 16, 1965, pp. 19–20.
8. USHMM, RG-50.120 # 160; see also AŽIH, 301/2202.
9. Ibid., Acc.1997.A.0124, 211/113, p. 20.
10. AŽIH, 301/2202, p. 7.
11. USHMM, Acc.1997.A.0124, 211/113, pp. 16, 20.
12. See the doew Web site (www.doew.at/projekte/holo-caust/shoah/wlodawa.html). For the transport from Vienna, see also AŽIH, 301/2202, p. 6. About 400 of these Viennese Jews were sent across the Bug to perform forced labor in Reichskommissariat Ukraine and were shot there together with other local Jews; see BA-L, B 162, II 202 AR-Z 472/67 (Hecht investigation), Bd. I, pp. 31–38, statement of Nachum Knopmacher, June 15, 1965.
13. AŽIH, 301/2766, testimony of Leon Lemberger, September 19, 1947, p. 1. See also JuNS-V, vol. 20, Lfd. Nr. 582, p. 582.
14. AŽIH, 301/2202, p. 2.
15. This kind of work is described in AŽIH, 301/277, testimony of Jecheskiel Huberman, pp. 1–2; see also 301/2766, p. 1.
16. JuNS-V, vol. 20, Lfd. Nr. 582, p. 582. Falkenberg's assistance to Jews is mentioned, for instance, in AŽIH, 301/2766, testimony of Leon Lemberger, p. 2.
17. Daniel Fraenkel and Jakob Borut, eds., Lexikon der Gerechten unter den Völkern. Deutsche und Österreicher (Göttingen, 2005), p. 109; and Musial, Deutsche Zivilverwaltung, pp. 274–275.
18. David Silberklang, "Die Juden und die ersten Deportationen aus dem Distrikt Lublin," in Bogdan Musial, ed., "Aktion Reinhardt." Der Völkermord an den Juden im Generalgouvernement 1941–1944 (Osnabrück: Fibre, 2004), pp. 141–164, here p. 157; and Musial, Deutsche Zivilverwaltung, p. 257. For detailed descriptions of the deportation, see JuNS-V, vol. 20, Lfd. Nr. 582, pp. 532–549; and Kants, Yiskerbukh tsu Vlodave, pp. 33–38.
19. AŽIH, 301/2766, p. 1.
20. YVA, M.10.AR.1/563, letter from Włodawa to Warsaw, June 1, 1942. For a printed German version of the letter, see Silberklang, "Die Juden und die ersten Deportationen," p. 157; Hebrew and Polish versions can be found in Archiwum Ringelbluma, vol. 1, Listy o zagładzie (Warsaw, 1997), pp. 152–155.
21. AŽIH, 301/2766, p. 1. The number of deported children differs from between "at least 100" (JuNS-V, vol. 20, Lfd. Nr. 582, p. 534) and 700 (Kants, Yiskerbukh tsu Vlodave, p. 36). Compared to the overall number of inmates, 200 to 300 seems more realistic.
22. Kants, Yiskerbukh tsu Vlodave (English section), pp. 35–37; USHMM, RG-50.120 # 160; JuNS-V, vol. 20, Lfd. Nr. 582, pp. 537–538.
23. Police Decree issued by HSSPF Krüger of the Generalgouvernement, October 28, 1942, published in Tatiana Benzenstein et al., eds., Faschismus, Getto, Massenmord: Dokumentation über Ausrottung und Widerstand der Juden in Polen während des zweiten Weltkrieges (Berlin: Rütten & Loening, 1961), pp. 342–344; see also Kants, Yiskerbukh tsu Vlodave (English section), p. 38.

24. AŽIH, 301/2202, pp. 8–9.

25. Ibid., pp. 9–10; and Musial, Deutsche Zivilverwaltung, pp. 274–275.

26. AŽIH, 301/2766, p. 2. For information on the partisans, see also Kants, Yiskerbukh tsu Vlodave (English section), pp. 27–32, 79–88.

ZAKLIKÓW

Pre-1939: Zaklików, town, Lublin województwo, Poland; 1939–1944: Zaklikow, Kreis Janow Lubelski, Distrikt Lublin, Generalgouvernement; post-1998: Zaklików, Stalowa Wola powiat, województwo podkarpackie, Poland

Zaklików is located about 80 kilometers (50 miles) south-southwest of Lublin. In 1921, the Jewish population of Zaklików was 1,403.¹ Before the war, most of Zaklików's Jews lived together in the area surrounding the town's marketplace. However, some Jewish residents shared a mixed residential area bordering the forest with Poles.²

In mid-September 1939, German airplanes bombed Zaklików, inflicting several casualties. On September 18, the first German units entered the town, encountering only token resistance from 10 Polish soldiers stationed there. In reprisal for this attempted resistance, however, the Germans burned down part of the Jewish shtetl.³ Later that day soldiers of the Wehrmacht forced the Jewish population to assemble in an empty lot. They held the Jews prisoner there for several hours with their hands on their heads. The Germans killed several Jews on this occasion, chosen more or less at random. Dozens of Jews from Zaklików, mostly single males, sought refuge from the Nazis in Soviet-occupied territory during these initial days.⁴

Those who remained in Zaklików were soon subjected to a series of anti-Jewish measures. Anything of value was confiscated by the Germans and stored in the study house, then shipped to Germany. Jewish freedom of movement was severely restricted: no Jew could go out after sunset or leave the town limits; and armbands bearing the Star of David had to be worn at all times. Soon after they arrived, the German authorities ordered the establishment of a Jewish Council (Judenrat). The community chose 12 representatives who became responsible for the enforcement of German decrees and demands. The Judenrat also organized a labor office (Arbeitsamt), which had the task of selecting able-bodied men for work in the town's lumber mills and in labor camps, such as that at Janów Lubelski. The Judenrat was perceived by many Jews to be actively collaborating with the Nazi regime, but one of its members also worked for an underground resistance organization. Zalman Kuperschmidt exploited his position in the Judenrat to issue forged identity papers, which helped a number of Jews from Zaklików to survive.⁵

There was also a unit of Jewish Police, which assisted the Judenrat in meeting the quota of forced laborers and in collecting the onerous "contributions" imposed on the Jewish community by the Germans. The Jewish Police wore armbands marked “Ordnungsdienst” and applied pressure on the wealthier and more reluctant members of the community to ensure they paid their share.⁶

During 1941, Zaklików became a destination for Polish Jews driven out of other towns, considerably worsening overcrowding and living conditions. In March 1941, 400 refugees from other places in Distrikt Lublin arrived in Zaklików.⁷ On November 14, 1941, members of the Sonderdienst (ethnic German police) escorted a group of 584 Jews that came from Kraków to Zaklików and Radomyśl nad Sanem. About 200 of these deportees remained in Zaklików.⁸ By the end of 1941, there were around 2,200 Jews residing in the town.⁹

On March 15, 1941, a forced labor camp was established next to the rural settlement of Łysiaków. Poles as well as Jews from Polish territories were exploited there as forced laborers. The camp, which was headed initially by a man named Müller and later by his deputy Klau, held about 160 prisoners; during its existence nearly 700 inmates passed through it. The prisoners lived in poor conditions with no medical care. Many prisoners suffered from typhus. When it was liquidated on April 20, 1943, the Germans transferred the Polish workers, but the Jews were taken to an unknown location and murdered. The Germans then dismantled the camp.¹⁰

In Zaklików, limited rations were issued to those Jews who performed work, but these were inadequate to survive. Therefore, Jews traded remaining possessions with local Poles from the surrounding villages to obtain extra food, but “the peasants demanded exorbitant prices for their produce.”¹¹ This trade was facilitated by the fact that no fence or wall was constructed in Zaklików to contain the Jewish population. Ben Peltzman, a survivor, mentions that from October 1941 Jews who left the town without permission faced the death penalty, but he does not mention the existence of a ghetto.¹²

Under German occupation, Zaklików became part of Kreis Janow, which from August 1941 was under the control of Kreishauptmann Kurt Lenk. The main force responsible for implementing German control in Zaklików, however, was the local Gendarmerie post, headed by a brutal Gendarme named Becker. Becker frequently entered Jewish houses and took what he wanted or murdered Jews personally. The German murder and deportation of the Jews of Kreis Janow commenced in the fall of 1942. As it was located on a railway line, Zaklików, together with Kraśnik, was intended as a place where Jews were concentrated briefly from throughout the Kreis prior to their deportation by rail.¹³

On or around October 15, 1942, German SS forces assisted by Ukrainian auxiliaries entered the town and with the help of the Gendarmerie gathered all the Jews in the marketplace. Children, the sick, and the elderly were brutally murdered on the spot, as were those found in hiding. Altogether, at least 500 people were killed in and around Zaklików, and at least 1,000 were deported to be gassed at the Bełżec extermination camp.¹⁴ Excluded from the deportation were up to 500 privileged Jews, including members of the Judenrat and the Jewish Police and some craftsmen, who then had to clear the streets of corpses. At least 200 others concealed themselves successfully and emerged from hiding shortly after the Aktion. The Germans allowed them to return to their homes, granting them a very brief respite. According to Hersch Croin’s testimony, the selection of people to remain in Zaklików “was a trick to fool the local Jews who had hidden during the expulsion Aktion.”¹⁵

The German authorities announced throughout the Kreis that Zaklików would be one of two remnant ghettos along with Kraśnik, as recalled by several survivors. For example, Chaim Icek Hirschman of Janów recalled that on October 18, 1942, an order was given that the entire Janów area was to be judenrein (cleansed of Jews). All Jews had to report to Zaklików, which was to be designated a “Judenstadt.”¹⁶ Another Janów survivor recalled: “Then, all Jews were ordered to leave Janów. They were permitted to make their way either to Kraśnik or to Zaklików. I, together with my family, went to Zaklików. In Zaklików, a selection took place. Men capable of labor were separated out from the women, children, the elderly, and those recognized as incapable of work. . . . [I joined] my wife and 6-month-old son. . . . They loaded us onto a train and [we] were taken to Bełżec.”¹⁷ Peltzman recalled that the Jews of Janów were sent to Zaklików with the promise that they could create a new community there. He dates this prior to the first Aktion and gives high figures for the number deported. It is likely that Jews from Modliborzyce, where according to Jewish Social Self-Help (JSS) records also no ghetto was established, were deported to Bełżec via the Zaklików railway station around this time.¹⁸

On October 28, 1942, Zaklików was listed as the only remaining Jewish “residential area” (Judenwohnbezirk) or remnant ghetto in Kreis Janow, in an order issued by the Higher SS and Police Leader (HSSPF) in the Generalgouvernement, Friedrich-Wilhelm Krüger. This served to reinforce the (false) assurances given earlier to Jews living in the Kreis that they would not be deported.¹⁹

Shortly afterwards, however, on November 2, 1942, nearly 1,500 Jews were sent to Zaklików from Kraśnik. Then on November 3, 1942, 2,000 people were deported from Zaklików by train to the Bełżec extermination camp.²⁰ These comprised about 300 people from Zaklików, together with those just arrived from Kraśnik.²¹ During this Aktion, a number of those who tried to escape were shot immediately and subsequently buried in the Jewish cemetery; the others were loaded onto cattle cars and sent to their deaths. About 150 young and healthy Jews were selected and sent to the labor camp of Budzyń near Kraśnik. This was subsequently converted into a concentration camp, and only about 20 of these people survived.²²

Following this deportation, Zaklików was officially declared to be cleansed of Jews, and it appears no “remnant ghetto” was formed in the town.²³ Rather, Zaklików served only as a collection and selection point for the Kreis within the destruction process. Nevertheless, the Germans continued to search for Jews in hiding. For example, later in November 1942, the Gendarmerie killed M. Magier, a Jew who had been able to hide until that point. His remains were buried in the forest close to the town.²⁴

In 1947, only about 200 Jews from Zaklików remained alive, most of them having fled to the interior of the Soviet Union in 1939–1941. More than 30 survived the German occupation in Budzyń and various other forced labor and concentration camps. Nearly all of the survivors left Poland shortly after the war to start a new life in Israel or other countries in the West.

SOURCES Information regarding the history of the Jewish community of Zaklików can be found in the following publications: Joshua Laks, I Was There: Zaklików, a Small Town to Remember (Tel Aviv: Y. Laks, 2005); Abraham Wein, Bracha Freundlich, and Wila Orbach, eds., Pinkas ha-kehillot. Encyclopaedia of Jewish Communities: Poland, vol. 7, Lublin and Kielce (Jerusalem: Yad Vashem, 1999), pp. 213–215; and Arnon Rubin, The Rise and Fall of the Jewish Communities in Poland and Their Relics Today, vol. 2, District Lublin (Tel Aviv: Tel Aviv University Press, 2007), pp. 308–310.

Documentation on the persecution and destruction of the Jewish community of Zaklików can be found in the following archives: AŻIH (301/27, 275, 1476, 2544, 3050; 211/704, 1142); BA-BL (R 102II/31); CAHJP (HM/6709-11); IPN (ASG; Ankieta OK Lublin, Ds 224/70/Kraś.); ITS; USHMM (RG-15.019M, reel 15; Hersh Croin Memoir: “The Last Act,” 2005.341; Larry Rosenbach papers, 2005.169.1); VHF; and YVA (e.g., M-1/E/1630; O-53/82; O-3/4242).

Caterina Crisci and Martin Dean

NOTES

1. Laks, I Was There, p. 18.
2. Ibid., pp. 20–21.
3. AŻIH, 301/3050, testimony of Ben Peltzman.
4. Laks, I Was There, pp. 293–295.
5. Ibid., pp. 297–300; and AŻIH, 301/3050.
6. Laks, I Was There, p. 301; and AŻIH, 301/3050.
7. Wein, Freundlich, and Orbach, Pinkas ha-kehillot: Poland, vol. 7, Lublin and Kielce, p. 215.
8. BA-BL, R 102II/31, Gendarmerie Post Zaklików to Kreishauptmann Janow Lubelski, November 15, 1941, and Kreishauptmann Janow Lubelski to Main Department Internal Administration, BuF, November 18, 1941.
9. Rubin, The Rise and Fall, vol. 2, p. 309.
10. RG-15.019M, reel 15, p. 54.
11. Laks, I Was There, pp. 303–307. A ration card is reproduced on p. 303.
12. AŻIH, 301/3050; see also Verordnung des Generalgouverneurs Frank, Warsaw, October 15, 1941, Verordnungsblatt GG (1941) Nr. 99, p. 595, reprinted in Tatiana Berenstein et al., eds., Faschismus, Getto, Massenmord: Dokumentation über Ausrottung und Widerstand der Juden in Polen während des zweiten Weltkrieges (Berlin: Rütten & Loening, 1961), pp. 128–129. Rubin, The Rise and Fall, vol. 2, p. 309, also states there was no ghetto in Zaklików.
13. Laks, I Was There, pp. 309–313; Becker was subsequently murdered by the partisans on one of his regular visits to Kraśnik. AŻIH, 301/2544, testimony of Henryk Proper; 301/1476, testimonies of Chaim and Pola Hirszman, indicates that Jews from Janów Lubelski were deported via Zaklików.
14. Laks, I Was There, pp. 316–319. AŻIH, 301/3050, appears to give the figure of 2,000 people deported. Also see David Silberklang, “The Holocaust in the Lublin District” (Ph.D. diss., Hebrew University, Jerusalem, February 2003), p. 280.

15. Laks, I Was There, pp. 321–322; USHMM, 2005.341, Hersh Croin Memoir: “The Last Act.”

16. AŻIH, 301/27, testimony of Chaim Icek Hirszman; see also 301/3050.

17. Ibid., 301/1476.

18. Ibid., 301/3050. 211/704, p. 22, the local JSS branch reported in April 1942 that there was no ghetto in Modliborzyce, noting also that 670 Jews from Vienna arrived there on March 7, 1941, raising the Jewish population to 2,218 in April 1942. RG-15.019M, reel 5, p. 436, refers to Jews from Vienna, Modliborzyce, Janów, and other surrounding towns being shot and buried at the Jewish cemetery in Zaklików in early October 1942 [sic]—this probably refers to the Aktions in mid-October and early November.

19. Polizeiverordnung des Höheren SS- und Polizeiführers Krüger über die Errichtung von Judenwohnbezirken, October 28, 1942, published in Berenstein et al., Faschismus, Getto, Massenmord, pp. 342–344.

20. Silberklang, “The Holocaust in the Lublin District,” p. 281.

21. Laks, I Was There, p. 319.

22. AŻIH, 301/3050.

23. This is the opinion of Dieter Pohl, Von der “Judenpolitik” zum Judenmord. Der Distrikt Lublin des Generalgouvernements 1939–1944 (Frankfurt am Main: Peter Lang, 1993), p. 136. Remnant ghettos were formed in the other places listed on the October 28 order.

24. IPN, Ankieta OK Lublin, “Egzekucje,” Zaklików, pow. Kraśnik: OK Lublin, Ds 222/70/Kraś.

ZAMOŚĆ

Pre-1939: Zamość (Yiddish: Zamoshtsh), town, Zamość powiat, Lublin województwo, Poland; 1939–1944: Zamosc, Kreis center, Distrikt Lublin, Generalgouvernement; post-1998: Zamość, Lublin województwo, Poland

Zamość lies 85 kilometers (53 miles) southeast of Lublin. Before World War II, its 12,531 Jews formed the third largest Jewish community in the Lublin region.

On September 13, 1939, a Wehrmacht unit occupied Zamość but ceded it after 12 days to advancing Soviet forces. After a September 28 border renegotiation placed Zamość under German occupation, 7,000 to 8,000 Jews joined the Red Army’s October 5–6 evacuation behind the Bug River.

Upon reoccupying Zamość on October 8, 1939, Wehrmacht soldiers humiliated, robbed, and terrorized Jews. German police desecrated the two synagogues and several prayer houses. The violence ebbed from October 12, when military authorities ordered stores reopened. The Jews were subject to forced labor, made compulsory on October 26. Marking decrees, first issued in late November, required adult Jews by December to wear a white armband with a blue Star of David. From December, a series of Distrikt-wide and local orders confiscated Jewish businesses and property.

In mid-October 1939, the local Gestapo office and the German mayor ordered a Jewish Council of Elders established. In January 1940, it was transformed into a 24-member Jewish Council (Judenrat). Attorney Mieczysław (Mendel) Garfinkel served as council chair. The council established eight departments: food supply, post office, registration office, labor, welfare services for labor camp inmates, taxes, vital statistics, and finance. It recruited a group of so-called strong arms (shtarken) to round up forced laborers and to confiscate property that the Germans demanded, including by early 1940 some 235,000 złoty.¹ In mid-1941, the council organized a 10-person Jewish police force. Dawid Garfinkel, its first commander, was the Jewish Council chair's brother.

On December 19, 1939, some 556 Jewish expellees arrived from Włocławek. Helmuth Weißenmaier, the Kreishauptmann of Zamosc, ordered 150 men from the transport imprisoned, pending an expulsion to Soviet-occupied Poland. Around January 15, 1940, the prisoners were resettled in Szczepieszyn. Seventeen expellees, returning to Zamość to join their families, were arrested the next day, probably by a unit commanded by Sturmbannführer Fritz, the head of the local SS office. The men were murdered outside the SS barracks, located at the former agricultural school in Janowice Małe, a western Zamość suburb. Garfinkel recalled the killings were the first great tragedy to befall the Jewish community during the German occupation.²

The January 1, 1940, census counted 5,000 Jews, including 1,000 refugees. Among the latter were expellees from Włocławek, Koło (175), and Łódź (100). By January 1941, the Jewish population had expanded to 7,626, as natives returned home; locals displaced by war devastation moved from Biłgoraj, Frampol, Janów Lubelski, Krasnobród, Tyszowce, and other devastated places; and refugees arrived from farther away, including from Częstochowa, Łódź, and Warsaw.

Most Jews fulfilled forced labor obligations by reporting daily to what ultimately were 10 different labor camps. (Hundreds of other Jews were interned at many of these same camps.) From June until November 1940, the Zamość Water Regulation Office (Wasserwirtschaftsamt) interned 550 men at two labor camps: 250 in Bortatycze (also called the Białobrzegi camp) and 350 at the cavalier (kawaler), located in Zamość's pre-war garrison. The SS ordered another 150 conscripts to report to Janowice to retrofit its barracks. In the fall of 1940, the Luftwaffe, in preparation for the invasion of the Soviet Union (June 22, 1941), opened the Air Force Construction Office (Bauleitung der Luftwaffe) and a Jewish labor camp. In mid-October 1940, it moved the camp to the Planty neighborhood, expanded the inmate population from 300 to 800, and assumed control for all Jewish labor in Zamość and at its airfield and hangar construction sites in Mokre (150 Zamość laborers), Łabunie (200 to 300), Klemensów, and Oszczów. Though Luftwaffe authorities set labor priorities, the SS and their collaborators exercised day-to-day authority at the camps, with the exception of a Planty-area camp the Wehrmacht had established in November.³

In early April 1941, the city was placarded with posters ordering the Jews to move by May 1 into a ghetto in the New Town (Nowa Osada), the poorer of Zamość's two Jewish neighborhoods. Because many Jews already resided there, the orders in practice required residents of the wealthier Old Town (Stare Miasto) Jewish neighborhood and a few hundred Jews in other neighborhoods to report to the ghetto.

Before the ghetto's establishment, German authorities expelled most of the Warthegau deportees from Zamość. On April 5, the SS transferred 400 expellees to Komarów. On April 8, Polish (Blue) Police escorted another 248 expellees to Krasnobród. The head of the Jewish Social Self-Help (JSS) organization in Komarów reported the expellees, from Włocławek, Koło, and Łódź, had been cleared from the New Town to make room for wealthier native Jews. On May 1, the SS transferred to Komarów another 250 Jews who had refused to report to the ghetto.⁴

The Zamość ghetto was an unfenced open ghetto. A June 11, 1941, curfew order established the railway line on Lwów Street as the boundary separating the ghetto from the adjoining Old Town.

Because the neighborhood's Polish inhabitants were not expelled and could come and go as they pleased, food was more plentiful and cheaper than in most ghettos. To sell rations to the 7,500 to 8,000 Jews in the ghetto and to finance some of its undertakings, the Jewish Council opened five bakeries, three food distribution points, and a butcher's shop. German authorities permitted some 50 to 64 Jewish enterprises. Those established in the ghetto were mainly restaurants, where the wealthier could supplement rations, limited to potatoes, bread (3.1 kilograms [6.8 pounds] for July 1941), and occasionally sugar. A restaurant opened by the wife of SS informant Herman (Hilel) Goldhamer became legendary for its offerings of unobtainable meats and fish. The Jewish Council sometimes met there.⁵ Unable to afford such luxuries, most Jews bartered their possessions for food, usually with Polish acquaintances in the ghetto.

The ghetto's mainly wooden houses lacked indoor plumbing. Most had no outdoor latrines. There was nowhere to bathe, as the mikveh located within the ghetto's borders had been destroyed in a pre-war fire. From May 1941, Garfinkel attempted to renovate the structure. Only in late August did authorities consent to purchases of necessary plumbing materials.⁶

As renovations were under way, a late summer typhus outbreak became an epidemic by October 1941. To treat the sick, the Jewish Council, on September 26, opened a 60-bed hospital for infectious diseases. By October 22, the Kreishauptmann forbade Jews from leaving the ghetto and non-Jews from entering. Posters on the ghetto's outskirts warned: "Typhus! Entry Forbidden!"⁷ Some 16 of 279 hospital patients perished, including two Jewish Council members. The overburdened local JSS organization, led also by Garfinkel, shuttered its community kitchen on September 18, leaving some 1,000 impoverished without a daily meal.

The completion of the bathhouse in November 1941, shipments of medicine from JSS headquarters in Kraków, and the Kreishauptmann's onetime consent for the Jewish Council to retain 2,000 złoty in rent payments to purchase medicine and disinfection products controlled the spread of the epidemic by December, when the ghetto reopened.⁸ The community kitchen also was reestablished. In November, the JSS increased from 120 to 130 the number of impoverished children enrolled and fed at a day-care center, established in June. The children daily received for breakfast milk or milky coffee and bread with marmalade or artificial honey and the community kitchen's daily midday meal.

The Luftwaffe expanded the Jewish labor force, mainly by doubling the number of seasonal Wasserwirtschaftsamt (Water Regulation Office) camps and sending women there to cultivate and harvest vegetables for German military units stationed in the area.⁹ In Zamość, about 200 artisans (40 percent of the pre-war figure) received licenses to work in their trades. Some 60 craft workshops operated. Most were tailoring and shoemaking enterprises. From July 1941, the SS expected the Jews to finance and to transform its Janowice compound into an opulent equestrian and driving school. The Jewish Council requisitioned sequestered building supplies from ghetto residents, purchased other materials, and paid 4 złoty daily to hundreds of Jewish laborers and craftsmen and higher wages to non-Jewish masons it also employed. The 1.5 million złoty the council spent for the project by October 1942 was one of the largest Jewish property expropriations to occur during the ghetto's existence.¹⁰

About 300 to 500 additional Jews were resettled in the ghetto. In May 1941, 78 deportees arrived from Częstochowa.¹¹ On November 10, the entire Jewish population of Wysokie was expelled to the Oszczów labor camp and transferred from there in mid-December to the ghetto. Because the Wysokie Jewish Council oversaw some 200 Jewish residents (60 families) living in areas bordering Zamość (specifically in the pre-war Wysokie, Stary Zamość, and Skierbieszów gminy), the expulsion in practice cleared all Jews from northern and northwestern villages located within an approximately 10- to 20-kilometer (6- to 12.5-mile) radius of the city.¹²

In late 1941, a cryptic letter received by a ghetto resident indicated the remaining Jews in Koło had been gassed at the Chełmno extermination center.¹³ When 18,000 Jews from Lublin were sent to the Bełżec extermination facility between March 17 and 28, 1942, Jewish Council members from Lublin called Garfinkel to inquire about their fates. Garfinkel discovered from Jewish officials in localities closer to the railway line used for the transports that 10,000 to 20,000 Jews daily arriving at Bełżec perished in "mysterious" circumstances. Garfinkel facilitated the return to Lublin of some Bełżec escapees. However, he did not believe the reports, even subsequently from a Zamość eyewitness, and kept his discovery quiet.¹⁴

On April 11, 1942, at around 1:00 P.M., local Gestapo staff, led by Hauptsturmführer Gotthard Schubert, demanded the Jewish Council immediately assemble for deportation some 2,500 people at the New Town market square. Late that afternoon, the German military police and the Gestapo, including Fritz's cavalry unit, joined the Jewish Police and some Judenrat members in rounding up expellees. At about 9:00 P.M., the Jews were marched to the cargo railway dock (the so-called beet platform), located between Peowiak and Orlicz-Dreszer Streets (by the Luftwaffe Construction Camp), and locked into railway cars. At midnight, the expellees were sent to the Bełżec extermination camp. Approximately 250 to 520 Jews were killed during the Aktion. Another 2,000 to 2,900 were gassed at Bełżec.¹⁵ After the deportation, some 4,000 Jews remained in the ghetto.

On April 30 and May 2, 1942, about 2,000 Czech Jews, mainly from Prague, arrived in two transports from the ghetto in Terezín (Theresienstadt). On May 3, some 800 deportees were escorted to Komarów. That day, another 800 German Jews arrived from the Dortmund and Düsseldorf areas.¹⁶ Transport leader Alwin Lippman, a decorated World War I officer and pilot who had served with Göring in the Richthofen squadron (officially, Fliegerabteilung 69), replaced Garfinkel as the commander of the Jewish Police. The force was doubled to 20 men.

On May 17, 1942, the Jewish Council required that the elderly be "resettled" in what survivors remember as the "Old People's Aktion."¹⁷ That day, the Jewish Police began rounding up the elderly from lists and incarcerating them in makeshift prisons. As the Aktion was ongoing, the Arbeitsamt on May 24 ordered all Jews to stand before a German civilian commission to determine their fitness for labor. Jewish-Czech Police from Izbica (nad Wieprzem) assisted the commission. Some 400 to 500 people deemed unable to work (mainly women and children) were imprisoned. Among the growing inmate population were some 950 Reich and Protectorate expellees.¹⁸ Deportees from Komarów, Tyszowce, Krasnobród, and other nearby localities were brought to Zamość and similarly imprisoned. On May 27, some 5,000 Jewish prisoners were subdivided into groups, marched separately to the beet platform, and loaded onto a train, which made three trips to transport the expellees to the Sobibór killing center.

On August 11, 1942, members of the Lublin Gestapo, commanded by Amon Göth, ordered some 2,000 Jews expelled from the ghetto. After just 250 people appeared, Göth ordered assembled instead inmates from the city's labor camps and Jewish Council and Judenrat employees. Garfinkel bribed Göth to cease the Aktion. That day, 70 Jews were shot on the spot. Another 350 were sent to Majdanek.¹⁹

On September 1, 1942, the Jews were confined to five streets in the New Town, from which Poles were expelled. To stave off deportation, the Jewish Council secured consent to transform the ghetto into a closed labor camp.²⁰ The council ordered fencing, and laborers started enclosing the ghetto. In early September, some 400 nonregistered ghetto residents were sent to their deaths at Bełżec.

On October 16, 1942, the ghetto liquidation began. Gestapo members Kolb and Lagenkampfer shot dead 60 patients and personnel at the hospital. The approximately 2,000 surviving ghetto residents were informed that Zamość soon would be transferred to SS authority and ghetto residence limited to the organization's urban conscripts, mainly craftsmen. The remaining Jews, including all the surviving Jewish Council members, were to be marched immediately to Izbica, where the Wehrmacht would establish a labor camp.²¹ Some 150 Jews were murdered during the march. In Izbica, the Zamość deportees, except for those who hid or fled, were enveloped by the October 19 deportation, during which some 5,000 Jews were sent to Bełżec and Sobibór.²²

Almost all 300 Jews left behind in the Zamość ghetto were executed on November 20, 1942. In mid-March 1943, the ghetto, by then a single house, was liquidated. Its residents were interned at the Luftwaffe Construction Camp. On May 31, the camp's 400 inmates (including 53 women) were sent by truck to Majdanek.

About 70 Jews survived the Zamość ghetto. Among them were Mieczysław and Dawid Garfinkel; Roszia Luft (Rose Warner) and Mordechaj Sztrygler, transferred, respectively, in August 1942 and May 1943 to Majdanek; Lea Reisner, a survivor of the October 1943 Sobibór uprising; and about 20 Czech deportees.

At a postwar trial in Wiesbaden, Schubert was sentenced to six years' imprisonment.

SOURCES Adam Kopciowski, the coauthor of this entry, has written Zagłada Żydów w Zamościu (Lublin: Wydawnictwo UMCS, 2005), a history of the Jews in Zamość during the German occupation. The work contains an impressive multilingual bibliography. Kopciowski also has authored several smaller English-language summaries, including one published in the introduction to Everlasting Name: Zamość Ghetto Population List, 1940, 2nd ed. (Tel-Aviv: Israeli Organization of Zamość Jewry & Their Descendants, 2007). The list mentioned in the title was from the January 1940 census of the Zamość Jewish population. The book's front pieces include an English translation of the testimony of Fiszelson, a former Zamość ghetto resident, found after the war in the Ringelblum archives, from AŻIH, [1059] Ring I/946, pp. 1–12.

English-language testimonies published by survivors include Moshe Frank, To Survive and Testify: Holocaust Traumas of a Jewish Child from Zamosc, trans. Shaul Rosner (Tel Aviv: ha-Kibuts ha-me'uhad, [1998]), originally published in Hebrew as Le-hišared ule-baid teraumat ha-Shoah shel yeled Yebudi mi-Zamoshets (Tel Aviv: Bet loḥame ha-geṭaot, 1993); Gary Keins, A Journey through the Valley of Perdition (Gary Keins, 1985); "Henryk [Garfinkel] Lewandowski," in Wiktoria Śliwowska, ed., The Last Eyewitnesses: Children of the Holocaust Speak, trans. Julian Bussgang and Fay Bussgang (Evanston, IL: Northwestern University Press, 1998), vol. 1, pp. 97–99; and the testimony of Lea Reisner-Bialowitz, in Miriam Novitch, ed., Sobibór, Martyrdom, and Revolt: Documents and Testimonies (New York: Holocaust Library and Schocken Books, 1980). The testimony of Sara Rozen is available electronically, under her married name Christine Damski, on the Web site of the Humboldt State University as part of a larger project titled "To Save a Life: Stories of Holocaust Rescue."

The yizkor book, Mordechai W. Bernstein, ed., Pinkes Zamoshtsh: Yizker-bukh nokh der farsbnitener durkh di natsis (Buenos Aires: Tsentral-komitet far Pinkes Zamoshtsh, 1957), also contains testimonies from survivors. Important too are Grzegorz Pawłowski (Szepsel "Zvi" Jacob Hersz Griner), "Moje życie," Tygodnik Powszechny, nos. 15–16 (1966) and no. 11 (1967); and the substantial excerpts of the AŻIH 302 testimonies from Moshe Frank and Mieczysław Garfinkel published in the chapter devoted to Zamość in Michał Grynberg and Maria Kotowska, eds., Życie i zagłada Żydów polskich, 1939–1945: Relacje świadków (Warsaw: Oficyna Naukowa, 2003), pp. 134–159. Testimonies from Czech deportees include those published by Jan Osers, "Flucht aus Zamosc," and Lukáš Příbyl, "Die Geschichte der Flucht von 'As 232' und 'As 233' aus Zamosc," both in Theresienstädter Studien und Dokumente, respectively, no. 5 (1998): 288–321 and no. 9 (2002): 252–271. Information about Alwin Lippman comes from the memoir of the Izbica ghetto survivor Thomas Toivi Blatt, From the Ashes of Sobibor: A Story of Survival (Evanston, IL: Northwestern University Press, 1997), pp. 59–62.

Contemporary press coverage includes "Zamość," Gazeta Żydowska, October 26, 1941, no. 103, p. 2.

Justiz und NS-Verbrechen, vol. 38 (Amsterdam: Amsterdam University Press, 2008), Lfd. Nr. 790, covers the postwar investigations and trials of several former Gestapo members assigned to Zamość during the deportations, including most notably Gotthard Schubert. This same material is covered archivally in the entry through the documentation held by Polish investigators, located at IPN-Lu, 3/67.

Additional relevant documentation can be found in the following archives: APL (RŻwZ); AŻIH (e.g., 210/741, 211/1147-1152, 301 [111, 1297, 2284, 4605, 5391, 5404, 5581, 5785, 5951, 5953, 5965], 302 [81, 122], Ring [(1199) I/378, (1481) I/596 a f g, (1482) I/583 a]); BA-L (LG-Wies, 8 Ks 1/70); FVA; IPN (e.g., 2-ob [Bełżec, Mieczysław Garfinkel deposition], 188, ASG, SOZ [41, 96]); IPN-Lu (e.g., 3/67/1-10, 51/67/1-2, 98/67/1-5, 265/67/1-2, 284/383/1-2, 328/67/1-2, 354/67/1-2, 399/67/1-3, 400/67/1-2, 401/67/1-2); USHMM (e.g., Acc.1997.A.0124 [AŻIH 211]; Acc.1999.A.0154 [AŻIH 210]; RG-15.019M [IPN ASG] [reel 6 (18/1336, 1339-1340, 1346, 1347-1348), reel 15 (49/201, 203, 207-208)]; RG-15.056M [APL RŻwZ]; RG-15.068M [IPN 188]; RG-15.079M [AŻIH Ring]; RG-50.030*0270; RG-50.549.02*58); VHF; and YVA (e.g., M-1/E/1287, O-3/2985).

Adam Kopciowski and Laura Crago

NOTES

1. AŻIH, 302/122, testimony of Mieczysław Garfinkel, pp. 4–5.
2. Ibid., pp. 7–8.
3. Ibid., 301/5404, anonymous testimony, p. 1.
4. USHMM, Acc.1997.A.0124, 211/553, p. 1; 211/135, p. 42; Bernstein, Pinkes Zamoshtsh, p. 943 (testimony of Y. Tsvilikh); AŻIH, 302/122, pp. 10–12.
5. Bernstein, Pinkes Zamoshtsh, pp. 936–937, 946 (Tsvilikh).
6. USHMM, Acc.1997.A.0124, 211/1150, pp. 32–34, 38, 41.
7. Ibid., 211/1151, pp. 16, 28, 35; AŻIH, 302/122, p. 18.
8. USHMM, Acc.1997.A.0124, 211/1151, pp. 14, 35, 47–48.
9. AŻIH, 301/4605, testimony of Lejzor Rochman, pp. 1–2; 301/5581, testimony of Franciszka Srebnogórska (Frajda Fink), p. 2.

10. Ibid., 302/122, pp. 27–29; IPN, 2-ob (Bełżec), Mieczysław Garfinkiel deposition, p. 4; YVA, O-3/2985, testimony of Hedda (Rubinsohn) Arnold, pp. 24–25.
11. USHMM, Acc.1997.A.0124, 211/1149, p. 11.
12. Ibid., 211/1151, pp. 46, 64; 211/1152, p. 5; 211/1137, p. 3.
13. YVA, M-1/E/1287, testimony of Boruch Wilder, pp. 12–13.
14. AŻIH, 302/122, p. 34; IPN, 2-ob (Bełżec), Garfinkiel, p. 1.
15. AŻIH, 302/122, pp. 35–38; Bernstein, Pinkes Zamoshtsb, pp. 949–951 (Tsvilikh); IPN-Lu, 3/67, pp. 39, 69.
16. USHMM, Acc.1997.A.0124, 211/1152, p. 34.
17. Bernstein, Pinkes Zamoshtsb, pp. 951–953 (Tsvilikh).
18. AŻIH, 301/5404, pp. 2–3; 302/122, p. 41.
19. Ibid., 302/122, pp. 42–43.
20. Ibid., 301/5581, p. 5.
21. Ibid., 301/5404, pp. 4–5; 301/4605, pp. 2–3.
22. Ibid., 302/122, pp. 44–46; 301/5953, testimony of Stefan Sendlak, p. 8.; Bernstein, Pinkes Zamoshtsb, pp. 961–962 (Tsvilikh).

ZWIERZYNIEC

Pre-1939: Zwierzyniec, town, Zamość powiat, Lublin województwo, Poland; 1939–1944: Kreis Bilgoraj, Distrikt Lublin, Generalgouvernement; post-1998: Zamość powiat, Lublin województwo, Poland

Zwierzyniec lies about 94 kilometers (58.4 miles) south-southeast of Lublin. In August 1939, some 2,050 Jews lived in Zwierzyniec (total population, approximately 4,000) and the neighboring village Rudka.

On September 18, 1939, a Wehrmacht unit occupied Zwierzyniec for less than a day before moving on to confront Polish forces near Tomaszów Lubelski. Shortly thereafter, Soviet forces occupied Zwierzyniec. When a September 28 border renegotiation returned Zwierzyniec to German occupation, as many as half the Jewish residents of Zwierzyniec and Rudka joined the October 5 regional Soviet military evacuation behind the Bug River.¹ A few days later, the Germans reoccupied Zwierzyniec.

In early 1940, Zwierzyniec was attached to Kreis Bilgoraj, headed from October 1939 until March 1942 by Kreishauptmann (and Landwirt of Bilgoraj) Werner Ansel. In April, Hans Augustin, previously the Cholem Kreishauptmann, succeeded Ansel. In Zwierzyniec, the Germans appointed a local Polish collaborationist administration, led by Józef Paszkowski, the pre-war wójt (mayor). In practice, a trustee or manager (Treuhänder) appointed by the Governor of Distrikt Lublin oversaw the Zamoyski properties and exercised day-to-day authority. In December 1941, Ernst Streit, the first Treuhänder of the holdings, was arrested. Walter Bünsch replaced him. Deprived of almost all his properties, Zamoyski soon organized and chaired what the Germans, in January 1940, officially recognized as the Polish Welfare (Assistance)

Councils for Zamość, then from February 1940, for Biłgoraj powiaty. (That same month, the Germans banned Jewish participation on the councils and Polish-Christian Council members from providing food assistance to Jews.)

The Germans transformed Zwierzyniec into a retreat for high-ranking military officers and for the visiting Nazi elite. The hunting lodge was designated an officer's club. Some buildings on the estate were used for a German hospital and medical clinic. From January 1940, Nazi leaders, including Hans Frank, the head of the Generalgouvernement, arrived to hunt the rare pheasants and other birds at the preserve.²

The prominent officials and military personnel living at and visiting the estate probably were responsible for the Jewish residents of Zwierzyniec being confined to a ghetto. The Zwierzyniec ghetto may have been the only officially recognized ghetto in Kreis Bilgoraj before April 1942, the date by which the Jewish Social Self-Help (JSS) organization expected its local branches to return a ghetto questionnaire. Zwierzyniec was the only JSS branch in the Kreis known to have responded positively on the questionnaire.³ (Not all the records of the various branches have survived intact.) In September 1941, Kreishauptmann Ansel nonetheless excluded Zwierzyniec from a list of ghettos he was required to submit to Distrikt-level authorities in Lublin. Ansel, in fact, claimed no ghettos existed in Kreis Bilgoraj. He maintained that only in Biłgoraj proper was Jewish residence limited to several streets. Because the list was prepared in response to a Reich Interior Department inquiry about available space for incoming Jews, Ansel (and Bünsch) may have excluded Zwierzyniec to prevent additional Jews from being resettled there.

Unfortunately, neither physician Leopold Reidler nor (Mordecai) "Mordka" Erbesfeld, the leaders of the Zwierzyniec JSS, provided a date for the ghetto's establishment on the questionnaire. The first known reference to the ghetto (dzielnica żydowska) in JSS records comes from July 1941.⁴ The ghetto may have been established during what diarist Zygmunt Klukowski described as a pogrom, launched by an SS unit on June 1, 1941, the Christian feast day of Pentecost (Whitsun), against Jews in neighboring Rudka. That day, the SS killed three Jews, beat several scores more, and destroyed or confiscated all the possessions of the Rudka Jews.⁵ Unfortunately, Klukowski did not recall whether the Rudka Jews were evicted to a newly established ghetto in Zwierzyniec.

Erbesfeld described the Zwierzyniec ghetto as an unfenced, open ghetto. He did not provide its exact location. He only noted the ghetto occupied a pre-war Jewish neighborhood. JSS financial records, for March, suggest the mikveh was located within the ghetto's boundaries.⁶ In July 1941, the ghetto population stood at 544, including at least 73 refugees. Among the latter were December 1939 deportees from Kalisz, Katowice, Łódź, and Poznań. The ghetto population also included a number of voluntary transplants from Lublin, Pruszków, and Warsaw.⁷

Little is known about the Jewish administration in the ghetto. Reidler described the Jewish Council (Judenrat)

members as belonging to the pre-war Zwierzyniec elite, all merchants, known neither for their charity nor moral virtue.⁸ In response to a mid-March 1942 mandate from the county medical director, the JSS established a sanitation force to maintain hygiene standards.⁹

On July 26, 1941, JSS officials in a telegram reported a fire, the previous night, had destroyed part of the ghetto and appealed to charity leaders in Kraków for immediate assistance for 80 to 200 people left homeless after 15 homes burned down.¹⁰ The fire makes it difficult to ascertain the number of residences included in the ghetto. Erbesfeld on the questionnaire described the ghetto as composed of 20 homes (60 rooms), making it likely that 35 residences initially were designated for the ghetto. Though 6 people on average lived in each available room, Reidler reported just 10 cases of typhus in 1941 and none in the first quarter of 1942.¹¹

The Zwierzyniec ghetto inmates were conscripted for labor at the sawmill and lumber yard on the former Zamoyski estate.¹² Others repaired and expanded the roads leading from Zwierzyniec to Biłgoraj and to Szczepieszyn. Most matzevot in the cemetery were used on the project. The road construction crews worked for Organisation Todt (OT), which in the spring of 1940 established an encampment (initially mostly for German employees) in the Zamoyski (Zwierzyniec) Forest. The Jewish road construction crews eventually were housed in two of six barracks erected at the camp. In June 1941, some 280 ghetto residents were interned at labor camps established in the pre-war gmina, including at the OT camp, in barracks at the lumber yard and sawmill, and at several camps the Luftwaffe established on former Zamoyski properties to build air bases and a flight training school. Another 16 Jews worked as craftsmen, mainly at four workshops established in the ghetto for painting, carpentry, tailoring, and shoemaking. Each workshop employed no more than 4 people.¹³

From the spring of 1942, several small groups of Jews, usually of two or three, were arrested and executed at the Jewish cemetery or at a mass grave located in the so-called Borek Woods.

By mid-May, the ghetto population had experienced a 172-person decline. As the postwar Polish Court Inquiries about Executions, Mass Graves, Camps, and Ghettos (ASG) records for Zwierzyniec indicate, relatively small numbers of Jews were executed, and an intermediate deportation probably occurred, perhaps in conjunction with the May 1942 expulsion of part of the Szczepieszyn Jews to the Bełżec killing center.¹⁴ Because French prisoners of war (POWs), transferred in the spring of 1942 from Stalag 325 in Rawa Ruska and housed at the OT camp, filled the places of Jewish labor conscripts at the lumber yard, the sawmill, and on road construction crews, the 372 Jews held back for labor in Zwierzyniec probably were mainly craftsmen, their families, and others providing services deemed essential to estate operations. Another deportation occurred on August 9, 1942, with the expulsion of 500 to 1,000 Jews from Biłgoraj to the Zwierzyniec railway station and their deportation from there to Bełżec. Stanisław Bohdanowicz, a local Polish-Christian, recalled that the Germans also ordered the Zwierzyniec Jews deported that day. However, the Jewish Council staved off a total expulsion by offering a bribe of gold. Some 52 Zwierzyniec Jews were added to the Biłgoraj expulsion.

On October 21, 1942, Security Police stationed in Biłgoraj and SS Latvian and Lithuanian auxiliaries liquidated the ghetto. They ordered the 300 to 320 Jews immediately assembled at the square. Many Jews were killed attempting to evade expulsion. Another 100 were shot during the march to Szczepieszyn. Upon arrival, at around 9:00 p.m., the survivors were imprisoned in the buildings of the Alwa factory, along with most of the remaining Jews in Szczepieszyn. At noon, on October 22, the Jews were marched to the railway station, forced onto wagons, and transported to Bełżec, where they were gassed on arrival.¹⁵

There are believed to have been no survivors of the Zwierzyniec ghetto.

SOURCES No secondary work has ever before mentioned the Germans confining the Jewish community of Zwierzyniec to a ghetto. Unfortunately, secondary sources providing coverage of the fate of the Zwierzyniec community during World War II remain limited to Polish-language sources including the larger survey of the war offered by Krzysztof Czubara, "Zwierzyniec w latach II wojny światowej (1939–1944)," Zamoyski Kwartalnik Kulturalny, no. 3 (92) (2007): 17–29, which is available electronically at the journal's Web site.

Stanisław Bohdanowicz, "Likwidacja Żydów ze Zwierzynicy," in Zygmunt Klukowski, ed., Wydawnictwo materiałów do dziejów Zamojszczyzny w latach wojny 1939–1944, vol. 2, Zamojszczyzna w walce z Niemcami (Zamość: N.p., 1946), pp. 77–86, is from a Polish-Christian eyewitness of the Zwierzyniec expulsions. Historian Martin Gilbert had a part of the Bohdanowicz testimony translated into English and published it subsequently in The Holocaust: A History of the Jews of Europe during the Second World War (New York: Henry Holt and Company 1986), pp. 408–409, but did not realize its origins and therefore improperly attributes it. Klukowski, the editor of the document collection containing the Bohdanowicz testimony, also is the author of Dziennik z lat okupacji Zamojszczyzny (1939–1944) (Lublin: Lubelska Spółdzielnia Wydawnicza, 1958), available in English as Diary from the Years of Occupation, 1939–1944, trans. George Klukowski (Chicago: University of Illinois Press, 1993), an indispensable wartime source for events in the larger Zamość region, including in Zwierzyniec.

Primary documentation can be found in the following archives: APL; AŻIH (e.g., 211 [219, pp. 7, 10, 19; 220, p. 78; 221, pp. 47, 58, 64; 222, pp. 5, 44, 66–67; 223, p. 19; 224, pp. 1, 28; 1162–1164]); IPN; IPN-Lu; USHMM (e.g., Acc.1997.A.0124 [AŻIH 211]); VHF (e.g., # 16536, 19996, 47064); and YVA.

Laura Crago

NOTES

1. USHMM, Acc.1997.A.0124 (AŻIH), 211/1162, p. 2.
2. Klukowski, Diary, pp. 67–68, 71, 73–74, 105.

3. AŽIH, 211/1162, p. 46.
4. USHMM, Acc.1997.A.0124, p. 56.
5. Klukowski, Diary, p. 155.
6. USHMM, Acc.1997.A.0124, 211/1162, pp. 41–42; 211/222, p. 66.
7. Ibid., 211/1162, pp. 10–11.
8. Ibid., pp. 30–31.
9. Ibid., 211/224, pp. 16, 28.
10. Ibid., 211/1162, pp. 4, 11, 14.
11. Ibid., p. 38.
12. Ibid., 211/220, p. 78.
13. Ibid., 211/1162, pp. 2, 10, 36.
14. Ibid., 211/1160, p. 46.
15. Klukowski, Diary, pp. 219–220.

EASTERN GALICIA REGION

A group of Jewish women at the entrance to the Brody ghetto in Eastern Galicia, 1942. The sign is written in German, Ukrainian, and Polish.

USHMM WS #23380, COURTESY OF EUGENIA HOCHBERG LANCETER

EASTERN GALICIA REGION (DISTRIKT GALIZIEN)

Pre-1939: Lwów, Stanisławów, and Tarnopol województwa, Poland; 1939–1941: Drohobych, L'viv, Stanislav, and (most of the) Ternopol' oblasts, Ukrainian SSR; 1941–1944: Distrikt Galizien, Generalgouvernement; post-1991: L'viv, Ivano-Frankivs'k, and (most of the) Ternopil' oblasts, Ukraine

Distrikt Galizien was established and added to the four existing Distrikte of the Generalgouvernement in August 1941, just six weeks after the German invasion of the Soviet Union. The Distrikt included the pre-war Polish Lwów, Stanisławów, and Tarnopol województwa. In Distrikt Galizien, the German authorities initially created 17 Kreise, governed by Kreishauptmänner. On April 1, 1942, these were consolidated into 14 Kreise: Brzezany, Czortkow, Drohobysch, Kalusz, Kamionka-Strumilowa, Kolomea, Lemberg-Land, Rawa Ruska, Sadowa Wisznia, Sambor, Stanislau, Stryj, Tarnopol, and Zloczow. In addition, there was a Stadthauptmann in Lemberg. The governor of Distrikt Galizien was Otto Wächter. The SS- und Polizeiführer (SS and Police Leader, SSPF) was Friedrich Katzmann. At the start of the German occupation, approximately 540,000 Jews were living in the area of Eastern Galicia.

The chronology of German ghettoization was somewhat different in Distrikt Galizien than in most other regions. Many of the more than 50 ghettos were not established until the fall of 1942, some only in December, quite late in the process of concentration, deportation, and destruction. A few ghettos, some of them open ghettos, were established earlier, starting in August 1941. Accompanying the entire process was the progressive concentration of the Jews from the smaller towns and villages into the larger towns, where most of the ghettos were established. This proceeded in a series of waves up until the fall of 1942, accompanied also by large-scale killing Aktions (such as that conducted in Stanisławów in October 1941) and mass deportations, mostly to the extermination camp in Bełżec (from March 1942 onward). A number of different types of forced labor camps also existed alongside the ghettos in this region. This combination of local mass murder, deportation, and ghettoization, spread over a period of more than 18 months, gave the Holocaust a somewhat unique character in Distrikt Galizien, combining key elements both from the rest of the Generalgouvernement and from the occupied Soviet territories (e.g., Reichskommissariate Ostland and Ukraine).

Operation Barbarossa commenced in Eastern Galicia with a wave of killings, conducted mainly by the German police and Ukrainian militias. In Lwów, and other places, the Einsatzgruppen exploited outrage at the discovery of People's Commissariat of Internal Affairs (NKVD) murders in order to conduct mass shootings of adult male Jews and suspected Communists. A wave of anti-Jewish pogroms and brutal murders, carried out primarily by local Ukrainians, swept the region during the summer of 1941, causing some Jews to flee the villages to larger towns for security. More than 20,000 Jews were murdered throughout the summer.

Despite a provisional ban on further ghetto creation, announced by Generalgouverneur Hans Frank in July 1941, in expectation that the Jews would soon be deported to the east, the new civil administration in Distrikt Galizien began setting up a few ghettos almost immediately. A Jewish residential district (open ghetto) was created in Rohatyn in August 1941, and the open ghetto established in Tarnopol in September was then enclosed in December.¹ Planning for ghettos also started in the fall for several larger cities, including Lwów and Stryj. Among the motivations for German administrators was a desire to isolate the Jews from the rest of the population and the need to acquire space in towns.

The public humiliation of a Jew in the Stryj ghetto, ca. 1942.
USHMM WS #63411, COURTESY OF YIVO

The pattern of destruction intensified in October 1941 when the Security Police in Stanisławów began the systematic mass shooting of Jewish men, women, and children in pits, shortly after the murder of more than 23,000 Jews (including 11,000 recently expelled from Hungary) in neighboring Kamenets-Podolskii to the east. The presence of many Jewish expellees from Hungary in and around Stanisławów was probably a contributory factor in this escalation. After a trial run in Nadwórna on October 6, when 2,000 Jews were killed, on October 12, 1941, "Bloody Sunday," Hans Krüger, head of the Border Police Office (Grenzpolizeikommissariat, GPK) Stanisław, and his men murdered around 10,000 Jewish men, women, and children in a most brutal fashion. Having reduced the city's Jewish population, a ghetto was then established in Stanisławów. It was officially pronounced a closed ghetto on December 20, 1941, and surrounded by a wooden fence. In this southeastern corner of Distrikt Galizien, the German authorities had conducted mass killings of Jews, also accompanied by ghetto formation in Horodenka, Kołomyja, and Kosów by December 1941. In Lwów, however, attempts to establish a ghetto in November and December 1941 proved too chaotic and were broken off in the face of a rampant typhus epidemic.

The usual array of anti-Jewish measures was introduced in Eastern Galicia in the second half of 1941, affecting also the bulk of Jews who had not yet been ghettoized. Jews had to wear armbands bearing the Star of David, they could not leave the town limits without permission, food was generally rationed, and trading with non-Jews was forbidden or severely restricted. The German authorities established Jewish Councils (Judenräte), which had to collect "contributions" in money and kind and supply quotas of forced laborers, and were assisted by the Jewish Police (Jüdischer Ordnungsdienst). Judenrat members were held personally responsible for the implementation of German demands, and a number were murdered.

By the winter of 1941–1942, the systematic recruitment of able-bodied Jews to work in a variety of forced labor camps had commenced. Many of the camps were built to support the German Durchgangsstrasse (highway, DG) IV road construction project and were subordinated to SSPF Katzmann. Jewish forced laborers were also exploited in the oil fields around Drohobycz and Borysław, on plantations for the extraction of synthetic rubber, and for a time, in villages in the Carpathian Mountains. Some Jewish Councils were obliged to supply food and clothing to Jews sent to the camps from their communities. Living conditions in the camps were brutal, and many of the inmates died. Subsequently, the Janowska Street camp in Lwów became not only a place of forced labor but also a mass killing site.

At the end of 1941, Jews were ordered to surrender their fur items of clothing for the use of the German army, and searches conducted to enforce this demand resulted in a number of people being shot. During the winter, many Jews died of disease and starvation in Eastern Galicia. By early in 1942, the Bełżec extermination camp, just across the border in Distrikt Lublin, was preparing to receive its first victims. In response, the authorities in Distrikt Galizien began registering Jews in three separate categories, to facilitate the subsequent deportation and murder of those incapable of work. The killing of Jews in mass-shooting Aktionen continued in Lwów, Kołomyja, Tarnopol, and other places in the first months of 1942. Then from mid-March, rail transports to Bełżec from Distrikt Galizien commenced. German Security and Order Police units conducted the first Aktion in Żółkiew, deporting 700 Jews "incapable of work." However, 2 Jewish women, Mina Astmann and Mala Thalenfeld, managed to escape from Bełżec and returned to Żółkiew, spreading news of the new techniques of mass murder there.²

A renewed wave of concentration and ghetto formation accompanied the start of deportations. In April 1942, ghettos were established in Borszczów, Tłumacz, and Tyśmienica. At this time some entire Jewish communities were dissolved: in March 1942, the Jews of Husiatyń were transferred, temporarily, to the small town of Probużna, before being consolidated again, in October, in the Kopyczyńce ghetto. Following the murder of about half the Jews of the short-lived open ghetto in Gwoździec in April, the remainder were relocated to the ghetto in Kołomyja. The number of Jews living in smaller towns and villages declined steadily throughout 1942, although exemptions were permitted for doctors and certain other categories of skilled workers.

In a few towns, however, the process of ghettoization remained gradual. In Stryj, Kreishauptmann von Dewitz had ordered the establishment of an open ghetto in early October 1941, but in January 1942, 2,000 Jews were still living outside the ghetto area, and only in July did the last non-Jews move out. Even then, doctors, members of the Judenrat, and some craftsmen still resided outside the ghetto to facilitate their work, although they could not leave the town.³

On July 19, Heinrich Himmler ordered the liquidation of all the Jews in the Generalgouvernement by the end of 1942.⁴ In the last five months of 1942, the German authorities murdered more than 250,000 Jews in Distrikt Galizien, most following deportation to Bełżec. After the murder of about 40,000 of Lwów's Jews through local massacres and deportations within two weeks in August, with the active participation of the Ukrainian police, a closed ghetto was created there in early September. Now that Bełżec was operating at full capacity, the process of concentration, deportation, and where necessary, ghetto formation became more closely synchronized.

A public hanging on Zolkovkoy Street in Lwów, 1942.
USHMM WS #37247, COURTESY OF NARA

In some cases, Jews were informed that they were being transferred to a ghetto but then were deported by train almost immediately on arriving in the larger town. According to the yizkor book, this was the case in Turka, where Jews were concentrated on August 1, 1942, but it appears that no ghetto was actually established, as most Jews were deported within a few days.⁵ Jews brought from the village of Stojanów to Radziechów in mid-September 1942 sat at the railway station for two days without food and then were packed into railroad cars and deported without entering the Radziechów ghetto.⁶

In early September 1942, the Security Police conducted a wave of mass deportations to Bełżec from Kreis Stryj. Two weeks later, the Kreishauptmann issued instructions for the Jews of the Kreis to be concentrated in Stryj, Bolechów, Chodorów, Skole, or Żurawno. Then, by the end of September, most of the remaining Jews had been further concentrated in the Stryj ghetto for deportation. However, even after a further wave of deportations in October, remnant ghettos were established in some places, such as Chodorów and Żurawno, as all Jews who remained exempted for labor were "under all circumstances to be housed in barracks." In Chodorów this comprised a group of some 800 people, performing a variety of tasks, who were moved to a separate Jewish quarter by the end of 1942.⁷

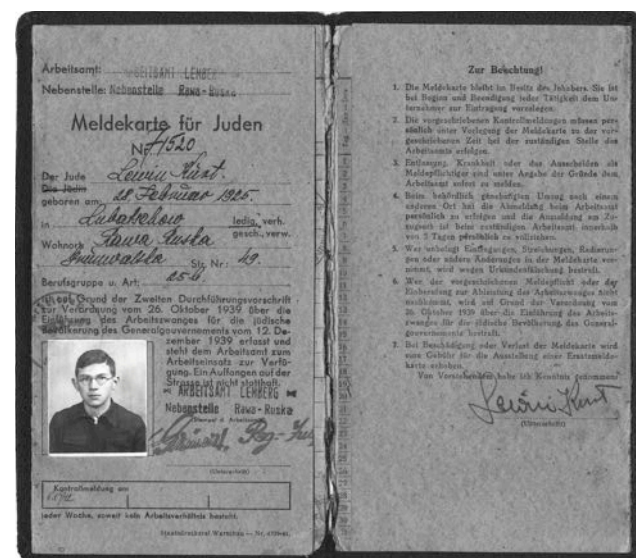

The main wave of ghettoization in the region is documented in the order of Höherer SS- und Polizeiführer (HSSPF) Friedrich Wilhelm Krüger, issued on November 10, 1942. It proclaimed the confinement of Jews to just 32 ghettos in Distrikt Galizien by December 1, 1942.⁸ Some of these places already had ghettos, and others were created in November and December, such as those in Kozowa, Busk, Jaryczów Nowy, Rudki, and Żółkiew. In fact, in December the number of ghettos slightly exceeded the 32 officially recognized. A few remained open, marked only with signs, despite Krüger's instructions for their enclosure.

The order's intent was to clear the entire region of Jews except for those concentrated in the official ghettos or labor camps. Any Jew caught outside of these places would be shot. In view of the massive wave of deportations from the region that had been proceeding since July 1942, the remaining Jews in the smaller towns were considerably unnerved by the demand to move into the ghettos. The Jewish Council of Gliniany tried to bribe German officials in Złoczów for permission to establish a ghetto in their town, to avoid the cruel fate of resettlement. This was denied, and when the Jews left Gliniany for nearby ghettos, Ukrainians robbed them of almost everything on the way.⁹

Mass deportations of Jews, accompanied by the shooting of those unfit for travel or attempting to hide or escape, continued on a horrendous scale through the fall of 1942 into December; those who remained were Jews registered for work. People desperately sought work cards and, in some places, special armbands, which offered a measure of protection against deportation. The Germans repeatedly insisted that the Jewish Councils and Jewish Police assist in the roundups for forced labor and deportation (or be deported themselves), creating bitter divisions among the Jews. A good number of Jews created hiding places, obtained Aryan papers, or fled to the countryside in the hope of surviving a while longer. Hundreds of Jews jumped from the deportation trains, but even if they survived the ensuing manhunts, many simply returned to the ghetto they had just left to reunite with family or to exploit local contacts and resources, as seemingly their best chance of survival.

Living conditions in the ghettos deteriorated as the last reserves were used up, and being enclosed further limited their access to food and other resources. In some places, such as Skalat, the deportations were accompanied by reductions in the ghetto area, which increased overcrowding. Remaining Jews demolished the empty Jewish houses and sorted Jewish property for the Germans as part of a salvage operation.¹⁰ Lack of space, malnutrition, and poor sanitation led to the spread of disease in the ghettos. In Rawa Ruska, SSPF Katzmann used the severe typhus epidemic there as a pretext for liquidating the ghetto in December 1942, using police personnel who had been vaccinated to clear out the ghetto.¹¹

Despite the existence of many ghettos in Distrikt Galizien for at least six months or more, comparatively little evidence has survived about social life in these ghettos, beyond the naked struggle for survival. Some religious observances, including the burial of the dead, were maintained, and a few contemporary letters and diaries give insights into the Jews' awareness of their likely fate and their effort that went into surviving.¹² Jews bartered their last remaining possessions for food and sought any kind of employment that might offer the chance to obtain an extra crust of bread. In the Borszczów ghetto, some inmates wrote poems and songs, but few manifestations of cultural life in the ghettos have survived.

A Jewish forced labor card issued to Kurt Lewin while in Rawa Ruska. Lewin subsequently escaped from the Lwów ghetto. USHMM, ACC.1997.A.0076

Among the strategies pursued by the Jewish Councils, bribing German officials was very widespread, but ultimately it offered no real protection. In 1942, the Jewish Social Self-Help (Jüdische Soziale Selbsthilfe, or JSS) set up branches in a number of towns in Distrikt Galizien, which helped support soup kitchens and provided additional assistance, but all these efforts to aid the large numbers of destitute Jews remained woefully inadequate. In the Bursztyn ghetto, Dr. Shumer describes Jews swollen with hunger and children with skinny legs from malnutrition. Many Jews died of starvation, and their bodies were left lying in the streets for days.¹³

At the end of 1942, around 160,000 Jews remained alive in Distrikt Galizien, interned either in labor camps or the remaining ghettos, many of which now closely resembled labor camps. In some places, such as Tarnopol, new labor camps were established outside the ghetto, and the able-bodied Jews were sent to these camps. In Lwów, the remnant of the ghetto was renamed the Judenlager (Jewish camp) and converted into a labor camp for Jews. In Bolechów, the short-lived ghetto had been dissolved by December 1, but groups of Jewish laborers were still housed in several barrack camps close to their workplaces for several months more. For some locations, such as Podwołoczyska and Leszniów, the available primary evidence is insufficient to confirm the existence of a ghetto, but it can be assumed that the few Jews retained, after the main wave of deportations in the fall of 1942, were exploited for labor.¹⁴

Following the closure of the Bełżec extermination camp at the end of 1942, SSPF Katzmann resorted to mass shootings to murder all the remaining Jews in the ghettos in the first half of 1943. A few ghettos were reduced in size or completely liquidated in brutal Aktions between January and March. Then from April to June 1943, almost all remaining ghettos were liquidated, although in a few locations the ensuing cleanup operations continued into July. Finally, most of the remaining forced labor camps were liquidated and their inmates shot during the summer of 1943.

In a number of ghettos and labor camps in the region, Jews offered armed resistance to the Germans and their collaborators, some even using guns bought from Italian soldiers stationed in the region. For example, a group of Jews from the Czortków ghetto obtained arms and escaped to the forest in the spring of 1943, but most members of the group were killed in subsequent clashes with the German and Ukrainian police. After the liquidation of the Tarnopol ghetto, Jews that went into hiding defended themselves with grenades and other weapons when the Nazis and their collaborators came to drive them out. The liquidation of the remnants of the Lwów ghetto (Julag) in June 1943 also encountered stiff armed resistance, and some Jews escaped into the sewers of the city. An idea of the bitter nature of these last clashes, as the Germans and their Ukrainian police collaborators sought to root out every last Jew, can be found in SSPF Katzmann's concluding report on the ghetto clearances:

[D]uring the Aktions, there were many other enormous difficulties, since the Jews attempted under all circumstances to evade resettlement. They not only tried to flee, but also concealed themselves in the most inconceivable corners, in sewers, in chimneys, even in cesspits &c. . . . They barricaded themselves in underground passages, in cellars converted into bunkers, in holes in the ground, in sophisticated hiding places in attics and shacks, inside furniture, and so forth.¹⁵

Even after the ghetto liquidations, German Gendarmes and the Ukrainian police regularly combed the surrounding countryside in search of any remaining Jews; those captured were generally shot on the spot. Rewards were paid to those denouncing Jews, and the death penalty was threatened and sometimes implemented against anyone caught hiding escaped Jews. Ukrainian nationalist partisans posed an additional danger to fugitive Jews in the forests.

Despite the German threats, a number of righteous people risked their lives to save Jews in Distrikt Galizien. In Tarnopol, several individuals of Polish ethnicity, including Dr. Kolczycki and Karola Pietroszyńska, actively assisted Jews. In Borysław, many Jews were saved through the intervention of Berthold Beitz, a German manager with the "Karpathen" oil company. In Lwów, Metropolitan Sheptytskyi, head of the Greek-Catholic Church, led an operation that hid around 150 Jews. Many Jews survived in the countryside, aided by local peasants; others survived with the aid of forged Aryan papers or made their way across the border into Romania or Hungary.

Among the most important German trials dealing with the perpetrators of the Holocaust in Eastern Galicia were those of Hans Krüger (head of the GPK in Stanisławów), who was sentenced to life in prison by a court in Münster in 1968, and also of Paul Raebel and Hermann Müller (Sipo Tarnopol), both sentenced to life in prison by a court in Stuttgart in 1966.¹⁶ Other trials of perpetrators were conducted in Soviet Ukraine, Poland, and East Germany.

SOURCES Among the most useful publications with regard to the Holocaust in Eastern Galicia are the following: Tatiana Berenstein, "Eksterminacja ludności żydowskiej w dystrykcie Galicja (1941–1943)," BŻIH, no. 61 (1967); Jakob Honigsman, Juden in der Westukraine: Jüdisches Leben und Leiden in Ostgalizien, der Bukowina und Transkarpatien 1933–1945 (Konstanz: Hartung-Gorre, 2001); A. Kruglov, Katastrofa ukraińskiego evreistva 1941–1944 gg.: Entsiklopedicheskii spravocchnik (Kharkov: "Karavella," 2001); A. Kruglov, The Losses Suffered by Ukrainian Jews in 1941–1944 (Kharkov: Tarbut Laam, 2005); Dieter Pohl, Nationalsozialistische Judenverfolgung in Ostgalizien 1941–1944 (Munich: Oldenbourg, 1996); Dieter Pohl, "Hans Krüger and the Murder of the Jews in the Stanislawow Region (Galicia),” Yad Vashem Studies 26 (1998): 239–265; and Thomas Sandkühler, “Endlösung” in Galizien. Der Judenmord in Ostpolen und die Rettungsinitiativen von Berthold Beitz 1941–1944 (Bonn: Dietz, 1996).

Of assistance in identifying the ghettos in the region are Handbuch der Lager, Gefängnisse und Ghettos auf dem besetzten Territorium der Ukraine (1941–1944) (Kiev: Staatskomitee der Archiven der Ukraine, 2000); Danuta Dabrowska, Abraham Wein, and Aharon Weiss, eds., Pinkas ha-kehillot. Encyclopaedia of Jewish Communities: Poland, vol. 2, Eastern Galicia (Jerusalem: Yad Vashem, 1980); Guy Miron, ed., The Yad Vashem Encyclopedia of the Ghettos during the Holocaust (Jerusalem: Yad Vashem, 2010); and Shmuel Spector and Geoffrey Wigoder, eds., The Encyclopedia of Jewish Life before and during the Holocaust (Jerusalem: Yad Vashem; New York: New York University Press, 2001).

Relevant documentation can be found in the following archives: AAN; AŽIH (e.g., Collections 211, 229, 301, and 302); BA-BL; BA-L; BA-MA; CDJC; DAI-FO; DALO; DATO; FVA; GARF; GASBU; GASBU-L; IfZ; IPN; MA; NARA; RGVA; TsDAHOU; TsDAVO; USHMM (e.g., RG-31.003M); VHF; YIU; YIVO; and YVA.

Martin Dean

NOTES

1. GARF, 7021-75-105, pp. 4–5.
2. BA-L, B 162/2100, pp. 95–100.
3. DALO, 1952-1-62.
4. BA-BL, NS 19/1757.
5. J. Siegelman, ed., Sefer zikaron le-kehillat Turka al nebar Stryj ve-ha-seviva (Haifa: Former Residents of Turka [Stryj] in Israel, 1966), p. 241. Handbuch der Lager, Gefängnisse und Ghettos auf dem besetzten Territorium der Ukraine (1941–1944), p. 75, indicates the existence of a ghetto in Turka, but this is not corroborated by other available sources, including several survivor testimonies; see, e.g., AŽIH, 301/4974 and 4975.
6. Eichmann Trial, Session No. 23, May 2, 1961, as cited on www.nizkor.org.

7. DALO, R 1952-1-62, pp. 92, 97; AŽIH, 301/2574, testimony of Juda Kneidel.

8. Polizeiverordnung des HSSPF Krüger über die Errichtung jüdischer Wohnbezirke, November 10, 1942, Verordnungsblatt des Generalgouvernements, November 11, 1942.

9. Hurbm Glinyane: Lezikoren unzere kdoyshim (New York: Emergency Relief Committee for Gliniany and Vicinity, n.d.), pp. 260–261.

10. Abraham Weissbrod, Death of a Shtetl (USA, 1995), pp. 12, 20, 29, 32.

11. International Military Tribunal, Trial of the Major War Criminals (TMWC), vol. 37 (Nuremberg, 1948), pp. 404–405, Doc. L-018.

12. See, for example, for Przemyślany Wendy Lower, The Diary of Samuel Golfard and the Holocaust in Galicia (Lanham, MD: AltaMira Press in association with USHMM, 2011) or the contemporary correspondence published in A. Zilberman, ed., Yizkor Bukh Zborov (Israel: Landsmanshaft Zborov un Umgebung in Israel, 1975).

13. Dr. Lipa Shumer, “Ummmentshlechn leydn un peyn,” in Shimon Katz et al., eds., Sefer Burshtin (Jerusalem: Entsiklopedyah shel galuyot, 1960), p. 371.

14. Dabrowska, Wein, and Weiss, Pinkas ha-kehillot: Poland, vol. 2, Eastern Galicia, pp. 305–306, indicates that an enclosed ghetto was established in Leszniów on November 2, 1942. Kruglov, Katastrofa ukrainskogo evreistva 1941–1944 gg., p. 185, however, indicates that 250 Jews were transferred from Leszniów to Brody in November 1942. Podwołoczyska is described as a ghetto in Miron, The Yad Vashem Encyclopedia of the Ghettos, pp. 605–606, but the yizkor book for the town makes no mention of the ghetto, whereas many sources describe the labor camp there, also known as Kami-onka (III).

15. TMWC, vol. 37, p. 405, Doc. L-018.

16. Justiz und NS-Verbrechen vol. 24 (Amsterdam: Amsterdam University Press, 1998), Lfd. Nr. 634, and vol. 28 (2003), Lfd. Nr. 675.

Ghettos in the Eastern Galicia Region

1941 - 1943

Borders as of 1942

BÓBRKA

Pre-1939: Bóbrka (Yiddish: Boiberke), town, powiat center, Lwów województwo, Poland; 1939–1941: Bobrka, raion center, L'viv oblast', Ukrainian SSR; 1941–1944: initially Kreis Lemberg-Ost then Kreis Lemberg-Land, Distrikt Galizien, Generalgouvernement; post-1991: Bibrka, L'viv oblast', Ukraine

Bóbrka is located 31 kilometers (19 miles) southeast of Lwów. According to the Polish census, 1,480 Jews resided in Bóbrka in 1921, comprising 33.7 percent of the total population. By 1931, the Jewish population of Bóbrka had increased to 1,833.¹ By mid-1941, including refugees, there were probably in excess of 2,000 Jews living in the town.

Bóbrka was occupied on June 30, 1941, by units of the 257th Infantry Division, which was part of the German 17th Army. In July 1941, a military commandant's office (Ortskommandantur) governed the town. On August 1, 1941, Eastern Galicia was transferred to a civil administration and became part of Distrikt Galizien in the Generalgouvernement. This region was initially divided into 17 Kreise; but from April 1, 1942, following its reorganization, there were only 14 Kreise. Bóbrka formed part of the Kreis Lemberg-Ost, which became Kreis Lemberg-Land after its unification with Kreis Lemberg-West in April 1942. The Kreis was governed by a Kreishauptmann. Wilhelm Stockheck held the position of Kreishauptmann until mid-September 1941, then Otto Bauer until March 1942, Dr. Werner Becker until early 1943, and finally Baron Joachim von der Leyen. Each Kreis was divided into Landkommissariate, led by a Landkommissar. The Bóbrka Landkommissar was von Dohomeranski. There was also a German Gendarmerie post in Bóbrka, a Criminal Police (Kripo) post, and a detachment of Ukrainian Auxiliary Police (Ukrainische Hilfspolizei), which was organized initially as a militia within a few days of the German arrival. The anti-Jewish Aktions were generally carried out in the town by a team of Security Police from Lwów with the assistance of the German Gendarmerie and the Ukrainian police.

On July 2, 1941, a pogrom took place in Bóbrka. The cause of the pogrom was the discovery of the bodies of 16 victims of the Soviet People's Commissariat of Internal Affairs (NKVD). Their murder was blamed on the Jews, and antisemitic Ukrainian nationalists organized a "bloodbath" in revenge.² Bands of Ukrainian peasants came to town from the surrounding villages and dragged the Jews from their hiding places, beating them with sticks. Several dozen Jews were killed.³

On July 10, 1941, by decree of the military authorities, all Jews older than 14 years were obliged to wear armbands bearing the Star of David. Jews also had to be registered and were compelled to engage in forced labor. The military commandant's headquarters (Ortskommandantur) and the local Ukrainian administration implemented these orders with the aid of the Jewish Council (Judenrat), which consisted of 12 members and was created on the same day. Its first chairman was O. Miller.⁴ The next day the Ortskommandantur ordered the Judenrat to collect a "contribution" of 2,000 Reichsmark

(RM) within 24 hours. Subsequently, Jews were made to surrender articles of clothing and furniture. As Jews were forbidden from doing business or interacting with the non-Jewish population, they were forced to live off their savings.

In October 1941, the commandant of the Kurowice labor camp made a demand for 20 Jewish laborers. The Judenrat asked young unmarried people to volunteer and offered bread to the volunteers' parents as an incentive.⁵

By the summer of 1942, hunger among the Jews of the town was very serious: people were reduced to eating thorns and grass, and a few people died of hunger each day. Some food was obtained from the local population secretly by barter.

In early August 1942, the Jews of the surrounding villages (Mikołajów, Podhorodyszcze, and others) were brought into Bóbrka, together with 180 Jews from Szczercz and all the Jews (1,252 people) from Strzeliska Nowe. Consequently, there were some 3,200 Jews gathered in Bóbrka. Conditions in the town became very overcrowded, with three or four families sharing each apartment.

On August 12, 1942, a team of Security Police from Lwów, with the assistance of the German Gendarmerie and the Ukrainian police, deported 1,260 Jews to the Bełżec extermination camp. Some people hid in bunkers, and the German forces killed on the spot approximately 200 Jews, who were disabled or who tried to escape. The Judenrat and Jewish Police were asked to help search for those in hiding; some refused and the Germans killed them too. It is estimated that between 1,500 and 1,900 Jews remained in the town after this Aktion.⁶

On December 1, 1942, a ghetto was created in Bóbrka following instructions issued by the German administration in November.⁷ On December 8, 1942, the Germans conducted a second Aktion in the ghetto. Again some Jews hid in bunkers. Most of the several hundred Jews rounded up for deportation to Bełżec were among those who had arrived recently from the surrounding villages. Among those Jews killed on the spot on this occasion were three Jewish doctors who "died suddenly," while two others together with the Judenrat and the Jewish Police were reportedly among those deported. After being loaded onto the train, a few people managed to jump from the moving railway wagons.⁸

Thereafter, the poor hygienic conditions in the ghetto meant that many people became sick. In the period up to April 13, 1943, approximately 300 Jews died of hunger and typhus in the closed ghetto. Some non-Jewish acquaintances advised Jews to escape, but most were too afraid to offer shelter themselves.⁹

On April 13, 1943, a squad of Security Police from Lwów, with the assistance of the German Gendarmerie and the Ukrainian police, surrounded the ghetto to help in its liquidation and the shooting began. The German authorities, aided by the Jewish Police, attempted to gather all the residents of the ghetto on the square by the synagogue. The assembled Jews were ordered to deposit all valuables, including photographs, into boxes. Ten healthy Jews were escorted in the direction of Wołowe to dig the graves. The Germans also selected a group of 159 able-bodied Jews destined for work. The remaining Jews (more than 1,000 elderly, children, and the sick) were transported to the killing site, where they were forced to undress and were shot on the edge of the pit with machine guns. A Jewish hospital containing 50 patients was also burned down. The selected group was then loaded into cattle cars on top of the clothing of those just murdered near Wołowe, and they were sent to the Janowska Street labor camp in Lwów. According to Avraham Fisher, only 4 of the 159 survived the war. One survivor, Moses Erlich, recalls that two militiamen searched the bloody clothing during the journey, looking for any money and valuables.¹⁰

In Bóbrka several hundred Jews managed initially to survive the ghetto liquidation by hiding, but almost all of them were later caught and killed.¹¹ After Soviet troops had recaptured Bóbrka, some Jews who had hidden in the nearby woods, especially the Świrz Forest, returned to the town and met up with others who had remained hidden with non-Jews during the occupation. Approximately 40 Jews returned to Bóbrka in total.

SOURCES Articles on the extermination of the Jews of Bóbrka and its surrounding area can be found in the Bóbrka yizkor book, Sh. Kallay, ed., Le-zekher kehilat Bobrka u-benoteba (Jerusalem: Association of Former Residents of Bobrka and Vicinity, 1964); and in Danuta Dabrowska, Abraham Wein, and Aharon Weiss, eds., Pinkas ha-kehillot. Encyclopaedia of Jewish Communities: Poland, vol. 2, Eastern Galicia (Jerusalem: Yad Vashem, 1980).

Documents regarding the extermination of Bóbrka's Jewish community can be found in the following archives: AŻIH (301/1247 and 1316); DALO (R 24-3-156); GARF (7021-67-84); and YVA.

Alexander Kruglov and Ester-Basya Vaisman

NOTES

1. N.M. Gelber, "History of Boiberke," in Kallay, Le-zekher kehilat Bobrka u-benoteba, pp. 11–16 (abridged English translation).

2. BA-MA, RH 26-257/35, Activity Report of 257th Infantry Div./Ic, July 3, 1941; RH 26-257/8, already reported on the evening of July 2, 1941, in the War Diary (KTB) of the 257th Infantry Division.

3. According to the testimony of Chaim Gimpl, 63 Jews were killed; see AŻIH, 301/1316. According to the Soviet Extraordinary State Commission (ChGK) report, there were 30 people (GARF, 7021-67-84, p. 7). Mordechai (Moses) Erlich, "Our Town's Experiences," in Kallay, Le-zekher kehilat Bobrka u-benoteba, pp. 187–198, indicates 42 were killed.

4. Erlich, "Our Town's Experiences," pp. 187–198.

5. Ibid.

6. Ibid.; and AŻIH, 301/1316.

7. DALO, R 24-3-156, Kreishauptmann Lemberg-Land an die Landkommissare, November 25, 1941, Betr.: Bildung von Judenwohnbezirken.

8. Ibid., R 24-3-283, p. 16, Kreisarzt Bobrka an Hauptkreisarzt, December 11, 1942. According to the ChGK report for Bóbrka, in December 1942, 1,200 Jews were deported to Bełżec from the town (GARF, 7021-67-84, p. 7)—this figure is probably too high. Also see Erlich, "Our Town's Experiences," pp. 187–198.

9. Yosef Vogel, "The Last Struggle," in Kallay, Le-zekher kehilat Bobrka u-benoteba, p. 199.

10. M. Erlich, "Escape from the Death Camp," in Kallay, Le-zekher kehilat Bobrka u-benoteba, p. 204; see also AŻIH, 301/1247, testimony of Moses Ehrlich (in Polish).

11. GARF, 7021-67-84, p. 8; Avraham Fisher, "The Ghetto in Our Shtetl," in Kallay, Le-zekher kehilat Bobrka u-benoteba, p. 183.

BOLECHÓW

Pre-1939: Bolechów, town, Dolina powiat, Stanisławów województwo, Poland; 1939–1941: Bolekhov, raion center, Stanislav oblast', Ukrainian SSR; 1941–1944: Bolechow, Kreis Stryj, Distrikt Galizien, Generalgouvernement; post-1991: Bolekhiv, Ivano-Frankivs'k oblast', Ukraine

Bolechów is located 64 kilometers (40 miles) west-northwest of Stanisławów. According to the 1931 census, 2,986 Jews were residing in the town. By the middle of 1941, allowing for an annual growth rate of 9 or 10 persons per 1,000, there would have been around 3,300 Jews in Bolechów.

Soviet forces abandoned Bolechów on July 2, 1941. The town was without a clear ruling authority until July 6. Units of the Hungarian and then the Slovak armies occupied the town from July 6. Initially, a military commandant's office administered the city. Then, in August 1941, power was transferred to a German civilian administration. Bolechów became part of Kreis Stryj within Distrikt Galizien. Regierungsrat Dr. Wiktor von Dewitz was appointed to the post of Kreishauptmann in Stryj.

In Bolechów, a German Gendarmerie post was established, which served under the command of the Gendarmerie platoon based in Stryj. A Ukrainian police unit was also established, which participated in the Aktions against the Jews.

Group portrait of Jewish youth in the Bolechów ghetto, 1941–1942. Pictured standing from left are Simon Weiss, Lila Berger, Burnek Josefsberg, and the donor's sister, Musia Adler. Sitting, from left, are Bela Altman, unknown, and Dyzia Lew.

USHMM WS #24603, COURTESY OF SCHLOMO ADLER

At the end of July 1941, a Jewish Council (Judenrat) was established in Bolechów on the orders of the occupying forces. The Judenrat was headed initially by Dr. Reifeisen and then by Dr. Schindler from the end of 1941. A Jewish police force was charged with maintaining order and assisted the Judenrat in carrying out its tasks. Jews were obliged to register themselves and to appear for forced labor tasks assigned to them via the Judenrat, including cleaning and bridge repair work. The German officials also demanded furniture from the Jews for equipping their offices and villas. In October 1941, the Jews were required to pay a large monetary contribution.¹

On October 28 and 29, 1941, the first Aktion was carried out in Bolechów. Some 750 Jews, who were unable to work, were gathered in the Catholic Home and then later taken to the forest near Taniawa and shot.² The Security Police and SD unit based in Stanisławów probably carried out the shootings. In October 1941, the head of the Judenrat, Dr. Reifeisen, committed suicide after a German official slapped him in the face for failing to meet the incessant German demands.³ At the end of December 1941, the Jews were required to surrender their fur coats and warm clothing, and a number of Jews were taken hostage to ensure compliance with this order.⁴

The Judenrat organized a soup kitchen for the poor, which served watery soup and small pieces of bread each day. Many Jews made use of this service, but nevertheless between January and September 1942 roughly 60 Jews died per month of weakness and starvation, including a number of Hungarian refugees. There was also a Jewish hospital, which was staffed by Jewish doctors and women volunteers. According to one survivor account, Jewish women were forbidden to wear lipstick, apparently to prevent them from enticing Germans to help them.⁵

On June 10, 1942, 4,281 Jews were counted in the town of Bolechów and its outlying villages. Of these, 1,588 were deemed fit to work, most of them working directly for German offices.⁶ In August 1942, Jews from the outlying towns and villages of Wędrzisz, Wygoda, Wyszaków, and Mizuń Stary and also some from Rożniatów were all resettled to Bolechów.⁷ After this concentration of Jews in Bolechów, a deportation Aktion was carried out on September 3–5, 1942. Some 400 Jews were killed on the spot, including a number of children, and more than 1,600 Jews were deported to the extermination camp in Bełżec. The German Security Police, Gendarmerie, Ukrainian police, and Jewish Police all participated in the Aktion.⁸

After the Aktion on September 3–5, approximately 2,500 Jews remained in the town. On October 1, 1942, the Jewish Council was informed that all Jews not carrying a work pass issued by the Security Police outpost in Stryj would soon be rounded up by the Ukrainian police and resettled to the ghetto in Stryj. The Jewish Council appealed for this operation to be delayed, as not all work passes had yet been distributed.⁹ On October 21, 1942, the Judenrat was requested to surrender 400 Jews, including some of the workers. The Jewish Police arrested the Jews, and some people paid large bribes to avoid deportation, while others went into hiding.¹⁰ Of the 1,748 Jews who were officially counted in Bolechów on October 29, 1942, most worked in timber production for the German HO-BAG company (215); in leather manufacturing (126); in the barrel (72) and furniture (45) factories; in the combined town industries (90); or as craftsmen (49). Among these Jews, there were 147 who were members of the Judenrat, the Jewish Police, the sanitation service, or the local committee for Jewish Social Self-Help (JSS).¹¹

In September or October 1942, all Jews, including those from the surrounding villages, were required to abandon their apartments and move into a “ghetto” or “special quarter of town” reserved for Jews that consisted of “the Shuster-Gas, the Ring-Platz, the Klein-Gas, and the surrounding side-streets.” Each person was left to find new living space on his or her own. Some of the houses had remained empty after the deportations in early September, but generally there was insufficient space, and many people had to leave some of their furniture and other items behind and sell them. The “Jewish residential area” (open ghetto) was not fenced in and was not guarded, but the Jews were not permitted to leave its borders, and harsh penalties were threatened against anyone disobeying this order.¹² The mayor of the town, Ostap Hucalo, reported that the establishment of the ghetto in Bolechów had been completed on November 1, 1942, but that the Jews working in the barrel factory, the leather factory, and the combined town industries were residing in various parts of town (outside the ghetto), mostly in barracks established at their respective factories. As insufficient discipline was enforced, the mayor complained that many of these Jews were still able to roam the town freely. In response the mayor ordered that each firm should maintain only one barracks, that Jews should be permitted to leave only when going to work, and that they should always be escorted. He also requested that the other Jews not residing in barracks all be transferred to the Stryj ghetto, which was to be completed by December 1, 1942.¹³ Soon afterwards the Jewish laborers in Bolechów were all relocated into corresponding factory barracks (labor camps) that were each surrounded by a high fence. The Germans planned for these Jews to train their own non-Jewish replacements. The resettlement of all the nonworking Jews to Stryj, which was completed in December, meant in effect the liquidation of the Bolechów ghetto only a few weeks after its establishment.¹⁴

Some of the Jewish forced labor camps in the town survived until the summer of 1943, when they were liquidated. In a series of Aktions, on March 5, June 5, June 8, July 13, and August 25, 1943, all the Jewish workers were shot. The Jewish Police and most of the Judenrat were shot during the March Aktion. Recognizing that the time had come, the head of the Judenrat, Dr. Schindler, hanged himself on learning the fate of his colleagues.¹⁵

Bolechów was liberated on August 9, 1944. Only about 50 Jews managed to survive by hiding inside the town or in nearby forests. At the end of 1944 and over the course of 1945, small groups of Jews returned to the city, having survived in German labor camps or in the Soviet interior.

SOURCES Information on the extermination of the Jews in Bolechów can be found in the yizkor book edited by Y. Eshel and M.H. Eshel, Sefer ha-Zikaron li-Kedoshai Bolehov (Haifa: Association of Former Residents of Bolechow in Israel, 1957); in Danuta Dabrowska, Abraham Wein, and Aharon Weiss, eds., Pinkas ha-kehilot. Encyclopaedia of Jewish Communities: Poland, vol. 2, Eastern Galicia (Jerusalem: Yad Vashem, 1980), pp. 72–77; and in the book by Anatol Regnier, Damals in Bolechów: Eine jüdische Odyssee (Munich: Btb, 1997), which has also since been published in a Hebrew translation. The story of a single family from Bolechów during the Holocaust is reconstructed by Daniel Mendelsohn in The Lost: The Search for Six of Six Million (New York, 2006).

Documents dealing with the persecution and murder of the Jews in Bolechów can be found in the following archives: AŻIH (301/1035, 1554, 2145, 2146, 2147, 2148, and 4045); DAI-FO; DALO (R 1952-1-62); GARF (7021-73-9); USHMM; and YVA.

Alexander Kruglov and Martin Dean
trans. Steven Seegel

NOTES

1. AŻIH, 301/1554, 2146.
2. GARF, 7021-73-9, p. 2.
3. Eshel and Eshel, Sefer ha-Zikaron, pp. 341–342.
4. AŻIH, 301/2147, 2148.
5. AŻIH, 301/2145, 2147.
6. DALO, R 1952-1-62 (USHMM, RG-31.003M), p. 36, reproduced in Thomas Sandkühler, “Endlösung” in Galizien: Der Judenmord in Ostpolen und die Rettungsinitiativen von Berthold Beitz 1941–1944 (Bonn: Dietz-Verlag, 1996), p. 329.
7. Tatiana Berenstein, “Eksterminacja ludności żydowskiej w dystrykcie Galicja (1941–1943),” BŻIH, no. 61 (1967), table 10. According to the yizkor book, the Jews of Rożniatów were mostly expelled to Dolina and Bolechów in September 1941; see Shimon Kanc, ed., Sefer zikaron le-kehilat Rozniatow (Tel Aviv: Rozniatow, Perehinsko, Broszniow and Environs Societies in Israel and the USA, 1974), pp. 157–206.
8. Sandkühler, “Endlösung,” pp. 344–345.
9. DALO, R 1952-1-62, p. 88, Judenrat in Bolechów an Kreisjudenrat in Stryj, October 1, 1942.
10. Regnier, Damals in Bolechów, p. 152.
11. DALO, R 1952-1-62, p. 63, report of mayor on Jews working in the town of Bolechów, October 29, 1942.
12. Eshel and Eshel, Sefer ha-Zikaron, pp. 324, 345–346.
13. DALO, R 1952-1-62, p. 65, Bürgermeister in Bolechów an die Kreishauptmannschaft, November 13, 1942; Regnier, Damals in Bolechów, p. 153.
14. Eshel and Eshel, Sefer ha-Zikaron, p. 325.
15. Berenstein, “Eksterminacja,” table 10; Dieter Pohl, Nationalsozialistische Judenverfolgung in Ostgalizien 1941–44: Organisation und Durchführung eines staatlichen Massenverbrechens (Munich: R. Oldenbourg, 1997), pp. 260, 358; Regnier, Damals in Bolechów, pp. 161–162.

BORSZCZÓW

Pre-1939: Borszczów, town, powiat center, Tarnopol województwo, Poland; 1939–1941: Borsbchov, raion center, Ternopol’ oblast’,

Ukrainian SSR; 1941–1944: Borszczow, Kreis Czortkow, Distrikt Galizien, Generalgouvernement; post-1991: Borsbchiv, raion center, Ternopil’ oblast’, Ukraine

Borszczów is located 98 kilometers (61 miles) south-southeast of Tarnopol. In mid-1941, there were approximately 3,000 Jews living in Borszczów: this number includes both local Jews and some refugees from central and western Poland.¹

Hungarian troops occupied Borszczów on July 7, 1941. A few Jews, mostly men, escaped with the retreating Soviet troops. On July 8, Hungarian soldiers accompanied by Ukrainian policemen went from house to house, confiscating radios from the Jews, sometimes robbing them as well.² During these first days of occupation, antisemitic Ukrainians tried to organize a pogrom in the town, but the Hungarian military authorities intervened to prevent the maltreatment of Jews.³ At this time the Hungarian military commandant ordered the creation of a Jewish Committee, which was headed by Wolf Hess. In August 1941, several thousand Jews deported from Hungary passed through Borszczów, where they received some assistance from the local Jewish community. They were then handed over to the Germans, who shot them.⁴

In August 1941, the Hungarian forces withdrew and transferred authority to a German civil administration. Borszczów became part of Kreis Czortkow, within Distrikt Galizien. The Kreishauptmann was at first the former deputy Gestapo chief in Stettin, SS-Sturmbannführer Dr. Gerhard Littschwager, and from late April 1942, the former Stadthauptmann (head of the city) of Lwów, SS-Hauptsturmführer Dr. Hans Kujath.

The anti-Jewish Aktions in Borszczów were organized and carried out by a squad from the Security Police outpost (Sipo-Aussendienststelle) in Czortków. This unit was headed in turn by SS-Obersturmführer Karl Hildemann (October 1941 to October 1942), SS-Untersturmführer Hans Velde (October 1942 to February 1943), and SS-Sturmscharführer Heinrich Peckmann (February to September 1943).⁵

In Borszczów there was a Criminal Police (Kripo) post, which was subordinate to the Sipo outpost in Czortków, as well as a Gendarmerie post and a squad of Ukrainian Auxiliary Police, all of which played an active role in the anti-Jewish Aktions.

When power was transferred to the Germans, the situation of the Jews sharply declined. They were forced to wear white armbands bearing a blue Star of David and were forbidden to leave the town limits, appear on the main street, or even leave their houses; all Jewish men aged between 14 and 60 had to perform forced labor. For purchasing groceries, Jews were restricted to one hour in the middle of the day. In response to this measure, the Jewish Committee, which had been converted into a Jewish Council (Judenrat), established its own shops, but this system was abused by some Judenrat members and their families. The Jewish community was also subjected to a series of “fines,” and the Judenrat members were threatened with being shot if the goods requested were not delivered on time.⁶

On November 14, 1941, a detachment of Security Police from Czortków carried out the first anti-Jewish Aktion during which elderly and sick Jews were shot. After the Aktion, Josef Littner in Zbaraż received a postcard from the Judenrat informing him of the death of his relatives.⁷ In the winter of 1941–1942, several groups of young Jews were sent to the labor camps in Stupki, Kamionki, and Borki Wielkie.

On April 1, 1942, a Jewish residential district (open ghetto) was established in Borszczów. A curfew from 6:00 P.M. to 6:00 A.M. was imposed, and non-Jews were forbidden from entering the district or having any contact with Jews. Nevertheless, contacts continued secretly, especially for barter, and non-Jews also relayed information to other towns.

In late July 1942, the head of the Judenrat, Wolf Hess, was sent to the Bełżec extermination camp for sabotaging German orders. A refugee from Vienna, Oscar Hessing, was appointed chairman of the Judenrat in his place; unlike Hess, he carried out all the occupants' demands. His brother Shimon was the head of the Jewish Police (Jüdischer Ordnungsdienst), which imposed punishments of beatings and fines.

On September 26–27, 1942, the second anti-Jewish Aktion was carried out during which 800 Jews were deported to the Bełżec extermination camp, and about 100 people (the elderly and the sick) were killed on the spot. After this Aktion, some of the remaining able-bodied Jews who had not been deported or killed on September 26–27, from the neighboring towns of Mielnica, Skalat, Jezierzany, Korolówka, and Krzywca, were transferred to Borszczów. As a result, there were now more than 4,000 Jews in Borszczów. With this influx the Judenrat was reconstituted such that each of the newly arrived groups was now represented.

On December 1, 1942, the Jewish residential district in Borszczów was converted into an enclosed ghetto and isolated from the rest of the town on the orders of the Higher SS and Police Leader (HSSPF) in the Generalgouvernement, SS-Obergruppenführer Friedrich-Wilhelm Krüger.⁸ Within the ghetto, the Judenrat had numerous responsibilities, including social welfare, ghetto workshops, statistics, food distribution, and tax collection. Jews were not permitted to contact the German authorities directly but only via the Judenrat. Owing to the problems in managing scarce resources, there was much animosity towards the Judenrat, especially among the new arrivals. Nevertheless, cultural activities continued, as some inmates wrote poems and songs.⁹

In the spring of 1943, Aktions in the ghetto recommenced. Thus, on March 13, 1943, about 400 Jews were sent to the Janowska Street labor camp in Lwów, 800 Jews were shot on April 19 at the Jewish cemetery, and 700 more were shot on June 5. On June 9, 1943, German forces and their collaborators began the liquidation of the ghetto, during the course of which 1,800 people were shot in the Jewish cemetery, and Borszczów was officially pronounced to be judenrein (cleansed of Jews). Nevertheless, 60 Jews remained in the town for some time, engaged in sorting Jewish belongings, as well as there being several hundred Jews in hiding. Of the latter group, the Germans were able to lure a number out of hiding, and they shot 360 people on August 14, 1943.

Altogether, in 1941–1943, according to the documents of the Soviet Extraordinary State Commission (ChGK) for the Borshchov raion, 4,557 Jews were shot in the town; they are buried in 15 mass graves in the Jewish cemetery and include nearly all of the victims of the German occupation of the town.¹⁰

In the spring of 1942, in the Jewish residential district, a resistance group was created, which was headed by Wolf Ashendorf, Joel Weintraub, and Kalman Schwartz. Not long before the last Aktion, members of the group escaped to the surrounding forests. In the summer and fall of 1943, the group performed several operations against the German occupation forces and the Ukrainian police. Thus, on November 17, 1943, the group freed 50 prisoners (including 20 Jews) from the Borszczów prison.

The German police carried out a series of operations against the Jewish partisans. During one of these operations, on December 10, 1943, five bunkers were destroyed in the forest near the town, and 13 armed Jews were killed in battle.

SOURCES Publications on the persecution and destruction of the Jewish population of the town include the following: Nachman Blumenthal, ed., Sefer Borshtshiv (Tel Aviv: Irgun yots'e Borshts'ov be-Yisrael Hotsa'at sefarim 'a. sh. Y.L. Perets, 1960); Danuta Dabrowska, Abraham Wein, and Aharon Weiss, eds., Pinkas ha-kehillot. Encyclopaedia of Jewish Communities: Poland, vol. 2, Eastern Galicia (Jerusalem: Yad Vashem, 1980), pp. 102–106; and I. Fajersztejn, "Banda żydowska," in Fun letstn khurbn (Munich: Tsentral historishe komisye baym Tsentral komitet fun di bafrayte Yidn in der Amerikaner zone, 1946), no. 3.

Relevant documentation can be found in the following archives: AŻIH (301/350, 1504, 2522, and 2540); BA-BL (R 58/214); BA-L (ZStL, 208 AR-Z 239/59); DATO; GARF (7021-75-87); USHMM; and YVA.

Alexander Kruglov
trans. Ester-Basya Vaisman

NOTES

1. Tatiana Berenstein, "Eksterminacja ludności żydowskiej w dystryktie Galicja (1941–1943)," BŻIH, no. 61 (1967), table 3.
2. Blumenthal, Sefer Borshtshiv, p. 176.
3. Ibid.; BA-BL, R 58/214, Ereignismeldung UdSSR no. 23, July 15, 1941.
4. Blumenthal, Sefer Borshtshiv, p. 177.
5. Verdict of LG-Sa, 6 Ks 2/62, June 25, 1962, in Justiz and NS-Verbrechen, vol. 28 (Amsterdam: Amsterdam University Press, 2003), Lfd. Nr. 541, p. 664; Peckmann was acquitted by the court in Saarbrücken.
6. Blumenthal, Sefer Borshtshiv, pp. 178–179.
7. Jakob Littner, Journey through the Night: Jakob Littner's Holocaust Memoir [trans. and ed. Kurt Nathan Grübler] (New York: Continuum, 2000), pp. 35–36, which includes a facsimile of the postcard. Blumenthal, Sefer Borshtshiv, p. 180, states that two Hungarian Jews from Budapest were shot on this date for not wearing their armbands.

8. Order of HSSPF Krüger issued on November 10, 1942, published in Verordnungsblatt GG (1942) no. 98, November 11, 1942, reprinted in Tatiana Berenstein et al., eds., Faschismus, Getto, Massenmord: Dokumentation über Ausrottung und Widerstand der Juden in Polen während des zweiten Weltkrieges (Berlin: Rütten & Loening, 1961), pp. 344–345.

9. Blumenthal, Sefer Borshitsiv, pp. 181–182, 219.

10. GARF, 7021-75-87, pp. 1 and reverse side.

BORYSLAW

Pre-1939: Boryslaw, city, Drohobycz powiat, Lwów województwo, Poland; 1939–1941: Borislav, Drogobych raion and oblast', Ukrainian SSR; 1941–1944: Boryslaw, Kreis Drogobytsh, Distrikt Galizien, Generalgouvernement; post-1991: Boryslav, Drohobych raion, L'viv oblast', Ukraine

Boryslaw is located roughly 75 kilometers (47 miles) southwest of Lwów. On the eve of World War II in 1939, there were about 13,000 Jews in the city.¹

On September 12, 1939, German forces occupied Boryslaw. German soldiers imposed forced labor on the Jews and stole their property. Ukrainian nationalists also attacked Jews on the outskirts of the city. After a few days, in mid-September 1939, the Red Army took over the area under the terms of the Nazi-Soviet Pact.

Forces of the German 17th Army occupied Boryslaw on July 1, 1941. The next day, the hastily formed Ukrainian militia, supported by local peasants, organized a pogrom, enraged over the discovery of 44 prisoners murdered in the city by the Soviet People's Commissariat of Internal Affairs (NKVD) as the Red Army retreated. Some German soldiers also participated in the pogrom in which up to 350 Jews were murdered, dozens were wounded, and many others were robbed. After the initial wave of violence, the German military restored order. It soon appointed a Jewish Council (Judenrat), initially led by Michael Herz, which was made responsible for supplying a number of Jews for various forced labor tasks. These included arduous bridge reconstruction work, in the course of which a number of Jews lost their lives.²

On August 1, 1941, authority was transferred to a German civil administration. Boryslaw became part of the Kreis Drohobycz. The Kreishauptmann was initially Sturmbannführer Eduard Jedamzik, who was succeeded in June 1942 by Hermann Görgens. Boryslaw's local administration was directed by a Stadtkommissar. This post was initially held by SA-Hauptsturmführer Bornemann, who was succeeded by Wilhelm Möllers in the fall of 1942.³

From November 18, 1941, a 20-man unit of the Schutzpolizei (Schupo) from Vienna, led by Meister der Schupo Gustav Wüpper, was stationed in the city. On their arrival, the Ukrainian militia, which had been converted into an Auxiliary Police (Ukrainische Hilfspolizei), was subordinated to this unit and placed under the command of Hauptwachtmeister Heinrich Nemetz. A small unit of Criminal Police (Kripo) was also present, directed by the head of the Border Police

Office (GPK) in Drohobycz, Hauptsturmführer Franz Wenzel, who was succeeded in May 1942 by Hauptsturmführer Hans Block.⁴

The Germans conducted the first organized Aktion in Boryslaw at the end of November 1941. On November 27–28, 1941, using a list compiled by the Judenrat, the Security Police from Drohobycz, assisted by the Schupo and the Ukrainian Auxiliary Police, seized around 700 or 800 Jews who were unfit for labor or sick. They were confined in the barracks of the Ukrainian Auxiliary Police and were then transported to the forests of Truskawiec and Tustanowice, where men of the Ukrainian Auxiliary Police and Schupo shot them on November 29.⁵

In the winter of 1941–1942, the Jewish community suffered severely from hunger and typhus, and a number of Jews died. In addition, the Jews were forced to surrender their winter clothing to the Wehrmacht. By February 1942, allowing also for Jews sent to nearby forced labor camps and the repatriation to central Poland of some refugees, the Jewish population had declined to 10,734.⁶

In November 1941, Kreishauptmann Jedamzik in Drohobycz initiated preparations to establish a Jewish residential quarter (open ghetto) in Boryslaw. On November 20, he introduced the death penalty for Jews leaving their place of residence without permission. In March 1942, Stadtkommissar Bornemann approved a plan to establish a ghetto with separate sections for specialist workers, those capable of work, and those unfit for work, in accordance with new regulations to register all Jews for labor service. However, practical ghettoization measures were then postponed until after May 1942, on the recommendation of the German medical official, Medizinalrat Dr. Wilhelm Dopheide, owing to the continuing typhus outbreak and fears that the stream, which would form the border between the “Aryan” and Jewish quarters, might spread disease to the general population.⁷

At the end of July 1942, the Judenrat was ordered to compile a list of deportees for “resettlement to the Pińsk area.” On the morning of August 6, the Schupo, Ukrainian Auxiliary Police, and Jewish Police (Jüdischer Ordnungsdienst) began to round up those selected and detain them in the Graszyna Cinema. The Aktion was temporarily halted because many Jews had escaped into the outlying forests or hidden in the city. The operation resumed later that day, and many Jews were arrested indiscriminately; children, the sick and elderly, and some of those found in hiding were murdered on the spot. Those detained were housed in the overcrowded movie theater, as well as in the former headquarters of the Polish Socialist Party.

On the morning of August 8, the prisoners were taken to the train station, where 400 were selected for the Janowska Street labor camp located near Lwów. Another 250, many of them children under the standard working age, were saved through the intervention of Berthold Beitz, a manager with the German “Karpathen” oil company. The remaining 5,000 Jews—including some from Podbuż, Schodnica, and other villages nearby—were sent to the Bełżec extermination camp. During this process Michael Herz, the head of the Jewish Council, and several policemen managed to escape the city. Heinrich Kahane and Bernard Eisenstein were then appointed as heads of the Jewish Council and Jewish Police, respectively.⁸

Following the Aktion, the Germans established two separate open ghettos in Borysław, in the districts of Potok Górny and Nowy Świat, where the poorest Jews already lived. The non-Jews had to leave these areas within a few days, and Jews were given two weeks to move in. The health and living conditions in the ghettos were very bad, and overcrowding was severe.⁹ In September 1942, there were 1,760 Jews working in the oil industry in Borysław, who had been issued special armbands bearing the letter “A,” as needed workers (Arbeitsjuden). These armbands enabled them to travel to their workplaces and were thought to give them some protection from further roundups. A small number of Jews who worked for Beitz in key positions lived with their families in a separate camp in the Mrasznica suburb, known as the “White House,” where living conditions were much better, including even payment in cash.¹⁰

In early September 1942, Kreishauptmann Görgens set a deadline of September 22 for the concentration of the remaining Jews of Borysław into a ghetto enclosed with barbed wire. This deadline was not met, but on October 13, 1942, Görgens declared that the resettlement of the Jews into the ghetto was completed. The ghetto now consisted of a number of living quarters for Jews, each surrounded with barbed wire and guarded by Ukrainian auxiliaries.¹¹

On October 21–24, 1942, the Germans conducted a third Aktion. First, Jews from outlying communities (including 140 Jews from Schodnica) were deported to the Borysław ghetto, bringing the total number of its inhabitants to 4,890. After the population was assembled, the Schupo and Ukrainian militia, assisted by Company 5, 24th Police Regiment (commanded by Hauptmann Ernst Lederer), arrested 1,020 Jews and deported them to Bełżec. Among those deported were some people who had been issued armbands. In early November, the remaining Jews working in Borysław were officially transferred to the control of the SS, and employers now had to pay the SS 5 złoty per day for their continued use.¹²

A fourth Aktion followed on November 29–30. The Schupo and militia, reinforced by a platoon of mounted police, deported to Bełżec and the Janowska Street camp an estimated 1,500 Jews (mainly the families of those Jews now issued new “R” armbands as Rüstungsarbeiter, or armament worker). Before being deported, the Jews were held under terrible conditions for three weeks in the Graszyna Cinema, which at least gave Beitz the chance to intervene on behalf of about 150 people. A few days before their deportation, on November 21, the local Schupo post, led by Wüpper, also shot 100 Jews who had been found in hiding places. With Beitz’s assistance, some Jews fled across the Hungarian border, but these efforts had to be abandoned after one group was captured, almost leading to Beitz’s arrest.¹³

In November 1942, a forced labor camp (Zwangsarbeitslager, ZAL) was established for Jews working in the oil industry at Mrasznica, close to the privileged Jews in the “White House.” By early December 1942, there were 1,470 Jews working for the Karpathen AG (Aktiengesellschaft) who had been issued passes to leave the ghetto for work. Over the following weeks, an increasing number of Jews were transferred from the ghetto (or Karpathen-Wohnblock) to the ZAL. As many as 400 Jews were shot in and around the city during December 1942. By January 1943, of 993 Jews with ghetto passes, 443 were based at the ZAL, and 550 were still in the ghetto. A number of illegal Jews had also managed to be smuggled into the ZAL. Several hundred additional Jews, working for other German offices, still resided in the ghetto.¹⁴

On February 16–17, 1943, a fifth Aktion took place in which 600 Jews were shot at the slaughterhouse by members of the Ukrainian Auxiliary Police, German mounted police, and Schupo. Among the victims were Jews who worked in the city’s workshops and sawmill, as well as Jews from the ghetto who were deemed unfit for labor. Smaller executions continued during the next few months at the slaughterhouse. Most of the victims were Jews found hiding in the woods outside the city.¹⁵

From May 25 to June 2, 1943, the German forces completed the liquidation of the Borysław ghetto. Schupo and Ukrainian militia forces assembled the surviving inmates at the Graszyna Cinema and made selections for the Janowska Street camp. The security forces then shot an estimated 700 sick, young, and elderly Jews at the slaughterhouse. Among the victims were the members of the Jewish Police, who had been forced to dig the graves. A series of smaller shooting Aktions took place at the slaughterhouse throughout the summer as the Schupo and Ukrainian forces combed the woods and ghetto for Jews in hiding.¹⁶

During 1943–1944, a partisan unit under the command of David Erlbaum was active in the area. It was mostly composed of escapees from the ghetto. The unit was later absorbed into a larger partisan unit of Polish Communists, belonging to the Gwardia Ludowa (People’s Guard, GL). A small resistance organization also existed in the ghetto, led by a man named Marenholz. The group was able to obtain a few small arms and also set fire to a large amount of raw materials and finished products in the ghetto industry.¹⁷

Besides Berthold Beitz, several Polish and Ukrainian residents of Borysław rescued Jews and have been recognized by Yad Vashem as Righteous Among the Nations. Roughly 400 Jews emerged from hiding after the liberation of the city by the Red Army on August 7, 1944. Most of the survivors soon left after the war, and only a few remained in Borysław.¹⁸

Several former members of the Borysław Schupo were prosecuted after the war for their crimes. On July 26, 1956, the regional court of Vienna tried six former policemen, among them Josef Pöll, one of the unit’s most sadistic members, who was sentenced to 20 years in prison. Leopold Mitas was sentenced to life in prison, but the remaining four were acquitted.¹⁹

SOURCES Publications regarding the Boryslaw ghetto and the destruction of the Jews of Boryslaw include the following: Danuta Dabrowska, Abraham Wein, and Aharon Weiss, eds., Pinkas ha-kehillot. Encyclopaedia of Jewish Communities: Poland, vol. 2, Eastern Galicia (Jerusalem: Yad Vashem, 1980), pp. 92–99; Nathan Michael Gelber, ed., Sefer zikaron le-Drobobycz, Boryslaw veba-sevivah (Tel Aviv: Irgun Yotse Drhobits, Borislav veba-sevivah, 1959); Bernd Schmalhausen, Berthold Beitz im Dritten Reich: Mensch in unmenschlicher Zeit (Essen: Pomp, 1991); Tuviah Friedmann, ed., Schupo-Kriegsverbrecher vor dem Wiener Volksgericht: Schutzpolizei Dienstabteilung in Boryslaw: Dokumentensammlung (Haifa: Institute of Documentation in Israel for the Investigation of Nazi War Crimes, 1995); Andrzej Zbikowski, “Inny pogrom,” Karta, no. 5 (1991); Shevah (Sze-wach) Weiss, “Mizh rokami 1941–1945,” Dialohy, nos. 7–8 (1985); M. Terlets’kyi, “Strakhittia druhoi svitovoi viiny u Boryslavs’komu baseini,” in Drobobychchyna—zemlia Ivana Franka (New York, 1975); Alfred Jasiński, “Boryslawska apokalipsa,” Karta, no. 4 (1991); Thomas Sandkühler, “Endlösung” in Galizien: Der Judenmord in Ostpolen und die Rettungsinitiativen von Berthold Beitz 1941–1944 (Bonn: Dietz, 1996); Dieter Pohl, Nationalsozialistische Judenverfolgung in Ostgalizien 1941–1944: Organisation und Durchführung eines staatlichen Massenverbrechens (Munich: Oldenbourg, 1997); and Thomas Geldmacher, Wir als Wiener waren ja bei der Bevölkerung beliebt: Österreichische Schutzpolizisten in Ostgalizien 1941–1944 (Vienna: Mandelbaum, 2002).

Documentation regarding the persecution and murder of the Jews of Boryslaw can be found in the following archives: AŽIH (301/176, 679, 1068, 1315, 2138, 2193, 2465, and 4448); BA-L (B 162/5831-5839 [ZStL, II 208 AR-Z 8/62]; ZStL, II 208 AR 1471/67; and II 208 AR 1468/67); DALO (e.g., R 1933-1-15 and R 2042-1-55); GARF (7021-58-21); RGVA (1275-3-663; and 1323-2-2926); SHLA (Abt. 352 Lübeck/1731ff.); Sta. Bremen (3 Ks 1/53 and 29 Ks 1/66 gegen Friedrich Hildebrand); USHMM (RG-31.003M); VHF (e.g., # 8188, 12064, 14681, and 15542); and YVA.

Alexander Kruglov, Michael McConnell, and Martin Dean
trans. Kathleen Luft

NOTES

1. Tatiana Berenstein, “Eksterminacija ludności żydowskiej w dystrykcie Galicja (1941–1943),” BŻIH, no. 61 (1967).

2. Sandkühler, “Endlösung,” pp. 303–305; according to Sandkühler’s sources, 183 Jews were buried in the Jewish cemetery, but others were killed in hiding, and their bodies may not have been retrieved. RGVA, 1275-3-663, p. 4, report of Ortskommandantur II/347 in Boryslaw dated July 1941, gives the figure of 350 Jews murdered. Zhanna Kovba, Liudianist’ u bezodni pekla: povedinka mistsevoho naseleennia Skhidnoi Halychyny v roki “Ostatocnoho rozv’iazannia evreiskoho pyttannia” (Kiev: Sfera, 1998), pp. 239–242; VHF, # 12064, testimony of Adam Auslander; # 14681, testimony of Jenny Backenroth; # 15542, testimony of Murray Bergman; Geldmacher, Wir als Wiener, pp. 54–57; and AŽIH, 301/2465.

3. Sandkühler, “Endlösung,” pp. 297, 309.

4. Geldmacher, Wir als Wiener, pp. 72, 74, 80; Sandkühler, “Endlösung,” p. 310.

5. GARF, 7021-58-21, p. 44; Sandkühler, “Endlösung,” p. 318; AŽIH, 301/2465; and Berenstein, “Eksterminacija,” table 4.

6. Berenstein, “Eksterminacija,” table 4; Dabrowska, Wein, and Weiss, Pinkas ha-kehillot: Poland, vol. 2, Eastern Galicia, pp. 92–99.

7. Sandkühler, “Endlösung,” pp. 318–324; DALO, R 1933-1-15, pp. 1–2; and R 2042-1-55, p. 32, Umsiedlung der Juden in Boryslaw, March 17, 1942.

8. VHF, # 15542; Sandkühler, “Endlösung,” pp. 336–341; Geldmacher, Wir als Wiener, pp. 105–108.

9. Dabrowska, Wein, and Weiss, Pinkas ha-kehillot: Poland, vol. 2, Eastern Galicia, pp. 92–99; AŽIH, 301/2465.

10. Sandkühler, “Endlösung,” pp. 346, 351; AŽIH, 301/2465.

11. Report of Kreishauptmann Görgens, October 13, 1942, in DALO, R 1933-1-15, p. 2; and AŽIH, 301/176 and 800; Sandkühler, “Endlösung,” p. 348.

12. DALO, R 1933-1-15, p. 2; RGVA, 1323-2-2926, p. 28, report on the resettlement of Jews by Schupo Hauptmann Lederer, commander of Company 5, 24th Police Regiment, October 25, 1942; Sandkühler, “Endlösung,” pp. 354–356; AŽIH, 301/2465.

13. VHF, # 15542; GARF, 7021-58-21, p. 45; Sandkühler, “Endlösung,” pp. 359–361; Pohl, Nationalsozialistische Judenverfolgung, p. 241; Geldmacher, Wir als Wiener, pp. 112–115; Dabrowska, Wein, and Weiss, Pinkas ha-kehillot: Poland, vol. 2, Eastern Galicia, pp. 92–99.

14. Sandkühler, “Endlösung,” pp. 361–366.

15. GARF, 7021-58-21, p. 45; Sandkühler, “Endlösung,” pp. 370–373; Geldmacher, Wir als Wiener, pp. 117–118.

16. GARF, 7021-58-21, p. 45; Geldmacher, Wir als Wiener, pp. 124–130.

17. Il’ia Al’tman, Zbertvy nenavisti: kholokost v SSSR 1941–1945 gg. (Moscow: Fond Kovcheg, 2002), p. 328.

18. Dabrowska, Wein, and Weiss, Pinkas ha-kehillot: Poland, vol. 2, Eastern Galicia, pp. 92–99; and Kovba, Liudianist’, p. 241. For more information regarding Berthold Beitz, see Sandkühler, “Endlösung.”

19. Friedmann, Schupo-Kriegsverbrecher vor dem Wiener Volksgericht.

BRODY

Pre-1939: Brody, city, powiat center, Tarnopol województwo, Poland; 1939–1941: raion center, L’viv oblast’, Ukrainian SSR; 1941–1944: Kreis Zloczow, Distrikt Galizien, Generalgouvernement; post-1991: raion center, L’viv oblast’, Ukraine

Brody is located 87 kilometers (54 miles) east-northeast of Lwów. In 1939, of 18,020 residents, 8,365 were Jewish. In 1940, there were 12,617 Jews, but by mid-1941, of 22,218 residents, just 10,070 were Jews.¹ The sudden increase in the Jewish population was caused by the arrival of many Jewish refugees from western and central Poland in the autumn of 1939. The rapid decrease again by mid-1941 reflected the deportations, especially of Jewish refugees, carried out by the Soviet People’s Commissariat of Internal Affairs (NKVD) in a series of actions in 1940 and the first half of 1941.

After Germany invaded the Soviet Union on June 22, 1941, a small part of the Jewish population was able to evacuate to the east, leaving almost 9,000 Jews in Brody.² Units of the Postwar photograph of the ruins of the main synagogue in Brody.

USHMM WS #23382, COURTESY OF EUGENIA HOCHBERG LANCETER

German army occupied the city on June 29, 1941. At the start of the occupation, the city was controlled by a German military administration; from August 1941, a German civil administration assumed responsibility for governing the area. Brody became part of the Kreis Zloczow, within Distrikt Galizien. Initially, the Kreishauptmann was Gerichts-Assessor Hans Mann, but in January 1942, Dr. Otto Wendt succeeded him. The Kreis was divided into several subdistricts known as Landkommissariate. Fritz Weiss was in charge of the Brody Landkommissariat.

The anti-Jewish Aktions in Brody were carried out under the direction of the office of the Security Police and SD based in Lwów (KdS Lemberg), assisted also by staff from the office of the Criminal Police (Kripo) based in Złoczów, directed by a police officer from Vienna, Otto Zikmund. There was also a local office of the Kripo in Brody, which received its orders from the Criminal Police office in Złoczów. In addition, in Brody there was an office of the German Gendarmerie, which supervised the local Ukrainian Auxiliary Police (Ukrainische Hilfspolizei), headed by Stepan Syhovich. The Gendarmerie and Ukrainian police played an active role in the anti-Jewish Aktions.

Within two weeks of the start of the occupation, the first anti-Jewish Aktion took place in Brody in which 250 members of the Jewish intelligentsia were arrested and murdered by a squad of the Security Police and SD. The forces involved included members of the special operational group (Einsatzgruppe z.b.V.) based in Lwów.³ In July 1941, another 60 Jews were murdered by the intelligence section (Nachrichtenabteilung 2) of the Higher SS and Police Leader (HSSPF) Russia South.⁴

In the second half of July 1941, the German military administration established a Jewish Council (Judenrat), headed by Dr. Jakow Blech. Jews were made to wear white armbands bearing a Star of David; most of their property was confiscated; and they were stripped of many basic rights. The Jews were required to register for compulsory work for very low wages and also had to pay a mandatory fee of 750 rubles each to the main bank in Brody by August 5, 1941. Those who failed to comply with these demands faced severe punishment.⁵

In October 1941, Jews from the surrounding areas were ordered to move to Brody. Some Jews from Brody were also forced to go to Złoczów for work. On October 19, 1941, several groups of young Jewish males who were physically fit for hard work were sent to the Kozaki labor camp. On December 27, 1941, several larger groups were sent to labor camps from which no one usually returned. These camps were located in Lackie Wielkie, Jaktorów, Płuhów, and Zborów.⁶ In January 1942, the German authorities established an open ghetto (Jewish residential district) in Brody. At the same time, Jews were required to give up their winter clothing, including any fur coats and winter shoes.

In June 1942, a number of Jews reportedly were living in the following villages around Brody: Toporów, 734; Leszniów, 321; Sokołówka, 269; Koniuszków, 236; Suchowola, 452; and Stanisławczyk, 626.⁷ On September 19, 1942, the Germans deported 2,500 Jews from Brody to the Bełżec extermination camp. About 300 of them were killed during the roundup. At the end of November, 2,500 more Jews were sent to Bełżec.⁸

On German orders, the Jewish Police was involved in rounding up the Jews; the German Security Police, Gendarmerie, and Ukrainian Auxiliary Police supervised and implemented the deportations and killings. The outpost of the Security Police (Sipo-Aussendienststelle) in Sokal under the command of SS officer Oswald Heyduk organized the first deportation Aktion. The second Aktion was conducted by forces under the command of SS officer Carl Wöbke of the outpost's Jewish section, assisted by the Ukrainian Auxiliary Police.

On December 2, 1942, around 2,000 more Jews were brought into the ghetto from various villages, including Toporów, Podkamień, Sokołówka, Stanisławczyk, Leszniów, Koniuszków, Ponikawica, Ponikwa, and Suchowola. Around this time, in accordance with the order of HSSPF for the Generalgouvernement Friedrich Wilhelm Krüger, issued on November 10, 1942, the German authorities set up an enclosed ghetto in Brody.⁹ The ghetto was located around Shlitalnaia Street, where most Jews already lived, and it was surrounded with barbed wire with only a single entrance. German and Ukrainian police guarded the ghetto. Placards declared that anyone attempting to leave would be shot. The overcrowding in the ghetto was terrible: often as many as 25 or 30 people had to share one small room.

Those Jews who received special work passes because they were working for the Wehrmacht ("W") or for the armaments industry (Rüstungsindustrie, "R"), however, were put into small labor camps consisting mostly of enclosed barracks located at the factories, some inside and some outside the ghetto. The total number of people in the ghetto increased to more than 5,000. During the winter of 1942–1943, about 1,000 people died from starvation, sickness, and disease, especially from typhus.¹⁰

On May 21, 1943, the HSSPF for Distrikt Galizien, Friedrich Katzmann, issued orders for the liquidation of the Brody ghetto, which resulted in the immediate shooting of 100 Jews and numerous deportations to concentration or extermination camps (probably to Majdanek).¹¹ Some Jews offered armed resistance, killing four Ukrainians and several German policemen. This rebellion provoked the German forces into treating the remaining Jews even more brutally, burning down some of the houses to force hiding Jews to come out. The liquidation of the ghetto took about one month, lasting well into June 1943.¹²

Two months after the liquidation of the Brody ghetto, there still remained about 40 Jews working in the city, but they were murdered on July 19, 1943.

At the end of 1942, a Jewish resistance organization was secretly formed in the Brody ghetto. The leaders of the group were Jakow Linder and Shmuel Weiler. They managed to develop contacts with the Jewish underground organization in the Lwów ghetto, as well as with members of a secret Communist Party group called Narodnaia Gvardia imeni Ivana Franka, which was also based in Lwów. Their primary goal was to establish an independent partisan force, which would have three bases operating clandestinely throughout the Lwów region to resist the murder of the Jews. In April 1943, around 70 Jews managed to escape from the ghettos. Linder's group organized a number of attacks on ghettos, forced labor camps, and other targets, which were only weakly protected. Among the successful attacks were those on the fuel factory in Sokolowska and against the labor camp in Sasów. As a result of the above-mentioned efforts to liberate Jewish prisoners, the strength of the resistance was augmented. The partisans were also active in blowing up bridges used by German troops.¹³

As a result of the interrogation of some captured partisans, the Germans acquired more detailed information about the group operating in the forests near Brody. Consequently, German soldiers and Ukrainian police searched the area and launched a number of raids, which resulted in the killing of 33 Jewish partisans.¹⁴

One group of Jews in Brody managed to escape the liquidation operations and hid in the ruins of the old synagogue. However, the local police reported their presence to the Germans. The German commander, Meister der Gendarmerie Damm, ordered the arrest of the Jews. Of the 12 Jews hiding there, 6 were captured and murdered by the German security forces and their collaborators.¹⁵ At the time of the liberation of Brody in 1944, several hundred Jews returned to the city, having survived with the partisans in the surrounding forests or in hiding.

After the war, Otto Wendt was a secretary in the Ministry of Economics in Lower Saxony, Germany. In 1969, without bringing charges, the German authorities abandoned their investigation into his alleged involvement in the persecution of the Jews. Otto Zikmund was extradited to the USSR in 1949; he was convicted by a Soviet court and died in prison. S.I. Syhovich was sentenced to death by a Soviet military tribunal and executed in 1944.

SOURCES Information on the Jewish community of Brody and its fate during the Holocaust can be found in the following publications: Mosad HaRav Kook and N.-M. Gelber, Toldot Yebudei Brody 1584–1943 (Jerusalem, 1955); Aviv Melzer, ed., Ner tamid, yizkor li-Brodi: Sefer zikaron li-kebilat Brodi u-sevivat (Israel: Irgun yots'e Brodi be-Yisrael, 1994); Danuta Dabrowska, Abraham Wein, and Aharon Weiss, eds., Pinkas ha-kehillot. Encyclopaedia of Jewish Communities: Poland, vol. 2, Eastern Galicia (Jerusalem: Yad Vashem, 1980), pp. 121–134; Iakov Khonigsman, Evrei goroda Brody (1584–1944) (L'viv, 2001); Chymak, ed., Brody and Bridesbuna: Historical and Memorial Collection (Toronto, Ontario, 1998); Henry Friedman, I'm No Hero: Journeys of a Holocaust Survivor (Seattle: University of Washington Press, 1999); Shmuel Weiler, "The Jewish Resistance Movement in Brody," in Meyer Barkai, ed., The Fighting Ghettos (Philadelphia and New York: J.B. Lippincott, 1962), pp. 109–117; and F. Zorne Laufer, "Dziennik z czasów okupacji hitlerowskiej (Brody)," BŻIH, no. 59 (1966): 93–100.

Documentation about the persecution and murder of the Jews in Brody during the Holocaust can be found in the following archives: AŻIH (301/39, 40, 198, 1777, 2888, 4517, 4737, 5439; and 302/170 and 227); DALO (R 77-1-574); GARF (7021-67-80); USHMM (RG-02.156 and RG-50.002*0057); and YVA.

Alexander Kruglov
trans. Andriy Tsintsiruk

NOTES

1. Khonigsman, Evrei goroda Brody, p. 102.
2. Tatiana Berenstein, "Eksterminacja ludności żydowskiej w dystrykcie Galicja (1941–1943)," BŻIH, no. 61 (1967), table 12.
3. GARF, 7021-67-80; Berenstein, "Eksterminacja," table 12.
4. See LG-Kais Verdict of Dec. 22, 1976 (18 Js 7/73 Ks) and Verdict of June 25, 1982 (18 Js 7/73 Ks).
5. AŻIH, 301/170, testimony of Samuel Weiler.
6. Ibid.
7. Berenstein, "Eksterminacja" tables 5, 12.
8. AŻIH, 301/170.
9. Polizeiverordnung des HSSPF Krüger über die Errichtung jüdischer Wohnbezirke, November 10, 1942, Verordnungsblatt des Generalgouvernements, November 11, 1942.
10. GARF, 7021-67-80, pp. 88–89, statement of Rosa Lerner, September 11, 1944.
11. Ibid., pp. 82, 88.
12. Friedman, I'm No Hero, p. 29; DALO, R 77-1-574.
13. Khonigsman, Evrei goroda Brody, pp. 86–87.
14. Weiler, "The Jewish Resistance," pp. 109–117.
15. AŻIH, 301/170.

BRZEŻANY

Pre-1939: Brzeżany (Yiddish: Berezhan), town, powiat center, Tarnopol województwo, Poland; 1939–1941: Berezhan, raion center, Ternopol' oblast', Ukrainian SSR; 1941–1944: Brzezany, Kreis center, Distrikt Galizien, Generalgouvernement; post-1991: Berezhan, raion center, Ternopil' oblast', Ukraine

Brzeżany is located 48 kilometers (30 miles) west-southwest of Tarnopol. The Jewish population of Brzeżany was 3,670 in 1931. Jews were the second-largest ethnic group in the town after the Poles. On the eve of World War II, Poles constituted 42.2 percent, Jews 35.5 percent, and Ukrainians 22.3 percent of the local population.

VOLUME II: PART A

The Red Army occupied Brzeżany in September 1939 in accordance with the terms of the Molotov-Ribbentrop Pact. After the Germans launched their invasion of the USSR on June 22, 1941, the first Wehrmacht units arrived on July 4. A small number of Brzeżany's Jews fled with the retreating Soviets. Ukrainians, mainly from nearby villages, broke into the Brzeżany prison, where they found the mutilated bodies of Ukrainian nationalists who had been arrested by the People's Commissariat of Internal Affairs (NKVD). Some corpses were floating in the local river. The prevailing popular images of Jewish collaboration with the Soviets and the wrath ensuing from the murder of Ukrainian prisoners resulted in an anti-Jewish pogrom on July 6. Dozens of Jews were forced to dig graves and bury the Ukrainian dead. Then they were slaughtered by the Ukrainian mob, some with their own spades. A Ukrainian crowd ran all over town, looting Jewish property and occasionally killing and wounding Jews.¹

German administrative personnel began arriving in Brzeżany in the fall of 1941. The highest-ranking German official in town and in Kreis Brzeżany was Kreishauptmann Hans-Adolf Asbach, a Nazi Party member trained in law and economics. The Brzeżany Kreishauptmannschaft was located in the impressive modern building of the pre-war Polish high school. Asbach wanted to transform Brzeżany into a German-looking town. Hundreds of Jews were forced to raze buildings and prepare open spaces for future construction, which was never realized. His grandiose architectural fantasies wreaked additional damage on the already half-devastated town. Asbach assisted the German Security Police in the roundups and deportations of Brzeżany's Jews.² The local representation of the Volksdeutsche Mittelstelle (Office for Ethnic German Affairs, VoMi), in charge of appropriating Jewish property, was headed by Hubert Kohnen, a member of the Nazi Party. He arrived in Brzeżany in the summer of 1942 and remained there until the last roundup in June 1943. Though his official work was to collect Jewish property, he apparently participated in the murder of Brzeżany Jews in the old Jewish cemetery on Okopisko Hill. "Hubert," as people referred to him, was the terror of Brzeżany's Jews. Some of the few survivors recalled him as "the Mephisto of the Ghetto" or "the Angel of Death."³

Several police units were stationed in Brzeżany. The German Gendarmerie consisted of nine men. A particularly vicious Gendarme was Zipprich, who participated in the Okopisko killings. The Sonderdienst, the Special Police, a group of about 30 men, was subordinated to Kreishauptmann Asbach, and most of its members were Volksdeutsche (ethnic Germans). There was also a local branch of the Criminal Police (Kripo). The local Ukrainian Auxiliary Police (Ukrainische Hilfspolizei), headed by a Ukrainian officer, consisted of a few dozen men, supervised by the German Gendarmerie.⁴

A short while after his arrival in Brzeżany, Asbach nominated a Jewish Council (Judenrat). The chairman was Dr. Shi-

mon Klarer, and his deputy was Israel Ros. Among its members were Dr. Philip Pomerants, Dr. Bernard Falk, and Dr. Eliezer Wagszal. The Brzeżany Judenrat assisted the German authorities in their anti-Jewish policies, but it also attempted, as much as it could, to ameliorate the terrible living conditions of the local Jewish population. The Judenrat appointed a Jewish Police force (Jüdischer Ordnungsdienst), consisting of 12 young men, some of them local Jews and some Jewish refugees.⁵

The first Aktion, the so-called intelligentsia roundup, occurred on the eve of Yom Kippur in early October 1941. All local Jewish males were required to report to the Brzeżany marketplace. About 600 Jews, mostly professionals and merchants, were detained and locked up in the Brzeżany prison. Asbach promised the Judenrat to help free them in return for 3 kilograms (6.6 pounds) of gold, which he got from the Judenrat, but nobody was released. The men were loaded onto trucks and driven in the direction of the village of Raj, southwest of Brzeżany, where men of the Security Police (Sipo) from Tarnopol shot them. Their bodies were buried in a nearby quarry. Most of the killings of Brzeżany Jews were conducted by the German Sipo outpost in Tarnopol. The Security Police in Tarnopol was headed by SS-Sturmbannführer Herman Müller and his specialist on Jewish affairs, Willi Herrmann. The next large-scale Aktion in Brzeżany took place in mid-December 1941, on the second day of Hanukkah.

About 1,000 Jews, mostly the elderly, women, and children, were rounded up and taken on foot and in horse-drawn carts in the direction of Podhajce, southeast of Brzeżany. A Sipo detachment from Tarnopol, headed by Herman Müller, was waiting for them in the Litiatyn Forest, halfway between Brzeżany and Podhajce. All were shot on the spot and buried there.⁶

On January 15, 1942, an announcement was published in the local Ukrainian newspaper: "Jews who leave their designated quarter without permission, as well as those who provide them with shelter, are subject to the death penalty."⁷ The final establishment of the ghetto in the center of Brzeżany occurred in the fall of that year, with a number of Jews being brought in from surrounding villages such as Narajów.⁸ The first mass deportation from Brzeżany to the Bełżec extermination camp was carried out on Yom Kippur, September 21 and 22, 1942, by the Tarnopol Sipo, with the assistance of the local Ukrainian police. More than 1,000 Jews were loaded onto freight cars at the Brzeżany railway station. A few managed to jump off the train and make it back to Brzeżany.⁹ Then 1,000 Jews were deported from Brzeżany to Bełżec on October 31, 1942, arriving in Bełżec in early November. Another 1,500 Jews were rounded up in Brzeżany on the first day of Hanukkah, December 4, 1942, and sent to Bełżec.¹⁰

The first roundup of 1943 took place in late March and early April. It lasted three days. Some of those apprehended were deported to nearby labor camps. Others were shot at the old Jewish cemetery on Okopisko Hill, on the way to Raj. The last roundup and the liquidation of the Brzeżany ghetto occurred on Saturday, June 12, 1943, two days after the Shavuot holiday. It was directed and supervised by SS-Scharführer

Willi Herrmann. The last Jews of the Brzeżany ghetto, including the “W” group of some 300 Jewish men, supposedly needed as workers by the Wehrmacht, were marched to the Okopisko Jewish cemetery. Some 1,400 Jews were shot one by one on that day and buried in mass graves. Brzeżany became officially cleansed of Jews (judenrein).¹¹ Those Jews who survived the liquidation of the Brzeżany ghetto went into hiding with non-Jewish families, mainly Polish. Some were hidden by mixed Polish-Ukrainian families, and very few, by Ukrainians.

The first Red Army units entered Brzeżany on July 22, 1944. Fewer than 100 of Brzeżany’s Jews, including some children, returned to the town. Almost all left within a year and were repatriated to Poland. Among them were also a few Brzeżany Jews who had survived the war in the Soviet Union.¹²

SOURCES Articles and memoirs on the Brzeżany ghetto and the extermination of Brzeżany’s Jews can be found in the Brzeżany yizkor book, edited by Menachem Katz, Brzezany, Narajow ve-baseviva: Toldot kehillot shenebrevu (Haifa: Association of Former Residents of Brzeżany, Narajow, and Vicinity, 1978); and in Danuta Dabrowska, Abraham Wein, and Aharon Weiss, eds., Pinkas ha-kehillot. Encyclopaedia of Jewish Communities: Poland, vol. 2, Eastern Galicia (Jerusalem: Yad Vashem, 1980).

For published memoirs on Brzeżany’s Jews, see Oren Elyashiv, Ha-rofe shebazhar (Tel Aviv: Sifriat Poalim, 1981); Menachem Ben Shimon Katz, Bishvilei ha-tikva (Tel Aviv: Eked, 1992; repub. Jerusalem: Carmel, 2006) [a Polish translation was published as Na ścieżkach nadziei (Warsaw: Żydowski Instytut Historyczny, 2003); and an English translation, Path of Hope, was published by Yad Vashem in 2007]; and Hersch C. Altman, Brzezany Boyhood (Jerusalem: Yad Vashem, 2006).

A comprehensive study of Brzeżany in the years 1919–1945 can be found in Shimon Redlich’s Together and Apart in Brzezany: Poles, Jews and Ukrainians, 1919–1945 (Bloomington: Indiana University Press, 2002). It has also been published in Polish (2002), Ukrainian (2003), and Hebrew (2005).

Documentation regarding the extermination of Brzeżany’s Jewish community can be found in the following archives: AŻIH (301/879); BA-L (ZStL, 208 AR-Z 76/61); DATO (R 274-1-123, p. 106); GARF (7021-75-370); VHF; and YVA (e.g., M-1/E/263; M-33/896).

Shimon Redlich

NOTES

1. Katz, Brzezany, Narajow ve-baseviva, p. 261; Redlich, Together and Apart, pp. 104–106, 116; and YVA, M-1/E/263, testimony by Pinhas Fenner.

2. Berezhans’ka zemlia: Istorichno-memuarnii zbirnyk (New York: Berezhany Regional Committee), vol. 1, pp. 304–305; Zbigniew Rusinski, Tryptyk Brzeżański (Wrocław: W kolorach tęczy, Oficyna Artystyczno-Wydawnicza, 1998), pp. 36–37.

3. YVA, Brzezany collection of witnesses’ testimonies collected by the Israeli Police, peh-ayin/01167; and BA-L, ZStL 208 AR 797/66 (Becker case).

4. BA-L, ZStL 208 AR-Z 76/61 (Asbach case); Berezhans’ka zemlia, vol. 1, p. 303.

5. Katz, Brzezany, Narajow ve-baseviva, pp. 264–269.

6. Ibid., pp. 266–268, 271–273.

7. Berezhans’ki visti, 3(46), January 15, 1942.

8. AŻIH, 301/879, testimony of Mojżesz Kin, who recalls that his family was brought from Narajów to Brzeżany following the Aktion on Yom Kippur (September 21) 1942. DATO, R 274-1-123, p. 106, notes that the ghetto was located in the center of town.

9. Katz, Brzezany, Narajow ve-baseviva, pp. 305–313; Robin O’Neil, “Belzec: A Reassessment of the Number of Victims,” East European Jewish Affairs 29: 1–2 (Summer–Winter 1999): 95.

10. Katz, Brzezany, Narajow ve-baseviva, pp. 328–329; O’Neil, “Belzec: A Reassessment,” pp. 99–100.

11. YVA, M-33/896, documents of the Soviet Extraordinary State Commission (GARF, 7021-75-370); Katz, Brzezany, Narajow ve-baseviva, pp. 334–339; Katz, Bishvilei ha-tikva, pp. 9–26.

12. Redlich, Together and Apart, pp. 147–149.

BU CZACZ

Pre-1939: Buczacz, city, powiat center, Tarnopol województwo, Poland; 1939–1941: Buchach, raion center, Ternopol’ oblast’, Ukrainian SSR; 1941–1944: Buczacz, Kreis Czortków, Distrikt Galizien, Generalgouvernement; post-1991: Buchach, raion center, Ternopil’ oblast’, Ukraine

Buczacz is located 55 kilometers (34 miles) south-southwest of Tarnopol. An apparently gerrymandered Polish census in 1931 claimed 23,884 residents, of whom half were Roman Catholic and one third Jewish.¹ But the demographic reality indicated a Ukrainian rural majority and a Jewish urban plurality.

On July 5, 1941, the German army reached Buczacz, expelling the Soviets, who had occupied the town since September 1939. The following day the 101st Light Infantry Division reported “murders of inhabitants (Ukrainians) in the jails of Buczacz and Czortków,” noting that “a Ukrainian militia took over as local police until the arrival of German troops.” Such army units merely passed through Buczacz on the way to the east.² Meanwhile, the self-proclaimed Buczacz “Sich,” or Ukrainian militia, included more than 100 men initially commanded by Tadei Kramarchuk and Andrii Dan’kovych, along with the representative of the Organization of Ukrainian Nationalists, Myron Hanushevs’kyi. In late July, command over the militia was transferred to former public prosecutor Volodymyr Kaznovs’kyi. The Sich abused, looted, exploited, and murdered Jewish inhabitants of Buczacz. Together with a few Gestapo officials, in mid-July it executed at least 40 politically suspect Jews, Poles, and Ukrainians. Then on August 25, the militia assisted a German police unit from Tarnopol in a mass shooting of some 400 Jewish craftsmen and professionals on the Fedor Hill, not far from the center of Buczacz.³

There were at the time approximately 8,000 Jews in Buczacz, making up about half the total population. Because many Jews were conscripted into the Red Army or fled to the east, and refugees were streaming in from the west, Portrait of Polish rescuer, Gregory Baran, who hid six Jews fleeing an Aktion in Buczacz in 1941. Baran was recognized as Righteous Among the Nations in 2001.

USHMM WS #57638, COURTESY OF JFR

precise figures cannot be determined. In early August, the Germans established a Jewish Council (Judenrat) of 12 men and a unit of Jewish Police (Jüdischer Ordnungsdienst) that grew to about 30 members. The first head of the Judenrat was Mendel Reich, former chairman of the kehillah, or Jewish community, who was assisted by a deputy, Rabbi Chaim Schapira, and a secretary, the lawyer and chairman of the General Zionists, Dr. Engelberg. Other lawyers on the Judenrat included Samuel (Berko) Hersas; Dr. Szaja Hecht (treasurer); Dr. Emanuel Meerengel, deputy mayor and community chairman in the 1930s; and Dr. Y. Stern. Among additional known members at one time or another were Jankiel Ebenstein; chairman of the Mizrachi, Munisz Frankiel; the merchant Ozjasz Freudenthal; quarry owner Dawid Kanner; factory owner Baruch Kramer; high school teacher Kriegel; physician Dr. Bernhard Seifer; and Dr. Silberschlag. Kanner, Kriegel, and Stern were murdered in the mass shooting of August 1941. Reich was replaced soon thereafter by Silberschlag, who was in turn replaced by Engelberg. The latter, described as an "upright man," escaped with his wife and child, but all three were denounced and shot. In early 1943,

Kramer was appointed head; he was killed in the final liquidation Aktion in June 1943.⁴

The Judenrat has been credited with providing assistance to thousands of Hungarian Jewish expellees, soon to be driven out of Buczacz and murdered in Kamenets-Podolskii by Police Battalion 320 on August 28–31, 1941.⁵ The Judenrat also set up a soup kitchen for the poor and arranged housing for expellees from nearby towns. Nevertheless, most survivors condemned the Judenrat and the Jewish Police for corruption and collaboration. When supplying the Germans with workers for forced labor camps, the Jewish Police, initially commanded by Josef (Józef) Rabinowicz, would "seize . . . only the poorest Jews . . . who could not ransom themselves." Dr. Seifer of the Judenrat "saw the poor as human dust, which was meant to satiate the German beast until the bad times would pass, and thereby to save those who were 'worthy of rescue.'" The last head, Baruch Kramer, came in for the harshest condemnation. This "handsome Jew . . . was still a follower of Hasidism and wore side locks" before the war. But "under the Germans he shaved and became their servant." As head, he "ran around with a hatchet during the roundups and betrayed the hiding places of the Jews. . . . He celebrated with the Germans and forced young Jewish women to come to these feasts." He was thus deemed "more of a collaborator than a Jew," in charge of a Judenrat that "became a tool of the Gestapo." Similar bitterness was expressed about "the shameful actions of the Jewish Police, which, at the height of its degeneration, was headed by Mojżesz Albrecht." Moshe Wizinger, who later fought with the Polish resistance, wrote scathingly: "The Jewish Police are robbing, killing, worse than the Germans; Albrecht walks down the streets in an Ordnungsdienst uniform. Like the Germans, he is holding a whip in his hand and woe to whoever will stand in his way." Albrecht died of typhus in the winter of 1942–1943 and was replaced by the law student Wolcio Wattenberg. The latter was replaced by Lichtenholz, who was eventually shot in June 1943.⁶

Some Ordnungsdienst members eventually turned against the Germans or joined resistance groups in the forests. Jewish policeman Janek Anderman, who attacked the perpetrators during the mass shooting of April 1943, was beaten and then burned alive in the town square. Yitzhak Bauer, who served in the Ordnungsdienst, later became a partisan.⁷ Several Judenrat members resigned in protest; some provided funds to purchase arms; and some chose direct action. Jankiel Ebenstein, who "during his few months . . . in the Judenrat became hated by everyone" and "was called an agent of the Gestapo," was said to have "died a hero's death" when he tried to conceal a bunker with Jews in November 1942 and then attacked and was killed by the Gestapo. "That day," as one account puts it, "he was forgiven everything."⁸

Unlike the Ukrainian police, the Ukrainian mayor of Buczacz, Ivan Bobyk, was reportedly considerate to the Jewish population.⁹ But in the fall of 1941, control over extermination policies in the region reverted to the Security Police (Sipo) outpost based in nearby Czortków. Assisted by several hundred Ukrainian Auxiliary Police, as well as by locally based

German Gendarmes and Ukrainian police, during the next three years this outpost murdered approximately 60,000 Jews in the Czortków-Buczacz region. The Sipo outpost's first chief was Kriminalsekretär Fritz-Ernst Blome, who came there in September 1941. The following month he was replaced by Kriminalkommissar Karl Hildemann, who remained at his post until October 1942. His successor, Kriminalsekretär Hans Velde, remained at the outpost until March 1943, when he was replaced by Kriminalsekretär Heinrich Peckmann, deputy chief from late 1942. In October 1943, Kriminalkommissar Werner Eisel came in as the chief of the Czortków Sipo outpost, which was finally dismantled in early 1944. Of these men, only Peckmann was tried after the war, but he was acquitted of all charges.¹⁰

Another notable character associated with the Czortków Sipo outpost was Kurt Köllner, who was in charge of Jewish affairs from July 1942 to the dismantling of the outpost. Well known for his brutality was Paul Thomanek, who commanded a labor camp in Czortków as of November 1942 and kept a room in Buczacz, where he participated in mass killings and other brutalities, including rapes. While the Buczacz town administrators, or Landkommissare, Richard Lissberg and his successor Walter Hoffer, were not active in anti-Jewish Aktionen, some of the local Gendarmes, notably Peter Pahl, are recalled by witnesses as having been particularly brutal. Buczacz was also the site of the only railroad tunnel in Galicia, blown up by the Red Army in the summer of 1941. The tunnel and bridge were rebuilt by the German firm Ackermann with local Jewish forced labor. Subsequent trials of the perpetrators made use of evidence by German civilians associated with this firm, who witnessed firsthand much of the killing.¹¹

Following the first mass shooting in the summer of 1941, Buczacz was spared from large-scale killing operations for over a year, although hundreds of mostly poor Jewish men were sent to the labor camp of Borki Wielkie near Tarnopol, where many died. The first Aktion, or roundup, occurred on October 17, 1942, when Gestapo personnel, aided by Ukrainian and Jewish policemen, deported some 1,600 Jews to the Bełżec extermination camp; hundreds of others were shot in their homes and on the streets. A second Aktion took place on November 27; approximately 2,500 Jews were deported to Bełżec, and many others were shot on the spot.

Meanwhile, Buczacz was being crammed with Jews brought from surrounding villages. In December 1942, a ghetto, or "residential district," was established, which Jews were not allowed to leave without permission, although it was not enclosed. The crowded conditions and lack of food, sanitation, and medication caused a typhus epidemic that claimed many lives. People were frantically trying to build bunkers or hiding places into which they could flee during a raid, while others sought shelter in the surrounding villages. In early February 1943, a third Aktion took place; this time the approximately 2,000 victims were led to Fedor Hill, where they were shot in front of previously dug mass graves. The bloodletting was so massive that the town's water supply was polluted. The surviving Jews were then divided between those who remained in the ghetto and others who were incarcerated in a labor camp on the outskirts of Buczacz. Only Jews who could afford to pay large sums of money to the Judenrat, as well as members of the Judenrat and the Jewish Police, were admitted into this camp.

The Baedeker tourist guide of 1943 described Buczacz as a town of 9,000 inhabitants, distinguished by its castle, town hall, churches, and monastery on the slope of Fedor Hill. No mention was made of Jews.¹² On March 1, 1943, the German authorities reported the total number of residents in Buczacz as 8,207.¹³ Sporadic killings went on for the next two months, followed by a fourth major Aktion in April, when some 4,000 Jews still living in the ghetto were shot on Fedor Hill, and hundreds of others were killed on the streets. In mid-May, Buczacz was declared to be cleansed of Jews (judenrein), and the surviving Jews, with the exception of those in the labor camp, were expelled to other towns in the area. Most of them were either killed on the way or subsequently slaughtered by the Germans, local collaborators, and bandits who attacked the farms on which they were employed.¹⁴ The labor camp in Buczacz was liquidated in mid-June 1943. Some armed Jewish Police resisted the perpetrators, and in the course of the fighting, many managed to flee to the nearby forests or villages. The rest, some 1,800 people, were shot and buried on Baszty Hill, where the Jewish cemetery was located.

The hunt for hidden Jews continued with the assistance of local denouncers. A certain dynamic developed in this last phase whereby Jews "hiding among the peasants paid high sums for the shelters, and the simple-minded peasants went to town and bought whatever they desired." Consequently, "the Ukrainian murderers . . . began following these peasants . . . and found Jews in attics, cellars, and so on . . . [and] shot them on the spot." This in turn unleashed "large-scale denunciations," and "the peasants themselves began to kill the Jews or evict them."¹⁵ In an attempt to end this upsurge of local killings, a group of local Jewish resisters attacked the notorious "Jew-catchers" Kowalski and Nahajowski.¹⁶ This may be one reason why about 800 Jews were still alive when Buczacz was liberated on March 23, 1944. Tragically, on April 7 a counter-offensive brought the Germans back to Buczacz, and most of these last survivors were murdered. When the Red Army returned on July 21, 1944, fewer than 100 Jews were still alive in Buczacz.

Some of the local Ukrainian residents of Buczacz and its vicinity profited from the genocide by taking over the property of the victims and finding new employment opportunities. The Ukrainian high school teacher Victor Petrykevych noted in his unpublished diary in early January 1944 that although most people were living in "unprecedented poverty . . . some of the people live well and comfortably . . . the war destroys and ruins some, and gives too much to others, often undeservedly." On March 22, the day before the Soviets arrived, he added: "People, merchants, artisans, and so forth, who lived in former Jewish houses . . . are moving out . . . in view of the recent developments in the war. They anticipate Jewish revenge."¹⁷

In fact, there was no Jewish revenge. The few survivors who returned to Buczacz after the liberation soon left the town and ended up mostly in Israel and the United States. Buczacz became part of Soviet Ukraine, an almost exclusively Ukrainian town, with no memory of its Jewish past or of the mass murder of its Jewish population.

SOURCES The most important published source on Buczacz is the yizkor book, Yisrael Cohen, ed., Sefer Buczacz; matsevet zikaron le-kebila kedosha (Tel Aviv, 1956). Also valuable is the entry “Buczacz” in Danuta Dabrowska, Abraham Wein, and Aharon Weiss, eds., Pinkas ha-kehillot. Encyclopaedia of Jewish Communities: Poland, vol. 2, Eastern Galicia (Jerusalem: Yad Vashem, 1980), pp. 83–89, and sources cited therein.

Zbigniew Fedus, “Pierwsza deportacja z województwa tarnopolskiego (10 lutego 1940 roku),” Zesłaniec 21 (2005): 49–63, offers a detailed analysis of Polish deportations by the Soviets. Evaluations of the number of Jews deported to Bełżec can be found in Robin O’Neil, “Bełżec: A Reassessment of the Number of Victims,” East European Jewish Affairs (EEJA) 29: 1–2 (1999): 85–118; and Dieter Pohl and Peter Witte, “The Number of Victims of Bełżec Extermination Camp: A Faulty Reassessment,” EEJA 31:1 (2001): 15–22.

The unpublished diary by the Ukrainian high school teacher Victor Petrykevych (provided by his son) is of great importance in understanding events in Nazi-occupied Buczacz as seen by a conservative nationalist Ukrainian. The published diaries Arie Klonicki-Klonymus’s The Diary of Adam’s Father [in Hebrew] (Jerusalem, 1969) and Baruch Milch’s Testament (Warsaw, 2001) are invaluable, as are several other unpublished lengthy diaries and testimonies written in the immediate aftermath of the war. The 150-page 1947 Polish-language testimony by Moshe Wizinger, cited in the notes, is exceptional in its expressive quality and the range of experiences it depicts, not least of Jewish, Polish nationalist, and Russian Communist collaboration in fighting nationalist Ukrainians and Nazi Germans. Altogether there are hundreds of testimonies by Jews referring to Buczacz, as well as numerous Polish and a few Ukrainian testimonies. Trials conducted in the Federal Republic of Germany in the late 1950s and early 1960s are extremely rich sources of information about the Holocaust in Buczacz; much of it is collected in Justiz und NS-Verbrechen (Amsterdam: Amsterdam University Press, 1968–). Some useful material can also be found in the records of trials conducted by the German Democratic Republic. Investigations by the Soviet Extraordinary State Commission, the NKVD, and the KGB and trials conducted in the Soviet Union similarly contain much useful information.

Published memoirs include Pesach Anderman, The Power of Life [in Hebrew] (Ramat Gan, 2004); Alicia Appleman-Jurman, Alicia: My Story (New York, 1988); Etunia Bauer Katz, Our Tomorrows Never Came (New York, 2000); Yisrael Munczer, A Survivor from Buczacz [in Hebrew] (Jerusalem, 1990); Mina Rosner, I Am a Witness (Winnipeg, 1990); and Moshe Schwartz, Versteimertes Herz (Konstanz, 2005). An interesting memoir and popular history of Buczacz by a former Polish resident is Stanisław J. Kowalski, Powiat Buczacki i jego zabytki (Biały Dunajec-Ostróg, 2005).

The Soviet official postwar view of Buczacz can be gleaned from Igor Duda, Buczacz: The Guide [in Ukrainian] (L’viv, 1985). Conditions in the town in recent years are described in Omer Bartov, Erased (Princeton, NJ, 2007), pp. 127–141.

Scattered documentary and testimonial sources on the Holocaust in Buczacz can be found in a number of archives. In Austria: ÖSA and SWA. In the Federal Republic of Germany: BA-BL; BA-L; BA-MA; BDC; BStU; GLA-K; and other regional archives; ITS; LA-BW; LG-Hag; LG-Man; LG-Sa; and other Landgerichte; and PAAA. In Israel: YVA. In Poland: AAN; AGAD; AŽIH; GUS; and IPN. In the Russian Federation: GARF. In Ukraine: DAI-FO; DALO; DATO; DASBU; HADSBU; TsDAVO; and TsDIAL. In the United Kingdom: BNA and PISM. In the United States: FVA; HI/MID; USHMM; and VHF.

Omer Bartov

NOTES

1. Office Central de Statistique de la République Polonaise, Deuxième recensement général de la population du 9 décembre 1931: Voïévodie de Tarnopol (Warsaw, 1938).

2. BA-MA, RH20-17/32, 5.7.41 (July 5, 1941), 6.7.41; RH26-101/8, 5.7.41; RH24-52/3, KTB, Heft 2, pp. 40–42, 55; RH20-17/38, 6.7.41, 12.7.41; RH20-17/277, 7.7.41; RH26-257/8, KTB Nr. 5, 20.5.41-12.12.41; RH26-257/10, Anlagen z. KTB Nr. 5, vol. 2, 12.7.41, 13.7.41; RH20-17/33, 11.7.41, 12.7.41.

3. HADSBU Ternopil’, Kaznovs’kyi trial (1956–57), spr. 30466, vols. 1–2; 26874; 14050-P; 736; 3713; 14340; 9859-P; 8540-P; 8973-P; 14320-P; Letter by Markus Kleiner, April 10, 1951; AŽIH, 301/327, Izaak Szwarc (1945); IPN, 0192/336, vol. 29, Józef Humeniuk trial (1949).

4. Isidor Gelbart, YVA, O-33/640, and BA-L, ZStL 208 AR-Z 239/59, Band III, Bl. 1004-13, Kurt Köllner trial (1965); Józef Kornblüh, AŽIH, 301/2605 (1945), 301/3279 (1948), 301/3283 (1948); Samuel Rosen, YVA, M-49/1935 (1960); Samuel Rosenthal, AŽIH, 301/2086 (1947?); Moshe Wizinger, YVA, O-3/3799 (1947); M-1/E/1726, unsigned testimony on Baruch Kramer (1948); letter by Jewish physician, signature illegible, June 5, 1946, private collection.

5. HADSBU Ternopil’, spr. 240, vol. 3, photos of Police Battalion 320 in Kopyczyńce near Buczacz; DATO, R 174-1-1283, September 3, 1941.

6. YVA, O-3/3799; Yehoshua Friedlander, 2004, private collection; Jozef Rabinowicz, BA-L, B 162/5163, and BA-L, ZStL 208 AR-Z 239/59, Band III, Bl. 935-938, Köllner trial (1961, 1964); testimonies in notes 3 and 4 and in Cohen, Sefer Buczacz.

7. AŽIH, 301/327; Yitzhak Bauer (Ischak, Izio), BA-L, B 162/5182, testimony at Albert Brettschneider’s trial (1968); interview with author, 2003.

8. YVA, O-3/3799.

9. YVA, O-33/640.

10. USHMM, RG-31.003M, reel 1; Fritz Ernst Blome, BDC, RS/BA-BL; Indictment against Köllner and Heinrich Peckmann, BA-L, DP 3/1645; Werner Eisel, BWSL, GLA-K 309. Zug. 2001_42/881, LG-Man SB. 40.

11. Urteil LG-Hag 601031, Paul Thomanek, in Justiz und NS-Verbrechen, vol. 16 (Amsterdam: Amsterdam University Press, 1976), Lfd. Nr. 498, pp. 727–772; testimony by Henriette Bau (Lissberg), Brettschneider trial (1969), BA-L, B 162/5183; testimony by Walter Hoffer, Köllner and Peckmann trial, BA-L, ZStL 208 AR-Z 239/59 (1960); Peter Pahl, trial, BA-L, B 162/5167, 5169, 5173 (1966–67); Albert Wachinger, employee of Ackermann, Brettschneider trial (1960), BA-L, B 162/5180.

12. Karl Baedeker, Das Generalgouvernement (Leipzig, 1943), p. 235.

13. Amliches Gemeinde- und Dorfverzeichnis für das Generalgouvernement (Krakau, 1943), in GUS Library.

14. AŻIH, 301/3492, Mojżesz Szpigiel (1948); YVA, O-3/3799.

15. Elias Chalfen, YVA, M-1/E/1559 (1947).

16. Bauer, interview; YVA, O-3/3799.

17. Petrykevych diary, unpaginated.

BUKACZOWCE

Pre-1939: Bukaczowce, town, Rohatyn powiat, Stanisławów województwo, Poland; 1939–1941: Bukachevtsy, raion center, Stanislav oblast', Ukrainian SSR; 1941–1944: Bukaczowce, Kreis Brzezany, Distrikt Galizien, Generalgouvernement; post-1991: Bukachevtsy, Rohatyn raion, Ivano-Frankivsk oblast', Ukraine

Bukaczowce is located 35 kilometers (22 miles) west-northwest of Stanisławów. On the eve of World War II in 1939, there were 780 Jews living there.

The Germans entered Bukaczowce on July 3, 1941. A German military commandant's office (Ortskommandantur) initially ruled the town. In August 1941, authority passed to a German civil administration. Bukaczowce was incorporated into Kreis Brzezany, within Distrikt Galizien. The Kreishauptmann in Brzezany was Hans-Adolf Asbach until the beginning of 1943, when he was replaced by Dr. Werner Becker.

Until the end of March 1942, the anti-Jewish Aktions in Bukaczowce were organized by the office of the Security Police and SD (Sipo-Aussendienststelle) in Stanisławów, headed by SS-Hauptsturmführer Hans Krüger. From April 1942, responsibility for the area was transferred to the Sipo office in Tarnopol. From October 1941, the Security Police office in Tarnopol was headed by SS-Sturmbannführer Hermann Müller. In June 1943, he was succeeded by SS-Hauptsturmführer Wilhelm Krüger. In Bukaczowce there was a post of the German Gendarmerie and a unit of the Ukrainian Auxiliary Police (Ukrainische Hilfspolizei) that participated in the anti-Jewish Aktions.

In the summer of 1941, the occupational authorities imposed a curfew on the Jews and ordered them to wear insignia bearing the Star of David. They were also obliged to surrender all their valuables, and several Jews were taken hostage to ensure compliance. Jews were not allowed to leave the town and were frequently beaten by the Ukrainian police, who seized them off the streets for forced labor.

The German authorities soon established a Jewish Council (Judenrat) and appointed Emil Kroiz as its head. They used the Judenrat to communicate their regulations regarding demands made of the Jewish population. The Judenrat had to organize daily work details of Jewish men and women, many of whom had to walk up to 8 kilometers (5 miles) to work on agricultural estates outside the town. Some of those who worked for the local authorities, in services, or in other professions received small salaries, or at least some extra food as pay.¹

At some time between the summer of 1941 and the spring of 1942, a Jewish residential district, or open ghetto, was established in Bukaczowce. In April 1942, Jews from the surrounding villages, including Knihynicze, Wasiuczyn, Łukowiec, Kozara, Czerniów, Tenetniki, Czahrów, Kołokolin, Martynów, and several others, were resettled into Bukaczowce, bringing the total Jewish population there to 1,303. This large influx resulted in severe overcrowding and the worsening of sanitary conditions.² Jews received a basic daily allowance of only 40 grams (1.4 ounces) of bread, causing hunger, especially among those who had been resettled into the town and were able to bring very little property with them to barter for extra food. In September 1942, an epidemic of typhus broke out. Since there was no hospital, the sick continued to live with the healthy, and a number of Jews died as the epidemic spread.³

In the fall of 1942, the Germans conducted two deportation Aktions in Bukaczowce. During the first Aktion on September 21, 230 mostly elderly and sick Jews were deported to the extermination camp at Bełżec via Rohatyn. German and Ukrainian police conducted the Aktion, while the Jewish Police (Jüdischer Ordnungsdienst) assisted them in gathering the deportees next to the office of the Judenrat. As some Jews went into hiding, house searches were conducted, and a few dozen Jews were shot in the town.⁴ Following the deportation, several hundred Jews from Bursztyn were resettled to Bukaczowce on October 15, 1942.⁵ On their arrival there on October 15, there was no room in the Jewish quarter, so the Germans ordered the non-Jews to vacate one street for the Bursztyn Jews temporarily, explaining that the Jews would be deported again after only 11 days.⁶

During the second Aktion, on October 25–26, 1942, a detachment of the Security Police from Tarnopol headed by SS-Sturmbannführer Hermann Müller, assisted by the German, Ukrainian, and Jewish Police, rounded up 550 Jews and deported them to Bełżec.⁷ Besides those deported to Bełżec, 255 more Jews were killed in and around Bukaczowce.⁸

On November 10, 1942, SS-Obergruppenführer Krüger ordered that the Jewish residential district in Bukaczowce should be completely fenced off from the rest of the town, creating an enclosed ghetto.⁹ However, it is doubtful whether such an enclosed ghetto was created.¹⁰ In January 1943, the 320 or so Jews who remained in Bukaczowce were given only three days by the German authorities to move to the enclosed ghetto in Rohatyn, where they shared the fate of the local Jews.¹¹

The Red Army recaptured Bukaczowce on July 27, 1944. Only about 20 Jews from Bukaczowce managed to survive the remainder of the German occupation, hiding in the woods, using false papers, or obtaining the aid of local Christians.

SOURCES A short article on the Jewish community of Bukaczowce and its fate during the Holocaust can be found in Danuta Dabrowska, Abraham Wein, and Aharon Weiss, eds., Pinkas ha-kehillot. Encyclopaedia of Jewish Communities: Poland, vol. 2, Eastern Galicia (Jerusalem: Yad Vashem, 1980), pp. 89–91.

Documents concerning the extermination of the Jews of Bukaczowce can be found in the following archives: AŻIH (301/2572, 3655); DAI-FO; GARF (7021-73-12); and YVA.

Alexander Kruglov
trans. Igor Puchkov

NOTES

1. AŻIH, 301/2572; Dabrowska, Wein, and Weiss, Pinkas ha-kehillot: Poland, vol. 2, Eastern Galicia, p. 90.
2. Tatiana Berenstein, "Eksterminacja ludności żydowskiej w dystrykcie Galicja (1941–1943)," BŻIH, no. 61 (1967). The Jewish survivor Sol Mandel dates the establishment of the ghetto in Bukaczowce in the summer of 1941; see www.shtetlinks.jewishgen.org/Bukaczowce/Threads.htm; also AŻIH, 301/2572. The Jewish populations of these villages in 1921 were as follows: Knihynicze, 414; Wasiucyn, 16; Łukowiec, 16; Kozara, 13; Czerniów, 52; Tenetniki, 17; Czahrów, 38; Kołokolin, 28; Martynów, 97; see Dabrowska, Wein, and Weiss, Pinkas ha-kehillot: Poland, vol. 2, Eastern Galicia, p. 90.
3. AŻIH, 301/2572.
4. GARF, 7021-73-12, p. 3016; Dabrowska, Wein, and Weiss, Pinkas ha-kehillot: Poland, vol. 2, Eastern Galicia, p. 90.
5. Berenstein, "Eksterminacja."
6. Shimon Katz et al., eds., Sefer Burshtin (Jerusalem: Entsiklopedyah shel galuyot, 1960), pp. 324–325, 373.
7. GARF, 7021-73-12, p. 3016.
8. Ibid.
9. Polizeiverordnung des HSSPF Krüger über die Errichtung jüdischer Wohnbezirke, November 10, 1942, Verordnungsblatt des Generalgouvernements, November 11, 1942.
10. Dieter Pohl, Nationalsozialistische Judenverfolgung in Ostgalizien 1941–1944 (Munich: Oldenbourg, 1996), p. 244.
11. Dabrowska, Wein, and Weiss, Pinkas ha-kehillot: Poland, vol. 2, Eastern Galicia, p. 91.

BURSZTYN

Pre-1939: Bursztyn, town, Rohatyn powiat, Stanisławów województwo, Poland; 1939–1941: Burshtin, raion center, Stanislav oblast', Ukrainian SSR; 1941–1944: Bursztyn, Kreis Brzezany, Distrikt Galizien, Generalgouvernement; post-1991: Bursztyn, Halych raion, Ivano-Frankivs'k oblast', Ukraine

Bursztyn is located 37 kilometers (23 miles) north of Stanisławów. On the eve of World War II, about 1,800 Jews lived there.

German troops occupied Bursztyn on July 3, 1941. Until August, the town was under the authority of a German military administration, but the local Ukrainian militia was more or less in control.

On July 20–21, 1941, antisemitic local Ukrainians together with a German noncommissioned officer (NCO) initiated a pogrom against the Jews in Bursztyn. A number of leading Jews were arrested and beaten in the community building. The pogrom organizers then ordered the Jews to collect a tribute of sugar, coffee, liquor, and other valuable materials from their homes. Thereafter, another group of Jews, including two rabbis, were gathered in the synagogue, where they were humiliated, beaten, and had their beards shorn, while being forced to pray. Throughout the night, as the Ukrainians drank and celebrated, Jews were beaten close to death on the streets and their properties looted. Many Jews went into hiding until the pogrom abated.¹

In early August 1941, authority was transferred to a German civil administration. Bursztyn was in Kreis Brzezany. From November 1941 until the start of 1943, Hans-Adolf Asbach served as the Kreishauptmann. From the spring of 1942, the German Security Police post in Tarnopol was responsible for organizing the deportation and killing Aktions against the Jews of Kreis Brzezany. Between October 1941 and May 1943, this post was commanded by SS-Sturmbannführer Hermann Müller. In the town of Bursztyn, there were posts of the German Gendarmerie and the Ukrainian Auxiliary Police (Ukrainische Hilfspolizei), both of which actively participated in the Aktions against the local Jews.

In early August 1941, the German authorities ordered the establishment of an eight-man Jewish Council (Judenrat) in Bursztyn. The first head of the Judenrat was Mine Tobias, but he resigned after a few weeks when he was requested to send Jewish youths to the forced labor camps. He was replaced by his cousin Filip Tobias. Other members of the Judenrat included Jehuda-Hersh Fishman and, for a time, Dr. Lipa Shumer.² One of the first tasks of the Judenrat was to collect part of a massive contribution of 10 million rubles, which the Germans had demanded from the Judenrat in Rohatyn and the surrounding communities, including Bursztyn. According to Dr. Shumer, who traveled to Rohatyn as part of the Bursztyn delegation, the Bursztyn Jews had to pay some 2 to 3 million rubles within a short time. By selling most of their remaining property, somehow the Jews of Bursztyn gathered the sum, but the hopes that the Germans would then leave them in peace went unfulfilled.³

During the first months of the occupation, the German authorities introduced a number of anti-Jewish measures. The Jews were registered by the Judenrat and had to wear white armbands bearing a blue Star of David. Jews were forbidden to trade with non-Jews or to leave the limits of the town. Male Jews were forced to carry out physically demanding work. Jewish survivor Feiga Sager, whose father was a kosher butcher, recalls that the Germans prohibited the ritual slaughter of meat.⁴

The Jewish Council also had an executive force at its disposal, the Jewish Police (Jüdischer Ordnungsdienst). The tasks of the Jewish Police included assembling Jews required for forced labor tasks and collecting required contributions from the Jews. Some time after the first contribution, two Gestapo men arrived in Bursztyn and demanded many silver items and other luxuries. Again the Judenrat somehow managed to collect these things, as the Jews sold their very last precious reserves, despite the ban on trading with non-Jews. Nonetheless, the Germans still kept coming back for more.⁵

Information about the Bursztyn ghetto can be found in the personal accounts in the yizkor book. According to Yankel

Glazer: “the ghetto in Bursztyn was created right after the Germans arrived in the shtetl.” The Jews had to live in the Jewish quarter and were not allowed to come into contact with the Christian population.⁶ Dr. Shumer states “that the Germans did not create a ghetto, but the whole quarter where the Jews lived was converted into a ghetto. Jews had to leave their houses on the main streets, as they were not permitted to live among the Christians.” The resulting Jewish quarter was very overcrowded, with up to 20 people sharing a room. Some Jews from the surrounding countryside had been driven from their homes and gathered in Bursztyn during the first days of the occupation. Their Ukrainian neighbors robbed most of them on the way, and a number were killed.⁷

From late 1941 and during 1942, the Judenrat periodically was required to surrender groups of Jews to work in forced labor camps at Zborów and other sites near Tarnopol on road construction. Conditions in these camps were so bad that many inmates died of exhaustion after only a few weeks.

Living conditions in the open ghetto in Bursztyn were also severe. During the winter of 1941–1942, Jews had to walk almost 5 kilometers (3 miles) to collect firewood from the forest, and sometimes they were beaten and robbed on the way. The Judenrat was responsible for the distribution of the meager bread rations, with those performing forced labor receiving larger portions; but it was accused of showing favoritism, and on occasion people waited for their share in vain.⁸ Some survivors criticize members of the Judenrat harshly, for collaborating too eagerly with the Germans and protecting their own families at the expense of others. Hersh ben Moshe-Ahron Veysman, however, mentions an incident in which he was arrested by the Ukrainian Auxiliary Police for illegally possessing some butter. He was released, however, after the Judenrat paid a bribe to the head of the police.⁹

The Jews suffered from hunger, as they were no longer permitted to buy food from the stores, now owned by the non-Jews in the town. After all the robberies and contributions, the Jews had to barter their last poor items for a piece of bread or a few potatoes. Dr. Shumer recalls the terrible picture of Jews swollen with hunger and children with skinny legs from malnutrition. Many Jews died of hunger, and their bodies were left lying around for several days.¹⁰

In May 1942, the German authorities permitted the establishment of a branch of the Jewish Social Self-Help (JSS) in Bursztyn, appointing Dr. Wolf Schmorsk as its chairman. The other two members of the delegation were Filip Tobias and Dr. Lipa Shumer.¹¹ The late date of its establishment gave the JSS little time to ameliorate the suffering of Bursztyn’s Jews.

In June 1942, a total of 1,564 Jews were registered in Bursztyn. After more Jews from the surrounding villages were brought into the town over the summer, the population rose to 1,650. On September 21, 1942, the first major anti-Jewish Aktion took place. To make up a deportation quota from Rohatyn, German police arrived in Bursztyn and rounded up approximately 200 Jews, killing a number of others who tried to flee. The Jews were escorted to Rohatyn and then deported by train to the extermination camp at Bełżec.¹²

On October 10, 1942, the Germans posted announcements in Bursztyn that all the Jews had to move to Bukaczowce. On their arrival there on October 15, there was no room in the Jewish quarter, so the Germans ordered the non-Jews to vacate one street for the Bursztyn Jews temporarily, explaining that the Jews would be deported again after only 11 days. Then on October 26, several hundred Bursztyn Jews were among a large transport sent from Bukaczowce to the Bełżec extermination camp. A number of Jews were killed in the town during the roundup, which was carried out by members of the Security Police based in Tarnopol, assisted by the local Ukrainian Auxiliary Police.¹³

About 30 Jews remained in Bursztyn after this Aktion concentrated in a camp based in one house, as they were still needed for road construction work. At the end of October these Jews were transferred to the Rohatyn ghetto, where most were murdered together with the local Jews of that area in 1943. A number of Jews managed to escape during the round-ups and sought shelter with local peasants, often in exchange for payment. Many of these people, however, were denounced to, or uncovered by, the Ukrainian Auxiliary Police and were subsequently shot or added to the deportations. Some other escapees also made their own way to the Rohatyn ghetto, due to the difficulties of surviving in hiding.

According to the materials of the Soviet Extraordinary State Commission (ChGK), a total of 1,806 Jews from Bursztyn were deported to the extermination camp at Bełżec or to the Rohatyn ghetto.¹⁴

SOURCES Publications on the persecution and murder of the Jewish population of Bursztyn include the following: Shimon Katz et al., eds., Sefer Burshtin (Jerusalem: Entsiklopedyah shel galuyot, 1960); “Bursztyn,” in Danuta Dabrowska, Abraham Wein, and Aharon Weiss, eds., Pinkas ha-kehillot. Encyclopaedia of Jewish Communities: Poland, vol. 2, Eastern Galicia (Jerusalem: Yad Vashem, 1980), pp. 99–102; and Tatiana Berenstein, “Eksterminacja ludności żydowskiej w dystrykcie Galicja (1941–1943),” BŻIH, no. 61 (1967): 18 (table 2). Shmuel Spector and Geoffrey Wigoder, eds., The Encyclopedia of Jewish Life before and during the Holocaust (Jerusalem: Yad Vashem; New York: New York University Press, 2001), p. 223, mention the open ghetto in Bursztyn, dating its establishment in September 1941.

Documents regarding the persecution and destruction of the Jews of Bursztyn can be found in the following archives: AŻIH (211/263 [JSS]); BA-L (B 162/4134 [AR-Z 76/61 Brzezany, vol. 5]); DAI-FO; GARF (7021-73-2); VHF (# 11656); and YVA.

Martin Dean and Alexander Kruglov
trans. Katrin Reichelt

NOTES

1. Yankel Glazer, “Der gang iber ale gehinums,” pp. 320–321; and Dr. Lipa Shumer, “Ummentshlechn leydn un peyn,” pp. 361–368—both in Katz et al., Sefer Burshtin.

2. Glazer, “Der gang,” p. 323; Shumer, “Ummentshlechn leydn,” p. 369; Yankel Feldman, “In tal fun yammer un gruel,” in Katz et al., Sefer Burshtin, p. 305.

3. Glazer, "Der gang," pp. 321–322; Shumer, "Ummentshlechn leydn," pp. 369–370.
4. Shumer, "Ummentshlechn leydn," p. 369; VHF, # 11656, testimony of Feiga Sager.
5. Shumer, "Ummentshlechn leydn," pp. 370–371.
6. Glazer, "Der gang," p. 323.
7. Shumer, "Ummentshlechn leydn," pp. 368, 371.
8. Feldman, "In tal," pp. 306–307.
9. Hersh ben Moshe-Ahron Veysman, "Durch sheudern un angst," in Katz et al., Sefer Burshtin, pp. 379–380.
10. VHF, # 11656; Shumer, "Ummentshlechn leydn," p. 371.
11. AZIH, 211/263 (JSS).
12. Glazer, "Der gang," p. 324.
13. Shumer, "Ummentshlechn leydn," p. 373; Glazer, "Der gang," pp. 324–325.
14. GARF, 7021-73-2.

BUSK

Pre-1939: Busk, town, Kamionka Strumiłowa powiat, Tarnopol województwo, Poland; 1939–1941: raion center, L'vov oblast', Ukrainian SSR; 1941–1944: Kreis Kamionka-Strumilowa, Distrikt Galizien, Generalgouvernement; post-1991: raion center, L'viv oblast', Ukraine

Busk is located 45 kilometers (28 miles) northeast of Lwów. In 1931, there were 1,840 Jews living in Busk (22.8 percent of the total population).

When German forces occupied Busk on July 1, 1941, there were about 1,900 Jews residing there. Initially, a German military commandant's office (Ortskommandantur) governed the town, but in August 1941 a German civil administration was established. Busk became part of Kreis Kamionka-Strumilowa, within Distrikt Galizien. The Kreishauptmann was at first SS-Untersturmführer Wilhelm Rebay von Ehrenwiesen, and from June 1942, his former assistant SS-Untersturmführer Joachim Nehring was given the position.

The anti-Jewish Aktions in Busk were organized and carried out by a squad of the Security Police (Sipo-Aussendienststelle) from the office in Sokal, which was subordinate to the Commanding Officer of the Security Police and the SD (KdS) in Lwów. The Sokal outpost was headed by SS-Sturmbannführer Hans Block from October 1941, and from May 1942 until October 1943, it was headed by SS-Obersturmführer Oswald Heyduk. In Busk itself, there was a post of German Gendarmerie and Ukrainian Auxiliary Police, which actively participated in the anti-Jewish Aktions. A teacher named Roman Czuczman was appointed head of the police. The mayor was another Ukrainian teacher by the name of Oleksy Bay.¹

During the first days of the occupation, Ukrainians and German soldiers broke into Jewish houses and arrested people who might then be released in return for a ransom. The first Aktion was carried out in mid-July 1941, when 28 Jews from the intelligentsia and two Ukrainians were shot in a forest near Jablunówka as Soviet activists.² The shooting was apparently carried out by a squad (Einsatztruppe) of the Security Police and SD from Lwów.

In July 1941, a Jewish Council (Judenrat), chaired by Isaac Margalit, was created in Busk on orders from the German military administration, and Jews were forced to wear distinguishing markings on their clothing. Jewish property, especially valuables, was confiscated, and Jews were deprived of many basic rights. All Jews had to be registered, and they were compelled to engage in forced labor accompanied by cruel beatings. The Judenrat was responsible for selecting Jews for forced labor, and recruitment was carried out by the Jewish Police (Jüdischer Ordnungsdienst), who wore blue hats and were armed with clubs. Among the labor tasks performed was road construction on the main highway from Lwów to Kiev for the Organisation Todt. The Judenrat managed to limit the robberies and violence by bribing German officials and the Ukrainian Auxiliary Police and trying to meet all their demands.³

In the winter of 1941–1942, an outbreak of typhus spread from the emaciated Soviet prisoners of war. On instructions from the local doctor, the Judenrat set up a separate hospital for Jews to treat those who fell ill; only three or four Jews died of the disease. The Judenrat also ensured that all Jews had work, so that the Gestapo was not able to take away any unemployed Jews. There were no ration cards issued by the Judenrat, but everyone received a portion of potatoes and 250 grams (8.8 ounces) of bread every other day; poor people, who could not supplement these basic rations by bartering with local peasants, received just the bread every day.⁴

On September 21, 1942 (Yom Kippur), the Germans carried out a large Aktion in Busk. On this day, a squad of Security Police from Sokal, with the assistance of the German Gendarmerie and Ukrainian forces, rounded up about 600 Jews who were incapable of work. They were escorted out of town and shot with other Jews from the region in trenches near Kamionka Strumiłowa.⁵

In late October 1942, Jews from the surrounding villages were transferred to Busk. At that time, there were 1,760 Jews in Busk (including the surrounding villages, there were 2,023 Jews).⁶

On December 1, 1942, a ghetto composed of two streets and surrounded by a fence was created in Busk on orders from Kreishauptmann Nehring.⁷ Several hundred Jews died of hunger and disease in the ghetto during the fall and winter of 1942–1943. They were taken out on carts and buried in mass graves in the Jewish cemetery. Jews could leave the ghetto only on Tuesdays and Fridays for two hours to buy food. Otherwise, Jews caught attempting to leave the ghetto would be shot. People bartered their last possessions, including their warm clothes, for something to eat. In January 1943, all the patients in the ghetto hospital were murdered.

From among the Jews in the ghetto, a special workers' brigade was formed. These Jews lived outside the ghetto and wore special armbands bearing a "W" for Wehrmacht, as they worked for the German army and at least for a time were spared from Aktions and other roundups of Jews.⁸ A resistance movement, headed by Jacob Eisenberg, collected arms inside the ghetto and made plans to escape to the forests, but on May 21, 1943, the ghetto was liquidated. German security forces, Ukrainian police, and ethnic Germans stormed Jewish apartments, and many people were murdered on the streets. Those Jews who were rounded up on the main square were then escorted to the Jewish cemetery, where the German forces shot them in a number of mass graves. During the Aktion, some 1,200 people were murdered and about 300 were taken to the Janowska Street labor camp in Lwów. The Jews with the “W” sign on this occasion were among the first victims.⁹ A few Jews were kept alive to assist in cleaning up the ghetto area. The Germans also kept about 30 pretty Jewish girls as “sex slaves” for themselves and the local police. The women became pregnant, and the Germans called in a Security Police detachment from Sokal to shoot them in the forest about 5 kilometers (3.1 miles) away.¹⁰

On June 7, 1943, Kreishauptmann Nehring published an announcement that the ghettos in Busk and Sokal had been dissolved and that his Kreis was now free of Jews (judenfrei). The same poster declared that any remaining Jews were sentenced to death, and the same punishment was threatened against anyone who housed, fed, or hid Jews, or knowingly failed to report their presence to the police.¹¹ Some Jews managed to hide in the ghetto and subsequently escape to the forests, but they faced intensive searches by the Ukrainian police.

Several years after the war, an investigation was opened against Rebay von Ehrenwiesen by the Federal German authorities. However, the case was soon closed owing to insufficient evidence. Nehring was acquitted on August 24, 1981, by the Landgericht in Stade. Block died in August 1944. Heyduk was sentenced to life imprisonment on July 13, 1949, by a court in Munich.

SOURCES Information on the Jewish community can be found in the yizkor book: A. Shayar, ed., Sefer Busk; le-zekher ha-kehila she-barva (Haifa: Busker Organization in Israel, 1965). There is also a memoir of the Holocaust period in Busk by Thomas T. Hecht, who was a teenager at that time, Life Death Memories (Charlottesville, VA: Leopolis Press, 2002). Some of the testimonies collected by the Yahad-in Unum research team in Busk have been published in the book of Father Patrick Desbois, The Holocaust by Bullets (New York: Palgrave, 2008), pp. 161–191.

Documentation regarding the annihilation of the Jews of Busk can be found in the following archives: AŽIH (301/477, 1704, 4486, and 4926); BA-L (ZStL, AR-Z 14/1964; 208 AR 1415/66); GARF (7021-67-82); StA-Lud; YIU; and YVA.

Alexander Kruglov and Martin Dean
trans. Ester-Basya Vaisman

NOTES

1. AŽIH, 301/477, testimony of Maria Steinberg.
2. GARF, 7021-67-82, p. 61; AŽIH, 301/1704, testimony of Israel Hecht.
3. AŽIH, 301/477.
4. Ibid.
5. Tatiana Berenstein, “Eksterminacja ludności żydowskiej w dystrykcie Galicja (1941–1943),” BŽIH, no. 61 (1967), table 5; GARF, 7021-67-82, p. 55; AŽIH, 301/477 and 4926.

6. Berenstein, “Eksterminacja,” table 5.

7. BA-L, ZStL, 208 AR 1415/66, statements of J. Nehring on March 24, 1965, and of W. Rebay von Ehrenwiesen on May 21, 1965; AŽIH, 301/4486, testimony of Mieczysław Rolsztein, who dates the formation of the ghetto in November.

8. Hecht, Life Death Memories, pp. 103–104.

9. Danuta Dabrowska, Abraham Wein, and Aharon Weiss, eds., Pinkas ha-kehillot. Encyclopaedia of Jewish Communities: Poland, vol. 2, Eastern Galicia (Jerusalem: Yad Vashem, 1980), p. 82; Berenstein, “Eksterminacja,” p. 26; AŽIH, 301/1704. According to the documents of the ChGK, about 2,000 Jews were killed in the Busk raion, and more than 2,000 were deported (see GARF, 7021-67-82, p. 55); however, from the available evidence, it appears that these figures are too high. See also The Mass Shooting of Jews in Ukraine 1941–1944: The Holocaust by Bullets (Paris: Mémorial de la Shoah and Yahad-in Unum, 2007), pp. 106–107; the research of Yahad-in Unum uncovered 15 mass graves at the site of the Jewish cemetery in Busk in August 2006.

10. YiU, testimony # 033, Anna Dychkant in Busk; testimonies # 136 and 286, Anton Davidovski, Busk, April 12, 2006, and August 25, 2006; Desbois, The Holocaust by Bullets, pp. 167–168.

11. StA-Lud, EL 317 III, LG-Stutt, Ks 5/65, Bekanntmachung Nehring dated June 7, 1943 (transcription).

CHODORÓW

Pre-1939: Chodorów, town, Bóbrka powiat, Stanisławów województwo, Poland; 1939–1941: Khodorov, raion center, Drogobych oblast', Ukrainian SSR; 1941–1944: Chodorow, Kreis Stryj, Distrikt Galizien, Generalgouvernement; post-1991: Khodoriv, raion center, L'viv oblast', Ukraine

Chodorów is located 53 kilometers (33 miles) south-southeast of Lwów. According to the population census of 1931, 2,216 Jews were living in Chodorów.¹ By the middle of 1941, allowing for an annual increase of 9 to 10 persons per 1,000, there were probably around 2,500 Jews in the town.

German troops occupied Chodorów on July 2, 1941. During the first weeks of the occupation, the Germans and their Ukrainian collaborators abused Jews in the streets, robbed their homes, and burned down the Great Synagogue.

Initially, a German military commandant's office (Ortskommandantur) administered the town. On August 1, 1941, power was transferred to a German civil administration. Chodorów was incorporated into Kreis Stryj, within Distrikt Galizien. Regierungsrat Dr. Wiktor von Dewitz was appointed as Kreishauptmann in Stryj from 1941 to 1944. A number of Landkommissare served under the Kreishauptmann. The Landkommissar in Chodorów was Karl Hohlmann.

Along with a local Ukrainian police unit, a German Gendarmerie post was also established in Chodorów. The German Gendarmerie served under the Gendarmerie in Stryj. The members of these units took an active part in the anti-Jewish Akions conducted in the town.

In the summer of 1941, the German military administration ordered the creation of a Jewish Council (Judenrat), which was headed by a man named Teichman. The Judenrat was subsequently assisted by a unit of Jewish Police (Jüdischer Ordnungsdienst). The German authorities ordered the Judenrat to collect contributions in money and valuables from the Jews, threatening to execute its members if they failed to meet these demands. The Jews were obliged to wear white armbands bearing a blue Star of David in plain view. Adult Jews were required to perform forced labor, during which they were beaten and abused, sometimes resulting in death. In the winter of 1941–1942, the Jews were ordered to surrender their furs and warm coats for the use of the German army.

On June 10, 1942, 2,732 Jews were registered in Chodorów, of whom 1,169 were engaged in various kinds of labor.² A deportation Aktion was carried out in the settlement on September 4 and 5, 1942, in which between 1,100 and 1,500 Jews were deported to the extermination camp in Bełżec. Sick Jews and others who were unfit were shot on the spot.

Information on the existence of a ghetto in Chodorów is sparse. After this first wave of deportations in September, the Kreishauptmann issued instructions for the remaining Jews of the Kreis to be concentrated in Stryj, Bolechów, Chodorów, Skole, or Żurawno before the end of October. Those working Jews who remained in some locations after this date were “under all circumstances to be housed in barracks.”³ Although not officially included as a ghetto on the list announced by Higher SS and Police Leader (HSSPF) Krüger in November 1942, the concentration in Chodorów of the Jews from the surrounding villages during October led to overcrowding. According to survivor Dora Iwler, the influx of Jews from other villages meant that another 17 or 18 people had to be put up in her home, on the orders of the Judenrat. She describes this concentration of Jews as being “like a ghetto.”⁴

On October 18, 1942, in a second Aktion, 350 Jews were deported from Chodorów to Bełżec.⁵ After this operation, around 800 Jews were allowed to remain in Chodorów, where they worked in different professions. Some 487 Jews worked in agriculture, while the remainder worked at a sugar factory, in a sawmill, at a butchers’ shop, for the town administration, and in other public workplaces.⁶ According to the testimony of Juda Kneidel, these remaining Jews were ordered by the German SD to vacate their homes and move into a special Jewish quarter, or remnant ghetto, at the end of 1942. Among the German officials who beat and murdered Jews in the town were Kundt, Janson, Kogel, and Mischke.⁷

On February 5, 1943, the German police assisted by the Ukrainian police murdered all the remaining Jewish laborers in Chodorów near the local sugar plant.⁸

A handful of Jews managed to survive with the assistance of local non-Jewish acquaintances. According to Pinkas ha-kehillot, Henryk Piczek displayed particular courage by hiding 10 Jews in his cellar for 22 months.

SOURCES Information on the history and fate of the Jewish population of Chodorów can be found in Danuta Dabrowska, Abraham Wein, and Aharon Weiss, eds., Pinkas ha-kehillot. Encyclopaedia of Jewish Communities: Poland, vol. 2, Eastern Galicia (Jerusalem: Yad Vashem, 1980), p. 224. Reference to the existence of a ghetto in Chodorów is made in Handbuch der Lager, Gefängnisse und Ghettos auf dem besetzten Territorium der Ukraine (1941–1944) (Kiev: Staatskomitee der Archiven der Ukraine, 2000), p. 75.

Documents about the persecution and murder of the Jews in Chodorów can be found in the following archives: AŻIH (301/2574); DALO (R 1952-1-62); TsDAHOU (57-4-235, p. 7); VHF (# 24587); and YVA.

Alexander Kruglov and Martin Dean
trans. Steven Seegel

NOTES

1. Tatiana Berenstein, “Eksterminacja ludności żydowskiej w dystrykcie Galicja (1941–1943),” BŻIH, no. 61 (1967), table 10.
2. DALO, R 1952-1-62, p. 36.
3. Ibid., p. 92, Runderlass Kreishauptmann Stryj an alle Vögte, October 7, 1942.
4. VHF, # 24587, testimony of Dora Iwler.
5. Yitzhak Arad, Bełżec, Sobibor, Treblinka: The Operation Reinhard Death Camps (Bloomington: Indiana University Press, 1987), p. 387.
6. DALO, R 1952-1-62, p. 97, Stadtverwaltung Chodorow an den Kreishauptmann, October 31, 1942.
7. AŻIH, 301/2574, testimony of Juda Kneidel.
8. Berenstein, “Eksterminacja,” table 10.

CZORTKÓW

Pre-1939: Czortków, city, powiat center, Tarnopol województwo, Poland; 1939–1941: Chortkov, raion center, Ternopol’ oblast’, Ukrainian SSR; 1941–1944: Czortkow, Kreis center, Distrikt Galizien, Generalgouvernement; post-1991: Chortkiv, raion center, Ternopil’ oblast’, Ukraine

Czortków is located 61 kilometers (38 miles) south-southeast of Tarnopol. On the eve of World War II, there were around 8,000 Jews living in the city.

German forces occupied Czortków on July 6, 1941. On August 1, 1941, power was transferred to a German civil administration. Czortków became the center of Kreis Czortkow, within Distrikt Galizien. The first Kreishauptmann was the former deputy head of the Gestapo in Stettin, SS-Sturmabführer Dr. Gerhard Littschwager, and from April 1942, SS-Hauptsturmführer Hans Kujath, who previously had served as the chief city administrator in Lwów. The deputy Kreishauptmann and also the Stadtkommissar in Czortków was J. Haase.

The anti-Jewish Aktions in the city were organized and carried out by the Security Police branch office based in Czortków. This office was run successively by Kriminalsekretär Hermann Blome (September 1941), SS-Obersturmführer Karl Hildemann (October 1941–October 1942), SS-Untersturmführer Hans Velde (October 1942–February 1943), SS-Sturmscharführer Heinrich Peckmann (February

A child's dress with red and blue flowers with small green leaves, embroidered by Lola Kaufman's mother in the Czortków ghetto and worn by Lola while in hiding.

USHMM WS #N08182, COURTESY OF LOLA AND WALTER KAUFMAN

1943–September 1943), and SS-Obersturmführer Werner Eisel (September 1943 until the German retreat). The Jewish Affairs Officer (Judenreferent) in Czortków was SS-Oberscharführer Konrad Rimpler, and from July 1942, SS-Scharführer Kurt Köllner. This office was subordinated to the Commanding Officer of the Security Police and the SD (KdS) in Distrikt Galizien, which was based in Lwów. The city also had a German Gendarmerie post and a squad of Ukrainian police, both of which took an active part in the anti-Jewish Aktions.

In early July of 1941, just before the arrival of German forces, local Ukrainians began killing Jews in Czortków and in neighboring villages. On July 10, antisemitic elements of the Ukrainian population and German soldiers carried out a pogrom in the town. In the course of the violence, more than 300 Jews were killed, and many more were beaten and robbed.¹

At the end of July 1941, on the orders of the German military administration, a Jewish Council (Judenrat) of 12 people was established. Initially the head was Dr. Kruh, assisted by Israel Langerman, Bertsie Steiger, and others. In addition to the Jewish Council in Czortków, there was also a Jewish Council for the entire Kreis, which could give instructions to the various Jewish Councils in the area. The chairman of the Kreis Jewish Council from October 1941 was M. Margules.²

Soon after its establishment, a number of Judenrat members were murdered in the Aktion against the Jewish intelligentsia, and the Germans dissolved the first Judenrat. Then the lawyer Dr. Chaim Ebner, who had served as deputy mayor before the war, became chairman of a reconstituted Judenrat. A unit of Jewish Police (Jüdischer Ordnungsdienst) consisting of 20 men was also set up as an organ of the Jewish Council. The Jews were then ordered to wear white armbands bearing a blue Star of David. They were also forbidden to leave the city, use the main street, and leave their homes at night. All male Jews aged between 14 and 60 had to perform forced labor on a regular basis.³

The Germans conducted the first Aktion on August 25, 1941, seizing around 100 Jews and killing them in a nearby forest.⁴ A unit of the Security Police and SD based in Tarnopol probably organized and implemented this Aktion. On September 10, 1941, the German authorities imposed a contribution of 25,000 złoty on the Jewish community.⁵ Subsequently, there were further demands on the Jewish Council for valuables and, in December 1941, for the surrender of all fur garments for the German army.

On October 15, 1941, the Security Police branch office carried out a second Aktion in Czortków during which around 150 members of the intelligentsia were arrested and shot, based on lists prepared with the assistance of the Jewish Council.⁶

At the end of 1941 and in early 1942, several raids were carried out against young, healthy Jews. In the course of these raids, several hundred people were seized and sent to labor camps in the Tarnopol area (including those in Kamionki, Borki Wielkie, and Stupki). Those who had sufficient means were able to pay the Jewish Council to gain exemption from these transfers.⁷

By April 1942, the pogrom, successive Aktions, the deportations to labor camps, and deaths from hunger and disease had reduced the number of Jews in Czortków by approximately 1,000, to 6,800 people.⁸

In mid-March 1942, the German authorities announced the creation of a ghetto and gave the Jews until April 1 to move in. Six streets—Rzeźnicka, Składowa, Targowa, Łazienna, Podolska, and Szkolna—were designated as being within the ghetto. All the Jewish houses were marked with a large Star of David, and leaving the ghetto without a permit was punishable by death. It was terribly overcrowded, with two to three families (up to 20 people) sometimes occupying one room.⁹ Some Jews received passes that permitted them to go to their workplaces outside the ghetto. Those who were unemployed received different cards and were at the mercy of the Arbeitsamt for forced labor deployment. In May 1942, 150 girls were selected and sent to work on local estates for the cultivation of the rubber-yielding plants kok-saghyz.¹⁰

In the summer of 1942, German security forces shot about 110 Jews at the Jewish cemetery. These people had been arrested for violating German regulations.¹¹ By August 1942, the number of Jews in the ghetto was 6,500.¹²

In the second half of 1942, two deportation Aktions took place in which the Jews were sent to the Bełżec extermination camp. The first Aktion was on August 27, 1942. The Security Police, Gendarmerie, Ukrainian Auxiliary Police, and a company of Order Police from Tarnopol took part in the Aktion, assisted by the Jewish Police. During the Aktion, all of Czortków's Jews were driven onto the city's market square. In this process, more than 300 people were killed. On the market square, the Security Police, together with the Jewish Council, selected specialists and other workers, who were then returned to the ghetto. The remaining Jews were escorted to the train station and forced into freight cars, 120 to 130 people per car. Despite the best efforts of the Security Police, between 300 and 500 people could not be squeezed into the cars. These people were then taken to the Security Police prison, where they remained until October, when a new Aktion was conducted. In all, more than 2,000 people were sent to Bełżec; some of them died en route from the intolerable heat and overcrowding. After this Aktion, the ghetto's dimensions were reduced to only two streets (Składowa and Rzeźnicka) near the Seret River.¹³

The second deportation Aktion took place on October 5, during which the Security Police, with the help of the Jewish Council and its police force, assembled 500 Jews. These people were loaded into railway cars designated with the letter "L" (Lager, or camp), as the Jews were to be sent to the Janowska Street forced labor camp in Lwów.¹⁴ The other 45 wagons on that train were filled with Jews from Tłuste, Buczacz, Monasterzyska, and Jagielnica. Aside from the Czortków Jews, who were left at the Janowska Street camp, all the other Jews were killed in the gas chambers in Bełżec.

At the end of 1942, several hundred Jews were sent to work on the surrounding estates, while about 600 people were placed in a newly created labor camp for those working for the Wehrmacht. In early 1943, the Czortków ghetto contained about 2,500 people, living in conditions of starvation and poverty. Typhus spread among the inhabitants. On June 16, 1943, the Security Police, Gendarmerie, and Ukrainian police liquidated the ghetto. The Jews tried to save themselves by fleeing. As a result, the liquidation Aktion took three days.¹⁵ The Jews seized during the combing of the ghetto were shot in ravines located on the grounds of the local airport.

During the ghetto's existence, attempts were made to organize an underground resistance. A group led by Reuven Rosenberg obtained arms and escaped to the forest in the spring of 1943, but it was soon discovered by the Germans and their Ukrainian auxiliaries. In the ensuing clash, most members of the group were killed. The few survivors continued to roam the forests. Another group under Meir Wassermann also escaped to the forest. They operated against the Germans between Tłuste and Jagielnica. Most of them also fell in battle. The Red Army liberated Czortków on March 23, 1944, but one week later the Germans drove them out again for a few days, forcing more than 60 Jewish survivors to retreat briefly with the Soviet forces until the city was recaptured.

After the war, Littschwager was the subject of an investigation carried out by the State Prosecutor's office in Darmstadt. The case was closed in 1972. Kujath was also under investigation after the war, but the case was closed on his death in 1963. Blome, the deputy chief of the Security Police in Czortków from October 1941 until July or August 1942, died in 1948. Hildemann died in 1945 in American detention. Velde died in February 1943 from typhus. Peckmann was acquitted by the district court (Landgericht, LG) in Saarbrücken on August 25, 1962. Eisel died in 1947 and Rimpler in 1946 in a camp in Czechoslovakia. Köllner was sentenced to life imprisonment.

SOURCES Information on the destruction of the Jews of Czortków can be found in the following publications: Dr. Yeshayahu Austri-Dunn, ed., Sefer yizkor le-bantsabat kedoshai kehillat Czortkow (Tel Aviv and Haifa: Irgun Yotzey Czortkow in Israel, 1967); Danuta Dabrowska, Abraham Wein, and Aharon Weiss, eds., Pinkas ha-kehillot. Encyclopaedia of Jewish Communities: Poland, vol. 2, Eastern Galicia (Jerusalem: Yad Vashem, 1980), pp. 443–450; A. Morgenstern, Chortkov Remembered: The Annihilation of a Jewish Community (Dumont, NJ, 1990); and "Tschortkow," in Israel Gutman et al., eds., Enzyklopaedie des Holocaust: Die Verfolgung und Ermordung der europäischen Juden (Munich: Piper, 1995), pp. 1435–1436.

Documents and witness testimonies describing the fate of Czortków's Jews can be found in the following archives: AŻIH (301/835, 3206, 3754, and 4682); BA-L (ZStL, 208 AR-Z 239/59, 208 AR 611/60, and verdict of LG-Man, 1 Ks 1/70); DATO; GARF (7021-75-107); Sta. Dortmund (45 Js 11/65); USHMM (e.g., RG-02.028; and RG-50.030*0021); VHF; and YVA.

Alexander Kruglov
trans. Ray Brandon

NOTES

1. Morgenstern, Chortkov Remembered, pp. 20–21; AŻIH, 301/835, 3206, 3754, and 4682; GARF, 7021-75-107, pp. 8, 37–38.
2. Austri-Dunn, Sefer yizkor Czortkow, p. 15; LG-Man 1 Js 210/64, Anklage in der Strafsache gegen Albert Brettschneider und Richard Pal, September 3, 1970, p. 68.
3. Morgenstern, Chortkov Remembered, pp. 21–23; Austri-Dunn, Sefer yizkor Czortkow, p. 16.
4. Morgenstern, Chortkov Remembered, p. 24.
5. AŻIH, 301/4682.
6. Morgenstern, Chortkov Remembered, p. 24.
7. AŻIH, 301/4682 and 4911. Dr. Frankel and Dr. Goldstein resigned from the Jewish Council at this time. By early 1943, word of the poor reputation of the Jewish Council in Czortków had even spread to Buczacz.
8. Tatiana Berenstein, "Eksterminacja ludności żydowskiej w dystrykcie Galicja (1941–1943)," BŻIH, no. 61 (1967), table 3.
9. Morgenstern, Chortkov Remembered, pp. 29–30; D. Seidenberg, "The Destruction of Czortkow," in Austri-Dunn, Sefer yizkor Czortkow; GARF, 7021-75-107, pp. 9 and verso.
10. Morgenstern, Chortkov Remembered, p. 35.
11. GARF, 7021-75-107, pp. 80–81.
12. Ibid., p. 21.
13. GARF, 7021-75-107, pp. 9–11; Morgenstern, Chortkov Remembered, pp. 37–53; Seidenberg, "The Destruction of Czortkow."
14. Morgenstern, Chortkov Remembered, pp. 53–60; Seidenberg, "The Destruction of Czortkow."
15. AŻIH, 301/3206, 3770, 4682, 5710, and 302/50. According to some sources, the liquidation of the ghetto was not fully completed until September 1943.

DOLINA

Pre-1939: Dolina, town, powiat center, Stanisławów województwo, Poland; 1939–1941: raion center, Stanislav oblast', Ukrainian SSR; 1941–1944: Kreis Kalusz, Distrikt Galizien, Generalgouvernement; post-1991: Dolyna, raion center, Ivano-Frankivs'k oblast', Ukraine

Dolina is located 51 kilometers (32 miles) west of Stanisławów. According to the 1931 census, there were 2,488 Jews living in the town. Assuming a natural annual increase of 9 to 10 persons per 1,000, it is estimated that there would have been more than 2,700 Jews living there in 1941.

Hungarian army detachments occupied the town on July 2, 1941. Initially the settlement was under the control of a Hungarian military commandant, but in August 1941 authority was transferred to a German civil administration. In 1941–1942, Dolina, which was the administrative center of Landkommissariat Dolina, was incorporated into Kreis Kalusz within Distrikt Galizien. The Kreishauptmann until March 1942 was Regierungsrat Dr. Friedrich Gercke. His successor until early 1943 was Dr. Karl-Hans Broschegg.

In Dolina, the Germans established a Gendarmerie post, a Security Police outpost (Sipo-Aussendienststelle), and a force of Ukrainian policemen. The anti-Jewish Aktions in Dolina were organized and implemented primarily by the Sipo outpost in Stanisławów, which was headed from the end of July 1941 to the start of November 1942 by SS-Hauptsturmführer Hans Krüger.

In early August 1941, a large transport of Hungarian Jews passed through Dolina, before most of them were drowned in the Dniester River. A few hundred of these Jews managed to escape, and many went into hiding in and around Dolina. However, the occupational authorities lured them out with the false promise of returning them to Hungary. The Jews who responded to this appeal were taken out to a neighboring forest and shot together with a group of local Jews.

In the late summer of 1941, the German authorities established a Jewish Council (Judenrat) in Dolina, led by Julius Weinraub and Ephraim Weingart, and a unit of Jewish Police (Jüdischer Ordnungsdienst). The Jews were registered and required to wear white armbands bearing the Star of David. The Judenrat had to meet repeated German demands for money, foodstuffs, furniture, and valuables, on one occasion enforced by the temporary arrest of 55 Jews. It was also responsible for supplying quotas of Jews for forced labor.

Since the Jews in Dolina lived together in their own part of town and did not mix with the local Ukrainians, there was no need for the Germans to establish a separate residential area for the Jews. Instead, the area where the Jews lived became a de facto open ghetto. Some survivors from Rożniatów, who were forcibly resettled to Dolina from the fall of 1941, refer to Dolina as a ghetto, as many Jews from Rożniatów and other villages were concentrated there. One account from the Rożniatów yizkor book recalls: "[T]he life of the exiles that were sent to the Dolina ghetto from the entire region became more difficult by the day. The hunger was increasing. Jews were perishing on the outskirts of the town from hunger. New decrees were issued daily, each one harsher than the preceding one."¹

In January 1942, the Germans organized a mass roundup in Dolina of Jewish men for forced labor. These Jews were taken initially to Stryj and, from there, together with other Jews, they were sent to work in various villages in the Carpathian Mountains, where most of them perished from hunger and cold.

In the spring of 1942, the German Security Police conducted an Aktion against the Jews in Dolina in which they shot 300 people at the Jewish cemetery.² After this, by the middle of 1942, hundreds more Jews were resettled to Dolina from Rożniatów and other villages. As a result, conditions became very overcrowded in the town, with many people forced to live in stables and barns and others having to sleep under the open sky.

On the orders of Hans Krüger in Stanisławów, a Sipo detachment under the command of Rudolf Müller was sent to Dolina to conduct a mass shooting there in early August, as no transportation was at that time available to deport the Jews from Dolina to the Bełżec extermination camp. The Germans initially demanded that the Judenrat surrender 1,200 Jews, but the chairman refused, saying he was not able to decide over the fate of people's lives. Then on August 3, 1942, the German police, assisted by local Ukrainian policemen, drove 3,500 Jews out of their houses and assembled them on the market square. The police abused many of them there and shot numerous children. After a selection, which resulted in able-bodied Jews being sent to labor camps, including one in Wyszaków, the remaining 2,500 or so Jews, including most members of the Judenrat, were escorted to the Jewish cemetery and shot. The Germans carefully removed any valuables from the Jews' clothing, and local inhabitants were ordered to bury the corpses in a mass grave.³

Some of the Jews managed to evade the roundup and escape into the surrounding forests, where Jewish partisan units, which included Jewish escapees from other towns in the region, were subsequently established. Ukrainian policemen, German Gendarmes, and also the Wehrmacht regularly searched for and killed Jewish fugitives in the area around Dolina over the ensuing 20 months.⁴ Only a few Jews from Dolina managed to survive until the return of the Red Army in 1944.

In 1983 a court in Memingen sentenced a German Gendarme who was based in Dolina during the occupation to five and a half years in prison for the shooting of Jews at the forced labor camp in Broszniów.⁵

SOURCES Relevant publications regarding the fate of the Jewish population in Dolina during the Holocaust include Danuta Dabrowska, Abraham Wein, and Aharon Weiss, eds., Pinkas ha-kehillot. Encyclopaedia of Jewish Communities: Poland, vol. 2, Eastern Galicia (Jerusalem: Yad Vashem, 1980), pp. 153–156; and Shimon Kanc, ed., Sefer zikaron le-kehillat Rożniatów

774 EASTERN GALICIA REGION

(Tel Aviv: Rozniatow, Perehinsko, Broszniow and Environs Societies in Israel and the USA, 1974), pp. 157–206—an English translation is available at jewishgen.org.

Relevant documentation can be found in the following archives: AŽIH (301/670, 2148, 3365, 4919); BA-L (e.g., ZStL, 208 AR-Z 398/59 against Krüger et al.); DAI-FO (R 42 [Landkommissariat Dolina], R 98-1-13); GARF (7021-73-7); and YVA.

Alexander Kruglov and Martin Dean
trans. Steven Seegel

NOTES

1. Kanc, Sefer zikaron le-kehillat Rozniatow, pp. 201–206.
2. “Dolina,” in Rossiiskaia evreiskaia entsiklopediia (Moscow: Rossiiskaia akademiia estestvennykh nauk, Nauchnyi fond “Evreiskaia entsiklopediia,” “Epos,” 2000), vol. 4, p. 397. See also Verdict of LG-Münst, May 6, 1968, in the case against Krüger et al., published in Justiz und NS-Verbrechen, vol. 28 (Amsterdam: Amsterdam University Press, 2003), Lfd. Nr. 675, p. 202.
3. DALO, R 35-12-11, p. 4; Dieter Pohl, Nationalsozialistische Judenverfolgung in Ostgalizien 1941–1944 (Munich: Oldenbourg, 1996), pp. 226–227, 315; AŽIH, 301/670 (Z. Rotenbach), 301/2148 (D. Szuster), 301/4919 (S. Sindler). According to another source, the shooting took place on August 30, 1942. See GARF, 7021-73-7, pp. 3, 19.
4. GARF, 7021-73-7, p. 19.
5. Verdict of LG-Mem, 1 Ks 115 Js 5640/76, against Jarosch, December 23, 1983.

DROHOBYCZ

Pre-1939: Drohobycz, city, powiat center, Lwów województwo, Poland; 1939–1941: Drogobych, raion and oblast’ center, Ukrainian SSR; 1941–1944: Drogobytsh, Kreis center, Distrikt Galizien, Generalgouvernement; post-1991: Drohobych, raion, center, L’viv oblast’, Ukraine

Drohobycz is located 69 kilometers (43 miles) south-southwest of Lwów. According to the census of December 9, 1931, 12,931 Jews were living in Drohobycz.

German troops occupied Drohobycz on June 30, 1941. Beginning in July, a military commandant’s office (Feldkommandantur 676) governed the city. On August 1, authority was transferred to a German civil administration. The city became the administrative center of Kreis Drohobycz. From August 1941 until June 1942, the Kreishauptmann was SS-Sturmabführer Eduard Jedamzik, who was succeeded by Hermann Görgens. A Stadtkommissar headed the German civil administration in the city of Drohobycz. Vetterman originally held that position; Wilhelm Schübler replaced him at the end of February 1942. The Stadtkommissar reported to the Kreishauptmann in Drohobycz. In addition to the Stadtkommissar’s department, beginning in November 1941, a 20-man municipal police unit (Schutzpolizei-Dienstabteilung) from Vienna was permanently located in the city. Hauptmann Rudolf Hötzl commanded this unit; his deputy was Oberleutnant Ferdinand Holzschuh. The Ukrainian Auxiliary Police (Ukrainische Hilfspolizei) was subordinated to the municipal police; by the summer of 1943 it was 150 men strong. Like their Austrian counterparts, the Ukrainian police took an active role in all the anti-Jewish Aktionen.

Portrait of thirteen-year-old Bernard Mayer taken in Drohobycz, November 1941.

USHMM WS #14244, COURTESY OF BERNARD MAYER

Beginning on July 8, 1941, an SD detachment (SD-Einsatztrupp) was among the punitive units stationed in Drohobycz. It was subordinated to a special-purpose Security Police task force (Einsatzgruppe z.b.V.). SS-Hauptsturmführer Nikolaus Tolle commanded the SD detachment in the city; his deputy was SS-Untersturmführer Walter Kutschmann (who died in 1985 in Argentina).

In September 1941, the German authorities established a Grenzpolizeikommissariat (Border Police Office, GPK) at the base of the SD detachment in Drohobycz. SS-Sturmabführer Franz Wenzel commanded the GPK from October 1941 to May 1942; SS-Sturmabführer Hans Block succeeded him. Beginning in the fall of 1942, Block’s deputy, SS-Untersturmführer Lucas Heckl, was in charge of the Criminal Police (Kripo). In June 1942, the Germans also established an outpost of the Security Police (Sipo-Aussendienststelle) in Drohobycz, under the command of SS-Hauptsturmführer Benno Paulischkies.

On July 1 and 2, immediately after the occupation of the city by German troops, antisemitic sentiments among Ukrainian and Polish inhabitants set off an impromptu pogrom in which German soldiers also participated; 47 Jews were killed.¹ At least two executions of Jews took place soon after the arrival in the city of the SD-Einsatztrupp. On July 12, that unit murdered 23 Jews, including two women, in the woods near the city, and on July 22, 20 more Jews were killed.²

In the second half of July 1941, the German military authorities in Drohobycz required Jews to wear white armbands bearing the Star of David. The Germans confiscated a large number of Jewish possessions, especially valuables. The occupying authorities also deprived the Jews of many basic rights. To assist them with the implementation of the new restrictions, the German authorities established a Jewish Council (Judenrat). The newly created Jewish Police (Jüdischer Ordnungsdienst) served the council. Among the tasks of the Jewish Police was filling the required quota of Jewish workers for the labor office (Arbeitsamt).³

Jewish workers who had permanent jobs, for example, with the city administration, other German offices, or private firms, were supposed to receive regular wages that were 80 percent of those paid to non-Jews performing the same task, as payment was vital if their ability to work was to be maintained.⁴ They were also registered for social security payments, to be deducted from their wages. In addition, there was the daily quota of casual laborers (Hilfsarbeiter), supplied by the Jewish Council. These men were not paid directly, but their meager pay was supposed to be remitted entirely to the Jewish Council, which then issued larger rations to these workers' families. Unfortunately, many offices and companies paid these "wages" to the Jewish Council very late or not at all, such that payments were some 20,000 złoty in arrears by the end of October 1941.⁵ In July 1942, the Jewish Council also imposed a tax on those Jews earning wages directly, requesting their employers to deduct 10 percent and remit it to the Jewish Council to help pay for welfare services.

The Germans carried out their first Aktion in Drohobycz on November 22, 1941. From a list provided by the Jewish Council, on that day the Security Police, with the help of the Schutzpolizei and Ukrainian policemen, seized and executed some 400 Jews, who were either sick or otherwise unfit for labor.⁶ After that massacre, according to data for February 1942, 12,781 Jews remained in Drohobycz.⁷ By that count, the number of Jews in the city had dropped by more than 1,000 in the first seven months of the occupation.

The first so-called deportation Aktion was carried out in Drohobycz on March 25, 1942. In that operation, some 1,000 "poor" Jews were seized, transported, and then murdered in the Bełżec extermination camp.⁸ The Jewish Council compiled the list of those destined for deportation. After that Aktion, some 11,400 Jews still remained in Drohobycz in May 1942.⁹

The Germans carried out a second deportation Aktion on August 7 and 8, 1942. Before it began, they gathered in the city Jews from the villages of Medenica, Stebnik, and Truskawiec. In the course of this Aktion, in which the German, Austrian,

Ukrainian, and Jewish policemen participated, about 100 Jews were killed on the spot, and some 4,000 Jews were deported to Bełżec.¹⁰

Although it appears that plans existed for the creation of a Jewish residential area in Drohobycz from at least the beginning of 1942, it was reported in March 1942 that no closed (or consolidated) residential area (geschlossener Wohnbezirk) for the Jews had yet been established.¹¹ From October 1941, Jews were forbidden to leave the city, on pain of death, and they were also prohibited from using certain streets in the city center. However, the formal creation of a ghetto was not implemented until the end of September 1942.¹² According to the yizkor book, the Jews were given until October 1, 1942, to move into the ghetto and could take with them only up to 50 kilograms (110 pounds) of possessions. The ghetto was organized on the following streets: Zuzki, Kuwolska, Gabarska, Krashevski, Ribia, Skutnizki, and part of Sienkiewicz. A large number of Jews were also brought into Drohobycz from the surrounding area at this time. About 100 Jews died during the operation, either shot or from hunger and exhaustion. Two or three families had to share a small room. Jews were forbidden to leave the ghetto. However, many Jews disobeyed this order to go in search of food to ward off starvation.¹³ The order issued by the Higher SS and Police Leader (HSSPF), SS-Obergruppenführer Friedrich Wilhelm Krüger, on November 10, 1942, confirmed retrospectively the establishment of the ghetto in Drohobycz.¹⁴

A third Aktion on October 23 and 24, 1942, led to the deportation of another 1,179 Jews.¹⁵ An Aktion on November 30 sent about 1,000 more Jews to Bełżec.¹⁶ Rounding up the Jews took about two weeks, in the course of which Jewish Police, on the orders of the Gestapo, were obliged to deliver 100 victims daily to an assembly point (a former synagogue). In several cases, Jewish policemen reportedly turned over their own mothers.¹⁷

In the interval between the third and fourth Aktions, an event took place in Drohobycz that came to be known as "Wild Thursday." In retaliation for the wounding of SS-Oberscharführer Karl Hübner by a Jewish pharmacist, Reiner, on November 19, 1942, 230 Jews were seized on the streets and killed. Among those slaughtered was the well-known writer and artist Bruno Schulz, who was shot on the street by SS-Oberscharführer Karl Günther.¹⁸

About 3,000 Jews still remained in Drohobycz at the beginning of December 1942. Some 1,500 were in the ghetto, and about the same number were in the forced labor camp of the Karpathen-Öl AG and several other labor camps. At the end of December 1942, the German civil administration ordered a reorganization of the Jewish Council. At this time, many of the Jews in the ghetto were in possession of official passes (Passierscheine) issued by the German police, permitting them to go unhindered to their places of work outside the ghetto. By March 1943, however, this was still possible only when accompanied by a non-Jewish escort who had been issued the pass on the Jew's behalf. At the end of March 1943, the Jewish Council was still concerned about obtaining a Passierschein that would remain valid for some time for one of its employees who left the ghetto every day to collect the post.¹⁹

The next Aktion took place on February 15, 1943, in the ghetto. Some 500 Jews were seized and murdered.²⁰ The final liquidation of the ghetto began on May 21, 1943. On that day the Germans murdered the members of the Jewish Council, as well as about 500 Jews from the Rawa Ruska region. On June 6, 1943, the Germans killed the Jewish policemen. However, the search for Jews hiding in bunkers continued for several weeks. On July 15, 1943, the Germans put up signs declaring that Drohobycz was officially cleansed of Jews (judenrein).²¹

After the liquidation of the ghetto, there remained in Drohobycz the labor camp at the petroleum extraction company, Karpathen-Öl AG, and several other work crews, such as that at the Klinker cement factory (600 workers), including various kinds of craftsmen and gardeners. SS-Obersturmführer Friedrich Hildebrand was in charge of the labor camp from July 1943 until July 1944. The former head of the camp, SS-Unterscharführer Erich Minkus, was removed from this position for drunkenness but remained as a subordinate of Hildebrand. By order of the SS- und Polizeiführer (SSPF) for Distrikt Galizien, as early as June 12, 1943, local German authorities removed some 170 women and children from the labor detachments and murdered them. On August 25, 1943, the SSPF ordered the liquidation of the labor detachment at the cement factory. At Karpathen-Öl AG, the German authorities selected between 80 and 100 individuals to continue working for the company; the rest were killed; 40 Jews who had worked previously at Karpathen-Öl were slaughtered with them.²² The labor camp crew at the petroleum company was disbanded on April 14, 1944. The German authorities then took 489 Jews, together with 533 Jews from Boryslaw, to the Krakau-Plaszow concentration camp in Poland.²³

When Soviet troops liberated Drohobycz in August 1944, some 400 Jews emerged from hiding. A number of them had been saved through the efforts of non-Jews—Ukrainians and Poles. Maria Strutinskaia, a schoolteacher, and her sister saved 13 Jews, including 5 children.²⁴ Even some German officials were known to have concealed Jews. In Drohobycz, for example, the head of the Arbeitsamt hid labor crews in his own house in 1943.²⁵

On May 6, 1953, a court in Bremen sentenced former SS-Obersturmführer Friedrich Hildebrand to eight years in prison. In his capacity as commander of the Jewish forced labor camp in Drohobycz, he had taken part in killing Jews. On May 12, 1967, also in Bremen, the court sentenced Hildebrand to life imprisonment for crimes in other locations and camps.

In Vienna, on March 18, 1959, a court issued a life sentence to former SS-Hauptscharführer Josef Gabriel. As a member of the German Security Police in Drohobycz in 1942 and 1943, Gabriel took part in the persecution and extermination of Jews in the city; he was released from prison in 1963. On March 16, 1962, a court in Stuttgart sentenced former SS-Hauptscharführer Felix Landau to life in prison. As a member of the Security Police in Drohobycz, Landau had taken an active role in the murder of Jews. A court in Munich sentenced former SS-Rottenführer Hans Sobotta to life imprisonment on December 2, 1971, for taking part in killing inmates of the Jewish forced labor camp in Drohobycz in 1942–1943.

In the early 1990s, survivors erected a memorial to the Jewish victims in the Bronnitsky Wood on the outskirts of Drohobycz.

SOURCES Publications relevant to the history of the Drohobycz ghetto include the following: N.M. Gelber, ed., Sefer zikaron il-Drohobits, Borislav veba-sevivah (Tel Aviv: Irgun Yotse Drohobits, Borislav veba-sevivah, 1959/2000); Tuvia Friedmann, ed., Die Tätigkeit der Schutzpolizei, Gestapo und Ukrainischen Miliz in Drohobycz, 1941–1944 (Haifa: Institute of Documentation in Israel for the Investigation of Nazi War Crimes, 1995); and Danuta Dabrowska, Abraham Wein, and Aharon Weiss, eds., Pinkas ha-kehillot. Encyclopaedia of Jewish Communities: Poland, vol. 2, Eastern Galicia (Jerusalem: Yad Vashem, 1980), pp. 169–171.

Documents and testimonies regarding the extermination of the Jewish community in Drohobycz can be found in the following archives: AŽIH (301/193, 344, 1799, 4909, and 4920); BA-L; DALO (e.g., R 2042-1-55, 154-56; and R1952-1-152); FVA (# 60 and 120); GARF (7021-58-20); RGVA (1275-3-661); USHMM (e.g., RG-30.003M, Acc.1995.A.561 and 1995.99); and YVA (e.g., M-4/106, M-20/6199).

Alexander Kruglov and Martin Dean
trans. Steven Seegel

NOTES

1. RGVA, 1275-3-661, Report of the Ortskommandantur in Drohobycz, August 8, 1941.
2. LG-Stutt, Verdict of March 16, 1962, in the case of Felix Landau, in Justiz und NS-Verbrechen, vol. 18 (Amsterdam: Amsterdam University Press, 1978), Lfd. Nr. 531; Tuvia Friedman, ed., Love Letters of a Nazi Murderer in Lemberg and Drohobycz (Haifa: Institute of Documentation in Israel for the Investigation of Nazi War Crimes, 1995), p. 11.
3. DALO, R 2042-1-155, pp. 91–92, Arbeitsamt an Kreishauptmann, Betr.: Jüdischer Ordnungsdienst, May 11, 1942.
4. USHMM, RG-30.003M (DALO), R 1951-1-186a, p. 1, Arbeitsamt Drohobycz an Stadtverwaltung, Betr.: Arbeitseinsatz der Juden, September 6, 1941.
5. Ibid., p. 11, Arbeitsamt an Städt. Schlachthaus Drohobycz, October 27, 1941.
6. GARF, 7021-58-20, pp. 521, 539.
7. Tatiana Berenstein, “Eksterminacja ludności żydowskiej w dystrykcie Galicja (1941–1943),” BŻIH, no. 61 (1967), table 4.
8. Ibid.; GARF, 7021-58-20, pp. 521, 539; and USHMM, Acc.1995.99.
9. Berenstein, “Eksterminacja,” table 4.
10. GARF, 7021-58-20, p. 522; Friedmann, Die Tätigkeit der Schutzpolizei, statement of Alexander Rybak (1901) on July 23, 1947.
11. USHMM, RG-30.003M (DALO), R 2042-1-56, an den Gouverneur des Distrikts Galizien, Abt. Innere Verwaltung, Betr.: Errichtung von Wohnbezirken für Juden (n.d., March 1942); see, however, also BA-L, ZStL, 208 AR-Z 8/62, Abschlussbericht, November 29, 1963, which indicates that a form of “open ghetto” may have existed by this time.

12. GARF, 7021-58-20, p. 522; AŽIH, 301/193; Friedmann, Die Tätigkeit der Schutzpolizei, testimony of Wilhelm Krell (1902). See also DALO, R 2042-1-33 and R 2042-1-155.

13. Gelber, Sefer zikaron il-Drohobits, pp. 210–211; Jan Kulbinger, “Im Gefängnis,” in Leon Poliakov and Josef Wulf, eds., Das Dritte Reich und die Juden: Dokumente und Aufsätze (Berlin-Grunewald: Arani, 1955), pp. 297–300.

14. Order of HSSPF Krüger on October 11, 1942, published in Tatiana Berenstein, ed., Faschismus, Getto, Massenmord: Dokumentation über Ausrottung und Widerstand der Juden in Polen während des zweiten Weltkrieges (Berlin: Rütten & Loening, 1961), pp. 344–346.

15. See the report of October 25, 1942, by Captain Lederer, commander of the 5th Company, 24th Regiment, Schutzpolizei, concerning the resettlement of Jews, RGVA, 1323-2-2926, p. 28.

16. Berenstein, “Eksterminacja,” table 4; GARF, 7021-58-20, p. 540.

17. YVA, M-20/6199, Letter of Rothenberg, p. 8.

18. Jerzy Ficowski, ed., Letters and Drawings of Bruno Schulz: With Selected Prose (New York: Harper & Row, 1988), pp. 248–249, personal account of Tadeusz Lubowiecki (aka Izydor Friedman). A slightly different version of events is given in AŽIH, 301/4920.

19. USHMM, RG-30.003M (DALO), R 2042-1-154, pp. 2, 172, Polizeiliche Erlaubnis zum Verlassen des Judenwohnbezirkes in Drohobycz, January 15, 1943; and Judenrat an Kreishauptmann, March 27, 1943.

20. GARF, 7021-58-20, pp. 523, 534.

21. Ibid.; Friedmann, Die Tätigkeit der Schutzpolizei, statements of David Freimann, July 1, 1948, and Maritus Dornstrauch (born 1901), n.d.

22. LG-Brem, Verdict of May 6, 1953, in the case of T. Hildebrand, in JuNS-V, vol. 10 (Amsterdam: Amsterdam University Press, 1973), Lfd. Nr. 355, pp. 663–693.

23. Sta. Bremen, 29 Ks 1/66, Beiakten, Liste der am 14. April 1944 aus Drohobycz und Boryslaw überstellten jüdischen Häftlinge.

24. Ilya Al'tman, Zbertvy nenavisti: Kholokost v Rossii 1941–1945 gg. (Moscow: Fond Kovcheg, 2002), p. 441.

25. Sta. Munich I, 115 Js 5640/76, statement of G.A. on August 20, 1965.

GRÓDEK JAGIELLOŃSKI

Pre-1939: Gródek Jagielloński, town, Lwów województwo, Poland; 1939–1941: Gorodok, raion center, L'viv oblast', Ukrainian SSR; 1941–1944: Grodek, Kreis Lemberg-Land, Distrikt Galizien, Generalgouvernement; post-1991: Horodok, raion center, L'viv oblast', Ukraine

According to the Polish census in 1921, 2,545 Jews resided in Gródek, which lies 26 kilometers (16 miles) southwest of Lwów. Jews comprised 24.2 percent of the total population. On December 9, 1931, 3,281 Jews were residing in the town. In mid-1941, there were approximately 5,000 Jews in Gródek (including a number of Jewish refugees from Poland).¹

German forces first occupied Gródek on September 17, 1939. They withdrew again three weeks later, handing the town over to the Red Army. Following the German invasion of the Soviet Union, German forces entered the town again on June 29, 1941. In July 1941, a military commandant's headquarters governed Gródek.

On August 1, 1941, Eastern Galicia was transferred to a German civil administration and became part of Distrikt Galizien in the Generalgouvernement. This region was initially divided into 17 districts (Kreise); but from April 1, 1942, following a redrawing of boundaries, there were only 14 districts. Gródek was initially the center of its own Kreis, but from April 1, 1942, it became part of the Kreis Lemberg-Land. The Kreis was governed by a Kreishauptmann. Wilhelm Stockheck held the position of Kreishauptmann from September 1941 until February 1942. Dr. Werner Becker was the Kreishauptmann of Kreis Lemberg-Land from March 1942 until early 1943; he was succeeded by Baron Joachim von der Leyen. Each Kreis was divided into county commissariats (Landkommissariate) administered by a county commissioner (Landkommissar). From February 1942 the Gródek Landkommissar was SS-Untersturmführer Josef Steyert. SS-Untersturmführer Franz Weisskind was his assistant. In the summer of 1943, Steyert was replaced by Dr. Breczowsky; in 1944, Dr. von Trijansky was the Landkommissar. There was also a German Gendarmerie post in Gródek, a Criminal Police (Kripo) post, and a detachment of Ukrainian Auxiliary Police (Ukrainische Hilfspolizei). The anti-Jewish Aktions were generally carried out in the town by a team of Security Police from Lwów with the assistance of the German Gendarmerie and Ukrainian police.

As early as June 29, 1941, a pogrom was organized in the town and widespread looting and destruction began within two weeks.²

Jews residing in the so-called new part of town were forced to relocate to the “old city,” and all Jewish houses had to be marked with a Star of David. Jews were also compelled to engage in forced labor. In particular, they were used in land improvement and road construction tasks, as well as for work at the brick factory; others were sent to forced labor camps.³

In August 1941, a Jewish Council (Judenrat) was created in Gródek, and its first chairman was a teacher by the name of Laks. Most of its members were part of the local Jewish intelligentsia. Shortly after its establishment, the Judenrat organized the Jewish Police (Jüdischer Ordnungsdienst) and was ordered to provide the Germans with workers and various contributions in cash and valuables.

From the spring of 1942, the occupation forces began the systematic extermination of the town's Jews. The first Aktion took place on March 21, 1942, when more than 300 older Jews were shot in a nearby forest. Mala Weinbaum was a witness of the Aktion; at the time, she was working in the building of the military commandant (Ortskommandant). She saw a car—in which Steyert and Weisskind were sitting—drive up to a house where three Jewish families lived (Herring, Levin, and Blazer). Weisskind led the Jews out of the house and announced: “[S]ince you complained about me to the Ortskommandant, I will shoot you myself.” He carried out his threat.⁴

The second Aktion took place on May 8, 1942. On this day, on Steyert's orders, the Jewish Police gathered approximately 800 Jewish men aged from 15 to 55 on the market square. These Jews were separated into groups according to their profession. Then Steyert, Weisskind, the German Gendarmerie, the Ukrainian police, a team of Security Police from Lwów, and SS men from the Janowska Street labor camp appeared. They carried out the selection. Weisskind killed Jakub Bauer and the 15-year-old son of the assistant chairman of the Judenrat, Dr. Margolis. In the evening, the Jews gathered in the square were taken to the Janowska Street labor camp in Lwów; from there most of them were subsequently taken to other Jewish labor camps (e.g., Jaktorów, Lackie Wielkie, and Płuhów).⁵

The third Aktion (the so-called Aktion against the poor) was carried out in late June 1942 when the German Gendarmerie, headed by Leutnant der Gendarmerie Haase, shot 70 to 100 elderly Jews; 25 Roma (Gypsies) were shot along with the Jews.⁶

The fourth Aktion in Gródek was carried out on August 19, 1942. A team of Security Police from Lwów, the German Gendarmerie, the Ukrainian police, and the Jewish Police, under the direction of the chief of staff, SS-Sturmabführer Willy Ost, subordinated to the SS and Police Leader (SSPF) in Lwów (SS-Brigadeführer Fritz Katzmann), combed the Jewish district in the old city and shot at least 100 Jews on the streets. The assistant Landkommissar Weisskind killed the patients in the Jewish hospital. After the Jews were driven to the train station, a selection took place, during the course of which Steyert, Weisskind, and Hauptmann der Gendarmerie Junge beat the Jews. Officials of the Ortskommandantur were barely able to reclaim Jewish craftsmen they employed. The head of the poultry farm had to go to great lengths to reclaim his 25 Jewish workers. Subsequently, about 2,800 Jews were driven into freight cars and taken to the Bełżec extermination center. On the orders of Ost, who commanded the Aktion, the belongings of the Jews were taken to four synagogues and then sent on to Lwów from there. After this Aktion, about 1,100 Jews remained in the town, whereas before the Aktion there had been 3,635 Jews.⁷ Another Aktion took place on September 14, 1942, during which an unknown number of Jews were taken to Lwów. Those deemed fit to work were sent to the Janowska Street labor camp, the rest to Bełżec.

In the summer of 1942, the Jews were further concentrated to a few small streets. A second Judenrat was organized at this point, as the members of the first had been killed.

On December 1, 1942, the Jewish district in Gródek was converted into a ghetto: it was surrounded by a fence and guarded by the Ukrainian police. The ghetto housed both the local Jews and those brought in from Janów in November 1942.⁸ The inmates were made to work at local factories run by German firms. Because of the extreme overcrowding (about 12 people lived in every room), lack of food, and severe cold, an epidemic of typhus soon broke out in the ghetto. The Germans and the Ukrainian policemen regularly beat and robbed the Jews.

On January 27, 1943, a squad of Security Police from Lwów, together with the German Gendarmerie and Ukrainian police, liquidated the ghetto, shooting about 1,300 Jews. Because some of the Jews were able to avoid the shootings by hiding, the squad returned to the town on February 3, 1943, and killed several hundred more Jews they were able to capture.⁹

In 1952, in Warsaw, two former Ukrainian policemen (the brothers Vladimir and Roman Svitenko), who played an active role in the extermination of Gródek's Jews in 1942–1943, were sentenced to the death penalty. For the same crimes, the former official of the German Kripo in Gródek, Bania, was sentenced to the death penalty in Poland.

The former Gródek Landkommissar Josef Steyert was under investigation in Germany in the early 1960s, but the investigation came to an end in September 1964 owing to his poor health; Steyert died in November 1964. The person in charge of the Gródek Aktion of August 19, 1942, former SS-Sturmabführer Willy Ost, disappeared in 1945.

In 1968 in Stuttgart, the former head of the Gródek labor camp of March–June 1943, Adolf Kolonko, was sentenced to seven years' imprisonment. The former "official for Jewish affairs" at the office of the SSPF in Distrikt Galizien, SS-Untersturmabführer Anton Löhnert, who in June 1943, on the orders of SS-Brigadeführer Katzman, controlled the liquidation of the Gródek Jewish labor camp, was given the same prison sentence in Stuttgart.

SOURCES Articles on the extermination of the Jews of Gródek can be found in the following publications: Sefer Grayding (Gródek Jagiellonski) (Tel Aviv: Society of Grayding Emigrants, 1981); Danuta Dabrowska, Abraham Wein, and Aharon Weiss, eds., Pinkas ha-kehilot. Encyclopaedia of Jewish Communities: Poland, vol. 2, Eastern Galicia (Jerusalem: Yad Vashem, 1980); and Adam Rutkowski, "Zbrodnicza działalność hitlerowskiego ludobójcy Franza Weisskinda," BŻIH, no. 4 (1952): 251–260.

Documents regarding the extermination of Gródek's Jewish community can be found in the following archives: AŻIH (301/1944, 2510, 2510a, 2526, and 4634); BA-L (ZStL, 208 AR-Z 276/60); DALO (R 15: Gorodok Ukrainian police; R 24: Kreishauptmann Lemberg-Land; R 3-1-279); FVA (# 574); GARF (7021-67-80); TsDAVO; YVA; and ZSSta-D (Sta. Dortmund, 45 Js 29/63).

Alexander Kruglov
trans. Ester-Basya Vaisman

NOTES

1. AŻIH, 301/2526.
2. Ibid.
3. Ibid.
4. Ibid., 301/2510.
5. ZSSta-D, Sta. Dortmund, 45 Js 29/63, against Josef Steyert, vol. 1, pp. 119–120.
6. Ibid., pp. 46–47. Other sources (Act of the Town's Commission, October 8–10, 1944) indicate that in Gródek in June 1942, 200 Jews were killed; see TsDAVO, 4620-3-290, pp. 4–8.

7. Rutkowski, “Zbrodnicza działalność hitlerowskiego,” pp. 255–257; DALO, R 24-3-283, p. 17. Other sources (the Act of the Town’s Commission, October 8–10, 1944) indicate that on August 19, 1942, 2,500 Jews were deported, and on August 20, 1942, 50 Jews were shot; see TsDAVO, 4620-3-290, pp. 4–8. See also Thomas Sandkühler, “Endlösung” in Galizien. Der Judenmord in Ostpolen und die Rettungsinitiativen von Berthold Beitz 1941–1944 (Bonn: Dietz, 1996), pp. 231–232.

8. AŻIH, 301/2526.

9. Act of the Town’s Commission, October 8–10, 1944; see TsDAVO, 4620-3-290, pp. 4–8. Other sources indicate that on December 26, 1942, roughly half of the remaining population of the ghetto was taken to pits outside of town and shot; see Dabrowska, Wein, and Weiss, Pinkas ha-kebilot: Poland, vol. 2, Eastern Galicia pp. 145–149.

GWOŹDZIEC

Pre-1939: Gwoździec, town, Kołomyja powiat, Stanisławów województwo, Poland; 1939–1941: Gvozdetz, raion center, Stanislav oblast’, Ukrainian SSR; 1941–1944: Gwoździec, Kreis Kolomea, Distrikt Galizien, Generalgouvernement; post-1991: Gvizdets’, Kolomyia raion, Ivano-Frankivs’k oblast’, Ukraine

Gwoździec is located 56 kilometers (35 miles) southeast of Stanisławów. According to the 1921 census, there were 1,234 Jews living in Gwoździec. By the middle of 1941, the number of Jews in the town is estimated to have been around 1,500.

Units of the Hungarian army first occupied the town on July 2, 1941. While in charge, the Hungarian military authorities treated the Jews reasonably. Jewish men were required to perform forced labor at a nearby airfield and in farming, but when Ukrainian overseers beat the workers, the Hungarians intervened to stop the abuse. While Gwoździec was still under the control of the Hungarian army, a Jewish Council (Judenrat) was established. Presiding over the Judenrat were Greenberg and also Elisha Zannenzów.

With the transfer of power to the Germans after several weeks, the situation of the Jews deteriorated sharply. The German authorities established the Jewish Police and forced the Jews to wear distinguishing armbands. They confiscated most of the Jews’ property, especially any valuables, and registered the Jews.

According to Pinkas ha-kebilot, at the end of 1941 or in early 1942, all the Jews were ordered to move into a ghetto in the eastern part of town, near the train station. The move had to take place within only a few hours, which forced the Jews to leave behind most of their possessions. Living conditions in the ghetto were cramped, but the Jews did not suffer from starvation, due to the ongoing illegal trade with local farmers.¹ The Jewish survivor Paul Schmelzer states that “all the Jews in Gwoździec were herded into a two-block ghetto.”²

In March 1942, the ghetto (Jewish residential area) in Gwoździec held a total of 1,540 Jews.³ By this time, news had reached the ghetto about the mass murder of Jews in other places, especially in nearby Kołomyja. Expecting similar treatment, the Jews of Gwoździec began to prepare hiding places.

On April 12, 1942, German and Ukrainian police surrounded the ghetto and drove the Jews from their houses, shooting some indiscriminately in the streets. The Aktion lasted eight hours, and part of the ghetto was set on fire, probably to smoke out those in hiding. The Germans and Ukrainians then led the several hundred assembled Jews into a nearby forest and murdered them all.

In the Aktion, roughly half of the ghetto population perished. The survivors consisted of those who had managed to hide or had been out of town during the Aktion on work assignments. The Germans ordered the survivors to collect the corpses strewn about the ghetto and bury them in a mass grave at the cemetery in Kolaczkwicza.⁴

On April 24, 1942, the Germans ordered those Jews who remained to assemble in front of the Judenrat to be transferred to the recently established ghetto in Kołomyja.⁵ According to records of the Soviet Extraordinary State Commission (ChGK), in April 1942, Jews from the following villages around Gwoździec were relocated to Kołomyja: Soroky, 16 Jews; Rosokhach, 23; Prikhmische, 14; Dzurkov, 45; Trophanovka, 2; Staryi Gwoździec, 19; Malyi Gwoździec, 13; Balinty, 12; Slobodka, 13; Kulachkovtsy, 56; Vinograd, 34; Ostrovets, 11; and Zagaipol’, 53—311 people in total.⁶

Owing to the poor conditions in Kołomyja, some of the refugees from Gwoździec and its surroundings escaped to other places or were transferred by the Germans to forced labor camps. A few even managed to get permission from the Germans to return and work in Gwoździec, where they lived in the remaining buildings of the ghetto. Others worked in the countryside on farms until the late summer of 1942, when all Jews were ordered to move to the nearest large towns.⁷

On September 11, 1942, the Germans deported around 4,000 Jews to the Bełżec extermination camp from the Kołomyja ghetto, including most of the remaining Jews from Gwoździec. A few of those who went into hiding in the countryside managed to evade the German roundups and survived until the Red Army drove the Germans from the region in 1944.

SOURCES A short article on the Jewish community in Gwoździec and its fate during the Holocaust can be found in Danuta Dabrowska, Abraham Wein, and Aharon Weiss, eds., Pinkas ha-kebilot. Encyclopaedia of Jewish Communities: Poland, vol. 2, Eastern Galicia (Jerusalem: Yad Vashem, 1980), pp. 135–137. The ghetto in Gwoździec is mentioned also in Rossiiskaia evreiskaia entsiklopediia (Moscow: Rossiiskaia akademiia estestvennykh nauk, Nauchnyi fond “Evreiskaia entsiklopediia,” “Epos,” 2000), vol. 4, p. 309.

Documentation on the persecution and extermination of the Jews in Gwoździec can be found in the following archives: DAI-FO; GARF (7021-73-12); and YVA (e.g., O-3/2315).

Alexander Kruglov and Martin Dean
trans. Igor Puchkov

VOLUME II: PART A

NOTES

1. Dabrowska, Wein, and Weiss, Pinkas ha-kehillot: Poland, vol. 2, Eastern Galicia, pp. 135–137.
2. Joseph J. Preil, Holocaust Testimonies: European Survivors and American Liberators in New Jersey (New Brunswick, NJ: Rutgers University Press, 2001), p. 189.
3. Tatiana Berenstein, “Eksterminacja ludności żydowskiej w dystrykcie Galicja (1941–1943),” BŻIH, no. 61 (1967): 18 (table 6).
4. Dabrowska, Wein, and Weiss, Pinkas ha-kehillot: Poland, vol. 2, Eastern Galicia, pp. 135–137.
5. GARF, 7021-73-12, pp. 130–133.
6. Ibid., pp. 136–167.
7. Dabrowska, Wein, and Weiss, Pinkas ha-kehillot: Poland, vol. 2, Eastern Galicia, pp. 135–137.

HORODENKA

Pre-1939: Horodenka, town, powiat center, Stanisławów województwo, Poland; 1939–1941: Gorodenka, raion center, Stanislav oblast', Ukrainian SSR; 1941–1944: Horodenka, Kreis Kolomea, Distrikt Galizien, Generalgouvernement; post-1991: Horodenka, raion center, Ivano-Frankivsk oblast', Ukraine

Horodenka is located about 60 kilometers (37 miles) east-southeast of Stanisławów. In 1931, 3,526 Jews were living in the town.

Following the German invasion of the Soviet Union on June 22, 1941, trains carrying refugees from the towns and cities to the west began passing through Horodenka, and on July 2 the Soviets abandoned the town. Only a few Jews managed to flee in time, owing to the lack of transportation.

The Hungarian army occupied Horodenka in early July. In the second half of July, about 1,000 Jews arrived in the town, following their deportation from the Transcarpathian Ukraine by the Hungarian Gendarmerie. These Jews arrived hungry and exhausted. Local Jews took in some of them, and the rest lived in the synagogue, in crowded and dirty conditions. With the new arrivals, the number of Jews in the town rose to about 4,500.¹

Under Hungarian administration, a Jewish Council was formed, which was required to make a contribution in money and produce. When this demand was not met, the Hungarian army hanged 1 Jew in the marketplace. Subsequently, the Hungarian commandant took first 10, then 20 Jews as hostages, to ensure Jewish compliance. The Jews were also required to perform forced labor.

The town remained under Hungarian military administration until August, when authority was gradually transferred to a German civil administration. Initially Horodenka became a local administrative center (Kreis) within Distrikt Galizien. The Kreishauptmann was SA-Obersturmführer Johann Hack. In April 1942, Kreis Horodenka became part of the Kreis Kolomea, which until July 1, 1942, was headed by Klaus Peter Volkmann. He was succeeded, until July 26, 1943, by SS-Obersturmführer Herbert Gorgon.

The Jewish Aktions in Horodenka were organized and carried out by the office of the Security Police (Sipo-Aussendienststelle) in Kreis Kolomea, which was headed by SS-Obersturmführer Peter Leideritz. In Horodenka there was a Criminal Police (Kripo) post, a German Gendarmerie unit, and a Ukrainian police force, which all took an active part in the anti-Jewish Aktions.

The new German administration imposed a number of additional restrictions on the Jews. They registered all Jews and confiscated most remaining Jewish property, particularly any valuables. Jews were also prohibited from leaving the town limits on pain of death. According to survivor accounts, on November 8, 1941, the Germans ordered the Jews off the main streets of the town and crowded them together into a small Jewish quarter (Judenviertel) in the west of the town, giving them three days to make the move.²

On December 5, the first anti-Jewish Aktion was carried out in the town. Under the pretext of giving typhus shots, the German Gendarmerie and Ukrainian police gathered the Jews in a synagogue. For further authenticity, Jewish physicians were also requested to be present with all the necessary instruments. After freeing craftsmen and specialists, a detachment of Security Police from Kołomyja shot 2,500 Jews in the forest near Semakowce. The chairman of the Judenrat tried to prevent the Aktion with a bribe. He was murdered together with all the other members of the council.³ Kreishauptmann Hack, who was not a confirmed Nazi (in the 1920s, he had been a member of the German Communist Party), protested the Aktion and even wrote a letter to an acquaintance who was the head of the foreign organization (Auslandsorganisation) of the Nazi Party (Reichsleiter Bohle), but his protest was fruitless.⁴

After the first Aktion, the Germans ordered the remaining 1,500 or so Jews to move into a tiny ghetto area three or four blocks long. Its borders included Schtelshetska Street to the house of Fleshner, then proceeding to the other side of the bridge leading to Kotokivka, and from there to the Polish church and finally the high school (gimnazjum). To assist with the transfer, a new Judenrat was formed. All the entrances and exits to the ghetto were sealed off. Within the ghetto there was considerable overcrowding. Jewish forced labor was organized by the Judenrat. Those Jews who worked for the Germans outside the ghetto received work passes. The Jewish Police strictly controlled their departure to and return from work.⁵

On April 13, 1942, a second Aktion was carried out in Horodenka. The Jews found out about the forthcoming Aktion from a bribed employee at the labor exchange in Kołomyja, and many of them hid in bunkers they had prepared. As a result, the German police shot only 75 people on this occasion, as they released many of those they had arrested in return for bribes.⁶

In April and May of 1942, Jews from the surrounding villages were transferred into the ghetto, bringing the number of Jews to 2,348. At that time the ghetto was enlarged slightly to accommodate the new arrivals, and some specialists were permitted to live outside its confines.⁷ Every day men from the ghetto were conscripted to work in the local sugar factory. There were also occasional roundups of younger Jews for the labor camps, where many died of overwork and undernourishment. Apart from the roundups, hunger and outbreaks of typhus also decimated the ghetto's population, as there was no hospital.⁸ In August 1942, some 500 Jews from Czernelica, as well as any remaining Jewish farmers in the surrounding countryside, were brought into the ghetto. Any Christians caught helping Jews who went into hiding were also threatened with severe punishment.⁹

On September 7, 400 Jews from Obertin were brought to the town. On September 8, 1942, a third Aktion was carried out in Horodenka that lasted for three days. Under the pretext of registration, the Jews were gathered in one place, and 200 or 300 of them were murdered on the spot. About 2,000 people were placed into 10 freight cars (180 to 200 people in each car), and on September 10, most of them were transported to the Bełżec extermination camp, although a small group of 80 Jews capable of work was sent to the Janowska Street labor camp in Lwów.¹⁰ About 120 specialists were retained in the town to help clear out the ghetto area, and several hundred more people hid in bunkers. In late September 1942, all the Jews remaining in the town were ordered to move to Kołomyja, and Horodenka was officially proclaimed to be cleansed of Jews (judenrein).¹¹ After this, however, the Ukrainian police regularly captured Jews still hiding in the town, and all those captured were immediately murdered.

Only a few Jews managed to hide successfully. For example, Aharon Frischling turned to Bronisława Otwinowska, a former neighbor, to hide him during the final liquidation of the ghetto. Despite harassment from her Ukrainian neighbors, Otwinowska hid and fed Frischling and his family right up to the arrival of the Red Army in March 1944.¹²

Herbert Gorgon (born 1909) was sentenced to death by the SS and Police court in Lwów on August 6, 1943, and he committed suicide in prison on October 27, 1943. Peter Leideritz was extradited to Poland in December 1946 and was executed on November 17, 1947, following his conviction by a Polish court.

SOURCES Publications on the annihilation of Horodenka's Jews include the following: S. Meltzer, ed., Sefer Horodenka (Brooklyn, NY: Book Committee of Sefer Horodenka in the United States and Israel, 1963), also available in English translation by Ellen Biderman (Santa Fe, NM: E. Biderman, 2004); T. Friedman and J. Zak, eds., Zusammenstellung der Begebenheiten über die Vernichtung des Judentums in Ostgalizien (Kolomea, Stanisławów, Stryj und Umgebung) (Vienna: Jüdische Historische Dokumentation Wien, n.d.); J. Wermuth, "The Jewish Partisans of Horodenka," in Y. Suhl, ed., They Fought Back (New York, 1967); and Danuta Dabrowska, Abraham Wein, and Aharon Weiss, eds., Pinkas ha-kehillot. Encyclopaedia of Jewish Communities: Poland, vol. 2, Eastern Galicia (Jerusalem: Yad Vashem, 1980), pp. 175–181.

Documents and testimonies about the fate of Horodenka's Jews in the Holocaust can be found in the following archives: AŻIH (301/1396, 1404, 1434, 2877, 2880, 3337, and 3647); BA-L (ZStL, AR-Z 277/1960); DAI-FO (R 71-1-1); GARF (7021-73-11); USHMM; VHF; and YVA.

Alexander Kruglov and Martin Dean
trans. Ester-Basya Vaisman

NOTES

1. Testimony of Mendel Rozenkranz, in Leon Poliakov and Josef Wulf, eds., Das Dritte Reich und die Juden: Dokumente und Aufsätze (Berlin-Grunewald: Arani, 1955), pp. 278–279; AŻIH, 301/2178, testimony of Rozia Grinberg; and 301/1434, testimony of Izak Plat.

2. AŻIH, 301/1434.

3. Friedman and Zak, Zusammenstellung, pp. 43–44; Verdict of LG-Darm, July 28, 1967, in the case against Haertel and others, published in Justiz und NS-Verbrechen, vol. 26 (Amsterdam: Amsterdam University Press, 2001), Lfd. Nr. 657, pp. 491–492; GARF, 7021-73-11, pp. 4, 17.

4. G Sta. Berlin, P(K) Js 7/68, Beistück 46, statement of J. Hack, April 12, 1965.

5. Reuben Prifer, "My Walk through Seven Levels of Hell," p. 312; Meyer Sucher, "The Murder of the Jews of Horodenka," p. 306—both in Meltzer, Sefer Horodenka.

6. Testimony of Rozenkranz, in Poliakov and Wulf, Das Dritte Reich und die Juden, p. 280; Sucher, "The Murder of the Jews of Horodenka," p. 306.

7. AŻIH, 301/1434; Tatiana Berenstein, "Eksterminacja ludności żydowskiej w dystrykcie Galicja (1941–1943)," BŻIH, no. 61 (1967), table 6.

8. Ch.K. Kaufman, "In the Time of Murder," in Meltzer, Sefer Horodenka, p. 329; AŻIH, 301/2178.

9. GARF, 7021-73-11, pp. 12 and verso; Shmuel Spector and Geoffrey Wigoder, eds., The Encyclopedia of Jewish Life before and during the Holocaust (Jerusalem: Yad Vashem; New York: New York University Press, 2001), p. 288; Shlomo Blond, The Righteous Gentiles (Israel: Shlomo Blond, 1983), pp. 142–143.

10. Prifer, "My Walk through Seven Levels of Hell," pp. 313–314; Kaufman, "In the Time of Murder," p. 329; and AŻIH, 301/2178.

11. RGVA, 1323-2-292b, pp. 40–42, report by the commander of the 7th Company, Police Regiment 24, September 14, 1942; Berenstein, "Eksterminacja," table 6; GARF, 7021-73-11, p. 18.

12. Israel Gutman, ed., The Encyclopedia of the Righteous among the Nations: Rescuers of Jews during the Holocaust—Poland (Jerusalem: Yad Vashem, 2004), vol. 2, pp. 571–572. Bronisława Otwinowska was recognized as Righteous Among the Nations by Yad Vashem on September 28, 1989.

JANÓW LWOWSKI

Pre-1939: Janów Lwowski, town, Gródek Jagielloński powiat, Lwów województwo, Poland; 1939–1941: Ianov, raion center, L'viv oblast', Ukrainian SSR; 1941–1944: Janow, Kreis Lemberg-Land, Distrikt Galizien, Generalgouvernement; post-1991: Ivano-Frankove, Iavoriv raion, L'viv oblast', Ukraine

Janów Lwowski is located 21 kilometers (13 miles) west-northwest of Lwów. In 1921, there were 490 Jews living in Janów. According to the population census of December 9, 1931, 650 Jews were living in the town. By the middle of 1941, it is estimated that there were more than 700 Jews in Janów.

Janów was occupied by units of the German 17th Army on June 28, 1941. A German military commandant's office (Ortskommandantur) ran the affairs of the town in July 1941. On August 1, authority in Janów was passed to a German civil administration. Janów initially became part of Kreis Lemberg-West (Grodek), within Distrikt Galizien. On April 1, 1942, the Kreis Lemberg-West was united with the Kreis Lemberg-Ost to form the larger Kreis Lemberg-Land. The Kreis was headed by a Kreishauptmann. In chronological order, this position was held by Wilhelm Stockheck (until September 1941); Otto Bauer (until March 1942); Dr. Werner Becker (until the start of 1943); and Baron Joachim von der Leyen (from the start of 1943). The Kreis was divided into several Landkommissariate, each headed by a Landkommissar. Janów belonged to Landkommissariat Grodek, which was headed by SS-Untersturmführer Josef Steyert.

The occupying authorities also appointed a lawyer named Dr. Kizyk as mayor in Janów and established a small Ukrainian police force.

In July 1941, the German military administration organized the creation of a Jewish Council (Judenrat) and ordered Jews to wear distinctive white armbands bearing the Star of David. Much of the Jews' property and valuables was confiscated. The Jewish population was registered and required to perform various types of forced labor.

During the first eight months of the occupation, while Dr. Kizyk remained mayor, the Jewish population lived in the town in relative peace. This quiet period ended in the spring of 1942. On several occasions the Jews of Janów were ordered to report to the market square, where selections were made for Jews to work in the peat bogs of Rzęsna Polska.¹ According to undated German registration figures, taken between the summer of 1941 and the fall of 1942, there were 635 Jews residing in Janów, and another 276 Jews were living in the surrounding villages.²

Members of the Security Police in Lwów frequently came to Janów and demanded contributions from the Judenrat. The Judenrat also had to bribe the manager of the sawmill with furniture for his apartment. Since the resources of the community were soon exhausted by these repeated demands, the Germans arrested the members of the Judenrat and deported them to the Janowska Street labor camp in Lwów, where they all died.³

In early May 1942, the Germans conducted the first anti-Jewish Aktion in Janów. The Jews were ordered to assemble on the market square on pain of death. Here around 100 able-bodied Jews were selected by Gestapo officials and taken away to the Janowska Street labor camp in trucks.⁴ It is likely that from there most of them were subsequently taken to other Jewish labor camps in Distrikt Galizien.

In the summer of 1942, probably in July, a ghetto was created in Janów for the rest of the Jewish population.⁵ All of the remaining Jews were moved onto one street, which became a ghetto.

In accordance with the order of the Higher SS and Police Leader (HSSPF), SS-Obergruppenführer Friedrich Wilhelm Krüger, issued on November 11, 1942, on the establishment of ghettos in Distrikt Galizien,⁶ the Kreishauptmann Lemberg-Land ordered on November 25, 1942, that the Jews of Janów would have to move to the ghetto (Judenwohnbezirk) in Gródek Jagielloński.⁷ One survivor recalls that the Jews were instructed they would have to leave the town, which was to become judenrein, and they would have to move to one of the few remaining designated places, where Jews were still permitted to live.⁸ Shortly after this announcement, the Germans then conducted a second Aktion in Janów,⁹ during which around 40 people were killed on the spot.¹⁰ The remaining Jews, probably around 500 people, were then moved to the ghetto in Gródek Jagielloński.¹¹ There they were killed, along with the local Jewish population, in two mass-shooting Aktions in late January and early February 1943.¹² A few of the younger Jews managed to evade the roundups and survived in the forests.

SOURCES The ghetto in Janów Lwowski is mentioned in Shmuel Spector and Geoffrey Wigoder, eds., The Encyclopedia of Jewish Life before and during the Holocaust (Jerusalem: Yad Vashem; New York: New York University Press, 2001), p. 560; and in Rossiiskaia Evreiskaia Entsiklopediia, vol. 4 (Moscow: Rossiiskaia Akademiia Estestvennykh Nauk, Nauchnyi fond "Evreiskaia Entsiklopediia," "Epos," 2000), p. 496.

Relevant documentation regarding the persecution and murder of the Janów Jews can be found in the following archives: AŻIH (301/1944, 2526); DALO (R 37-5-27, R 24-3-156); GARF (7021-67-82); TsDAVO (4620-3-290); USHMM (e.g., RG-31.003M); and YVA.

Alexander Kruglov and Martin Dean
trans. Steven Seegel

NOTES

1. AŻIH, 301/1944, testimony of Małgorzata Gottesmann.
2. DALO, R 37-5-27, Projekt der Sammelgemeinde des Rayon Janow, n.d.
3. AŻIH, 301/1944.
4. Ibid.; Thomas Sandkühler, "Endlösung" in Galizien: Der Judenmord in Ostpolen und die Rettungsinitiativen von Berthold Beitz 1941–1944 (Bonn: Dietz, 1996), p. 230.
5. "Ivano-Frankovo," in Rossiiskaia Evreiskaia Entsiklopediia, vol. 4, p. 496.
6. Polizeiverordnung des HSSPF Krüger über die Errichtung jüdischer Wohnbezirke, November 10, 1942, in Verordnungsblatt des Generalgouvernements, November 11, 1942.
7. DALO, R 24-3-156, p. 40, Kreishauptmann Lemberg-Land an die Landkommissare und Vögte, November 25, 1942.
8. AŻIH, 301/1944.
9. Tatiana Berenstein, "Eksterminacja ludności żydowskiej w dystrykcie Galicja (1941–1943)," BŻIH, no. 61 (1967), table 7.

10. Report of the NKVD section head in the Ivano-Frankovo (Janów) raion, September 12, 1944, in GARF (7021-67-82, p. 52).

11. AŽIH, 301/2526, testimony, of Mania Trau (nee Rozendorn).

12. TsDAVO, 4620-3-290, pp. 4–8.

JARYCZÓW NOWY

Pre-1939: Jaryczów Nowy, town, Lwów powiat and województwo, Poland; 1939–1941: Novyi Iarychev, raion center, L'viv oblast', Ukrainian SSR; 1941–1944: Jaryczow, Kreis Lemberg-Land, Distrikt Galizien, Generalgouvernement; post-1991: Novyi Iarychiv, Kam'ianka-Buz'ka raion, L'viv oblast', Ukraine

Jaryczów Nowy is located 24 kilometers (15 miles) east-northeast of Lwów. According to the population census of December 9, 1931, 926 Jews were living in Jaryczów Nowy. In 1939, on the eve of World War II, there were approximately 2,120 Jews in the town.¹

Following the German attack on the Soviet Union on June 22, 1941, Jaryczów Nowy was occupied by detachments of the German 17th Army on June 30, 1941. In July 1941, a German military commandant's office (Ortskommandantur) administered the town. At the very start of the German occupation, local Ukrainians murdered 14 Jews; these Jews were allegedly killed for being Soviet activists. The Ukrainian rioters also beat and robbed much of the Jewish population, encouraged by the local Ukrainian Orthodox priest. Some time after this first Aktion, Ukrainians also played a role in burning down the synagogue and the Bet Midrash, together with the sacred objects inside.²

In July 1941, the German military administration ordered the creation of a Jewish Council (Judenrat), headed by Szul Indyk, and a small force of Jewish Police (Jüdischer Ordnungsdienst) as an auxiliary organ of the Judenrat. The Jewish Police enforced the registration and marking of the Jews, who were all required to wear white armbands bearing the Star of David. The German authorities confiscated considerable amounts of Jewish property, particularly any items of value. Jews were deprived of many basic rights. They were made to perform various kinds of compulsory labor including construction work on the road to Lwów (under the supervision of the Organisation Todt).

On August 1, 1941, authority over Eastern Galicia passed into the hands of a German civil administration. Jaryczów Nowy was incorporated into Kreis Lemberg-Land. The first Kreishauptmann was Wilhelm Stockheck, who controlled the area until the middle of September 1941. Otto Bauer succeeded him from September 1941 to March 1942; then Werner Becker from March 1942 to January 1943; and finally Baron Joachim von der Leyen from January 1943 until the liberation of the town.

The German authorities established a German Gendarmerie post and a Ukrainian police squad in the town. The unit of the Security Police and SD based in Lwów directed the main anti-Jewish Aktions in the town, and it was assisted by the German Gendarmerie and Ukrainian police forces.

In Jaryczów Nowy there were frequent roundups of Jews during 1942. Jews capable of work were sent to labor camps in Winniki, Hermanów, Kurowice, and Polonice, where they were beaten, half-starved, and murdered.³ In the spring of 1942, probably in March, there were also roundups of older men and women incapable of work, whom the Germans then sent to be gassed at the Bełżec extermination camp.

On November 10, 1942, the Higher SS and Police Leader (HSSPF), SS-Obergruppenführer Friedrich Wilhelm Krüger, issued an order that called for the formation of a ghetto in Jaryczów Nowy. The German administration established the ghetto at the beginning of December 1942. The authorities resettled all local Jews and all the Jews from the surrounding villages into the ghetto. Among those villages from which the Jews were transferred were Barszczowicze, Rudańce, Kukizów, Pikutowicze, and Jaryczów Stary.⁴ A few also came from other towns in the vicinity where no ghetto was established, such as Gliniany, especially if they had relatives in Jaryczów.⁵ More than 2,500 Jews altogether were confined within the ghetto, which existed for only one and one half months. When vacating houses assigned to the ghetto, the former non-Jewish inhabitants had destroyed the chimneys and broken the doors and windows, exposing the ghetto inhabitants to the winter cold. Anyone caught leaving the ghetto without permission could be shot.

The Jewish residents of the ghetto were permitted to draw water from the wells for only one hour per day and were not permitted to buy any food. The overcrowded conditions in partially destroyed houses with almost no food and water soon led to epidemics in the ghetto. According to one survivor account, a Ukrainian doctor named Mielnik warned the Germans that these epidemics would spread to the non-Jewish population if something were not done. This may have been the pretext for the liquidation of the ghetto that was organized by the Germans shortly afterwards.⁶

On January 15–16, 1943, a unit of the Security Police and SD from Lwów liquidated the ghetto with the assistance of the German Gendarmerie and the Ukrainian police. Around 1,570 Jews were shot in the forest, and about 1,000 more were murdered at the site of the Jewish cemetery.⁷ Following the main massacre, more than 40 local Ukrainians assisted in searching the ghetto area for Jews in hiding. They killed many of them on the spot. In one bunker the murderers found 33 Jews, who were then taken to the cemetery to be shot.⁸ At the end of 1943, a German special unit (Sonderkommando 1005) used prisoners to attempt to remove the traces of the massacres by exhuming the bodies and burning them.⁹

SOURCES There is a yizkor book on the town, which focuses on the events of the Holocaust and the memory of the victims: Mordechai Gerstl, ed., Hurbn Yaritshev bay Lemberg (New York, 1948). A brief article on the Jewish community of the town can also be found in Danuta Dabrowska, Abraham Wein, and Aharon Weiss, eds., Pinkas ha-kebilot. Encyclopaedia of Jew- ish Communities: Poland, vol. 2, Eastern Galicia (Jerusalem: Yad Vashem, 1980), pp. 285–287.

Documentation about the destruction of the Jews of Jaryczów Nowy can be found in the following archives: AŻIH (301/2481, 2615); DALO (e.g., R 3-1-278, R 24/3/156, and R 500-1-39); GARF (7021-67-82); USHMM; and YVA (e.g., 1426/261, 2317/551).

Alexander Kruglov
trans. Steven Seegel

NOTES

1. Tatiana Berenstein, “Eksterminacja ludności żydowskiej w dystrykcie Galicja (1941–1943),” BŻIH, no. 61 (1967), table 7; AŻIH, 301/2615.

2. GARF, 7021-67-82, p. 40; Gerstl, Hurbn Yaritshev, p. 31, gives the figure of 13 Jews.

3. AŻIH, 301/2615.

4. DALO, R 24/3/156, Kreishauptmann in Lemberg-Land an die Landkommissare, November 25, 1941, Betr.: Bildung von Judenwohnbezirken; AŻIH, 301/2615. In 1921 the populations of these villages were as follows: Barszczowicze, 57; Rudańce, 53; Kukizów, 46; Pikutowicze, 36; and Jaryczów Stary, 35: see Black Book of Localities Whose Jewish Population Was Exterminated by the Nazis (Jerusalem: Yad Vashem, 1965), pp. 88–110.

5. Gerstl, Hurbn Yaritshev, p. 30; Jews from Gliniany went to at least four separate ghettos; see Megiles Gline (Gliniane): Zikroynes un iberlebungen fun a borev gevorener kehile (New York, 1950), p. 263.

6. AŻIH, 301/2615.

7. GARF, 7021-67-82, pp. 40–42; Gerstl, Hurbn Yaritshev, pp. 8–9, 30, gives the figure of 5,000 inhabitants of the ghetto. AŻIH, 301/2615, also gives much higher figures of 2,800 Jews murdered in the forest and 2,000 at the Jewish cemetery, according to hearsay evidence from a Jew who was employed by the Germans as “burner of the dead,” working with Sk 1005. See also DALO, R 3-1-278, pp. 2–12; R 3-1-279, p. 256; and R 500-1-39, pp. 2–20—these cited by Jakob Honigsman, Juden in der Westukraine: Jüdisches Leben und Leiden in Ostgalizien, der Bukowina und Transkarpatien 1933–1945 (Konstanz: Hartung-Gorre, 2001), pp. 247, 294.

8. AŻIH, 301/2481 and 2615; Gerstl, Hurbn Yaritshev, pp. 34–35.

9. Dieter Pohl, Nationalsozialistische Judenverfolgung in Ostgalizien 1941–1944 (Munich: Oldenbourg, 1996), p. 380; Gerstl, Hurbn Yaritshev, p. 35.

JAWORÓW

Pre-1939: Jaworów, town, Drohobycz powiat, Lwów województwo, Poland; 1939–1941: Iavorov, raion center, L'viv oblast', Ukrainian SSR; 1941–1944: Jaworow, Kreis Lemberg-Land, Distrikt Galizien, Generalgouvernement; post-1991: Iavoriv, raion center, L'viv oblast', Ukraine

Jaworów is located 45 kilometers (28 miles) west-northwest of Lwów. In June 1941, there were approximately 3,000 Jews living in Jaworów.

Following a brief German occupation in 1939 and then a period of Soviet rule, units of the German 17th Army occupied Jaworów again on June 25, 1941, only three days after the start of the German invasion of the USSR. They were greeted with flowers and great enthusiasm by most Ukrainians. Only a handful of Jews were able to escape with the retreating Red Army.¹ In late June 1941, antisemitic Ukrainians organized a pogrom in Jaworów, during which there was looting of Jewish houses and killing of Jews.² At that time, the German Security Police (probably a detachment of Sonderkommando 4b, subordinated to Einsatzgruppe C) shot and killed 15 Jews in a forest outside the town. The Jews were arrested on the basis of a list prepared by local Ukrainians who sought revenge for the punishment of Ukrainian nationalists by the Soviet People's Commissariat of Internal Affairs (NKVD).³ In July 1941, a military commandant's office (Ortskommandantur) governed the town.

A sketch map of the Jaworów ghetto, submitted to the Soviet Extraordinary State Commission. Located below the market square the ghetto bordered Alexandorwiczo Street. A Star of David, representing the synagogue, is found within the ghetto's boundary.

USHMM/RG22.002, 7021-67-79

On August 1, 1941, Eastern Galicia was transferred to a German civil administration and became part of the Distrikt Galizien in the Generalgouvernement. Jaworów was initially in Kreis Lemberg-West (Kreis center Grodek), but from April 1, 1942, it became part of the Kreis Lemberg-Land. The Kreis was initially governed by Kreishauptmann Wilhelm Stockheck until mid-September 1941; then by Otto Bauer until March 1942; by Dr. Werner Becker until early 1943; and finally by Baron Joachim von der Leyen. Each Kreis was divided into county commissariats (Landkommissariate) administered by a county commissioner (Landkommissar). Jaworów was part of the Landkommissariat Grodek, headed by SS-Untersturmführer Josef Steyert. There was also a German Gendarmerie post in Jaworów, a Criminal Police (Kripo) post, and a detachment of Ukrainian Auxiliary Police (Ukrainische Hilfspolizei), headed by a man named Poslawski. The anti-Jewish Aktions in Jaworów were coordinated by a team of Security Police from Lwów with the assistance of the German Gendarmerie and Ukrainian police.

In July 1941, the German military administration ordered the creation of a Jewish Council (Judenrat), chaired initially by Yoel Fuss, who was soon replaced by Sender Blum. There was also a Jewish Police force (Jüdischer Ordnungsdienst) that served to implement the orders of the Jewish Council. Jews were ordered to wear white armbands bearing the Star of David. The Jewish Council had to collect contributions of valuables demanded by the German authorities. All Jews had to be registered. Another main task of the Judenrat was organizing 400 Jewish forced laborers every day, who were engaged in road construction, general cleaning, collecting ammunition left by the Soviets in the forests, and work at the Soviet prisoner-of-war camp, where many prisoners died of starvation or were shot. On the construction sites, skilled Jewish craftsmen were paid 1 złoty per hour and received an extra loaf of bread each week.⁴

During the first eight months of the occupation, Jews lived in their own houses in the town, which were required to display the Star of David. Jews were banned from the main streets (Mickiewicza, Aleksandrowicza, and Krakowiecka), and there was a curfew for Jews after 6:00 P.M. Jews were exposed to arbitrary arrests and beatings by the Ukrainian police, and there were incidents of plunder and rape. Jews were denied the opportunity to make a living, and many suffered from hunger. Until the spring of 1942, the only large deportations were of several hundred able-bodied Jews to local forced labor camps (such as Jaktorów and Winniki).

In early April 1942, Landkommissar Josef Steyert appeared in Jaworów and ordered the chairman of the Jewish Council, Blum, to demolish the Jewish cemetery within two weeks. He also ordered Blum to hand over as “contributions” large amounts of silk, leather, and gold. Shortly afterwards, Blum suffered a heart attack, and he was replaced by David Badian, who was eager to carry out all of Steyert’s demands. A new head of the Jewish Police, Buzie Hahn, was also appointed.⁵

A month later, on May 5, 1942, the Germans carried out a deportation Aktion in Jaworów, during which about 500 Jews were sent to the labor camp in Płuhów. Some of those found to be unfit were murdered on arrival.⁶ Soon after this Aktion, on June 10, 1942, 442 Jews from Wielkie Oczy were resettled (some to Krakowiec and the majority to Jaworów) on Steyert’s orders.

Another deportation Aktion took place in Jaworów on November 7–8, 1942, when a team of Security Police from Lwów, together with German and Ukrainian police, and with the support of the Jewish Police, brutally seized 1,200 Jews, of whom about 200 were killed on the spot, the others being deported to the Bełżec extermination camp.⁷ Almost the entire Jewish Council was deported, and the Jewish hospital was also “cleared.” On November 9, the German Gendarmerie and Ukrainian police went in search of more Jews; about 200 Jews were dragged from various hiding places, and the Germans shot them at the Jewish cemetery.⁸

On November 10, 1942, the Germans established a ghetto in the southern part of the town, which was surrounded by a wire fence. About 600 remaining Jews initially entered the ghetto. On the two days following the ghetto’s establishment, about 20 Jews were shot for being caught outside the fence.⁹ On November 15, 1942, those Jews working for the Wehrmacht’s forestry office (who wore armbands with the letter “W”) were moved into a separate “block camp” outside the ghetto (initially only a few; later, 60 people), where they received considerably better treatment.¹⁰

Jews from the communities of Drohomys’l, Szkło, Bonów, Twierdza, and other villages were transferred into the ghetto during November but could bring with them very little in the way of possessions. By early December, the Jews from Mościska, Janów, Sądowa Wisznia, Krukienice, Hussaków, and Krakowiec had also been transferred into the Jaworów ghetto, bringing the total population to around 6,000 Jews by mid-December.¹¹ Since members of the Jewish Council and the Jewish Police occupied the best apartments and were responsible for assigning living quarters, the new arrivals were forced to live on the streets for three days. All of them were finally crammed into 80 small houses, with just over 70 people living in each house. The ghetto area extended from the marketplace to Alexandrowicz Street, circled around the Greek Catholic Church and the approaches to the synagogue. The ghetto had several gates, each guarded by a German patrol.¹² The extremely poor sanitary and hygienic conditions soon produced a typhus epidemic. The reconstituted Judenrat received permission to organize a hospital and tried to obtain rations for the Jews, but the rations distributed were well below subsistence level (about 300 grams, or slightly less than 11 ounces of bread per day). According to some sources, more than 1,500 people died of typhus and hunger during the ghetto’s existence. In early 1943, about 500 able-bodied Jews were rounded up and deported to the Janowska Street labor camp.¹³

On April 16, 1943, the Germans liquidated the ghetto. A team of Security Police from Lwów, together with the German Gendarmerie and Ukrainian police, shot and killed over 3,500 Jews; some 2,500 Jews had already been killed by noon, and the rest were murdered over the following days. Following the selection of those fit for work at the Jewish cemetery, those destined for death were collected in the burned-out synagogue before being taken off in trucks to be shot in the Porudno Forest. The ghetto area was largely destroyed by fire as the Germans and their collaborators drove out those in hiding.¹⁴ A few hundred Jews remained in the block camp for about a week or so after the Aktion. About 200 Jews who had emerged from hiding were shot a few days later, and some of the Jews from the block camp managed to escape. The rest (about 200) were transferred to the Janowska Street labor camp in Lwów at the end of April.¹⁵

According to the report of the Soviet Extraordinary State Commission, 7,316 civilians were killed in the Jaworów raion from 1941 to 1944, including 4,900 people killed in Jaworów (of them, 4,400 were killed on April 16, 1943); 1,200 people were deported to the Bełżec extermination camp; and 1,200 people were sent to the Janowska Street camp. (The number of Jews sent to the Janowska Street labor camp was actually half this amount. The number of Jews shot on April 16, 1943, was also less. On the other hand, the figures for the Jaworów raion do not take into account Jews who died in the ghetto from hunger and disease.)¹⁶ Nearly all the victims were Jews.

Only about 20 Jews returned to Jaworów on the liberation of the town by the Red Army on July 20, 1944, having survived in hiding or in the forests with the Soviet partisans. According to survivor testimony, local Poles were generally more willing than Ukrainians to hide Jews from the Germans.

Bauer was killed by partisans in 1944. Becker worked in the German administration after 1945, and the investigation into his activities was closed in 1975; he died in 1991. Von der Leyen perished in 1945. The fate of Stockheck is unknown. The investigation into Steyert by the Zentralstelle Dortmund (ZSSa-D) was closed in September 1964, as he was no longer fit to stand trial; he died in November 1964.

SOURCES Further information on the ghetto in Jaworów can be found in the book by Samuel Druck, Swastika over Jaworow: The Tragic Chronicle of the Jaworow Jewish Community [trans. from Yiddish by Samuel Kreiter] (New York: First Jaworower Independent Association, 1950).

Documentation regarding the destruction of the Jews of Jaworów can be found in the following archives: AŽIH (301/1612, 1613, 1616, 1912, 1913, and 4947); BA-L (ZStL, 208 AR-Z 276); DALO (R 3-1-278 and 279); GARF (7021-67-79 and 84); USHMM; and YVA.

Alexander Kruglov
trans. Ester-Basya Vaisman

NOTES

1. AŽIH, 301/1616, testimony of Jonas Deer and Włodzimierz Hochberg; Druck, Swastika over Jaworow, pp. 7–8.

2. AŽIH, 301/1912.

3. BA-BL, R 58/214, Ereignismeldung UdSSR no. 24, July 16, 1941; AŽIH, 301/1613, testimony of Rachela Scheer; and Druck, Swastika over Jaworow, pp. 8–9. The Jewish sources mostly mention only 12 victims.

4. AŽIH, 301/1912, 1616; and Druck, Swastika over Jaworow, pp. 9–10.

5. Druck, Swastika over Jaworow, pp. 12–13; AŽIH, 301/1611, testimony of Juda Mezler; and AŽIH, 301/1613, 1616.

6. Druck, Swastika over Jaworow, pp. 15–16.

7. GARF, 7021-67-79, p. 65. According to another account, 1,800 Jews were sent to Bełżec, and 250 were killed locally (see 7021-67-79, p. 61). Accounts by survivors also give varying numbers, e.g., AŽIH, 301/1616.

8. Tatiana Berenstein, “Eksterminacja ludności żydowskiej w dystrykcie Galicja (1941–1943),” BŽIH, no. 61 (1967), table 7; Thomas Sandkühler, “Endlösung” in Galizien. Der Judenmord in Ostpolen und die Rettungsinitiativen von Berthold Beitz 1941–1944 (Bonn: Dietz, 1996), p. 234. Another source indicates that 262 Jews were shot (GARF, 7021-67-79, p. 61).

9. GARF, 7021-67-79, p. 61; AŽIH, 301/4947, testimony of Chaja Antmann, April 11, 1945; and 301/1616; Druck, Swastika over Jaworow, pp. 24–25.

10. AŽIH, 301/1611, 1613.

11. Berenstein, “Eksterminacja,” table 7; and AŽIH, 301/4947.

12. Sandkühler, “Endlösung,” pp. 234–235; AŽIH, 301/1613; Druck, Swastika over Jaworow, pp. 24–26.

13. GARF, 7021-67-79, p. 61 AŽIH, 301/1616, mentions 1,500 deaths, as does Druck, Swastika over Jaworow, p. 26.

14. GARF, 7021-67-79, pp. 61, 65; Druck, Swastika over Jaworow, pp. 29–32.

15. Berenstein, “Eksterminacja,” p. 26, table 7; Druck, Swastika over Jaworow, pp. 33–35.

16. GARF, 7021-67-84, pp. 125–126.

JEZIERZANY

Pre-1939: Jezierzany (Yiddish: Oziron), town, Buczacz powiat, Tarnopol województwo, Poland; 1939–1941: Ozeriany, Skala-Podol’skaia raion, Ternopol’ oblast’, Ukrainian SSR; 1941–1944: Jezierzany, Kreis Czortkow, Distrikt Galizien, Generalgouvernement; post-1991: Ozeriani, Borsbchiv raion, Ternopil’ oblast’, Ukraine

Jezierzany is located about 88 kilometers (55 miles) south-southeast of Tarnopol. According to the 1921 census, 1,302 Jews were living in the town. In 1939, the Jewish population is estimated to have been around 1,800.

On July 8, 1941, a Hungarian regiment entered Jezierzany. At that time, nationalist Ukrainians were in control of the town. In mid-July, the Ukrainian militia escorted a group of Jewish men into the forest with the intention of killing them, but Hungarian officers intervened, and the Jews were spared. However, a number of Jews were killed in neighboring villages, including in Piłatkowice and Szypowce, and surviving refugees from these villages fled to Jezierzany in search of help.¹ In the summer of 1941, a number of Jews who had been expelled eastward from Hungary also arrived in the town. Some stayed for a while, before they moved on to Borszczów and other towns. The Jews of Jezierzany did their best to assist them.

By September of 1941, authority had been transferred to a German civil administration. Jezierzany became part of Kreis Czortkow within Distrikt Galizien. At first, the Kreishauptmann was the former deputy Gestapo chief in Stettin, SS-Sturmabführer Dr. Gerhard Littschwager, and from April 1942, former Stadthauptmann (city mayor) in Lwów, SS-Hauptsturmführer Dr. Hans Kujath.

The anti-Jewish Aktions in the town were organized by the Security Police outpost (Sipo-Aussendienststelle) based in Czortków. The heads of this office successively were SS-Obersturmführer Karl Hildemann (from October 1941 to October 1942), SS-Untersturmführer Hans Velde (from October 1942 to February 1943), SS-Sturmscharführer Heinrich Peckmann (from February to September 1943), and SS-Obersturmführer Werner Eisel (from September 1943). The German Gendarmerie and the Ukrainian Auxiliary Police (Ukrainische Hilfspolizei) both took an active part in the anti-Jewish Aktions.

With the transfer of power to the Germans, the Jews were required to wear white armbands bearing the Star of David. All men aged between 14 and 60 had to perform forced labor on a regular basis, which was organized by the Jewish Council (Judenrat). The Jewish Police assisted in collecting contributions in money and goods demanded by the German authorities. During the winter of 1941–1942, the Jews also had to surrender their fur items of clothing for the Wehrmacht.

According to Pinkas ha-kehillot, the Germans established a ghetto in Jezierzany in October 1941. Frieda Friedman (née Elberger) and her younger brother, Sam Elberger, were both forced to move from Szypowce to the ghetto in Jezierzany in the fall of 1941, where they found accommodation with relatives. They could take with them only the possessions they could carry in their hands. Jews were explicitly forbidden to leave the ghetto, but according to child survivor Sam Elberger, many people sneaked out at night “through holes in the fence” to procure extra food.²

Mikołaj Szczyrba, a local Polish inhabitant, mentions that in September 1941 the Germans ordered the Ukrainians to stop murdering the Jews in the villages and disarmed the Ukrainian villagers, tasking the Ukrainian Auxiliary Police to maintain order. At this time, many of the remaining Jews in the villages were ordered to move to Jezierzany, where a ghetto was then established.³

In December 1941, the German authorities sent 100 young Jews from Jezierzany to work in the labor camp at Borki Wielkie. More Jewish youths were sent in April 1942 to the camp at Hłuboczek, but the Judenrat did its best to remain in contact with these workers and supply them with extra food and clothing. Many people died in the labor camps from the harsh conditions there.

From April through June of 1942, more Jews were brought into the Jezierzany ghetto from surrounding villages, including the family of Max Hecht from Oleksińce. Hecht recalls the ghetto as having been unfenced but remarks that the Jews knew they were not permitted to leave its area. Jews still went out illegally to forage for food, but this became increasingly dangerous over time, as some of the local population would kill the Jews they found or turn them in to the German authorities.⁴

In the late spring of 1942, two Jewish refugees from Austria and Germany, who had been in Jezierzany for two years, appealed to the Jewish Social Self-Help (JSS) in Kraków for some assistance. They no longer had adequate shoes or even a spare shirt to change, and they received from the Judenrat only their ration of 100 grams (3.5 ounces) of bread per day.⁵ The JSS branch office in Jezierzany, which from July 1942 was officially headed by Abraham Maiberger, was able to offer only a small amount of financial support to the needy Jews of the town.

In the summer of 1942, the Germans took over a collective farm in the vicinity of Jezierzany and established a plantation for kok-saghyz—a plant similar to tobacco, used for the production of synthetic rubber—using Jewish workers. This plantation became a form of forced labor camp for Jews, which remained in existence into the summer of 1943, holding more than 200 Jews.

On September 26, 1942, German and Ukrainian police surrounded the ghetto. Over the next two days they rounded up about 700 Jews, who were then deported by train to the Bełżec extermination camp. Max Schmerer of Zaleszczyki was caught in Jezierzany at the time of the roundup. With his mother and sister, he was taken to the collection point, where they were held for two days without food or water under very close guard. A number of small children and elderly people were shot on the spot during the roundup. On the third day, the assembled Jews were loaded into freight cars and deported. A few Jews managed to break out of the freight cars and made their way back to Jezierzany. Shortly afterwards in October, most of the remaining Jews in Jezierzany (about 600 people) were transferred to the ghettos in Tłuste or Borszczów in horse-driven carts, as Jezierzany was to become judenrein (cleansed of Jews).⁶

After this transfer, a small group of Jews stayed in Jezierzany for a while longer, to sort out remaining Jewish property. The Jewish houses of the town were mostly dismantled, and any valuable materials were sold to the local peasants. Some Jews who had escaped during the roundups survived in the nearby forests in bunkers. However, many of these escapees subsequently were captured and killed by local peasants or by the German and Ukrainian police.

When the Soviet army entered Jezierzany in April 1944, about 50 Jews emerged from hiding, but some fled again, as it appeared the Germans might return. At the end of the war, most of the survivors moved to postwar Poland and from there to Israel, the United States, or other countries in the West.

SOURCES The main published source used regarding the history of the Jewish community of Jezierzany and its fate during the Holocaust is Danuta Dabrowska, Abraham Wein, and Aharon Weiss, eds., Pinkas ha-kehillot. Encyclopaedia of Jewish Communities: Poland, vol. 2, Eastern Galicia (Jerusalem: Yad Vashem, 1980), pp. 288–290. Additional information can be found in A. Kruglov, Katastrofa ukraińskiego ewreistwa 1941–1944 gg.: Entsiklopedicheskiy spravocchnik (Kharkov: “Karavella,” 2001), pp. 240–241.

Documents and testimonies describing the fate of the Jews of Jezierzany can be found in the following archives: AŻIH (211/481; 301/3184, 4990); DATO; USHMM; VHF (# 3236, 25611, 45175); and YVA.

Martin Dean

NOTES

1. AŻIH, 301/3184, testimony of Mikołaj Szczyrba (a Catholic Pole); VHF, # 3236, testimony of Sam Elberger.
2. VHF, # 3236 and # 25611, testimony of Frieda Friedman (née Elberger).
3. AŻIH, 301/3184.
4. VHF, # 45175, testimony of Max Hecht.
5. AŻIH, 211/481, Emanuel Wegner und Marion Stern an das Jüdische Sozialamt Krakau, April or May 1942.
6. Ibid., 301/4990, testimony of Max Schmerer.

VOLUME II: PART A

KALUSZ

Pre-1939: Kałusz, town, powiat center, Stanisławów województwo, Poland; 1939–1941: Kalush, raion center, Stanislav oblast', Ukrainian SSR; 1941–1944: Kalusz, initially center of Kreis Kalusz then Kreis Stanislau, Distrikt Galizien, Generalgouvernement; post-1991: Kalush, raion center, Ivano-Frankivsk oblast', Ukraine

Kałusz is located 27 kilometers (17 miles) north-northwest of Stanisławów. According to the population census of 1931, 3,967 Jews were living in Kałusz. On the eve of World War II in 1939, there were about 5,000 Jews in the town. In July 1941, there were probably around 6,000 Jews living in Kałusz.¹

Following a period of Soviet occupation at the beginning of World War II, Hungarian troops occupied Kałusz on July 6, 1941. The Hungarians ordered the opening of all the shops, with signs identifying every “Jewish store.” They proceeded to loot the shops and ship everything back to Hungary. Local Ukrainian nationalists complained to the German commandant in Stanisławów that their allies were stealing “government property.” In the surrounding villages, Ukrainian nationalists murdered some Jews, causing others to seek refuge in Kałusz. Within two weeks the Germans took control of the town, replacing the Hungarians.²

A German military commandant's office (Ortskommandantur) briefly administered the town until the end of July. On August 1, 1941, power was transferred to a German civil administration. Kałusz was initially the center of the Kreis Kalusz in Distrikt Galizien. Those appointed to the position of Kreishauptmann were Regierungsrat Dr. Friedrich Gercke (from August 1941 to March 1942; he died during the war) and Dr. Karl-Hans Broschegg (from March 1942 to July 1943).

The subdistricts of Kałusz, Wojniłów, Dolina, Bolechów, Rożniatów, Wygoda, and Perehińsko were incorporated into Kreis Kalusz. (In March 1942, Bolechów became part of the Kreis Stryj.) Altogether, according to the population census of December 9, 1931, there were 16,720 Jews living in these subdistricts.³

In July 1942, the Kreishauptmannschaft Kałusz was dissolved. The subdistricts of Kałusz and Wojniłów were incorporated into Kreis Stanislau. The remaining districts—Dolina, Rożniatów, Wygoda, and Perehińsko—were incorporated into Kreis Stryj.

The anti-Jewish Aktionen in the town were organized and carried out by the Security Police outpost (Sipo-Aussendienststelle) in Stanisławów. The post was headed by SS-Hauptsturmführer Hans Krüger (from the end of July 1941 until November 1942) and by his deputy, SS-Untersturmführer Oskar Brandt (from November 1942). A German Criminal Police (Kripo) post, a German Gendarmerie post, and a Ukrainian police unit were established in Kałusz. These units participated in the extermination operations that were carried out.

On August 23–25, 1941, shortly after the transfer of power to the German civil administration, a Security Police detachment arrived in Kałusz from Stanisławów. In this first Aktion, the detachment arrested and shot 380 Jews, mostly merchants and professionals.⁴ In September 1941, 50 more people were arrested and shot by the German Gendarmerie.⁵

In the summer of 1941, the German military administration ordered the creation of a Jewish Council (Judenrat) and the Jewish Police (Jüdischer Ordnungsdienst), commanded by a Czech refugee named Memmelis; these served to enforce compliance with German regulations. The Jewish Police implemented the marking of the Jews with white armbands bearing the Star of David. The Germans confiscated vast amounts of Jewish property, including any items of value. The Jews were registered and required to perform assigned labor tasks.

At the end of 1941, an open ghetto (Jewish residential district) was created in Kałusz. Those living outside the defined area were forced to move into the ghetto, bringing whatever possessions they could carry and abandoning—or trying to sell for very little—heavier items such as furniture. Jews expelled from neighboring villages were also sent to the ghetto. People from places outside the ghetto were housed with families or in the synagogue, and living conditions became extremely crowded. A curfew was imposed, requiring Jews to stay off the streets after sunset, even within the ghetto. Two Jews who violated the order were shot on sight, a clear warning that the curfew had to be strictly observed.

The Judenrat was charged with meeting the daily quota for forced labor. Those assigned to work outside the ghetto received special identification cards and had some contact with the local population, providing possible access to extra food. Some Jews paid large bribes to get these jobs. Among the more desirable places to work were farms, sawmills, workshops, and various German firms operating in the area.⁶

As of April 1942, there were 6,300 Jews living in the Kałusz ghetto.⁷ That same month, the Security Police detachment from Stanisławów carried out another Aktion. They arrested and shot 800 Jews only because they were deemed unfit for labor.⁸ After this Aktion, there were 5,500 Jews remaining in the town.⁹

As the months dragged by, conditions in the ghetto deteriorated. Hunger increased, especially among the many poor who had nothing to trade for food. The Judenrat had nothing left to distribute. People keeled over in the streets, dying from starvation. Corpses were collected on a daily basis to be buried in mass graves in the cemetery. All communal activity ceased. Nevertheless, many people were sustained by a vitality that enabled them to overcome physical deprivation. The doctors in the ghetto, despite the lack of basic resources, nurtured many people through their illnesses.¹⁰

In August 1942, the number of Jews in Kałusz increased again as the Germans transferred more Jews into the town from nearby villages. A total of 209 Jewish families from the villages in the Perehińsko subdistrict—which included Perehińsko, Uhrynów, Jasieniów, Siwka, Jasień, Zawój, Berłochy, Piotrów, Nowica, Grabówka, and Kamień—were resettled to Kałusz.¹¹ Still more were brought in from the Rożniatów subdistrict. On Yom Kippur (September 21, 1942), a few dispirited souls assembled in a secret place for an abbreviated prayer service.

After the Jews were concentrated in the town, the Security Police post in Stanisławów carried out a series of Aktions in the fall of 1942, during which part of the Jewish population was taken to Stanisławów and murdered there, while the others were deported to the extermination camp in Bełżec. The final large Aktion probably took place in mid-September or mid-October 1942 (accounts differ).¹² Because of rumors circulating about another large transport, people frantically tried to hide in cellars and attics, mostly within the ghetto. At the start of the Aktion, Gestapo men and Ukrainian policemen entered the ghetto for a house-to-house roundup. About 1,200 people were captured and held near the railroad station. Most of those in hiding were discovered and also rounded up. The hunt continued for about 36 hours. Then the prisoners were brought to the rail depot and loaded into freight cars. The victims, including the Jewish Police and leaders of the Judenrat, were transported to the camp in Bełżec.¹³

Not everyone was captured during the two-day roundup. As their hunger increased, people slowly emerged from hiding. The Germans announced they would not be harmed. They ordered the establishment of another Judenrat, headed by Berish Geller. No one was sent out to forced labor, nor was any food distributed. At the end of October, or a few weeks later, the surviving remnant was shipped to Stanisławów. The Germans officially declared Kałusz to be free of Jews (judenrein).¹⁴ The Red Army liberated Kałusz on August 1, 1944. Fewer than a dozen Jewish inhabitants survived the occupation.

SOURCES Articles on the destruction of the Jewish population of the town can be found in the following publications: Danuta Dabrowska, Abraham Wein, and Aharon Weiss, eds., Pinkas ha-kehillot. Encyclopaedia of Jewish Communities: Poland, vol. 2, Eastern Galicia (Jerusalem: Yad Vashem, 1980), pp. 452–455; Shabtai Unger and Moshe Etinger, eds., Kalusz: Hayeha ve-burbana shel ha-kehila (Tel Aviv: Kalusz Society, 1980).

Documents on the fate of the Jews of Kałusz are located in the following archives: AŻIH (301/671, 1381, and 4928); DAI-FO; GARF (7021-73-8); and YVA.

Alexander Kruglov and Samuel Fishman
trans. Steven Seegel

NOTES

1. Tatiana Berenstein, “Eksterminacja ludności żydowskiej w dystrykcie Galicja (1941–1943),” BŻIH, no. 61 (1967), table 9; AŻIH, 301/4928, testimony of Mundek Kramer, May 20, 1945.
2. Unger and Etinger, Kalusz, p. 233; AŻIH, 301/4928.
3. Berenstein, “Eksterminacja,” p. 11.
4. GARF, 7021-73-8, p. 2; AŻIH, 301/1381, testimony of Dawid Halpern. Halpern gives the figure of 500 Jewish victims.
5. GARF, 7021-73-8, p. 4.
6. Unger and Etinger, Kalusz, pp. 236–238.
7. Berenstein, “Eksterminacja,” table 9.
8. Thomas Sandkühler, “Endlösung” in Galizien: Der Judenmord in Ostpolen und die Rettungsinitiativen von Berthold Beitz 1941–1944 (Bonn: Dietz-Verlag 1996), p. 238.

9. See the document dated July 8, 1942, from the Jewish Social Self-Help Committee in Kałusz (Jüdisches Hilfs-Komitee), in the reports of the Jewish Social Self-Help Organization (Jüdische Soziale Selbsthilfe) in Kraków, AŻIH, 211/270.

10. Unger and Etinger, Kalusz, p. 239.

11. GARF, 7021-73-23, pp. 2, 6–17. As of March 1942, 663 Jews lived in Perehińsko. See Berenstein, “Eksterminacja,” table 10.

12. There are contradictory accounts regarding the dating of the final liquidation Aktion. Unger and Etinger, Kalusz, p. 240, indicates that the ghetto liquidation took place in mid-October 1942. Other accounts date the liquidation on September 15–17, 1942: see AŻIH, 301/671 and 4928. According to M. Shpats, around 3,000 Jews were deported to Bełżec in a deportation Aktion on November 23–25, 1942. See GARF, 7021-73-8, pp. 9–10.

13. Unger and Etinger, Kalusz, p. 240.

14. Ibid., p. 241. According to M. Shpats, about 500 Jews remained in the township of Kałusz. In December 1942, they were rounded up and brought to Stanisławów. See GARF, 7021-73-8, pp. 9–10.

KAMIONKA STRUMIŁOWA

Pre-1939: Kamionka Strumilowa, town, powiat center, Tarnopol województwo, Poland; 1939–1941: Kamenka Strumilovskaia, raion center, L'vov oblast', Ukrainian SSR; 1941–1944: Kamionka-Strumilowa, Kreis center, Distrikt Galizien, Generalgouvernement; post-1991: Kam'ianka-Buz'ka, raion center, L'viv oblast', Ukraine

Kamionka Strumilowa is located 39 kilometers (24 miles) northeast of Lwów. According to the Polish census of 1931, 3,283 Jews were living in the town. On the eve of World War II, this figure had risen to 3,964 Jews. In June 1941, the number of Jews in Kamionka Strumilowa was around 3,500.¹

German forces occupied Kamionka Strumilowa on June 29, 1941. At first a military commandant's office (Ortskommandantur) administered the town, but on August 1, authority was handed over to a German civil administration. Kamionka became the administrative center of Kreis Kamionka-Strumilowa within Distrikt Galizien. The Kreis included the subdistricts of Kamionka, Busk, Milatyń Nowy, Sokal, Radziechów, and Łopatyń. The Kreishauptmann was at first SS-Untersturmführer Wilhelm Rebay von Ehrenwiesen; from June 1942, his deputy, SS-Untersturmführer Joachim Nehring.

The anti-Jewish Aktions in Kamionka were organized and carried out by the Security Police outpost in Sokal, which was subordinated to the Commanding Officer of the Security Police and the SD (KdS) based in Lwów. The Sokal outpost initially was run by SS-Sturmabführer Hans Block and, from May 1942 to October 1943, by SS-Obersturmführer Oswald Heyduk. In Kamionka Strumilowa itself, there was a German Gendarmerie post and a Ukrainian police detachment, both of which actively participated in the anti-Jewish Aktions.

VOLUME II: PART A

At the end of June 1941, antisemitic elements among the local Ukrainians organized a pogrom that lasted three days, resulting in the deaths of about 150 Jews. After the pogrom, posters appeared on the streets in which it was announced that the Germans had not killed the Jews.²

In July 1941, on the orders of the German military administration, a Jewish Council (Judenrat) was created, and the Jews were ordered to wear white armbands bearing a Star of David. The first head of the Jewish Council was Maks Friedhofer, a capable and well-respected man. Unfortunately, the Gestapo murdered him in Lwów after only a few weeks. His replacement, Meier Kleiner, was criticized for his personal greed. In accordance with German orders, he organized the collection of a large amount of Jewish property, especially valuables, retaining part for his own use.³

On November 10, 1941,⁴ a unit of the Security Police from Sokal carried out the first Aktion in Kamionka Strumiłowa, during which about 500 Jews from the intelligentsia were shot in the village of Obydów.⁵

In June 1942, 71 Jews from the villages of Żełdec, Dalnicz, Kłodno Wielkie, and Pieczychwosty in the Lwów district were resettled to Kamionka. At that time, 3,163 Jews were registered in Kamionka. The figure in April 1942 had been 3,189 Jews.⁶

On September 15, 1942, a Security Police unit from Sokal carried out a second Aktion in the course of which some 1,500 Jews were deported to the extermination camp at Bełżec and about 300 Jews were murdered in the town.⁷ In the course of a third Aktion on September 21, 1942, around 600 Jews from Kamionka were killed in Zabuże; Jews from Radziechów, Chołojów, and Busk, some 2,000 in all, were shot along with them.⁸ The Jews were possibly shot instead of being deported because a train could not be allocated to send them to Bełżec.

After the third Aktion, a Jewish residential district, or open ghetto, was established on September 30, 1942; it existed for less than one month.⁹ On October 28, 1942, during the fourth Aktion, the open ghetto was liquidated, and 1,023 Jews were deported to Bełżec. After the deportation, more than 100 Jews were uncovered hiding in and around the ghetto and shot near the town. Fifteen Jews were retained to clean up the ghetto area, but they were also shot once this task was completed.¹⁰ Following the ghetto liquidation Aktion, the town was declared to be “free of Jews” (judenfrei), which was celebrated by a personal visit from the governor of Distrikt Galizien, Otto Wächter.¹¹

Only about 20 Jews managed to survive the German occupation, most of them hidden by local Poles.

Rebay von Ehrenwiesen was under investigation for a period after the war, but the case was closed for lack of evidence. Nehring was acquitted on August 24, 1981, by the state court. Block died in August 1944. Heyduk was sentenced to life imprisonment on July 13, 1949, by a court in Munich.

SOURCES An article about the persecution and destruction of Kamionka Strumiłowa's Jews can be found in Danuta Dabrowska, Abraham Wein, and Aharon Weiss, eds., Pinkas ba-kebilot. Encyclopaedia of Jewish Communities: Poland, vol. 2, Eastern Galicia (Jerusalem: Yad Vashem, 1980), pp. 455–457.

Documentation on the fate of Kamionka Strumiłowa's Jews during the Holocaust can be found in the following archives: AŻIH (301/45, 4855, and 4926); BA-L (ZStL, 208 AR-Z 14/1964); DALO; GARF (7021-67-84); RGVA (1323-2-292b); and YVA.

Alexander Kruglov
trans. Ray Brandon

NOTES

1. Tatiana Berenstein, “Eksterminacja ludności żydowskiej w dystrykcie Galicja (1941–1943),” BŻIH, no. 61 (1967), table 5; AŻIH, 301/4926.
2. GARF, 7021-67-84, pp. 11, 13; AŻIH, 301/4926 and 4855. Some sources, however, mention the participation of German forces.
3. AŻIH, 301/4926.
4. Verdict of LG-Stad, 10 Ks 9 Js 544/64 (29/78), in the case against J. Nehring, August 24, 1981.
5. GARF, 7021-67-84, p. 12; AŻIH, 301/45. According to another source, 300 people were shot; GARF, 7021-67-84, p. 13.
6. Berenstein, “Eksterminacja,” table 5.
7. AŻIH, 301/4926.
8. Verdict of LG-Stad, 10 Ks 9 Js 544/64 (29/78), in the case against J. Nehring, August 24, 1981; Berenstein, “Eksterminacja,” table 5; AŻIH, 301/4855.
9. AŻIH, 301/4926.
10. Ibid. See the account by the Einsatzkommando, 5. Zug, SS-Pol. Rgt. 24, RGVA, 1323-2-292b, p. 29.
11. AŻIH, 301/4926.

KOŁOMYJA

Pre-1939: Kołomyja, city, Stanisławów województwo, Poland; 1939–1941: Kolomyia, raion center, Stanislav oblast', Ukrainian SSR; 1941–1944: Kolomea, Kreis center, Distrikt Galizien, Generalgouvernement; post-1991: Kolomyia, raion center, Ivano-Frankivsk oblast', Ukraine

Kołomyja is located 51 kilometers (32 miles) south-southeast of Stanisławów. In 1938, in so-called metropolitan Kołomyja (after the inclusion of the villages of Szeparowce, Diatkowice, Korolówka, and Wierbiąż Niżny), the Jewish population stood at 20,000.¹

By 1941, owing to a great influx of Jewish refugees, first from Germany and Austria, and later from Poland and Hungary, the Jewish population of Kołomyja reached about 30,000.²

On the night of June 21–22, 1941, the German air force bombed Kołomyja. The bulk of Jewish Communists, as well as many young people and students, tried to flee into the interior of the Soviet Union, and many of them succeeded. The vast majority of the Jewish population of Kołomyja stayed put for many reasons, among them lack of transportation, the absence of any call to leave from the Jewish leadership, and

The mother and son of the Kołomyja rabbi, n.d. Both perished in the Holocaust.

USHMM WS #63415, COURTESY OF YIVO

the inability to imagine what would await them at the hands of the Germans.

On July 1, 1941, the last units of the Red Army left Kołomyja, and local Ukrainians established their own authority in the city. On July 3, Hungarian tanks entered Kołomyja and established a military occupation.

On Friday, July 4, 1941, the Ukrainians in Kołomyja organized an anti-Jewish pogrom. Jews were forced out of their houses, beaten, and humiliated. Then 300 Jews were forced to remove the Lenin statue from Piłsudski Square with their bare hands.³ Another group of Jews was forced into the city park to remove the statues of Stalin and Lenin. Jews were forced to stand facing a fence, and the Ukrainians were preparing to shoot them when a deputy mayor arrived and stopped this Aktion.⁴ Similar pogroms, in which hundreds of Jews were killed, took place in the small towns and villages in the vicinity of Kołomyja.⁵

In Kołomyja, the Ukrainians were unhappy with Hungarian rule. To prove to the Germans their own superior organizational abilities, they prepared lists of the Jewish intelligentsia for forced labor. Zenon Pryhrodskij, the head of the Organization of Ukrainian Nationalists (OUN), prepared the lists.⁶ On July 16, 1941, a mobile Security Police unit from Stanisławów arrived in Kołomyja, and the local Ukrainians gathered 110 Jews from the list and led them towards the former village of Korolówka.⁷ The Jews were told to march with shovels, and at the rear of the column was a German car with a machine gun. Upon their arrival in Korolówka, the Jews were told to undress and to start digging ditches. Realizing what awaited them, most Jews stopped digging and started to pray or just lay on the ground. At the last moment, the commandant of the Hungarian garrison was informed about the intentions of the Ukrainians and the Germans. He arrived at Korolówka and stopped the Aktion.⁸

On August 1, 1941, Hans Frank declared the annexation of Eastern Galicia to the Generalgouvernement, and on that day the administration of Kołomyja was transferred into German hands.

The anti-Jewish repressions intensified. The new Kreishauptmann, Klaus Peter Volkmann, ordered all Jews aged 6 and older to wear armbands bearing the Star of David; he appointed a Jewish Council (Judenrat) supervised by the Gestapo and ordered all Jews between the ages of 12 and 60 to perform forced labor. The Jewish Council was ordered to conduct a census of all Jewish inhabitants in Kołomyja.⁹

At the end of September 1941, Volkmann and Peter Leideritz, the head of the Gestapo, appointed a chairman of the Judenrat for Kołomyja, which now also represented the surrounding towns: Kuty, Kosów, Jabłonów, Horodenka, Zabłotów, Śniatyń, and Żabie. Mordechai Markus Horowitz was appointed chairman of the Jewish Council. He was a respected pre-war industrialist in Kołomyja who accepted this position out of a sense of obligation towards the Jewish community. Horowitz believed that the Jews should fulfill all German orders quickly and fully, and he made sure that all the Jews complied.

The German authorities in general and the Gestapo in particular used the Jewish Council in Kołomyja as their tool to carry out their repressive policies. The duties of the Judenrat included the confiscation of valuables, organization of Jews for labor, and at a later date, assistance with the deportations of Jews from Kołomyja. Often it appeared that the Jewish Council was bending over backwards to fulfill the German demands.¹⁰

The Judenrat employed 300 people and consisted of six departments as follows:

1. A labor bureau (Arbeitsamt) was established to organize forced labor. A succession of well-known personalities headed this section of the Jewish Council, and it introduced special worker identification cards and permanent places of work.¹¹
2. A provisioning department (Beschaffungsamt) was in charge of the confiscation of goods from Jewish homes, as well as the preparation of apartments for the Germans.

3. A supply department (Approvisationsabteilung), with Shayke Frisch as its head, was in charge of dividing up the meager provisions.
4. A housing department (Wohnungsamt) had to find living space for the large number of people brought to Kołomyja both before and after the establishment of the ghetto.
5. A registration department (Registrationsabteilung) employed five clerks who managed the files of the inhabitants of the Kołomyja ghetto, usually based on the ration cards. The files never reflected the true number of Jews in the city. After each Aktion, new ration cards were issued, each time in a different color. Many people preferred not to apply for new ration cards for their children and elders, to protect them from certain death.
6. A Jewish post office (Postamt), headed by Zindel Neuman, was established within the Judenrat, as Jews were not allowed to use the city post office. Jewish mail was distributed there, and outgoing mail was prepared for the German censor so the mail could go out.

The building of the Jewish Council became the center of all activities for Jews in Kołomyja. All labor details left from there, all barter took place there, and all information and rumors were exchanged in front of the Judenrat building.¹²

With time, Markus Horowitz, the chairman of the Jewish Council, moved into the Judenrat building, gave all his money to the Judenrat, and ate only in the soup kitchens. He even refused to ask for the release of his wife from a roundup. Horowitz used to say, “[G]ive them everything and you will stay alive.”¹³ Many believed that Horowitz slowly went insane, and he finally committed suicide in November 1942 together with his sister.

The Germans chose the eve of the Jewish New Year—September 21, 1941—to expel the Jewish population from the villages in the vicinity of Kołomyja, sending them to the city. The next three weeks passed under constant Gestapo terror, including the forced removal of gravestones from Jewish cemeteries to pave the roads with them.

On October 11, 1941, massive arrests were conducted according to lists prepared by the Ukrainians. Jewish teachers, rabbis, doctors, and lawyers were arrested by the SD, commanded by SS-Obersturmführer Leideritz. They were kept in the Kołomyja prison until the evening, when they were taken to the Szeparowce Forest and murdered there.¹⁴

On the next day, Hoshana Rabba, the last day of the Sukkot holiday, October 12, 1941—the Gestapo, with the help of the Ukrainian Auxiliary Police (Ukrainische Hilfspolizei), dragged 3,000 Jews from synagogues, houses, and streets. They were taken first to the prison and later by truck to the Szeparowce Forest, 8 kilometers (5 miles) from Kołomyja, where they were shot.¹⁵ The Great Synagogue of Kołomyja was also burned down during this Aktion.

On Thursday, November 6, 1941, under the pretext of looking for collaborators with the Soviets, the German forces led by Leideritz, assisted by the Judenreferent (Jewish Affairs Officer) at the Gestapo, Ebersold, and Gestapo forces led by SS-Hauptscharführer Goedde, who later became a political Referent for the Kołomyja ghetto, surrounded the poorest part of the Jewish quarter in Kołomyja, along Mokra Street. During this and subsequent killing Aktions, more than 2,000 Jews were taken to the Szeparowce Forest and brutally murdered there. A Ukrainian, Chlipko of the Hilfspolizei, demonstrated how Jews could be killed without wasting ammunition. He ordered the naked Jews to lie on the ground with their heads over the edge of the ditch they had just dug, and with an axe, he started to chop off their heads. Ebersold ordered him to stop, and the rest of the victims were killed by shooting.¹⁶

On November 11, 1941, a few hundred more Jews were rounded up and murdered in Szeparowce.

On December 23, 1941, the Germans ordered the confiscation of all fur items in the possession of Jews, as well as any ski equipment, including sweaters and hats, in the so-called Fur Aktion (Pelzaktion).¹⁷

On the same day, December 23, 1941, all Jews with foreign passports had to come to the Gestapo building to register. All those who obeyed this order were imprisoned for the night. The next day these 1,200 Jews were murdered in the Szeparowce Forest. Only a few Jews were released and later taken to Lwów.¹⁸

On January 22, 1942, 400 of the most respected Jews in Kołomyja were caught and later killed in the Szeparowce Forest.¹⁹ Throughout February and March 1942, about 1,000 Jews per week were murdered in Szeparowce.

In March 1942, there were only 17,000 Jews left in Kołomyja. On March 23, the remaining Kołomyja Jews were confined within a ghetto, which was divided into three parts. The Jewish Police (Jüdischer Ordnungsdienst), consisting of 160 Jews, was established on March 26, 1942; they enforced German orders to move all the remaining Jews into the ghetto within 24 hours.

On April 3–6, 1942, the first deportation of some 5,000 Jews from Kołomyja to the Bełżec killing center took place. On September 7, 1942, an order was posted for all Jews to congregate at 6:00 A.M. on a large square. At the same time a roundup took place inside the ghetto, and all who were found in hiding were shot and killed. More than 10,000 people gathered in front of the Labor Bureau, trying to look their best. Then 1,300 people were selected to stay, deemed fit for labor, and the rest were slated for deportation to Bełżec. This Aktion was conducted by the Gestapo officer Prost, and Gestapo man Hallerbach was in charge of the confiscation of valuables from the deported Jews.²⁰

After the expulsion of the Jews from the small towns and villages, many who took cover subsequently emerged and were told by the Germans to go to the Kołomyja ghetto with a promise that they would be safe. On September 11, 1942, the Germans entered the ghetto at 4:00 A.M., rounded up 4,000

Jews, and deported them to Bełżec.²¹ During the four days between September 7 and September 11, 1942, 17,300 Jews from Kołomyja and its vicinity, including Śniatyń, Kosów, Kut, Zabłotów, and Horodenka, were deported to Bełżec and murdered there on arrival.

On February 2, 1943, the final destruction of Kołomyja's Jews took place; 2,200 Jews were brutally killed in the ghetto by beating, clubbing, or shooting. Leideritz allegedly competed with the head of the Gestapo in Stanisławów as to whose Kreis would be "cleansed of Jews" (judenrein) first. Leideritz won this murderous contest.

Out of about 70,000 Jews who lived in Kołomyja (25,000) and its vicinity, 60 percent were murdered in Kołomyja and the Szeparowce Forest, and 40 percent were taken to the Bełżec extermination camp and murdered there on arrival.

During the deportations from Kołomyja to Bełżec, Szaje Feder, who was deported twice and escaped from the train twice, testified that between 100 and 120 people were pushed into each train wagon. After each escape, Feder was caught by local Ukrainians, beaten, and delivered back to the Kołomyja ghetto.

There were between 17 and 20 Aktions in Kołomyja. More than 200 Jews managed to escape and survived in hiding.²² The Red Army liberated the area in March 1944.

Peter Leideritz was the head of the Gestapo in Kołomyja from the fall of 1941 until January 1944. He personally directed most of the Aktions. Leideritz was extradited to Poland in 1947, tried, sentenced to death, and executed. Klaus Peter Volkmann (b. 1913) served as a Kreishauptmann in the Generalgouvernement and was Hans Frank's representative in Kołomyja until July 1942, when he was demoted for corruption. After the war, he changed his name to Peter Grubbe and worked as a journalist on foreign affairs for major German newspapers. He was never tried for war crimes.

SOURCES The following publications also contain information regarding the annihilation of the Jews of Kołomyja: Dr. Dov Noy and Mark Schutzman, eds., Sefer Zikaron Li-Kehilat Kolomeyah Veba-Sevivah (Tel Aviv: Irgun yots'e Kolomeyah veba-sevivah ba'arets uva-tefutsot, 1972); Shlomo Bickel, ed., Pinkas Kolomey (1957; New York: Rausen Bros., 1979); and Tuvia Friedmann, ed., Schupo-Kriegsverbrecher in Kolomea: Vor dem Wiener Volksgericht: Dokumentensammlung (Haifa: Institute of the Documentation in Israel for the Investigation of Nazi Crimes, 1986).

Documents dealing with the persecution and destruction of the Jews of Kołomyja can be found in the following archives: AŻIH (301/1219, 1398, 1774, 2579); BA-L (ZStL, 208 AR-Z 277/60); DAI-FO; USHMM; and YVA (O-3/2141, 2145, 2147; and 1504/43).

Teresa Pollin

NOTES

1. YVA, O-3/2141, Jakub Heger testimony.
2. AŻIH, 301/2579, Anna Blecher Moritz testimony.
3. Noy and Schutzman, Sefer Zikaron, p. 274.
4. AŻIH, 301/1398, Szaje Feder testimony.
5. Noy and Schutzman, Sefer Zikaron, p. 274.

6. YVA, O-3/2141, Jakub Heger testimony.

7. Ibid., 1504/43; Calel Neider mentions a list of 115 Jews, prepared by Ukrainians.

8. Ibid., O-3/2141. According to Noy and Schutzman, Sefer Zikaron, this Aktion took place on July 24, 1941, and 2,000 Jews were dragged from their homes and gathered in the city park; 150 Jews taken from the Ukrainian list were sentenced to death for spitting on two German officers and put together with 20 other prominent Jews on a truck to Korolówka to be shot. They were saved by the Hungarian commandant at the last moment.

9. Noy and Schutzman, Sefer Zikaron, pp. 276–277.

10. YVA, 1504/43.

11. Ibid., O-3/2141.

12. Noy and Schutzman, Sefer Zikaron, pp. 280–281.

13. YVA, O-3/2141.

14. Ibid., O-3/2147, Edward Rotner Rudnicki testimony.

15. AŻIH, 301/1219, Wolf Hacker testimony.

16. Ibid., 301/1774, Salomon Schachter testimony.

17. Noy and Schutzman, Sefer Zikaron, p. 288.

18. YVA, 1504/43.

19. Ibid.

20. AŻIH, 301/1398.

21. Ibid.

22. Ibid.; Noy and Schutzman, Sefer Zikaron, p. 308.

KOMARNO

Pre-1939: Komarno, town, Rudki powiat, Lwów województwo, Poland; 1939–1941: raion center, Drogobych oblast', Ukrainian SSR; 1941–1944: Kreis Lemberg-Land, Distrikt Galizien, Generalgouvernement; post-1991: Gorodok raion, L'viv oblast', Ukraine

Komarno is located about 38 kilometers (24 miles) southwest of Lwów. The Jewish population of Komarno was 2,004 in 1921, comprising 25 percent of the total. According to the population census of December 1931, 2,390 Jews were living in Komarno.

Following the outbreak of war on September 1, 1939, Komarno was briefly occupied by the Germans. In the two weeks of occupation, Jews had to perform hard labor accompanied by physical abuse, and several were murdered. At the end of September, the town came under Soviet rule, and the Jewish Communist Eliezer Freiwilg was appointed mayor. Hundreds of Jewish refugees from western Poland arrived in Komarno and received some assistance from the local Jewish community. Many of these refugees were exiled to Siberia by the Soviets.

Forces of the German 17th Army recaptured Komarno on June 29, 1941. Immediately the Ukrainian police went on a rampage against the Jewish community; a group of Jews was put in prison and forced to remove the corpses of Ukrainians killed by the retreating Soviets, wash the corpses, and then rebury them. Also, Jews were kidnapped daily by Ukrainians and forced to perform degrading chores.¹

Initially, a German military commandant's office (Ortskommandantur) administered the town. On August 1, 1941, power was transferred to a German civil administration. Komarno became part of Kreis Lemberg-Land, within Distrikt Galizien. The Kreishauptmann was initially Wilhelm Stockheck (August 1941–September 1941); succeeded first by Otto Bauer (September 1941–March 1942); then Werner Becker (March 1942–January 1943); and finally Baron Joachim von der Leyen (from January 1943). A German Gendarmerie post and a unit of Ukrainian Auxiliary Police (Ukrainische Hilfspolizei) were established in Komarno.

In the summer of 1941, the German authorities ordered the establishment of a Jewish Council (Judenrat), which was subsequently assisted by the Jewish Police (Jüdischer Ordnungsdienst). The Jews of Komarno were registered and required to wear white armbands bearing the Star of David. A large amount of Jewish property was confiscated, including any items of value. The Judenrat was headed initially by Dov Balaban; its other members included Tzvi Weiser, Henach Sobel, Eliezer Glanz, and Raphael Koch. The Judenrat was forced to provide a certain quota of Jewish forced laborers to the German authorities. The Ukrainian police cut off the beards of observant Jews as an act of public humiliation. The Germans also prohibited the Jews from assembling to pray in the synagogue or prayer house during the High Holidays.

The Germans organized the first mass shooting of Jews in Komarno on October 24, 1941. German and Ukrainian police went from house to house and arrested the heads of many families, especially any professionals or community leaders, together with a few women. More than 200 people were arrested and were placed in the local prison. In the early hours of the next day the Germans and Ukrainian police escorted them into a nearby forest and shot them using machine guns. The bodies were thrown into a pit, where some were buried alive. The surviving Komarno Jews learned of the mass murder a few days later.²

A short time after the murder of the intelligentsia, the remaining Jews of Komarno were ordered to move to the center of town near the market, thus establishing a de facto open ghetto. The Jews were only permitted to leave their residential area for one or two hours per day to visit the market. Despite strict prohibitions, the Jews continued to buy food illegally from local peasants at inflated prices. In late 1941 or in early 1942, the German authorities murdered the head of the Judenrat, Balaban, for failing to meet a large contribution they had demanded. Balaban was succeeded as Judenrat head by Henach Sobel.

In April 1942, a Jewish resident of Komarno, named Mandel Koch, wrote to the central office of the Jewish Social Self-Help (JSS) in Kraków, complaining about the members of the JSS branch in Komarno. He wrote that daily children and the elderly were dying of hunger and that despite subventions received, the only aid being delivered was three spoonfuls of watery soup per day. He accused the JSS committee of having no philanthropic experience, lacking initiative, and only being interested in the special passes they received, which might save their own lives.³

According to undated German registration figures, taken at some time between the summer of 1941 and the fall of 1942, there were 2,328 Jews residing in Komarno and another 51 Jews living in the surrounding villages.⁴ It is likely that the Jews from the surrounding villages were mostly concentrated by the Germans in Komarno, before the end of November 1942.

In accordance with the order of the Higher SS and Police Leader (HSSPF), SS-Obergruppenführer Krüger, of November 10, 1942, on the establishment of ghettos in Distrikt Galizien,⁵ the Kreishauptmann Lemberg-Land ordered on November 25, 1942, that the Jews of Komarno would have to move to the ghetto (Judenwohnbezirk) in nearby Szczerec.⁶

Immediately after this, at the end of November 1942, an Aktion was carried out in Komarno. Several hundred Jews were rounded up and deported to the Bełżec extermination camp by train. Similar Aktions were carried out at this time also in the nearby towns of Rudki and Szczerec. Altogether about 1,600 Jews from these three places were deported to Bełżec in late November 1942.⁷

After this Aktion, only a few hundred Jews remained in Komarno confined to a small ghetto consisting of about a dozen houses. These Jews were composed of some selected workers and others who had emerged from hiding after the Aktion. Shortly afterwards, in December 1942, these remaining Jews were transferred to the newly established ghetto in Rudki. Many of these Jews died of hunger and typhus in Rudki during the winter of 1942–1943.⁸ Security Police and SD from Lwów, assisted by the German Gendarmerie and Ukrainian police, liquidated the Rudki ghetto on April 9, 1943, when most of the ghetto's inmates were shot in ditches in the forest near Brzezina.⁹

Komarno was recaptured from the Germans on July 7, 1944, by the Soviet army. Only a handful of Komarno's Jewish community, whom Christians hid, survived the Holocaust.

SOURCES Published sources on the Jewish community of Komarno and its fate during the Holocaust include Danuta Dabrowska, Abraham Wein, and Aharon Weiss, eds., Pinkas ha-kehillot. Encyclopaedia of Jewish Communities: Poland, vol. 2, Eastern Galicia (Jerusalem: Yad Vashem, 1980), pp. 478–481; and Barukh Yashar, Bet Komarna: Korot ha-ir ve-toldoteha, me-hivasdab ve-ad hurbanah, rabaneha, gedoleha, va-admoreha, isbeha, bayehem, vi-khilyonam (Jerusalem: B. Yashar, 1965). Additional information can be found in Tatiana Berenstein, “Eksterminacja ludności żydowskiej w dystrykcie Galicja (1941–1943),” BŻIH, no. 61 (1967); Shmuel Spector and Geoffrey Wigoder, eds., The Encyclopedia of Jewish Life before and during the Holocaust (Jerusalem: Yad Vashem; New York: New York University Press, 2001), p. 651; and Guy Miron, ed., The Yad Vashem Encyclopedia of the Ghettos during the Holocaust (Jerusalem: Yad Vashem, 2010), p. 338.

Relevant documentation on the destruction of the Jews of Komarno can be found in the following archives: AŻIH (211/552; 301/527); DALO (R 37-5-27; R 24-3-156); GARF (7021-58-21); USHMM (Acc.1997.A.0124 [JSS], 211/552); and YVA.

Alexander Kruglov and Martin Dean
trans. Steven Seegel

NOTES

1. Dabrowska, Wein, and Weiss, Pinkas ha-kehillot: Poland, vol. 2, Eastern Galicia, pp. 478–481.
2. Ibid., gives a total of 240 victims GARF; 7021-58-21, p. 255, gives the figure of 470.
3. USHMM, Acc.1997.A.0124 (JSS), 211/552.
4. DALO, R 37-5-27, Projekt der Sammelgemeinde des Rayon Janow, n.d.
5. Polizeiverordnung des HSSPF Krüger über die Errichtung jüdischer Wohnbezirke, November 10, 1942, in Verordnungsblatt des Generalgouvernements, November 11, 1942.
6. DALO, R 24-3-156, p. 40, Kreishauptmann Lemberg-Land an die Landkommissare und Vögte, November 15, 1942.
7. GARF, 7021-58-21, pp. 197–213; AŽIH, 301/527; Thomas Sandkühler, “Endlösung” in Galizien. Der Judenmord in Ostpolen und die Rettungsinitiativen von Berthold Beitz 1941–1944 (Bonn: Dietz, 1996), p. 234.
8. AŽIH, 301/527.
9. Ibid.; GARF, 7021-58-21, p. 200; Berenstein, “Eksterminacja,” table 7.

KOPYCYŃCE

Pre-1939: Kopyczyńce (Yiddish: Kopitshintze), town, powiat center, Tarnopol województwo, Poland; 1939–1941: Kopychintsy, raion center, Ternopol’ oblast’, Ukrainian SSR; 1941–1944: Kopyczynce, Kreis Czortkow, Distrikt Galizien, Generalgouvernement; post-1991: Kopychyntsi, Husiatyn raion, Ternopil’ oblast’, Ukraine

Kopyczyńce is located 56 kilometers (35 miles) south-southeast of Tarnopol. In 1931, there were 2,590 Jews living there.

German troops occupied Kopyczyńce on July 7, 1941. In August 1941, authority was transferred to a German civil administration. Kopyczyńce became part of Kreis Czortkow, within Distrikt Galizien. Initially, SS-Sturmbannführer Dr. Gerhard Littschwager held the position of Kreishauptmann in Czortków. At the end of April 1942, SS-Hauptsturmführer Dr. Hans Kujath took over the position.

The anti-Jewish Aktions in Kopyczyńce were organized and carried out by a branch of the Security Police (Sipo-Aussendienststelle) in Czortków. The following individuals, in turn, were in charge of this unit: SS-Obersturmführer Karl Hildemann (October 1941–October 1942), SS-Untersturmführer Hans Velde (October 1942–February 1943), and SS-Sturmscharführer Heinrich Peckmann (February–September 1943). Kopyczyńce itself had an office of the Criminal Police (Kripo), which was subordinated to the Security Police in Czortków. There was also a Gendarmerie post, as well as a detachment of Ukrainian Auxiliary Police (Ukrainische Hilfspolizei). All these forces played an active part in the anti-Jewish Aktions.

On July 7, 1941, German soldiers killed several Jews in Kopyczyńce. For several days after July 11, 1941, Einsatzkommando 6, under the command of SS-Standartenführer Dr.

Kroeger, was active in the town.¹ Most likely, it was this unit that shot 7 Jews, who were accused of having collaborated with the Soviet authorities. In addition, 21 Jews who had been prisoners of the Soviets were also shot.²

On July 12, 1941, the German occupation authorities ordered the Jews to wear white armbands bearing the Star of David. The Jewish men were assigned to perform hard labor and were subjected to physical abuse and humiliation by the Ukrainian policemen. Without special permission, Jews were forbidden to leave the town. They were forced to mark their residences with the Star of David, and they were allowed to shop at the market only between 11:00 A.M. and 2:00 P.M. Later, in August 1941, a contribution of 1 kilogram (2.2 pounds) of gold and several tens of thousands of zloty was imposed on the Jews of Kopyczyńce. In spite of meeting this large contribution, the Germans burned down the local synagogue, including the Torah scrolls, at the end of the month. The German authorities established a Jewish Council (Judenrat) in Kopyczyńce. It was headed first by J.J. Zellenmeyer and then by Herman Roller. The Judenrat was responsible for passing on the regulations and instructions of the German authorities to the Jewish population and ensuring their enforcement. From around November 1941, the executive arm of the Jewish Council was the Jewish Police (Jüdischer Ordnungsdienst), consisting initially of about 15 to 20 men, which was led in turn by David Loker, Josele Shmeterling, and Maurice Roller.³

In November 1941, the Germans started to round up and deport able-bodied Jews from Kopyczyńce to work in various forced labor camps. On November 8, 1941, about 200 Jews were sent to the Kamionki labor camp near Tarnopol. In the winter of 1941–1942, more Jews were sent to the labor camp in Borki Wielkie; in late March 1942, 150 Jews were sent to the camps in Kamionki and Hłuboczek Wielki; in May 1942, 50 Jewish women were sent to work on the kok-saghyz plantations in the Jagielnica area; and in June 1942, another group of Jews was transferred to the labor camp in Stupki.⁴

In the spring of 1942, a branch of the Jewish Social Self-Help (JSS) was established in Kopyczyńce, with Herman Roller appointed as chairman and engineer Jakob Silberstein acting as the main organizer. The JSS received support, including some medical supplies from the organization’s headquarters in Kraków. It established a soup kitchen to provide meals to the needy and a medical clinic for walk-in patients, as well as a facility for disinfecting clothes returned from the camps. For a time, it was possible for the Jews of Kopyczyńce to send food, clothing, and letters to those deported to the labor camps and occasionally even obtain the release, with bribes or replacements, of those who had fallen sick.⁵ In total, between November 1941 and October 1942, around 500 Jews were sent to various labor camps, and further roundups for the camps continued into the spring of 1943.⁶ Living conditions in these camps were harsh, and a number of inmates died from hunger, sickness, or due to the brutality of the guards.

Despite the repeated deportations, the number of Jews in Kopyczyńce did not decline. In March 1942, a number of Jews from surrounding villages and smaller towns were resettled to Kopyczyńce, at the same time that the Jews of nearby Husiatyń were forced to relocate, mainly to Probużna. Therefore, in June 1942, reportedly 3,123 Jews were living in Kopyczyńce.⁷ Then in August 1942, another 200 Jews were resettled to Kopyczyńce from Czortków.

At this time no formal ghetto existed in Kopyczyńce, as some Jews continued to reside on the town's outskirts interspersed among non-Jews. However, Jews could not leave the town without permission and faced the death penalty for violating this order. Indeed, the main chronology in the yizkor book uses the term ghetto to describe living conditions for Jews in Kopyczyńce more or less from the start of the occupation.

On September 30, 1942, a deportation Aktion was carried out in Kopyczyńce. In its course, around 50 Jews were killed on the spot, and more than 1,000 Jews were deported to the extermination camp in Bełżec.⁸ The Aktion was conducted by a Security Police detachment from Czortków with the help of the German Gendarmerie, Ukrainian police and fire brigade, and also the Jewish Police. One month after this Aktion, in October 1942, the remaining Jews from Chorostków, Probużna (including many Jews originally from Husiatyń), and the surrounding villages were transferred to Kopyczyńce. They were given until October 20 to complete the resettlement. As a result, the number of Jews in Kopyczyńce increased again to 2,915, making the overcrowding situation worse, with 10 to 15 people sharing each room, and the inevitable spread of disease. More than 200 Jews died from disease, cold, and starvation in the winter of 1942–1943.⁹

On December 1, 1942, in accordance with the order of November 10, 1942, issued by the Höherer SS- und Polizeiführer (HSSPF) in the Generalgouvernement, SS-Obergruppenführer Friedrich Wilhelm Krüger, Kopyczyńce was declared to be a “Jewish residential area” (Jüdischer Wohnbezirk, or ghetto).¹⁰ According to evidence from the yizkor book, however, no major change in the residential pattern of Jews appears to have taken place at this time.

In the winter of 1942–1943 and the early spring of 1943, the Jews in Kopyczyńce suffered from occasional arrests and killings conducted by the Gestapo from Czortków and the Ukrainian police but were spared another major Aktion until April. They drew some solace from news of the German defeat at Stalingrad but lived in constant fear for their lives. Most prepared hiding places in attics, cellars, and behind false walls, in expectation of the next large Aktion.

On April 15, 1943, the Security Police and their local collaborators broke into Jewish houses, ripping them apart to find those in hiding. Altogether around 500 Jews were shot, some in the streets; the bulk of them were forced to kneel down next to a mass grave near the railway station, where they received one bullet from behind. Many victims were buried while still alive.¹¹

After this Aktion, the Germans ordered that all Jews living on the periphery of the town were to be resettled into a more compact ghetto before May 1, 1943. No sooner was this implemented than a new decree ordered that all the Jews would soon be resettled to the Tłuste ghetto. Thanks to a large bribe, this order was soon rescinded, but then most of the surviving Jews in Buczacz were instructed to move either to the Kopyczyńce or to the Tłuste ghetto between May 15 and May 30. Every day many carts with impoverished refugees arrived from Buczacz, bringing the total number of Jews in the Kopyczyńce ghetto to around 5,000. With this new influx came also fear of a further Aktion.¹²

On June 3, 1943, the Germans and their collaborators liquidated the ghetto. Many of the Buczacz Jews were still sleeping in the streets or in only improvised accommodations, with no place to hide; they fell easily into the clutches of the murderers. In total, on this day the Security Police detachment from Czortków, assisted by Ukrainian policemen, shot more than 2,000 Jews.¹³ The Ukrainian and German policemen then conducted sweeps, hunting for Jews who had escaped and those in hiding. All the Jews they were able to catch were collected together and then shot in groups over the ensuing days up to June 11; according to the yizkor book, in total nearly 4,000 people were killed within just eight days.¹⁴

At this time, around 1,000 Jews remained alive. On June 12, 1943, the remains of the ghetto were surrounded with a wooden fence. Three days later an order was given that all the Jews must move to Czortków within two days. About 400 people obeyed this instruction, but they were all murdered in an Aktion there shortly afterwards. Then on June 18, 1943, a small remnant ghetto was established, containing about 350 people. A few other surviving Jews were sent to small agricultural labor camps in the vicinity. The last date to move into the small ghetto was June 25, 1943. The small ghetto was finally liquidated on July 20, 1943. The Ukrainian police was sent ahead to pull Jews out of the bunkers, as the Germans feared bitter resistance.¹⁵ A few Jews escaped into the countryside, where they sought aid from local peasants or tried to make contact with Soviet partisans. Some, however, were denounced by those they turned to for help or their neighbors, as the Germans offered rewards of a kilogram (2.2 pounds) of sugar or a liter (a quart) of brandy for turning in Jews. Only around 65 Jews from the town are believed to have survived through the German occupation.¹⁶

SOURCES The main published source used in preparation of this entry is the yizkor book, edited by Avraham Beker, Kehilatyim (Husiatin ve-Kopitsintsa) (Tel Aviv: Hutz La-Or ay Ir-gun Yotsei Husiatin Ha-Galitsayit be-Yisrael, 1977). Other relevant publications include Danuta Dabrowska, Abraham Wein, and Aharon Weiss, eds., Pinkas ha-kehillot. Encyclopaedia of Jewish Communities: Poland, vol. 2, Eastern Galicia (Jerusalem: Yad Vashem, 1980), pp. 486–489; and Guy Miron, ed., The Yad Vashem Encyclopedia of the Ghettos during the Holocaust (Jerusalem: Yad Vashem, 2010), pp. 345–346.

Documentation and testimonies describing the fate of the Jews of Kopyczyńce during the Holocaust can be found in the following archives: AŻIH (211/569, 301/409, 301/5531, 302/50); DATO; GARF (7021-75-107); USHMM (e.g., Acc.1997.A.0124 [JSS], RG-50.002*0035); VHF (e.g., # 5381, 27193, 34860); YIU (# 156); and YVA (e.g., O-3/1253, O-3/2235).

Alexander Kruglov and Martin Dean
trans. Kathleen Luft

NOTES

1. N-Doc., NOKW 2272, AOK 17/Ic-A.O., Tätigkeitsbericht 15.5. bis 12.12.1941 (Aufzeichnungen v. 11 und 12.7.1941).
2. GARF, 7021-75-107, p. 192; Beker, Kehilatayim, p. 230.
3. Beker, Kehilatayim, pp. 235–236.
4. Ibid., pp. 235, 238–239, 241.
5. Ibid., pp. 239–241; AŽIH, 211/569, pp. 8–9, 29; VHF, # 34860, testimony of Edmund Brenman.
6. AŽIH, 211/569, p. 45, JUS Kopyczyńce (the JSS had by this time been renamed JUS) to the JUS Central Office in Kraków, October 10, 1942.
7. Tatiana Berenstein, “Eksterminacja ludności żydowskiej w dystrykcie Galicja (1941–1943),” BŽIH, no. 61 (1967), table 3.
8. GARF, 7021-75-107, p. 194.
9. Beker, Kehilatayim, p. 247; VHF, # 5381, testimony of Morris Grinberg; AŽIH, 211/569, p. 45.
10. Polizeiverordnung des HSSPF Krüger über die Errichtung jüdischer Wohnbezirke, November 10, 1942, in Verordnungsblatt des Generalgouvernements, November 11, 1942.
11. GARF, 7021-75-107, p. 194; Beker, Kehilatayim, pp. 252–254.
12. Y. Cohen, ed., Sefer Buczac: Matsevet Zikaron Le-kehila Kedosha (Tel Aviv, 1956), p. 267 (testimony of E. Khal-fan), p. 277 (testimony of I. Gilbert); Beker, Kehilatayim, p. 258.
13. GARF, 7021-75-107, p. 194.
14. VHF, # 27193, testimony of Eva Halpern; Beker, Kehilatayim, pp. 258–260.
15. GARF, 7021-75-107, p. 194; Beker, Kehilatayim, pp. 261–262.
16. USHMM, RG-50.002*0035, interview with Zygmunt Gottlieb, February 21, 1989.

KOSÓW

Pre-1939: Kosów, town, powiat center, Stanisławów województwo, Poland; 1939–1941: Kosov, raion center, Stanislav oblast', Ukrainian SSR; 1941–1944: Kosow, Kreis Kolomea, Distrikt Galizien, Generalgouvernement; post-1991: Kosiv, raion center, Ivano-Frankivs'k oblast', Ukraine

Kosów is located 75 kilometers (47 miles) south-southeast of Stanisławów. In September 1939, when German forces invaded Poland from the west, there were about 3,700 Jews living in Kosów.

Following a period of Soviet rule, detachments of the Hungarian army occupied Kosów on July 1, 1941. Initially a Hungarian military commandant ran the town. In August 1941, authority was transferred to a German civil administration. Kosów became part of Kreis Kolomea, within Distrikt Galizien. From August 1941 to July 1, 1942, the Kreishauptmann in Kołomyja was Klaus Peter Volkmann. He was then succeeded by SS-Obersturmführer Herbert Gorgon, who held the position until July 26, 1943.

The Aktions against the Jewish population in Kosów were mostly organized and carried out by the Security Police outpost (Sipo-Aussendienststelle) based in Kołomyja, which was headed by SS-Obersturmführer Peter Leideritz, his deputy SS-Obersturmführer Erwin Gay, and the Jewish Affairs Officer (Judenreferent), SS-Hauptscharführer Robert Frost. In Kosów, a German Gendarmerie post was established, along with a precinct of the Schutzpolizei and a local Ukrainian police detachment, which took an active part in all the anti-Jewish Aktions.

During the first days of occupation, the Ukrainian mayor, Boyechko, established a regime of forced labor for Jews, and the Ukrainian militia beat and robbed Jews with impunity. Towards the end of July, a Jewish Council (Judenrat) was established, headed by Chayim Zvi Steiner. With the transfer of authority to the Germans, the position of the Jews did not improve. Forced labor continued, including arduous work repairing roads and constructing bridges. In addition, there was a demand from Kreishauptmann Volkmann for furniture to equip a villa for his personal use, and he also issued an order for the Jews to surrender all gold and personal valuables.

Just before Rosh Hashanah (September 22, 1941), more than 300 Jewish refugees arrived in Kosów from Hungary and the Carpathian region of Ukraine. They received aid from the local community, and most tried to return home, assisted by bribes, although a number were turned back at the Hungarian border. In September 1941, the Ukrainian and German security forces arrested 8 Jews, accusing them of being Communists, and 7 of them were subsequently killed.¹

On October 16–17, 1941, a mass killing Aktion was carried out against the Jewish population. In the course of these two days, a Security Police unit from Kołomyja, headed by SS-Obersturmführer Erwin Gay, assisted by the Ukrainian police under the command of Dershchitski, shot 2,088 Jews, including some Jews brought in from the surrounding countryside, into two ditches on the “mountain” near the Moskalowka Bridge. The synagogue was also burned down.²

Following the mass killing Aktion, Ukrainians and Poles robbed Jewish houses, and the remaining Jews who had survived in hiding were forced to move into a separate Jewish residential area (Jüdischer Wohnbezirk), establishing an open ghetto. The streets designated as belonging to the “Jewish quarter” were changed several times, each time causing part of the Jewish population to move. In November 1941, Ukrainians murdered all the Jews in the neighboring village of Riczka, but until Passover in early April 1942, there were no further Aktions in Kosów.³

On April 24, 1942, another Aktion took place. Around 1,000 Jews were resettled to Kołomyja. The Germans and local Ukrainians robbed many of them on the way. Some of them managed to return (illegally) to Kosów in May and June of 1942.⁴ According to one source, after this Aktion a “ghetto” was established in Kosów for the remaining 1,200 Jews (including their families) who worked for the Wehrmacht or other

German offices. This number had been increased with the aid of bribes to the Germans. About 200 of the men permitted to remain suddenly acquired “wives,” through fictitious marriages performed by Rabbi Mosche Schizel, Reb Schimschon, and Jehoschua Gertner, thereby enabling these women to remain in Kosów. Jews were required to wear white armbands (signifying their work status) and were permitted to leave the ghetto only in groups, to go to their workplaces outside. There was a marketplace near the ghetto, but sneaking out to visit the market was punishable by death. As a result, there was hunger in the ghetto, and a number of people died of starvation.⁵

On September 7, 1942, under the pretext of a registration, the Jews were gathered in the sports stadium. After 56 artisans were selected out of the group, the remaining 500 people were sent off to prison. Some who were found in hiding were shot on the spot. On the very same day, Jews from the settlement of Kutu were also brought into Kosów.⁶ On September 8, 1942, all the Jews of Kosów and those from Kutu (some 1,500 in total) were transported to Kołomyja. From there, they were deported along with Jews from other nearby settlements to the Bełżec extermination camp.⁷

After this Aktion, a few hundred Jews remained illegally in Kosów as refugees in hiding. The Jewish artisans were resettled into a special prison, which was guarded by Ukrainian policemen. These Jews were used to sort out the remaining Jewish property from the vacated Jewish houses. At the end of September 1942, some of the Jews in hiding were offered an amnesty if they resettled to Kołomyja. However, this was only a ruse, and they were all killed shortly afterwards. In October the municipality began to demolish the Jewish houses. By the end of October 1942, only about 240 Jews remained in Kosów, 40 of them legally.⁸ The Security Police carried out the last “cleansing Aktion” on October 31 and November 1, 1942. Some of the Jews were shot on the spot, while the others were taken to Kołomyja and shot there.⁹

In total, more than 100 Jews managed to survive from Kosów. A few Jews managed to hide with the aid of sympathetic local inhabitants, including Kataryna Kalel, Lopatynski, Lukaniak, and Husatynski. Other survivors made their way across the border into Romania. The Red Army recaptured the area in September 1944.¹⁰

SOURCES The following publications contain information regarding the annihilation of the Jews of Kosów: E. Kresel, ed., Sefer Kosow: Galicia ba-mizrah (Tel Aviv: Former Residents of Kosow and Vicinity in Israel, 1964); Danuta Dabrowska, Abraham Wein, and Aharon Weiss, eds., Pinkas ba-kehillot. Encyclopaedia of Jewish Communities: Poland, vol. 2, Eastern Galicia (Jerusalem: Yad Vashem, 1980), pp. 481–486; and D. Gertner and J. Gertner, Home Is No More: The Destruction of Kosow and Zabie (Jerusalem: Yad Vashem, 2000).

Documents dealing with the persecution and destruction of the Jews of Kosów can be found in the following archives: AŽIH (301/134, 2186, 4929, and 4930); BA-L (ZStL, 208 AR-Z 277/60); DAI-FO; GARF (7021-73-11); and YVA.

Alexander Kruglov and Martin Dean
trans. Steven Seegel

NOTES

1. AŽIH, 301/134, testimony of J. Gertner. According to another source, 15 Jews were arrested at about this time and were never heard of again; see 301/2186, testimony of Ire Sztajgman.

2. Gertner and Gertner, Home Is No More, pp. 79–98; AŽIH, 301/134 and 301/4930, testimony of Markus Engler; Verdict of the regional court (Landgericht) in Darmstadt on July 28, 1967, in the criminal case against Haertel and others, in Justiz und NS-Verbrechen, vol. 26 (Amsterdam: Amsterdam University Press, 2001), Lfd. Nr. 657, pp. 434–436. See also BA-L, ZStL, 208 AR-Z 277/60, concluding report, June 17, 1963. According to another source, as many as 2,700 Jews were shot; see GARF, 7021-73-11, p. 108.

3. AŽIH, 301/4930.

4. Ibid., 301/134.

5. Ibid., 301/2186; this source explicitly mentions a ghetto in Kosów but does not mention any physical barrier. See also 301/4930; Gertner and Gertner, Home Is No More, pp. 108–112.

6. On the fate of the Jews in Kutu during the Holocaust, see Martin Rudner, Kutu: Echoes of a Vanished Heritage (Ottawa: M. Rudner, 1993).

7. AŽIH, 301/134. See also Bericht des Kompanieführers 7./Polizeiregiment 24, Wessermann, an den Kommandeur der Ordnungspolizei Galizien: “Umsiedlungsaktion” in Ostgalizien, September 14, 1942, published in Peter Long-erich and Dieter Pohl, eds., Die Ermordung der europäischen Juden: Eine umfassende Dokumentation des Holocaust 1941–1945 (Munich: Piper, 1989), pp. 216–221.

8. Gertner and Gertner, Home Is No More, p. 145.

9. AŽIH, 301/134. See also Thomas Sandkühler, “Endlösung” in Galizien. Der Judenmord in Ostpolen und die Rettungs-initiativen von Berthold Beitz 1941–1944 (Bonn: Dietz, 1996), pp. 248–249.

10. AŽIH, 301/4930; Gertner and Gertner, Home Is No More, p. 146.

KOZOWA

Pre-1939: Kozowa, town, Brzeżany powiat, Tarnopol województwo, Poland; 1939–1941: Kozova, raion center, Ternopol’ oblast’, Ukrainian SSR; 1941–1944: Kozowa, Kreis Brzezany, Distrikt Galizien, Generalgouvernement; post-1991: Kozova, raion center, Ternopil’ oblast’, Ukraine

Kozowa is located 34 kilometers (21 miles) southwest of Tarnopol. According to the census of 1931, 1,570 Jews lived in Kozowa. On the eve of World War II, the town had about 1,600 Jews. In the fall of 1939, many refugees from western Poland arrived in the town, so the number of Jews increased considerably.

The town was occupied by German troops on July 4, 1941. Until August 1941, a German military commandant’s office (Ortskommandantur) administered the town. On July 5, the Ukrainians started to assign Jews to forced labor, which included cleaning toilets and other degrading work. The same day, a group of Ukrainians killed four Jews who had been Komsomol members under the Soviets.¹

In the summer of 1941, the Jews were subjected to a number of antisemitic measures. Jews were forbidden to walk on the pavements or buy food from non-Jews. The numerous Ukrainian Auxiliary Police (Ukrainische Hilfspolizei) beat and humiliated the Jews on a daily basis. To restore order, the Jews bribed the Ukrainian leaders and provided a quota of Jewish forced laborers daily. The laborers performed menial tasks for the Germans based in Kozowa and were used for cleaning the streets, construction work, and other tasks.²

In August 1941, authority was transferred to a German civil administration. Kozowa was incorporated into Kreis Brzezany, within Distrikt Galizien. The position of Kreishauptmann in Kreis Brzezany was occupied first by Hans-Adolf Asbach (from November 1941 until the start of 1943) and then by Dr. Werner Becker.

In Kozowa a squad of German Gendarmerie took over responsibility for the Ukrainian Auxiliary Police. At this time the number of Ukrainian policemen was reduced; some of them were disarmed. The Jews were instructed to form a Jewish Council (Judenrat), with Dr. Izydor Sobel as its head. At its first meeting the Judenrat established the Jewish Police (Jüdischer Ordnungsdienst), headed by Kopel, which initially had 20 members. Kopel was later replaced by the engineer, Gelb, who was a refugee.

German officials made demands for monetary contributions and also large quantities of tea, coffee, pepper, and other items to be handed over at short notice. According to the survivor Jeanne Fischer, the Judenrat made every effort to accommodate the German demands for money, jewels, furs, and even people. At first the Jews thought that if they gave the Germans all their possessions, they might be safe.³

On August 20, 1941, Jews were ordered to wear white arm-bands bearing a blue Star of David. At the same time Jews were forbidden to leave the town without a special permit.

In early October 1941, during the week of Yom Kippur, 10 German Gestapo men arrived in Kozowa and conducted a selection. The craftsmen were sent to one side, and then 300 Jews were taken away on trucks. They were shot in the forest near the village of Komarówka (about 6 kilometers [4 miles] west of Kozowa).⁴ Shortly after this Aktion, the German authorities started to send Jews away to forced labor camps. In 1941–1942, altogether more than 500 young Jews from Kozowa were sent to various camps, including those in Zborów, Hłuboczek, Jagielnica, Jezierzany, Kamionki, Borki Wielkie, and Tarnopol. Conditions in the camps were very bad, but the Jews of Kozowa sent some extra food to help those sent there. Some impoverished Jewish refugees were paid to go to the camps in place of local Jews from Kozowa.

In March 1942, 2,595 Jews were living in Kozowa. By April, after many of the Jews from nearby villages were moved to Kozowa, the Jewish population had increased to 2,853; it decreased, however, to 2,691 in June 1942, probably following further transports to labor camps.⁵ In the summer of 1941–1942, there was a shortage of food, and 1 or 2 Jews died every day of hunger in Kozowa.

On September 21, 1942, the German authorities carried out a deportation Aktion in the town. On that day the Jewish Police, acting on orders from the German Security Police (Sipo), rounded up some 500 people, mostly the elderly, women, and children, who were transported to Brzezany, and from there, together with other Jews, they were deported to the Bełżec extermination camp. Then on November 8, 1942, the Sipo based in Tarnopol, headed by SS-Sturmbannführer Herman Müller, conducted a second Aktion in Kozowa in which around 1,000 Jews were deported by train to Bełżec. About 200 of these Jews managed to jump from the trains, and most of these escapees returned to Kozowa.⁶

Kozowa is not mentioned in the order of the Higher SS and Police Leader (HSSPF), SS-Obergruppenführer Krüger, issued on November 11, 1942, on the establishment of ghettos in Distrikt Galizien. However, at the local level, the Kreishauptmann in Brzezany decided to permit Jews to continue residing in Kozowa, and in late November 1942, a ghetto was established there. Some of the Jews in Kozowa had to move into the ghetto from outside, leaving behind most of their possessions.⁷

Around this time, another 400 or so Jews were brought in from nearby villages, including 200 from the village of Kozłów, as Jews were now only permitted to reside in certain designated locations. This raised the number of Jews in the ghetto to almost 2,000. The ghetto was located on two sides of the market square and in the alleys leading onto it. It was not enclosed, but signs reading “Jüdischer Wohnbezirk” were put up around its borders, and the houses were also marked with the Star of David. In December 1942, another 400 Jews were brought into the ghetto from Brzezany. Due to the intense overcrowding, with about 8 to 10 people sharing a small house, an outbreak of typhus soon resulted, which was hard to contain, as there were no doctors and no medicine. In December 1942, the Gestapo shot 18 Jews sick with typhus. Altogether in the winter of 1942–1943, around 300 Jews died of the disease.⁸

In the spring and early summer of 1943, the Sipo from Tarnopol, together with the German Gendarmerie and Ukrainian policemen, conducted three Aktions against the Kozowa ghetto. On April 9, a Sipo detachment under Müller’s command shot 100 Jews at the Jewish cemetery. Then on April 17, 60 SS men and 80 Ukrainian policemen surrounded the ghetto. The Jews were dragged out of their hiding places and were assembled on the market square, where a selection was conducted. Altogether more than 1,000 Jews were then led, in rows 4 abreast, to the execution site just outside the town. According to Jakob Milder’s testimony, Rabbi Mendele tried to console the Jews on the way, and the younger ones went to their deaths singing the “Hatikvah” (a Zionist song). The pits were dug by 60 Jews being told they would be sent to a labor camp, but all were shot when the work was done. The Jews were forced to stand on a plank over the pits to be shot, and many fell in only wounded. SS-Sturmbannführer Müller personally shot many Jews with his revolver.⁹

After this Aktion, around 1,000 Jews remained, and the area of the ghetto was reduced to just one side of the market square. Some Jews in the ghetto planned to escape to the forests, and a few obtained weapons, but there was little time to organize resistance before the next Aktion. Many sought shelter with peasants in the surrounding area or prepared bunkers in the forest, but some were betrayed or killed by those they turned to for help. In early June, Kreishauptmann Becker visited Kozowa, and word went around that the town would soon be made “cleansed of Jews” (judenrein).

On June 12, the Germans liquidated the ghetto. They rounded up and killed the 400 Jews they found in the ghetto, as some 600 had managed to escape. Most of the escapees were subsequently captured and killed by the Germans or Ukrainian partisans, and a few died of hunger and cold.¹⁰ In total, more than 4,500 Jews from the former Kozova raion were murdered. Some 2,500 Jews were shot, and around 1,500 Jews were deported to the Bełżec extermination camp. Several hundred more Jews were sent to forced labor camps, where most died from the severe conditions or were murdered, and hundreds more died of starvation and disease in and around Kozowa.¹¹

When the Red Army drove the Germans from the area in July 1944, only around 80 Jews from Kozowa remained alive; most of them left for Poland and then the West soon after the end of the war.

SOURCES Publications on the fate of the Jewish population of Kozowa during the Holocaust include the following: Danuta Dabrowska, Abraham Wein, and Aharon Weiss, eds., Pinkas ha-kehillot. Encyclopaedia of Jewish Communities: Poland, vol. 2, Eastern Galicia (Jerusalem: Yad Vashem, 1980), pp. 457–459; and Tatiana Berenstein, “Eksterminacja ludności żydowskiej w Dystrykcie Galicja (1941–1943),” BŻIH, no. 61 (1967), table 2. The Kozowa ghetto is also mentioned in Dieter Pohl, Nationalsozialistische Judenverfolgung in Ostgalizien 1941–1944 (Munich: Oldenbourg, 1996); and Handbuch der Lager, Gefängnisse und Ghettos auf dem besetzten Territorium der Ukraine (1941–1944) (Kiev: Staatskomitee der Archiven der Ukraine, 2000), p. 165.

Documents and testimonies describing the fate of the Jews of Kozowa can be found in the following archives: BA-L (ZStL, 208 AR 797-66); DATO (R 274-2-102a, p. 309); GARF (7021-75-487); VHF (e.g., # 340, 3006, 3068, 6268); and YVA (e.g., O-3/1687, M-1/E/1388).

Alexander Kruglov and Martin Dean
trans. Igor Puchkov

NOTES

1. YVA, M-1/E/1388, testimony of Jakob Mildniener.
2. Ibid.
3. VHF, # 6268, testimony of Jeanne Fischer.
4. YVA, M-1/E/1388. GARF, 7021-75-487, p. 4, testimony of J.S. Volf, mentions an earlier killing of 270 Jews in August 1941.
5. Berenstein, “Eksterminacja.”
6. YVA, M-1/E/1388.
7. Polizeiverordnung des HSSPF Krüger über die Errichtung jüdischer Wohnbezirke, November 10, 1942, in Verordnungsblatt des Generalgouvernements, November 11, 1942. See also Pohl, Nationalsozialistische Judenverfolgung, p. 244, citing BA-L, ZStL, 208 AR 797/66; Dabrowska, Wein, and Weiss, Pinkas ha-kehillot: Poland, vol. 2, Eastern Galicia, p. 458; VHF, # 6268.

8. YVA, M-1/E/1388.

9. Ibid.

10. Ibid.

11. According to the materials of the ChGK (GARF, 7021-75-487, pp. 1, 1a), the then-Kozova raion suffered the loss of about 9,500 Jews: 5,855 Jews were shot, 1,600 Jews were deported to Bełżec, and 2,000 Jews were sent to labor camps. In our opinion, these figures are considerably exaggerated (by some 5,000 victims).

LUBACZÓW

Pre-1939: Lubaczów, town, powiat center, Lwów województwo, Poland; 1939–1941: Lubachev, raion center, L'vov oblast', Ukrainian SSR; 1941–1944: Lubaczow, Kreis Rawa Ruska, Distrikt Galizien, Generalgouvernement; post-1998: Lubaczów, powiat center, województwo podkarpackie, Poland

Lubaczów is located 80 kilometers (50 miles) west-northwest of Lwów. In 1931, the Jewish population of the town was 2,040.

Following a brief but violent German occupation in September 1939 and a longer period of Soviet rule, the Germans reoccupied Lubaczów on June 25, 1941. At first the town was run by a German military commandant's office (Ortskommandantur). In August 1941, however, authority was transferred to a German civil administration. Lubaczów was incorporated into Kreis Rawa Ruska, within Distrikt Galizien. An outpost of the Criminal Police (Kripo), which reported to the Criminal Police headquarters in Rawa Ruska, as well as a post of the German Gendarmerie and a squad of Ukrainian Auxiliary Police were based in Lubaczów. The Aktions against the Jewish population in Lubaczów were organized and carried out by the Security Police outpost in Sokal, headed in 1941–1942 by SS-Obersturmführer Oswald Heyduk.

The main synagogue in Lubaczów, 1938.
USHMM WS #19726, COURTESY OF ANNA AND JOSHUA HEILMAN

The day after their arrival, the Germans ordered all Jews to assemble in the marketplace in the early hours of the morning. Nobody was excluded; men, women, children, and even the sick and elderly were chased to the market, where the Germans announced a series of anti-Jewish restrictions. Jews were ordered to wear distinguishing armbands and to mark their homes and businesses with the Star of David; they were instructed to avoid any contact with the non-Jewish population, and they were forbidden to leave the town limits on pain of death.

A Jewish Council (Judenrat) was established in Lubaczów. Its main tasks were to provide the Germans with quotas of workers for all kinds of hard labor and to collect the contributions that they frequently demanded. In August 1941, the Germans arrested 30 Jewish intellectuals in Lubaczów. A contribution of valuables and precious materials had to be delivered within 36 hours if their lives were to be spared. The Judenrat managed to collect and pay the requested amount in time. Nevertheless, the Germans killed all the hostages, allegedly because they had been hiding weapons.¹ In December 1941, the Germans ordered the Jews to surrender any fur items, conducting extensive searches for concealed items for several weeks.² In March 1942, 100 Gypsies and 7 Jews were killed in the nearby Bałaj Forest.³ From this time on, train transports of Jews headed to the Bełżec extermination camp began to pass regularly through the town. The Jews of Lubaczów gradually became aware of their intended fate.

In the spring of 1942, a branch of the Jewish Social Self-Help (JSS), headed by Majer Schnitzer, was established in Lubaczów. Immediately the JSS had to face the needs of a community of 2,270 people, most of whom were severely impoverished. Although no Jewish residential area was created during the early stages of the occupation, most Jewish homes had been located in a single area, which had suffered severe damage during the fighting in June 1941. The shortage of housing led to severe overcrowding. Soon the JSS set up an isolation hospital to deal with epidemics and provided some form of welfare aid for about 40 percent of the Jewish population. A public kitchen, however, which had been run by the Judenrat up until April 1942, had to be closed, owing to lack of funding.⁴ In May 1942, the Jewish population increased by some 2,000, when Jews from 20 nearby villages were moved into the town.

On October 8, 1942, the Germans announced the establishment of an open ghetto in the eastern part of the market square and on Piłsudski Street by October 10. It was to contain more than 3,000 Jews in a small group of houses already densely populated by Jews. Many Jews had to relocate and were able to take with them only a small portion of their possessions.⁵ One inhabitant of the ghetto wrote at this time that even if they survived the next transport, “it would be impossible for us to exist much longer, because all our belongings are gone and sooner or later we will die from hunger.” Non-Jewish acquaintances had refused to hide this family because of the high risks involved.⁶

Shortly after the establishment of the ghetto, the Germans conducted an Aktion during which about 2,000 people were deported to the Bełżec extermination camp. At the beginning of December 1942, in accordance with the order issued by SS-Obergruppenführer Friedrich Wilhelm Krüger on November 10, the Lubaczów ghetto was officially recognized as one of the few remaining places in Distrikt Galizien where Jews could reside, and it then was enclosed.⁷ As a result, before the end of November 1942, nearly 2,000 Jews from Oleszyce arrived in Lubaczów to beat the deadline. According to one source, about 1,000 of these Jews were deported to Bełżec from Lubaczów before the end of November. At the end of 1942, hundreds of Gypsies were brought to Lubaczów. Together with a number of Jewish workers whose task was to dig a mass grave, the Gypsies were taken to a nearby forest and murdered.⁸

The enclosed ghetto existed less than two months. In December, there was a severe epidemic of typhus, with about 25 Jews dying per day. The Germans viewed the epidemic as a reason to liquidate the ghetto. On January 5, the Germans collected all finished and unfinished items from the Jewish tailors and shoemakers, thus starting rumors of an impending Aktion and prompting several hundred Jews to flee. On the next day, the Jews were driven into the market square, where many were shot indiscriminately.⁹ On January 8, 1943, the Security Police, assisted by Ukrainian policemen, conducted another Aktion. They shot hundreds of sick and elderly Jews in the town, burying them in the Jewish cemetery.¹⁰ According to one survivor account, the remaining 2,000 Jews were deported to the Sobibór extermination camp; local Polish sources, however, indicate that more than 2,000 Jews, apparently brought from the Lubaczów ghetto, were shot by the Gestapo from Rawa Ruska and the Ukrainian policemen in defensive trenches dug by the Soviets in 1940, about 600 meters (1,969 feet) south of the village of Hryńków.¹¹ Many of those who escaped from the ghetto found shelter in Oleszyce. Informed of this, the Security Police descended on the town and shot 174 Jews uncovered there on January 14, 1943. Another group was shot there on February 13, 1943.

On July 21, 1944, the Red Army drove the Germans from Lubaczów. In the ensuing weeks, only 19 Jews who had survived the German occupation returned. Of those who survived, 1 had lost his foot to frostbite, and another had hidden hunched up in a tiny attic for almost two years.¹²

SOURCES Further information on the history and fate of the Jewish population of Lubaczów can be found in the following publications: Maurie Hoffman, Keep Yelling: A Survivor's Testimony (Richmond, Victoria, Australia: Spectrum Publications, 1995); Danuta Dabrowska, Abraham Wein, and Aharon Weiss, eds., Pinkas ha-kebilot. Encyclopaedia of Jewish Communities: Poland, vol. 2, Eastern Galicia (Jerusalem: Yad Vashem, 1980), pp. 294–295; Tatiana Berenstein, “Eksterminacja ludności żydowskiej w dystrykcie Galicja (1941–1943),” BŻIH, no. 61 (1967); and Rejestr miejsc i faktów zbrodni popełnionych przez okupanta hitlerowskiego na ziemiach polskich w latach 1939–1945: Województwo przemyskie (Warsaw: Główna Komisja Badania Zbrodni Hitlerowskich w Polsce, 1985), pp. 56–58.

Documentation on the persecution and destruction of the Jewish community in Lubaczów can be found in the following archives: AŻIH (301/1132 and 1174; 211/642); DALO; IPN; USHMM (RG-15.019M reels 10 and 17; and Acc.1997.A.0124 [JSS], reel 32, 211/642); VHF; and YVA.

Caterina Crisci and Alexander Kruglov
trans. Steven Seegel

NOTES

1. Hoffman, Keep Yelling, pp. 29–33; USHMM, RG-15.019M, reel 10; VHF, # 27279, testimony of J. Remer.
2. AŻIH, 301/1174, testimony of F. Kamer.
3. USHMM, RG-15.019M, reel 10.
4. Ibid., Acc.1997.A.0124 (JSS), reel 32, 211/642.
5. Hoffman, Keep Yelling, p. 83; AŻIH, 301/1174. USHMM, RG-15.019M, reel 17, p. 107, dates the establishment of the ghetto in September 1942.
6. Norman Salsitz, with Stanley Kaish, Three Homelands: Memories of a Jewish Life in Poland, Israel, and America (Syracuse, NY: Syracuse University Press, 2002), pp. 126–127, letter from an inmate of the Lubaczów ghetto, dated October 10, 1942.
7. Polizeiverordnung des HSSPF Krüger über die Errichtung jüdischer Wohnbezirke, November 10, 1942, Verordnungsblatt des Generalgouvernements, November 11, 1942.
8. Rejestr miejsc i faktów, pp. 57–58; AŻIH, 301/1174.
9. AŻIH, 301/1174, and 301/1132, testimony of J. Herzig.
10. USHMM, RG-15.019M, reel 17, p. 109; this protocol prepared in Lubaczów on September 18, 1945, indicates that around 950 Jews were buried in two mass graves in the Jewish cemetery but dates the Aktion (erroneously) in January 1942.
11. AŻIH, 301/1174, indicates that the Jews were sent to Sobibór, as the camp in Bełżec had already been closed down by this time. USHMM, RG-15.019M, reel 17, p. 108; this protocol prepared in Lubaczów on September 19, 1945, mentions two mass graves at this site, one holding 1,750 Jews and the other 2,600, both containing the bodies of Jews from the Lubaczów ghetto.
12. Hoffman, Keep Yelling, pp. 194–195.

LWÓW

Pre-1939: Lwów, city, powiat and województwo center, Poland; 1939–1941: L'vov, raion and oblast' center, Ukrainian SSR; 1941–1944: Lemberg, center of Kreis Lemberg-Land and Distrikt Galizien, Generalgouvernement; post-1991: L'viv, oblast' center, Ukraine

Lwów is located about 341 kilometers (212 miles) southeast of Warsaw. On the eve of war in 1939, there were 109,500 Jews living in the city, comprising one third of the total population.

The Soviet Union occupied Lwów from September 1939 to June 1941. Tens of thousands of Jewish refugees from German-occupied Poland arrived in Lwów in late 1939. By January 1940, the urban Jewish population had reached about 180,000; then it declined owing to the deportation of many refugees to eastern regions of the Soviet Union. Approximately 150,000 Jews were living in the city just prior to its capture by the Germans in late June 1941, and only an estimated 1 percent survived the German occupation, either within the city or in the surrounding countryside. After the Soviets returned in 1944, the city remained in the Soviet Union until 1991. Present-day Lwów (Ukrainian L'viv) is the largest city in western Ukraine.

German police publicly humiliate Jews on Lacki Street in Lwów, 1941.
USHMM WS #73218, COURTESY OF IPN

The German 1st Mountain Division and the Nachtigall Battalion of Ukrainian nationalist legionnaires entered Lwów on June 30, 1941. The Soviet security forces (People's Commissariat of Internal Affairs, NKVD) murdered several thousand prisoners before evacuating the city, and the Jews were blamed for this atrocity as well as for collaboration with the Soviets in general.¹ Einsatzgruppe C and a hastily mustered local Ukrainian militia incited a pogrom during which somewhere between 2,000 and 5,000 Jews were murdered. Einsatzgruppe C, with assistance from a Ukrainian police force drawn from the militia, shot an additional 2,500 to 3,000 Jewish men just after the end of the pogrom in the first days of July.²

In late July 1941, a pogrom known as the "Petliura Days" broke out, in connection with the fifteenth anniversary of the death of Simon Petliura, a Ukrainian leader who was assassinated in Paris in 1926 by a Jewish anarchist. Over 1,000 Jews were killed, again with heavy involvement of the Ukrainian militia. One day after this pogrom, the German authorities began extorting a large contribution from Lwów's Jews. Additional smaller-scale Aktions took place throughout the summer. The SS conducted mass executions in the woods to the east of Łyczakowska Street, in the Lesienice Forest to the west, or in the so-called Sands (Piaski) near the Janowska Street cemetery.

In September 1941, discussions concerning the establishment of a ghetto began between the Generalgouverneur Hans

Frank, the governor of Distrikt Galizien, Karl Lasch, and Lwów mayor Hans Kujath. By the end of October, the decision to proceed with the ghetto was justified on the basis of Lwów's strategic and ideological importance as a gateway to the east. Between November 12 and December 15, 1941, Jews were required to relocate to the specific areas that would belong to the ghetto, while Poles and Ukrainians were required to leave those areas. Jews were not allowed to take most of their belongings, while non-Jews were. The ghetto was based in the Zamarstynów and Kleparów districts, which already had large Jewish populations. The German authorities ordered about 80,000 Jews to move into the area designated for the ghetto, where about 25,000 were already living. This meant that about one third of Lwów's inhabitants were to leave their residences. Suspended in December, when 20,000 Jews had not yet moved into the ghetto, this first move towards ghettoization was accompanied by systematic looting of the victims, who had to pass through designated bottlenecks into the ghetto. Several thousand of them were murdered systematically, including, for the first time in Lwów, women and children.

According to Mauricy Allerhand, this first wave of dislocation led to "unheard-of exploitation by the . . . Ukrainian and, in exceptional cases, also the Polish population." Non-Jews who obtained an official "order" for an apartment to be vacated by Jews extorted money for letting them take their movable property with them. Another scam was to use such an order to demand payment for not having it enforced. Jews were often forced to vacate their apartments within as little as 15 to 30 minutes, causing them to lose most of their movable property.³

The ghetto was not sealed until November 1942, significantly later than originally planned. German reports attribute the delay to outbreaks of typhus and to fear that resettlements would spread the disease to the non-Jewish population. Jewish leaders also appealed for a delay.⁴

The resettlement hiatus ended with the first large-scale deportation from Lwów, in March 1942. Over 15,000 Jews were taken to the Bełżec extermination camp northwest of Lwów. In May 1942, the SS- und Polizeiführer (SSPF) in Distrikt Galizien, Friedrich Katzmann, took over responsibility for Jewish affairs. Since Katzmann had already become heavily involved in deportations, civilian officials were familiar with his frequent demands for harsher measures against the Jews. In Lwów, the German authorities enforced an "incremental ghettoization" in May 1942 by demanding the wearing of armbands and the possession of work certificates, without which Jews could not move about on Lwów's streets.

The Security Police organized a second major Aktion in August 1942, which claimed about 42,000 Jewish lives within two weeks. The Jews were murdered either within the city, at Bełżec, or in the SS-run Janowska Street forced labor camp on the northwestern edge of the city. Before the Aktion, there were around 90,000 Jews still alive in Lwów, but afterwards the German authorities estimated that only about 50,000 remained, and Katzmann ordered all Jews still outside the ghetto to enter it immediately. He posted public notices announcing the "establishment of a closed Jewish residential district" on August 21, before the August Aktion was completed. The Jews were given until September 7 to move into the ghetto, under the direction of the Jewish Council (Judenrat).⁵ However, the erection of the wooden fence continued into the fall, and it was not until November 10, 1942, that Katzmann declared the ghetto closed. On September 1, 1942, however, while the Jews were being driven into the ghetto, SS-Sturmbannführer Erich Engels publicly hanged the head of the Judenrat, Dr. Landesberg, and 10 Judenrat officials in reprisal for the killing of a Security Police officer. Thereafter the Jewish Police (Jüdischer Ordnungsdienst) was in control of the reconstituted Judenrat.

The boundaries of the ghetto were formed by the Pełtew River to the north, Kleparowska Street to the east, Zamarstynów Street to the west, and Rappaport and Szpitalna Streets to the south. Jewish, Ukrainian, and German police units guarded the ghetto gates. The main gate stood where Pełtewna Street met the southern edge of the ghetto.

The Lwów Judenrat was established in late July 1941.⁶ Dr. Józef Parnas, a lawyer, was the first of four Judenrat chairmen, all of whom were either murdered by the Germans or died of illness. He was succeeded by Drs. Adolf Rotfeld, Henryk Landesberg, and Eduard Ebersohn. The Judenrat's first community publication outlined 23 departments in various locations throughout the city. These offices administered the distribution of rations, housing, and health care and also bore responsibility for filling labor quotas and meeting German demands for "contributions." A ban on schooling, public worship, and other cultural activities severely restricted the activities of the educational and cultural divisions, although teaching and worship continued secretly, and underground publications were produced.⁷

In November 1941, the Jewish Police was established in connection with the first resettlements into the ghetto. Witnesses suggest that the number of Jewish Police may have reached 750 in the spring of 1942.⁸ Originally seen by the Jewish community as members of a militia to help the Judenrat maintain order and sanitation in the ghetto, the policemen gained a tarnished reputation as collaborators, implementing the orders of the Gestapo. In their primary task of filling labor and deportation quotas, they had the power to either send people to their deaths or give them a momentary reprieve (for which policemen occasionally took bribes). Witnesses attest to at least one attempt within the Jewish Police to organize a resistance group.

Jews gather at an outdoor market in the Lwów ghetto, 1941–1942.
USHMM WS #61143, #COURTESY OF IPN

Among non-Jewish local civilians, Ukrainians received higher-status work opportunities than Poles. This Nazi racial hierarchy provided the foundation for the Germans' "divide and rule" approach to occupation. Thus, while the majority of the Criminal Police were Poles under the command of Captain Jan Balicki, a separate Ukrainian police division was established under Major Volodymyr Pitulej. The Ukrainian Auxiliary Police played a key role in carrying out anti-Jewish measures, including the killing and deportation Aktions.⁹

Jews worked in numerous private firms that were run by either local civilians or Germans and were located outside the ghetto, as well as for the German army and the Ostbahn railway company. Emphasis lay on enterprises that contributed to the war effort, such as clothes manufacturing and construction. The largest private German firm belonged to a Berlin industrialist, Schwarz, who employed about 3,000 Jews. Shortly before the ghetto was closed, approximately 10,000 Jews from Lwów were working for the Wehrmacht.¹⁰ The SS ran two forced labor camps: the very large camp on Janowska Street and a smaller camp on Czwartaków Street. The Organisation Todt ran the comparatively small Persenkowka camp.

The German labor office (Arbeitsamt), led by Richard Nitsche, conducted a series of registrations to review the employment status and productivity of Jewish workers. A missing work permit was a death sentence. On the other hand, the Lwów labor office and the armaments command (Rüstungskommando) were aware that the German war effort faced an increasing shortage of non-Jewish workers who were proficient and available to replace Jewish workers and that deportations of Polish and Ukrainian workers to the Reich exacerbated these shortages.¹¹ However, Jewish labor restrictions tightened on SSPF Katzmann's command.

With the exception of organized resistance during the ghetto's liquidation, acts of resistance in the Lwów ghetto occurred on an individual and small-group basis. The relatively late development of organized resistance in Lwów can be attributed to two main factors: the weakening of the Jewish community during the 1939–1941 Soviet occupation and the persistence of antisemitism within the extremist wings of the Ukrainian and Polish nationalist movements. Of the Polish and Ukrainian underground organizations, Żegota, the Polish Council for Aid to Jews, gave the most assistance to Lwów's Jews. The Lwów branch of Żegota began its work in late 1942.¹²

Pistols and rifles could be procured at a price from Italian and Hungarian soldiers and from willing locals. In late 1942, a group of young Judenrat officials organized underground military training courses but did not create a military detachment. Reprisals followed any act of violence towards a German official.

Individuals attempted to escape deportation by jumping from the trains into the forest, where their lives depended on finding a partisan unit or a peasant who would protect them. Guards attempted to put an end to this practice by ordering the deportees to strip before leaving on the transport. The so-called jumpers (shpringer) continued to leap to at least momentary freedom. Some joined work detachments by passing as Poles. Other jumpers tried to escape multiple times, only to return to the ghetto after failing to find help.

Resisters included Jews who hid and Poles and Ukrainians who risked their lives to protect them.¹³ Survivors recall occasions during Aktions when a Polish or Ukrainian neighbor deliberately told policemen that no Jews remained in the apartment building. Some survivors hid for longer periods in the city, while others went to the countryside and hid in peasants' homes. The head of the Greek-Catholic Church, Metropolitan Sheptytskyi, reported the mass murder of Jews to the Vatican, spoke out against Ukrainian involvement, and led an operation hiding about 150 Jews. Eleven Roman-Catholic monasteries in Lwów are known to have sheltered Jewish children. Another form of resistance was the practice of passing as an Aryan. As the liquidation of the ghetto drew near, and as local Poles and Ukrainians foresaw Germany's ultimate defeat, more local non-Jews helped the few remaining Jews by supplying them with false papers or by hiding them. On the whole, however, assistance to Jews remained an exception among the non-Jewish population.

Deportations from the ghetto continued during the winter of 1942–1943. In January 1943, according to official German figures, 24,000 Jews were still alive inside the ghetto, though their real number was probably somewhat higher. After another mass-shooting Aktion, killing at least 10,000 of the ghetto's inhabitants, the German administration transformed the ghetto into a work camp (known as the Judenlager, or Julag). The Judenrat was dissolved and its members mostly killed, with some being incarcerated in the Janowska Street labor camp. SS-Hauptsturmführer Josef Grzymek oversaw the Julag from mid-February 1943 until its liquidation in June 1943. A commander known for his extreme cruelty, Grzymek made daily personal inspections of the Julag. He also ordered orchestra performances, the single permitted "cultural" activity.

By May 1943, after continual selections and killings, the Julag (ghetto remnant) had probably more than the 12,000 registered inhabitants. It was liquidated by German and Ukrainian police in June 1943. Some Jews escaped into the sewers, while others fired guns and threw grenades from bunkers. Many committed suicide. Several German policemen were killed. After being driven out of the bunkers by fire, the remaining Jews were taken to the Janowska Street labor camp, and after selections, many were shot. Some victims may have been deported to Sobibór. In November 1943, about 3,000 remaining inmates of the Janowska Street labor camp were killed, together with 2,000 Jewish forced laborers for the Ostbahn. The camp itself, now temporarily inhabited by several hundred non-Jewish inmates, continued to exist.

SOURCES Publications on the history of the Lwów ghetto and the fate of Lwów's Jews during the Holocaust include the following: Philip Friedman, "The Destruction of the Jews of Lwów," in Ada June Friedman, ed., Roads to Extinction: Essays on the Holocaust (New York: Jewish Publication Society of America, 1980), pp. 244–321; and Eliakhu Iones, Evrei L'vova v gody vtoroi mirovoi voyny i katastrofy evropeiskogo evreistva 1939–1944, ed. Svetlana Shenbrunn (Moscow: Rossiiskaia biblioteka Kholokosta, 1999). Published memoirs include those by Jacob Gerstenfeld-Maltiel, My Private War: One Man's Struggle to Survive the Soviets and the Nazis (London: Vallentine Mitchell, 1993); Rabbi David Kahane (who survived with help from contacts of the Ukrainian Greek Catholic Metropolitan Andrei Sheptytskyi), Lvov Ghetto Diary, trans. Jerzy Michalowicz (Amherst: University of Massachusetts Press, 1990); and Joachim Schoenfeld, Holocaust Memoirs: Jews in the Lwów Ghetto, the Janowski Concentration Camp, and as Deportees in Siberia (Hoboken, NJ: Ktav, 1985).

Documentation on the destruction of Lwów Jewry during the Holocaust can be found in the following archives: AAN (Records of the Lwów mayor's office, Collection 540); AŻIH (e.g., Collections 211, 229, and 301); BA-BL (R 58); BA-L; BA-MA (RH 28-1, RH 53-23, RW 23); DALO (R 12, R 31, R 35, R 37, and R 2042); GARF; IPN; USHMM (e.g., RG-15.069M, RG-15.070M, RG-31.003M, Acc.1995.A.1086); and YVA.

Christine Kulke

NOTES

1. BA-MA, RH 28-1/20 and RH 28-1/266 (1. Gebirgsdivision).
2. BA-BL, R 58/214, p. 191, Ereignismeldung UdSSR no. 24, July 16, 1941.
3. USHMM, RG-15.069M (AŻIH), 229/3, pp. 1 ff., 229/22, p. 3, and 229/53.
4. BA-MA, RH 53-23/33 through RH 53-23/38 (Oberfeldkommandantur 365, monthly reports of the Chief Medical Officer); DALO, R 2042-1-55 (Aktenvermerk, January 10, 1942, regarding postponement of resettlements).
5. Anordnung über die Bildung eines geschlossenen jüdischen Wohnbezirks in der Stadt Lemberg, gez. Katzmann, Lemberg, August 21, 1942, reproduced in Schoenfeld, Holocaust Memoirs, after p. 112.
6. DALO, R 31-1-1 (Mayoral decree, July 27, 1941).
7. Ibid., R 35-12-50 (Publication of the Judenrat, January 1, 1942); Kahane, Lvov Ghetto Diary, pp. 13–25.
8. Iones, Evrei L'vova, pp. 134, 140.
9. For detailed Ukrainian police reports of involvement in Aktions, see USHMM, Acc.1995.A.1086, reels 2 and 3.
10. BA-MA, RH 53-23/38 (Oberfeldkommandantur 365, September 1942).
11. USHMM, RG-31.003M, reel 1 (requests from private enterprises for Jewish labor); BA-MA, RH 23/13 (Rüstungskommando Lemberg), and RH 53-23/38-39 (Oberfeldkommandantur 365).
12. For Żegota reports from Lwów, see USHMM, RG-15.070M, reel 4.
13. For trials and death sentences of local civilians who hid Jews, see ibid., Acc.1995.A.1086, reel 29.

MIKOŁAJÓW

Pre-1939: Mikołajów (Mikołajów nad Dniestrem), town, Żydaczów powiat, Stanisławów województwo, Poland; 1939–1941: Nikolaev, raion center, Drogobych oblast', Ukrainian SSR; 1941–1944: Mikołajów, Kreis Stryj, Distrikt Galizien, Generalgouvernement; post-1991: Mykolaiv, raion center, L'viv oblast', Ukraine

Mikołajów is located approximately 38 kilometers (24 miles) south-southwest of Lwów. According to the census of 1931, 559 Jews were living in the town.¹ In mid-1941, it is estimated that the Jewish population may have exceeded 600.

German armed forces occupied the town on July 2, 1941. Initially a German military commandant's office (Ortskommandantur) administered the town, but in August 1941 a German civil administration took over. Mikołajów became part of Kreis Stryj, within Distrikt Galizien. The Kreishauptmann from 1941 to 1944 was Regierungsrat Dr. Wiktor von Dewitz.

In Mikołajów itself, there was an outpost of the German Gendarmerie that reported to the Gendarmerie office in Stryj. The local Gendarmerie post was also responsible for a squad of Ukrainian Auxiliary Police (Ukrainische Hilfspolizei). These forces took an active part in the anti-Jewish Aktions.

In the summer of 1941, on the orders of the occupation authorities, a Jewish Council (Judenrat) was established, headed by a lawyer named Salcberg. At the same time, the Jewish Police (Jüdischer Ordnungsdienst) was created to act as the executive arm of the Judenrat. The Jews were required to wear white armbands bearing a blue Star of David and were registered. Much of the Jews' property was confiscated, especially any valuable items, and the Jews had to meet German demands for large contributions. In addition, Jews had to perform various kinds of forced labor, including work in the stone quarries.

In August or September 1941, groups of Jewish men were rounded up and sent to the Carpathian forests for hard labor, where they suffered from severe hunger. A few young men managed to escape from the camp. Jewish craftsmen in Mikołajów were exempted from forced labor, as they were working directly for the Germans.

On June 10, 1942, 614 Jews were registered in Mikołajów. Of these people, 305 were used in various kinds of labor.² In early September 1942, a so-called deportation Aktion was conducted in the town. In its course, 500 Jews were deported to the Bełżec extermination camp, and several dozen Jews were killed on the spot.³

On October 7, 1942, the Kreishauptmann ordered the concentration of all remaining Jews of the Kreis in the Stryj ghetto by the end of the month. Exceptions were only granted for Jewish doctors and pharmacists, waste collectors working for the Kremin Company, and Jews working for the local council. However, these specialist Jews who were to remain in some locations after the end of October were "under all circumstances to be housed in barracks."⁴

After the September deportation Aktion, a Jewish work group of approximately 100 people remained in Mikołajów, of which 57 were employed by the local council, and that probably included a few Jewish physicians, dentists, and a pharmacist. This entire group was contained within a small fenced area, which is described in some sources as a form of remnant ghetto.⁵ These Jews were shot in two Aktions on February 5 and June 12, 1943.⁶ In total, more than 200 Jews were shot in Mikołajów in 1942 and 1943.⁷

SOURCES Information on the persecution and murder of the Jews in Mikołajów can be found in Danuta Dabrowska, Abraham Wein, and Aharon Weiss, eds., Pinkas ha-kehillot. Encyclopaedia of Jewish Communities: Poland, vol. 2, Eastern Galicia (Jerusalem: Yad Vashem, 1980), pp. 322–324. The existence of a ghetto in Mikołajów is mentioned in Handbuch der Lager, Gefängnisse und Ghettos auf dem besetzten Territorium der Ukraine (1941–1944) (Kiev: Staatskomitee der Archiven der Ukraine, 2000), p. 73.

Documentation regarding the extermination of the Jews in Mikołajów can be found in the following archives: AŻIH (301/2574); DALO (R 1952-1-63); GARF (7021-58-22); TsDAHOU (57-4-235, p. 7); USHMM (RG-31.003M [DALO]); and YVA.

Alexander Kruglov and Martin Dean
trans. Igor Puchkov

NOTES

1. Tatiana Berenstein, “Eksterminacja ludności żydowskiej w dystryktach Galicja (1941–1943),” BŻIH, no. 61 (1967), table 10.
2. DALO, R 1952-1-63, p. 36.
3. GARF, 7021-58-22, p. 32. Dabrowska, Wein, and Weiss, Pinkas ha-kehillot: Poland, vol. 2, Eastern Galicia, pp. 322–324, however, date the first deportation Aktion to Bełżec from Mikołajów in April 1942.
4. DALO, R 1952-1-62, p. 92, Runderlass Kreishauptmann Stryj an alle Vögte, October 7, 1942, as cited by Dieter Pohl, Nationalsozialistische Judenverfolgung in Ostgalizien 1941–1944 (Munich: Oldenbourg, 1996), p. 243; and Thomas Sandkühler, “Endlösung” in Galizien. Der Judenmord in Ostpolen und die Rettungsinitiativen von Berthold Beitz 1941–1944 (Bonn: Dietz, 1996), p. 352.
5. DALO, R 1952-1-63, pp. 49ff., Landgemeinde Mikolajow, Verzeichnis ueber die in Mikolajow verbliebenen Arbeitsjuden, October 26, 1942; Sandkühler, “Endlösung,” p. 356; TsDAHOU, 57-4-235, p. 7.
6. GARF, 7021-58-22, p. 32.
7. Ibid.

MIKULIŃCE

Pre-1939: Mikulińce, town, Tarnopol powiat and województwo, Poland; 1939–1941: Mikulintsy, raion center, Ternopol’ oblast’, Ukrainian SSR; 1941–1944: Mikulince, Kreis Tarnopol, Distrikt Galizien, Generalgouvernement; post-1991: Mykulyntsi, Terebovlia raion, Ternopil’ oblast’, Ukraine

Mikulińce is located 16 kilometers (10 miles) south of Tarnopol. According to the 1931 census, 1,770 Jews were living in Mikulińce. Under Soviet rule in 1939–1941, the Jewish population increased to about 2,300, following the influx of Jewish refugees from western and central Poland, some of which were then deported to the Soviet interior.¹

German armed forces occupied Mikulińce on July 4, 1941. A German military commandant’s office (Ortskommandantur) ran the town’s affairs until August 1941, when authority was transferred to a German civil administration. Mikulińce was incorporated into Kreis Tarnopol, within Distrikt Galizien. Gerhard Hager was appointed as Kreishauptmann in Tarnopol, a position he held until April 1942, when Mogens von Harbou und von der Hellen succeeded him.

The anti-Jewish Aktions in the region were organized and carried out primarily by members of the Security Police outpost (Sipo-Aussendienststelle) in Tarnopol. The Sipo-Aussendienststelle was headed from the end of July to October 1941 by SS-Hauptsturmführer Edmund Schöne; and from October 1941 until May 1943, by SS-Sturmbannführer Hermann Müller. In Mikulińce itself, a German Gendarmerie post and a unit of the Ukrainian Auxiliary Police (Ukrainische Hilfspolizei) were established.

On the night of July 4, 1941, the first Jews were murdered in Mikulińce. On July 5, local Ukrainian residents and antisemites staged a pogrom in the town; 12 Jews were murdered, and many Jews were beaten and robbed. On July 6, Ukrainian antisemites attempted to organize a massacre of Jews who had been herded to the river to help remove the ruins of a bridge, but these plans were thwarted by the intervention of a German officer, who sent everyone home as it was getting dark. A short time later, a group of Jews was murdered by Ukrainian policemen and buried in a grave for livestock, which the Jews themselves had to dig. Additionally, 18 Jews, including professionals, wealthy businessmen, and former public officials, were shot for having allegedly collaborated with the Soviet authorities in 1939–1941.²

In the summer of 1941, the German authorities ordered the Jews to wear distinguishing armbands and to surrender all gold and any other valuables. A Judenrat was established, headed by the attorney Jagerndorf, which had to collect money from the Jews to pay contributions demanded by the Germans and also supply a daily quota of forced laborers.

At the end of 1941, the Jews were ordered to destroy the synagogue and demolish the tombstones in the cemetery, so the materials could be used for resurfacing the roads. In December 1941, the Jews were ordered to surrender all furs and other items of warm clothing for the German army. Then, in the spring, Jews were ordered to surrender all foodstuffs. German policemen arrived from Tarnopol at this time. They robbed Jewish homes and murdered Jews indiscriminately.

In the first half of 1942, groups of young and able-bodied Jews were rounded up with the aid of the Judenrat and sent to various forced labor camps, including those in Kamionki, Stupki, and Hłuboczek Wielki. Other Jews assigned to farms around Mikulińce received food for their work and were able to return home occasionally to visit their families.

According to Pinkas ha-kehillot, a fenced ghetto was not erected in Mikulińce, but at some time before the summer of 1942, all the Jews had to move to a separate section of town (an open ghetto) near the Sart River. Jews were forbidden to leave the limits of the town without permission.

A large part of the remaining Jews were rounded up in a major Aktion at the end of August 1942, when around 1,200 Jews were deported from Mikulińce via Tarnopol to the Bełżec extermination camp. During the roundup, the German and Ukrainian police killed about 80 elderly and infirm Jews on the spot. They also searched all the Jewish houses, shooting any Jews they found in hiding or that tried to escape. The Jewish deportees were held under close guard for hours without food and water in extreme heat, at first on the market square, and then in the freight cars, before the train departed.³ The Aktion was carried out by detachments of the Security Police and the Schutzpolizei from Tarnopol, assisted by Ukrainian policemen. Local non-Jews plundered the empty houses.

Some Jews evaded the Aktion by hiding successfully or were absent working on farms when it took place. Therefore, approximately 600 Jews remained in Mikulińce, and the Germans then forced some of these Jews to work clearing out remaining property from the Jewish residences. In early October 1942, all the Jews in Mikulińce were ordered to leave the town by October 15, as it was to become “cleansed of Jews” (judenrein).⁴ It was intended that most of these people should move to the Tarnopol ghetto, but as this ghetto was overcrowded, some Jews resettled to other places where Jews were still permitted to reside, including Trembowla, Kopyczyńce, Kozowa, Zbaraż, and Podhajce.⁵ Following the transfer, the Jews from Mikulińce shared the fate of the other Jews in these ghettos.

A few Jews survived by hiding during the Aktions and finding shelter with non-Jewish inhabitants. The Polish farmer Karol Sygnatowicz gave shelter to two Jews from Mikulińce for a number of months after the liquidation of the Trembowla ghetto in the spring of 1943.⁶

SOURCES Information regarding the destruction of the Jewish population of Mikulińce can be found in the following publications: “Mikulince,” in Danuta Dabrowska, Abraham Wein, and Aharon Weiss, eds., Pinkas ha-kebilot. Encyclopaedia of Jewish Communities: Poland, vol. 2, Eastern Galicia (Jerusalem: Yad Vashem, 1980), pp. 324–326; and Hayim Preshel, ed., Mikulince: Sefer yizkor (Israel: Be-hots’at Irgun yots’e Mikulintsah be-Yisrael uve-Artsot ha-Berit, 1985).

Documents describing the fate of the Jews of Mikulińce can be found in the following archives: AŻIH (301/1421, 1422, 1423, 4212, 4841, 4842); DATO; GARF (7021-75-103); USHMM; and YVA.

Alexander Kruglov and Martin Dean
trans. Steven Seegel

NOTES

1. AŻIH, 301/1421, testimony of Izydor Zeiler.

2. Ibid.; Nisia Schweizer-Horowitz, “My Town during the Second World War,” in Preshel, Mikulince. According to ChGK materials, around 200 Jews were shot in July 1941 for their collaboration with the Soviet authorities; see GARF, 7021-75-103, p. 8. This figure, however, seems too high.

3. AŻIH, 301/1421, dates the Aktion on August 29, 1942. Justiz und NS-Verbrechen, vol. 24 (Amsterdam: Amsterdam University Press, 1998), Lfd. Nr. 634, p. 39, gives August 29 or August 30. See also Schweizer-Horowitz, “My Town during the Second World War”; AŻIH, 301/1423, testimony of Klara Szrenzel, 4212, 4841.

4. AŻIH, 301/1423.

5. Schweizer-Horowitz, “My Town during the Second World War”; AŻIH, 301/1421, 1423, 4841.

6. AŻIH, 301/1421, 1423.

MOŚCISKA

Pre-1939: Mościska, town, powiat center, Lwów województwo, Poland; 1939–1941: Mostiska, raion center, Droboych oblast’, Ukrainian SSR; 1941–1944: Mosciska, Kreis Lemberg-Land, Distrikt Galizien, Generalgouvernement; post-1991: Mostys’ka, raion center, L’viv oblast’, Ukraine

Mościska is located 62 kilometers (39 miles) west of Lwów. According to the population census of December 9, 1931, there were 2,328 Jews living in Mościska.

In mid-September 1939, the Red Army occupied Mościska, which was soon annexed to the Soviet Union. Under Soviet rule, most businesses were nationalized and Jewish organizations closed down. In June 1941, there were about 3,500 Jews in the town. This figure includes a number of refugees who arrived from western and central Poland in the fall of 1939.¹

Forces of the German 17th Army occupied Mościska on June 23, 1941. In July 1941, a military commandant’s office (Ortskommandatur) administered the town. On August 1, 1941, authority was transferred to a German civil administration. Mościska was initially incorporated into Kreis Sadowa Wisznia, which, in April 1942, was included within Kreis Lemberg-Land. In 1942, Kreis Lemberg-Land was headed by Kreishauptmann Dr. Werner Becker. In Mościska itself, the Germans established a Gendarmerie post and a Ukrainian police force recruited from local inhabitants. The deportation and killing Aktions against the Jewish population were carried out by the Security Police from Lwów, with the assistance of the Gendarmerie and the Ukrainian Auxiliary Police (Ukrainische Hilfspolizei).

Shortly after the start of the occupation, a wave of anti-semitism gripped the town. Local residents vented their fury in a pogrom during which many Jews were beaten and robbed and a number murdered.² In July 1941, the German military administration created a Jewish Council (Judenrat) under the leadership of Julek Katz, which had to meet German demands for money and valuables. The Jewish Police (Jüdischer Ordnungsdienst) assisted the Judenrat in the implementation of German demands. The Jews were registered and ordered to wear white armbands bearing the Star of David. Jews were deprived of many basic rights and were obligated to perform heavy forced labor for little or no pay.

In May 1942, the Germans rounded up several hundred able-bodied Jews in Mościska and sent them either to the

Janowska Street camp in Lwów or to the camp at Jaktorów for forced labor.³ A few of these Jews subsequently were released from Jaktorów in return for a substantial bribe organized by members of the Judenrat in coordination with other Jewish Councils in the region.⁴

By the early summer of 1942, the Germans had established an open ghetto (Judenviertel) in Mościska. Several hundred Jews from the surrounding villages were resettled there. They were permitted to bring with them only their personal clothing. There was terrible overcrowding in the open ghetto, with 15 people having to share a room. The buildings in the ghetto were very dilapidated, and there was insufficient light and water. Jews in the ghetto received news about the killing of Jews in Lwów but hoped that they would not be affected, as they tried to meet all the German demands. According to one account, no children were born in the ghetto.⁵

On October 12–13, 1942, a large so-called deportation Aktion took place, and about 2,000 Jews were taken to the Bełżec extermination camp. The person in charge of this Aktion was SS-Obersturmführer Friedrich Hildebrand from the staff of the SS- und Polizeiführer in Lwów. The Security Police forces from Lwów were assisted by the Order Police in Mościska, commanded by Neumann, and the Ukrainian Auxiliary Police, commanded by Bem, known as a brutal murderer of Jews. Those Jews who tried to hide were hunted down. The German and Ukrainian police shot about 500 Jews at the Jewish cemetery in Mościska.⁶ About 1,000 Jews survived the deportation Aktion, including the members of the Judenrat and their families and others who emerged from hiding. Several hundred Jews fled to the surrounding countryside around this time, but many were betrayed by local peasants who were largely hostile or in fear of the death penalty imposed by the Germans on those who hid Jews. Remaining property from those deported was collected and sorted. The more valuable items were sent to Germany; the remainder was sold very cheaply to the local non-Jewish population. The ghetto existed for about another five weeks after the Aktion. The inmates suffered from terrible hunger, as the Ukrainian guards at the ghetto gate did not permit any food to be brought in. A number of Jews died from typhus and/or starvation. The Germans and their collaborators continued to exploit the Jews for forced labor and regularly took out groups of Jews arbitrarily and shot them.⁷

In December 1942, all the Jews who remained in the Mościska ghetto were resettled into the Jaworów ghetto, which became the collecting point for the remaining Jews in the area.⁸ Some of them died of hunger and disease. The ones who remained alive were nearly all shot in April 1943 during the liquidation of the Jaworów ghetto.

SOURCES An article on the history of the Jewish community in Mościska can be found in Danuta Dabrowska, Abraham Wein, and Aharon Weiss, eds., Pinkas ha-kehillot. Encyclopaedia of Jewish Communities: Poland, vol. 2, Eastern Galicia (Jerusalem: Yad Vashem, 1980), pp. 317–319.

Documentation on the persecution and destruction of the Jews of Mościska can be found in the following archives:

AŻIH (301/673 and 4947); DALO (R 24-1-123); GARF (7021-58-30); USHMM; VHF; and YVA.

Alexander Kruglov and Martin Dean
trans. Steven Seegel

NOTES

1. Tatiana Berenstein, “Eksterminacja ludności żydowskiej w dystrykcie Galicja (1941–1943),” BŻIH, no. 61 (1967), table 7.
2. AŻIH, 301/673, testimony of Lidia Grunberg.
3. Ibid., 301/4947, testimony of Chaja Antmann.
4. DALO, R 24-1-123, pp. 104–127.
5. AŻIH, 301/4947.
6. AŻIH, 301/673; Sta. Bremen, 29 Ks 1/66, Anklage gegen Fritz Hildebrand, December 28, 1965, pp. 35–36. See also Yitzhak Arad, Bełżec, Sobibor, Treblinka: The Operation Reinhard Death Camps (Bloomington: Indiana University Press, 1987), p. 387; Arad dates the deportation Aktion on October 10, 1942. AŻIH, 301/4947, dates the Aktion on September 24, 1942.
7. AŻIH, 301/4947.
8. Ibid.

MOSTY WIELKIE

Pre-1939: Mosty Wielkie, town, Żółkiew powiat, Lwów województwo, Poland; 1939–1941: Mosty Velikiye, raion center, L'vov oblast', Ukrainian SSR; 1941–1944: Mosty Wielkie, Kreis Lemberg-Land, Distrikt Galizien, Generalgouvernement; post-1991: Velyki Mosty, Sokal' raion, L'viv oblast', Ukraine

Mosty Wielkie is located about 44 kilometers (27 miles) north of Lwów. The Jews lived mainly around the market square in the center of town, whereas the Poles and Ukrainians lived mainly on the outskirts. According to the 1931 census, 1,266 Jews were living in Mosty Wielkie. By the middle of 1941, there were probably around 1,400 Jews residing there.

Units of the German 17th Army occupied Mosty Wielkie on June 29, 1941, and in July a military commandant's office (Ortskommandantur) controlled the town. On August 1, 1941, power was transferred to a German civil administration. Mosty Wielkie was incorporated into Kreis Lemberg-Land, within Distrikt Galizien. The Kreishauptmann was initially Wilhelm Stockheck (August 1941–mid-September 1941); then Otto Bauer (mid-September 1941–March 1942); Werner Becker (March 1942–January 1943); and finally, Baron Joachim von der Leyen (from January 1943).

A German Gendarmerie post and a unit of Ukrainian Auxiliary Police (Ukrainische Hilfspolizei) were established in the town. The Security Police post in Lwów was responsible for organizing most of the anti-Jewish Aktions carried out in Mosty Wielkie, assisted by the Gendarmerie and local Ukrainian policemen. The Ukrainian mayor, Wasyl Strąćicki, was also notable for his hostility to the Jews.¹

On July 6, 1941, the local residents of Mosty Wielkie took advantage of the antisemitic mood prevailing in town and carried out a pogrom during which 19 Jews were burned to death in the synagogue.²

On July 22, 1941, the Germans conducted an Aktion in Mosty Wielkie in which around 100 people (mainly Jews) were shot as alleged Soviet activists. The mass shooting was conducted by a detachment of the German police assisted by local Ukrainian policemen.

In the summer of 1941, the German military administration ordered the creation of a Jewish Council (Judenrat). The Jews were obliged to wear white armbands bearing the Star of David. A large amount of Jewish property was confiscated, including especially any items of value, such as gold or silver. Jews also were required to perform forced labor for little or no pay. Subsequently the Jewish Police (Jüdischer Ordnungsdienst) was established, to serve as the executive organ of the Judenrat, to assist in the enforcement of German demands and regulations.

In the spring of 1942, the Festungspionier-Beutestab 3 of the Wehrmacht, which was headquartered in Lwów, created outposts (Aussenstellen) in Mosty Wielkie and the neighboring village of Sielec Zawonie. The task of the Festungspionier-Beutestab was the collection of military hardware and munitions that had been left behind after the retreat of Soviet forces in the summer of 1941. In Mosty Wielkie the local overseer was the captain of the military-engineer division, Hauptmann Johann Kroupa from Vienna. He supervised three to five soldier-engineers, and to carry out their work, they used Jewish forced labor. Kroupa was keen to employ Jews to perform a variety of jobs, and Jews were attracted to Mosty Wielkie and Sielec Zawonie from the surrounding area by the relatively good conditions there. Kroupa even provided fictitious work permits to some of the Jews; more than 2,000 Jews (including 1,200 women) were working in different capacities in Mosty Wielkie for the Wehrmacht. There were also around 500 Jews (nearly all men) working in Sielec Zawonie.³ The head of the Judenrat, Herman Gruber, who previously had been the head of the Jewish community in Witków Nowy, steered bribes towards Kroupa in recognition of his favorable attitude.

An open ghetto ("Jewish residential district") was established in Mosty Wielkie, at some time between the summer of 1941 and the summer of 1942, into which the town's Jews, along with those from surrounding villages, were resettled.⁴ Pinkas ha-kehillot dates its establishment in early August 1942, noting that it was unfenced and unguarded.

The transfer into the ghetto is described by the Jewish survivor Haskell Frostig. He notes that at a certain time the German authorities ordered all the Jews to move into one side of town. Most of the houses in this area were already occupied by Jews. Those Jews who were forced to relocate were not able to take with them all of their possessions. Subsequently Jews had to pay a bribe for permission to leave the ghetto to exchange their remaining clothes and other items with the local peasants for food. Frostig notes that subsequently the "ghetto" was surrounded with barbed wire and that the men were separated from the women and children by a partition.⁵

Between October and November 1942, on the orders of the German authorities, a large part of the town's Jewish population was relocated to Sokal and Żółkiew.⁶ Some were murdered there, while others were deported to the extermination camp at Bełżec.

According to the conclusions of the German court in Bremen, in the fall of 1942 the open ghetto in Mosty Wielkie, which consisted of around 30 small houses, was surrounded with a barbed-wire fence more than 2 meters (6.6 feet) high and converted into a forced labor camp. This also meant that men and women were segregated within the camp, which was split into two parts by an internal barbed-wire fence. The camp came under SS control, subordinated to the SS- und Polizeiführer (SSPF), SS-Brigadeführer Friedrich Katzmann.

Katzmann appointed SS-Obersturmführer Willi Schulze to run the camp in Mosty Wielkie, which was also responsible for the subcamp in Sielec Zawonie. Schulze appointed Harmaz, a Jew whom he had handpicked from the Janowska Street labor camp in Lwów, as the elder (starosta) of the Mosty Wielkie camp. A Jewish security service was also established. Under the watch of Ukrainian policemen, the Jews had to line up each day in columns and be led back and forth to various labor sites (to the laundry, the brush factory, the sawmill, the railway construction site, the administration office of the Wehrmacht, and other sites), which were often unguarded.

Pinkas ha-kehillot indicates that a separate ghetto continued to exist until the beginning of February with contacts retained to the labor camp, as the latter was fenced but not effectively guarded. However, in light of Frostig's testimony and the description given by the German court, it is possible that this is a reference to the two sections of the labor camp that were separated from each other by a fence. Mosty Wielkie was not listed as one of the towns where Jews were permitted to continue residing in the November 10, 1942, decree issued by the Höherer SS- und Polizeiführer (HSSPF), SS-Obergruppenführer Friedrich Wilhelm Krüger.⁷ Therefore, those not in the labor camp would have been forced to leave Mosty Wielkie by December 1, 1942, although certain exceptions to this rule did occur elsewhere in Distrikt Galizien.

In January 1943, the Festungspionier-Beutestab, for economic reasons, decided from February 1, 1943, onwards to reduce by half the payments to the SSPF for the exploitation of Jewish labor. In response, Katzmann ordered the execution of half of the workers in the Mosty Wielkie camp, including all the women, the elderly, and men who were sick or infirm. For this operation, Katzmann chose SS-Obersturmführer Friedrich Hildebrand from his personal staff. The Aktion was carried out on February 10, 1943. In the morning, 20 to 30 Jews were taken into the nearby woods, where they were forced to dig mass graves. In the afternoon, Security Police from Lwów, assisted by the local Ukrainian policemen, shot at least 1,150 Jews, or half the workforce of Mosty Wielkie. This is the date recorded by Pinkas ha-kehillot also as the liquidation of the ghetto.

Captain Kroupa attempted to save the lives of a group of workers by hiding them. However, these Jews were discovered and shot. The Nazis then court-martialed Kroupa for protecting the Jews.

On May 1, 1943, the forced labor camp in Mosty Wielkie was liquidated. The remaining prisoners were taken to Rawa Ruska, where they were murdered in the summer of 1943. Of the Jewish population of Mosty Wielkie, only a few dozen managed to survive the war, including some who had escaped into the Soviet interior at the time of the German invasion.

At the court proceeding in Bremen on May 12, 1967, Friedrich Hildebrand was sentenced to life in prison. Willi Schulze served as a witness at the trial.

SOURCES Publications on the persecution and destruction of the Jews in Mosty Wielkie include the following: Danuta Dabrowska, Abraham Wein, and Aharon Weiss, eds., Pinkas ha-kehilot. Encyclopaedia of Jewish Communities: Poland, vol. 2, Eastern Galicia (Jerusalem: Yad Vashem, 1980), pp. 313–317; Justiz und NS-Verbrechen, vol. 26 (Amsterdam: Amsterdam University Press, 2001), Lfd. Nr. 653; Guy Miron, ed., The Yad Vashem Encyclopedia of the Ghettos during the Holocaust (Jerusalem: Yad Vashem, 2010), pp. 500–501. The existence of a ghetto in Mosty Wielkie is mentioned also in Handbuch der Lager, Gefängnisse und Ghettos auf dem besetzten Territorium der Ukraine (1941–1944) (Kiev: Staatskomitee der Archiven der Ukraine, 2000), p. 101.

Relevant documentation can be found in these archives: AŻIH (301/2780a-d and 301/4971); DALO (R 3-3-279); GARF (7021-67-78); VHF (e.g., # 8897, 36389); and YVA.

Alexander Kruglov and Martin Dean

NOTES

1. AŻIH, 301/2780.
2. Tatiana Berenstein, “Eksterminacja ludności żydowskiej w dystryktie Galicja (1941–1943),” BŻIH, no. 61 (1967), table 7.
3. Verdict of LG-Brem, 29 Ks 1/66, May 12, 1967, published in JuNS-V, vol. 26, Lfd. Nr. 653, p. 249; AŻIH, 301/2777.
4. Verdict of LG-Brem, 29 Ks 1/66, May 12, 1967, published in JuNS-V, vol. 26, Lfd. Nr. 653, p. 249.
5. VHF, # 36389, testimony of Haskell Frostig.
6. Berenstein, “Eksterminacja,” table 7.
7. Police Decree issued by HSSPF Krüger of the Generalgouvernement, November 10, 1942, published in Tatiana Berenstein et al., eds., Faschismus, Getto, Massenmord: Dokumentation über Ausrottung und Widerstand der Juden in Polen während des zweiten Weltkrieges (Berlin: Rütten & Loening, 1961), pp. 344–345.

NADWÓRNA

Pre-1939: Nadwórna, town, powiat center, Stanisławów województwo, Poland; 1939–1941: Nadvornaia, raion center, Stanislav oblast', Ukrainian SSR; 1941–1944: Nadworna, Kreis Stanislau, Distrikt Galizien, Generalgouvernement; post-1991: Nadvirna, raion center, Ivano-Frankivs'k oblast', Ukraine

Nadwórna is located about 40 kilometers (25 miles) south of Stanisławów. In 1936, the Jewish population of Nadwórna of 4,500 represented almost 40 percent of the town's residents.¹

ENCYCLOPEDIA OF CAMPS AND GHETTOS, 1933–1945

The Hungarian army occupied Nadwórna on July 1, 1941, as a result of an agreement with Germany. At the beginning of September 1941 and in conjunction with its occupation of southeastern Galicia, Hungary expelled 1,000 “nonresident” Jews (nominal citizens of Poland who had resided in Hungary for generations) to Nadwórna. At the same time, Hungarian authorities issued an order for all Jews to wear an armband with a Star of David. The Jews of Nadwórna attempted to negotiate protection from pogroms with the Hungarian authorities to no avail. In the middle of July 1941, the local Ukrainian population instigated a pogrom in which Jews were beaten and humiliated, and dozens were murdered. Dr. Michal Starer, leader of the Jewish community, was among the victims. The Ukrainians forced Jews to exhume corpses from a Soviet-era mass grave, wash them, and then drink the wash water.²

Though Nadwórna formally became part of Distrikt Galizien in the German Generalgouvernement on August 1, 1941, the Germans did not actually take over administration of the area until early September. They immediately started to confiscate furniture, furs, and other valuables from Nadwórna's Jews. Even under German rule, the local police station was manned entirely by Ukrainians and Poles and headed by a local Ukrainian, Kohuciak. The Germans established a Judenrat: Dr. Maximilian Schall was nominated to be the chairman and Izak Szapira was his deputy and in charge of supplies.³

On October 6, 1941, the first day of the Sukkot holiday (the Feast of Tabernacles), at 7:00 A.M., Gestapo forces from Stanisławów and Tatarów, aided by the local Ukrainian population, Ukrainian policemen, and men of the German Order Police, began the first Aktion in Nadwórna. The Ukrainians, armed with iron bars and clubs, stormed through the city, raiding Jewish homes, and forcibly assembled most of the Jewish population in the market square in front of a church. In the square, SS-Hauptsturmführer Hans Krüger (head of the Security Police in Stanisławów), his deputy SS-Untersturmführer Oskar Brandt, SS-Hauptscharführer Ernst Varchmin (head of the Sipo and SD in Tatarów), and SS-Oberscharführer Heinrich Schott (Judenreferent) supervised the actions of the local police.⁴ Half of Nadwórna's Jewish population was forced onto trucks and taken to the nearby Bukowinka Forest. They were made to undress, lined up at the edge of a World War I trench, and gunned down.⁵ At 7:00 P.M., Heinrich Schott returned to the market square to announce that the mass grave had been filled and that the Aktion was over. Altogether, more than 2,000 Jewish men, women, and children, mostly Jews from Nadwórna and some Jewish Hungarian deportees, were murdered on that day.⁶

The reverse of an envelope from the Nadwórna ghetto, bearing the stamp, “THE JEWISH COUNCIL in NADWIRNA,” n.d.
COURTESY OF EDWARDVICTOR.COM

German historian Dieter Pohl, in an article on Hans Krüger, writes:

Following the September discussions in Lwow, Krüger began to make preparations for the large-scale massacre of Jews in Stanisławów. In order to condition his Security Police for the task awaiting them, he first organized a mass murder on October 6, 1941, in the nearby town of Nadwórna as a kind of "dress rehearsal." This massacre in Nadwórna, which claimed the lives of 2,000 men, women, and children, marked the actual beginning of the "Final Solution" in the Generalgouvernement.⁷

Judenrat members and their families, as well as "essential" workers for the war-related industries, were preserved. Many Jews hid during the Aktion and thereby saved themselves for a short while. During the Aktion, Krüger offered Jews an opportunity to pay for their release, though payment did not guarantee safety. After the massacre, surviving Jews received permission to bury the victims in the mass grave in Bukowinka. Members of the local population confiscated the homes of those killed, and the valuables were claimed by the Germans.

Following the October massacre, a period of six months of relative calm ensued. However, in April 1942 the Germans established a ghetto in Nadwórna that was sealed on April 30. It was divided by a fence into two sections: "A" was for Jews with an Ausweis (work permit) and "B" for those not deemed "essential to the war effort." For a bribe of 2,000 to 3,000 złoty, it was possible to obtain an Ausweis from local officials. A ghetto inhabitants were fed at their workplace and received ration cards, while the inhabitants of the B ghetto, including children orphaned by the October killings, received no rations. Some children sneaked out of the ghetto to find food. The Jews of the A ghetto worked in the oil refinery, at the "Skolengasse" agricultural cooperative, and in other service roles. In addition to the ghettos, a Lager (work camp) was built at the local sawmill in which 137 "essential" workers lived and worked under the supervision of a German, Weber, who was married to a Jewish woman.⁸

In May and June 1942, more than 100 Jews were brought into the Nadwórna ghetto from the surrounding villages (73 from Pasieczna, 24 from Strymba, 20 from Bitków, and others from Oślaw Biały [1921: Jewish population 187] and Zielona [1921: Jewish population 112]). During the summer, Gestapo officials in Nadwórna continued shooting individual Jews arbitrarily. Owing to severe food shortages and overcrowding, mortality was very high. According to the Soviet Extraordinary State Commission Report (ChGK), some 800 Jews died in the ghetto of disease and starvation.⁹

In September and October of 1942, groups of Jews from Nadwórna were rounded up and sent to Stanisławów to be murdered soon afterwards, mostly by shooting. SS-Sturmbannführer Helmut Tanzman of Lwów ordered regular executions to keep the ghetto in Stanisławów small. By November 1942, there were only about 300 Jews remaining in Nadwórna. A small number of individuals managed to escape from Nadwórna to Hungary.¹⁰ The Millbauer brothers produced false "Aryan" papers in the ghetto, which made some escapes possible.

On Sunday, November 8, 1942, the final liquidation of the Nadwórna ghetto and work camp took place. The Ukrainian police and Kripo surrounded the sawmill and detained the Jewish workers. Judenrat members and the remaining Jews in the ghetto were arrested. A few days later, all of Nadwórna's remaining Jews were deported to the Jewish cemetery in Stanisławów, where they were shot and killed.¹¹

The Soviet army liberated Nadwórna on July 26, 1944. Only a few individual local Jews survived by hiding in forests or escaping to neighboring Hungary.

Hans Krüger was arrested by the Canadian military in Holland but released soon afterwards. He proceeded with his business and political career until 1968, when he was sentenced to life in prison. He was released in 1986 and died in 1988 at the age of 79.

SOURCES The yizkor book edited by Israel Carmi (Otto Kramer), Nadworna; sefer edut ve zikaron [in Hebrew, English, and Yiddish] (Tel Aviv: Hotsa'at ha-irgunim shel yotse Nadwornah be-Yisrael uve-Artsot ha-berit, 1975), includes the testimony of Schaje Schmerler and other relevant information on the Jewish community of Nadwórna. A short article on the town can also be found in Danuta Dabrowska, Abraham Wein, and Aharon Weiss, eds., Pinkas ha-kehilot. Encyclopaedia of Jewish Communities: Poland, vol. 2, Eastern Galicia (Jerusalem: Yad Vashem, 1980), pp. 328–331.

The testimonies of Izak Szapira and Estera Seibald can be found in YVA; the trial of Hans Krüger in Münster can be found in StA-Mü (LG-Münst, 5 Ks 4/65); part of the documentation for this trial can also be examined at BA-L (ZStL 208 AR-Z 398/59). Additional documentation is located in AŻIH (301/3345); and GARF (7021-73-10); with copies also at USHMM (RG-22.002M, reel 14) and in YVA.

Teresa Pollin

NOTES

1. Davar, March 9, 1936, Tel Aviv, Palestine, in Nadworna yizkor book.

2. YVA, O-3/3066, testimony of Estera Seibald given in July 1967 [in Polish] (Estera Seibald was married to Dr. Michal Starer and divorced him in 1939).

3. Ibid., O-33/1501, testimony of Izak Szapira [in Hebrew], witness at the trial of Hans Krüger, August 1966.

4. Justiz und NS-Verbrechen, vol. 28 (Amsterdam: Amsterdam University Press, 2003), Lfd. Nr. 675a, pp. 281–284.

5. YVA, O-33/1501.

6. Ibid., O-3/3066. For further details of the Aktion, see StA-Mü, Verdict of LG-Münst 5 Ks 4/65, May 6, 1968, (Fall 2), published in JuNs-V, vol. 28, Lfd. Nr. 675a, pp. 281–308. According to the Soviet Extraordinary State Commission Report (GARF, 7021-73-10, p. 264), 3,859 Jews were killed in Nadwórna on that day.

7. Dieter Pohl, “Hans Krüger and the Murder of the Jews in the Stanisławow Region (Galicia),” Yad Vashem Studies 26 (1998): 239–265.

8. YVA, O-3/3066; testimony of Schaje Schmerler in Carmi, Nadwórna, pp. 8–27; A. Kruglov, Katastrofa ukraińskogo evreistva 1941–1944 gg.: Entsiklopedicheskii spravocchnik (Kharkov: Karavella, 2001), p. 218, gives the date of June 27, 1942, for the sealing of the ghetto.

9. Kruglov, Katastrofa, p. 218; GARF, 7021-73-10, pp. 267, 272–280; JuNs-V, vol. 28, Lfd. Nr. 675a, pp. 525–548. Also see BA-L, ZStL 208 AR-Z 398/59, private letter of the Landkommissar in Nadwórna dated May 4, 1942; this letter gave the figure of 7,000 Jews in his area of jurisdiction.

10. YVA, O-3/3066.

11. Ibid. A. Kruglov, Entsiklopediia kholokosta: Evreiskaia entsiklopediia Ukrainy (Kiev: Evreiskii sovet Ukrainy, Fond “Pamiat’ zhertz fashizma,” 2000), pp. 74–75, does not list any deportations to the Bełżec extermination camp directly from Nadwórna in 1942.

NARAJÓW

Pre-1939: Narajów (Yiddish: Nariav), village, Brzeżany powiat, Tarnopol województwo, Poland; 1939–1941: Naraev, Berezhany raion, Ternopol’ oblast’, Ukrainian SSR; 1941–1944: Narajow, Kreis Brzezany, Distrikt Galizien, Generalgouvernement; post-1991: Narayiv, Berezhany raion, Ternopil’ oblast’, Ukraine

Narajów is located 65 kilometers (40 miles) west of Tarnopol. According to the 1921 census, there were 775 Jews living in Narajów, accounting for 26.3 percent of the total population. On the eve of World War II, there were about 600 Jews living in Narajów.¹

In September 1939, the Polish army retreated from the area, and for a short while there was an interregnum, during which nationalist Ukrainians conducted attacks against the Jews. Then units of the Red Army occupied Narajów and restored order. Under the Soviet regime from September 1939 until the end of June 1941, Jewish communal organizations were closed down, and some Jewish businesses were nationalized.

At the start of July 1941, German forces occupied Narajów. Almost immediately they forced the Jews to perform hard and degrading labor. Ukrainian policemen kidnapped Jews from the streets, cut off their beards, and beat them. They especially tortured Jews who were accused of collaborating with the Soviet authorities.²

Until August 1941, a German military commandant’s office (Ortskommandantur) governed the village; then authority was transferred to the German civil administration. Narajów became part of Kreis Brzezany, in Distrikt Galizien. Anti-Jewish Aktions were organized and carried out in the village until the end of March 1942 by the outpost of the Security Police (Sipo-Aussendienststelle) in Stanisławów, headed by SS-Hauptsturmführer Hans Krüger. From April 1942 on, the Aktions in the region were organized by the Sipo outpost in Tarnopol, which was headed from October 1941 to May 1943 by SS-Sturmbannführer Hermann Müller.

In the summer of 1941, the occupation authorities required the Jews to wear armbands bearing the Star of David and to hand over all their gold and valuables. Jews were forbidden to leave the confines of the village and from trading with non-Jews. Immediately, food shortages started and prices escalated. A Jewish Council (Judenrat) was created in the village, headed by the community worker, Torno, and including the rabbi Hersh Groswaks. The Jewish Police (Jüdischer Ordnungsdienst) was also established; the policemen wore red armbands bearing the letters “OD.” The occupation authorities used the Judenrat to collect “contributions” and to organize forced labor assignments. Jews were forced to clean the streets and German dwellings. Several Zionist leaders were arrested and were not heard from again.³

Around October 1, 1941, the Germans conducted a first anti-Jewish Aktion in Brzeżany. According to one source, a number of Jews from Narajów were also shot at this time.⁴ In October 1941, several hundred Jews were moved to the village from Buczacz, bringing the number of Jews in Narajów to 1,100. The Jewish population then rose to 1,400 in April 1942 when Kreishauptmann Hans-Adolf Asbach sent an additional 300 Jews to Narajów from the capital of the Kreis in Brzeżany.⁵

Starting in the winter of 1941–1942 and continuing into the summer, a number of younger Jewish men and women were rounded up in Narajów and sent to work in various forced labor camps in the region. On September 21, 1942, at the time of Yom Kippur, the Germans conducted the first deportation Aktion in the village. As rumors were circulating at this time of a deportation Aktion in Brzeżany, many Jews fled to the woods to avoid being arrested. Then German Security Police, assisted by the Gendarmerie and Ukrainian policemen, rounded up several hundred Jews in Narajów and transported them on trucks to Brzeżany. From there they were subsequently deported by train to the Bełżec extermination camp.⁶

After this Aktion, the remaining 500 or so Jews were moved into an open ghetto (Judenviertel) in Narajów.⁷ In November 1942, the Higher SS and Police Leader (HSSPF) for the Generalgouvernement, Friedrich Wilhelm Krüger, restricted the number of towns in Distrikt Galizien in which Jews could reside (within Jewish residential areas or ghettos) to around 30, including Brzeżany but not Narajów.⁸ As a result, most Jews in Narajów were forced to move to Brzeżany by early December, although a few necessary workers remained, together with a number of Jews in hiding. The Germans conducted another large deportation Aktion from Brzeżany on December 4–5 during which several hundred Jews from Narajów were probably also deported to Bełżec.⁹

Narajów was now officially “cleansed of Jews” (judenrein), but at least 100 Jews continued to reside there, many of them illegally. In mid-December 1942, the German Security Police official Willi Hermann of the Tarnopol Gestapo came to Narajów and, together with the Ukrainian police, organized a hunt for Jews. As a result, more than 70 Jews were collected in the house of Mendel Herc, next to the Ukrainian Auxiliary Police station. Hermann then selected all the women, children, and elderly and shot them at the Jewish cemetery.¹⁰

The fate of the few remaining Jewish workers in Narajów is not known, but by the spring of 1943, there were probably no more Jews residing there. A few Jews managed to escape to the surrounding countryside and hide with non-Jewish acquaintances. Ukrainian nationalist partisans as well as the Ukrainian police continued to hunt them down, however, until the end of the German occupation. According to one account, in March 1944, a bunker was discovered by Ukrainian partisans near Narajów, and they murdered the 51 Jews who had been hiding there.

At the end of the occupation, only just over a dozen Jews from Narajów emerged from hiding, to be joined by a few dozen more who had survived the war in the Red Army or in the Soviet interior.

SOURCES Information about the persecution and destruction of the Jews of Narajów can be found in the following publications: “Narajow,” in Danuta Dabrowska, Abraham Wein, and Aharon Weiss, eds., Pinkas ha-kehillot. Encyclopaedia of Jewish Communities: Poland, vol. 2, Eastern Galicia (Jerusalem: Yad Vashem, 1980), pp. 332–333; and Menachem Katz, ed., Brzezany, Narajow ve-baseviva: Toldot kehillot sbenebrevu (Haifa: Association of Former Residents of Brzezany, Narajow and Vicinity, 1978).

Relevant documentation can be found in the following archives: AŻIH (301/879); BA-L (B 162/4135); DATO; GARF (7021-75-370); USHMM (e.g., RG-15.084M [301/879]); VHF (e.g., # 2356); and YVA.

Alexander Kruglov and Martin Dean
trans. Kathleen Luft

NOTES

1. “Narajow,” in Dabrowska, Wein, and Weiss, Pinkas ha-kehillot: Poland, vol. 2, Eastern Galicia, p. 332.

2. Ibid.

3. Ibid.

4. Dieter Pohl, Nationalsozialistische Judenverfolgung in Ostgalizien 1941–1944 (Munich: Oldenbourg, 1996), p. 111 n387.

5. Tatiana Berenstein, “Eksterminacja ludności żydowskiej w dystrykcie Galicja (1941–1943),” BŻIH, no. 61 (1967): 18 (table 2); Katz, Brzezany, Narajow ve-baseviva, p. 24 [English].

6. BA-L, B 162/4135 (208 AR-Z 76/1961, vol. 6), pp. 1066–1067, statement of Szymon Ehre, January 27, 1966, and p. 1083, statement of Sima Kwodi (née Hochberg), January 28, 1966. The latter witness states that only about 350 Jews were taken.

7. Ibid., B 162/4135, pp. 1081–1082, Kwodi statement.

8. Polizeiverordnung des HSSPF Krüger über die Errichtung jüdischer Wohnbezirke, November 10, 1942, in Verordnungsblatt des Generalgouvernements, November 11, 1942;

AŻIH, 301/879, testimony of Mojżesz Kin, mentions moving from Narajów to Brzezany at some time in the fall of 1942.

9. Berenstein, “Eksterminacja,” p. 18 (table 2); Katz, Brzezany, Narajow ve-baseviva, pp. 328–329.

10. BA-L, B 162/4135, pp. 1068–1069, Ehre statement, and pp. 1086–1088, Kwodi statement.

PODHAJCE

Pre-1939: Podhajce, town, powiat center, Tarnopol województwo, Poland; 1939–1941: Podgaitsy, raion center, Ternopol’ oblast’, Ukrainian SSR; 1941–1944: Podhajce, Kreis Brzezany, Distrikt Galizien, Generalgouvernement; post-1991: Pidbaitsi, raion center, Ternopil’ oblast’, Ukraine

Podhajce is located 45 kilometers (28 miles) southwest of Tarnopol. The 1931 census recorded 3,129 Jews living in the town. Under Soviet rule, from September 1939 until July 1941, most businesses were nationalized, and all political activity was suppressed. A number of wealthy Jews were exiled to Siberia. At the end of June 1941, just prior to the arrival of the Germans, an attempted uprising by some of the members of the Organization of Ukrainian Nationalists (OUN) was quashed by the Soviet People’s Commissariat of Internal Affairs (NKVD).

Podhajce was occupied by German forces on July 4, 1941. It was under military administration until August 1, 1941, when authority was transferred to a German civil administration. Podhajce became a part of Kreis Brzezany, within Distrikt Galizien. The Kreishauptmann in Brzezany from November 1941 to early 1943 was Hans-Adolf Asbach; he was succeeded by Dr. Werner Becker. Subordinated to the Kreishauptmann in each Kreis were several Landkommissare. The Landkommissar in Podhajce was Johannes Tkaczyk.

Anti-Jewish Aktions in Podhajce were organized and carried out by the branch office of the Security Police (Sipo-Aussendienststelle) in Tarnopol, which was headed by SS-Sturmabführer Hermann Müller, from October 1941 to May 1943, and by SS-Hauptsturmführer Wilhelm Krüger, from June 1943 to March 1944. The German Criminal Police (Kripo) and Gendarmerie both had offices in Podhajce, as did the Ukrainian Auxiliary Police (Ukrainische Hilfspolizei). All these forces played an active role in implementing the anti-Jewish measures and Aktions.

On July 13, 1941, just nine days after the occupation of the town, antisemitic Ukrainian nationalists launched a pogrom in the course of which many Jews were beaten and robbed. That same month, a Jewish Council (Judenrat) was established under the chairmanship of L. Lilienfeld, and the Jewish Police (Jüdischer Ordnungsdienst) was formed as an executive organ of the Judenrat. On August 10, 1941, a “contribution” of 500,000 rubles and additional valuables was imposed on the Jews. In addition, the Jewish Council had to make available to the German and Ukrainian administration daily a large quota of Jews to perform various types of forced labor. The Jewish community also had to supply newly arrived German officials with furniture, clothes, and dishes.

The period from August 1941 until September 1942 remained relatively quiet for Podhajce's Jews. There were no killings and only occasional selections of young and healthy Jewish men for labor camps. For example, from the fall of 1941, the Jewish Council received repeated demands, which resulted in the selection of several hundred young Jews to be sent to labor camps, including those in Borki Wielkie, Kamionki, and Hłuboczek Wielki. The members of the Jewish Council maintained contact with them, supplying them with food and clothing. They also tried to get released those who fell sick.

On September 21, 1942 (Yom Kippur), a detachment of the Security Police from Tarnopol, together with the German Gendarmerie and the Ukrainian police, carried out a deportation Aktion in Podhajce. During the Aktion, more than 1,000 Jews were arrested and deported by train to the Bełżec extermination camp, and about 50 Jews were shot in the Jewish cemetery. A few Jews managed to escape from the moving cattle cars. Those who managed to avoid the bullets of the escorting guards made their way back to Podhajce.¹

After the September 1942 deportation Aktion, a ghetto (Jewish residential area) was established in Podhajce.² The ghetto consisted of a number of houses on a few narrow streets in the poorest part of town, between Halishka Street and Bjejonska Street. At this time Jews were permitted to leave the ghetto for a few hours, once a week, to visit the market with a police escort. All the Jews wore armbands, but some removed them and sneaked out of the ghetto to barter items for food with the local peasants. The ghetto was very overcrowded, with several families being forced to share each small dwelling. This overcrowding soon led to the spread of typhus.³ Anticipating the next Aktion, many Jews prepared bunkers inside the ghetto or sought hiding places in the surrounding forests. In a second Aktion, on October 30, 1942, more than 1,200 Jews were deported to Bełżec, and several dozen Jews were killed on the spot. Reportedly, there were cases of Jews who had to suffocate their infants to prevent the child's crying from revealing their hiding places to policemen searching the ghetto.

In the fall of 1942, the Jews from the neighboring villages were resettled into Podhajce, including from the nearby village of Zawałów.⁴ One witness recalled that the Judenrat in Zawałów announced that everyone would be resettled. The Jews then traveled for two hours in horses and carts to the Podhajce ghetto, escorted by Jewish Police.⁵

According to the decree issued by the Höherer SS- und Polizeiführer (HSSPF) in the Generalgouvernement, SS-Obergruppenführer Friedrich Wilhelm Krüger, the Jewish residential area in Podhajce was officially converted into an enclosed ghetto by December 1942.⁶ By this time, the ghetto was enclosed by a wooden fence topped with barbed wire, and those Jews with specialist labor tasks for the Germans were moved into a separate labor camp outside the ghetto. There were about 2,500 Jews in Podhajce at this time. In the winter of 1942–1943, there were daily deaths from hunger and disease in the ghetto. On April 12, 1943, 40 to 50 sick Jews were shot in the Jewish cemetery.⁷

On June 6, 1943, a detachment of Security Police from Tarnopol, assisted by the German Gendarmerie and Ukrainian policemen, liquidated the ghetto. The labor camp was also liquidated around this time. That day, 1,070 Jews were shot in two pits near the village of Stare Miasto.⁸ To lure out of hiding those Jews still in the ghetto, it was announced that they would all be resettled to Tarnopol. The Jews collected with the help of this ruse—750 in all—were shot by the Gendarmerie and the Ukrainian police on June 8. The mass shooting took place near the village of Zahajce.⁹ Only 21 Jews, who were on a list prepared by the Judenrat, were selected out from the group and escorted to Tarnopol by Ukrainian policemen.¹⁰

After the liquidation of the ghetto, the Gendarmerie and Ukrainian police carried out systematic searches for hidden Jews. The Jews who were caught were then shot in the Jewish cemetery. In all, some 300 additional Jews were shot in the Jewish cemetery in the months following July 1943.¹¹

Several hundred Jews were able to escape from the ghetto and hide in the woods. Some were killed in 1943–1944 by detachments of the Ukrainian Insurgent Army (UPA). When Podhajce was finally liberated on July 21, 1944, only about 50 Jews returned.

Altogether, probably around 2,500 Jews died of hunger or disease or were killed in Podhajce and the surrounding area between 1941 and 1944. At least 2,200 more were deported to the Bełżec extermination camp.

The ghetto youth organized a group whose main purpose was to gather ammunition for self-defense and to send people out of the ghetto to the forest. They planned to build bunkers in the forests near the village of Zawałów. After many difficulties, the group, led by Israel Zilber, obtained some pistols and rifles, and some managed to escape in time. In December 1943, Zilber's group assisted Jews who were hiding in the forest and tried to supply them with food.

Some Jews were saved by members of a Christian sect that observes Saturday as the Sabbath, who lived near Podhajce. Among those who helped and rescued Jews while risking their own lives was Lev Blicharvski.

Hermann Müller was sentenced to life in prison on July 15, 1966, in Stuttgart. He died in 1988. Johannes Nowotsch, the former chief of the Gendarmerie post in Podhajce, was sentenced to five years in prison.¹²

SOURCES Information regarding the persecution and murder of the Jewish population of Podhajce can be found in the following publications: A. Milch, "Moje przeżycia podczas wojny," Fun letstn churbn (Munich), no. 3 (1946); Encyclopaedia Judaica, vol. 13 (Jerusalem: Keter, 1972); M.Sh. Geshuri, ed., Sefer Podhaysah (Tel Aviv: Irgun yots'e Podhaysah vehasevivah be-Yisrael, 1972); Danuta Dabrowska, Abraham Wein, and Aharon Weiss, eds., Pinkas ha-kehillot. Encyclopaedia of Jewish Communities: Poland, vol. 2, Eastern Galicia (Jerusalem: Yad Vashem, 1980), pp. 410–414—a translation can be found on JewishGen; A. Kruglov, Katastrofa ukraińskiego evreistva 1941–1944. Entsiklopedicheskii spravochnik (Kharkov: Karavella, 2001), pp. 258–259; and Guy Miron, ed., The Yad Vashem Encyclopedia of the Ghettos during the Holocaust (Jerusalem: Yad Vashem, 2010), pp. 604–605.

Relevant documentation can be found in these archives: AŻIH (301/4722); BA-L (ZStL 208 AR-Z 294/59, 208 AR-Z 76/61, 208 AR 797/66); BWSL (EL 317 III, Bü 1408); DATO; GARF (7021-75-10); LG-Hamb ([90]4/75); USHMM; VHF (e.g., # 8815, 16377, 22069); and YVA.

Alexander Kruglov and Martin Dean
trans. Ray Brandon

NOTES

1. Milch, “Moje przeżycia podczas wojny,” pp. 65–66; Verdict of LG-Stutt, Ks 7/64, in the case against Paul Raebel and others, July 15, 1966, published in Justiz und NS-Verbrechen, vol. 24 (Amsterdam: Amsterdam University Press, 1998), Lfd. Nr. 634, pp. 39, 81; GARF, 7021-75-10, p. 48.

2. Geshuri, Sefer Podbaitasab, p. 244; BA-L, B 162/4136 (ZStL 208 76/61), p. 1323, testimony of Hella Epstein, March 9, 1966. Some sources, however, date the establishment of an open ghetto from the spring of 1942; see VHF, # 8815; testimony of Mathilda DeMayo (born 1921).

3. Geshuri, Sefer Podbaitasab, p. 244; VHF, # 8815; and # 22069, testimony of Minne Blumenfeld (born 1914).

4. Milch, “Moje przeżycia,” pp. 65–66.

5. VHF, # 22069.

6. Police Decree issued by HSSPF Krüger of the Generalgouvernement, November 10, 1942, published in Tatiana Berenstein et al., eds., Faschismus, Getto, Massenmord: Dokumentation über Ausrottung und Widerstand der Juden in Polen während des zweiten Weltkrieges (Berlin: Rütten & Loening, 1961), pp. 344–345.

7. GARF, 7021-75-10, pp. 52, 55.

8. Ibid., pp. 1, 211.

9. Ibid., p. 1; LG-Hamb (90) 4/75, verdict of May 17, 1976.

10. BA-L, B 162/4136, p. 1328.

11. GARF, 7021-75-10, p. 1.

12. Justiz und NS-Verbrechen, vol. 41 (Amsterdam: Amsterdam University Press, 2009), Lfd. Nr. 832.

PRZEMYŚLANY

Pre-1939: Przemyślany, town, powiat center, Tarnopol województwo, Poland; 1939–1941: Peremyshlany, raion center, L'viv oblast', Ukrainian SSR; 1941–1944: Przemyślany, Kreis Zloczow, Distrikt Galizien, Generalgouvernement; post-1991: Peremyshlany, raion center, L'viv oblast', Ukraine

Przemyślany is located about 40 kilometers (25 miles) east-southeast of Lwów. In June 1941, there were probably at least 2,600 Jews in Przemyślany, including a number of Jewish refugees who had arrived from western Poland in the fall of 1939.

German forces occupied Przemyślany on July 1, 1941. At first, a military commandant's office (Ortskommandantur) ran the town, but in August 1941 power was transferred to a German civil administration. Przemyślany became part of Kreis Zloczow, within Distrikt Galizien. Regierungsassessor Hans Mann became the Kreishauptmann. Dr. Otto Wendt replaced him at the beginning of 1943. The Kommandeur der Sicherheitspolizei (Commanding Officer of the Security Police and SD, KdS) in Lwów and the Kriminalkommissariat (Criminal Police office) in Złoczów, which was headed by Otto Zikmund, organized the anti-Jewish Aktions in Przemyślany.

An outpost of the Kriminalpolizei (Kripo) and a German Gendarmerie post were established in Przemyślany. Locally, the Ukrainian Auxiliary Police (Ukrainische Hilfspolizei) was formed, which also played an active role in all the measures taken against the Jews.

Local Ukrainian nationalist antisemites carried out a pogrom on July 4, 1941. An unknown number of Jews were burned alive in a synagogue, and many Jews were assaulted and robbed.¹

During the summer of 1941, a Jewish Council (Judenrat) was formed in Przemyślany on the orders of the German authorities; it had to ensure that all Jews were registered and wearing the required armbands bearing the Star of David. The German authorities confiscated a considerable amount of Jewish property and most valuable items. The Jews were required to perform forced labor for little or no pay.

On November 5, 1941, the first Aktion was carried out in Przemyślany. The German forces shot around 400 Jews who were unable to work.² The shooting was probably carried out by a detachment of Security Police from Tarnopol, assisted by a Gendarmerie unit that had arrived from Distrikt Warschau.

At some time during 1942, Kreishauptmann Mann ordered the formation of a “Jewish residential district” (Jüdischer Wohnbezirk—an open ghetto) in Przemyślany. Jews living outside the designated area had to move into more cramped conditions within it, and it also became a collecting point for Jews from the smaller surrounding communities. The ghetto comprised much of the town but did not include the main square, on which both the German police headquarters and the Judenrat building sat. Jews were only permitted to leave the Jewish residential district if the authorities directed them to perform specific tasks outside.³

A contemporary diary, written by Samuel Golfard, describing events in the open ghetto gives the impression that everyday control was in the hands of the Judenrat and the Jewish Police, but periodically the Germans and their Ukrainian auxiliaries would come in during the Aktions and deportations to wreak havoc.⁴ In May 1942, another Aktion was conducted in Przemyślany, which claimed more than 100 Jewish lives.⁵

In September 1942,⁶ the German Security Police organized a large-scale deportation Aktion. Nearly two thirds of the Jews of Przemyślany—almost 3,000 people—were seized and deported to the extermination camp in Bełżec. The German Gendarmerie, Ukrainian Auxiliary Police, and Jewish Police also participated in the Aktion.

After this deportation Aktion, additional Jews from nearby villages and towns, including Gliniany and Swirz, were resettled to Przemyślany.⁷ According to the Gliniany yizkor book, the Jewish Council in Gliniany tried to bribe German officials in Złoczów to establish a ghetto in Gliniany to avoid the cruel fate of resettlement. This was denied, but when the Jews left Gliniany for Przemyślany and other nearby ghettos, Ukrainians robbed them of their property on the way.⁸ Other Jews even returned to the Przemyślany ghetto after jumping from the railcars destined for Bełżec.

In early November 1942, the Germans conducted another smaller Aktion in Przemyślany, concurrent with a large Aktion in Złoczów. According to the Samuel Golfard diary, Złoczów fell short in its quota by about 200 victims, and the Jews of Przemyślany had to make up this deficit.⁹

According to the order issued on November 10, 1942, by the Higher SS and Police Leader (HSSPF) in the Generalgouvernement, SS-Obergruppenführer Friedrich Wilhelm Krüger, the Jewish ghetto in Przemyślany was to be transformed after December 1, 1942, into an enclosed area, completely isolated from the outside world.¹⁰ The Jews concentrated in the ghetto suffered from a severe shortage of water, as only two wells were available to them. Many Jews prepared bunkers or other hiding places, in anticipation of the next Aktion.

Several sources refer to a further deportation Aktion on December 5, 1942. According to the Golfard diary, the Aktion occurred after two months of relative “peace” in which the Jews from the countryside were brought in:

The number of Jewish militiamen parading with their rubber truncheons was increased fivefold. The trapped Jews of the vicinity paid fantastic sums to the Jewish Council and the militia for living quarters knowing that they were getting shelter for a few days only. “We are paying slaughter fees,” they said with tears in their eyes. At last, all were crammed into narrow, dirty huts, into spat-upon holes. After the ghetto had been sealed, an SS commander named Ludwig arrived from Lwów on an inspection tour. He surveyed the fenced-in ghetto with satisfaction, saluted the Jewish militiamen guarding the exit, and then drove away. Two days later a massacre took place in which 2,400 people perished, 600 of whom were killed on the spot in the ghetto.¹¹

Meyer Kanner, who only arrived in the ghetto on December 2, just as it was sealed, went to hide in a bunker packed with people after only three days, as soon as the Aktion started. He and his family remained there for two to three days and then escaped to the woods, as they believed that the town would be completely “cleansed” of Jews.¹² In fact the ghetto was reduced in size but continued to exist for several more months. The specialist workers, who had been issued with distinctive armbands bearing the letters “R” and “W,” were transferred to enclosed barracks outside the ghetto. During the winter of 1942–1943, a few hundred Jews died in the ghetto from hunger and disease. On May 22, 1943, the ghetto was liquidated, and 2,000 people were shot inside the ghetto or in the woods nearby. This Aktion lasted for more than a week, as the Germans repeatedly searched the ghetto in an effort to uncover all the hiding places.¹³ This final Aktion was carried out by a company of the 1st Battalion, Police Regiment 23, assisted by the Ukrainian police.¹⁴

On March 21, 1943, a Jewish labor prison camp was established in Przemyślany, similar to the one in Kurowice.¹⁵ SS-Unterscharführer Karl Kempka became the commandant of the camp. The prisoners worked in quarries and on the construction of roads. The camp was liquidated on June 28, 1943.¹⁶ Then 250 women were shot, and 200 men were sent to the camp in Kurowice.¹⁷

A few of the escapees from the ghetto survived in the surrounding forests or in hiding with local peasants until the arrival of the Red Army in 1944. However, many were captured and killed by the German and Ukrainian police in the months after the liquidation of the ghetto.

Otto Zikmund was extradited to the Soviet Union in 1949, where he was tried. He died in prison.

SOURCES Information on the persecution and murder of the Jews in Przemyślany during the German occupation can be found in the following publications: Danuta Dabrowska, Abraham Wein, and Aharon Weiss, eds., Pinkas ha-kehillot. Encyclopaedia of Jewish Communities: Poland, vol. 2, Eastern Galicia (Jerusalem: Yad Vashem, 1980), pp. 440–443; Guy Miron, ed., The Yad Vashem Encyclopedia of the Ghettos during the Holocaust (Jerusalem: Yad Vashem, 2010), pp. 620–621; and DDR-Justiz und NS-Verbrechen, vol. 5 (Amsterdam: Amsterdam University Press, 2002), Lfd. Nr. 1224, pp. 307ff.

In addition, there is a manuscript describing events in Przemyślany, the Golfard diary in Wendy Lower, The Diary of Samuel Golfard and the Holocaust in Galicia (Lanham, MD: AltaMira Press in association with the United States Holocaust Memorial Museum, 2011).

Relevant documentation can be found in the following archives: AŻIH (301/808, 1136, 1701, 2482, and 5753); DALO; GARF (7021-67-82); USHMM (e.g., RG-17.003M, reel 98); VHF (e.g., # 9289, 26616, 50384); and YVA.

Alexander Kruglov and Wendy Lower
trans. Steven Seegel

NOTES

1. AŻIH, 301/5753, testimony of Józef Kolabiński.
2. Ibid.
3. BWSL, Ludwigsburg, EL 317 III, LG-Stutt, Ks 5/65, statement of L.M. on April 29, 1963, as cited by Dieter Pohl, Nationalsozialistische Judenverfolgung in Ostgalizien 1941–1944. Organisation und Durchführung eines staatlichen Massenverbrechens, 2nd ed. (Munich: R. Oldenbourg Verlag 1997), pp. 157–158, dates the formation of an “open ghetto” in early 1942. Survivor testimonies generally date its formation at some time between March and October 1942; e.g., VHF, # 9289, testimony of Regina Peterseil; # 50384, testimony of Yetta Lewinter.
4. Lower, The Diary of Samuel Golfard.
5. AŻIH, 301/5753.
6. Ibid., 301/2483 and 5753.

7. Tatiana Berenstein, “Eksterminacja ludności żydowskiej w dystrykcie Galicja (1941–1943),” BŻIH, no. 61 (1967), table 12. There were 411 Jews living in the village of Swirz in January 1942 and around 1,600 Jews in Gliniany by June 1942.

8. Hurbm Gliniane (New York: Emergency Relief Committee for Gliniany and Vicinity, 1946), pp. 260–261.

9. Lower, The Diary of Samuel Gelfard. The dating of the Aktion is from the verdict of LG-Stutt, Ks 5/65, April 29, 1968, against Roeder et al., published in Justiz und NS-Verbrechen, vol. 27 (Amsterdam: Amsterdam University Press, 2003), Lfd. Nr. 671, p. 704.

10. Dabrowska, Wein, and Weiss, Pinkas ha-kehilot: Poland, vol. 2, Eastern Galicia, p. 442.

11. Lower, The Diary of Samuel Gelfard.

12. VHF, # 26616, testimony of Mayer Kanner, dates the “ghetto liquidation” in January 1943.

13. Iu. Shuk’meister, Sovest’ i beschest’e (L’vov, 1984), p. 71; AŻIH, 301/2482.

14. Pohl, Nationalsozialistische Judenverfolgung, pp. 257–258.

15. E. Iones, Evrei L’vova v gody vtoroi mirovoi voyny i katastrofy evropeiskogo evreistva 1939–1944 [trans. and ed. from Hebrew by S. Shenbrunn] (Moscow, 1999), p. 231. According to another source, the camp was created at the end of 1942. See Berenstein, “Eksterminacja,” table 12.

16. Tatiana Berenstein, “Praca przymusowa ludności żydowskiej w tzw. dystrykcie Galicja,” BŻIH, no. 69 (1969): 45.

17. Iones, Evrei L’vova, p. 231. See Berenstein, “Eksterminacja,” table 12.

RADZIECHÓW

Pre-1939: Radziechów, town, powiat center, Tarnopol województwo, Poland; 1939–1941: Radekhov, raion center, L’vov oblast’, Ukrainian SSR; 1941–1944: Radziechow, Kreis Kamionka Strumilowa, Distrikt Galizien, Generalgouvernement; post-1991: Radekhiv, raion center, L’viv oblast’, Ukraine

Radziechów is located about 65 kilometers (40 miles) northeast of Lwów. According to the 1921 population census, 1,977 Jews were living in the town. By the middle of 1941, there were probably around 2,100 Jews in Radziechów.

German forces entered Radziechów on June 24, 1941, just two days after the start of the German invasion of the Soviet Union. Initially, a German military commandant’s office (Ortskommandantur) administered the town. At the start of the German occupation, four Jews, who were alleged to have been Soviet activists, were tortured and murdered.

In August 1941, power was transferred into the hands of a German civil administration. Radziechów was incorporated into Kreis Kamionka Strumilowa, within Distrikt Galizien. The first Kreishauptmann was SS-Untersturmführer Wilhelm Rebay von Ehrenwiesen. He was succeeded in June 1942 by his deputy, SS-Untersturmführer Joachim Nehring.

The anti-Jewish Aktions in Radziechów were organized and carried out by the branch of the Security Police (Sipo-Aussendienststelle) in Sokal, which was subordinated to the Kommandeur der Sipo und des SDs (KdS) in Lwów. The Sipo-Aussendienststelle in Sokal was headed from October 1941 to May 1942 by SS-Sturmbannführer Hans Block; and from May 1942 to October 1943, by SS-Obersturmführer Oswald Heyduk.

A German Gendarmerie post and a detachment of the Ukrainian Auxiliary Police (Ukrainische Hilfspolizei) were established in Radziechów itself. They both played an active part in the roundup and deportation of Jews from Radziechów.

In the summer of 1941, the number of Jews in Radziechów increased, due to the arrival of around 500 Jews from the village of Chołojów. These Jews from Chołojów had lost their homes to German bombardments.¹ In August 1941, the German authorities ordered the creation of a Jewish Council (Judenrat) in Radziechów, which was headed by Albert Kranz. Much Jewish property was seized or confiscated from the Jews of Radziechów, especially any items of value. All Jews were required to register with the authorities, and they had to perform forced labor. In the fall and winter of 1941–1942, a number of able-bodied Jews were sent away to work in forced labor camps, including the camp at Pluhów.

Information regarding the ghetto in Radziechów is somewhat contradictory. According to the recollections of survivor Mark Halpern, an open ghetto was established there at the beginning of 1942. All the Jews were forced to live together on one or two streets. There was no fence, and there were no guards around the ghetto, but the Jews were not permitted to leave the ghetto area. The Jews wore armbands and lived in overcrowded conditions—some people had to sleep on the floor. There was no schooling for the children, and Halpern also does not recall any medical care. The Jews of Radziechów were able to obtain some flour or potatoes by purchase or barter from the local population. He recalls that the food was smuggled in at night.²

In the summer and fall of 1942, the Jews from many of the surrounding villages were concentrated in Radziechów in a series of resettlement operations.³ Sonia Kaplan was among them. She recalls that the Germans “cleared out a couple of streets and Jews from the surrounding area congregated here as well.” Sonia and her family were allotted one room to live in—and everyone was afraid of the word Aktion. Sonia and her brother dug a hole under the floorboards to hide when that day came. When the Aktions finally started, Sonia and her brother hid in that hole and survived the roundup.⁴

Starting in the fall of 1942, Jews were deported from Radziechów in successive large-scale Aktions. During the first Aktion on September 15, 1942, about 1,400 Jews were deported to the extermination camp in Bełżec.⁵ According to testimony given at the Eichmann trial by Dr. Wells, part of his family was taken in 1942 just before Yom Kippur (September 21) from the village of Stojanów to Radziechów: “There they sat at the railway station for two days and two nights without any food . . . and then they were packed into railway wagons and sent away to Bełżec.”⁶

On September 21, 1942, around 500 Jews from Radziechów were taken to Kamionka Strumilowa, where they were shot together with Jews from other places, including Chołojów and Busk.⁷ A description of how the men were rounded up can be found in the town's yizkor book. Leon Shrage reports that after the first Aktion in Radziechów, the remaining Jews, both old and young, hid themselves in cellars or outside the town. When the Jews no longer came to work, the German authorities announced on placards that all Jews should assemble at the square on Yom Kippur to have their identity cards stamped. Anyone caught without such a stamp thereafter would face the death penalty. The Jews were unsure what to do, and about 480 people reported as requested. They were then escorted out of the town in a marching column guarded only by five Ukrainians and four Germans. According to Shrage, word went around the column for the Jews to overpower their guards and scatter, as they feared they were being taken to their deaths; but the rabbi, who was in the column, argued against it, urging his fellow Jews to have faith that God would protect them. Shrage then managed to escape from the column as it left the town.⁸

Joseph de Shrage, whose sister, father, and brother were among those escorted out of town that day, reports that the column was marched about 48 kilometers (30 miles), picking up additional Jews from other places on the way. His family members managed to bribe one of the guards and escaped. The others were shot into a large pit near Kamionka Strumiłowa. Some of the victims were only wounded, and Joseph de Shrage subsequently learned about the killing from one of the Jews who managed to climb out and escape.⁹

According to Pinkas ha-kehillot, the Germans only established a ghetto in Radziechów at the beginning of October 1942. This is confirmed by Joseph de Shrage, who notes that at around this time, after the first two Aktions, they "started to make a ghetto in Radziechów."¹⁰ The ghetto contained Jewish craftsmen who had been selected out from the deportations and also other Jews who had been brought to Radziechów. Shortly after the ghetto's establishment, on October 7, 1942, 1,000 more Jews from Radziechów were deported to Bełżec.¹¹ Around this time a number of Jews from Witków Nowy were also brought to Radziechów.

Sonia Kaplan recalls that after the roundups life in the ghetto deteriorated rapidly. The Germans decided that the ghetto area was too big and reduced it by half. Sonia and her family now had to live in a kitchen, which they shared with 20 other people. The only thing people cared about was food. People were dying from starvation. The ghetto was enclosed by a wooden fence and a gate, which was guarded. There was no soup kitchen in the ghetto, and the only people who ate were those who dug out beets for the Germans outside the ghetto. Those who could not work (the young, old, and sick) had no food and were dying daily.¹²

After the three large Aktions, most of the remaining 500 Jews in Radziechów were resettled to the recently established ghetto in Sokal at the end of October 1942.¹³

Around 100 Jews then remained in Radziechów, charged by the Germans with sorting former Jewish property. The Germans shot this last group in the Poczaków Forest on March 15, 1943.

A number of Jews fled from Radziechów during the Aktions and sought shelter in the surrounding countryside.

Many of these Jews were subsequently denounced or caught by German patrols. Some survived with the aid of non-Jewish local acquaintances. Sala Bernsohn managed to survive two liquidation Aktions hidden in a shelter and then obtained Aryan papers and moved to Lwów.¹⁴

The Soviet army drove the Germans from the region in July 1944.

SOURCES Publications on the history of the Jewish population of Radziechów include G. Kressel, ed., Sefer zikaron le-kehillot Radikbov (Tel Aviv: Society of Radikbov, Lopatyn, and Vicinity, 1976); and Danuta Dabrowska, Abraham Wein, and Aharon Weiss, eds., Pinkas ha-kehillot. Encyclopaedia of Jewish Communities: Poland, vol. 2, Eastern Galicia (Jerusalem: Yad Vashem, 1980), pp. 496–498. The ghetto in Radziechów is also mentioned in Dieter Pohl, Nationalsozialistische Judenverfolgung in Ostgalizien 1941–1944 (Munich: Oldenbourg, 1996), p. 289; and in Handbuch der Lager, Gefängnisse und Ghettos auf dem besetzten Territorium der Ukraine (1941–1944) (Kiev: Staatskomitee der Archiven der Ukraine, 2000), p. 111.

Relevant documentation concerning the destruction of the Jews of Radziechów can be found in the following archives: AŻIH (301/826, 1688, 4115, and 4855); BA-L (ZStL, 208 AR 1340/67); DALO; GARF (7021-67-82); VHF (e.g., # 955, 16070, and 44393); and YVA.

Martin Dean and Alexander Kruglov
trans. Steven Seegel

NOTES

1. Tatiana Berenstein, "Eksterminacja ludności żydowskiej w dystrykcie Galicja (1941–1943)," BŻIH, no. 61 (1967), table 5.
2. VHF, # 44393, testimony of Mark Halpern.
3. Berenstein, "Eksterminacja," table 5.
4. VHF, # 955, testimony of Sonia Kaplan.
5. Berenstein, "Eksterminacja," table 5.
6. Eichmann Trial, Session No. 23, May 2, 1961, as cited on www.nizkor.org.
7. Berenstein, "Eksterminacja," table 5; Urteil LG-Stad, August 24, 1981 (10 Ks 9 Js 544/64 [29/78] gegen J. Nehring); AŻIH, 301/4855.
8. Leon Shrage, "Meyne iberlebnishn," in Kressel, Sefer zikaron le-kehillot Radikbov, pp. 100–104.
9. VHF, # 16070, testimony of Joseph de Shrage.
10. Ibid.
11. Yitzhak Arad, Belzec, Sobibor, Treblinka: The Operation Reinhard Death Camps (Bloomington: Indiana University Press, 1987), p. 385.
12. VHF, # 955.
13. GARF, 7021- 67-82, p. 82.
14. AŻIH, 301/4115, testimony of Sala Bernsohn.

RAWA RUSKA

Pre-1939: Rawa Ruska, town, Niemirów powiat, Lwów województwo, Poland; 1939–1941: Rawa-Ruskaia, raion center, L'vov oblast', Ukrainian SSR; 1941–1944: Rawa Ruska, Kreis center, Distrikt Galizien, Generalgouvernement; post-1991: Rawa-Rus'ka, Zhovkva raion, L'viv oblast', Ukraine

Rawa Ruska is located about 50 kilometers (31 miles) north-northwest of Lwów. There were 7,120 Jews in Rawa Ruska on the eve of World War II.

German forces occupied Rawa Ruska in late June 1941, during the first days of the German invasion. Due to war operations, 125 houses were destroyed and others severely damaged; 400 Jewish families were rendered homeless.¹

In July 1941, a military commandant's headquarters (Ortskommandantur) governed the town. On August 1, 1941, Rawa Ruska became the center of Kreis Rawa Ruska, within Distrikt Galizien. The Kreishauptmann was Dr. Hans-Walter Zinser until March 1942, and then in April, Gerhard Hager succeeded him. There was also a German Gendarmerie post in Rawa Ruska, a Criminal Police (Kripo) outpost, and a detachment of local Ukrainian Auxiliary Police (Ukrainische Hilfspolizei). The Kripo outpost was subordinate to the Sicherheitspolizei-Aussendienststelle (Sipo outpost) in Sokal, which was headed by SS-Obersturmführer Oswald Heyduk. Generally, a squad of Security Police from Sokal, with the assistance of the German Gendarmerie and Ukrainian policemen, carried out the anti-Jewish Aktions in Rawa Ruska.

In early July 1941, more than 100 Jews were arrested and shot as alleged Communists. In the summer and fall of 1941, a series of anti-Jewish measures was implemented in Rawa Ruska: Jews were required to wear distinctive armbands bearing the Star of David; those aged between 16 and 60 were compelled to engage in forced labor for low pay; they were forbidden to leave the town; and they were subjected to systematic robberies and beatings. As in other large towns, a Jewish Council (Judenrat) was created in Rawa Ruska almost immediately, headed initially by a German Jew named Schweitzer. Additionally, the occupiers ordered the creation of a Jewish Council for the Kreis (Kreisjudenrat), which could give orders to the other Jewish Councils in neighboring settlements. In total, some 22,000 Jews resided in Kreis Rawa Ruska, including the communities of Lubaczów, Niemirów, and Uhnów. The first head of the Judenrat, Schweitzer, is accused by some survivors of abusing his power, robbing people and sending them to their deaths. He was killed and replaced soon after the arrival of Kreishauptmann Hager in 1942.²

In November 1941, the Judenrat reported that there were 7,400 Jews residing in the town, including a number of refugees from Lwów and other places. Some 4,500 Jews were in need of social assistance, which consisted mainly of a soup kitchen that drained most of the community's remaining financial reserves. In addition, the Judenrat had to meet heavy contributions that the German authorities demanded and also pay the large number of forced laborers.³ In the winter of 1941–1942, the Jews had to surrender their fur clothing to the Germans, and several hundred able-bodied Jews were deported to forced labor camps. Jews suffered from hunger and cold, and some died.

The systematic destruction of the town's Jews began in the spring of 1942. The first Aktion took place on March 19, 1942,⁴ when approximately 1,000 Jews were arrested on the streets and from their homes and places of work and were deported to the Bełżec extermination camp, which was located about 20 kilometers (12.5 miles) northwest of Rawa Ruska.⁵

In late July 1942, a second anti-Jewish Aktion took place in the city. The first company of German Police Battalion 133 and 60 Ukrainian Auxiliary Police from Lwów, as well as the local Judenrat and the Jewish Police (Jüdischer Ordnungsdienst), took an active part in the Aktion, along with the local Gendarmerie and Ukrainian policemen.⁶ During the Aktion, another 2,000 Jews were deported to Bełżec; along with them were deported hundreds of Jews from Niemirów and Uhnów.⁷ The considerable number of trains containing Jews passing through Rawa Ruska in the summer of 1942, and the proximity to Bełżec itself, meant that the local community soon received a clear impression of the fate of the Jews throughout Distrikt Galizien.

A few weeks after the second Aktion, in August 1942, the Germans began to concentrate the Jewish population in Rawa Ruska, designating three streets in the poorest section of the town as an open ghetto (jüdisches Wohnviertel). In this area there was no electricity and only two wells.⁸ Then, in late September and early October 1942, Jews from Magierów, Niemirów, Uhnów, Potylicz, Lubycza Królewska, and other nearby places were transferred into the Rawa Ruska ghetto.⁹ In addition, a number of Jews who had escaped from the trains heading to Bełżec also sought refuge there. As a result, the number of Jews in the ghetto probably rose to around 10,000 or more.¹⁰

Abraham Schall, a survivor from Niemirów, has described the transfer to Rawa Ruska: "At the end of September, the Judenrat was instructed that all the Jews had to move to Rawa Ruska . . . by the following evening. We could take with us anything we wanted . . . but the people were plundered by the Gestapo and Ukrainian militia on the way. Nobody dared to remain in Niemirów. Two girls, who were discovered there after the deadline, were brought to Rawa Ruska and immediately shot."¹¹

Despite the new influx, the area of the ghetto was not increased at all. This led to tremendous overcrowding, with two or three families, between 20 and 30 people, living in each room. Together with the severe lack of food, water, warm clothing, and medicine, the appalling living conditions soon led to a large-scale outbreak of typhus in the ghetto. About 10 to 20 people died daily from the disease. In late 1942, probably at the start of December, the ghetto was declared closed. Jews were no longer permitted to leave the ghetto to go to their places of work. Fearing a further Aktion, many Jews prepared bunkers and other hiding places.¹²

In December 1942, the SS- und Polizeiführer (SSPF) in Distrikt Galizien, SS-Brigadeführer Friedrich Katzmann, used the severe typhus epidemic as a pretext for liquidating the ghetto. The liquidation Aktion took place on December 7–11, 1942, with the assistance of a squad of Security Police from Sokal, the German Gendarmerie, the Ukrainian Auxiliary Police, and the operational squad of the 5th Company of Police Regiment 24. In the report of June 30, 1943, prepared by SSPF Katzmann, the circumstances of the ghetto's liquidation are described as follows:

The Rawa Ruska Jews, fearing an evacuation, hid those who were ill with typhus in holes in the ground. When the evacuation was set to begin, it was discovered that 3,000 Jews, sick with typhus, were lying around in the ghetto. All police officials, who had been vaccinated for typhus, had to be called upon immediately to destroy the source of the infection. Thus, we were able to destroy this source of the plague, losing only one person in the process.¹³

During the liquidation Aktion, at least 5,000 Jews were shot on the spot, 2,500 were deported to Bełżec in four trains, and several hundred young Jews were deported to various labor camps.¹⁴ The operational squad of the 5th Company of Police Regiment 24 alone shot 750 Jews during the “cleansing” of the ghetto territory, according to its report dated December 12, 1942.¹⁵

After the liquidation of the ghetto, approximately 60 Jews were left alive in the town, housed in a separate barracks outside the ghetto, to bury those killed. Of those sent to the labor camps, some were returned to the town three weeks later; they were employed in collecting, organizing, and sorting property from Jewish houses and cleaning the territory of the former ghetto. Aside from these “legal” Jews, about 250 to 300 illegal Jews were hiding in the ghetto; the legal Jews provided them with food. The Germans shot many of the illegals on sight. In March 1943, they shot the burial team, and the remaining 100 or so legal laborers stayed in the ghetto until June.¹⁶ The first head of this remnant ghetto or labor camp (from mid-December 1942 until mid-February 1943) was SS-Hauptscharführer Josef Grzimek, who, from February 19, 1943, was the head of the Jewish camp (Judenlager) in Lwów.

On May 1, 1943, the remaining 300 to 400 Jewish inmates from the liquidated labor camp in Mosty Wielkie, which was located 37 kilometers (23 miles) east of Rawa Ruska, were transferred to Rawa Ruska. Here they were accommodated in 10 barracks and were employed in repairing and building roads. In June 1943, the Germans shot all of these Jews, together with the others remaining in Rawa Ruska, as Kreis-hauptmann Hager refused to provide them with food. The Germans even lured the remaining illegal Jews out of hiding with a false promise to send them to the labor camp at Potylicz if a specific sum of money was collected. Most sources date the final massacre of the remaining Jews around June 8–10, 1943, at a mass grave in the forest near the village of Borowe, just to the west of Rawa Ruska.¹⁷ Local inhabitants were requisitioned to fill in the graves; blood streamed out, and the ground continued to heave for some time after the shooting. Some witnesses recall that one group of victims was blown up with dynamite, scattering body parts around the vicinity.¹⁸

On January 29, 1949, SS-Hauptscharführer Josef Grzimek, head of the Jewish labor camp in Rawa Ruska, was sentenced to death in Poland; he died in prison in 1950. On July 13, 1949, former SS-Obersturmführer Oswald Heyduk was sentenced to life in prison in Munich, Germany.

SOURCES Information regarding the persecution and destruction of the Jewish population of Rawa Ruska can be found in the following publications: A.M. Ringel and Y.Ts. Rubin, eds., Sefer zikaron li-kehillat Ravah-Ruskah veba-sevivah (Tel Aviv: Irgun yots'e Ravah-Ruskah veba-sevivah be-Yisrael, 1973); J. Iszchulow, “Zagłada Żydów w mieście i powiecie Rawa Ruska,” BŻIH, no. 102 (1977); and Danuta Dabrowska, Abraham Wein, and Aharon Weiss, eds., Pinkas ha-kehillot. Encyclopaedia of Jewish Communities: Poland, vol. 2, Eastern Galicia (Jerusalem: Yad Vashem, 1980), pp. 498–503—an English translation is available via jewishgen.org. There is also a short survivor testimony published in Rima Dulkinienė and Kerry Keys, eds., With a Needle in the Heart: Memoirs of Former Prisoners of Ghettos and Concentration Camps (Vilnius: Garnelis, 2003), pp. 84–87.

Relevant documentation can be found in the following archives: AŻIH (e.g., 211/896, 301/4950a and 4950b, and 302/71); BA-BL (e.g., R 58/1002); BA-L (e.g., ZStL, AR-Z 3/63); DALO (R 28-1-4, R 3-1-279); GARF (7021-67-80); RGVA (1323-2-292b); USHMM; YIU (e.g., nos. 1, 12, 13, 14, 15, 142); and YVA.

Alexander Kruglov and Martin Dean
trans. Ester-Basya Vaisman

NOTES

1. AŻIH, 211/896, Judenrat Rawa Ruska to the JSS in Kraków, November 24, 1941.

2. Yehushe Volfus, “My Experiences,” in Ringel and Rubin, Sefer zikaron li-kehillat Ravah-Ruskah, pp. 230–247.

3. AŻIH, 211/896, Judenrat Rawa Ruska to the JSS in Kraków, November 24, 1941.

4. Soviet Extraordinary State Commission (ChGK) report for the Rava Russkaia raion, September 24–30, 1944, published in L'vivshchyna u Velykii Vitchyzniani viini (1941–1945 rr.) (L'viv: Kameniar, 1968), pp. 134–139.

5. AŻIH, 301/4950b. According to other sources (e.g., Yitzhak Arad, Belzec, Sobibor, Treblinka. The Operation Reinhard Death Camps [Bloomington: Indiana University Press, 1987], p. 384), the first Aktion took place in Rawa Ruska on March 20, 1942, when 1,500 Jews were deported.

6. Dieter Pohl, Nationalsozialistische Judenverfolgung in Ostgalizien 1941–1944. Organisation und Durchführung eines staatlichen Massenverbrechens (Munich: R. Oldenbourg Verlag, 1997), p. 224. The Aktion took place between July 27 and July 29, 1942.

7. AŻIH, 301/4950b. According to other sources (Arad, Belzec, Sobibor, Treblinka, p. 384), the second Aktion took place in Rawa Ruska on July 29, 1942, when 1,200 Jews were deported together with 800 from Niemirów.

8. AŻIH, 301/4950b.

9. See Tatiana Berenstein, “Eksterminacja ludności żydowskiej w dystrykcie Galicja (1941–1943),” BŻIH, no. 61 (1967), table 8.

10. AŻIH, 301/4950b, gives the figure of 15,000, which is probably too high. BA-BL, R 58/1002, Schenk report, May 15, 1943, gives what was probably the official figure of 8,000.

11. AŻIH, 301/4950a, testimony of Abraham Schall.

12. Ibid., 301/4950a and 4950b; 302/71, testimony of Zelda Ginzburg, who erroneously dates the establishment of the ghetto to 1941; and Khayim Shpaster, “The End of My Town Rave,” in Ringel and Rubin, Sefer zikaron li-kehillat Ravah-Ruskah, pp. 254–265.

13. Trial of the Major War Criminals before the International Military Tribunal, vol. 37 (Nuremberg, 1948), pp. 404–405, Doc. L-018.

14. The ChGK report of September 24–30, 1944 (see note 4 above) estimates much higher numbers of victims.

15. RGVA, 1323-2-292b, p. 6.

16. AZIH, 301/4950b.

17. Ibid.; Thomas Sandkühler, “Endlösung” in Galizien. Der Judenmord in Ostpolen und die Rettungsinitiativen von Berthold Beitz 1941–1944 (Bonn: Dietz-Verlag, 1996), p. 236. According to the ChGK, some 1,500 corpses were found at the site (see note 4).

18. YIU, nos. 1, 12, 13, 14, 15, 142.

ROHATYN

Pre-1939: Rohatyn, town, powiat center, Stanisławów województwo, Poland; 1939–1941: Rogatin, raion center, Stanislav oblast', Ukrainian SSR; 1941–1944: Rohatyn, Kreis Brzezany, Distrikt Galizien, Generalgouvernement; post-1991: raion center, Ivano-Frankivs'k oblast', Ukraine

Rohatyn is located 61 kilometers (38 miles) north of Stanisławów. On the eve of war in 1939, the Jewish population was 3,282.¹

Rohatyn was occupied by German forces in early July 1941; more than 3,000 Jews remained in the town. Initially Rohatyn was governed by a German military commandant's office; then in August 1941, a civil administration took over. Rohatyn became part of the Kreis Brzezany, in Distrikt Galizien, within the Generalgouvernement. From November 1941 until January 1943, the head of the Kreis (Kreishauptmann) in Brzezany was Hans-Adolf Asbach; he was replaced by Dr. Werner Becker.

Until the end of March 1942, the Security Police outpost (Sipo-Aussendienststelle) in Stanisławów, headed by SS-Hauptsturmführer Hans Krüger, organized large-scale anti-Jewish Aktions in Rohatyn. From April 1942, responsibility for Rohatyn was transferred to the Sipo-Aussendienststelle in Tarnopol, which from October 1941 was headed by SS-Sturmbannführer Hermann Müller. In June 1943, he was replaced by SS-Hauptsturmführer Wilhelm Krüger. There was also a post of the German Criminal Police (Kripo) and German Gendarmerie in Rohatyn, as well as a Ukrainian police unit. All these units participated in the various anti-Jewish Aktions.

At the end of July 1941, the German authorities established a Jewish Council (Judenrat) of 12 people. Its members were mainly former members of the Jewish community administration (kehillah), including its head, Shlomo Pomerantz, and the head of the newly formed Jewish Police, Meir Weiser. The Judenrat sought to prevent the continuous seizure of Jews from the streets for forced labor by the Ukrainian militia and the theft of Jewish property. In August 1941, the German authorities ordered the Judenrat to collect and deliver a fine of 1 million zloty. In the same month, they also ordered the concentration of the Jews into a specific quarter of town, creating a “Jewish residential district” (open ghetto). The ghetto was in the poorest part of town, enclosed by the Gnila Lipa River, the stream running into the river, and the marketplace. All streets leading into the ghetto were blocked off, and only two exit points were open, manned by the Jewish Police. There was terrible overcrowding, with each family allotted only one room.²

In September, the German authorities issued orders for the Jews to remain within the limits of the ghetto and to wear distinguishing armbands. In addition to organizing a labor office and a post office and distributing meager rations, the Judenrat implemented special German instructions, often involving the confiscation of property.³

The first large-scale killing Aktion against the Jews of Rohatyn was organized by Hans Krüger on March 20, 1942. On this day, members of the German Gendarmerie and Ukrainian policemen herded the Jewish population to the central market square, then took them by truck to a pit near the railroad station. Some specialist workers, including dentists and pharmacists, were selected out and sent back to the ghetto. The Security Police from Stanisławów shot their victims in groups from 10:00 A.M. until 5:00 P.M., when the remainder was released.⁴

According to the estimate of the Jewish Council, 1,820 people were shot on that day.⁵ Around 1,000 Jews survived. Following this Aktion, more Jews from the surrounding villages of the Rohatyn Rayon were resettled into the “open ghetto,” which was also reduced in size, worsening the overcrowding.⁶

By the summer of 1942, the Rohatyn Jews became increasingly aware that their fate was sealed and sought to survive either by hiding on the “Aryan side” outside the ghetto or by constructing hiding places inside the ghetto.⁷

The second Aktion took place on September 21–22, 1942, at the time of Yom Kippur. The Aktion took two days, as so many Jews went into hiding that the Germans could not initially fill the waiting train cars. Some 300 Jews were killed on the spot, and 700 more were deported to the Bełżec extermination camp.⁸ This Aktion was organized by the Security Police detachment from Tarnopol, assisted by the German Gendarmerie and the Ukrainian policemen. After the Aktion, at the end of October 1942, more Jews from Bursztyn, Bolszowce, and Bukaczowce were resettled into the Rohatyn ghetto. As a result of this massive influx, the Jewish population of Rohatyn rose to some 4,000 or 5,000 people.

In the summer and fall of 1942, the Jewish Council in Rohatyn repeatedly sent its representatives to visit the office of the Security Police in Tarnopol, hoping to learn about their plans regarding the ghetto and defer its destruction with generous bribes. Nevertheless, the Security Police conducted a third Aktion on December 8, 1942, in which 1,400 Jews were deported from Rohatyn and 500 more were murdered in the town.⁹ Between 4,300 and 5,000 Jews are estimated to have been killed in the three main Aktions.

On November 10, 1942, SS-Obergruppenführer Krüger ordered that the Jewish residential district in Rohatyn should be completely fenced off from the rest of the town, creating an enclosed ghetto.¹⁰ The 3,000 Jews who still resided in the ghetto were now physically separated from the surrounding population.¹¹

Owing to overcrowding and lack of sanitary facilities, the ghetto was plagued by epidemics of typhus and dysentery. The typhus epidemic reached a climax in the winter of 1942–1943. The Jewish Council opened a hospital for a limited number of patients. Food was scarce, as all contact with the surrounding population was prohibited. Only those Jews who still had some property (clothing was especially in demand among the peasants) could trade it for food; a black market continued to flourish across the border of the ghetto. The ghetto Jews were also taken daily for forced labor outside the ghetto in various German offices and stores, on road construction, and at the railroad.

Despite the hunger, persecution, and death, many Jews maintained their religious observances. Torah scrolls were distributed among private homes, and people congregated during the day to say Kaddish (prayers for the dead) for those who had died.¹²

In the period from February to April 1943, the German Security Police conducted several further Aktions in the ghetto. With the assistance of the Jewish Police, several hundred able-bodied Jews were selected for forced labor at the Borki Wielkie camp, near Tarnopol.¹³ On March 2, 1943, those Jews who had typhus were targeted, and 30 were shot in their own homes. The Security Police also murdered the patients in the Jewish hospital, together with the entire staff. Members of the Jewish Police were ordered to assist in carrying this out. Finally, on April 24, 1943, SS-Oberscharführer Ludwig Wenzel personally shot 40 Jewish children.¹⁴

On June 6, a Gestapo unit arrived in Rohatyn from Lwów. The Security Police detachment from Tarnopol, assisted by the German Gendarmerie and the Ukrainian policemen, surrounded the ghetto, rounded up about 2,500 Jews, and shot them at the Jewish cemetery.¹⁵ To capture the remaining Jews in hiding, the Ukrainian police set the ghetto on fire. There was some armed resistance, but this was quickly crushed.¹⁶

It is estimated that in the period from 1941 to 1943 a total of 5,000 Jews were murdered in Rohatyn, and 2,000 more were deported to Bełżec. When the Red Army liberated Rohatyn, only a few survivors remained of a once-flourishing Jewish community of several thousand people.

After the war, Asbach was one of the founders of the Union of Expellees and the Disenfranchised (1950). Until 1957 he was a minister in Schleswig-Holstein. His case was closed due to “lack of evidence” in 1976. Becker was a judge in an administrative court after the war. His case was similarly never brought to court; it was closed in 1975 also due to lack of evidence. He died in 1991. Hans Krüger was sentenced to life in prison on May 6, 1968, by a court in Münster. He was released in 1986 and died two years later. Müller received his life sentence in Stuttgart on July 15, 1966, and died in 1988. Wilhelm Krüger was under investigation for a while, but the case was, like so many others, unable to produce a conviction.

SOURCES Publications on the destruction of the Jewish population of the town include the following: Mordechai Amihai, David Stockfish, and Shmuel Bari, eds., Kehilat Rohatyn ve-ha-seviva; Rohatyn: A Town That Perished (Tel Aviv: Former Residents of Rohatyn in Israel, 1962); Alexander Kimmel, Child of the Shoah (Alexander Kimel, 2000); and Danuta Dabrowska, Abraham Wein, and Aharon Weiss, eds., Pinkas ha-kehillot. Encyclopaedia of Jewish Communities: Poland, vol. 2, Eastern Galicia (Jerusalem: Yad Vashem, 1980), pp. 506–510.

Documents regarding the fate of the Jewish population of Rohatyn under the German occupation can be found in the following archives: AŽIH (301/2572); DAI-FO; GARF (7021-73-13); NARA; and YVA.

Alexander Kruglov and Ksenia Krimer
trans. Katrin Reichelt

NOTES

1. GARF, 7021-73-13, pp. 34 and reverse.
2. Rosa Halpern (Faust), “A Diary of the Rohatyn Ghetto,” in Amihai, Stockfish, and Bari, Rohatyn: A Town That Perished, pp. 27–31; Kimmel, Child of the Shoah, chaps. 8 and 9.
3. Halpern, “A Diary of the Rohatyn Ghetto,” pp. 27–31.
4. Schwurgericht beim Landgericht Münster, 5 Ks 4/65, Urteil vom 3. und 6. Mai 1968 in der Strafsache gegen Hans Krüger u.a., in Justiz und NS-Verbrechen, vol. 28 (Amsterdam: Amsterdam University Press, 2003), Lfd. Nr. 674, pp. 165–173; Dr. Avraham Schtertzer, “How Rohatyn Died,” in Amihai, Stockfish, and Bari, Rohatyn: A Town That Perished, p. 51.
5. GARF, 7021-73-13, p. 34. The Rohatyn yizkor book puts the number of casualties at 3,000 adults and 600 children; see Amihai, Stockfish, and Bari, Rohatyn: A Town That Perished, p. 51.
6. Kimmel, Child of the Shoah, chap. 11.
7. Schtertzer, “How Rohatyn Died,” pp. 51–53.
8. GARF, 7021-73-13, pp. 2 and reverse. According to another source (7021-73-13, p. 34), 800 Jews were deported and 200 more were killed on the spot; Kimmel, Child of the Shoah, chap. 13.
9. GARF, 7021-73-13, pp. 2 and reverse.
10. Polizeiverordnung des HSSPF Krüger über die Errichtung jüdischer Wohnbezirke, November 10, 1942, in Verordnungsblatt des Generalgouvernements, November 11, 1942.
11. Amihai, Stockfish, and Bari, Rohatyn: A Town That Perished, pp. 47–48.
12. Kimmel, Child of the Shoah, chap. 14.
13. Amihai, Stockfish, and Bari, Rohatyn: A Town That Perished, pp. 45–50.
14. SWCA, H. Zenner, “Wie ein Jude lebte während der russischen und deutschen Okkupation in Polen 1939–1945,” Online Special Collections, Collection 6: ZENNER Hermann.
15. GARF, 7021-73-13, pp. 20 (both sides), 34.
16. NARA, N-Doc. 018-L, Katzmann report, June 30, 1943.

RUDKI

Pre-1939: Rudki (Yiddish: Ridik), town, powiat center, Lwów województwo, Poland; 1939–1941: raion center, Drohobych oblast', Ukrainian SSR; 1941–1944: Kreis Lemberg-Land, Distrikt Galizien, Generalgouvernement; post-1991: Rudky, Sambir raion, L'viv oblast', Ukraine

Rudki is located 40 kilometers (25 miles) southwest of Lwów. According to the Polish census, there were 1,962 Jews residing in Rudki in 1931.

On September 12, 1939, German troops occupied Rudki. Shortly after their arrival, they burned down part of the town, leaving many Jews homeless. They also enforced a curfew and shaved the beard off the rabbi. Rumors were spreading of a pogrom being organized by the Germans and local Ukrainians when the arrival of the Red Army temporarily relieved the pressure on the Jews.¹ Overnight they became Soviet citizens, and a number of Jews were recruited into the Red Army. The new Soviet authorities suppressed Jewish commercial and communal activities. In mid-1941, there were approximately 3,000 Jews in Rudki, including a number of refugees who had arrived from western and central Poland in the fall of 1939.

Following the German attack on the Soviet Union on June 22, 1941, units of the German 17th Army occupied Rudki on June 27. In July, a military commandant's office (Ortskommandantur) governed the town. On August 1, 1941, Eastern Galicia was transferred to a German civil administration. Rudki was in Kreis Lemberg-Land, which was governed by Kreishauptmann Otto Bauer until March 1942; then Dr. Werner Becker until early 1943; and finally, Baron Joachim von der Leyen.² Most of the anti-Jewish Aktions in Rudki were carried out by a squad of Security Police and SD from Lwów, assisted by the German Gendarmerie and Ukrainian Auxiliary Police (Ukrainische Hilfspolizei).

The first Aktion was carried out in Rudki in early July 1941. An Einsatzkommando of the Security Police and SD arrived (probably from Lwów) and arrested 39 Jews from the intelligentsia. The arrestees were taken to a forest 3 kilometers (2 miles) outside the town, where they were murdered. The synagogue was also burned to the ground.³

In July 1941, a Jewish Council (Judenrat) was established in the town by the German military administration, and Jews were forced to wear white armbands bearing blue Stars of David. The German authorities confiscated Jewish property, especially valuable items, and deprived Jews of most rights and liberties. All Jews had to be registered, and they were compelled to engage in hard manual labor.

On November 25, 1942 (in accordance with the November 10 order of Higher SS and Police Leader [HSSPF] SS-Obergruppenführer Friedrich Wilhelm Krüger), the Kreishauptmann in Lwów issued instructions for the establishment of a Jewish ghetto (Judenwohnbezirk) in Rudki, which would also contain several hundred Jews from the surrounding communities of Kupnowice, Dydiatycze, Hoszany, Tuligłowy, and Podwierzyniec.⁴ At the end of November, however, a second

Aktion was carried out in Rudki during which the German forces deported 821 Jews to the Bełżec extermination camp. A similar number of Jews were deported from the nearby towns of Komarno and Szczercz along with the prisoners from Rudki.⁵

The ghetto was established on December 1, 1942, and the remaining Jews in Komarno were also transferred to Rudki. Altogether there were some 2,500 people in the ghetto. Approximately 500 of them died of hunger and typhus in the period up to April 1943. Jews who left the ghetto each day under guard to work were considered fortunate, as they might have the opportunity to obtain some food. Jews tried to keep up their spirits in the ghetto by spreading rumors that perhaps Hitler had died and that there might be a change of regime in Germany.⁶

Security Police and SD personnel from Lwów, assisted by the German Gendarmerie and Ukrainian policemen, liquidated the Rudki ghetto on April 9, 1943: about 300 workers were deported to the Janowska Street labor camp in Lwów; the other 1,700 Jews were escorted out of town to ditches prepared in the forest near Brzezina. Here the victims were made to stand on a wooden plank over the ditch and were shot so that they fell into it. After the liquidation Aktion the Germans declared the town to have been cleansed of Jews (judenrein).⁷ The German office for setting prices in the office of the Kreishauptmann reported at the end of April that following the complete resettlement of the Jews earlier in the month, prices for agricultural products on the black market had halved in the Rudki subdistrict (Landgemeinde).⁸

A number of Jews managed to escape and hid with local peasants. They lived in constant fear of the Ukrainian policemen, which continued to search for them. The Jews in hiding lived under terrible conditions and listened keenly for any news from the front lines. One survivor recalls that the time in hiding also had a deep psychological impact. The Red Army recaptured the area in July 1944, liberating at least 18 Jews who had hidden successfully.⁹

SOURCES Personal accounts about the Jewish community in Rudki can be found in Josef Chrust, ed., Rudki, sefer yizkor li-Yebude Rudki veba-sevivah (Tel Aviv: Hutsa be-hishtatfut shel yots'e kehilat Rudki, 1977). A brief overview of the history of the community can also be found in Danuta Dabrowska, Abraham Wein, and Aharon Weiss, eds., Pinkas ha-kehillot. Encyclopaedia of Jewish Communities: Poland, vol. 2, Eastern Galicia (Jerusalem: Yad Vashem, 1980), pp. 503–505.

Relevant documentation can be found in the following archives: AŻIH (301/527); BA-BL (R 58/214); DALO (e.g., R 24-2-40; R 24-3-156; and R 37-5-30); GARF (7021-58-21); USHMM; VHF; and YVA.

Alexander Kruglov and Martin Dean
trans. Ester-Basya Vaisman

NOTES

1. Chrust, Rudki, sefer yizkor, pp. 286–288.
2. Bauer was killed in February 1944; Becker died in 1991; and von der Leyen was killed in the bombing of Dresden in 1945.

3. BA-BL, R 58/214, Ereignismeldung UdSSR no. 20, July 12, 1941; GARF, 7021-58-21, pp. 199–200; AŽIH, 301/527, testimony of Leib Tell, 1945.

4. DALO, R 24-3-156, Kreishauptmann Lemberg-Land an die Landkommissare, November 25, 1942; see also Polizeiverordnung des HSSPF Krüger über die Errichtung jüdischer Wohnbezirke, November 10, 1942, in Verordnungsblatt des Generalgouvernements, November 11, 1942.

5. GARF, 7021-58-21, p. 197; AŽIH, 301/527; Thomas Sandkühler, “Endlösung” in Galizien. Der Judenmord in Ostpolen und die Rettungsinitiativen von Berthold Beitz 1941–1944 (Bonn: Dietz, 1996), p. 234.

6. AŽIH, 301/527.

7. Ibid.; GARF, 7021-58-21, p. 200; Tatiana Berenstein, “Eksterminacja ludności żydowskiej w dystryktie Galicja (1941–1943),” BŻIH, no. 61 (1967), table 7.

8. DALO, R 24-2-40.

9. AŽIH, 301/527.

SAMBOR

Pre-1939: Sambor, town, Lwów województwo, Poland; 1939–1941: raion center, L'vov oblast', Ukrainian SSR; 1941–1944: center, Kreis Sambor, Distrikt Galizien, Generalgouvernement; post-1991: Sambir, L'viv oblast', Ukraine

Sambor is located 68 kilometers (42 miles) west-southwest of Lwów. According to the 1931 census, there were 6,275 Jews in Sambor. Estimates for 1939 put the number of Jews at around 8,000.

With the German invasion in June 1941, groups of Jews tried to flee to the east, but the rapid German advance prevented the escape of all but a few.

German forces occupied the town on June 30, 1941. In July, a German military administration took charge, to be replaced on August 1 by a civil administration. Sambor then became part of Distrikt Galizien in the Generalgouvernement. The town was the administrative center of Kreis Sambor. Kreis Sambor was created from two former Polish powiats, Sambor and Turka, in which, according to the 1931 census, there were 21,885 Jews. The Kreis was governed by a district chief (Kreishauptmann). Dr. Mogens von Harbou und von der Hellen held the post of Kreishauptmann from November 1941 until March 1942; Dr. Hans-Walter Zinser, from March until September 1942; and Dr. Karl-Georg Emerich, from October 1942 until April 1943. In the spring of 1943, Kreis Sambor was dissolved and incorporated into Kreis Drohobycz as the Landkommissariat Sambor. Hans Rockendorf was the Landkommissar in Sambor.

There were also a German Gendarmerie post in Sambor, a Criminal Police Commissariat (Kriminalkommissariat), and a detachment of Ukrainian Auxiliary Police (Ukrainische Hilfspolizei). The Criminal Police was commanded initially by SS-Hauptscharführer Karl Ulrich Wüstner (1942–1943) and then by Kriminalobersekretär Johann Iselt (1943–1944). The Criminal Police Commissariat was subordinated to the Border Police Office (Grenzpolizeikommissariat) in Drohobycz, which was headed by SS-Sturmabführer Hans Block from June 1942 until August 1944. The anti-Jewish Aktions were generally carried out in the town by a team of Security Police from Drohobycz, assisted by the German Gendarmerie and the Ukrainian policemen.

In the summer of 1941, the German military administration established a Jewish Council (Judenrat), chaired by Dr. Schneidscher, and a force of Jewish Police (headed by Herman Stahl) to implement the orders of the Jewish Council. Jews were deprived of all civil rights, and much Jewish property was confiscated (particularly valuables). In October 1941, all Jews in Sambor and the surrounding area were ordered to turn over all agricultural inventory and livestock to the German authorities, much of which was then appropriated by the Stelle zur Stärkung des Volksdeutschtums in Sambor (Office for the Strengthening of the Ethnic Germans in Sambor). All Jews had to be registered, and they were compelled to perform forced labor. Jewish apartments were also seized for the German authorities.

In early March 1942, a “Jewish residential district” (open ghetto) was created on the edge of town in Blich, and all Jews were supposed to move there by March 12.¹ In May, the population numbered 6,466 Jews. At the beginning of the summer of 1942, Jews from the surrounding communities, along with the Jews of Stary Sambor, were forcibly relocated to Sambor. Except for the murder of 32 Jewish prisoners in February 1942, there were no mass shootings of Jews in this period.²

From August to October 1942, four anti-Jewish Aktions were carried out in the town. The first Aktion took place on August 4. SS-Obersturmführer Robert Gschwendtner was in charge of this Aktion, along with the SS and Police Leader (SSPF) in Distrikt Galizien, SS-Brigadeführer Friedrich Katzmann. A squad of German Gendarmerie, Ukrainian Auxiliary Police, and Jewish Police and a team of Security Police from Drohobycz headed by SS-Hauptscharführer Josef Gabriel participated in the Aktion. The German troops and policemen gathered the Jews in a stadium, and Jews from the surrounding area were also brought there (from Stary Sambor, Felsztyn, Strelki, Terszów, and other places). Jewish patients deemed too sick to be moved were murdered in the hospital.³ Subsequently, a selection was conducted in the stadium, supervised by the commander of the Janowska Street labor camp in Lwów, SS-Obersturmführer Gustav Willhaus, and his assistant, SS-Untersturmführer Richard Rokita. During the selection, Rokita chose at least 150 and possibly as many as 600 people for the Janowska Street labor camp. Those Jews deemed “incapable of work” were killed on the spot. In the ghetto and at the stadium, at least 150 Jews were murdered. At noon, the greater part of the Jews destined for “transfer” were driven into freight cars and sent to the Bełżec extermination camp, while the selected Jews were locked up in barracks in the Jewish residential district. On August 6, after the chairman of the Jewish Council, Dr. Schneidscher, was able to free several people from the barracks at night, those Jews selected for the Janowska Street labor camp were taken to Lwów. In their place, a group of Jewish workers was brought in from the Janowska Street labor camp; they prepared the productive machinery located in Sambor for transfer to Lwów under the direction of SS-Untersturmführer Rokita. All told, during the three days of the August Aktion, approximately 4,000 Jews were killed.⁴

On September 25–26, during the distribution of work permits to Jews by the Criminal Police, the second Aktion took place: the Jewish Council had to select about 300 old and sick Jews, who were placed in prison and then shot in a forest near Radłowicze.

On October 17–18 and 22, a team of Security Police from Drohobycz, the German Gendarmerie (commanded by Hauptmann der Gendarmerie Nebel), Schutzpolizei (a section of Company 5 of the 24th Police Battalion), and Ukrainian Auxiliary Police carried out the third and fourth Aktions in Sambor. During these Aktions, Jews were collected in the jail, along with Jews from the surrounding villages. The head of the jail, Friedrich Busse, subjected the Jews in jail to various forms of torture. Robert Quecke once again tried to get his Jewish workers released, but his attempts proved unsuccessful; the supervisor of the Criminal Police in Sambor threatened to shoot him, a fate Quecke managed to avoid only by escaping. During the third Aktion, about 1,000 Jews were transported to Bełżec, and during the fourth Aktion, 460.⁵ During the four Aktions, 5,000 Jews in total were transferred to the Bełżec extermination camp from Sambor (including Jews from the surrounding villages), about 600 Jews were transferred to the Janowska Street labor camp in Lwów, and about 400 Jews were killed in Sambor.

On December 1, 1942, the Jewish residential district in Sambor was isolated from the rest of the town by means of barbed wire and turned into an enclosed ghetto. All the Jews remaining in Kreis Sambor were forced to move to this ghetto, from Turka, Stary Sambor, Felsztyn, and surrounding villages. Altogether, there were more than 3,000 Jews in the ghetto.⁶ The Jews in the ghetto suffered from hunger and disease during the winter of 1942–1943. From time to time, small groups of Jewish youths were removed to the Janowska Street camp near Lwów.

In the period February to June 1943, the Security Police from Drohobycz, together with the German Gendarmerie and Ukrainian policemen, carried out four Aktions in the ghetto. SS-Hauptscharführer Josef Gabriel was in charge of the Aktions. The first Aktion took place on February 13, 1943, when about 500 Jews were shot in the forest near Radłowicze; they had been arrested by the Jewish Police in November and December 1942 during an Aktion against aged Jews (over 55 years) and had been in prison since then.⁷

On April 14, 1943, a second Aktion was carried out in the ghetto: about 1,200 people were captured and placed in jail after the families of members of the Jewish Council and the Jewish Police (about 300 people) had been selected out, and on April 18, 900 of those held in the jail were shot in the cemetery.⁸ After this Aktion, about 2,000 people remained in the ghetto, most of whom were engaged in construction work.⁹

On May 20–22, a third ghetto Aktion was carried out, during which several hundred Jews “incapable of work” were killed in the forest near Radłowicze, 550 were transferred to the concentration camp of Majdanek, and 70 to 80 people were transferred to the Janowska Street labor camp.¹⁰

On June 5, 1943, the German police began the liquidation of the Sambor ghetto. It was accompanied by the arson and detonation of houses, with the goal of forcing Jews to leave their hiding places. Those Jews captured were put in jail, and on June 10 they were taken in trucks to the forest near Radłowicze and shot there, including the members of the Jewish Council and the Jewish Police and their families. Altogether, more than 1,000 people were killed during the liquidation of the ghetto.¹¹ Some of the last Jews from Sambor tried to escape the ghetto and reach the Hungarian border, but most were killed on the way. Others tried to go into hiding using Aryan papers but without success. Attempts at rescue were limited, with a few exceptions. For example, Ivan and Maria Malenkevich, a Ukrainian couple from a village near Sambor, sheltered the siblings Artur and Irina Sandauer for 14 months in their home, where they built a hiding place in the attic.¹²

After the liquidation of the ghetto, the Germans continued to shoot Jews who were found in their hiding places. Thus, on June 23, 1943, 100 people were shot, on July 6, 40 people, and on July 22, 25 people. Altogether, in 1943, about 3,000 Jews were killed in Sambor, and more than 600 Jews were transferred to Majdanek or to the Janowska Street labor camp.

At the beginning of 1943, there was an attempt to organize a Jewish underground. A group of young Jews, one of whose most active members was Artur Sandauer, acquired firearms and began training in the area of the Jewish cemetery. The group sought assistance from the Jewish Council in securing provisions, but their efforts met with no success. As Irina Sandauer recalled, after the April 1943 Aktion (aktsiah), her brother went to extraordinary lengths to secure weapons for his group. To acquire the necessary financial resources to purchase 10 rifles from a Pole, Artur Sandauer turned to the treasurer of the Jewish Council, Batzker. After Batzker refused to hand over money for resistance activities, Sandauer tried to steal the money from the Jewish Council but only managed to make off with three typewriters. The series of Aktions carried out by the Nazis interfered with further preparations for active resistance.

In total, about 160 Jews from Sambor managed to survive, mostly by hiding with Poles and local peasants. For example, in Czukowa near Sambor a peasant hid 18 Jews, who were not betrayed although most of the village knew about them. One of these Jews was, however, murdered by members of the Armia Krajowa (Polish Home Army, AK) after the Soviet forces arrived.¹³

Dr. Mogens von Harbou und von der Hellen died in 1946 in an internment camp in Dachau. Dr. Hans-Walter Zinser was a federal judge after the war in the federal administrative court in Berlin; he was under investigation for some time, but the case was closed in 1968 owing to insufficient evidence. Dr. Karl-Georg Emmerich was convicted in 1950 by a Soviet military tribunal; he died in prison. Gschwendtner was under investigation for some time after the war, but the investigation was abandoned in 1968 owing to his inability to give testimony (he was then 86 years old). Katzmann died in 1957 (he lived in Germany under the name Bruno Albrecht). Gabriel was sentenced in 1947 by a Soviet military tribunal to 25 years imprisonment; in 1955 he returned to Austria, where in 1957 he was once again arrested and in 1959 sentenced to life imprisonment in Vienna; in 1968 he was released from prison. Willhaus died in 1945; Rokita was under investigation for some time after the war and in preliminary confinement, but he did not appear in court owing to his health; he died in 1976 at the age of 82.

SOURCES The following publications were consulted in the preparation of this entry: Alexander Manor, ed., Sefer Sambor–Sary Sambor; pirkei edut ve-zikaron le-kebilot (Tel Aviv: Sambor/Sary Sambor Society, 1980); Danuta Dabrowka, Abraham Wein, and Aharon Weiss, eds., Pinkas ha-kebilot. Encyclopaedia of Jewish Communities: Poland, vol. 2, Eastern Galicia (Jerusalem: Yad Vashem, 1980), pp. 340–346.

Documents of the Soviet Extraordinary State Commission (ChGK), captured German documents, and the testimonies of witnesses and survivors regarding the extermination of Sambor's Jews can be found in the following archives: AŽIH (301/1474, 1747, 3745, 3763, 3768, 3773, 3898, 4054, 4967, 4975); BA-BL; DALO; GARF (7021-58-22); GStAPK Berlin (P[K] Js 7/68, case against Zinser); RGVA; Sta. Mü I (112 Js 11- 13/68, case against Brumberger); USHMM; and YVA.

Alexander Kruglov and Avinoam Patt

NOTES

1. Lemberger Zeitung, March 5, 1942, cited by Dieter Pohl, Nationalsozialistische Judenverfolgung, in Ostgalizien 1941–1944 (Munich: Oldenbourg, 1996), p. 194.

2. GARF, 7021-58-22, p. 26, testimony of David Freimann.

3. Manor, Sefer Sambor, p. 213.

4. Dr. Irina Glanz-Sandauer, “Between Life and Death,” in ibid., p. 214.

5. Meldung 5./Pol.Rgt. 24 an Kommandeur d. Ordnungspolizei, October 25, 1942, RGVA, 1323-2-2926, p. 28.

6. GARF, 7021-58-22, p. 16, testimony of David Freimann.

7. GARF, 7021-58-22, p. 26, testimony of David Freimann (Freimann claims that the shooting took place on February 15).

8. GARF, 7021-58-22, p. 18; testimony of Samuel Berger, taken June 24, 1948, in the bureau of “Jewish Historical Documentation” in Vienna; Sta. Mü I: Verfahren 112 Js 11- 13/68 (case against Brumberger).

9. Testimony of Samuel Berger.

10. Meldung Kriminalkommissariat Sambor über Munitionsverbrauch bei Judenaktionen, June 21, 1943, DALO, R 36-1-6, p. 102; GARF, 7021-58-22, pp. 18, 26; testimony of Samuel Berger; testimony of David Freimann.

11. GARF, 7021-58-22, pp. 18, 26 (claims 1,500 were killed); testimony of Samuel Berger (claims 800 were killed during the liquidation of the ghetto); testimony of David Freimann (claims 1,500 to 1,600 were killed).

12. Glanz-Sandauer, “Between Life and Death,” p. 215.

13. AŽIH, 301/4967, testimony of Meyer Lamet, July 15, 1945, in Bucharest.

SKAŁAT

Pre-1939: Skałat, town, powiat center, Tarnopol województwo, Poland; 1939–1941: Skałat, raion center, Ternopol' oblast', Ukrainian SSR; 1941–1944: Kreis Tarnopol, Distrikt Galizien, Generalgouvernement; post-1991: Pidvolochis'k raion, Ternopil' oblast', Ukraine

Skałat lies 32 kilometers (20 miles) southeast of Tarnopol. In 1921 there were 2,919 Jews (49.1 percent) living in Skałat. By 1939, there were 4,800 Jews there, of whom roughly 200 fled with the retreating Red Army after the Germans invaded the USSR on June 22, 1941.

German forces occupied Skałat on July 5, 1941. A German military commandant's office (Ortskommandantur) governed the town until August, when a civil administration took over. Skałat became part of Kreis Tarnopol, within Distrikt Galizien. The Kreishauptmann in Tarnopol was first Gerhard Hager (until April 1942) and then Mogens von Harbou und von der Hellen.

The anti-Jewish Aktions in the town were organized and carried out by a detachment of the Security Police (Sipo-Aussendienststelle) based in Tarnopol, which was headed by SS-Sturmbannführer Hermann Müller from October 1941 until May 1943, then by SS-Hauptsturmführer Wilhelm Krüger from June 1943 until March 1944. In Skałat itself, there was a Criminal Police (Kripo) post, an Order Police post (Schutzpolizei), and a squad of Ukrainian Auxiliary Police that actively participated in the anti-Jewish Aktions.

In mid-July 1941, a temporary Jewish Council of 12 people headed by Nikolaj Bilyk was established on the orders of the Ukrainian town council. Then in early August, the Judenrat was reorganized into a 10-person council headed by Meyer Nirler. On July 19, the Jews were forced to make a contribution of 600,000 rubles within five days. In addition, the Judenrat had to assign 200 to 300 people daily to perform various jobs for the German and Ukrainian administration, as well as supplying German officials with furniture, clothes, and dishes.¹

From August 1941 until August 1942, there were no large-scale Aktions in Skałat; only young and healthy Jews were occasionally selected for work in labor camps. Thus, on October 17, 1941, 200 Jews were sent to work on the railroad in Maksymówka, but at the end of the month the Judenrat was able to obtain their release by paying a large ransom.² On November 24, 1941, 120 women and 120 men were sent to the labor camp at Borki Wielkie (the women were also released two weeks later for a ransom).³ In January 1942, another 130 to 150 people were sent to work in a camp in Nowosiółka; in June 1942, they were transferred to a camp in Kamionki.⁴ Finally, in July 1942, 30 young Jewish women were sent to a camp in Jagielnica to work on synthetic rubber plantations, but some time later, their parents were able to get them released with a bribe.⁵

On August 31, 1942, the first Aktion took place in the town: the Judenrat, with the assistance of the Jewish Police, collected over 500 elderly Jews on orders of the head of the Security Police post in Tarnopol, Müller. The Jews were taken in trucks to Tarnopol, then deported from there by train to the Bełżec extermination camp.⁶

On October 1, 1942, the German civil administration ordered all the Jews of the Skałat, Grzymałów, and Podwołoczyska subdistricts to move to Skałat by October 15.⁷ After these Jews had arrived in Skałat, the Security Police from Tarnopol under Müller's command organized a second Aktion on October 21–22, 1942. During the Aktion the Gendarmerie and the Ukrainian policemen rounded up about 3,000 Jews with some assistance from the Jewish Police, who helped to reveal some Jewish hiding places (so-called bunkers). Once captured, the Jews were transported by train to Bełżec on the evening of October 22; 153 Jews were murdered in the town. In Lwów, 200 people were selected from the transport for the Janowska Street camp, and the remaining Jews were forced to remove their clothing, to make any escape more difficult.⁸

On November 9, 1942, the Tarnopol Security Police conducted a third Aktion in Skałat. The Gendarmerie and Ukrainian police seized approximately 1,000 Jews in the town and sent them to Tarnopol on trucks borrowed temporarily from the stone quarry in Nowosiółka. From there they were deported by train to Bełżec. About 100 Jews were selected for the labor camp in Hłuboczek.⁹

In April 1942, the Jews were ordered to leave their homes in the town center and to move to the periphery of the town. In mid-October 1942, the Germans created a Jewish residential district (open ghetto) in Skałat, which consisted of mainly dilapidated houses on several small streets in the poorest part of town between the marketplace and the synagogue. On October 25, 1942, soon after the second Aktion, an order came from Tarnopol to reduce the size of this district.¹⁰ Jewish labor gangs from the ghetto were organized to demolish the emptied Jewish houses, and salvaged wood was sold cheaply for heating or building material.¹¹ At the beginning of December 1942, in accordance with the order issued by SS-Obergruppenführer Krüger on November 10, the district officially became a ghetto.¹²

The Security Police from Tarnopol conducted two Aktions in the ghetto. On April 7, 1943, German and Ukrainian police captured and shot approximately 700 Jews in the ghetto. Eighteen Jewish policemen participated in this Aktion; they forced the victims to undress and maintained order at the killing site, beating those who did not move quickly enough. For this, the Germans had promised to spare their lives, but they were also shot into the same ditches at the end of the Aktion. Some members of the Jewish Council and their families met the same fate.¹³

On June 9, 1943, a further Aktion was carried out in the ghetto in which 10 Jewish Police from Tarnopol participated by helping the Germans search for Jews in hiding. During the Aktion, approximately 600 Jews were captured; about 20 of them were transferred to the labor camp in Skałat, and the rest were shot. Shortly afterwards, another 120 Jews were shot; they were discovered in shelters in the former ghetto or were captured by Ukrainian peasants in surrounding villages.¹⁴ A group of Jews from the ghetto tried to find shelter in the labor camp in Skałat, but the Jewish camp administrators refused to help them out of fear. On June 16, 1943, 50 people were handed over to German police and then shot at the cemetery.¹⁵

Following the Aktion on April 7, 1943, a resistance group, led by Mechel Glanz, began to prepare for armed resistance in the ghetto. Glanz had arrived from Kopyczyńce. He was soon joined by other young people, including Lonek Pudles, Sholem Schechter, Meyer Grinfeld, Bucio Elfenbein, Henek Weinberg, and many others. They attended secret meetings to plan for resistance during the expected Aktion. The young men started collecting arms, but the Germans, aware of the existence of the group, brought forward the date of the Aktion, catching the group unprepared. With only a pair of pistols and 12 grenades lacking firing pins, there was no possibility of serious armed resistance. On June 9, 1943, the Germans started the liquidation of the ghetto, which resulted in the complete destruction of the Jewish community of Skałat.¹⁶

During 1941–1943, approximately 2,500 Jews were killed in the town or nearby, and approximately 4,500 more Jews were transported to the Bełżec extermination camp. Thus, approximately 7,000 Jews were murdered in total, including the Jews from Grzymałów and Podwołoczyska. Almost 200 Jews from Skałat and its vicinity survived the German occupation.

Hager died in 1961. Harbou died in 1946 while interned by the Americans at Dachau. Hermann Müller, born on January 30, 1909, was sentenced to life imprisonment by the regional court (Landgericht) in Stuttgart on July 15, 1966. He died in 1988. Wilhelm Krüger, also born in 1909, was held in American captivity after the war, but the investigation against him was closed without an indictment being issued.

SOURCES Publications on the fate of Skałat's Jews during the Holocaust include Abraham Weissbrod, Death of a Shtetl (USA, 1995), which is an expanded edition in English of the original yizkor book, A. Vaysbrod, Es shtarbt a shtetl: Megiles Skalat; baarbet un redagirt fun Y. Kaplan (Munich: der Tsentraler historisher komisye baym Tsentral komitet fun di bafrayte Yidn in der amerikaner zone in Daytshland, 1948). The yizkor book Skalat: kovets zikaron li-kebilab she-barvab ba-Sho'ah / ha-orekh Hayim Bronshtain [in Hebrew] (Petah Tikvah: Bet ha-sefer al shem Ya'akov Karol ve-Irgun Yehude Skalat be-Yisrael, 1971) was published in Israel. A brief article on the town can be found in Danuta Dabrowska, Abraham Wein, and Aharon Weiss, eds., Pinkas ha-kebilot. Encyclopaedia of Jewish Communities: Poland, vol. 2, Eastern Galicia (Jerusalem: Yad Vashem, 1980), pp. 400–404.

Documentation regarding the extermination of the Jewish community in Skalat can be found in the following archives: AŻIH (301/905); BA-L (ZStL, AR-Z 294/59); BA-MA; BWSL (EL 317 III, Bü 1408); DATO; GARF (7021-75-12); USHMM; and YVA.

Alexander Kruglov
trans. Ester-Basya Vaisman

NOTES

1. Weissbrod, Death of a Shtetl, pp. 10–11.
2. GARF, 7021-75-12, p. 92; Weissbrod, Death of a Shtetl, p. 11.
3. GARF, 7021-75-12, pp. 92 and verso.
4. Ibid.
5. Weissbrod, Death of a Shtetl, p. 13.
6. Ibid., pp. 14–18.
7. GARF, 7021-75-12, pp. 92 and verso.
8. Weissbrod, Death of a Shtetl, pp. 23–27.
9. Ibid., pp. 31–32, 104; GARF, 7021-75-12, pp. 92 and verso.
10. Weissbrod, Death of a Shtetl, pp. 12, 20, 29.
11. Ibid., p. 32; see especially the diagram of the Skalat ghetto reproduced as an appendix in the same volume.
12. Polizeiverordnung des HSSPF Krüger über die Errichtung jüdischer Wohnbezirke, November 10, 1942, in Verordnungsblatt des Generalgouvernements, November 11, 1942.
13. Weissbrod, Death of a Shtetl, pp. 36–38.
14. Ibid., p. 45.
15. Ibid., pp. 56–57.
16. Ibid., pp. 43–44.

ŚNIATYŃ

Pre-1939: Śniatyń, town, powiat center, Stanisławów województwo, Poland; 1939–1941: Sniatin, raion center, Stanislav oblast', Ukrainian SSR; 1941–1944: Sniatyn, Kreis Kolomea, Distrikt Galizien, Generalgouvernement; post-1991: raion center, Ivano-Frankivs'k oblast', Ukraine

Śniatyń is located about 80 kilometers (50 miles) southeast of Stanisławów. According to the 1931 census, 3,892 Jews lived in Śniatyń. By June 1941, allowing for an annual increase of 9 or 10 persons per 1,000, there would have been around 4,200 Jews in the town.

Romanian troops had occupied Śniatyń by the start of July 1941. Immediately they began to loot the town, and together with local Ukrainians they murdered more than a dozen Jews. Soon Hungarian forces replaced the Romanians, administering Śniatyń through a military commandant's office. The Hungarians introduced forced labor for the Jews, having them bring in the harvest and repair bridges.¹

At the end of August 1941, power was transferred to a German civil administration: Śniatyń was incorporated into Kreis Kolomea, within Distrikt Galizien. Klaus Peter Volkman was appointed as the Kreishauptmann in Kołomyja from August 1941 until July 1, 1942. SS-Obersturmführer Herbert Gorgon succeeded him until July 26, 1943.

The anti-Jewish Aktions in Śniatyń were organized and conducted by the Security Police outpost (Sipo-Aussendienststelle) in Kołomyja, which was headed by SS-Obersturmführer Peter Leideritz. In Śniatyń itself, a Border Police (Grenzpolizei) outpost was established, which served under the Security Police in Kołomyja. From September 1941 to February 1942, SS-Untersturmführer Paul Elsner headed the Border Police outpost; together with his fellow SS officers, he organized a private “harem” of Jewish women, whom he subsequently murdered. Elsner was caught stealing Jewish valuables, causing him to be court-martialed. From February to May 1942, Kriminalobersekretär Paul Behr commanded the post, and from June 1942, Max Sachs. A German Gendarmerie post and a local Ukrainian police unit were also established in Śniatyń.

The living conditions for the Jewish population deteriorated with the transfer of power into German hands. The German administration established a Jewish Council (Judenrat) under the leadership of a dentist named Cohen and ordered the registration of the Jews. The Germans confiscated large amounts of Jewish property, including most items of value. Jews were forbidden to trade with non-Jews. They were obliged to wear white armbands bearing the Star of David. All male Jews aged between 15 and 60 were required to perform forced labor; subsequently, this was extended to female Jews.²

The Germans acted first against prominent Jews, Communists, and Soviet activists. On September 26, 1941, officers of the newly established Border Police post shot about 20 people in the vicinity of Śniatyń. In October and November 1941, the Germans shot around 60 people, and in March 1942 they murdered 70 more.³ According to one account, these selective killings deprived the Jewish community of its trusted leaders; those who subsequently served the Germans did so out of self-interest, hoping to save their own lives.⁴

At the end of March 1942, the German authorities completed the establishment of a so-called open ghetto, or Jewish residential district, in Śniatyń, concentrating the Jews in a special quarter of the town. (According to one source, the Germans started organizing an open ghetto in Śniatyń at the beginning of August 1941, moving the Jews into the area around Steczowska Street and forcing the non-Jews to move out of that area.)⁵ On April 2, 1942, the head of the Border Police, Behr, received an order from SS-Obersturmführer Leideritz to arrest and transport the Jews of Śniatyń via Kołomyja to the Bełżec extermination camp.⁶ The Jews were ordered to assemble at the high school building and have their papers checked. Only some 2,000 Jews complied, while the rest went into hiding. Only a few of those who appeared were released as specialist workers for the Wehrmacht. The majority of the 2,000 Jews were held prisoner for several days and then were subsequently deported to Bełżec by train. A number of Jews were also murdered in and around Śniatyń following searches in the ghetto for those in hiding.

Following the Aktion, groups of Jews were resettled from the surrounding villages into Śniatyń on April 27–28, 1942. At least 216 people were brought into the ghetto: 42 from the village of Podwysoka, 82 from Stecowa, 35 from Budyłów, 17 from Karłów, 23 from Bełtuja, and 17 from Zaprut'e.⁷ As a result of these resettlement efforts, the Jewish population in the Śniatyń ghetto reached 1,582 persons as of June 1942.⁸ Conditions in the ghetto were very overcrowded, with as many as 20 people sharing a room or five families in one house. They were largely without furniture. Hunger ravaged the ghetto: children searched for potato peelings to take home and eat. Hundreds of Jews died of hunger and disease in Śniatyń during the summer.⁹

On September 7, 1942, about 250 Jews were brought into the Śniatyń ghetto from the town of Zabłotów. This signaled the start of the final deportation Aktion and the liquidation of the ghetto. Over the following days, the Jews of Śniatyń were rounded up and held in the building of the high school. Then on September 10, 1942, just before Rosh Hashanah, the Security Police, the German Gendarmerie, and the Ukrainian policemen escorted all the Jews to the railway station and loaded them into 10 cattle cars. Several hundred were murdered in and around the town. The rest (probably about 1,500) were deported via Kołomyja to the extermination camp in Bełżec.¹⁰ A few Jews were excluded from deportation as craftsmen working for the Wehrmacht, but these were murdered a few weeks later. About 15 escapees from the Śniatyń ghetto successfully made their way across the Romanian border and subsequently to Palestine. The border patrols caught many others attempting to cross. In the weeks and months following the Aktion, many Jews were discovered in hiding and shot.

Paul Behr died in 1969 in West Germany while under investigation for war crimes. Max Sachs died in 1944.

SOURCES Published articles on the destruction of the Jewish population of Śniatyń include the following: L'Extermination des Juifs en Pologne: Depositions de témoins oculaires. Cinquième Serie: Lwów-Śniatyń-Sandomierz (Geneva, 1945); and "Śniatyn," in Danuta Dabrowska, Abraham Wein, and Aharon Weiss, eds., Pinkas ha-kehillot. Encyclopaedia of Jewish Communities: Poland, vol. 2, Eastern Galicia (Jerusalem: Yad Vashem, 1980), pp. 516–519.

Documents on the destruction of the Jews of Śniatyń can be found in the following archives: AŻIH (301/5438 and 6098); BA-L (ZStL, 208 AR-Z 277/60); DAI-FO; GARF (7021-73-17); RGVA (1323-2-292b); USHMM; and YVA.

Alexander Kruglov
trans. Steven Seegel

NOTES

1. AŻIH, 301/5438, testimony of Norbert Fischer, July 17, 1957.

2. L'Extermination des Juifs en Pologne, pp. 21–22. Probably compiled from the statements of several survivors, the chronology in this report is unfortunately somewhat contradictory and unreliable.

3. V. Zamlyn'skyi, Tavrovani prezyrstvom narodu (Kiev, 1974), p. 40.

4. L'Extermination des Juifs en Pologne, p. 22.

5. AŻIH, 301/5438. Other sources date the establishment of the ghetto in December 1941 or early 1942.

6. BA-L, ZStL, 208 AR-Z 277/60, statement of P. Behr, August 13, 1964.

7. GARF, 7021-73-17, pp. 36, 43, 57–59, 62, 78–79.

8. Tatiana Berenstein, "Eksterminacja ludności żydowskiej w dystrykcie Galicja (1941–1943)," BŻIH, no. 61 (1967) table 6.

9. L'Extermination des Juifs en Pologne, p. 22.

10. See the report of the commander of the 7th Company of the 24th Police Battalion, September 14, 1942, in RGVA, 1323-2-292b, p. 55.

SOKAL

Pre-1939: Sokal, town, powiat center, Lwów województwo, Poland; 1939–1941: Sokal', raion center, L'vov oblast', Ukrainian SSR; 1941–1944: Sokal, Kreis Kamionka-Strumilowa, Distrikt Galizien, Generalgouvernement; post-1991: Sokal', raion center, L'viv oblast', Ukraine

Sokal is located 75 kilometers (47 miles) north-northeast of Lwów. The Jewish population numbered 4,360 (43 percent) in 1921 and 5,220 in 1931.

After the outbreak of World War II, Jewish refugees from Bełż, Krystynopol, and localities in western Poland arrived in Sokal; as a result, under Soviet rule (1939–1941) the Jewish population increased to more than 6,000. The refugees were lodged in synagogues and private homes, and a special committee was established to aid them. In the summer of 1940, many of the newly arrived refugees were deported to the Soviet interior.

Units of the German 6th Army occupied Sokal on June 22, 1941. Initially, the town was run by a German military commandant's office (Ortskommandantur), but in August 1941, authority was transferred to a German civil administration. Sokal became part of Kreis Kamionka-Strumilowa, within Distrikt Galizien. Until the end of November 1942, the Kreishauptmann was Regierungsrat SS-Untersturmführer Wilhelm Rebay von Ehrenwiesen. He was succeeded on January 1, 1943, by Hauptschriftleiter SS-Untersturmführer Joachim Nehring, who in 1941–1942 had been the Kreishauptmann's deputy.

Starting in the fall of 1941, an outpost of the Security Police (Sipo-Aussendienststelle) was stationed in Sokal, which until May 1942 was headed by SS-Sturmbannführer Hans Block, and then from May 1942 until October 1943, by SS-Obersturmführer Oswald Heyduk. SS-Untersturmführer Wilhelm Geisenhof was the deputy head of the post, and SS-Hauptscharführer Hans Hartmann was in charge of "Jewish affairs" there. The Sipo outpost organized and implemented all the anti-Jewish Aktionen in the town. Also in Sokal was a German Gendarmerie post and a squad of Ukrainian Auxiliary Police (Ukrainische Hilfspolizei), which both took an active part in the anti-Jewish measures.

The first Jews were killed on June 22, 1941. On that day, the German soldiers who occupied the town shot 11 Jews in front of the Polish Cathedral.¹ Further killings in Sokal were organized by Sonderkommando (Sk) 4a, commanded by SS-Standartenführer Paul Blobel. The regional court (Landgericht) in Darmstadt subsequently described the Sk 4a shootings at the end of June 1941:

Immediately upon arriving in Sokal on June 27, 1941, from the officials, translators, and drivers, Blobel formed search detachments that with the help of the Ukrainian militia were to search for “suspicious persons,” including Communist functionaries and Jews. These detachments received the lists and drove off in automobiles to arrest the people. Some of the houses suspected of holding Communist functionaries were pointed out by informers among the local population. Those arrested were delivered to the squad’s base and from there, without interrogation, were taken by truck to the . . . brick factory 2 to 3 kilometers [1.2 to 1.9 miles] east of Sokal. There they were locked in and guarded.

After a brief interrogation, many of the prisoners were shot. In Sokal, members of Sk 4a shot, on June 28, “17 Communist functionaries, agents, and guerillas,” on June 29, “117 active Communists and NKVD agents,” and on June 30, “183 Jewish Communists.”²

In July, a Jewish Council (Judenrat) was created in the town, headed by the lawyer Grzegorz Januszczyński. It was assisted by the Jewish Police (Jüdischer Ordnungsdienst), which acted on the orders of the council. After about one month, the Jews were required to wear white armbands with a blue Star of David. Jews were registered for forced labor, and the Judenrat had to supply hundreds of forced laborers to the German authorities on a daily basis. At the end of July 1941, the German police demanded a large sum of gold from the Judenrat. Jews were also required to hand over furniture and other items to equip the apartments of the newly arrived German officials. Soon, most of the Jews’ property was confiscated, especially any valuables. Six Jewish hostages were shot on August 18, 1941, for disobeying the orders of the German authorities.³

From the fall of 1941 through to the summer of 1942, the Jews were subjected to forced labor, economic restrictions, and physical attacks. A number of Jews were shot by the German police on the streets of the town. At the end of December 1941, the Jews were required to surrender any fur items of clothing for the use of the German army. To enforce this decree, a number of Jews were held hostage. Many Jews suffered from hunger in the winter of 1941–1942, and the Jewish Council organized a soup kitchen to assist the needy.

From November 1941, those Jews without work permits, demonstrating regular employment for the Germans, could be rounded up and sent away to forced labor camps. For example, on March 28, 1942, 150 Jews were sent to a labor camp, and of this group, only 7 people subsequently returned. On

July 10, 1942, 10 people were shot for disobeying the orders of the occupation authorities, and on August 3, 1942, 32 more Jews were shot for violating the regulation that forbade Jews from praying.⁴

On hearing news of the pogroms and mass deportations of Jews from other towns in Distrikt Galizien, many Jews began to prepare bunkers or other hiding places inside the ghetto. On September 17, 1942, the first deportation Aktion took place in Sokal. In its course, some 2,000 Jews were deported to the Bełżec extermination camp and about 160 Jews were killed on the spot.⁵ During the Aktion, some Jews were betrayed by other local inhabitants, and a few members of the Jewish Police were used by the Gestapo to track down Jews in hiding.

After this Aktion, on October 15, 1942, a ghetto was established in the town. All the Jews had to move into the designated ghetto area, with the exception of the Jewish doctors, and any non-Jews were moved out. The ghetto was surrounded with barbed wire and was closely guarded by the police. It had only four wells, and its inhabitants suffered from a severe water shortage. There was also terrible overcrowding, with two families having to share a single room.⁶ On October 22–24, Jews from Radziechów, Łopatyn, Witków Nowy, Tartaków, and Mosty Wielkie were brought into the Sokal ghetto.⁷ Earlier, in January and June 1942, Jews from Steniatin had been brought to Sokal.⁸ In total, about 3,500 additional Jews were brought into the town. Following this concentration of Jews in Sokal, the Germans organized a second deportation Aktion, on October 28, in which more than 2,000 Jews were sent to Bełżec, and around 60 Jews were killed on the spot. During this Aktion, the head of the Judenrat, Januszczyński, was also killed.⁹

Of the approximately 4,000 Jews remaining in the ghetto, hundreds died of starvation and disease, especially typhus, in the winter of 1942–1943. The doctors could do little to help the sick, as the Landrat in Sokal, Löscher, forbade them from bringing any medicine into the ghetto.¹⁰

On May 27, the Germans liquidated the ghetto,¹¹ shooting about 3,000 Jews.¹² On June 7, 1943, Kreishauptmann Nehring announced on placards that his Kreis had been “cleansed of Jews.”¹³

After the Germans had been driven from the town by the Red Army on July 19, 1944, several dozen Jews who had been hiding in the surrounding woods and villages returned to Sokal. Many more had managed to escape from the ghetto, but most were captured and killed by German patrols or Ukrainian nationalist partisans.

On July 13, 1949, Oswald Heyduk was sentenced to life in prison by Landgericht München I. On August 24, 1981, Joachim Nehring was acquitted by Landgericht Stade.

SOURCES Information about the destruction of the Jewish population of Sokal can be found in Avraham Chomet, ed., Sefer Sokal (Tel Aviv: Irgun yots’e Sokal vеха-sevivah, 1968); Encyclopaedia Judaica, vol. 15 (Jerusalem: Keter, 1972), pp. 82–83; and Danuta Dabrowska, Abraham Wein, and Aharon Weiss, eds., Pinkas ha-kehillot. Encyclopaedia of Jewish Communities: Poland, vol. 2, Eastern Galicia (Jerusalem: Yad Vashem, 1980), pp. 352–355.

Documentation regarding the fate of the Jews in Sokal during the Holocaust can be found in the following archives: AŻIH (301/805, 1167, 2012, and 4971); BA-L; DALO; GARF (7021-67-82); USHMM (RG-22.008 [TsGAMORF], 236-2675-134, folder 7); VHF (# 3434, 24942, 24947, and 26101); and YVA (e.g., M-1/E/940).

Alexander Kruglov and Martin Dean
trans. Igor Puchkov

NOTES

1. GARF, 7021-67-82, p. 2.
2. BA-BL, R 58/214, Ereignismeldung UdSSR no. 24, July 16, 1941. See also LG-Darm, verdict in the case against Kuno Callsen and others, November 29, 1968, published in Justiz und NS-Verbrechen, vol. 31 (Amsterdam: Amsterdam University Press, 2004), Lfd. Nr. 694a; and YVA, M-1/E/940, testimony of Paulina Schochet (née Langer) (born in 1927).
3. YVA, M-1/E/940; GARF, 7021-67-82, p. 2.
4. GARF, 7021-67-82, p. 3.
5. Ibid., however, gives the figure of 2,300. YVA, M-1/E/940, gives 1,500.
6. YVA, M-1/E/940. VHF, # 3434, testimony of Ida Kuchberg; this witness, however, dates the establishment of the ghetto somewhat earlier. See also BA-L, ZStL, 208 AR 1415/66, interrogations of J. Nehring March 24, 1965, and W. Rebay von Ehrenwiesen, May 21, 1965.
7. AŻIH, 301/4971, testimony of Mozes Brüh. In mid-1942, there were 450 Jews in Lopatin, 920 in Tartaków, and 1,125 in Witków Nowy; see Tatiana Berenstein, “Eksterminacja ludności żydowskiej w dystrykcie Galicja (1941–1943),” BŻIH, no. 61 (1967), table 5.
8. AŻIH, 301/2012, testimony of Henoch Burg.
9. GARF, 7021-67-82, p. 4.
10. YVA, M-1/E/940. The father of this witness was a Jewish doctor.
11. AŻIH, 301/2012, 301/4971.
12. According to a ChGK file dated October 7, 1944, in the Sokal’ raion, 1,500 Jews died in the ghetto and 6,000 more Jews were shot on May 27, 1943 (GARF, 7021-67-82, p. 5). In our opinion, in view of the number of Jews then in the ghetto, this number is considerably too high.
13. BWSL, Bestand EL 317 III, LG-Stutt Ks 5/65.

STANISŁAWÓW

Pre-1939: Stanisławów, city, powiat and województwo center, Poland; 1939–1941: Stanislav, raion and oblast’ center, Ukrainian SSR; 1941–1944: Stanislau, Kreis center, Distrikt Galizien, Generalgouvernement; post-1991: Ivano-Frankivs’k, oblast’ center, Ukraine

Stanisławów is located 113 kilometers (70 miles) south-southeast of Lwów. On the outbreak of World War II, about 25,000 Jews were living there, comprising about one third of the population.

On July 2, 1941, Hungarian troops occupied Stanisławów, and by the end of July the Germans had taken control of the city. At that time, SS-Hauptsturmführer Hans Krüger arrived to become head of the newly established Grenzpolizeikommissariat (Border Police Office) in Stanisławów. He brought with him Heinrich Schott as his Judenreferent—the Jewish Affairs Officer. The Kreishauptmann in Stanisławów from September 1941 was Heinz Albrecht. It is significant that all the key figures in the German administration in Stanisławów were radical antisemites. On July 26, 1941, on the orders of the Gestapo, a Jewish Council (Judenrat) was established to organize Jewish life and, above all, to implement German orders. The chairman was Israel Seibald, who had been active in the Jewish community before the war. His deputy was the lawyer Michael Lamm.¹ The Jewish Council was ordered to establish the Jewish Police (Jüdischer Ordnungsdienst).

A crowd of people observes a mass exhumation in the Jewish cemetery of Stanisławów, 1945.

USHMM WS #80762, COURTESY OF JACEK NOWAKOWSKI

Parts of the Ukrainian and Polish population conducted attacks against Jews at the beginning of the occupation.

On August 1, 1941, Distrikt Galizien became the fifth Distrikt of the Generalgouvernement. One day later, Krüger ordered Seibald to draw up a list of Jews who belonged to independent professions, and these men were ordered to come to the Gestapo headquarters on Biliński Street, where they were tortured, and most of them were killed.² Anti-Jewish decrees soon followed; Jews had to wear armbands and perform forced labor. Soon the Jewish Council instructed the lawyer Dr. Tenenbaum to set up a labor office, where registered Jews had to assemble to be assigned to various jobs for the Germans. Later, in the ghetto, it was this office that organized the Jewish work details that went outside the ghetto. The Germans also plundered the Jewish population. In addition, the German civil administration, under Kreishauptmann Heinz Albrecht and Stadtkommissar Emil Beau, drew up plans to establish a ghetto.

Before the Jews were enclosed in a ghetto, the Germans wanted first to “decimate” them. On October 12, 1941, they demonstrated how they meant to “solve” the “Jewish question” in the area. This day was later called Blutsonntag (“Bloody Sunday”). Unlike the other districts of the Generalgouvernement, in the region of Stanisławów the local German administration did not wait until the extermination camps had been established. Thousands of Jews were gathered on the market square; then the German forces escorted them to the Jewish cemetery, where mass graves had been prepared. On the way, the German and Ukrainian escorts beat and tortured the Jews. At the cemetery, the Jews were compelled to surrender their valuables and show their papers. Some of them were then released, but the majority had to remain. The men of the Security Police (Sipo) then started the mass shootings, assisted by members of the German Order Police (Ordnungspolizei) and also the Railroad Police. Krüger personally took part in the shootings. The Germans ordered the Jews to undress in groups and then proceed to the graves, where they were shot. They fell into the grave or were ordered to jump in before being shot.

Some survivors have described the massacre in detail, revealing the incredible brutality employed by the German forces. Many survivors remember how bravely Dr. Tenenbaum of the Jewish Council went to his death. Krüger, the head of the Gestapo, offered to set him free, but Tenenbaum said that he rejected this offer from a murderer and that he wanted to die with his brethren.³ In the evening, those Jews still alive were allowed to leave the cemetery. The German forces shot between 8,000 and 12,000 Jews on that day.⁴ Seibald, the chairman of the Jewish Council, survived the massacre but lived in hiding afterwards. Most probably he was also killed later on. On the day after the bloodbath, Lamm was called to the Gestapo headquarters, where they informed him that he would be the new chairman of the Jewish Council.⁵

After the mass murder, the civil administration began preparations for the move of the remaining Jews into the designated ghetto area. The Jewish Council succeeded in negotiating with the Germans regarding the inclusion of certain specific streets, but by the end of October, the final borders had been determined. As was the case almost everywhere in occupied Eastern Europe, in Stanisławów the Germans selected the oldest and most neglected part of the city to house the ghetto. The exact number of Jews in the ghetto is not known, but at least 20,000 Jews were compelled to live in this tiny, densely overcrowded area. Those who lived outside the ghetto were required to move inside between December 1 and 15, 1941. Many Jews did not manage to find housing, and the Jewish Council had to put them up in every available space, including storehouses and synagogues. During the month of November, the "Aryan" population living in this part of the city had to move out. The ghetto was officially closed on December 20, 1941, with a wooden fence separating it from the rest of the city. In the houses directly on the ghetto's perimeter, the windows had to be blocked with wooden bars. There were three gates, each guarded by German Schutzpolizei and the Ukrainian militia on the outside and by the Jewish Police on the inside. The commandant of the Jewish Police was Zahler, a former sergeant in the Polish army. About 100 Jews served in the ghetto police.

Jews were permitted to leave the ghetto only to perform forced labor. There were several workshops, where Jews worked for the Germans. The Jewish labor office organized these workshops under its new chairman, Horowitz, who succeeded Dr. Tenenbaum. The labor office issued identity cards to the workers. Many Jews worked outside the ghetto for various German institutions, at factories in the city, and also on farms. Salomon Günsberg recalls: "The Jewish population carried out work under the most difficult circumstances, virtually without any tools and they were beaten during the work."⁶

The living conditions in the ghetto were catastrophic. The sanitary conditions were dreadful; hunger and various diseases became the permanent companions of the Jewish population. The official rations were far too small; more and more people died of hunger. The hospital was overcrowded. During the first winter in the ghetto, many people died of hunger and the cold. Only those with some money left were able to buy extra food on the black market, which had to be smuggled into the ghetto, but only a few people could afford the exorbitant prices demanded. It was possible to sell things legally to the non-Jewish population in a shop established and run by Eckhaus, a member of the Jewish Council. The Jewish Council, with Lamm as its head and Mordechai Goldstein as his deputy, tried to organize life and social welfare under these difficult conditions. Many different departments were established in the Jewish Council, most of which were directed by Jewish Council members. One of the most important departments was the supply division, which organized food supplies for the population. The Beschaffungsamt (department of food procurement) had to "calm down" members of the Gestapo and Schupo with bribes of money and other valuables. There was also a branch of the Jewish Social Self-Help (JSS) set up in Stanisławów, which received some money every month from the headquarters of the JSS in Kraków. But all these efforts to support the numerous poor inmates of the ghetto remained inadequate. Living conditions in the overcrowded ghetto deteriorated.⁷

By the end of March 1942, Krüger told Lamm that only 8,000 Jews could remain in the ghetto and the rest, old and sick people or beggars, would be taken to a labor camp. He ordered Lamm to hand over these Jews. When Lamm refused to comply, German police and Ukrainian policemen surrounded the ghetto during the night of March 31, 1942. In a brutal raid, they expelled many Jews from their houses and drove them to Belwederska Street. Houses were set on fire to force hidden Jews to come out. They had to march to the train station, where freight cars were already waiting, and the people were deported to the extermination camp in Bełżec. After these first deportations, the ghetto was reduced in size, and the German authorities instructed the labor office to prepare new lists of those Jews who were able to work and those who were not. The Jews were divided into three categories: A, young and healthy Jews working in important factories or institutions; B, Jews able to work but without employment at the moment; and C, weak, old, or sick Jews. After this registration, thousands of Jews belonging to category C were murdered, probably shot. Life became more and more unsafe: only Jews deemed fit to work were allowed to live in Stanisławów. The German police frequently searched the ghetto for Jews of category B, who had not yet found a place to work.⁸

The civil authorities also began concentrating the Jews from smaller communities such as Kałusz, Nadwórna, or Tłumacz, in Stanisławów. Most of them were then murdered in successive Aktions. These killings were carried out in the Rudolfsmühle (Rudolf's Mill), a three-story building that housed a grain mill. Here the Germans concentrated old and sick people, along with Jews from Ruthenia. Jews with invalid work permits or those caught smuggling were also taken here. Living conditions were even worse than in the ghetto. Ukrainian policemen guarded the building on the outside, and the guards inside were Jewish policemen. Krüger had ordered all the sick Jews in the mill building to be killed. Owing to conditions in the building and the already poor health of the prisoners, most of them soon fell ill. The mill, directly under the control of Judenreferent Schott, was a place of terror and mass murder. Schott personally took part in many of the shootings. Schupo Leutnant Ludwig Grimm often joined him in carrying out the shootings. After the first deportations to Bełżec, Jews were regularly taken to the mill and shot there. Up to July 1942, most killings were carried out at the mill, and from August onwards, in the courtyard of the Sipo headquarters. At this time the head of the Jewish Council was Goldstein, the former deputy head. It is not known exactly when Lamm was murdered and Goldstein succeeded him, but he was probably shot in a nearby forest together with other members of the Jewish Council in June or July 1942. On August 22, 1942, the Germans also killed Goldstein. He was hanged publicly as the first symbolic victim during a "reprisal Aktion." The alleged reason for this reprisal was the murder of a Ukrainian, which the Germans blamed on a Jew. Schupo commander Walter Streege led this Aktion. More than 1,000 Jews were shot. The German policemen raped some Jewish girls and women before taking them to the courtyard of the Sipo headquarters. Streege also ordered the hanging of about 20 members of the Jewish Police. The Germans left the dead bodies hanging there for two days as a means of deterrence and to terrorize the Jews.⁹

The next head of the Jewish Council in Stanisławów was Schönfeld. According to the accounts of survivors, he apparently proved to be unscrupulous and a loyal servant of the Germans. He organized a new Jewish Police for this purpose, of which he also became the head.¹⁰

About 11,000 Jews were still living in Stanisławów when the next Aktion took place. On Rosh Hashanah, which fell on September 12 in 1942, about 3,000 or 4,000 Jews were deported to Bełżec. On October 15, 1942, the Jewish population in Stanisławów was largely annihilated. Only a few Jews who continued to work for various German offices remained alive.

By January 1943, there were no more deportations to the extermination camp in Bełżec, but the police continued to carry out shootings of Jews. On February 22 or 23, 1943, Brandt, who had succeeded Krüger in August 1942, ordered the police forces to surround the ghetto, thus initiating the final liquidation. People were brutally taken from their houses and driven to the Jewish cemetery, where the German police shot them. Among the victims was the head of the Judenrat. Many Jews had prepared hiding places, but owing to lack of water and food, most of them soon emerged and were captured. Four days after the beginning of the Aktion, the Germans put up posters announcing that Stanisławów was "free of Jews" (judenfrei). According to Jewish testimonies, about 500 Jews still remained in the city for various work tasks, but these people were also gradually shot in turn. On June 25, 1943, most of the last Jews still living "legally" in Stanisławów were shot. Only a few professionals such as engineers and technicians were still kept in the central prison.¹¹

When the Soviet army reached Stanisławów on July 27, 1944, there were about 100 Jews in the city who had survived in hiding. In total, about 1,500 Jews from Stanisławów survived the war.¹²

A formal indictment against Hans Krüger was issued in October 1965, after six years of investigations by the Dortmund State Prosecutor's Office. On May 6, 1968, the Münster State Court sentenced him to life imprisonment. He was released in 1986.¹³ In Vienna and Salzburg, there were other trial proceedings against members of the Schupo and the Gestapo in Stanisławów in 1966.

SOURCES The testimonies of Julian Feuerman and Joachim Nachbar have been published: Julian Feuerman, "Pamiętnik ze Stanisławowa (1941–1943)," BŻIH, no. 59 (1966): 63–91; Joachim Nachbar, Endure, Defy and Remember. Memoir of a Holocaust Survivor (Southfield, MI: J. Nachbar, 1977, repub. 2003). There are many testimonies quoted in these publications: Elisabeth Freundlich, Die Ermordung einer Stadt namens Stanislau (Vienna, 1986); and Towiah Friedman, ed., Schupo und Gestapo Kriegsverbrecher von Stanislau vor dem Wiener Volksgericht: Dokumentensammlung (Haifa: Institute of Documentation in Israel for the Investigation of Nazi War Crimes, 1957).

Two excellent German studies of the annihilation of the Jews in Distrikt Galizien contain much information concerning the events in Stanisławów: Dieter Pohl, Von der "Judenpolitik" zum Judenmord. Der Distrikt Lublin des Generalgouvernements 1939–1944 (Frankfurt am Main: Peter Lang, 1993); and Thomas Sandkühler, "Endlösung" in Galizien. Der Judenmord in Ostpolen und die Rettungsinitiativen von Berthold Beitz 1941–1944 (Bonn: Dietz, 1996). Pohl has also published an article focused on Stanisławów: "Hans Krüger and the Murder of the Jews in the Stanisławów Region (Galicia)," Yad Vashem Studies 26 (1997): 239–264. In Danuta Dabrowska, Abraham Wein, and Aharon Weiss, eds., Pinkas ha-kehilot. Encyclopaedia of Jewish Communities: Poland, vol. 2, Eastern Galicia (Jerusalem: Yad Vashem, 1980), pp. 359–367, there is an entry for Stanisławów.

Documentation, including survivor testimonies, can be found in the following archives: AAN; AŻIH (e.g., 301/91, 889, 1093, 1161, 1734, 2169, 2171, 3238, 3258, 3913, 4680, 4966; and 302/135, 136, 175); DAI-FO; GARF; IPN; USHMM; VHF; and YVA. The documents from the trial in Münster against Hans Krüger and others can be found in BA-L (ZStL); IfZ; and ZSSta-D.

Andrea Löw

VOLUME II: PART A

Vienna. Hauptmann was later replaced by Oberleutnant Karl Klarmann in October 1942. A 70-man unit of Ukrainian Auxiliary Police (Ukrainische Hilfspolizei), led by a man named Nykolyn, backed the Germans up. The Security Police office in Stryj was subordinate to the Drohobycz Border Police Office (Grenzpolizeikommissariat, or GPK), led by SS-Sturmbannführer Franz Wenzel, who was replaced in May 1942 by Hans Block.³

On September 22–23, 1941, during Yom Kippur, the Security Police and Ukrainian policemen shot 830 Jews in the Holobutów Forest on the edge of the city. On October 2, Kreishauptmann von Dewitz ordered the establishment of a Jewish residential district (open ghetto), initially encompassing 16 streets in Stryj's old Jewish quarter. The resettlement of the Jews into the Jewish district progressed slowly. In January 1942, more than 2,000 Jews were still living outside the designated area, and it was not until July 1942 that the last non-Jews were required to leave. At this time, Jewish medical personnel, members of the Judenrat, and a few craftsmen were still permitted to reside outside the district, although they could not leave the city. About 4 people shared each room inside the district.⁴

Jews were also required to register for work and were employed, for example, in road construction, at a glass factory, and for the Heeresbarackenwerk—a German firm that built barracks for the Wehrmacht. Conditions at the latter firm were good, and people prized the positions there. Others, mainly women and small children inside the ghetto, worked making and repairing clothing.⁵

During the winter of 1941–1942, the Jews had to surrender all their winter clothing to the German army. Due to the lack of fuel, food, and adequate clothing, many died. A typhus outbreak also ravaged the ghetto, and the Jewish hospital quickly became overcrowded and unsanitary. At this time, a number of Jews were sent to perform forced labor in impoverished villages in the Carpathian Mountains. Only a few of them returned a few weeks later, bloated from starvation.⁶ According to a report by the mayor of Stryj, the Jewish population declined from around 11,000 to only 9,700 during the winter months.⁷

In the spring of 1942, the Security Police, assisted by the Schupo and the Ukrainian Auxiliary Police, conducted an Aktion in which they shot several hundred Jewish men, women, and children. By this time many Jews had prepared bunkers and other hiding places, but the perpetrators shot many people who tried to escape or hide.⁸ In June 1942, there were 9,744 Jews in Stryj, of whom 3,930 were working. In July, reportedly 22 percent of the Jews were dependent on welfare support, which a branch of the Jewish Social Self-Help (JSS), headed by Heinrich Kronstein, was distributing.⁹

In the fall of 1942, the GPK in Drohobycz organized four deportation Aktions to the Bełżec extermination camp. The first Aktion took place on September 3 when units of Hauptmann Kröpelin's 5th Company of the 124th Police Battalion, assisted by the Security Police, the Jewish Police, and the Ukrainian Auxiliary Police, deported 3,000 Jews and shot an additional 400 people on the spot. In September and October 1942, hundreds of Jews from the surrounding area were brought into Stryj, as the Kreishauptmann ordered that the villages be cleared of all but the most essential Jewish workers (e.g., doctors) by the end of October. The local authorities were to ensure that no Jews remained in hiding.¹⁰ On October 17–18, a second deportation Aktion occurred: 1,487 Jews were detained overnight in the synagogue and then transported to Bełżec the following morning. A third Aktion took place on October 21–24; this time 800 Jews were deported. The fourth Aktion was on November 15–16, during which 1,200 Jews were sent to Bełżec.¹¹

These deportations were badly organized and did not proceed on the basis of prepared lists. Rather, the German and Ukrainian police appeared to be simply meeting a quota, seizing Jews off the streets and dragging inhabitants from their homes to the synagogue regardless of age or employment. In the chaos, some Jews managed to hide. A few, like the teenager Friedrich Edelstein, managed to bribe Ukrainian guards to board up the windows of their train only loosely. Under the cover of nightfall, they removed the boards, jumped from the train, and made their way back to the ghetto. By the end of 1942, Stryj's Jews had no doubts about the fate that awaited them.¹²

After these Aktions, around 5,000 Jews remained in Stryj, including a number of nonworking Jews who were brought in from Bolechów by early December. Large posters announced that on December 1, 1942, an enclosed ghetto was officially declared in Stryj. The ghetto was on Berek Joselewicz, Kugnierska, Krawiecka, and Lwów Streets, occupying a smaller area than the previous residential district. The roads leading out of the ghetto were fenced off, and the exits were guarded. Some of those who were employed and had special armbands bearing the letter "W" were now relocated to camps established near their respective work sites, while their families remained in the ghetto. Inside the ghetto hunger reigned, and many, like the teenager Rena Goldstein, formed small knitting groups or other associations in an attempt to hold the community together.¹³

Conditions in the enclosed ghetto were markedly worse. Electricity and gas were cut off, and only two water pumps were available, so Jews had to stand in line for water. People stored water in the bunkers in preparation for the next Aktion. The dead were taken to the cemetery on a cart pulled by a wizened old mare. Some youths wanted to obtain arms to fight the Germans and were critical of the Judenrat for its quiescent attitude to the incessant German demands.¹⁴

On February 28, 1943, 1,000 people were executed by the Security Police, assisted by the Ukrainian police, in the Holobutów Forest. Raids were conducted also in the various work camps in an attempt to find unregistered workers who had sneaked into the camps, trying to find food and safety. On capture, these Jews were taken to the prison located at the city square to await execution. On at least one occasion, Jews attempted to resist these roundups; one young man attempted to stab a Security Police official, and the other prisoners used the ensuing chaos to try to escape. Other searches were conducted in the ghetto where the Security Police used them as a means to uncover valuables hidden by the inmates.¹⁵

On May 23, 1943, 1,000 ghetto inmates were deported first to the Janowska Street labor camp outside of Lwów, then to the Majdanek concentration camp. Then on June 5–7, the remaining 3,000 ghetto inmates were shot in the Holobutów Forest by the Security Police and Ukrainian policemen, who—according to eyewitnesses—exhibited signs of heavy alcohol consumption. After the ghetto liquidation, Kreishauptmann von Dewitz reported that the mass graves had been improperly covered, posing a health danger for the general population.¹⁶

In the months after the liquidation of the ghetto, the police conducted a series of searches to uncover Jews who remained in hiding. In September, 150 Jews who had been collected were executed together. Among the last to be killed were the Jewish doctors, who had continued to live together in a separate house. The labor camps in the surrounding area were also liquidated on June 22, July 13–14, and August 25–26. The majority of the inmates were executed, although 70 were deported to Drohobycz.¹⁷

Stryj was liberated by the Red Army on August 8, 1944, and several dozen Jews emerged from hiding. Some had escaped into the woods, while others had been hidden by Poles and Ukrainians. A number of survivors returned to the city, but they soon moved on.

In 1947 several members of the Security Police unit based in Stryj were arrested in Vienna and extradited to the Soviet Union, where they were tried for their crimes. They received sentences of varying durations, the last of them returning to Austria in 1955. On March 16, 1954, a Hamburg court sentenced Karl Klarmann to four years and six months in prison for his role in crimes committed in Stryj. On March 18, 1959, in Vienna, Josef Gabriel, a former member of the Drohobycz GPK, was sentenced to life in prison for his participation in atrocities committed in Eastern Galicia.

SOURCES The following publications contain information regarding the fate of Stryj's Jewish community during the Holocaust: N. Kudish, Sh. Rozenberg, and A. Rotfeld, eds., Sefer Stry (Tel Aviv: Irgun yotse Stri be-Yisrael, 1962)—an English translation is available at jewishgen.org; “Stryj,” in Danuta Dabrowska, Abraham Wein, and Aharon Weiss, eds., Pinkas ha-kehilot. Encyclopaedia of Jewish Communities: Poland, vol. 2, Eastern Galicia (Jerusalem: Yad Vashem, 1980), pp. 383–393; Tuvia Friedman, ed., Schupo-Kriegsverbrecher von Stryj (Haifa: T. Friedman, 1996); Tatiana Berenstein, “Eksterminacja ludności żydowskiej w dystrykcie Galicja (1941–1943),” BŻIH, no. 61 (1967); Thomas Sandkühler, “Endlösung” in Galizien. Der Judenmord in Ostpolen und die Rettungsinitiativen von Bertold Beitz 1941–1944 (Bonn: Dietz, 1996); and Dieter Pohl, Nationalsozialistische Judenverfolgung in Ostgalizien 1941–1944 (Munich: Oldenbourg, 1996).

Relevant documentation can be found in the following archives: AŻIH (e.g., 301/437, 1293, 1361, 1676, 2570, 2574, 2770, and 3033); BA-BL (R 58/214); BA-L (e.g., B 162/4932); DALO (e.g., R 1952-1-62, 63, 65, and 172); GARF (7021-58-21);

RGVA (1323-2-2926); USHMM (e.g., RG-31.003M [DALO]); VHF (e.g., # 1873, 6347, 20674, 29179, 46571); and YVA.

Alexander Kruglov, Michael McConnell, and Martin Dean
trans. Steven Seegel

NOTES

1. Kudish, Rozenberg, and Rotfeld, Sefer Stry, pp. 19–35.
2. BA-BL, R 58/214, Ereignismeldung UdSSR no. 20, July 12, 1941; AŻIH, 301/1293, testimony of Speranza Marguiles; 301/2574, testimony of Dr. Izaak Ajzenszer; VHF, # 46571, testimony of Rena Goldstein.
3. Friedman, Schupo-Kriegsverbrecher, p. 11, statement of Johann Kranzler, and p. 19, statement of Johann Pflamitzer.
4. DALO, R 1952-1-62, includes extensive correspondence on the establishment of the Jewish district, including a detailed street map.
5. GARF, 7021-58-21, pp. 59, 75; VHF, # 29179, testimony of Rosa Braseliten; # 20674, testimony of Fredrich Edelstein; # 6347, testimony of Samuel Drix.
6. VHF, # 1873, testimony of Thomas Blatt; Friedman, Schupo-Kriegsverbrecher, p. 18, statement of Johann Pflamitzer.
7. DALO, R 1952-1-62, Stadtverwaltung in Stryj an die Kreishauptmannschaft, February 25, 1942.
8. Kudish, Rozenberg, and Rotfeld, Sefer Stryj, pp. 41–50; Friedman, Schupo-Kriegsverbrecher, p. 7, statement of Alexander Garber.
9. DALO, R 1952-1-63 and R 1952-1-65.
10. Ibid., 1952-1-62, pp. 92, 98.
11. Berenstein, “Eksterminacja,” table 10; AŻIH, 301/2770, testimony of Freda Schwechter; 301/1293; 301/2574; RGVA, 1323-2-2926, pp. 28, 33, reports of the 5th Company, 124th Police Regiment, November 19 and 25, 1942.
12. VHF, # 20674, # 46571, and # 29179.
13. Y. Eshel and M.H. Eshel, Sefer ha-Zikkaron li-Kedoshei Bolehov (Haifa: Association of Former Residents of Bolechow in Israel, 1957), p. 325; VHF, # 20674 and # 46571; Friedman, Schupo-Kriegsverbrecher, p. 22, statement of Max Preuer; Kudish, Rozenberg, and Rotfeld, Sefer Stryj, pp. 41–50.
14. Kudish, Rozenberg, and Rotfeld, Sefer Stryj, pp. 41–50.
15. Friedman, Schupo-Kriegsverbrecher, p. 8, statement of Alexander Garber; VHF, # 20674.
16. DALO, R 1952-1-172, p. 89, Monatsbericht der Kreishauptmann Stryj für Mai/Juni 1943, as cited by Sandkühler, “Endlösung,” p. 378.
17. BA-L, B 162/4932, p. 23, statement of Semen Fendyk; Berenstein, “Eksterminacja,” pp. 31–32.

TARNOPOL

Pre-1939: Tarnopol, city, powiat and województwo center, Poland; 1939–1941: Ternopol', raion and oblast' center, Ukrainian SSR; 1941–1944: Tarnopol, Kreis center, Distrikt Galizien, Generalgouvernement; post-1991: Ternopil', oblast' center, Ukraine

Tarnopol is located about 120 kilometers (75 miles) east-southeast of Lwów. According to the 1931 census, 13,999 Jews were living in the city, and by June 1941, the Jewish population had grown to around 18,600.¹

Group portrait of members of the Jewish forced labor detail in the Tarnopol ghetto, ca. May 1943. Each forced laborer wears a "W," meaning "Wehrmacht," workers for the German army.

USHMM WS #33530, COURTESY OF GFH

Units of the German 9th Panzer Division and the SS-Division Wiking captured Tarnopol on July 2, 1941. Initially, the city was run by a military commandant's office (Ortskommandantur); then, in August, authority was transferred to a German civil administration. Tarnopol became the center of Kreis Tarnopol, within Distrikt Galizien. The position of Kreishauptmann in Tarnopol was occupied first by Gerhard Hager (until April 1942) and then by Mogens von Harbou und von der Hellen. Subordinated to the Kreishauptmann was a German Stadtkommissar or mayor (Saltner), who in turn supervised the Ukrainian city administration.

The anti-Jewish Aktionen in the city were organized and conducted by the Security Police (Sipo) and the SD. From mid-July 1941, an operational squad of the SD (SD-Einsatztrupp), subordinated to the Einsatzgruppe z.b.V. (for special purposes), was present in the city; the squad was commanded by SS-Hauptsturmführer Edmund Schöne. In the middle of September 1941, the squad consisted of 39 people, assisted by 60 members of the Ukrainian militia, 8 interpreters, and 20 more locals who served as drivers, auto mechanics, and clerks.²

In September 1941, the SD-Einsatztrupp was converted into an outpost of the Security Police and SD (Sipo/SD-Aussendienststelle) that between October 1941 and May 1943 was headed by SS-Sturmabführer Hermann Müller and, after June 1943, by SS-Hauptsturmführer Wilhelm Krüger. The Tarnopol outpost reported to the head of the Security Police and SD in Lwów. Tarnopol also had a squad of Schupo (German Order Police), which in turn supervised a detachment of Ukrainian Auxiliary Police (Ukrainische Hilfspolizei).

On July 4, 1941, Sonderkommando (Sk) 4b, commanded by SS-Sturmabführer Günther Herrmann, arrived in the city from Lwów. In accordance with the order, issued by the head of the Security Police and the SD (Reinhard Heydrich) on June 29, 1941, Sk 4b organized a pogrom. The pretext used was the discovery in the jail of the bodies of Ukrainian nationalists and German soldiers killed by the Soviet People's Commissariat of Internal Affairs (NKVD). Both local Ukrainian antisemites and German soldiers (including members of the SS-Division Wiking) participated in the pogrom.³ They broke into Jewish homes, dragged out any men they found, and shot them in the courtyards outside. Jews were also kidnapped off the streets, gathered at several collection points, including the synagogue, and then shot. Those Jews who were forced to wash and bury the corpses from the jail in mass graves were murdered upon completion of their work. The violence began to escalate out of control, so the Germans brought the killing to a halt. Several thousand people were murdered in the course of the pogrom that lasted one week.⁴ Sk 4b also reported shooting 127 people itself, mostly members of the Jewish intelligentsia.⁵

In the days following the pogrom, the Jews searched through the mass graves for their lost family and friends. In July 1941, Jewish property was confiscated, Jews were excluded from all business activity, their rations were reduced, kidnappings began for forced labor, and their freedom of movement was severely restricted. By early August of 1941, a Jewish Council (Judenrat), consisting of 12 to 18 people, had been established in the city. The Jewish Council was headed in turn by the attorney Gustav Fischer (until the beginning of 1942), Yakov Lipper (until September 10, 1942), Karol Porhyrles (until November 1942), and Pinhas Gruenfeld. As an executive body reporting to the Jewish Council, the Jewish Police (Jüdischer Ordnungsdienst) was created (consisting of 60 people). It was led by a man named Furstenberg from Warsaw. The Gestapo assigned the following tasks to the Jewish Council: to conduct the registration of the Jews, in seven days to collect a "contribution" of more than 1 million rubles, to mobilize all the Jews between 14 and 50 years of age for labor, and to ensure that all Jews wore an armband with the Star of David and marked their apartments with a similar sign.⁶

On September 5, 1941, the German authorities announced that a ghetto was being created in Tarnopol and that all Jews would have to move there by September 25. Some 7,000 additional Jews were forced to move into the poorest part of the city, where some 5,000 Jews already lived. The area consisted of only about 5 percent of the city and had very few wells.⁷ On December 1, 1941, the territory of the ghetto was surrounded by a tall fence and barbed wire. One could enter and exit the ghetto only through two gates that were guarded by German and Ukrainian police externally and the Jewish Police internally. Cramped space (there were several families living in each room), unsanitary conditions, cold, hunger, and shortages of clothing soon led to a typhus epidemic in the ghetto. Despite the enclosure of the ghetto, Jews were still able to barter items for food with the non-Jewish population, as every day hundreds of Jews passed through the gates to their places of work.

At the end of December 1941, the Jews were ordered to surrender all their fur items; to ensure that the Jews obeyed this order the Gestapo took 12 Jews hostage. After the Jewish Council collected and handed over the furs, the Gestapo conducted a search and discovered fur items in the homes of the Schwartz family; for that, all 5 family members were shot.

In the ghetto the Jewish Council operated a hospital and a clinic, but these facilities were inadequate to meet the population's needs, and medicine was in short supply. A soup kitchen also provided food for the needy, but living conditions in the orphanage and the old-age home were appalling. The rooms were unheated, and some people slept on the floor. There were almost no medical supplies or medicine, and insufficient food led to starvation. In the winter of 1941–1942, the burial society had to bury many people in mass graves.

At the end of 1941 and the beginning of 1942, on the orders of the Gestapo, the Jewish Council, with the aid of the Jewish Police, conducted several roundups in the ghetto in which they seized several hundred young healthy Jews and sent them to the labor camps in Borki Wielkie, Kamionki, Hłuboczek Wielki, and Zagrobela. The Jewish Council was also required to provide these laborers with tools, food, and clothing; to pay the wages of the German staff and Ukrainian guards of the camps; and in the event of a laborer's death, to send a replacement worker.

The Security Police conducted the first Aktion in the ghetto on March 23, 1942. On the orders of the Gestapo, the Jewish Police collected 630 people (the elderly, the sick, and the handicapped), including 150 children. These people were then shot, together with the children from the Jewish orphanage, by the Gestapo and Ukrainian police in the Janowska Forest outside the city. Supposedly, the Gestapo originally demanded 1,000 people, but after receiving a bribe, it agreed to a smaller number.⁸

After this Aktion, according to the data of the city administration, 11,350 Jews remained in the ghetto as of April 20, 1942.⁹ This number diminished in May 1942, when several hundred women were sent to work on the kok-saghyz (synthetic rubber) plantations in Jagielnica near Czortków.

During July and August 1942, the Jews from nearby villages, including Balkowce, Smykowce, and Gaje Wielkie, were brought into the Tarnopol ghetto. On August 31, 1942, at 4:30 A.M., the ghetto was surrounded by German and Ukrainian police, and the residents were ordered to gather at the public square.¹⁰ A deportation Aktion was then conducted by the German and Ukrainian policemen, assisted by the Jewish Police, during which 2,600 to 2,800 Jews were rounded up. Only some of the Jews with work cards were exempted from the transport. Other railroad cars with Jews from Mikulińce, Zbaraż, and Strusów were added to the train leaving Tarnopol for the Bełżec extermination camp.¹¹

After this Aktion, the Gestapo demanded from the Jewish Council 2 grams (0.7 ounce) of gold from each Jew, promising to stop the Aktions. The Judenrat handed over more than 30 kilograms (66 pounds) of gold, but the Aktions continued. In early September, the area of the ghetto was reduced, and Jews had to move into the smaller section within a few hours. Now the ghetto residents struggled to obtain work cards, improve or create hiding places, and buy forged documents or poison.

Only a few people with sufficient money or connections were able to find a safe hiding place outside the ghetto.

On September 30, 1942, the second deportation Aktion took place. In the course of the Aktion, 750 Jews were rounded up and sent to the Bełżec extermination camp.¹² After this Aktion the ghetto was reduced in size. During further deportation Aktions in October and in early November, approximately 2,500 people were captured and deported.¹³ In October 1942, more Jews arrived in the Tarnopol ghetto from other towns, including Kozłów and Mikulińce, as it was one of the few places where Jews could still reside. During the November deportation Aktion, about 1,000 Jews were rounded up for deportation and forced for two days to remain at a mill that served as a collection point. During these two days the Jewish Council and Jewish Police replaced their own relatives or people who paid them with other less fortunate members of the community.¹⁴ In total, during the four Aktions in the second half of 1942, more than 6,000 Jews were deported to Bełżec.

In November 1942, a Jewish labor camp (Julag), a branch of the Janowska Street camp in Lwów commanded by SS-Untersturmführer Richard Rokita, was established in Tarnopol. Jewish craftsmen, as well as all able-bodied Jews, were placed in this camp. As of January 13, 1943, 5,246 Jews officially remained in the city, in the ghetto and in the labor camp combined, although others remained illegally.¹⁵ Starting in April 1943, the Security Police, with the aid of the German Schutzpolizei, the Ukrainian Auxiliary Police, and the Jewish Police, regularly conducted Aktions in the ghetto, which resulted in the extermination of the Jews unfit to work and the transfer to labor camps of the able-bodied. On April 7, 1943, one of the ghetto inmates wrote: "Our end is coming constantly closer. We sense it and know it. . . . From January until April 1943, it was quiet. . . . In April everything started again. A small number of people from the ghetto were dragged away somewhere and murdered. 20 people. On Monday again 50 people, and so forth."¹⁶

On April 9, about 1,500 Jews were shot, leaving some 700 Jews in the ghetto. The ghetto was finally liquidated on June 18–20, 1943. On June 23, 1943, the city was officially declared to be "cleansed of Jews" (judenrein).¹⁷

Altogether, about 3,000 Jews from the ghetto were shot in the period from March to June of 1943.

In mid-July 1943, there were about 2,000 Jews remaining in the labor camp. On July 23, German police surrounded the Julag, and most of the camp inmates (about 1,500 people) were shot near the village of Petryków by the Gestapo and the Ukrainian police. With them were also shot the members of the Jewish Police from the former ghetto. About 100 people were sent to the Janowska Street camp in Lwów. Several hundred Jews avoided execution by hiding. To capture them the Gestapo promised that all those who voluntarily came out of hiding would be sent to the camp in Lwów. Some of those in hiding tried to defend themselves with grenades and guns; however, it was to no avail, as almost all were murdered or committed suicide. On July 31, 1943, several hundred Jews who emerged from hiding were sent to the station, where they were held for one day in railroad carriages before being killed in the evening.¹⁸

Between 1941 and 1944, more than 10,000 Jews were killed in Tarnopol, about 6,000 Jews were deported to the Bełżec extermination camp, over 1,000 were sent to various labor camps, and several hundred died of disease and hunger in the ghetto.

Several people of Polish nationality in Tarnopol actively assisted Jews. Especially distinguished were Dr. Kolczycki, a physician with the railway administration, who helped Jews during Aktions; a Polish woman, Karola Pietroszyńska, who hid two Jews on her farm for nine months; and the Polish shoemaker Franciszek Stech and his wife, who employed a number of Jews, giving some fictitious jobs, so that they were registered with the German labor office. During the Aktions, they sheltered these Jews in their home.

Only about 750 Jews from Tarnopol and the surrounding area are known to have survived the Holocaust. Most of these survivors subsequently migrated to Poland.

On July 15, 1966, Hermann Müller was sentenced to life in prison by a German court in Stuttgart.

SOURCES Much of the information for this entry is derived from Danuta Dabrowska, Abraham Wein, and Aharon Weiss, eds., Pinkas ha-kebilot. Encyclopaedia of Jewish Communities: Poland, vol. 2, Eastern Galicia (Jerusalem: Yad Vashem, 1980), pp. 234–253—an English translation by Shlomo Sneh and Francine Shapiro is available on jewishgen.org. Other relevant publications on the persecution and murder of the Jews of Tarnopol include the following: P. Korngrün, ed., Tarnopol (Jerusalem: Hevrat ensiklopedyah shel galuyot, 1955); Żaneta Margules, “Moje przeżycia w Tarnopolu podczas wojny,” BŻIH, no. 36 (1960): 62–94; and Pesah Hertsog, Be-tsel banesher ha-shabor: ‘Ayarati Tarnopol mitbošet be-damah (Tel Aviv: Yaron Golan, 1996). Correspondence written in the Tarnopol ghetto in April 1943 has been published in Walter Zwi Bacharach, ed., Dies sind meine letzten Worte . . . Briefe aus der Schoah (Göttingen: Wallenstein, 2006), pp. 112–120.

Relevant documentation can be found in the following archives: AŻIH (e.g., 301/367, 2049, 3176, 4837, and 4845); BA-BL (R 58/214); BA-L (e.g., ZStL, 208 AR-Z 294/59); DATO; GARF (7021-75-105); RGVA (1323-1-59); TsDAVO; USHMM (e.g., RG-02.140); VHF (e.g., # 2874, 11785, 41613); and YVA.

Alexander Kruglov and Martin Dean
trans. Igor Puchkov

NOTES

1. Tatiana Berenstein, “Eksterminacja ludności żydowskiej w dystrykcie Galicja (1941–1943),” BŻIH, no. 61 (1967), table 11; GARF, 7021-75-105, p. 187.

2. RGVA, 1323-1-59, p. 258, report of the Tarnopol squad (Mittsner) to the head of the Security Police and SD in Warsaw (department 1), September 21, 1941.

3. BA-BL, R 58/214, Ereignismeldung UdSSR (EM) no. 14 (July 6, 1941), no. 19 (July 11, 1941), no. 24 (July 16, 1941), and no. 28 (July 20, 1941).

4. GARF, 7021-75-105, pp. 136, 181, 187, and verso, gives the figure of 4,600 victims. Bacharach, Dies sind meine letzten

Worte, p. 113, letter from Tarnopol, April 1943, gives almost 5,000. German sources put the number somewhat lower.

5. BA-BL, R 58/214, EM nos. 14, 19, and 28 (July 1941).

6. GARF, 7021-75-105, pp. 4–5.

7. Ibid., p. 5. For a list of the streets inside the ghetto, see Dabrowska, Wein, and Weiss, Pinkas ha-kebilot: Poland, vol. 2, pp. 234–251.

8. GARF, 7021-75-105, p. 136; AŻIH, 301/3176, testimony of Róża Spiess, dates the Aktion on March 24.

9. TsDAVO, 4620-3-308, p. 106.

10. USHMM, RG-02.140, Herbert R. Ert, “The Diary of a Survivor.”

11. GARF, 7021-75-105, pp. 136, 174, 187, 270.

12. Ibid., pp. 84, 134, 136.

13. Ibid., p. 85.

14. Margules, “Moje przeżycia,” pp. 79–80.

15. TsDAVO, 4620-3-308, p. 106.

16. Bacharach, Dies sind meine letzten Worte, pp. 112–117.

17. Ibid., pp. 118–119; Verdict of LG-Stutt, Ks 7/64, July 15, 1966, published in Justiz und NS-Verbrechen, vol. 24 (Amsterdam: Amsterdam University Press, 1998), Lfd. Nr. 634.

18. GARF, 7021-75-105, pp. 134, 202.

TŁUMACZ

Pre-1939: Tłumacz, town, powiat center, Stanisławów województwo, Poland; 1939–1941: Tłumach, raion center, Stanislav oblast’, Ukrainian SSR; 1941–1944: Tłumacz, Kreis Stanislaw, Distrikt Galizien, Generalgouvernement; post-1991: Tłumach, raion center, Ivano-Frankivs’k oblast’, Ukraine

Tłumacz is located about 24 kilometers (15 miles) east-southeast of Stanisławów. There were 2,012 Jews living in Tłumacz in 1921 (35 percent of the total).

Hungarian forces occupied the town on July 7, 1941. Then in September 1941, a German civil administration took over. Tłumacz became part of the Kreis Stanislaw, within Distrikt Galizien. The Kreishauptmann in Stanisławów from 1941 to 1944 was Regierungsrat Dr. Heinz Albrecht.

Jews board a deportation train in the Tłumacz ghetto, ca. 1942.
USHMM WS #07516, COURTESY OF YIVO

The anti-Jewish Aktions in the town were organized and carried out by the Security Police outpost (Sipo-Aussendienststelle) in Stanisławów, which from the end of 1941 to early November 1942 was commanded by SS-Hauptsturmführer Hans Krüger; and from November 1942, by his former deputy, SS-Untersturmführer Oskar Brandt.

In Tłumacz itself, there were outposts of the German Criminal Police (Kripo) and the German Gendarmerie, as well as a detachment of the Ukrainian Auxiliary Police (Ukrainische Hilfspolizei), which took an active part in the Aktions.

During the period of administration by the Hungarian army (July–August 1941), generally it treated the Jews properly, sometimes hindering antisemitic Aktions organized by Ukrainian nationalists. Hungarian anti-Jewish measures were limited to organizing a Jewish Council and marking the Jews. In August 1941, about 1,200 to 1,500 Jewish refugees arrived in Tłumacz, having been deported from Hungary. The Ukrainians ordered them to be expelled to a camp near Horodenka, along with some local Jews who were helping them. The Ukrainians then tied them up with barbed wire and threw them into the Dniester River to drown. They also drove out the Jews from Tłumacz to Hocimierz and denounced them to the Germans as “Bolsheviks.” The German officers, however, rejected the allegations. They disarmed the Ukrainians, beat them, and sent the Jews back to Tłumacz. On their return, the Jews found that their homes had been looted.¹

With the transfer of authority to the Germans, conditions for the Jewish population rapidly deteriorated. The Germans soon confiscated a large portion of Jewish property, especially any valuables. They were registered and made to perform hard labor, during which they were beaten.

At the end of August 1941, after the shooting of several leading Jews on the authority of the Gestapo chief, Krüger, in Stanisławów, two SS men came to Tłumacz demanding that several prominent Jews also be turned in. The newly appointed heads of the Jewish Council (Judenrat), Eliyahu Redner and his deputy, Moshe Mendel Bildner, warned the men to hide. The Germans then shot Redner and Bildner for their disobedience. The Germans also threatened to shoot another 300 Jews, so the 3 in hiding gave themselves up and were killed.

After this incident, the Judenrat was reconstituted, with Dr. Steinberg as chairman on the advice of Haim Ritzer, who had been appointed chief of the Jewish Police by the Germans. Steinberg’s deputy was Herzl Spirer, and Steinberg’s brother also served on the Judenrat.

In October 1941, when the Jews of Tłumacz were ordered to turn in all their gold, silver, cash and foreign currency, furs, and soap to the Gestapo, the Judenrat was made responsible for its collection. These items were required to furnish 32 rooms for German administrators who had arrived in the town. On October 12, 1941, news arrived from Stanisławów that more than 10,000 Jews had been murdered there on the previous day by the Gestapo and the Ukrainian policemen, which spread alarm among the Jews of the region. During the winter of 1941–1942, many Jews from Tłumacz were seized and sent to work in various labor camps in the area.²

In the spring of 1942, about 1,500 Jews from the surrounding villages, including the village of Hołosków, were brought into Tłumacz, raising the town’s population to about 3,500 Jews.³ At the beginning of April 1942, the German SS officers Doppler, Schäfer, and Metz arrived from Horodenka and began to organize a series of anti-Jewish Aktions. On one occasion, more than 1,000 Jews were assembled on the pretext of registration. They were told to bring up to 27 kilograms (60 pounds) of luggage in order to allay fears about their fate. During this Aktion, the Jewish Police used force to bring people to the assembly point at the Polish school. Then the German authorities sent them to Stanisławów, where they were subsequently murdered.⁴

In another Aktion organized by the Security Police, probably on May 18, 1942, German security forces murdered some 160 Jews in Tłumacz and sent several hundred others to labor camps, including the Janowska Street camp in Lwów, where most died shortly afterwards. Two weeks later the Germans deported 78 more Jews.⁵

A ghetto was established in the town with the active participation of the Jewish Council, probably at the end of March or the beginning of April 1942. It was then enclosed a few weeks later, just after the deportation Aktion on May 18. However, the ghetto was not closely guarded, and it remained possible to escape. Nevertheless, food was very scarce, and the Jews had to barter their last possessions for flour. Owing to the unsanitary and overcrowded conditions, about 280 people died in the ghetto of disease and hunger. After the ghetto was sealed, the Judenrat organized the distribution of the limited amounts of bread, flour, potatoes, and thin milk still supplied to the ghetto. The size of the ghetto was reduced with successive deportations; by the end, it consisted only of a couple of housing blocks.⁶

Although the Judenrat exercised nominal authority inside the ghetto, real power lay in the hands of the Kripo, which took its orders from SS-Obersturmführer Schäfer of the Gestapo. Schäfer placed three Poles in charge of the ghetto, the former schoolteachers Banderowsky, Sitnik, and Zborowsky, all serving in the Kripo under the German Schubert. During the summer, these men were primarily responsible for the murder of several hundred Jews. For example, they ordered the Judenrat to set up a Jewish hospital staffed by Jews. However, shortly after its establishment, they murdered the patients and staff with their own hands. Sometimes these three Poles roamed through the ghetto, shooting and killing at random. On another occasion, several Jews were shot while working to remove gravestones from the Jewish cemetery. Jews who escaped from the ghetto and hid in the forests were mostly caught by Ukrainian policemen and handed over to the Gestapo.

The clearance of the ghetto started in mid-August 1942, once the Ukrainian militia had herded the remaining Jews from the surrounding countryside into the ghetto on completion of the harvest. Seeing that many people sent for forced labor did not return, some Jews prepared bunkers within the ghetto, and the numbers reporting for work declined to only a few hundred. To entice more Jews out, the authorities provided increased rations and even permitted Jews to leave the ghetto for two hours a day. This did tempt some Jews to come out of hiding. However, a few days later the Gestapo and Ukrainian police surrounded the ghetto. On September 8, the last large group was deported. On this occasion the Gestapo, SS men, and local policemen drove the Jews to the square, where members of the Judenrat, including its last head, Dr. Steinberg, were added to the waiting group. The Jews were then taken to the railway station and were either murdered in Stanisławów shortly afterwards or deported to the Bełżec extermination camp. As many as 2,000 Jews may have been included in these last deportations in August and September 1942.⁷ The Germans kept back some 80 craftsmen to help sort out property from the ghetto, but these people were murdered only a few days later. In its situation report for December 1942, the Gendarmerie platoon in Stanisławów reported that the ghetto in Tłumacz had been liquidated.⁸

Some Jews managed to survive the liquidation by escaping from the ghetto after emerging from their bunkers or by jumping from the trains. However, most of the local population was unwilling to help them, as the Germans threatened with death anyone caught assisting Jews. Nevertheless, those who had long-standing contacts with local peasants, who were prepared to risk hiding them, had a better chance of surviving. Only about 30 surviving Jews returned to Tłumacz in the first days after its liberation by the Red Army in 1944, and 2 of these were murdered by Ukrainian nationalist partisans shortly afterwards. Most survivors soon left the town, immigrating to Israel or other countries in the West.

In 1945–1946 Heinz Albrecht was held captive, but in 1949 he again served in the local administration as an Oberregierungsrat (senior government official) in Hildesheim. Hans Krüger was tried before the State Court in Münster in 1968 and sentenced to life imprisonment. He died in 1988. Brandt died in 1948 in jail in Breslau.

SOURCES Articles on the destruction of the Jewish population of the town can be found in Shlomo Blond et al., eds., Tłumacz-Tłomitsb: Sefer Edut Ve-Zikaron (Memorial Book of Tłumacz) (Tel Aviv: Tłumacz Society, 1976); in Shlomo Blond, The Righteous Gentiles (Israel: Shlomo Blond, 1983); and also in Danuta Dabrowska, Abraham Wein, and Aharon Weiss, eds., Pinkas ha-kebilot. Encyclopaedia of Jewish Communities: Poland, vol. 2, Eastern Galicia (Jerusalem: Yad Vashem, 1980), pp. 264–265.

Documents and testimonies describing the fate of the Jews of Tłumacz are located in the following archives: AŻIH (301/1425, 3126, and 4977); DAI-FO (R 36-1-15); GARF (7021-73-19); USHMM (RG-02.088); and YVA.

Alexander Kruglov, Samuel Fishman, and Martin Dean
trans. Michael Rosenbush

NOTES

1. Blond et al., Tłumacz-Tłomitsb, pp. cxxii–cxxiii.
2. Ibid., p. cxxiii.
3. GARF, 7021-73-19, p. 5; AŻIH, 301/4977 (Jehuda Feuer) and AŻIH, 301/1425 (Eugenia Seinfeld).
4. GARF, 7021-73-19, p. 18; AŻIH, 301/4977.
5. GARF, 7021-73-19, p. 27.
6. Ibid., pp. 19 and verso; Blond et al., Tłumacz-Tłomitsb, pp. cxxiii–cxxiv, cxli; USHMM, RG-02.088, “An Angel at My Doorstep,” by Fran Finkelstein.
7. Blond et al., Tłumacz-Tłomitsb.
8. DAI-FO, R 36-1-15, pp. 1–2, situation report of Gend.-Zug Stanisław for December 1942.

TŁUSTE

Pre-1939: Tłuste, town, Zaleszczyki powiat, Tarnopol województwo, Poland; 1939–1941: Tolstoye, raion center, Ternopol’ oblast’, Ukrainian SSR; 1941–1944: Tłuste, Kreis Czortkow, Distrikt Galizien, Generalgouvernement; post-1991: Tovste, Zalizhchyky raion, Ternopil’ oblast’, Ukraine

Tłuste is located about 80 kilometers (50 miles) south of Tarnopol. On the eve of World War II, about 2,000 Jews lived in Tłuste out of a total population of some 3,000.¹ Under Soviet occupation from September 1939 until July 1941, some Jews were among those deported to Siberia by the Soviet authorities, which also established collective farms in the region.

On July 7, 1941, a local Ukrainian administration was organized in Tłuste as soon as the Soviets fled the town before the advancing German army. At this time, a train containing ammunition exploded and burned down the railroad station. That night local Ukrainian antisemites organized a pogrom against the Jews in the nearby village of Ułaszkwice (Jewish population 138 in 1921), murdering most of them. Further pogroms followed in other villages, causing many Jews to flee to Tłuste. A pogrom was also feared in Tłuste, but it was prevented with the aid of two local priests and other prominent Ukrainians in the town.² The arrival of a Hungarian garrison on July 10, 1941, helped to stabilize the situation. The Hungarian commandant organized a Jewish Council (Judenrat) based in the building of a bank and conducted a registration of the Jews, obliging them to wear distinguishing armbands. After a few weeks, some Jews deported from Hungary as non-citizens arrived in Tłuste and were made to perform forced labor. When the number of Jewish refugees in Tłuste became too great, some of these people were sent to Kamenets-Podolskii. Other refugees in Tłuste attempted to cross the border back into Hungary, but they risked being killed by German and Ukrainian patrols.³

In the meantime, in August 1941, authority had been transferred to a German civil administration. Tłuste became part of Kreis Czortkow, within Distrikt Galizien. At first, the Kreishauptmann was the former deputy Gestapo chief in Stettin, SS-Sturmbannführer Dr. Gerhard Littschwager, and from

The deportation of the Jewish population of Tłuste.
USHMM WS #44360

April 1942, former Stadthauptmann (city mayor) in Lwów, SS-Hauptsturmführer Dr. Hans Kujath.

The anti-Jewish Aktions in the town were organized by the Security Police outpost (Sipo-Aussendienststelle) based in Czortków. The heads of this office successively were SS-Obersturmführer Karl Hildemann (from October 1941 to October 1942), SS-Untersturmführer Hans Velde (from October 1942 to February 1943), and SS-Sturmscharführer Heinrich Peckmann (from February to September 1943). In Tłuste there was a post of the German Gendarmerie and Ukrainian Auxiliary Police, both of which took an active part in the anti-Jewish Aktions. A man named Schab was particularly notorious among the Ukrainian policemen.⁴

With the transfer of power to the Germans, the situation of the Jews deteriorated severely. They were required to wear white armbands with a blue Star of David and forbidden to leave the limits of the town, appear on its main street, and leave their homes after dark. In the fall of 1941, Jews were prohibited from shopping in the market except for a brief two-hour period, and the Ukrainian police sometimes still beat them even then. All men aged between 14 and 60 had to perform forced labor on a regular basis, which was organized by the Jewish Council, headed by Dr. Aberman. The Jewish Police (Jüdischer Ordnungsdienst) assisted in collecting “contributions” in money and goods demanded by the German authorities.

On November 15, 1941 (according to some sources, in January 1942), 150 Jews from Tłuste were sent to work at the labor camp at Kamionki, and in March 1942, 120 more Jews were dispatched to the Borki Wielkie forced labor camp (both camps were not far from Tarnopol).⁵ From February 1942, several hundred Jewish women were sent to work on the plantations for kok-saghyz—a plant similar to tobacco, used for the production of synthetic rubber, which under war conditions was considered a strategic resource. In charge of the plantation works was the Rubber Administration Office of the Generalgouvernement with its main office in Jagielnica headed by Kriegsverwaltungsrat Dr. Hanf. One of the branch offices was in Tłuste, which was responsible for rubber production on seven nearby estates. The Jews (mainly women) who worked on the plantations were not only from Tłuste but also from numerous other towns and villages of the region, including Czortków and Tarnopol. Initially the workers received some food and a daily wage of 2 zloty. Other Jews worked (some illegally) as craftsmen for the local population. Jewish survivor Adela Sommer, who made knit wear for local Ukrainians while in Tłuste, recalls: “One young man remarked he hoped that she wouldn’t be killed until the gloves she was knitting for him were completed.”⁶

In 1942, the German authorities conducted two deportation Aktions in Tłuste, sending Jews to the Bełżec extermination camp. The first Aktion took place on August 25 when 300 people were captured and deported to Bełżec in the same train with Jews from Czortków and Jagielnica.⁷ After that Aktion, on September 20, all the Jews in Zaleszczyki, about 2,700 people, were moved to Tłuste.⁸ The second Aktion took place on October 5, 1942, when 1,000 people were deported to Bełżec and about 120 people were murdered in the town.⁹

On December 1, 1942, on the order of the Höherer SS- und Polizeiführer (HSSPF) in the Generalgouvernement, SS-Obergruppenführer Friedrich Wilhelm Krüger, a ghetto was formed in the town. The ghetto was an open one, meaning that unlike most other ghettos in Distrikt Galizien at this time, it was not isolated from the outside world.¹⁰ Officially, 1,500 people lived in the ghetto,¹¹ but in reality, there were about 5,000 Jews living there. The ghetto existed for half a year.

In the winter of 1942–1943, a typhus epidemic broke out in the ghetto after the arrival of Jews from many places brought unbearable congestion. The death rate reached 6 to 8 people per day.¹² Sensing that the liquidation of the ghetto was only a matter of time, Jews prepared bunkers inside the ghetto or made plans to flee to the forest or hide with local peasants. On February 12, 1943, four drunken Gestapo men went on a rampage in the ghetto and shot 40 Jews in Tłuste.

On May 27, 1943, a squad of the Security Police from Czortków, together with the German Gendarmerie and Ukrainian police, liquidated the ghetto, shooting 3,000 Jews at the Jewish cemetery.¹³ Since some of the Jews managed to escape the killing by hiding, on June 6 another Aktion was conducted in Tłuste, during which an additional 1,000 people were arrested and shot in the cemetery.¹⁴ Over the following days, in the course of searches for Jews in hiding, the German Gendarmerie and Ukrainian policemen captured and shot several hundred more people.

After the liquidation of the ghetto, the forced labor camp for Jews (Zwangsarbeitslager für Juden, ZALfJ) in Tłuste for workers on the kok-saghyz plantations remained in existence. In July 1943, there were 20 laborers there, and at the beginning of 1944, due to the influx of Jewish refugees from other estates, 450 workers. The Red Army entered Tłuste on March 23, 1944, but the battle for the town continued into April. At this time 65 or more of the surviving Jews perished when the Germans bombed the town.¹⁵

After the war, Gerhard Littschwager was under investigation by the State Prosecutor's Office in Darmstadt for some time; the investigation was closed in 1972. Hans Kujath also was under investigation for some time; the case was closed due to his death in 1963. Karl Hildemann died in 1945 in American captivity. Hans Velde died in 1943 from typhus. Heinrich Peckmann was acquitted by the State Court in Saarbrücken on August 25, 1962.

SOURCES Publications on the persecution and destruction of the Jewish population of Tłuste include Gavriel Lindenberg, ed., Sefer Tlustab (Tel Aviv: Irgun yots'e Telustah veba-sevivah be-Yirsrael uve-Artsot ha-Berit, 1965); Baruch Milch, Can Heaven Be Void? (Jerusalem: Yad Vashem, 2003); Danuta Dabrowska, Abraham Wein, and Aharon Weiss, eds., Pinkas ha-kehillot. Encyclopaedia of Jewish Communities: Poland, vol. 2, Eastern Galicia (Jerusalem: Yad Vashem, 1980), p. 526; and Joseph J. Preil, ed., Holocaust Testimonies: European Survivors and American Liberators in New Jersey (New Brunswick, NJ: Rutgers University Press, 2001), pp. 193–197. An essay titled “History of Tłuste/Tovste—My Story” was published by Douglas Hykle in 2006 (www.tovste.info/MyStory.php).

Relevant documentation can be found in the following archives: AŻIH (301/1310, 2860, 3281, 3298, 3337, 3360, 3491, 3882, 3886; and 302/98, 128); DATO; GARF (7021-75-107); USHMM (RG-50.002*0026); and YVA.

Alexander Kruglov and Martin Dean
trans. Igor Puchkov

NOTES

1. Testimony of Julius Sommer in Preil, Holocaust Testimonies, p. 195.
2. AŻIH, 301/3337, 3281, 3491; 302/128 (in Yiddish) and 98; USHMM, RG-50.002*0026, oral history interview with Adela Sommer, 1983.
3. AŻIH, 301/3281.
4. Ibid., 301/3882, 3886.
5. GARF, 7021-75-107, pp. 82–83, 180.
6. USHMM, RG-50.002*0026.
7. GARF, 7021-75-107, p. 180. Among those deported were also 70 Jewish women who worked on the kok-saghyz plantations.

8. Ibid., p. 141.

9. Ibid., p. 175. Milch, Can Heaven Be Void?, pp. 102–103, gives the figure of 200 killed on the spot.

10. Tatiana Berenstein, “Eksterminacja ludności żydowskiej w dystrykcie Galicja (1941–1943),” BŻIH, no. 61 (1967): 18–19.

11. Ibid., p. 27.

12. Milch, Can Heaven Be Void?, p. 105. AŻIH, 301/3281, gives an average of 15 deaths per day.

13. GARF, 7021-75-107, p. 181; USHMM, RG-50.002*0026; Lindenberg, Sefer Tlustab, p. 299.

14. GARF, 7021-75-107, p. 181; Berenstein, “Eksterminacja,” p. 27, table 3.

15. USHMM, RG-50.002*0026; AŻIH, 301/3281.

TREMBOWLA

Pre-1939: Trembowla, town, powiat center, Tarnopol województwo, Poland; 1939–1941: Terebovlia, raion center, Ternopol' oblast', Ukrainian SSR; 1941–1944: Trembowla, Kreis Tarnopol, Distrikt Galizien, Generalgouvernement; post-1991: Terebovlia, raion center, Ternopil' oblast', Ukraine

Trembowla is located 29 kilometers (18 miles) south of Tarnopol. By June of 1941, there were probably around 1,700 Jews in the town in a total population of about 10,000 (about 3,000 Poles and 5,000 Ukrainians).¹

Units of the German army occupied Trembowla on July 3, 1941. Initially, a military commandant's office (Ortskommandantur) administered the town. At the beginning of August 1941, power was transferred into the hands of a Nazi civil administration. Trembowla was incorporated into Kreis Tarnopol. Gerhard Hager was appointed the Kreishauptmann. He was succeeded after April 1942 by Mogens von Harbou und von der Hellen. The anti-Jewish Aktions in Trembowla were organized and carried out by the regional office of the Security Police (Sipo-Aussendienststelle) in Tarnopol. The office was headed by SS-Hauptsturmführer Edmund Schöne (July–October 1941), SS-Sturmbannführer Hermann Müller (October 1941–May 1943), and then SS-Hauptsturmführer Wilhelm Krüger (June 1943–March 1944).

In Trembowla, a German Gendarmerie post (consisting of about 30 German Gendarmes), a local office of the Criminal Police (Kripo), subordinate to the Security Police in Tarnopol, and a local Ukrainian police unit were established. These units took an active part in the anti-Jewish Aktions within the town. The local Ukrainian mayor during the German occupation, Wolodymyr Wawrzyszyn, was also an ardent antisemite.

Soviet officials abandoned the town starting on June 29, 1941, but only about 100 to 150 Jews were able to evacuate with them. On July 5, 1941, 3 Jews were murdered in Trembowla.² At this time a provisional Ukrainian administration was organized, and Ukrainians began to persecute the Jews, seizing them for cleaning tasks and plundering Jewish houses. On July 10, 1941, the Ukrainian Auxiliary Police (Ukrainische Hilfspolizei) arrested 40 more Jews, supposedly for forced labor. Instead they were taken to a military barracks, where the Ukrainians tortured and then shot them. One man was able to save himself by bribing the guards with his gold watch.³

In the summer of 1941, the German authorities required Jews to wear a Star of David in plain view and to hand over all money and valuables. Successive German officials also demanded or took large amounts of furniture from the Jews. The Jews were prohibited from leaving the area of the town without permission on pain of death.⁴ The Ukrainian police was given a free hand to rob and search Jewish homes.

After several weeks, a Jewish Council (Judenrat) of 12 to 15 members was established, which the German occupying forces used to pass on their orders and restrictions to the Jewish population. The first head was Dr. Serat, who was then succeeded by a merchant named Goldstein. Once the civil administration was established, the labor office (Arbeitsamt) registered all Jews aged between 14 and 60, and these Jews had to perform forced labor. In October 1941, the Judenrat organized the Jewish Police (Jüdischer Ordnungsdienst), headed by Grynfeld, who told his men that if they served the Germans loyally, they would be saved. In the winter of 1941–1942, the Judenrat established a soup kitchen for needy Jews, which also received some financial support from the offices of the Jewish Social Self-Help (JSS) organization in Kraków and Lwów.⁵

On November 22, 1941, the Arbeitsamt sent 27 young Jews to the Borki Wielkie forced labor camp, near Tarnopol, where they worked repairing the railroad. Others were sent to similar camps, such as those in Kamionki and Stupki. As many Jews were shot or died of starvation in these camps, the Arbeitsamt subsequently demanded replacements. The Judenrat also raised a contribution from the Jews with the aim of bribing the German authorities to allow food to be sent to the camps. As people tried to avoid forced labor, both Ukrainian and Jewish policemen seized them off the streets, beating those who resisted.⁶

At the end of September 1942, the boundaries of the Trembowla ghetto were established. Then in October 1942, the Germans began to clear the smaller towns and villages of the region of their remaining Jewish population, and many Jews were resettled to Trembowla, including some from the neighboring towns of Strusów, Mikulińce, Janów, and Budzanów. The final date set for resettlement into the ghetto was November 3, 1942.⁷

Following the concentration of the Jewish population, the German security forces carried out a deportation Aktion in the town on November 5, 1942, during which they also killed 109 Jews on the spot. The occupiers deported 1,091 Jews (mostly those recently arrived in the town) to the extermination camp in Bełżec.⁸ German Security Police from Tarnopol carried out the Aktion with the assistance of the German Gendarmerie and Ukrainian policemen.

On November 10, 1942, an order issued by the Higher SS and Police Leader (HSSPF) in the Generalgouvernement, SS-Obergruppenführer Krüger, included Trembowla as one of the towns where the continued existence of a ghetto after December 1 was officially recognized.⁹ Living inside the ghetto after the November Aktion were some 2,500 Jews. The ghetto consisted only of two small streets and was desperately overcrowded. According to available witness testimony, however, it appears that it was not fenced off from the rest of the town, as Jews going to work still moved freely outside the ghetto wearing their armbands. In the winter of 1942–1943, there was starvation in the ghetto, and hundreds died from typhus due to the unsanitary conditions. An isolation area was set up within the ghetto hospital to deal with those infected, but the disease still continued to spread.¹⁰

On April 7, 1943, a Security Police unit from Tarnopol, the German Gendarmerie, and the Ukrainian policemen carried out a cleansing Aktion. The Jews were driven out onto the marketplace, and the Ukrainian police searched for those in hiding. After removing their outer clothing and surrendering any valuables, 1,100 Jews were escorted to a ditch near the village of Plebanowka and shot. Following this Aktion, the ghetto was further reduced in size. Then, at the beginning of June 1943, the ghetto in Trembowla was liquidated. All those Jews remaining were shot near Plebanowka. On June 3, 1943, 843 Jews were killed. On June 4, the Germans declared the town to be judenrein (cleansed of Jews); but the hunt for hidden Jews continued, including outside the ghetto, as some Jews had hidden on the Aryan side; and another 350 Jews were killed on June 5, 1943. The Germans spared only two engineers, two doctors, and three schnapps brewers as needed specialists at this time. They murdered these Jews later, apart from two who escaped.¹¹

Trembowla was taken by the Red Army on March 23, 1944. Only between 50 and 100 Jews from Trembowla managed to survive the German occupation. Among the survivors was Sofia Kalski, who was assisted by Anna and Voitek Gutonski in Humniska after escaping from the Trembowla ghetto and hid in a hole for eight months until the Red Army arrived. Other survivors of the ghetto include Myra Genn (born 1938) and her mother Sabina, who managed to evade several round-ups by hiding under the floor of their building, before fleeing to hide on the property of a former customer, Wincent Rajski.¹² Sofia Kalski, Myra Genn, and Myra's mother all migrated to the United States after the war.

Wawrzyszyn was tried before the regional court (Landgericht) in Munich in 1948 but was acquitted on all counts.¹³

SOURCES Several articles on the destruction of the Jewish population of Trembowla can be found in the yizkor book: Sefer yizkor li-kehillat Trembovlah Strusov ve-Yanov veba-sevivah (Bene Berak: Be-hotsa'at Irgun yots'e Trembovlah veba-sevivah, 1981). Additional information can be found in the article by Tatiana Berenstein, "Eksterminacja ludności żydowskiej w dystrykcie Galicja (1941–1943)," BŻIH, no. 61 (1967); and in Danuta Dabrowska, Abraham Wein, and Aharon Weiss, eds., Pinkas ha-kehillot. Encyclopaedia of Jewish Communities: Poland, vol. 2, Eastern Galicia (Jerusalem: Yad Vashem, 1980), pp. 272–274.

Documents and eyewitness testimonies describing the fate of the Jews of Trembowla can be found in the following archives: AŻIH (301/1421, 1422, 1423, 2149, 2150, 3697, 3983, and 4973); BA-L; DATO; GARF (7021-75-13); VHF; and YVA (e.g., M-1/E).

Alexander Kruglov and Martin Dean
trans. Steven Seegel

NOTES

1. AŻIH, 301/2149, testimony of Dr. German Kollin, September 9, 1946.
2. GARF, 7021-75-13, p. 42; AŻIH, 301/2150, testimony of Wolf Aszkenaze, September 1946.
3. AŻIH, 301/4973, testimony of Chaskiel Sommerstein, July 10, 1945. GARF, 7021-75-13, pp. 45, 48 (and verso), dates the incident on July 11, stating 38 victims. Also see AŻIH, 301/2150; Justiz und NS-Verbrechen, vol. 3 (Amsterdam: Amsterdam University Press, 1969-), Lfd. Nr. 99, pp. 432-434; Sefer yizkor li-kehillat Trembovlab, p. 212.
4. AŻIH, 301/4973; Sefer yizkor li-kehillat Trembovlab, pp. 218, 252.
5. AŻIH, 301/1422, testimony of Fini Dresdner, March 21, 1946; 301/2149 and 2150.
6. GARF, 7021-75-13, pp. 48 and verso; AŻIH, 301/2150 and 4973; Sefer yizkor li-kehillat Trembovlab, pp. 218-220.
7. Sefer yizkor li-kehillat Trembovlab, pp. 230, 254.
8. GARF, 7021-75-13, p. 49; AŻIH, 301/1423, testimony of Klara Szajowicz from Mikulińce, February 26, 1946.
9. Order of HSSPF Krüger on October 10, 1942, published in Tatiana Berenstein, ed., Faschismus, Getto, Massenmord: Dokumentation über Ausrottung und Widerstand der Juden in Polen während des zweiten Weltkrieges (Berlin: Rütten & Loening, 1961), pp. 344-346.
10. AŻIH, 301/1422, 2149, and 4973.
11. GARF, 7021-75-13, pp. 2, 6, 42 (and reverse), 49; JuNS-V, vol. 24 (Amsterdam: Amsterdam University Press, 1998), Lfd. Nr. 634, p. 41; AŻIH, 301/2149 and 4973.
12. Myra Genn has given a video testimony; see VHF, # 44456, taped on August 19, 1998.
13. JuNS-V, vol. 3, Lfd. Nr. 99.

TYŚMIENICA

Pre-1939: Tyśmienica, town, Tłumacz powiat, Stanisławów województwo, Poland; 1939-1941: Tismenitsa, raion center, Stanislav oblast', Ukrainian SSR; 1941-1944: Tyśmienica, Kreis Stanislau, Distrikt Galizien, Generalgouvernement; post-1991: Tyśmienitsa, raion center, Ivano-Frankivs'k oblast', Ukraine

Tyśmienica is located 10 kilometers (6 miles) east of Stanisławów. According to the 1931 census, there were 1,850 Jews living in Tyśmienica.¹ By mid-1941, there were probably more than 2,000 Jews in the town.

Hungarian armed forces occupied the town on July 3, 1941. A few weeks later, authority was transferred to a German civil administration. Tyśmienica became part of Kreis Stanislau, within Distrikt Galizien. Regierungsrat Dr. Heinz Albrecht was the Kreishauptmann in Stanisławów from 1941 to 1944.

The anti-Jewish Aktions in Tyśmienica were organized and carried out by the local Security Police outpost (Sipo-Aussendienststelle) in Stanisławów. It was headed by SS-Hauptsturmführer Hans Krüger from July 1941 to November 1942. In Tyśmienica itself, a German Gendarmerie post was set up, and the Ukrainian Auxiliary Police (Ukrainische Hilfspolizei) was recruited from among the local residents.

During their brief control of the town, the Hungarian armed forces generally treated the Jews reasonably. The Hungarian forces ordered the establishment of a Jewish Council and also required the Jews to wear armbands and perform forced labor. By August 1941, a number of Jews expelled from Hungary had arrived in Tyśmienica, where they received aid from the local Jews. Soon afterwards, however, the German authorities ordered these refugees to move to Stanisławów, where most of them presumably were massacred on October 12, 1941.²

Following the transfer to a German civil administration in August, the situation of the Jews deteriorated. The Germans confiscated a large amount of Jewish property, especially any items of value. Jews over the age of eight had to wear white armbands bearing a blue Star of David. The Judenrat, headed by Yakov Zigler, had to organize contingents of forced laborers, which were escorted to their workplaces by the Jewish Police (Jüdischer Ordnungsdienst), headed by Eliahu Buchhalter. Soon, the head of the Gestapo in Stanisławów, Hans Krüger, made regular visits to Tyśmienica, which usually resulted in Jews being killed or taken away to Stanisławów with the assistance of Ukrainian policemen, never to be heard from again.³

A few days before Passover, in the spring of 1942, a ghetto area was demarcated for the Jews of Tyśmienica. It covered an area of about 300 by 350 meters (328 by 383 yards) and started at the Polish monastery but did not include any part of the market square. All the Jews living outside the demarcated area were forced to move inside it. Jews were escorted out of the ghetto every day to perform forced labor, and this gave them the opportunity to obtain some food and smuggle it into the ghetto for their starving families.⁴

After the creation of the ghetto, a number of Jewish families who owned farms around Tyśmienica were permitted to continue living outside. At night Jews from the ghetto would sneak out and visit these farms to obtain food. In addition, there were certain craftsmen who received permits to leave the ghetto to conduct their trades. These people had the possibility to smuggle in food, but they were only permitted to leave the ghetto when accompanied by the Jewish Police, and Ukrainian policemen also searched them on returning to the ghetto.

Living conditions in the ghetto were overcrowded and unsanitary. Widespread hunger led to cases of stomach typhus and dysentery, while the cramped conditions caused lice-borne spotted typhus to flourish. The Jewish Council tried to do what it could for the ghetto population; however, it only had the resources to supply skimmed milk to a few children. Food rations were limited to the small amounts the Germans permitted into the ghetto. The Judenrat ordered the creation of an epidemic hospital in which one doctor provided medical care for the sick. However, the treatment met with little success, and there were deaths from starvation and disease almost every day.⁵

According to the account in the yizkor book, the Germans liquidated the Tyśmienica ghetto in August 1942. The precise details of the liquidation Aktion remain unclear. It appears that the bulk of the Jews were transferred to the Stanisławów ghetto, where they were either killed in the city or were deported to the Bełżec extermination camp. Some of the younger able-bodied Jews either were transferred or made their own way to the Tłumacz ghetto, where around 80 Jews remained after that ghetto's liquidation, which had been completed by September 8, 1942.⁶

In Tyśmienica, initially around 30 craftsmen were kept alive to clear out the ghetto. They were accommodated together in one house. It appears that these Jews were also transferred subsequently to Stanisławów. One of them, Hirsh-Leib Fliker, a furrier, subsequently managed to escape from his German escort on a trip to purchase raw pelts in the villages in March 1943.⁷

According to the records of the Soviet Extraordinary State Commission (ChGK), around 1,500 Jews passed through the camp or ghetto in Tyśmienica, and a total of 63 people were killed or died from hunger and disease. The remaining Jews were taken to Stanisławów.⁸ Local inhabitants also witnessed the murder of groups of Jews at the Jewish cemetery in Tyśmienica, where they were forced to undress before being shot.⁹

SOURCES Information on the persecution and destruction of the Jews of Tyśmienica can be found in the following publications: Shlomo Blond, ed., Tismenits; a matseyve oyf di kburves fun a farnikhteter yidishe kebile (Tel Aviv: Hamenora, 1974); Shlomo Blond, The Righteous Gentiles (Israel: Shlomo Blond, 1983); and Guy Miron, ed., The Yad Vashem Encyclopedia of the Ghettos during the Holocaust (Jerusalem: Yad Vashem, 2010), p. 854.

Relevant documentation is located in these archives: AŻIH (302/136); DAI-FO; GARF (7021-73-9); and YVA.

Alexander Kruglov and Martin Dean
trans. Steven Seegel

NOTES

1. Tatiana Berenstein, "Eksterminacja ludności żydowskiej w dystrykcie Galicja (1941–1943)," BŻIH, no. 61 (1967), table 9.

2. Blond, Tismenits, p. 120; Dieter Pohl, Nationalsozialistische Judenverfolgung in Ostgalizien 1941–1944: Organisation und Durchführung eines staatlichen Massenverbrechens (Munich: Oldenbourg, 1997), pp. 144–147.

3. Blond, Tismenits, p. 121.

4. Ibid., pp. 121–122.

5. Ibid.

6. Ibid., p. 123; Blond, The Righteous Gentiles, p. 46.

7. Blond, Tismenits, pp. 124–125; Blond, The Righteous Gentiles, pp. 48–49.

8. GARF, 7021-73-9, pp. 77, 80.

9. Blond, Tismenits, pp. 125–126.

ZBARAŻ

Pre-1939: Zbaraż, town, powiat center, Tarnopol województwo, Poland; 1939–1941: Zbarazh, raion center, Ternopol' oblast', Ukrainian SSR; 1941–1944: Zbaraz, Kreis Tarnopol, Distrikt Galizien, Generalgouvernement; post-1991: Zbarazh, raion center, Ternopil' oblast', Ukraine

Zbaraż is located 19 kilometers (12 miles) northeast of Tarnopol. The 1931 census recorded 3,000 Jewish residents. During World War II, the Jewish population reached 5,000 with the arrival of refugees from western Poland.

The town was occupied by German troops on July 4, 1941. Until August 1941, Zbaraż was controlled by a German military commandant's office (Ortskommandantur), but authority was then transferred to a German civil administration. Zbaraż became part of Kreis Tarnopol, in Distrikt Galizien. Until April 1942, the Kreishauptmann in Tarnopol was first Gerhard Hager, then Mogens von Harbou und von der Hellen.

Anti-Jewish Aktions in Zbaraż were organized and conducted by the Security Police outpost (Sipo-Aussendienststelle) in Tarnopol, which between late July and October 1941 was commanded by SS-Hauptsturmführer Edmund Schöne; from October 1941 to May 1943, by SS-Sturmabführer Herman Müller; and from June 1943 to March 1944, by SS-Hauptsturmführer Wilhelm Krüger. Zbaraż itself had posts of the German Gendarmerie and Ukrainian Auxiliary Police, which both took an active part in the anti-Jewish Aktions.

In the days preceding July 4, 1941, Ukrainian nationalist antisemites and German soldiers engaged in anti-Jewish violence in the town in which around 20 Jews were murdered and two synagogues burned down. Soviet reports indicate that dozens of Soviet prisoners of war also were killed.¹ In mid-July, the Germans established a Jewish Council (Judenrat). For "health reasons" the head of the local community council declined to serve, and a man named Feder was appointed as its head.² That same month, Jews were required to wear armbands bearing the Star of David for identification purposes and to turn in all gold and valuable items. Jews were forbidden to leave the town limits and were subjected to systematic robbery and beatings by the Ukrainian police.

On September 6, 1941, an SD-Einsatztrupp from Tarnopol under the command of SS-Hauptsturmführer Schöne arrived in Zbaraż from Tarnopol and ordered all men capable of work to assemble with shovels. The German Security Police selected more than 70 members of the intelligentsia and then shot them in the Lubianka Forest. Among the victims was the head of the Judenrat, Feder.³

Shortly afterwards the Germans appointed Pinchas Gruenfeld, a refugee from western Poland, as chairman of the Judenrat. According to Jewish survivor Jakob Littner, Gruenfeld carried out German orders without regard for the interests of the local community. The Judenrat also organized the Jewish Police, which collected contributions from the Jewish community using force where necessary. Jewish men were put to forced labor on railroad construction for no pay. Others were sent to forced labor camps, but the winter of 1941–1942 passed without further major incidents.

In the second half of 1942, in four deportation Aktionen, Jews were sent from Zbaraż to the Bełżec extermination camp. In late August 1942, Jewish fugitives started to arrive in Zbaraż from Łanowce and Wiśniowiec in neighboring Generalkommissariat Wolhynien und Podolien, where the ghettos had already been liquidated. Then on August 31, the first Aktion took place in Zbaraż. The Jewish Council was forced to select 500 old and sick Jews, who were taken to Tarnopol and, from there, together with other Jews, were transported to the Bełżec extermination camp.⁴ On September 30, the second Aktion took place, with 260 more Jews selected for deportation and taken to Bełżec via Tarnopol.⁵ On October 21–22, as part of the third Aktion, 960 Jews were deported to Bełżec, a smaller group was sent to the Janowska Street camp in Lwów, and around 130 were killed on the spot.⁶

Following the third Aktion, on October 25, 1942, a Jewish ghetto was established in Zbaraż for around 2,000 Jews near the old horse-trading market. Local Jews, together with others brought in from nearby Podwołoczyska were jammed into a few decrepit shacks located near the bathhouse and the synagogue. Overcrowding was severe, with about 20 people sharing each room.⁷ It was an “open ghetto,” but the perimeter was guarded internally by Jewish and externally by German and Ukrainian police. Jews only left the ghetto under guard to go to their places of work. The restricted movement made it difficult to find food. Around this time, anticipating further Aktionen, Jews began to prepare hiding places in the ghetto and in the nearby forest. The destruction of the Jewish community continued on November 8–9, when another 1,000 people were deported to Bełżec. In total, around 3,000 Jews fell victim to the four Aktionen.

On November 10, 1942, the Höherer SS- und Polizeiführer (HSSPF) of the Generalgouvernement, SS-Obergruppenführer Friedrich Wilhelm Krüger, proclaimed that Zbaraż was one of the towns in which a Jewish residential district would be permitted. Remaining Jews in all other locations were forced to move to these ghettos.⁸ In Podwołoczyska there was a labor camp, where some Jews from Zbaraż worked.

The winter of 1942–1943 was very hard on the remnants of the community, as hunger and illness took their toll.⁹ Jews continued periodically to be deported to various forced labor camps in the area, including those in Kamionki and Hłuboczek. Some Jews were able to avoid these transports by bribing the Judenrat.

On April 7, 1943, a Security Police detachment from Tarnopol, together with the German Gendarmerie and Ukrainian police, conducted another Aktion in the ghetto. In its course, more than 1,000 Jews, including members of the Jewish Police, were shot in ditches near the fuel storage tank at the Zbaraż railroad station.¹⁰ On June 9, 1943, the ghetto was finally liquidated: on that day a Security Police detachment from Tarnopol, assisted by the German Gendarmerie and Ukrainian policemen, captured and shot several hundred Jews.¹¹

Some Jews escaped from the ghetto to the nearby woods, but they remained vulnerable to local informants and faced constant food shortages. The German Gendarmes and Ukrainian policemen regularly combed the woods in search of the remaining Jews; those captured were shot on the spot. On June 19, 1943, 150 Jews were captured and killed in the forest 7 kilometers (4.5 miles) outside the town.¹² Only around 60 Zbaraż Jews survived the German occupation; among them were Jakob Littner and his companion and future wife, Janina Korngold.

Of the German officials who served in the region, Harbou died in 1946 in the detention camp in Dachau; Herman Müller was sentenced to life in prison on July 15, 1966, in Stuttgart; and Wilhelm Krüger was under investigation for some time after the war, but the case against him was closed eventually, owing to insufficient evidence.

SOURCES Information about the destruction of the Jewish population of Zbaraż can be found in the following publications: Jakob Littner, Aufzeichnungen aus einem Erdloch (Munich, 1948); Danuta Dabrowska, Abraham Wein, and Aharon Weiss, eds., Pinkas ha-kebilot. Encyclopaedia of Jewish Communities: Poland, vol. 2, Eastern Galicia (Jerusalem: Yad Vashem, 1980), pp. 189–202; Moshe Sommerstein, ed., Sefer Zbaraz (Tel Aviv: Organization of Former Zbaraz Residents, 1983); Wolfgang Koeppen, Jakob Littners Aufzeichnungen aus einem Erdloch (Frankfurt am Main: Jüdischer Verlag, 1992); Kurt Nathan Gräbler, ed., Journey through the Night: Jakob Littner's Holocaust Memoir (New York: Continuum, 2000); and Roland Ulrich and Reinhard Zachau, eds., Jakob Littner: Mein Weg durch die Nacht: Mit Anmerkungen zu Wolfgang Koeppens Textadaptation (Berlin: Metropol, 2002).

Documentation regarding the fate of the Jews of Zbaraż can be found in the following archives: AŻIH (301/350, 1725, 2177, 2571, 3554, 3772, 4853; 211/541); BA-L (ZStL, Verfahren 208 AR-Z 294/59 case against Raebel et al.); BWSL (EL 317 III, Bü 1408); DATO; GARF (7021-75-4); and YVA.

Alexander Kruglov and Samuel Fishman
trans. Igor Puchkov

NOTES

1. AŻIH, 301/2571, testimony of Dr. Marek Szmajuk; 301/3554, testimony of Icchok Lilien; GARF, 7021-75-4, p. 9.
2. Gräbler, Journey through the Night, p. 31.
3. AŻIH, 301/2571; GARF, 7021-75-4, pp. 1, 70. According to the report of the Jewish Social Self-Help (JSS) in Zbaraż to the JSS in Kraków, June 13, 1942, 72 people were shot (AŻIH, JSS, 211/541).
4. Littner, Aufzeichnungen, p. 65; Urteil Schwurgericht Stuttgart, Ks 7/64, gegen Paul Raebel u.a., July 15, 1966 (see Justiz und NS-Verbrechen, vol. 24 [Amsterdam: Amsterdam University Press, 1998], Lfd. Nr. 634).
5. GARF, 7021-75-4, pp. 3 and verso, 39; Urteil Schwurgericht Stuttgart, Ks 7/64, gegen Paul Raebel u.a., July 15, 1966 (JuNS-V, vol. 24, Lfd. Nr. 634).

6. GARF, 7021-75-4, p. 39; Littner, Aufzeichnungen, pp. 86–87; Urteil Schwurgericht Stuttgart, Ks 7/64, gegen Paul Raebel u.a., July 15, 1966 (JuNS-V, vol. 24, Lfd. Nr. 634).

7. Gräbler, Journey through the Night, p. 54; AŽIH, 301/2571; 301/3554.

8. Polizeiverordnung des HSSPF Krüger über die Errichtung jüdischer Wohnbezirke, November 10, 1942, in Verordnungsblatt des Generalgouvernements, November 11, 1942.

9. Sommerstein, Sefer Zbaraz, p. 40.

10. GARF, 7021-75-4, pp. 3 and verso, 40, 47, 49; Littner, Aufzeichnungen, pp. 92–96; Urteil Schwurgericht Stuttgart, Ks 7/64, gegen Paul Raebel u.a., July 15, 1966 (JuNS-V, vol. 24, Lfd. Nr. 634).

11. GARF, 7021-75-4, pp. 4, 22, 41; Urteil Schwurgericht Stuttgart, Ks 7/64, gegen Paul Raebel u.a., July 15, 1966 (JuNS-V, vol. 24, Lfd. Nr. 634). Estimates of the number of victims range from 300 to 600.

12. GARF, 7021-75-4, pp. 60 and verso.

ZBORÓW

Pre-1939: Zborów, town, powiat center, Tarnopol województwo, Poland; 1939–1941: Zborov, raion center, Ternopol' oblast', Ukrainian SSR; 1941–1944: Zborow, Kreis Tarnopol, Distrikt Galizien, Generalgouvernement; post-1991: Zboriv, raion center, Ternopil' oblast', Ukraine

Zborów is located 34 kilometers (21 miles) west-northwest of Tarnopol. In 1921, there were 1,086 Jews living in the town (29.1 percent), and in 1931, 1,900 Jews.

Zborów was occupied by German troops on July 3, 1941. Until August, the town was run by a German military commandant's office (Ortskommandantur), but then authority was transferred to a German civil administration. Zborów was incorporated into Kreis Tarnopol, within Distrikt Galizien. The position of Kreishauptmann in Tarnopol was held in turn by Gerhard Hager (until April 1942), then Mogens von Harbou und von der Hellen.

The Tarnopol outpost of the Security Police (Sipo-Ausendienststelle) organized and conducted the anti-Jewish Aktions in the town. SS-Hauptsturmführer Edmund Schöne headed the unit from the end of July until October 1941; SS-Sturmbannführer Hermann Müller succeeded him from October 1941 until May 1943; and from June 1943 on, SS-Hauptsturmführer Wilhelm Krüger was in charge. There was a German Gendarmerie post, a Criminal Police (Kripo) outpost (reporting to the Tarnopol branch of the Security Police), and a squad of Ukrainian Auxiliary Police, all based in Zborów that participated in the anti-Jewish Aktions.

At the start of the occupation, SS forces killed 600 Jews in Zborów, according to a German Einsatzgruppen report, “in retaliation for Soviet atrocities.”¹ Maria Cukier testified that the victims were killed in two separate locations, in a ditch just outside the town and in the courtyard of the former Soviet People's Commissariat of Internal Affairs (NKVD) building.²

In the summer of 1941, the occupation authorities ordered Jews to wear armbands bearing the Star of David and to turn in all their gold and valuables. Jews were assigned to perform forced labor, which included working as servants for the Germans. Jews were forbidden to leave the town and were subjected to systematic assault and robbery by the Ukrainian policemen. A Jewish Council (Judenrat) was established in the town, and through it all the orders and instructions of the German authorities were delivered to the Jewish population.

On October 16, 1941, a further anti-Jewish Aktion was carried out in Zborów. At that time an SD squad from Tarnopol, which SS-Hauptsturmführer Edmund Schöne commanded, shot around 600 Jews (including women and children) about 2 or 3 kilometers (about 1.5 miles) outside the town; the victims were selected and gathered in the market square on German instructions by the Jewish Council.³

Some information about living conditions in Zborów is available from letters sent to a relative who was a prisoner in Germany. By April 1942, the Jews were forced to sell their last possessions to buy something to eat, and a soup kitchen had been opened for the needy. As news arrived of killings and deportations in other towns, the Jews did not expect to survive the end of the year.⁴

The next Aktion was conducted in the late summer of 1942, on August 29. On that day, 220 Jews were rounded up, mostly children and the elderly, and, together with Jews from other localities in Kreis Tarnopol, they were deported to the Bełżec extermination camp.⁵ After this Aktion, Jews from the villages of Jezierna (Ozeriany), Zalozce, and Pomorzany were moved into the town.⁶

In accordance with the order of SS-Obergruppenführer Friedrich Wilhelm Krüger, the Höherer SS- und Polizeiführer (HSSPF) in the Generalgouvernement, a ghetto was established in Zborów on November 20, 1942.⁷ About 3,000 Jews were enclosed within the ghetto, including the remaining Jews from nearby villages. The ghetto was located on two streets near the river and was surrounded with barbed wire. Dozia Blustein has described living conditions there. Her family shared a three-room apartment with four other families. Each day hunger became more acute and sanitary conditions worsened, leading to an outbreak of typhus. People were dying daily by the dozen. Some local non-Jews used to smuggle food into the ghetto, among them Kola Leskiv, who also hid Dozia and her mother in his house in Jezierna after they escaped from the Zborów ghetto.⁸ There was a hospital in the ghetto, but it soon became overcrowded due to the rapid spread of typhus. People were lying next to each other on the floor with only straw for a bed. The only Jewish doctor came by once a day, but there was little that could be done for the hundreds of patients. According to one estimate, around half of those infected died of typhus.⁹

The Jews in the ghetto performed a variety of forced labor tasks. These included road construction, factory work, and sewing for the Germans. One group of Jewish girls was assigned to perform laundry work and gardening at the Gestapo headquarters. Some Jews, especially able-bodied men, were transferred to the forced labor camp in Zborów in early 1943. Their families remained in the ghetto.¹⁰

In the spring of 1943, an underground organization led by Levy Remer was active in the Zborów ghetto. The organization collected weapons and constructed bunkers in preparation for the ghetto's impending liquidation. On April 9, 1943, the first Aktion took place against the ghetto. On that day, a squad of Security Police from Tarnopol, assisted by the German Gendarmerie and Ukrainian policemen, shot about 2,300 Jews. On June 5, 1943, the ghetto was liquidated. When the Germans and Ukrainians came to clear the ghetto, they encountered armed resistance, so they set fire to some of the buildings to flush out the Jews in hiding.¹¹

In the spring of 1942, a Jewish forced labor camp was established in the town, which formed part of the series of camps along the Transit Highway 4 (Durchgangsstrasse, or DG IV) from Lwów to Podwołoczyska. Able-bodied Jews from Zborów and the vicinity were placed in the camp. The inmates were used to build and repair roads. In November 1942, branches of this camp were created in the villages of Zalogce and Olejów.¹² In October 1942, there were 420 inmates in the camp.¹³ SS-Schütze Erich Klaus was the first commandant of the camp. From August until November 1942, the camp was under the command of SS man Hans Sobotta. The camp was liquidated on July 23, 1943, when all the inmates were shot, about 500 people in all.¹⁴

In Jezierna, 14 kilometers (9 miles) to the east of Zborów, another Jewish labor camp was organized. Its inmates, as well as the prisoners in the Zborów camp, were used for road construction and repair. In July 1942, in the village of Zagrobela, not far from Tarnopol, a branch of this camp was established. At first SS-Unterscharführer Erich Minkus (who died in 1945) was the commandant of the Jezierna camp, and from April 1942 on, SS-Scharführer Richard Dyga (who died in 1961 while under investigation). The branch of the camp in Zagrobela was headed by Thomas Hasenberg (who was convicted in Stuttgart in 1966). The camp was liquidated on July 23, 1943, by shooting all the inmates (260 people).¹⁵

SOURCES Information on the persecution and murder of the Jewish population of Zborów can be found in the following publications: A. Zilberman, ed., Yizkor Bukh Zborov (Israel: Landsmanshaft Zborov un Umgebung in Israel, 1975); "Zborov," in Encyclopaedia Judaica, vol. 16 (Jerusalem: Keter, 1972); "Zborov," in Danuta Dabrowska, Abraham Wein, and Aharon Weiss, eds., Pinkas ha-kehillot. Encyclopaedia of Jewish Communities: Poland, vol. 2, Eastern Galicia (Jerusalem: Yad Vashem, 1980), pp. 202–205; and Guy Miron, ed., The Yad Vashem Encyclopedia of the Gbetos during the Holocaust (Jerusalem: Yad Vashem, 2010), pp. 971–972.

Documentation regarding the fate of Zborów's Jews during the Holocaust can be found in the following archives: AZIH (301/1643, 2520, 3777); BA-BL (R 58/214); BA-L (208 AR-Z 249/59, case against Raebel et al.); BWSL (EL 317 III, Bü 1408); DATO; GARF (7021-75-5); USHMM; and YVA.

Alexander Kruglov and Martin Dean
trans. Igor Puchkov

NOTES

1. BA-BL, R 58/214, Ereignismeldung UdSSR no. 19, July 11, 1941. According to Soviet Extraordinary State Commission materials, on the very first day of the occupation 830 Jews were killed in Zborów (GARF, 7021-75-5, p. 4).

2. AZIH, 301/2520, testimony of Maria Cukier.

3. Verdict of LG-Stutt, Ks 7/64, July 15, 1966, in the case against Paul Raebel et al. (Justiz und NS-Verbrechen, vol. 24 [Amsterdam: Amsterdam University Press, 1998], Lfd. Nr. 634).

4. Zilberman, Yizkor Bukh Zborov, pp. 84–85.

5. GARF, 7021-75-5, pp. 3 and verso. According to other data, JuNS-V, vol. 24, Lfd. Nr. 634, the Aktion took place in the fall of 1942, and at least 600 people were deported to Bełżec.

6. Tatiana Berenstein, "Eksterminacja ludności żydowskiej w dystrykcie Galicja (1941–1943)," BŻIH, no. 61 (1967), table 11. There were 1,106 Jews in Jezierna in June 1942, but some of them were deported to Bełżec at the end of August 1942; in 1931, 704 Jews lived in Zalogce; in 1942, there were 1,450 Jews in Pomorzany, but some of them were deported to Bełżec.

7. Polizeiverordnung des HSSPF Krüger über die Errichtung jüdischer Wohnbezirke, November 10, 1942, in Verordnungsblatt des Generalgouvernements, November 11, 1942; Zilberman, Yizkor Bukh Zborov, p. 175.

8. Testimony of Dozia Blustein, in J. Sigelman, ed., Memorial Book of Jezierna (Israel, 1971), pp. 352–349 (English section); see also Iakiv Suslenskyi, They Were True Heroes: Citizens of Ukraine, Righteous among the Nations (Kiev: Society "Ukraine," 1995), pp. 117–118.

9. Zilberman, Yizkor Bukh Zborov, pp. 89, 180.

10. Testimony of Dozia Blustein, pp. 352–349 (English section).

11. Dabrowska, Wein, and Weiss, Pinkas ha-kehillot: Poland, vol. 2, Eastern Galicia, p. 205. Zilberman, Yizkor Bukh Zborov, p. 94, estimates 1,500 victims of the April Aktion.

12. Tatiana Berenstein, "Praca przymusowa ludności żydowskiej w tzw. dystrykcie Galicja," BŻIH, no. 69 (1969): 33, 45.

13. Berenstein, "Eksterminacja," table 11.

14. GARF, 7021-75-5, p. 12.

15. JuNS-V, vol. 24, Lfd. Nr. 634.

ZŁOCZÓW

Pre-1939: Złoczów, town, powiat center, Tarnopol województwo, Poland; 1939–1941: Zolochiv, raion center, Ternopol' oblast', Ukrainian SSR; 1941–1944: Zloczow, Kreis center, Distrikt Galizien, Generalgouvernement; post-1991: Zolochiv, raion center, L'viv oblast', Ukraine

Złoczów is located 64 kilometers (40 miles) east of Lwów. On the eve of World War II, there were around 7,800 Jews living in Złoczów.¹

German forces occupied Złoczów on July 2, 1941. At first, a German military commandant's office (Ortskommandantur) governed the town. A German civilian administration took over control in August 1941. Złoczów became the administrative center of Kreis Zloczow, within Distrikt Galizien. Until January 1943, the Kreishauptmann was Regierungsassessor Hans Mann. He was then replaced by Dr. Otto Wendt. Until the fall of 1942, the Security Police outpost (Sipo-Aussendienststelle) in Tarnopol organized and carried out the anti-Jewish Aktions in Złoczów. Subsequently, that function shifted to the office of the Sipo and SD in Lwów (KdS Lemberg) and the post of the Criminal Police (Kripo) based in Złoczów, headed by a Criminal Police official from Vienna, Otto Sigmund.

Soviet troops exhume a mass grave in Złoczów, 1944. Złoczów was the site of Aktions against Jews from July 3 to 7, 1941, and from April 3 to 4, 1943.

USHMM WS #86588, COURTESY OF HERMAN LEWINTER

According to a German Einsatzgruppen report, in Złoczów “before the Russians fled . . . they arrested and killed in all about 700 Ukrainians. In retribution, the [Ukrainian] militia arrested several hundred Jews and shot them, on instructions from the Wehrmacht. The number of Jews killed was between 300 and 500.”²² A mobile group of the Organization of Ukrainian Nationalists (OUN), led by I. Klymiv (codename “Legenda”), initiated the pogrom. On July 3, members of this group rounded up and confined hundreds of Jews in a fortress. There they made the Jews dig up the victims of the Soviet People’s Commissariat of Internal Affairs (NKVD) with their bare hands. Then they killed the Jews on the spot, and the slaughter spread into the town itself. The killing went on for four days. According to the testimony of Jewish witnesses, thousands of Jews were killed; but the actual toll of the mass slaughter was more likely around 1,400. (According to the testimony of witnesses from the Soviet Extraordinary State Commission [ChGK], about 3,500 Jews were killed; that figure included 300 women.)³ Several days later, on July 10, a detachment of Security Police (part of Einsatzgruppe z.b.V. [for special purposes]) shot another 300 Jews selected from among the town’s professionals.

On orders from the German administration, the Jews remaining in Złoczów formed a 12-man Jewish Council (Judenrat), headed by Dr. Sigmunt Majblum. Subsequently, the Jewish Police, led by D. Landsberg, was established as the enforcement arm of the Judenrat.⁴ Jews were made to wear white armbands bearing the Star of David. The Germans confiscated most of the Jews’ belongings, especially any valuable items, and they introduced a series of restrictive measures against the Jews. Jews were required to register and to perform various kinds of hard labor for little or no pay, and they were not permitted to leave the limits of the town. The Germans also imposed a large financial contribution on the Jews, which was paid by the Judenrat.

In the fall of 1941, the Germans confiscated all Jewish-owned apartments and evicted those Jews living on the town’s main streets. A curfew was also enforced from 6:00 P.M. to 6:00 A.M., and Jews were not permitted to shop after 10:00 A.M. In November 1941 and at the beginning of 1942, the German authorities sent several hundred Jews to the labor camp in Lackie Wielkie, leaving 5,833 Jews in the town. Soon typhus broke out in the camp, and it quickly spread to the Jews in Złoczów.⁵

As many Jews had no source of income, from early in the occupation, people had to barter their remaining possessions for food at exorbitant prices. In the spring of 1942, the Judenrat organized a soup kitchen to help the poor. There was also a small hospital, staffed with Jewish doctors. In July 1942, another group of young men was rounded up, and they were sent to the labor camps in Sasów, Lackie Wielkie, Płuhów, and Kozaki.

Some sources indicate that a form of open ghetto was set up in Złoczów, at some time in 1942, perhaps in the spring, before the establishment of the enclosed ghetto in December. The Jews were concentrated in one part of town but could still move about within the town limits.⁶

In 1942, the principal means of killing the Jews of Złoczów was to send them on a train to the Bełżec extermination camp. In mid-August 1942, the Judenrat was requested to prepare a list of 2,500 Jews unfit for work. In the course of the first mass deportation Aktion, on August 28 and 29, 1942, the Germans sent some 2,000 Jews to Bełżec.⁷ The Sipo-Aussendienststelle in Tarnopol, headed by SS-Sturmbannführer Hermann Müller, carried out that Aktion with the assistance of German and Ukrainian policemen and the Jewish Police.⁸ After that, 4,172 Jews remained in Złoczów.⁹ The second Aktion took place on November 2, 1942, during which some 2,500 more Jews were deported to Bełżec. A detachment of the Security Police from Lwów, under the command of SS-Oberscharführer Karl Wöbke, together with members of the German Gendarmerie and Ukrainian police, carried out the Aktion. First the combined police forces combed the Jewish residential area, which at the time was not enclosed by a fence, and assembled those Jews they could catch at the so-called Green Ring. From there the Jews were escorted in groups to the railway station. Many Jews were shot on the spot during the roundup.¹⁰

On December 1, 1942, the Germans established an enclosed ghetto in Złoczów in which they confined the Jews still in the town, as well as Jews brought in from the surrounding villages

(e.g., Gołogory, Sasów, and Biały Kamień). For example, Herman Zeigler recalled that announcements were posted on the walls in Sasów ordering the Jews to move to the Złoczów ghetto within one week. The Jewish workers in the Sasów labor camp were excluded, but all their family members were transferred.¹¹ All told, there were about 4,000 Jews in the Złoczów ghetto at this time. According to one Soviet source, the ghetto was located on Mickiewicz and Targowa Streets. It was fenced using barbed wire, as well as the existing house walls. There was only one gate, guarded by the Ukrainian police. The severe overcrowding and unsanitary conditions in the ghetto soon led to an epidemic of typhus.¹²

Subsequently the typhus epidemic served as the grounds for liquidating the ghetto. Some sources indicate that Judenrat head Majblum refused to sign a document declaring that the ghetto was being eliminated because of typhus, and he was killed. Deputy Kreishauptmann Gerhard von Jordan apparently played a sinister role in the ghetto's destruction. He claims to have ordered the liquidation in a document he signed using the fictitious identity "Politruk-SS." A German Security Police detachment, accompanied also by Jewish Police from Lwów, and assisted by the local Gendarmerie and Ukrainian police, promptly liquidated the ghetto in an Aktion that was carried out primarily on April 3 and 4, 1943. In total, some 3,500 Jews were shot near the village of Jelechowice.¹³

Many Jews had prepared bunkers and hiding places inside the ghetto. The shootings continued for several weeks afterwards, as Ukrainian policemen and German Gendarmerie continued to search for those in hiding.¹⁴

A labor camp remained in the town after the liquidation of the ghetto. The occupiers had set up the camp towards the end of 1942 under the command of SS-Hauptscharführer Josef Grzimek. The prisoners in this camp were employed in a workshop and on the construction of a railway line. The Germans liquidated the camp in July 1943.¹⁵

Thanks to the help and backing of Josef Meyer, the Kreislandwirt in Złoczów, a group of Jews managed to survive. Until November 1942, Meyer did not believe that the German occupiers were exterminating Jews in gas chambers. When he finally grasped this reality, he did his utmost to help them. He made reasonable arrangements for the work to which they were assigned; he saw to their food supplies; and he gave them the chance to hide during the roundups. In Israel after the war, Meyer was awarded the title Righteous Among the Nations by Yad Vashem.

Two secret groups were established in the Jewish labor camp. P. Nachumovits led one group; H. Safran, the other. The group headed by Nachumovits—about 30 strong—managed to escape into the woods, where they tried to prepare a bunker. However, peasants in a neighboring village turned them in to the Germans, who killed most of the group. The members of Safran's group were also betrayed to the Germans, who arrested and shot them. At the time of the shooting, Safran jumped one of the Germans and grabbed his pistol but was killed from behind by a member of the Ukrainian police.

After the war, Otto Wendt was a Staatssekretär in Lower Saxony, Germany. For a while, he was under investigation; it was discontinued in 1969. Otto Sigmund was extradited to the Soviet Union in 1949, where he was tried, convicted, and sentenced to prison. He died in a Soviet jail. Hermann Müller was sentenced to life in prison for his part in the killings in Złoczów as well as other crimes.

SOURCES Relevant information may be found in these publications: Danuta Dabrowska, Abraham Wein, and Aharon Weiss, eds., Pinkas ha-kebilot. Encyclopaedia of Jewish Communities: Poland, vol. 2, Eastern Galicia (Jerusalem: Yad Vashem, 1980), pp. 217–223; Thomas Sandkühler, "Endlösung" in Galizien. Der Judenmord in Ostpolen und die Rettungsinitiativen von Berthold Beitz 1941–1944 (Bonn: Dietz, 1996), pp. 256–258; Israel Gutman et al., eds., Enzyklopädie des Holocaust: Die Verfolgung und Ermordung der europäischen Juden (Munich: Piper, 1995), pp. 1336–1337; Tatiana Berenstein, "Eksterminacja ludności żydowskiej w dystrykcie Galicja (1941–1943)," BŻIH, no. 61 (1967); Encyclopaedia Judaica, vol. 16 (Jerusalem: Keter, 1972); and Guy Miron, ed., The Yad Vashem Encyclopedia of the Ghettos during the Holocaust (Jerusalem: Yad Vashem, 2010), pp. 986–988.

Documentation regarding the extermination of the Jews of Złoczów can be found in the following archives: AAN (119/1, Personal File 5, pp. 56–63); AŻIH (e.g., 211/544; 301/87, 2850, 3285, 3752, 3776, 3777, 4015, 4670, 4834, 4991, 5879); BA-BL (R 58/214); BA-L (e.g., B 162/19262); DALO; GARF (7021-67-80); TsGAMORF (236-2675-134); USHMM (e.g., RG-15.084); VHF (e.g., # 8443, 21772); and YVA.

Alexander Kruglov and Martin Dean
trans. Robert Haney

NOTES

1. Berenstein, "Eksterminacja," table 12. See also TsGAMORF, 236-2675-134, which gives the figure of 8,000 inhabitants.
2. BA-BL, R 58/214, Ereignismeldung UdSSR no. 24, July 16, 1941.
3. GARF, 7021-67-80, pp. 4–7.
4. AŻIH, 301/3550, testimony of Anna Ulreich; 301/87, testimony of Mendel Ruder.
5. Ibid., 301/3550; Berenstein, "Eksterminacja," table 12.
6. AŻIH, 301/3550; VHF, # 21772, testimony of Fani Fulero (née Fanka Batisz).
7. GARF, 7021-67-80, pp. 14, 15; Sandkühler, "Endlösung," pp. 256–257.
8. See Urteil LG-Stutt, Ks 7/64, July 15, 1966, in Justiz und NS-Verbrechen, vol. 24 (Amsterdam: Amsterdam University Press, 1998), Lfd Nr. 634.
9. Berenstein, "Eksterminacja," table 12.
10. See Urteil LG-Stutt, Ks 5/65, April 29, 1968, in JuNS-V, vol. 27 (Amsterdam: Amsterdam University Press, 2003), Lfd. Nr. 671, pp. 704–707. For this and other crimes, Karl Wöbke was sentenced to nine years in prison.
11. AŻIH, 301/3776, testimony of Herman Zeigler; 301/3777, testimony of Chaim Wander; GARF, 7021-67-80, p. 6; Polizeiverordnung des HSSPF Krüger über die Errichtung jüdischer Wohnbezirke, November 10, 1942, in Verordnungsblatt des Generalgouvernements, November 11, 1942.

12. TsGAMORE, 236-2675-134; VHF, # 21772.
13. Gutman et al., Enzyklopädie des Holocaust, p. 1337; Sandkühler, "Endlösung," pp. 257-258.
14. VHF, # 21772; BA-L, B 162/19262, p. 25; AAN, 119/1, Personal File 5, Feld-Urteil gegen Gend.-Meister Walter Schlamilch, p. 58; GARF, 7021-67-80, p. 75 (forensic medical document). According to the ChGK concluding report for the Zolochov raion, more than 5,000 people were shot (p. 78). Likely, this figure is too high.
15. Tatiana Berenstein, "Praca przymusowa ludności Żydowskiej w tzw. dystrykcie Galicja," BŻIH, no. 69 (1969): 32, 36.

ŻÓŁKIEW

Pre-1939: Żółkiew, town, powiat center, Lwów województwo, Poland; 1939-1941: Zholkva, raion center, L'viv oblast', Ukrainian SSR; 1941-1944: Zolkiew, Kreis Lemberg-Land, Distrikt Galizien, Generalgouvernement; post-1991: Zhovkva (aka Nesterov), L'viv oblast', Ukraine

Żółkiew is located just over 20 kilometers (12.5 miles) north-northwest of Lwów. In 1921, the Jewish population was 3,718 (out of a total of 7,867). In 1931, there were about 4,400 Jews residing in Żółkiew.¹ By June 1941, due to an influx of Jewish refugees mainly from western Poland, the Jewish population had increased to about 5,000 people.²

Units of the German 17th Army occupied Żółkiew on June 29, 1941, and the town was initially placed under a local military commandant's office (Ortskommandantur). A few days after taking the town, German soldiers burned down the synagogue, and a pogrom erupted in which several Jews were killed. The Jews established an informal Jewish committee in early July to ameliorate the brutal roundups of Jews for forced labor. Subsequently, the Ortskommandantur converted the committee into a Jewish Council (Judenrat) chaired by Dr. Febus Rubinfeld, which had to ensure the fulfillment of German demands.³ The German authorities imposed a curfew and a daily labor quota on the community. Jews working on labor details suffered from constant abuse and harassment.

In August 1941, Żółkiew became part of Kreis Lemberg-Land, in Distrikt Galizien. The Kreishauptmann was Otto Bauer from September 1941 until March 1942; Werner Becker then served until January 1943. Baron Joachim von der Leyen replaced him in turn. The town of Żółkiew was governed by Landkommissar Rockendorf, who soon demanded a contribution from the Jews of 250,000 rubles, 5 kilograms (11 pounds) of gold, and 100 kilograms (220 pounds) of silver. At this time the Ukrainian Auxiliary Police (Ukrainische Hilfspolizei) also beat and arrested 12 prominent Jews, including the head of the Judenrat, and the community was informed that these Jews would be shot if the ransom were not paid. After considerable effort, assisted by some non-Jews, the community paid the ransom. In late December 1941, the Jews were required to surrender all their fur clothing (about 5,000 items) on pain of death.⁴

Daily labor details continued, and labor tasks for Jews included loading railroad cars at the station and repaving the town's streets with tombstones from the Jewish cemetery. The Germans also ordered the establishment of the Jewish Police (Jüdischer Ordnungsdienst); 18 men served under Phillip Czaczkes. The Jewish Police had to ensure that the labor quotas were met. The Jewish Council attempted to improve conditions for the Jews by paying bribes to key Germans and Ukrainian policemen.⁵ The many remaining smaller Jewish-owned properties that had not been confiscated by the Soviets were now confiscated by the Germans, who also charged the former owners rent.⁶

In March 1942, a group of SS men arrived from the forced labor camp in Lackie Wielkie and rounded up about 60 male Jews for work there. When one of these men escaped back to Żółkiew a few days later, he was recaptured and hanged in Lackie Wielkie. Others died there of exhaustion, hunger, and beatings, despite the efforts of the Jewish Council to send them food packets.⁷

German Security and Order Police units conducted the first Aktion on March 15, 1942, in which they deported 700 Jews, designated as incapable of work, to the Bełżec extermination camp; it was probably the first deportation to this destination. The Jews were informed that they would be sent to drain the swamps near Pińsk. However, when after many days Mina Astmann and Mala Thalenfeld returned to Żółkiew, they revealed that the Jews had been forced to undress before being murdered. The two women had only managed to escape because German security measures in Bełżec were not yet perfected at this time. Many Jews disbelieved the women initially, but other reports confirmed that trains delivered Jews to a camp near Bełżec and returned carrying only their property. A cloud of smoke hung over the camp from which terrible screams were sometimes heard. Over the summer, deportation trains from other towns also passed through Żółkiew.⁸

The German Security Police, assisted by men of the Order Police and Ukrainian police, conducted a second Aktion on November 22-23, 1942, during which about 2,400 people were sent to Bełżec. Knowing what to expect, many Jews managed to break holes in the moving railcars with tools and escape, while others went into hiding in town, some with local non-Jews. During and just after the Aktion, it is estimated that about 800 Jews (including some who had jumped from the trains) were shot and buried in and around Żółkiew, mainly at the Jewish cemetery. Local ethnic Germans were especially active in rooting out those in hiding.⁹

At the beginning of December 1942, the Germans established an enclosed ghetto in Żółkiew, surrounded with barbed wire. The remaining Jews in the town, plus arrivals from other nearby towns and villages (including about 1,000 from Kulików and some from Mosty Wielkie), were forced to relocate to the Żółkiew ghetto, which encompassed six blocks of the town. The population of the ghetto is estimated to have been around 4,000 people. Any Jews caught outside the ghetto were to be shot.¹⁰

Overcrowding was intense, and in January and February 1943, between 10 and 20 Jews died daily as an epidemic of typhus swept through the ghetto. The final liquidation took place in two further Aktions on March 15 and March 25, 1943. During these Aktions about 800 ghetto inmates (618 individuals on March 15 and then another 170 on March 25) were sent to the Janowska Street camp in Lwów or its subcamps (e.g., Gródek Jagielloński).¹¹ Altogether, some 1,500 Jews who remained in the ghetto were shot in the Borek Forest.¹² The members of the Jewish Council and the Jewish Police were also killed. The Aktion was carried out by members of the German Security Police based in Lwów, assisted by the local German Gendarmerie (commanded by Käthe) and Ukrainian policemen.

On April 6, the German police entered the ghetto area, offering food and security to the Jews still hiding there if they were to surrender. Some of the victims accepted this offer and left their hiding places; they were shot immediately. Only a few that were captured were sent to the Janowska Street camp. About 70 Jewish skilled workers (so-called specialists) remained in Żółkiew. They were shot on July 10, 1943; only 52 Jews are known to have escaped the roundups and survived.¹³

Soviet forces recaptured Żółkiew on July 23, 1944. Over the following months a few Jews returned to the town, but they soon moved on, and the Jewish community was not reconstituted.

SOURCES Published sources on the Żółkiew ghetto include Gerszon Taffet, Zagłada żydów żółkiewskich (Łódź, 1946)—other versions of this can be found in AŻIH (302/141) and BA-L (B 162/2100—a translation into German); and Danuta Dabrowska, Abraham Wein, and Aharon Weiss, eds., Pinkas ha-kehillot. Encyclopaedia of Jewish Communities: Poland, vol. 2, Eastern Galicia (Jerusalem: Yad Vashem, 1980), pp. 206–216.

Documents regarding the fate of the Żółkiew Jews during the Holocaust can be found in the following archives: DALO (e.g., R 98-1-4); GARF (7021-67-79 and 82); USHMM; VHF (e.g., # 15838); and YVA.

Alexander Kruglov and Michael McConnell
trans. Katrin Reichelt

NOTES

1. Dabrowska, Wein, and Weiss, Pinkas ha-kehillot: Poland, vol. 2, Eastern Galicia, pp. 206–216; and VHF, # 15838, interview with Ben Bergstein, 1996.

2. Tatiana Berenstein, “Eksterminacja ludności żydowskiej w dystrykcie Galicja (1941–1943),” BŻIH, no. 61 (1967), table 7.

3. BA-L, B 162/2100, pp. 79–119 (German translation of Taffet, Zagłada Żydów żółkiewskich), here p. 83 (of the German file).

4. Ibid., pp. 85–86.

5. Ibid., pp. 86–93; Berenstein, “Eksterminacja,” table 7.

6. DALO, R 98-1-4, p. 16. By July 1942, 40 nationalized (Sovietized) and 481 nonnationalized Jewish properties had been confiscated in Żółkiew by the German Housing Office (Wohnungsamt).

7. BA-L, B 162/2100, pp. 90–92.

8. Ibid., pp. 95–100.

9. Ibid., pp. 100–103.

10. GARF, 7021-67-79, p. 55, gives the figure of 5,000 ghetto inmates, which is probably too high; 7021-67-82, p. 38; VHF, # 15838; and Taffet, Zagłada Żydów żółkiewskich, pp. 22–43.

11. Taffet, Zagłada Żydów żółkiewskich, pp. 54, 57.

12. GARF, 7021-67-79, p. 55.

13. Taffet, Zagłada żydów żółkiewskich, p. 60; Joseph J. Preil, ed., Holocaust Testimonies: European Survivors and American Liberators in New Jersey (New Brunswick, NJ: Rutgers University Press, 2001), p. 172.

ŻURAWNO

Pre-1939: Żurawno, town, Żydaczów powiat, Stanisławów województwo, Poland; 1939–1941: Zhuravno, raion center, Drogobych oblast', Ukrainian SSR; 1941–1944: Żurawno, Kreis Stryj, Distrikt Galizien, Generalgouvernement; post-1991: Zhuravno, Zhidachiv raion, L'viv oblast', Ukraine

Żurawno is located 48 kilometers (30 miles) northwest of Stanisławów. In 1939, there were about 1,300 Jews in the town.¹

German armed forces occupied Żurawno on July 3, 1941. At first, a German military commandant's office (Ortskommandantur) ran the town's affairs. Then a German civil administration took over in August 1941. Żurawno was incorporated into Kreis Stryj, within Distrikt Galizien. Regierungsrat Dr. Wiktor von Dewitz was the Kreishauptmann from 1941 to 1944. In Żurawno, there was a German Gendarmerie post, which served under the command of the Gendarmerie in Stryj, and a local Ukrainian police force, which participated actively in the anti-Jewish Aktions.

In the summer of 1941, the German occupying authorities ordered the establishment of a Jewish Council (Judenrat) and the Jewish Police (Jüdischer Ordnungsdienst) to carry out the registration and marking of all the Jews in Żurawno. At the end of July, the Jews were ordered to wear white armbands bearing a blue Star of David. Then, by the end of August, the Jews were forced to pay a “contribution” of 100,000 złoty. Other restrictions included the closing of Jewish schools and a ban on Jews buying food in the marketplace or leaving the limits of the town.

The Jewish Council also established a labor office, which assigned Jews to various forced labor tasks. In the summer of 1941, a number of Jews were engaged in regulating the flow of local rivers that were prone to flooding. In the winter of 1941–1942, the Jews of Żurawno had to surrender any furs or other warm clothing for the benefit of the German army. The Jews suffered from terrible hunger and cold; there were a number of deaths from starvation.²

By the summer of 1942, a soup kitchen had been established in Żurawno to provide hot meals to Jewish workers. Plans also were made for a branch of the Jewish Social Self-Help (JSS) to be opened in the town.³ On June 10, 1942, there were 1,151 Jews registered in Żurawno, of whom 403 were forced to perform various labor tasks.⁴ These included work on road construction, at a quarry, and in an alabaster factory. In mid-June 1942, on instructions from the Judenrat, the Ukrainian Auxiliary Police rounded up 50 Jews for transfer to the Chodorów labor office, which was viewed as a great hardship in view of the food shortages before the harvest. Another 15 Jews were arrested and held by the Jewish Police. According to survivor Henryk Schächter, these Jews were threatened with deportation to extort money from them to be used by the Judenrat.⁵ The Judenrat may have had an urgent need of funds to bribe the Germans or pay the next contribution, but Schächter's testimony is highly critical of the unscrupulous tactics employed by the Judenrat.

At the beginning of September 1942, a mass deportation Aktion was carried out in the town in the course of which around 500 Jews from Żurawno were sent to the extermination camp in Bełżec. Jews from Stryj, Chodorów, and other nearby towns were deported at the same time.⁶ Two weeks after this first wave of deportations in early September 1942, the Kreishauptmann issued instructions for the remaining Jews of the Kreis to be concentrated in Stryj, Bolechów, Chodorów, Skole, or Żurawno. Then, on September 29, 1942, most of the remaining Jews of Żurawno were forcibly resettled into the ghetto in Stryj. Further deportation Aktions were carried out in Stryj during October and November 1942 in which most of the Jews sent there from Żurawno were deported to Bełżec.

Information on the existence of a small remnant labor ghetto in Żurawno is sparse. On October 7, 1942, the Kreishauptmann ordered the concentration of all remaining Jews of the Kreis in the Stryj ghetto by the end of the month: it was not to be permitted that any individual Jews should hide or be hidden in the countryside. Exceptions, however, were granted for Jewish doctors and pharmacists, waste collectors working for the Kremin Company, and Jews working for the local council. However, these specialist Jews who were to remain in some locations after the end of October were "under all circumstances to be housed in barracks."⁷

According to survivor Zwi Liberman, at the end of September 1942, all the Jews who remained after the deportations were forced to go into a small, but open, ghetto in Żurawno.

Liberman was forced to abandon his house as it was outside the ghetto. Jews could only bring in with them what they could carry. Conditions in the ghetto were very crowded, with around 18 to 20 people living in one room.⁸

As a result of the successive German orders, around 160 Jews remained in a small remnant labor ghetto in Żurawno after the end of October 1942, including a group of waste collectors. These Jewish workers were subsequently liquidated in two Aktions on February 4 and June 5, 1943.⁹

SOURCES Documentation regarding the annihilation of the Żurawno Jews can be found in the following archives: AŻIH (301/1036, 2809); DALO (e.g., R 1951-1-65; R 1952-1-62); GARF (7021-58-22); USHMM (RG-31.003M [DALO]); VHF (# 30316); and YVA.

Alexander Kruglov and Martin Dean
trans. Steven Seegel

NOTES

1. Tatiana Berenstein, "Eksterminacja ludności żydowskiej w dystrykcie Galicja, 1941–1943," BŻIH, no. 61 (1967), table 10.
2. VHF, # 30316, testimony of Zwi Liberman.
3. DALO, R 1951-1-65, p. 13, Tätigkeitsbericht JSS Kreis Stryj, July 1942.
4. Thomas Sandkühler, "Endlösung" in Galizien: Der Judenmord in Ostpolen und die Rettungsinitiativen von Berthold Beitz 1941–1944 (Bonn: Dietz, 1996), p. 329.
5. AŻIH, 301/2809, testimony of Henryk Schächter.
6. Yitzhak Arad, Bełżec, Sobibor, Treblinka: The Operation Reinhard Death Camps (Bloomington: Indiana University Press, 1987), p. 387.
7. DALO, R 1952-1-62, p. 92, Runderlass Kreishauptmann Stryj an alle Vögte, October 7, 1942, as cited by Dieter Pohl, Nationalsozialistische Judenverfolgung in Ostgalizien 1941–1944 (Munich: Oldenbourg, 1996), p. 243; and Sandkühler, "Endlösung," p. 352.
8. VHF, # 30316.
9. Ibid.—Zwi Liberman states that 152 Jews were killed in February 1943; AŻIH, 301/1036, testimony of Dawid Liberman. See also Pohl, Nationalsozialistische Judenverfolgung, pp. 250, 260; and Sandkühler, "Endlösung," p. 370.

SECTION IV

BIAŁYSTOK REGION (DISTRIKT BIALYSTOK)

On July 17, 1941, less than a month after the German invasion of the Soviet Union, Hitler ordered the establishment of a civil administration for the occupied western regions of the Soviet Union. He named Erich Koch, the Oberpräsident and Gauleiter of East Prussia (Ostpreussen), as head of the civil administration (Chef der Zivilverwaltung) for Distrikt Białystok, as well as the Reichskommissar of Ukraine. Distrikt Białystok consisted of territories mostly from eastern Poland's pre-World War II Białystok województwo (without the Suwałki region). Its borderlands also included small parts of the Warsaw, Poleskie, and Nowogródek województwa. In the period from late 1939 until June 1941, the area of Distrikt Białystok had been under Soviet rule, comprising more or less the entire Belostok oblast' and small parts of the Brest oblast' and the Baranovichy oblast', within the Belorussian SSR.

The official transfer from a military to a civilian administration occurred on August 15, 1941. However, the Distrikt's northeastern borderlands, near Lithuania, were incorporated only on October 1, 1941. One reason for establishing Distrikt Białystok was to create a direct territorial link between Koch's home base within the Reich as Gauleiter of East Prussia and his new fiefdom in the east, Reichskommissariat Ukraine. As it was intended that the Distrikt would be later incorporated directly within Gau Ostpreussen, the administration and many of the laws were based on the model of East Prussia. However, it remained throughout the German occupation somewhat of an anomaly: a separate Distrikt in the heart of Hitler's expanded empire, neither fully incorporated into the Reich nor subordinated to either the Generalgouvernement or the Reich Ministry for the Occupied Eastern Territories (RMO) but sandwiched between these three separate entities, serving both as a buffer zone and a link.

BIAŁYSTOK REGION

"The Jews in a transport," by Józef Charyton, Kamieniec Lit.[ewski], 1942.
USHMM WS #27701, COURTESY OF ŻIH

BIAŁYSTOK REGION (DISTRIKT BIALYSTOK)

Distrikt Białystok consisted of territories mostly from eastern Poland's pre-World War II Białystok województwo (without the Suwałki region). Its borderlands also included small parts of the Warsaw, Poleskie, and Nowogródek województwa.

Szymon Datner calculated the September 1, 1939, population of the Białystok Region at 1.5 million, including 240,000 Jews, and noted the arrival of another 100,000 Jewish refugees after the region came, from September 17, under Soviet occupation. About a third of the refugees subsequently were deported to the Soviet interior. Sara Bender placed the population on August 1, 1941, the day the Distrikt officially was established, at 1.13 million, including 150,000 Jews.

On July 17, 1941, Adolf Hitler named Erich Koch, the Oberpräsident and Gauleiter of East Prussia, the Chef der Zivilverwaltung for Distrikt Białystok. The transfer to civilian administration occurred only on August 15. Even then, the Distrikt's northeastern borderlands, near Lithuania, were incorporated only on October 1. They included Grodno and the northern parts of the pre-war Grodno powiat (county).

Pre-war portrait of Erich Koch, appointed Chef der Zivilverwaltung for Distrikt Białystok in 1941.

USHMM WS #45260, COURTESY OF GEOFFREY GILES

Before then, a military administration had governed the Distrikt. Under its tenure, the 3 largest ghettos were established in Białystok, Grodno, and Łomża and about half of the 61 provincial ghettos. The physical devastation and violence in the first two months of the war, a by-product of larger German military and strategic priorities, helped determine an irregular regional pattern of ghettoization: remnant ghettos predominated in the western borderlands near East Prussia; more traditional ghettos emerged in the north, near Grodno and Sokółka, and south, near Bielsk Podlaski; and open ghettos predominated in more devastated areas, including in the east near Wołkowysk and in the center, around Białystok.

The German invasion of the USSR on June 22, 1941, devastated some Jewish communities immediately. Hundreds perished as early morning artillery shelling set Sopoćkinie ablaze. The material devastation was greatest in the Białystok pocket, where five days of aerial bombardment leveled Wołkowysk, Wołpa, and Zelwa.

Upon occupying a locality, local German military commandant's offices (Ortskommandanturen) ordered Jews to surrender radios and bicycles and mandated forced labor. Within about two weeks, the regional military command, in Łomża, had issued to all Jews in its territories the so-called rules of conduct, including requirements to wear either yellow stars on their clothing or white armbands with yellow stars. A subsequent order, likely on July 20, 1941, required Jewish communal leaders to submit population censuses and commanded all Jews to return home, warning they were forbidden, on penalty of death, from leaving their places of census registration. The same order mandated the establishment of Jewish Councils (Judenräte).¹

During the first two months of the war, Einsatzgruppen, supported by the SS, Order Police, and Wehrmacht units, conducted small killing Aktions of suspected Communists and intellectuals in almost every Jewish community. The violence initially was most massive and rapidly accelerated in and around Białystok. On June 27, 1941, the day after the Germans had occupied Białystok, Police Battalion 309 murdered 2,000 to 3,000 Jews, including some 800 people burned alive in the Great Synagogue. A July 8 visit by Heinrich Himmler brought orders to execute 2,000 Jewish men. Police Battalions 316 and 322 killed 4,000 instead. On June 26–28, a small German unit (or perhaps units) set fire to Dąbrowa Białostocka, Zabłudów, Jasionówka, and Trzcianne, likely because their inhabitants almost all were Jewish. During the Jasionówka fire, on June 27, local Poles helped the Germans murder 70 to 150 Jews; a day later in Trzcianne, another group of locals abetted the murder of some 800 Jews.

In the west, violence accelerated after orders from Reinhard Heydrich, on June 29, 1941, for the Security Police to mobilize the local population and, on July 4, for Einsatzgruppen to clear Jews from the borderlands near East Prussia. A July 4 visit by Hermann Göring to Łomża intensified violence there, as a small Einsatzkommando from Zichenau murdered almost 2,000 Jews from July 4 to July 19. On July 5, Göring and Koch visited Kolno, as local Poles murdered 30 Jews.² The visit likely sealed the fate of the 2,350 to 3,000 Kolno Jews, executed in several stages beginning on July 15 with able-bodied men; from July 18, their parents and wives; and from late July, children, single men and women, and the elderly.³ In the meantime, in Radziłów, on July 7, and in Jedwabne, on July 10, the local population burned 1,100 to 2,400 Jews alive in two barns. By early September, parts of the local population, including the auxiliary police (Hilfspolizei), had engaged in anti-Jewish violence in at least 60 other localities, mostly assisting small Einsatzgruppen and police units to plunder, beat, murder, and ghettoize Jews.

Amid the war devastation and violence, the Wehrmacht issued the first orders for ghettoization. Local military commanders responded to fire devastation upon occupying Sopoćkinie and Michałowo, on June 22 and 27, 1941, by ordering the Jews into ghettos, in Sopoćkinie to secure a captive labor force, and in Michałowo, to enable the local population to appropriate the Jews' surviving houses. A remnant ghetto also was established in Jedwabne, on July 20, for survivors of earlier violence. On August 1, the military administration ordered the Jews confined to a closed ghetto in Białystok. Days later, the Łomża ghetto was established. Six of nine provincial ghettos in the Grodno region were created under the military administration. The Jews in Grodno proper were moved into its two ghettos on October 1, the day the region was incorporated into the Distrikt.

With the transfer to civil administration, on August 15, 1941, Koch delegated a plenipotentiary, Waldemar Magunia, to represent him in the Distrikt. In February 1942, Fritz (Friedrich) Brix succeeded Magunia. They supervised seven Kreiskommissare appointed to head the Kreise of Białystok,

Jews move their belongings into the Grodno ghetto, ca. 1941–1942. USHMM WS #50349, COURTESY OF IPN

Bielsk (Podlaski), Grajewo, Grodno (from 1942, Garten), Lomscha, Sokolka, and Wolkowysk. The Białowieża Forest, officially a part of Kreis Bielsk, was treated as an extraterritorial unit within the Distrikt, administered directly by the Reichsforstamt (Reich Forestry Office).

In Kreis Grajewo, located on the East Prussian border, large-scale killing Aktions accompanied the establishment of its four closed ghettos, all created in the first weeks of August, likely by the same Einsatzkommando from the Tilsit State Police. In Augustów and Szczuczyn, all Jewish men were imprisoned as closed ghettos were constructed, in the latter case by the local Polish population, for the Jewish community's women and children. A small number of craftsmen and medical professionals were released to the newly constructed ghetto. About 2,400 to 3,200 others were shot. Events likely followed a similar course in Grajewo. However, the sparse documentation makes it difficult to corroborate a Jewish eyewitness's suggestion that as many as 7,900 Jews perished before the ghetto was established.

In Kreis Lomscha, large-scale killing Aktions coincided with ghettoization in half of the eight ghettos established from July to September 1941. In Stawiski, in July, and in Czyżewo, in August, a total of 3,500 to 3,850 Jews were executed, and only 110 and 60, respectively, mostly male craftsmen were retained in remnant ghettos. In Zambrów, local auxiliaries helped the SS, on August 19, to choose 700 to 900 mostly able-bodied men, about a third of the Jewish community, for execution, likely the day before the ghetto was established. A remnant ghetto also was planned for Wysokie Mazowieckie, but the SS failed to arrive from Łomża as scheduled. The Jews, ordered to a ghetto in late August, lived in relative peace until November 1942. In Łomża, mass killing Aktions in August and September 1941 rid the ghetto of 700 to 2,000 "nonuseful" workers, including yeshiva students, the elderly, and those unemployed. A similar execution in Zambrów, in September, targeted 300 elderly and pregnant Jews.

Because of the mass killing Aktions, the ghettos in Kreis Lomscha and Kreis Grajewo remained small. The Jewish communities south of Śniadowo (Kreis Lomscha), including in Lubotyń, Prosiénica, and Szumowo Nowe, were wiped out in the first weeks of August. As a result, the Śniadowo ghetto, established in early August 1941, was made up almost exclusively of Jews native to the town. Likely, because a warehouse was established in one of Śniadowo's two railway stations to store items plundered on the Eastern Front, the Jewish community was spared from execution to sort, repair, and repack the goods for shipment to the Reich.

Because of the violence, Kreis Lomscha and Kreis Grajewo stood apart from the other Kreise for the relatively large number of Jews, mostly survivors of violence, living illegally inside and outside of its ghettos. These individuals placed enormous pressures on the ghettos in Zambrów, Czyżewo, and Łomża. In the spring of 1942, local authorities permitted fugitives in Stawiski (and other Jews in small remnant ghettos) to work for Poles as agricultural laborers, on contracts arranged by the local Arbeitsamt, and to remain behind in Jedwabne (Kreis Lomscha) and Radziłów (Kreis Grajewo), when the ghettos were dissolved in November 1941 and June 1942, respectively. The Jedwabne Jews were expelled to the Łomża ghetto. However, the Grajewo Kreiskommissar, in the spring of 1942, ordered Jews in his Kreis, including almost all the Radziłów survivors, sent for labor in Milewo, on his estate at Milbo. About a third of the Jews in the Augustów ghetto also were deported to Milbo at about the same time, as were most Jews from tiny survivor communities. Because it was more of a labor camp than a ghetto, Milewo is not covered in this volume.

In other Kreise, the transfer to civilian administration resulted in the concentration of Jews into just a few ghettos, including in the Białowieża Forest, in Kreis Bielsk. The initial violence that accompanied the expulsion of Jews from the forest's interior in the first two weeks of August 1941 gave way by the end of the month to a less murderous expulsion drive, likely ordered by the Reichsforstamt to clear the Jewish and non-Jewish population from a wide territorial belt along the forest's periphery. A small number of Jews were retained for remnant ghettos in Narewka and Kamieniec Litewski; the rest were expelled to Prużana along with Jews from 18 other communities. The expulsions continued after the establishment of the Prużana ghetto on September 25, 1941. With the expulsion of 4,000 to 5,000 Białystok ghetto inmates there in October, the Prużana ghetto population swelled to over 10,000, making it (because of the mass killings in Łomża) the third most populous ghetto in the Distrikt, behind only the Białystok and Grodno ghettos.

The Prużana ghetto also looked different from most other ghettos in the Distrikt, because its fence was constructed of metal and brick. More typically, local German authorities, even in Białystok, ordered the Jews in closed ghettos to provide wooden construction materials for the fences and to build them. In the case of Prużana, the authorities provided the metal fencing and barbed wire, charging the Jewish Council a 750,000 rubles "fee."⁴

In Kreis Sokolka, arson in late August 1941 drove the Jews from Sidra and Kuźnica Białostocka, but when they and the Dąbrowa Białostocka Jews returned to their burned-out homes, German authorities began establishing remnant ghettos for craftsmen and road construction laborers in fire-devastated towns, including Kuźnica in October and Dąbrowa in February 1942. Almost all the rest of the Jews from the northern and western part of the Kreis, including from Sidra, Dąbrowa, and a part of the Janów Sokółski community, were consolidated in the Suchowola ghetto, established in early August 1941. Following the last expulsion in February, the ghetto population had expanded from 2,000 to around 6,000. Because of the pressures overcrowding placed on its limited resources, the Suchowola Amtskommissar consented to establish a new ghetto in March 1942. Similar consolidations occurred in the east of the Kreis, to the Krynki ghetto, established in December 1941, but began only in the early spring of 1942. In the meantime, the ghetto established in October, in Sokółka, the Kreis center, remained a small, walled-off fortress for the native population and a small number of voluntary refugees.

In Kreis Bielsk, the establishment of the 12 ghettos outside the Białowieża Forest proceeded in stages with little violence. In August 1941, the local civil administration first ordered Jews to live apart from Christians. In large communities, including Ciechanowiec and Bielsk Podlaski, closed ghettos were established by the fall of 1941; in others, including Wysokie Litewskie, Siemiatycze, and Brańsk, open ghettos were created instead. In the spring of 1942, the newly appointed Kreiskommissar, Landrat Tubenthal, ordered all Jews in the Kreis to closed ghettos. The orders established ghettos in Orla and Boćki in March, and in Drohiczyn, Grodzisk, and Kleszczele, and also likely in Wysokie Litewskie, in May. However, the Jewish Council in Siemiatycze prolonged negotiations over the closed ghetto's future location and size and bribed local officials to postpone its establishment until August 1942.

The establishment of the provincial ghettos in Kreis Grodno likely followed a similar pattern as in Kreis Bielsk. All the provincial ghettos initially were open ghettos, including the ghettos in Ostryna and Marcinkańce, established in October and November 1941. The Ostryna ghetto was closed in April 1942, as were almost all the others, though the timing of the closure orders in Łunna, Jeziory, and Skidel is not known precisely.

Likely, because of the material devastation from war operations in Kreis Wolkowysk, almost all of the nine ghettos established in the summer of 1941 remained open. The ghettos had some of the worst material conditions in the Distrikt. In Zelwa, the Jews lived in the basements of war-devastated houses; in Wołpa, in pits dug into the ground. In Wołkowysk, 15 families crowded together in the few Jewish-owned structures still standing. Only two of the eight provincial ghettos, in Porozów and Piaski, were closed, with the first closed on September 23, 1942, and the second on September 26.⁵

Of the 10 provincial ghettos established in Kreis Białystok, likely only the ghettos in Michałowo and Gródek Białostocki were closed. The local Amtskommissar, Paul Melzer, disbanded the Michałowo ghetto upon arriving in nearby Gródek in August 1941. Several testimonies note Melzer established a closed ghetto in Gródek, perhaps in the fall of 1941. However, Szymon Datner recalls that the postwar Polish investigative team, of which he was a part, encountered difficulties charging Melzer with war crimes related to ghettoization, because documentation in the Underground Archives of the Białystok Ghetto upheld Melzer's claim that he had released Jews from ghettos rather than imprison them.⁶ The Knyszyn Amtskommissar ordered the ghetto there fenced in the fall of 1941, but local Polish health professionals intervened to suspend the closure order. It is the only known example of the local population seeking to mitigate the course of ghettoization in Distrikt Białystok.

Local authorities also did not expel Jewish returnees from fire-devastated localities, as in Kreis Sokolka. Rather, they established open ghettos, including in Trzcianne, in the fall of 1941, and Zabłudów, in January 1942. However, the ghetto populations were small from the outset, because only a limited number of Jews chose to live in the fire-devastated ruins of their former communities.

The varying patterns of ghettoization reflected the physical conditions in the region and larger German military and strategic priorities, but the wide range of ghettos across the Distrikt also highlights the flexible and partially decentralized nature of Nazi ghettoization policies. Given the near uniformity of certain ghettos in some Kreise and the uneven patterns across the Distrikt, it appears Kreiskommissare, as in Bielsk, decided whether ghettos would remain open or be closed and when and where ghetto consolidations would occur.

The decentralization helps to explain the vast disparities in provisioning across the ghettos, including why Jews in the Rajgród and Bielsk Podlaski ghettos received no rations and starved, whereas local peasants were permitted in Grajewo and Zambrów to enter the ghetto to barter food for material possessions. The relatively large number of examples of calves being smuggled into ghettos and the many references across the entries to ritual slaughterers (shochetim) executed for being found outside of ghettos suggest that kosher slaughter continued, inside and outside of ghettos, and that Jews, even in provincial ghettos, had access, albeit illegally and at great risk, to food sources beyond the limited rations.

Even the most uniform ghettoization policy instituted in the Kreis, the simultaneous liquidation of the provincial ghettos, on November 2, 1942, and the establishment of five regional transit camps in which to concentrate the Jews before sending them to the extermination camps was unique to the Distrikt. Local officials also appear to have decided the level of support they needed during the liquidation Aktion. In Drohiczyń (Kreis Bielsk), SS Ukrainian auxiliaries supported local Gendarmes and auxiliaries. In Marcinkańce (Kreis Grodno), for a ghetto of likely about the same population, the local Gendarmerie commander employed a small force of about 16 German police and civilians. Local auxiliaries were not called in for support until after the Jews had fled from the deportation. The Białystok Jews also were excluded from the liquidation Aktions because Brix and Froese, the Distrikt military inspector for the ordinance industry, successfully appealed to Berlin to maintain the Białystok ghetto intact to exploit its Jewish labor to expand munitions production.

Such arguments were no longer tenable by mid-July 1943, when losses on the Eastern Front and growing Soviet partisan activity prompted the German decision to transfer Białystok's industries to Lublin and in August to liquidate the ghetto, the last in the Distrikt. On August 15–16, with all hope for survival lost, the underground launched an uprising but was soon overwhelmed. More than 100 Jews managed to escape from the ghetto and join the partisans.

SOURCES Secondary works offering at least some regional coverage of the history of the Jews in the ghettos of Distrikt Białystok include Sara Bender, Mul Mavet Orev: Yehude Białystok be-Milhemet ha-'Olam ha-Sbniya 1939–1945 (Tel Aviv:

'Am 'Oved, 1997), now in an English translation, by Yaffa Murciano, as The Jews of Białystok during World War II and the Holocaust (Waltham, MA: Brandeis University Press, 2008); Szymon Datner, "Eksterminacja ludności żydowskiej w Okręgu Białostockim," BŻIH, no. 60 (1966): 3–50 plus unnumbered tables; Shalom Cholawsky, The Jews of Belorussia during World War II (Amsterdam: Harwood, 1998); Tikva Fatal-Knaani, Zo lo otah Grodnob, Kiblat Grodnob u-sevivatab bamilbamah uva-sho'ah 1939–1943 (Jerusalem: Yad Vashem, 2001); Christian Gerlach, Kalkulierte Morde: Die deutsche Wirtschafts- und Vernichtungspolitik in Weissrussland 1941 bis 1944 (Hamburg: HIS, 1999); Paweł Machcewicz and Krzysztof Persak, eds., Wokół Jedwabnego, 2 vols. (Warsaw: IPN-KSZpNP, 2002), vol. 1, Studia; Ewa Rogalewska, Getto białostockie. Doświadczenie Zagłady—świadełwa literatury i życia (Białystok: IPN-KSZpNP, 2008); Waldemar Monkiewicz and Józef Kowalczyk, Zagłada ludności Żydowskiej w Białymstoku (Białystok, 1983); Mariusz Nowik, Zagłada Żydów na ziemi łomżyńskiej (Warsaw: Bellona, 2006); Andrzej Żbikowski, U genezy Jedwabnego: Żyolzi na kresach północno-wschodnich II Rzeczypospolitej, wrzesień 1939–lipiec 1941 (Warsaw: ŻIH, 2006), with chap. 5, the most pertinent chapter, in an English translation as "Pogroms in Northeastern Poland—Spontaneous Reactions and German Instigations," pp. 315–354, in Elazar Barkan et al., eds., Shared History, Divided Memory: Jews and Others in Soviet-Occupied Poland, 1939–1941 (Leipzig: Simon-Dubnow-Institut für Jüdische Geschichte und Kultur, 2007).

Published collections of testimonies, memoirs with regional coverage or containing important information about German decision making about the region, and other primary source material include the following: R.A. Chernoglazova, ed., Tragediia evreev Belorussii (1941–1944): Sbornik materialov i dokumentov (Minsk: Izdatel' E.S. Gal'perin, 1997); Hajkah (Chaika) Grosman, Anshe ha-Maheret (Tel Aviv: Moreshet and Sifriyat Po'alim, 1965), available in an English translation by Shmuel Beer, as The Underground Army: Fighters of the Białystok Ghetto (New York: Holocaust Library, 1987); Serge Klarsfeld, ed., Documents Concerning the Destruction of the Jews of Grodno 1941–1944, 6 vols. (New York: Beate Klarsfeld Foundation, 1985–1992); Paweł Machcewicz and Krzysztof Persak, eds., Wokół Jedwabnego, 2 vols. (Warsaw: IPN-KSZpNP, 2002), vol. 2, Dokumenty; Leonid Smilovitskii, Katastrofa evreev v Belorussii 1941–1944gg. (Tel Aviv: Biblioteka Matveia Chernogo, 2000); Mordecai Tenenbaum, Dapim min ha-Delekah (Jerusalem: Yad Vashem and Bet Lohame ha-Gita'ot, 1984); and for its documentation on the deportations from Distrikt Białystok to the Auschwitz death camp, Stanisław Mączka, ed., Żydzi polscy w KL Auschwitz: Wykazy imienne. Polish Jews in KL Auschwitz: Name Lists (Warsaw: ŻIH, 2004).

Publications used to identify smaller ghettos in Distrikt Białystok included Marat Botvinnik, Pamiętniki genotsida evreev Belarusi (Minsk: Belaruskaja Navuka, 2000); Emanuel Ioffe, Belorusskie evrei: Tragediia i geroizm, 1941–1945 (Minsk: Arti-Feks, 2003); U.P. Verkhas' and U.F. Shumila, eds., Pamiats'. Historyka-dakumental'naia khronika Hrodzenskaha raiona (Minsk: Belaruskaja Entsyklapedyia, 1993); Henadz' Pashkou, ed., Pamiats'. Historyka-dakumental'naia khronika Shchubynskaha raiona (Minsk: Belaruskaja Entsyklapedyia, 2001); Czesław Pili-chowski et al., eds., Obozy hitlerowskie na ziemiach polskich 1939–1945: Informator encyklopedyczny (Warsaw: PWN, 1979); Abraham Wein, ed., Pinkas ha-kehillot. Encyclopaedia of Jewish Communities: Poland, vol. 4, Warsaw and Its Region (Jerusalem: Yad Vashem, 1989); Shmuel Spector and Bracha Freundlich, eds., Pinkas ha-kehillot. Encyclopedia of Jewish Communities: Poland, vol. 8, Vilna, Bialystok, Nowogrodek (Jerusalem: Yad Vashem, 2005); Rejestr miejsc i faktów zbrodni popełnionych przez okupanta hitlerowskiego na ziemiach polskich w latach 1939–1945. Województwo łomżyńskie (Warsaw: GKBZHWP and OKBZH-Bi, 1985); Rejestr miejsc i faktów zbrodni popełnionych przez okupanta hitlerowskiego na ziemiach polskich. Województwo ostrołęckie (Warsaw: GKBZHWP and IPN, 1985); Arnon Rubin, The Rise and Fall of Jewish Communities in Poland and Their Relics Today, vol. 1, District Bialystok (Tel Aviv: Tel Aviv University Press, 2006); and Shmuel Spector and Geoffrey Wigoder, eds., The Encyclopedia of Jewish Life before and during the Holocaust (Jerusalem: Yad Vashem; New York: New York University Press, 2001).

Relevant documentation can be found in the following archives: AAN; APB; APŁmż; AUKGBRBBO; AUKGBRB-GrO; AŻIH; BA-BL; BA-L; BA-MA; BLH; CDJC; FVA; GABO; GAGO; GARF; IPN; IPN-Bi; NARA; NARB; RGASPI; RGVA; USHMM; VHAP; VHF; YIVO; and YVA.

Laura Crago

NOTES

1. USHMM, RG-15.079M (AŻIH), Ring I/899, anonymous testimony, Rutki[-Kossaki] refugee, pp. 1–5.
2. BA-MA, RH 26-211/84, p. 1.
3. Dinah Koncepolsky-Chludniewitz, “The End of the Kolno Community,” in A. Rembah and Binyamin Halevi, eds., Sefer zikaron le-kehillat Kolnah (Tel Aviv: Irgun yots’e Kolnah ye-Sifriyat-po’alim, 1971), pp. 45–50; USHMM, RG-15.019M (IPN), ASG, reel 1, 2/177-78, pp. 1–2; IPN-Bi, S-1/71, pp. 1–289. See also IPN, SOŁ 130.
4. AŻIH, 301/1380, testimony of Olga Goldfajn, pp. 2–3.
5. Informacja Bieżąca, no. 44 (69), December 2, 1942, p. 3, in USHMM, RG-15.079M (AŻIH), Ring II/338/b [CD: # 8, 434. Ring II/338/2], p. 86.
6. Datner, “Eksterminacja,” p. 68.

AUGUSTÓW

Pre-1939: Augustów, town, Augustów powiat, Białystok województwo, Poland; 1939–1941: Avgustov, raion center, Belostok oblast', Belorussian SSR; 1941–1945: Augustowo, Kreis Grajewo, Distrikt Białystok; post-1999: Augustów, Augustów powiat, województwo podlaskie, Poland

Augustów lies 95.5 kilometers (59.3 miles), north-northwest of Białystok and 42.5 kilometers (26.4 miles) northeast of Grajewo.

Because of its location near the Polish–East Prussian border, the Germans bombed the Augustów train station on September 1, 1939, but occupied the town for just two hours before ceding it to Soviet occupation. In September 1940, 2,906 Jews lived in the Avgustov raion.

On June 22, 1941, the first day of the German invasion of the USSR, the Germans reoccupied Augustów. They established a Polish administration and recruited an auxiliary police force. A Jewish survivor remembers the force as composed of local Poles, who subsequently all qualified and registered under Nazi racial laws as ethnic Germans.¹ Little is known about the collaborators' activities in the summer of 1941, a period in which one third to one half of the Jewish community perished.

On June 24, 1941, a Waffen-SS commander arrested 70 workers and guests of an Augustów retreat center and executed about 30 of the captives—15 Jews and 15 Russians.² Operational units organized by Regierungsrat Hans-Joachim Böhme, commander of the Tilsit State Police, were responsible for the subsequent June and July murders of Augustów Jews. On June 27, an Einsatzkommando, led by SS-Captain Wolfgang Ilges, from Tilsit, ordered the arrest, for communism, of 100 more Augustów residents, mostly Jews.³ Several days later, the men arrested a furrier and several other Jews, probably for defying orders to return home. Whether the prisoners were executed immediately or were held and murdered on July 3, together with 175 more victims, remains unclear. What is known is that on July 3 an operational unit led either by Ilges or by Waldemar Macholl, the Grenzkommis-sar of the Sudauen (Polish: Suwałki) border police, and soldiers from the intelligence branch of the 87th Infantry Regiment murdered 300 to 316 people, including 10 women, in two mass shooting Aktions in the Augustów Forest.⁴ Almost all of the victims were Jews.

The largest mass shooting of Augustów Jews occurred at the same time the ghetto was established. On August 15, 1941, a German unit, also likely from the Tilsit State Police, ordered Jewish men from 13 to 60 years old to register for work at a central point in Augustów. Held captive in the synagogue, the 800 to 1,650 men who obeyed the order were executed in small groups of 200 to 300 people in the Szczecbrze section of the Augustów Forest, near Klonownica village.⁵

Likely, on the day of the roundup the Jewish women in Augustów were confined to a ghetto. Located on a 12-hectare (29.7-acre) area between the Augustów and Bystry Canals, the ghetto occupied a former settlement of one-room houses built for the workers of the local sawmill. It contained several streets of company-owned houses, all referred to as Barracks' Street. In the period of the ghetto, the streets were numbered from 1 to 13. They were surrounded by a wire fence, topped in some places by barbed wire. The only gate was on the road leading to Lipsk nad Biebrzą. The road is now called Bohaterów Westerplatte (Street of the Westerplatte Heroes).⁶

A detailed list in the postwar Polish court documentation of the skilled trades practiced by men in the Augustów ghetto suggests that craftsmen may have been released to the ghetto, as had happened several weeks prior in Szczuczyn (Białostocki), also in Kreis Grajewo. However, Jewish survivor Nusia Janowski maintains the Germans intended the ghetto population to be wholly female.⁷ Charles Levine, another survivor, notes that no men were held back from execution. The only men in the ghetto were those who had not registered for labor or had broken the windows of the synagogue and fled.⁸

In August 1941, the Germans consolidated in the ghetto about 100 Jews from other parts of the former Avgustov raion as well as a handful of Jews still resident in Kreis Sudauen. The expellees included the Sztabin community, a part of the Lipsk nad Biebrzą community, and a smaller number of Jews from Raczki (Augustów powiat) and Dowspuda. (In October 1939, the Germans had driven almost all of the Jews from the last two communities across the border near Augustów. Some had been deported from Augustów to the Soviet interior in May 1940; the others were ordered to move to Słonim.) The executions and consolidations make it difficult to ascertain the Augustów ghetto population. Most survivors claim 2,000 Jews resided there.

Toyer, the head of the SS in Augustów, and his assistant, an ethnic German named Klonovsky, were ultimately responsible for the ghetto. It was monitored on a day-to-day basis by the German Gendarmerie and guarded by Polish auxiliaries.⁹ Living conditions were poor. About 24 people resided in a single house. Overcrowding gave way to ailments, such as purpura, associated with typhus, and other fever epidemics. A hospital and cemetery were established in the ghetto.¹⁰

Jews are gathered at an assembly point during a deportation Aktion in the Augustów ghetto, November 1942.

USHMM WS #74337, COURTESY OF ŻIH

The male craftsmen worked as tailors, shoemakers, carpenters, watchmakers, and painters. Some men and many more women were conscripted for labor at the lumber mill, renamed in this period for Hermann Göring. Skilled mechanics and locksmiths worked for the Wehrmacht. Unskilled workers were sent to a labor camp established in Augustów for road repair or were conscripted for agricultural labor or timber harvesting. August Bogener, from January to March 1942 an auxiliary policeman and supervisor of Jewish forced labor crews, routinely beat prisoners with a rubber truncheon, kicked them, and stripped them of food they were attempting to smuggle into the ghetto.

In June 1942, the Germans reduced the size of the Augustów ghetto population by deporting a large number of young women inmates to Grajewo. The women were sent for agricultural labor at Milewo, the estate of the Grajewo Kreis-kommissar, located in Milewo (Szczuczyn gmina and powiat). Approximately 500 to 1,000 Jews at Milewo came from Augustów, Sztabin, and Lipsk.

The Augustów ghetto was liquidated on November 2, 1942. A handful of Christian converts were permitted to remain with their families in Augustów. The Gendarmes locked the sick and elderly, those they deemed unable to travel, either into the ghetto hospital or a regular house and set it ablaze.¹¹ The remaining Jews were expelled to a transit camp located north of Grajewo, in Bogusze village, near the train station in Prostken, East Prussia. About 5,000 to 9,000 Jews from other nearby localities, including from Milewo, were expelled to the transit camp that same day. On December 15–16, the Germans sent 3,000 to 5,000 inmates from Bogusze to the Treblinka extermination camp. On January 3, 1943, the remaining 2,000 Jews at Bogusze were sent to the Auschwitz extermination camp. On January 7, at Auschwitz II-Birkenau, the Germans selected 296 men and 215 women from the transport for labor. The remaining 1,489 people were gassed on arrival.

A pile of tombstones removed from the Jewish cemetery during the destruction of the Augustów ghetto, November 1942. The tombstone on top was erected in memory of Abraham bar Mayrim Moloveichik and includes a Hebrew acrostic using the letters of his first name.

USHMM WS #33431, COURTESY OF GFH

In August 1943, the converts excluded from the Bogusze deportation were executed.¹² In April 1944, Macholl, then head of Department IVA-3 of the Białystok Gestapo, organized a Sonderkommando 1005 unit, personally selecting its 43 laborers from a group of Jewish male craftsmen and other survivors at the city prison. The unit began its work on May 15, 1944, in the Augustów Forest. Closely supervised by Obersturmführer Dick, the Jewish prisoners spent almost three weeks exhuming and burning the corpses there, including 3,000 to 5,000 Jewish, Belorussian, and Polish civilians and former Soviet officials buried in seven mass graves at Szczębrze.¹³

In addition to the handful of survivors from Auschwitz, three Jewish refugees from German-occupied Poland are counted as survivors. Assisted by Paweł Kunda, a local physician, they lived outside the ghetto on false identity papers and remained in Augustów after the liquidation of the ghetto.¹⁴

In West Germany, Böhme received a 15-year prison term for ordering the executions of several thousand Jews (and Communists), including in Augustów. In 1957, Ilges received a 4-year sentence for murdering 100 Augustów Jews. In Poland, Bogener was sentenced to life in prison in 1947 for using compulsion to exploit Jews for forced labor. In 1954, the sentence was commuted to a 12-year term.¹⁵ Macholl was convicted in March 1945 of numerous crimes, including ordering the murders in June and July 1941 of 316 Augustów Forest victims, ordering the Sonderkommando 1005 unit to destroy evidence of Nazi crimes in Augustów, and ordering the execution of at least 31 Jews from the unit. He was sentenced to death and executed.¹⁶

SOURCES Some archival documentation appears in Paweł Machcewicz and Krzysztof Persak, eds., Wokół Jedwabnego, 2 vols. (Warsaw: IPN and KŚZpNP, 2002), vol. 2, Dokumenty, pp. 260–262 (AŻIH, 301/1846, Polish trans.), a testimony by Menachem Finkelsztein, which provides the most detailed description of labor at Milewo. The yizkor book edited by Ya'akov Aleksandrone, Sefer yizkor li-kehillat Ogustov veba-sevivah (Tel Aviv: Irgun yots'e Ogustov veba-sevivah be-Yisrael, [1966]), pp. 373–489, also includes accounts of the destruction of the Augustów Jewish community.

Secondary works covering the Jewish community of Augustów under German occupation during World War II include the brief account by Sara Bender, “‘Akcja Reinhardt’ w okręgu białostockim,” in Dariusz Libionka, ed., Akcja Reinhardt. Zagłada Żydów w Generalnym Gubernatorstwie (Warsaw: IPN, 2004), pp. 209–210; Abraham Wein, ed., Pinkas ha-kehillot. Encyclopaedia of Jewish Communities: Poland, vol. 4, Warsaw and Its Region (Jerusalem: Yad Vashem, 1989), p. 126 (Augustów), p. 421 (Raczki); and Arnon Rubin, The Rise and Fall of Jewish Communities in Poland and Their Relics Today, vol. 1, District Białystok (Tel Aviv: Tel Aviv University Press, 2006), pp. 36–38 (Augustów), p. 124 (Lipsk), and p. 212 (Sztabin). For the deportations to Augustów of the Lipsk and Sztabin communities and the handful of Jews from Raczki and Dowspoda, still invaluable is Szymon Datner, “Eksterminacja ludności żydowskiej w Okręgu Białostockim,” BŻIH, no. 60 (1966): tab. 4.

Historians divide over whether Macholl or Ilges was responsible for the July 1941 killings. Here compare Datner, “Niemiecki okupacyjny aparat bezpieczeństwa w Okręgu Białostockim (1941–1941) w świetle materiałów niemieckich (opracowania Waldemara Macholla),” Biuletyn GKBZHP 15 (1965): 25, 47, a point reiterated in Rejestr miejsc i faktów zbrodni popełnionych przez okupanta hitlerowskiego na ziemiach polskich w latach 1939–1945. Województwo suwalskie (Warsaw: GKBZHP-IPN, 1986), p. 15; with Christian Gerlach, Kalkulierte Morde: Die deutsche Wirtschafts- und Vernichtungspolitik in Weissrussland 1941 bis 1944 (Hamburg: HIS, 1999), p. 539; and Andrzej Żbikowski, “Pogromy i mordy ludności żydowskiej w Łomżyńskim i na Białostocczyźnie latem 1941 roku w świetle relacji ocalałych Żydów i dokumentów sądowych,” in Wokół Jedwabnego, vol. 1, Studia, p. 264. The fact that the July victims were almost all Jews is discussed in Józef Kowalczyk, “Zbrodnie Wehrmachtu w rejonie białostockim w latach 1939–1945,” Biuletyn GKBZHP 31 (1982): 94.

Published verdicts from the West German trials, cited below, are available in Justiz und NS-Verbrechen, vol. 14 (Amsterdam: Amsterdam University Press, 1976), Lfd. Nr. 444, pp. 105–134 (LG-Köl, 24 Ks 1/57); vol. 15, Lfd. Nr. 465, pp. 146–149 (LG-Ulm, Ks 2/57; and BGH, 1 StR 648/59); and vol. 16, Lfd. Nr. 485, pp. 155–164 (LG-Biel, 5 Ks 2/59). The Sonderkommando 1005 unit assigned to the Augustów Forest is discussed in Waldemar Monkiewicz, “Sonderaktion 1005 na Białostocczyźnie,” Białostocczyzna, no. 16 (1989): 27–29.

Documentation pertaining to the Jewish community of Augustów during World War II can be found in the following archives: AŻIH (e.g., Ankiety, 301 [21, 547, 1846, 2264]); FVA (e.g., HVT [1458, 663]); IPN (e.g., ASG, SOB 279–280, SOE 102, SWB 44); IPN-Bi (e.g., 1/1961, 7/1133, and 443/71 [Lipsk nad Biebrzą]); USHMM (e.g., RG-15.019M [IPN] [reel 14, 46/1], RG-50.002*0037, RG-50.549.02*0009); VHF (e.g., # 5388, 6010, 21177, 23224, 26675, 27439, 44356, 49356); and YVA (e.g., M-1Q/481, M-11/275, M-11B [37, 97, 206], M-49/E [21, 1265, 1267], O-3/2773, O-33/290, TR-10 [BA-L] 843).

Laura Crago and Elżbieta Rojowska
trans. Sala Levin

13. AŻIH, 301/21, testimony of Szymon Amiel, pp. 1–2 (typescript); and 301/547, testimony of Gerszon Mojżesz Hejss, pp. 1–3.

14. VHF, # 26675.

15. IPN, SOE 102. See also IPN-Bi, 7/1133.

16. IPN, SOB 279–280.

BIAŁYSTOK

Pre-1939: Białystok, city and capital, Białystok województwo, Poland; 1939–1941: Belostok, oblast' center, Belorussian SSR; 1941–1944: Białystok, Kreis center and capital, Distrikt Białystok; post-1998: Białystok, capital, województwo podlaskie, Poland

Białystok lies 190 kilometers (118 miles) northeast of Warsaw. Its 1936 population of 99,722 included 44,482 Jews. The Jews had transformed Białystok into a leading manufacturing center, with the second-largest textile industry in pre-war Poland.

The Germans occupied Białystok from September 15 to September 22, 1939, before ceding it to Soviet occupation. Under Soviet rule, refugees from German-occupied Poland swelled the Jewish population to about 50,000.

The Germans recaptured Białystok on June 27, 1941. That day, members of Police Battalion 309 extricated hundreds of Jews from their houses and executed them in the public garden. Patients in the Jewish hospital were also murdered. Another 800 Jews, driven into the Great Synagogue, were burned alive. On July 3, Einsatzkommando 8, a subunit of Einsatzgruppe B, rounded up about 1,000 Jews and shot 300 of them, mostly intellectuals, near Pietrasze, a village just north of Białystok. On July 12, the Germans arrested about 4,500 young Jewish men. Members of Police Battalion 316 executed them in a forest near Pietrasze. In two weeks, 7,000 Jews had perished.¹

On Sunday, June 29, 1941, local German military authorities ordered Gedaliah Rosenman, the chief rabbi of Białystok, to establish a 12-member Jewish Council (Judenrat) within 24

NOTES

1. USHMM, RG-50.002*0037; and repeated in VHF, # 21177, both testimonies of Charles Levine.

2. LG-Biel, 5 Ks 2/59.

3. LG-Köl, 24 Ks 1/57.

4. LG-Ulm, Ks 2/57.

5. IPN-Bi, S-415/71, vol. 1, p. 16 (deposition, Józef Rowiński); and USHMM, RG-50.002*0037.

6. USHMM, RG-15.019M (IPN), ASG, reel 14, 46/1, pp. 1–2.

7. VHF, # 26675.

8. Ibid., # 21177.

9. USHMM, RG-15.019M, reel 14, 46/1, pp. 1–2.

10. IPN-Bi, S-415/71, vol. 3, pp. 21–22 (depositions, Piotr Bondziul and Janina Derda).

11. Ibid., pp. 21–22, 27 (deposition, Waław Węgrzynowicz).

12. VHF, # 26675.

German soldiers surround a group of Jewish men who stand with their hands up in Białystok, ca. 1941.

USHMM WS #05681, COURTESY OF JERZY TOMASZEWSKI

hours. Rosenman formally served as its chair. However, the practical responsibilities of the chairmanship were assumed by Ephraim Barash, the administrative director and president of the Białystok Jewish community. The council was expanded to 24 people in August.

On July 26, 1941, the Judenrat announced that military authorities had ordered a ghetto established and had given the Jews five days to move there. The ghetto was located in an area immediately north of Kościuszko Square. The Germans ordered the Jews to construct a 2.5-meter-high (8.2-foot-high) wooden fence, topped with barbed wire, around the ghetto. On August 1, the main gate, on Jurowiecka Street, was closed on its 43,000 inhabitants. A Jewish police force of more than 200 men patrolled the ghetto from the inside and helped the Judenrat maintain order and carry out German orders. The Schupo guarded the ghetto gates from the outside.

The German-appointed mayor, or city governor, of Białystok officially served as the ghetto's civilian administrator. In practice, he oversaw its economic administration, and security officials exercised day-to-day control. From August 1941, the commander of the police and SD in Distrikt Białystok was Wilhelm Altenloh. Until October 1942, he carried out his responsibilities from Allenstein. A deputy, Theodor Paeffgen, represented him in Białystok. In April 1942, when the SD, Criminal Police (Kripo), and Gestapo in Białystok were united in a single operational framework, Altenloh was appointed Kommandeur der Sicherheitspolizei und des SD (KdS). The first commander of the Białystok Gestapo was Waldemar Macholl. Richard Dibus was its deputy commander. From October 1942, Fritz Friedel was head of the Judenreferat (Department of Jewish Affairs). When Lothar Heimbach was named Gestapo chief in January 1943, Macholl became his deputy, and Friedel assumed direct responsibility for the ghetto.²

In September 1941, the German authorities demanded the Judenrat provide a list of 4,500 to 5,000 Jews to be moved to the ghetto in Prużana. The expulsions stirred popular anger because the Judenrat had targeted for removal widows of recent victims of the Germans, and the Jewish Police used force to remove them.³

Even though Barash had acted harshly, likely to demonstrate to the Germans his authority, he and the council members felt enormous responsibility for the residents of the Białystok ghetto. They established a very large administrative staff to care for them. By June 1942, the council employed more than 4,000 people, not including the approximately 8,600 industrial workers employed in ghetto factories. The Supplies Department supervised bakeries, a dairy farm, and factories, which produced for ghetto residents a range of processed foodstuffs, including jam, and transformed inedible meat provided by the authorities into sausage.⁴ It grew 190 tons of vegetables in gardens planted on vacant lots and distributed rations, including barley, flour, potatoes, sugar, oil, wood, and coal. The fact that the Judenrat initially ordered ghetto inhabitants to burn potato peels, to save on refuse collection, perhaps indicates that the Białystok ghetto was better provisioned than most.⁵ A Welfare Department opened an old-age home for 200 residents and organized two orphanages. The Health Department established a hospital and provided the ghetto population with free or reduced-cost medical services, including standard vaccinations for children. A Sanitation Department imposed harsh penalties to prevent the outbreak of disease. The morbidity rate in the first year of the ghetto's existence nonetheless climbed to almost double the preoccupation rate, but the cleanliness drives also had prevented a single case of typhus in the ghetto.⁶

Barash maintained that Jewish survival depended on transforming the Białystok ghetto population into a productive source of cheap labor to meet the vital economic needs of the German Reich. He believed his strategy would protect the Jews from German violence, forestall deportations, and ensure Jewish survival. The extant reports of the Judenrat meetings indicate that its guiding principle was—as Barash put it—“to make the ghetto so useful to the German administration that it would be detrimental for them to destroy it.”⁷

By June 1942, 20 factories operated in the Białystok ghetto. A laundry, a glass-polishing workshop, sewing rooms, a tannery, and leather works also had been created. They manufactured a long list of items, including clothing and uniforms, shoes, saddles, barrels, electrical appliances, soap, chemicals, furniture, and bandages.⁸ To produce the finished products, most shops initially depended on raw materials, such as glass and ultimately potato peels, mainly collected in the ghetto. The largest orders came from the Wehrmacht. The Białystok ghetto laundry, for instance, reportedly cleaned the soiled clothes, uniforms, and bed sheets of every Wehrmacht unit on the Eastern Front.⁹ Private German companies and the German civil administration also ordered goods and services from the ghetto workshops and factories.

Barash's strategy likely prolonged the life of the Białystok ghetto. In early October 1942, the Reich Main Security Office in Berlin ordered the Security Police in Białystok to evacuate 12,000 Jews from the ghetto. However, several local German officials, including Brix, the deputy head of the civil administration, appealed to Berlin to spare the ghetto because of its importance to military production.¹⁰ When the Germans began on November 2, 1942, to liquidate almost all of the provincial ghettos in Distrikt Białystok, the Białystok ghetto was sealed temporarily but was untouched. However, as a result of the liquidation Aktion, control over the ghettos in Distrikt Białystok, in early November 1942, passed to the Security Police and the Gestapo. Barash also ceded about 25,000 square meters (6.2 acres) of land in the ghetto, including most of Zamenhof and Żydowska Streets and some of Biała, Brańsk, and Polna Streets. The Germans used the residences there to house some 5,000 Poles and Belorussians expelled from the Białowieża Forest area, with the latter brought there to assume the factory jobs of Jewish laborers, should they be transported to the extermination camps.¹¹

Barash curbed the excesses of the Jewish Police. On June 16–17, 1942, the Judenrat ordered 20 corrupt policemen sent to labor camps. When a search, on June 21, of the apartment of policeman Grisha Zelikowicz, a notorious extortionist, revealed large sums of foreign currency, diamonds, furs, and other valuables, the Judenrat ordered him turned over to the Gestapo.¹² Barash appointed the popular Moshe Berman, a pre-war deputy chief of police in Białystok, to fill the position of police commander. Berman restored the force's public image, in part by recruiting policemen with a social conscience.¹³ The changes ultimately created a force that refused to help the Germans extricate Jews from hiding places during the expulsions.

Youth from a wide range of pre-war political movements organized resistance. In December 1941, the Communists established the first underground organization, known as the Anti-Fascist Committee. In early January 1942, two groups of activists from Wilno arrived in the Białystok ghetto. The first, from Hehalutz Ha-Za'ir-Dror was led by Mordecai Tenenbaum, who himself continued on to Warsaw. The second, from the Ha-Shomer Ha-Za'ir, included Hajkah Grosman, a Białystok native, sent from the United Partisan Organization (Fareynikt Partizaner Organizatsye, FPO) to establish a similar organization to coordinate resistance. Her efforts failed because the Communists refused to abandon their tradition of ideological isolation. Cooperation between Dror and Ha-Shomer Ha-Za'ir also did not move forward smoothly, as Dror had not yet made armed struggle the focal point of its activities.¹⁴

Portrait of Mordecai Tenenbaum (1916–1943), commander of the Białystok ghetto underground, 1943.
USHMM WS #39074, COURTESY OF YVA

In August 1942, news of a deportation Aktion in the Warsaw ghetto and a split among the Communists enabled Edek Boraks, from Ha-Shomer Ha-Za'ir, to unite a part of the underground. His block, Front A, joined together the Communists, Ha-Shomer Ha-Za'ir, and a faction of Bundist youth.¹⁵ In November 1942, Tenenbaum returned to Białystok, determined to establish a cohesive fighting organization. His efforts faltered because the Communists still refused cooperation with Dror, who they believed propounded a heretical ideology and was too close to the Judenrat. Seeing no alternative, in late January 1943, Tenenbaum consolidated a second resistance block known as Front B. It consisted of Dror, Betar, Hanoar Hazioni, and a Bundist group that had not joined Front A. Ha-Shomer Ha-Za'ir members operated in both fronts, providing the link between the two blocks.¹⁶

As a committed Zionist, Barash was sympathetic to the youth movements, although they did not share his view of the Jews surviving the war unharmed. Barash responded to Grosman's request for assistance for Ha-Shomer Ha-Za'ir, and they formed a real friendship, based on mutual trust. He met regularly with Tenenbaum to exchange information, likely to gain his confidence and eventually a shared sense of responsibility for the ghetto.

On February 4, 1943, Barash summoned Tenenbaum to tell him that the Gestapo had intended to deport 17,600 Jews from the ghetto, but he had managed to reduce the number to 6,300. Barash explained that the Germans had reassured him that the factory employees would be spared. Convinced of the necessity of sacrificing a few in the hope of saving the majority, Tenenbaum also knew that a shortage of arms made resistance futile.¹⁷

The Aktion, which began on February 5, 1943, lasted an entire week. About 8,000 Jews were rounded up and sent to the Treblinka or Auschwitz extermination camps; another 2,000 were killed on the spot. When the Jewish Police refused to cooperate, the Germans savagely beat them and turned to informers to find hidden Jews.¹⁸ Among those sent to Treblinka was a large group of Ha-Shomer Ha-Za'ir members, including Boraks. Many Dror members hid in the factories and survived. A few Jews, such as Itzhak Malmed, resisted.¹⁹

The expulsions divided the Białystok underground. Many youth contemplated escaping to the forests to join the partisans. The Communists were among the first to send their members into the forests; Ha-Shomer Ha-Za'ir followed their lead immediately after the Aktion. Tenenbaum refused to retreat from the idea of resistance within the ghetto; as a result, the vast majority of Dror members remained in the ghetto to fight to the bitter end.²⁰

Because the Germans did not deport the workers and their families hidden in the factories, the expulsions appeared to confirm Barash's assurance that the approximately 30,000 Jews left in the ghetto would survive the war. As a result, the expulsions somewhat paradoxically enhanced Barash's status. After the Aktion, the Jews believed factory labor offered protection from expulsion. From March to August of 1943, the number of Jews requesting jobs grew. The economic condition of ghetto residents also improved because of an increase in production orders. In a period when the ghetto population would have been expected to sink into despair, the improved economic conditions created hope. On May 23, 1943, the holiday of Lag ba-'Omer, 30 weddings occurred.²¹

The resistance was reluctant to act, given Barash's now-unimpeachable authority and the atmosphere in the ghetto. Its necessary secrecy meant that virtually no one knew it existed. In late July 1943, as rumors circulated of an impending expulsion, the underground leaders formed a united front. Tenenbaum was appointed commander; Moszkowicz became his lieutenant.²²

In late July 1943, Heinrich Himmler ordered Odilo Globocnik to Białystok to plan the liquidation of the ghetto. Globocnik, a divisional commander of Operation Reinhard and the political director of the Ostindustrie camps in Distrikt Lublin, insisted on complete secrecy. The Gestapo did not forewarn Barash of its plans until August 15, when they summoned him to a secret meeting to inform him summarily that the next day police from Lublin would transport the Jews, their families, and the ghetto's factory equipment to Lublin.²³ That night, the liquidation forces, including three battalions from Police Regiment 26, composed mostly of Ukrainian auxiliaries, formed an armed three-ring cordon around the ghetto.²⁴ Early, on August 16, Barash ordered the 30,000 Jews to assemble at specific gathering points on Jurowiecka Street to await expulsion.

Because the final Aktion had started, the underground prepared to fight back. On Smolna Street, near the ghetto fence, a battle erupted between the Jews and the Germans and their Ukrainian auxiliaries. The Jews' ammunition ran out quickly. As the Germans fired incessantly to prevent the rebels from escaping through the ghetto fence, dozens of Jews were killed and hundreds wounded. The revolt continued elsewhere in the ghetto, especially in the factories. But thousands of Jews had reported to Jurowiecka Street rather than join the rebellion.²⁵

From August 17 to August 23, 1943, 14 transports carried over 25,000 Białystok Jews to the extermination camps. The first 2 transports went to Auschwitz. The other 12 were sent to Treblinka. On the latter, Jews already designated in Białystok to be left alive for labor remained on the transports and were taken to Lublin. They were then scattered among different labor camps in Distrikt Lublin, including Majdanek, Poniatowa, Trawniki, and Bliżyn. On August 17, about 2,000 children awaiting deportation near the train station at Pietrasze were taken from their parents. A rumor circulated that the children would be sent to Switzerland to be exchanged for German prisoners of war (POWs). On August 21, the children, about 1,260 in number, and 30 adult escorts were sent to the Theresienstadt ghetto. That same day, the adults were sent on to Auschwitz. After the exchange failed to materialize, the children and 50 escorts from Theresienstadt were

A group of survivors stands in front of a memorial to the fighters of the Białystok uprising, 1945–1947. The Polish text reads: "Mass grave for the Białystok ghetto fighters who fell in the heroic battle against the German barbarians for the freedom and honor of the Jewish people, 16–25 August 1943." To the right, there is text printed in either Hebrew or Yiddish. Note the Star of David atop the obelisk.

USHMM WS #14404, COURTESY OF MEIR ORKIN

deported on October 7 to Auschwitz II-Birkenau, where they were gassed upon arrival.²⁶

While the liquidation Aktion was unfolding in Białystok, thousands of Jews had hidden in bunkers they had prepared beforehand. The Germans discovered many of the bunkers each day, including one on the fourth day of the liquidation, on Chmielna Street, in which 71 Dror members had hidden. All of them were shot on the spot. When Tenenbaum and Moszkowicz discovered what had happened, they committed suicide.²⁷

About 1,000 Jews, mostly "essential" workers, their families, and important Judenrat officials, such as Barash and Rosenman, were held back from the deportation. They lived in what was known as the "Small Ghetto," an area bordered by Fabryczna, Jurowiecka, Ogrodowa, and Ciepła Streets. They cleared the machines and raw materials from the ghetto and cleaned it up. On September 8, 1943, the last Jews of the Small Ghetto were deported along with several hundred other Jews imprisoned in the city jail. Sent to Lublin, they were distributed among the forced labor camps in the region. Many of the nearly 15,000 Białystok Jews interned in these camps perished on November 3, during Aktion Erntefest (Harvest Festival), in which the Germans murdered some 42,000 Jewish prisoners of the concentration and labor camps of Distrikt Lublin.

In Białystok, some Jewish men remained confined in the Białystok prison. In May 1944, Macholl personally chose 43 of the prisoners for a Sonderkommando 1005 unit. Almost all of them were executed on the eve of the German retreat. On July 22, 1944, the day Białystok was liberated by the Red Army, the only Jews left in the city were a small group of women living on false papers.

SOURCES Nachman Blumental's Darko shel Yudenrat (Jerusalem: Yad Vashem, 1961–1962) contains important documentation from the Białystok Jewish Council, including decrees, placards, and minutes of Judenrat meetings.

Several yizkor books contain testimonies from survivors, including Y. Shmuleyitsh et al., eds., Der Bialistoker Yizkor Bukh (New York: The Bialystoker Center, 1982), available in English translation as The Bialystoker Memorial Book (New York: The Bialystoker Center, 1982), with an electronic version also at jewishgen.org; Srolke Kot, Khurbn Bialistok (Buenos Aires, 1947); Raphael Raizner, Der Umkum fun Bialistoker Yidntum (1939–1945) (Melbourne: Bialistoker Tsentr in Oystralye, 1948).

The most accessible memoir may be Hajkah (Chaika) Grosman, Ansbe ha-Mabteret (Tel Aviv: Moreshet and Sifriyat Po'alim, 1965), because it has been translated into English by Shmuel Beer as The Underground Army: Fighters of the Bialystok Ghetto (New York: Holocaust Library, 1987). Other relevant diaries or memoirs include Mordecai Tenenbaum, Dapim min ha-Delekab (Jerusalem: Yad Vashem and Bet Lohame ha-Gita'ot, 1984); Hadassa Levkovitsh (Lewkowicz) Shprung, "Der Letster Veg fun di 1,200 Bialistoker Kinder," Fun letstn khurbn (Munich), no. 7 (May 1984); Gustaw Kerszman, Jak ginąć, to razem (Montreal: Polish-Jewish Heritage Foundation of Canada, 2003); Felicja Nowak, Moja gwiazda (Białystok: Versus, 1991), which appears to be available in a limited English translation, by Diana Kuprel, as My Star: Memoirs of a Holocaust Survivor (Toronto: Polish-Canadian Pub. Fund, 1996).

The journals Bialistoker shtime, published by the Bialystoker Center in New York, NY, and Białostoccy Żydzi, 1993–2002, a collaborative effort by the Australian Bialystoker Center and the Institute of History, University of Warsaw, Białystok branch campus, include pronouncements from the Judenrat, memoirs, interviews, and important secondary accounts about the Białystok ghetto. The testimony of Pesach Kaplan, YVA, M-11/18, appears in a Polish translation in BŻIH 60 (1966): 51–76.

The main secondary sources specifically focused on the Białystok ghetto include Sara Bender, Mul Mavet Orev: Yehude Bialistok be-Milbemet ha-'Olam ha-Sbniya 1939–1945 (Tel Aviv: 'Am 'Oved, 1997), now in an English translation by Yaffa Murciano and Sara Bender, The Jews of Bialystok during World War II and the Holocaust (Waltham, MA: Brandeis University Press, 2008), which has an extensive bibliography of unpublished and published sources in Yiddish and Hebrew; Szymon Datner, Walka i zagłada białostockiego getta (Łódź: Centralna Żydowska Komisja Historyczna, 1946); Aleksander Omiljanowicz, Zanikające Echa (Warsaw: MON, 1978); Waldemar Monkiewicz and Józef Kowalczyk, Zagłada ludności żydowskiej w Białymstoku (Białystok, 1983); and Ewa Rogalewska, Getto białostockie. Doświadczenie Zagłady—świadczenia literatury i życia (Białystok: IPN-KŚZpNP, 2008), which has an extensive bibliography of primary and secondary sources focusing on Polish-language documentation.

The following documents from YVA were consulted in preparing this entry: O-16/411, O-3 (6013, 6180, 6227, 6239, 6357, 8650), O-33/469, M-11 (AŻIH 204) (17, 18, 26, 29, 36, 44, 47), M-11B (27, 29, 37, 87–89, 108, 147, 206, 247, 305), TR-10 (609, 661, 721, 813).

Additional archival documentation pertaining to the Jewish community of Białystok under German occupation in World War II includes: AŻIH (e.g., Ankiety, 204, 301 [e.g., 7, 12, 15, 19, 21, 79, 387, 396, 546–47, 550, 552, 746, 972, 981, 1080, 1121, 1217, 1253–54, 1259, 1267, 1273, 1280, 1282, 1285–87, 1289, 1456, 1458–61, 1465, 1469, 1473, 1834–35, 1838, 1840, 1845, 1859, 1974, 1991, 1999, 2000, 2003, 2005–08, 2115–20, 2122, 2124–25, 2128, 2131–33, 2157, 2251, 2256–61, 2263, 2265, 2409, 2413, 2419, 2587, 2589, 2590, 2594–95, 2601–04, 2855, 2949–51, 2954, 2958, 2961, 2970–71]); BA-L (e.g., B 162/14223); FVA (e.g., HVT # 76, 98, 189, 403, 430, 801, 1336, 1516, 1678, 1842, 1928, 1991, 2903, 2521, 3072, 3560, 3616, 3823); IPN (e.g., SAB [20, 79, 242], SOB [23, 107, 119, 120, 195, 260, 279–80], SWB [48–50, 57]); IPN-Bi (e.g., 1/226, 1/763, 1/1639, 1/1648, 1/1762, 1/1800, 1/1810, 1/1922, 7/365, 7/995, 15/438, Ds [41/67, 48/67, 49/67], S [2/68/1–10, 4/75, 6/82]); USHMM (e.g., 2001.305.1, Acc.1995.A.582, Acc.1998.A.0301, RG-50.120*0159, RG-50.120*0264, RG-50.120*0273); and VHF.

Sara Bender
trans. Andrew Koss

NOTES

1. YVA, TR-10/721, 10/609; 10/813; M-11B/108.
2. Ibid., TR-10/661, 10/813.
3. Ibid., M-11/18, p. 29; Kot, Khurbn Bialistok, p. 104.
4. YVA, M-11/18, pp. 9, 12–13; Raizner, Der Umkum, p. 92.
5. Blumental, Darko, pp. 423, 455 (notices 227, 286).
6. YVA, M-11/18, pp. 25–26, and O-3/6227, testimony of Tuvya Citron (Tobiasz Cytron), pp. 13–15.
7. Blumental, Darko, pp. 217, 237.
8. Ibid., pp. 203, 551; YVA, M-11/18, p. 20.
9. YVA, TR-10/255, pp. 2–3.
10. Tenenbaum, Dapim, p. 53.
11. Blumental, Darko, pp. 269–271; Tenenbaum, Dapim, p. 63.
12. Blumental, Darko, pp. 187–189, 209, 256; Raizner, Der Umkum, pp. 94–95.
13. Raizner, Der Umkum, p. 68; YVA, M-11/18, p. 36; Blumental, Darko, p. 201.
14. Itzhak Zukerman [Antek], Sheva' ha-Shanim ha-Hen (Tel Aviv: Bet Lohame ha-Gita'ot, 1990), pp. 137, 142; Tenenbaum, Dapim, pp. 101–102; Grosman, Ansbe ha-Mabteret, pp. 45, 69–70, 82–83.
15. Grosman, Ansbe ha-Mabteret, pp. 73–76, 87–88, 105, 122–123, 127.
16. Tenenbaum, Dapim, pp. 16–19, 23–24, 31; Grosman, Ansbe ha-Mabteret, pp. 150–156.
17. Tenenbaum, Dapim, pp. 38–39.
18. Ibid., p. 41; Raizner, Der Umkum, p. 121.
19. YVA, M-11B/116, testimony of A. Gershuni (Abraham or Abrasza Gerszuni); M-11/17, testimony of Pesach Kaplan, pp. 3–7; Kot, Khurbn Bialistok, pp. 59–62.

20. Grosman, Ansbe ha-Mabteret, p. 190; Tenenbaum, Dapim, p. 84.
21. Nowak, Moja gwiazda, pp. 52, 111–113; Raizner, Der Umkum, pp. 155–157.
22. Tenenbaum, Dapim, pp. 158–159.
23. YVA, TR-11, testimony of Fritz Friedel. See also IPN, SAB 20.
24. YVA, TR-10/813, pp. 157–160.
25. Ibid., M-11B/147, testimony of Meir Zashkowsky (Zaszkowski), O-3/6013, testimony of Lisa Strauch, pp. 22–31, O-3/6239, testimony of Ewa Krakowska (Kracowska), pp. 47–59, O-3/6637, testimony of Yisrael Prensky, TR-10/661, TR-10/813; Grosman, Ansbe ha-Mabteret, pp. 276–287; Raizner, Der Umkum, pp. 166–167; Kot, Khurbn Bialystok, p. 82.
26. Levkovitch, “Der Letster Veg,” pp. 74–79.
27. Grosman, Ansbe ha-Mabteret, p. 330; Bronka Vinizka Klibansky, “My Memories of Mordecai Tenenbaum and of the Activities of the Underground in Białystok” [in Hebrew], Yalkut Moresbet 9 (October 1968): 66; YVA, M-11B/140, testimony of Tuvia Citron.

BIELSK PODLASKI

Pre-1939: Bielsk Podlaski (Yiddish: Bielsk Podliask), town, Bielsk Podlaski powiat, Białystok województwo, Poland; 1939–1941: Bel'sk, raion center, Belostok oblast', Belorussian SSR; 1941–1944: Bielsk, Kreis Bielsk, Distrikt Bialystok; post-1998: Bielsk Podlaski, Bielsk powiat, województwo podlaskie, Poland

Bielsk Podlaski lies 50 kilometers (31 miles) south of Białystok. Its 1939 pre-war population of 8,200 included 3,280 Jews.

On September 15, 1939, the Germans occupied Bielsk Podlaski but ceded it a week later to Soviet occupation. Under Soviet rule, the Jewish population expanded to 5,000 to 6,000, as refugees from German-occupied Poland and April 1940 expellees from the Soviet border security zone arrived in Bielsk. In May 1940, local authorities deported about 1,000 Jewish refugees to the Soviet interior.

On June 22, 1941, German bombardment killed four Jews and destroyed about two thirds of Bielsk Podlaski. Upon occupying Bielsk, on June 24 or 25, a Wehrmacht unit discovered the local population looting Soviet warehouses. The soldiers shot dead several Jews reportedly for stealing, including Lejbce Bogacki, found carrying a bag of groceries. They compelled other Jews to clear war damage.¹ Within days, the Germans issued a number of anti-Jewish decrees, including prohibitions on leaving town without permission; mandates for those, from 14 to 60 years of age, to perform forced labor; and requirements to wear yellow stars on the back and chest of their clothes.

German authorities appointed a local collaborationist administration, headed by Herman, the pre-war (1939) mayor of Bielsk Podlaski. He reportedly attempted to blunt the anti-Jewish decrees.² They recruited a 10-man auxiliary police force, commanded by Leonczyk. The local police helped German soldiers search Jewish homes for valuables.³

In early July 1941, an SD detachment, perhaps the Einsatzkommando led by Hauptsturmführer Adolf Bonifer or the one led by Hauptsturmführer Wolfgang Birkner, executed about 30 Jewish intellectuals and business leaders at Osaszek, in the Piliki Forest. The victims were arrested from a list of names submitted by the non-Jewish population.⁴ On September 20, another SS unit executed 12 Jews, denounced as Communists.

In mid-July 1941, the Germans ordered that a Jewish Council (Judenrat) be established. Its head was Shlomo Epstein. The Judenrat appointed a Jewish police force, headed by Weinstein, from Orla. Its recruits were all Soviet-era arrivals to Bielsk Podlaski.⁵ In July, the Germans demanded a “contribution” of 2.3 kilograms (5.1 pounds) in gold, 5 kilograms (11 pounds) in silver, and a cash payment, probably of 300,000 rubles.

In August 1941, a German civil administration replaced the military authorities in Bielsk Podlaski. The Kreiskommissar initially was Landrat von Büнау. In late 1942, Tubenthal replaced him. A German, perhaps first Brosch and then Reinhard, was appointed mayor. An 8-man Gendarmerie post, reinforced by 10 local auxiliaries, was stationed in Bielsk, as was a Schupo detachment, commanded by Franz Lamm. They were reinforced by a 3-man SD detachment from the Commander of the Security Police and SD (KdS) Białystok, commanded by Schröder.

In August 1941, German authorities established an open ghetto in Bielsk Podlaski by forbidding Jews from living under the same roof as Christians or renting homes from them. It gave Jews in this position one day to relocate.

The German mayor established a more formal open ghetto, most likely in September 1941, by ordering the Jews to move to a neighborhood composed of a few streets. It was located on the area bordered by what now are Mickiewicz, Kazimierzowska, Jagiellońska, and Kopernik Streets.⁶ The ghetto included parts of Widowska, Wąska, and Ogrodowa Streets. Some survivors believe the mayor issued the order under pressure from local antisemites.⁷ The Germans gave the Jews a short time in which to construct a fence around the ghetto. Because they lacked access to wood, the Jews dismantled much of their furniture to build it. Upon its completion, the Germans gave the Judenrat 24 hours to raise a “contribution,” likely of 2.5 kilograms (5.5 pounds) of gold and 300,000 rubles. The Germans demanded an additional payment of 2 kilograms (4.4 pounds) of gold for the privilege of living in the ghetto.

Survivors note that the Bielsk Podlaski ghetto population stood at 5,000 to 6,000.⁸ Postwar Polish officials and West German investigators placed its population at 3,000 to 3,500.⁹ Overcrowding in the ghetto was severe, as three to four families squeezed into ghetto apartments.

The Bielsk Podlaski ghetto inmates were conscripted for a variety of labor tasks, assigned to the Judenrat by Alex Nese-meier, a German in the Bielsk Podlaski magistrate's office. The conscripts dug peat, worked in forestry labor, and performed tasks associated with clearing war devastation and transforming the razed areas into parks. On Sundays, children, women, and the elderly cleaned streets. About 30 Jews worked at a glazing workshop. Twice that number labored at a workshop established by the German firm Benz to produce felt boots for the Wehrmacht.

One day, German security forces stormed the ghetto and commanded the Jews to collect and burn their tallies, tefillin, Torahs, and religious works and for all male inmates to shave their beards. After subsequently discovering Shmuel Kac wearing a tallis on the way to an illegal prayer group, Gendarmes beat him severely before ordering him to burn the tallis.

Material conditions in the Bielsk Podlaski ghetto rapidly deteriorated, because the local authorities refused to distribute rations to its inmates. Moshe Ahron Bendes, the rabbi of Bielsk Podlaski, perished protesting the lack of rations with a hunger strike. Because the Jews had transferred to the ghetto a store of supplies looted from Soviet warehouses, most avoided starvation. However, after the Jewish Police reported the whereabouts of these supplies to German authorities, conscripted laborers working outside the ghetto were forced to forage for plants and to barter material possessions for food with the local population. Ghetto informers eroded community solidarity. The Jewish Police operated independently, blackmailing and robbing fellow inmates, in spite of the Jewish Council's efforts to restrain them.¹⁰

Some 24 Jews were executed for attempting to escape from the ghetto or for being found illicitly outside its gates. At least 6 others, including 2 Jewish policemen, were executed, based on a denunciation from inside the ghetto.

On November 2, 1942, the German Security Police and local security forces encircled the Bielsk Podlaski ghetto, in preparation for its liquidation. The KdS transformed the ghetto into a transit camp by transporting Jews from nearby localities, including from Boćki, Narew, Orla, Rutki (Orla gmina, Bielsk Podlaski powiat), and Brańsk to the ghetto. The Security Police illuminated the ghetto fence at night, shot dead anyone who approached it, and piled the corpses in front of it to deter others from fleeing. On November 6, the Germans transferred to the Białystok ghetto about 200 inmates from Bielsk and Orla, including Epstein, 48 to 49 craftsmen employed at the boot-making workshop, and their families.¹¹

Some survivors describe the Germans removing about 1,000 people each day from the Bielsk Podlaski ghetto, beginning on November 2, 1942, and sending them by train to the Treblinka extermination camp.¹² Others note the expulsions began about a week after the Brańsk Jews arrived in the ghetto, on November 7.¹³ Polish scholars, including Szymon Datner and Zbigniew Romaniuk, describe a gradual expulsion. The latter mentions the Brańsk Jews arrived in an emptied Bielsk ghetto, a point that suggests the Bielsk Podlaski community had been sent by then to Treblinka. Their German counterparts and postwar German criminal investigators rely on a diary from the 1st Company of Police Reserve Battalion 13, which notes it assisted local security forces on November 15–17 to march the Jews from the Bielsk Podlaski ghetto to the train station. They suggest a concentrated ghetto liquidation in which the 11,000 to 15,000 Jews consolidated in the ghetto were sent to Treblinka over three days.¹⁴ On the day the last transport of Bielsk Jews left for Treblinka, survivors note the Security Police shot 78 to 200 Jewish elderly, hospital patients, and children at the orphanage.

The Bielsk Podlaski craftsmen and their families were returned to the empty Bielsk ghetto for about a month to work in the boot-making factory. In January 1943, they were transferred to Pietrasze, a village north of Białystok. In February, the men's wives and children were sent to their deaths at Treblinka. The craftsmen were sent separately, mostly to the Majdanek and Auschwitz concentration camps, with some subsequently transferred to other camps, including the Bergen-Belsen concentration camp.

On January 15, 1943, the Germans murdered the mayor Herman, in a mass execution of the Bielsk Podlaski Polish elite. In 1949, Antoni Szulc, a former auxiliary policeman in Bielsk Podlaski, was tried in Poland for his participation in the July 1941 murders of Jews and illegal searches and seizures of Jewish property. He received only a three-year prison term, because the court suspected the witnesses, including two Jewish survivors, may have confused him with Michał Szulc, another auxiliary policeman.¹⁵ Lamm was tried after the war in West Germany. The court found the evidence insufficient for a conviction.

SOURCES Published testimonies from survivors can be found in Haim Rabin et al., eds., Bielsk Podlaski sefer yizkor le-zikhran ba-kadosh shel Yehude Bielsk she-nispu ba-Sho'ah hanatsit ba-shanim, 1939–1944 (Tel Aviv: Irgun ole Bielsk be-Yisrael, 1975). Its English-language section also appears at jewishgen.org. Two of the AŽIH testimonies cited below, 301/4769 and 301/1977 (Polish trans.), are available electronically, respectively, at the Cmentarze żydowskie w Polsce Web site, at www.kirkuty.xip.pl/bielskpodlaski.htm, and at Archiwum Etnograficzne, at www.archiwumetnograficzne.edu.pl/readarticle.php?article_id=28.

Secondary accounts include the relevant entries in Shmuel Spector and Bracha Freundlich, eds., Pinkas ha-kehillot. Encyclopaedia of Jewish Communities: Poland, vol. 8, Vilna, Białystok, Nowogrodek (Jerusalem: Yad Vashem, 2005), pp. 170–175; and Arnon Rubin, The Rise and Fall of the Jewish Communities in Poland and Their Relics Today, vol. 1, District Białystok (Tel Aviv: Tel Aviv University Press, 2006), pp. 40–44, though the descriptions provided of the liquidation of the Bielsk Podlaski ghetto are better read in conjunction with a range of archival sources listed below, including the AŽIH 301 testimonies and the documentation at USHMM (RG-15.019M [IPN]) for mass graves, with the latter, in particular, providing no corroboration that the Germans, rather than sending the Bielsk Podlaski Jewish community to Treblinka, executed its members outside Bielsk Podlaski.

Secondary accounts more helpful for understanding the liquidation of the Bielsk Podlaski ghetto include, in Polish, Szymon Datner, “Eksterminacja ludności żydowskiej w Okręgu Białostockim,” BŻIH, no. 60:25 (1966): tab. 3; Zbigniew Romaniuk, “Brańsk and Its Environs in the Years 1939–1953: Reminiscences of Events,” in The Story of Two Shtetls Brańsk and Ejszyski: An Overview of Polish-Jewish Relations in Northeastern Poland during World War II, 2 pts. (Toronto and Chicago:

Polish Educational Foundation in North America, 1998), pt. 1, pp. 78 ff; and in German, C.F. Rüter and D.W. de Mildt, eds., Justiz und NS-Verbrechen, vol. 33 (Amsterdam: Amsterdam University Press, 1979), Lfd. Nr. 718, pp. 247–262; Wolfgang Curilla, Die deutsche Ordnungspolizei und der Holocaust im Baltikum und in Weissrussland, 1941–1944 (Paderborn: Ferdinand Schöningh, 2006), p. 602.

Coverage of war crimes trials for Bielsk Podlaski includes, for Germany, the above-cited JuNS-V account, and for Poland, Andrzej Żbikowski, “Pogromy i mordy ludności żydowskiej w Łomżyńskim i na Białostocczyźnie latem 1941 roku w świetle relacji ocalałych Żydów i dokumentów sądowych,” in Paweł Machcewicz and Krzysztof Persak, eds., Wokół Jedwabnego, 2 vols. (Warsaw: IPN-KŚZpNP, 2002), vol. 1, Studia, p. 226.

Archival documentation pertaining to the history of the Jewish community of Bielsk Podlaski during the Holocaust includes AŻIH (e.g., 2/123 [old, 46/149d], 301 [988, 1823, 1977, 3944, 4769]); BA-L (B 162/21136-37, 4759, 14210); GARF (7021-148-186); IPN (e.g., SAB [37, 91, 119], SOB [314]); IPN-Bi (e.g., S [5/72, 126/68]); USHMM (RG-15.019M [IPN] 1/100-105, 46/36-37); and YVA (e.g., M-1/E [46, 1334], M-11 [138, 213, 304], M-49/E [e.g., 1270, 3145, 3943, 3944, 6640], O-3 [e.g., 3262], TR [10 (ZStL) (663, 900)]).

Alexander Kruglov, Michael McConnell, and Laura Crago

NOTES

1. VHF, # 37608, testimony of Renata Skotnicka-Zajdman.
2. AŻIH, 301/1977, testimony of Symcha Bursztajn, p. 1.
3. VHF, # 37608.
4. USHMM, RG-15.019M (IPN), reel 1, 1/101, pp. 1–2, 1/104, pp. 1–3; AŻIH, 301/4769, testimony of Sonia Gleicher, p. 1.
5. Rabin et al., Bilsk Podlaski, p. 28 (testimony of Meir Pekar).
6. With various dates, from 1941, in Rabin et al., Bilsk Podlaski, p. 27 (Pekar), early July; AŻIH, 301/988, testimony of Henoah Piasek, p. 1, August; AŻIH, 301/4769, p. 1, the most detailed, September; USHMM, RG-15.019M, reel 14, 46/36, pp. 1–2, fall; JuNS-V, vol. 33, p. 251, December 1.
7. AŻIH, 301/988, p. 1, 301/4769, p. 1.
8. Respectively, Rabin et al., Bilsk Podlaski, p. 27; AŻIH, 301/1977, p. 1.
9. Respectively, JuNS-V, vol. 33, p. 251; USHMM, RG-15.019M, reel 14, 46/36, pp. 1–2.
10. Rabin et al., Bilsk Podlaski, pp. 28–32.
11. AŻIH, 301/3944, testimony of Szymon Teperman, p. 1.
12. Ibid., 301/988, p. 1, 301/1977, p. 3.
13. Ibid., 301/4769, p. 1.
14. GARF, 7021-148-186, War Diary, Reserve Police Battalion 13, November 15–17, 1942.
15. IPN, SAB 119.

BOĆKI

Pre-1939: Boćki (Yiddish: Bodki), village, Bielsk Podlaski powiat, Białystok województwo, Poland; 1939–1941: Botski, Bel'sk raion, Belostok oblast', Belorussian SSR; 1941–1944: Bozki, Kreis Bielsk, Distrikt Białystok; post-1998: Boćki, Bielski powiat, województwo podlaskie, Poland

Boćki lies on the Nurzec River about 16 kilometers (10 miles) southwest of Bielsk Podlaski and 65.8 kilometers (41 miles) south-southwest of Białystok. In 1931, the Boćki population stood at 2,342, including 1,158 Poles, 763 Jews, and 421 Belorussians. On the eve of World War II, 600 Jews likely resided in Boćki.

In the first days of World War II, perhaps as early as September 1, 1939, but more likely shortly after September 6, German aerial bombardment resulted in the deaths of many Boćki residents, including at least three Jews. The Germans briefly occupied Boćki before withdrawing at the end of September to make way for the Red Army.

A Wehrmacht unit reoccupied Boćki on June 25, 1941. That day, the soldiers murdered seven Jews. The Germans expelled the Jews from their homes on July 7, 1941, giving them just two hours to report to a makeshift prison, erected in the most impoverished part of the Jewish neighborhood. They ordered the Jews to leave all of their personal possessions behind. Because only a few houses existed on the prison grounds, most inmates were forced to sleep outside. After several days, the Bielsk Podlaski military commander permitted the prisoners to return to their former homes, which, in the meantime, had been stripped of all their belongings. The Germans also organized a Polish auxiliary police force, which in turn rounded up Jews for forced labor to dismantle buildings and to repair roads destroyed during the recent military operations. Probably in early July 1941, the Germans appointed a Jewish Council (Judenrat). Its chair was Shlomo Zimni, the rabbi of Boćki. A Jewish police force also was established.

After a Gendarmerie post was opened in Boćki in March 1942, the Gendarmes, assisted by members of the SS, supervised the resettlement that same month of the Jews into a ghetto. Some confusion exists over its size and location. Polish postwar court documentation describes the Boćki ghetto as composed of 40 houses, located in the preexisting Jewish neighborhood, on three streets: Żałośńska (now Antoniak), Brańsk, and a part of Bielsk Streets. Drawing on other sources, scholars in Israel note the Boćki ghetto consisted of four “dilapidated” houses. After they were occupied beyond capacity, the remaining Jews were directed to live in the Bet Midrash and the synagogue. According to this latter group of sources, when the Germans ordered the ghetto fenced in June 1942, the housing situation resulted in the establishment of two closed ghettos. The first ghetto was composed of the four homes. The second ghetto consisted of the Bet Midrash and the synagogue. The Polish documentation does not mention the existence of two ghettos.¹

The Polish documentation notes that approximately 750 Jews lived in the Boćki ghetto. The population may be too high, as works written by scholars in Israel place the number at about 600 people.²

In Boćki, ghetto residents were conscripted for a number of labor projects. They refinished and restored much of the furniture, which earlier had been stolen from them, for its new Slavic and German owners. Craftsmen worked in tailoring shops established in the ghetto. Others were conscripted for agricultural labor on nearby estates. The Germans provided no rations to ghetto residents; rather, they expected them to secure food on their own.³

On November 2, 1942, the SS and members of the local Gendarmerie, likely including local Polish Schutzmännen, surrounded Boćki in preparation for the liquidation of the ghetto. They ordered the Jews to assemble on the square in front of the synagogue. The women, children, and elderly were loaded onto the carts of local Christian peasants, mobilized earlier for the liquidation Aktion. The men were ordered to follow behind them on foot to the Bielsk Podlaski ghetto. In Bielsk, the Germans permitted some male craftsmen to return to Boćki.

The rest of the Boćki Jews joined about 6,000 Jews already imprisoned in the Bielsk Podlaski ghetto and about 4,500 additional Jews from Brańsk, Narew, Orla, Rutki (pre-war Orla gmina, Bielsk powiat), and other localities. For two weeks, from November 2 to 14, almost daily roundups enveloped the Bielsk ghetto residents, with at least 1,000 Jews deported daily to the Treblinka extermination camp. According to one account, the Boćki Jews were sent to their deaths at Treblinka on November 11, though this same account also suggests the roundups were more arbitrary, with families and townspeople often separated from each other and sent to Treblinka in different transports.⁴ All of the Boćki Jews were gassed on arrival at Treblinka.

The male craftsmen returned to Boćki probably were confined to the four ramshackle houses, in a remnant ghetto. At the end of December 1942, the Germans organized the final liquidation of the Boćki ghetto. Many of the men attempted escape. While some managed to flee, most were shot. The craftsmen most likely were deported to the Białystok ghetto. They are believed to have been rounded up there and sent to Auschwitz and Treblinka during the first liquidation Aktion there in February 1943. None survived.

Almost all the men who had evaded deportation to the Białystok ghetto were discovered in subsequent searches of the area. Other fugitives were handed over to German authorities by Christians, some of whom had promised to shelter them for a fee. Only one former Boćki ghetto resident, Max Farber, survived the war. He was aided by a Christian friend, a farmer, whose first name was Julian.⁵

In 1951, three Poles, former Schutzmännen employed in the Boćki Gendarmerie, were convicted of various wartime crimes, including participating in executing Jewish fugitives at the Jewish cemetery in Boćki.⁶ In 1953, six Polish civilians were tried for having turned over to German authorities, in June 1943, four Jewish fugitives.⁷

SOURCES Useful are several accounts by Bernie M. Farber, the son of the only Jewish survivor of the German occupation of Boćki, including “Naming the Jews of Boćki,” Globe and Mail, September 30, 2004; and “Confronting Treblinka; On the Eve of Holocaust Remembrance Day, April 15,” April 14, 2007, on the Canadian Jewish Congress Charities Committee Web site at www.cjccc.ca/inthenews/in_the_news_link11.html, with the second account unfortunately confusing the Bielsk Podlaski and Sokołów Podlaski ghettos. Other secondary accounts include the relevant entries in Shmuel Spector and Bracha Freundlich, eds., Pinkas ha-kehillot. Encyclopaedia of Jewish Communities: Poland, vol. 8, Vilna, Białystok, Nowogródek (Jerusalem: Yad Vashem, 2005), pp. 136–138; and its English-language counterpart, Arnon Rubin, The Rise and Fall of Jewish Communities in Poland and Their Relics Today, vol. 1, District Białystok (Tel Aviv: Tel Aviv University Press, 2006), pp. 44–47.

Archival documentation on the history of the Boćki Jewish community during the Holocaust includes IPN (e.g., SAB [183, 204]); IPN-Bi (e.g., S-60/67); USHMM (RG-15.019M [IPN], reel 14, 48/39); and YVA (M-1Q/526).

Laura Crago

NOTES

1. Compare USHMM, RG-15.019M (IPN), reel 14, 48/39, pp. 1–2, and “Boćki,” in Spector and Freundlich, Pinkas ha-kehillot, 8:137.
2. Compare USHMM, RG-15.019M, reel 14, 48/39, p. 1, and “Boćki,” in Spector and Freundlich, Pinkas ha-kehillot, 8:138.
3. USHMM, RG-15.019M, reel 14, 48/39, p. 1.
4. Farber, “Confronting Treblinka.”
5. Farber, “Naming the Jews of Boćki.”
6. IPN, SAB 183.
7. Ibid., SAB 204.

BRAŃSK

Pre-1939: Brańsk, town, Białystok województwo, Poland; 1939–1941: Bransk, raion center, Belostok oblast', Belorussian SSR; 1941–1944: Kreis Bielsk, Distrikt Białystok; post-1998: Brańsk, województwo podlaskie, Poland

Brańsk is located 50 kilometers (31 miles) south-southwest of Białystok. In the summer of 1937, radical Polish nationalists smashed Jewish shop windows and beat up Jews in the town.¹ Brańsk had a population of about 4,600 inhabitants on September 1, 1939, of which more than half were Jewish.

On September 7, the town was bombed by the Luftwaffe, causing severe damage and loss of life. German tanks entered the town on September 10, and the German occupants set the Old Synagogue on fire almost two weeks later. But then they relinquished the area to the Soviet Union on September 24, 1939, in accordance with the terms of the Molotov-Ribbentrop Pact. The Jews initially welcomed the Soviets for releasing them from German bondage, but Jews were also among those who suffered from the nationalization of private property and systematic Soviet deportations to Siberia.

Following the German invasion of the Soviet Union on June 22, 1941, many Jews attempted to flee the town, but most were forced back by the rapid advance of the German forces, which reoccupied Brańsk on June 25, 1941. The town was severely damaged by aerial bombardment and military combat when German forces arrived, and shortly afterwards they killed eight Jews. The German military administration established a Polish police force and a Polish mayor. The Polish police identified the Jewish houses to the Germans so that these houses could be robbed. The Polish mayor, Władysław Dąbrowski, terrorized the Jews, making them perform hard labor and repeatedly collecting large fines from the community. However, a German administrator, Barwinski, soon replaced him.

In the summer of 1941, the Jews were ordered to wear yellow patches. Some youths refused to obey this order, wearing the patches on a string around their neck and only making them visible when a policeman approached. However, the Jewish Police beat them severely for not wearing the patches. Many Jews complained bitterly about the “Jewish Gestapo.” After one particular beating, the Jews protested, and thereafter the Jewish Police arrested offenders rather than beating them on the street.²

At the same time, the German authorities established a Jewish Council (Judenrat) consisting of 12 people, headed by Alter Jamsin. Its functions included collecting money to meet the demands of the German authorities, assigning people to forced labor, allocating housing within the ghetto, distributing food, and overseeing the Jewish Police, which was headed by Itzhak Wasser. Members of the Jewish Council and their families generally enjoyed considerable privileges over other members of the community.³

Jews were obliged to perform forced labor. Among the tasks they performed were road and bridge construction, which may have involved working in the river submerged up to their necks in cold water, or cutting wood in the forest. The poorest Jews were generally assigned to the worst jobs.

In the fall of 1941, under a new civil administration, Amtskommissar Sturmann took charge of the town, just as the ghetto was being established. He was influenced by the Jews to delay its creation for as long as possible; ultimately he permitted them to decide in which part of the town it would be, endorsing also the idea of a second “Small Ghetto.” On its eventual establishment, many Jews were forced to abandon their homes and moved into the ghetto carrying on their shoulders the few possessions they had left. The main ghetto was bordered by present-day Sienkiewicz, Binduga, John-Paul II, and Kościuszko Streets. About 2,400 people, among them about 175 Jews from nearby villages, were forced into the two ghettos.⁴ There was terrible overcrowding there, with four or five families living in each room. Daily rations consisted of 125 grams (4.4 ounces) of bread. Inside the ghetto there was also a jail and a court administered by the Jewish Council and the Jewish Police. Jews in the ghetto sometimes obtained German newspapers, which they read collectively during their days off work.⁵

In the ghetto a boot factory was established, in which Jews supplied the labor. Conditions in the ghetto deteriorated when Jews from neighboring towns that had suffered from Aktions at the hands of the Germans arrived in Brańsk, seeking refuge. These people were assigned places to sleep and ate with a different family each night, as they were not officially registered and therefore did not receive rations.⁶ Since the ghetto initially was not enclosed and the vigilance of the police was not strict (with the police accepting bribes), it was relatively easy for Jews to purchase or barter food from local peasants and then to conceal it inside the ghetto. Some food was even sent to help feed people in the Białystok ghetto, where it was exchanged for clothes, which could in turn be bartered.⁷

In the summer of 1942, the Germans ordered that a wooden fence some 4 meters (13 feet) high be erected around the ghetto. There were two gates by which people exited to go outside to work. Within the ghetto, the Jews actually felt more willing to go into the streets, where they would gather to discuss the situation in the war. Jews also gathered daily in private houses to pray. As news of the Aktions in other towns spread, Jews also prepared hiding places inside the ghetto in anticipation of its liquidation.

Jewish youth organized an underground resistance and purchased arms, in preparation for escaping to the forests to join the Soviet partisans and fight the Germans. There was even one sympathetic German soldier who helped to supply them with weapons. In the fall of 1942, the residents of the “small ghetto” were transferred into the main ghetto, making the overcrowding even worse.

On November 1, 1942, a Jew from Białystok arrived in Brańsk with news of German plans to liquidate all the ghettos of the region. The next day, the Germans and their collaborators (including Lithuanian and Ukrainian auxiliaries) surrounded the ghetto. On the night of November 2–3, several hundred Jews tried to flee, tearing down the fences and some seeking hiding places with local Christians. The Germans and their collaborators responded by shooting at the fleeing Jews, using flares to illuminate their targets. Nonetheless, several hundred escaped successfully. Most fled to the forests, as much of the Christian population was unwilling to assist them in finding hiding places. Some even returned to the ghetto when they were unable to find refuge.⁸

The cordon around the ghetto remained in place until November 7, 1942. On November 6, a Polish member of the Amtskommissariat and a member of Polish Home Army (AK), Waław Klukowski, warned the Jews that they would soon be exterminated. On November 7, hundreds of wagons arrived to transport the Jews to the nearby ghetto of Bielsk Podlaski. From there, on November 9, some 2,000 Jews of Brańsk commenced their journey to the Treblinka extermination camp, where they were murdered the next day.⁹

Over the following days the hunt for Jews that had escaped continued. In the village of Oleksin, the mayor Józef Adamczuk forced some inhabitants to help track down Jews, resulting in the deaths of 14 people. Other locals who participated in the area were Kaminski and the Rycz brothers.¹⁰ Inside the former ghetto, 23 people were murdered when they had to abandon their bunker due to an accidental fire.¹¹ There were also a number of local inhabitants who helped Jews, including 10 groups who have been recognized by Yad Vashem as Righteous Among the Nations. Among them are Jan Kozłowski and his family who helped Jack Rubin to survive.¹²

After Brańsk was liberated, 64 Jews returned to the town, having survived in hiding or fighting with the partisans. Living together in one building, the survivors felt depressed, isolated, and threatened, as there was an atmosphere of lawlessness, and many peasants had now moved into former Jewish homes. After 2 young Jewish women were murdered in March 1945, the group of Brańsk Jews decided to move to Białystok, and by 1948 most had immigrated to Israel or the United States.¹³

SOURCES The book by Eva Hoffman, Shtetl: The Life and Death of a Small Town and the World of Polish Jews (Boston: Houghton Mifflin, 1997), is focused on Brańsk and deals sensitively with the issue of Polish-Jewish relations, including a chapter on the Shoah. It should be read also in connection with Zbigniew Romaniuk, “Brańsk and Its Environs in the Years 1939–1953: Remiscences of Events,” in The Story of Two Shtetls Brańsk and Ejszyski (Toronto and Chicago: Polish Educational Foundation in North America, 1998), pt. 1, pp. 71–107. The yizkor book edited by Alter Trus and Julius Cohen, Brainsk sefer ha-zikaron: A basbraybung fun unzer beym (New York: Bransker Relief Committee, 1948), contains a series of personal portraits of the town; the memoir of Josef Broide, Zikbroynes fun a Yidishn partizan in di Braynsker velder (Tel Aviv: Urli, 1969) [an English MSS translation titled Men of the Forest is available], also includes a few details about the ghetto. Other relevant publications include Elhanan Man, Ner le-Brainsk: Tragedyah shel ‘ayarah Yehudit Yedu’ah be-Mizrah Eropah (Tel Aviv: A. Narkis, 2001).

Testimonies by survivors from Brańsk can be found in the following archives: AŻIH (301/1256, 1988, 2100-1, 2103-4, 2110, 2112, 3526, and 3530); FVA (HVT/1516, testimony of Jack Rubin); and YVA.

Martin Dean and Ester-Basya Vaisman

NOTES

1. Hoffman, Shtetl, pp. 179–180, 194–199.
2. Trus and Cohen, Brainsk sefer ha-zikaron, pp. 251–289.
3. Ibid.
4. Romaniuk, “Brańsk and Its Environs,” pp. 75–76.
5. Trus and Cohen, Brainsk sefer ha-zikaron, pp. 251–289; Broide, Zikbroynes.
6. Trus and Cohen, Brainsk sefer ha-zikaron, pp. 251–289.
7. Broide, Zikbroynes.
8. AŻIH, 301/2100, testimony of Lejb Trus.
9. Broide, Zikbroynes; Romaniuk, “Brańsk and Its Environs,” pp. 77–78.
10. AŻIH, 301/2101, testimony of Alter Trus; 301/2104, testimony of Jankiel Rubin.
11. Adamczuk was sentenced by a Polish court in 1948 to life imprisonment, which was later commuted to 10 years; see Hoffman, Shtetl, pp. 223–224.
12. See the list prepared by Zbigniew Romaniuk, “Poles from Brańsk and Its Environs Who Helped Jews during World War II,” in The Story of Two Shtetls Brańsk and Ejszyski, pt. 1, pp. 108–112. The files regarding these cases can be found in the collection YVA, M.31. Rubin’s video testimony is held at the Fortunoff Video Archive (HVT/1516).
13. Hoffman, Shtetl, pp. 239–240.

CIECHANOWIEC

Pre-1939: Ciechanowiec, town, Bielsk Podlaski powiat, Białystok województwo, Poland; 1939–1941: Tsekhanovets, raion center, Balostok oblast’, Belorussian SSR; 1941–1944: Ciechanowiec, Kreis Bielsk, Distrikt Białystok; post-1998: Wysokie Mazowieckie powiat, województwo podlaskie, Poland

Ciechanowiec is located about 133 kilometers (83 miles) northeast of Warsaw. The Nirzec River divides the town into two parts, the Old Town (Stare Miasto) and the New Town (Nowe Miasto). In 1921, the Jewish population was 1,649, or about 50 percent of the total. The precise Jewish population in September 1939 is unknown but probably was between 2,500 and 4,000 people.

Ciechanowiec was bombed on the first day of World War II. German troops entered the town on September 9 and attacked the Jews at once. They robbed their stores and forced a number of Jewish men into trucks that took them to New Town, where they were ordered to remove and bury the bodies of Polish soldiers who had died in the fighting. On September 17, in accordance with the Molotov-Ribbentrop Pact, the German army pulled out. This was followed by a period of anarchy, with no one in authority. Jewish Communists were released from prison in accordance with the pact. They joined with other freed prisoners to decorate the town and welcome the Soviet army, which arrived on October 4. Stores were reopened, but there were long lines of people trying to buy food or fabrics. The Soviets reorganized the labor force into cooperatives. The Jewish population swelled with the arrival of refugees from other parts of Poland, including a number of Jews brought in from the nearby town of Nur. A typhus epidemic broke out among the refugees, but the Soviets organized a hospital, and the epidemic was contained.

In the spring of 1940, the Soviet authorities ordered everyone to carry a passport (identity card), but some Jews declined to give up their Polish citizenship, which made the authorities suspicious of them. Also at this time many wealthy or politically active Jews in Ciechanowiec were declared to be “untrustworthy elements,” and their property was nationalized. People in both of these groups, as well as those evacuated from the border area, were sent to Siberia, which, in the course of events, ensured the survival of most of them.¹

On June 22, 1941, at 4:00 A.M., Ciechanowiec was shelled by German artillery, causing much damage in Old Town and the deaths of a number of Jews. After occupying Ciechanowiec, the Germans closed the synagogues and forbade even private prayer. A reign of torment and torture ensued, with arrests, forced labor, beatings, and killings a daily occurrence. Long lines for bread were occasions for further harassment. Vicious dogs were let loose to attack the Jews. A cruel German, Romanus, was appointed mayor and took command of the town. He pursued a course of daily terror and destruction until the final liquidation. Among those collaborators also noted for their sadism towards the Jews were the postmaster Pietrowski and a man named Dawidczuk.²

All Jews over the age of 12 were ordered to wear white armbands with a yellow Star of David and were not permitted to use the sidewalks. Men and women aged 14 to 60 were taken out each day for forced labor. They worked on road construction and in German factories. Their daily “wage” was 300 grams (about 10.6 ounces) of bread.

In November 1941, the German authorities established a ghetto in Ciechanowiec. It was located in the area of Drohiczyn, Wspólna, and Kościuszkó Streets, on the left-bank side of the town, as well as around Łomża and Kuczyńska Streets on the right bank of the Nurzec River. Therefore, it was divided into two sections, separated by the river but linked by a bridge.³ A barbed-wire fence surrounded the ghetto. Anyone caught outside could be shot on the spot. However, the Jews also were permitted to establish workshops outside the ghetto for artisans, such as locksmiths, carpenters, and cobblers.

In the winter of 1941–1942, Jews deported from the nearby towns of Zaręby and Czyżewo were sent to the Ciechanowiec ghetto, which grew in number to 4,000 inmates. At the end of January 1942, 18 Jews from the ghetto were arrested as Communists. The Germans beat and tortured them cruelly before murdering them. The attempts of the Jewish Council (Judenrat), headed by Wolf Kagan, to ransom them with bribes were to no avail. Two months later, 6 more Jews were arrested. One of the Jews, Lew Manes, attacked Mayor Romanus, who then shot him.⁴

On October 31, 1942, on the order of Romanus, 245 young men and women with particular skills were rounded up allegedly for work in the village of Pobikra. Instead, they were escorted away tied up with ropes, and most were shot trying to escape or later inside the ghetto. Some historians consider that this Aktion was probably a German attempt to forestall any resistance during the ensuing roundup of the ghetto population.⁵

At 5:00 A.M. on the morning of November 2, 1942, German and Polish police surrounded the ghetto. Many Jews tried to flee, but most of these people were shot in the ghetto or discovered in their hiding places and turned in by the local populace. Only 31 people managed to elude capture. The remaining Jews were taken from the ghetto on horses and carts to the railroad station in Czyżewo and then deported directly to the Treblinka extermination camp. The liquidation of the ghetto was completed by November 15, 1942.⁶

The fate of the Ciechanowiec ghetto was somewhat unusual for a ghetto in Distrikt Białystok. Since the ghetto was located very close to Treblinka, the Jews were deported directly there, rather than first being concentrated in a transit camp, as was the case for almost all other ghettos in the Distrikt.

SOURCES The yizkor book edited by Eliezer Leoni, Ciechanowiec: Meboz Białystok, sefer edut ve-zikaron (Tel Aviv: Chechanovitzer Immigrant Association in Israel and the USA, 1964), includes several contributions covering the war period and the Holocaust; English translations of three of the essays appear in the 79-page supplement. There is also a brief article on the town, “Ciechanowiec,” in Avraham Wein, ed., Pinkas ha-kehillot. Encyclopaedia of Jewish Communities: Poland, vol. 4, Warsaw and Its Region (Jerusalem: Yad Vashem, 1989), pp. 392–395. Additional information can be found at the Web site www.sciaga.pl/tekst/12694-13-historia_zydow_na_podlasiu; and in Shmuel Krakowski and Sara Bender, eds., The Encyclopedia of the Righteous among the Nations: Rescuers of Jews during the Holocaust—Poland, 2 vols. (Jerusalem: Yad Vashem, 2004).

Testimonies by survivors and other relevant documentation can be found in the following archives: AŻIH (301/386, 975, 1829, 2795); IPN-Bi (S-29/67/1-2, S-36/68/1-2); and YVA.

Samuel Fishman and Martin Dean

NOTES

1. Berl Lew, “Under Soviet Rule, 1939–41,” in Leoni, Ciechanowiec, p. 577; see also the partial English translation available on the Web at jewishgen.org. And see “Ciechanowiec,” in Wein, Pinkas ha-kehillot, 4:394.

2. On Romanus, see especially Yehuda Rydz, “The Savage Murderer, Romanus,” in Leoni, Ciechanowiec, p. 636; AŻIH, 301/1829, testimony of Simkha Bursztajn.

3. See www.sciaga.pl/tekst/12694-13-historia_zydow_na_podlasiu. AŻIH, 301/975, testimony of Ephraim Winer, however, gives the date of July 20, 1941. Other sources indicate the fall of 1941.

4. AŻIH, 301/1829, testimony of Simkha Bursztajn.

5. See www.sciaga.pl/tekst/12694-13-historia_zydow_na_podlasiu.

6. AŻIH, 301/1829; “Ciechanowiec,” in Wein, Pinkas ha-kehillot, 4:395; AŻIH, 301/975, testimony of Ephraim Winer. There are several contradictions in the various accounts of the liquidation Aktion.

CZYŻEWO (AKA CZYŻEW OR CZYŻEW-OSADA)

Pre-1939: Czyżewo (Yiddish: Tshizsbeve), village Wysokie Mazowieckie powiat, Białystok województwo, Poland; 1939–1941: Chizhev, raion center, Belostok oblast', Belorussian SSR; 1941–1944: Czyżewo, Kreis Lomscha, Distrikt Białystok; post-1998: Czyżew-Osada, Wysokie Mazowieckie powiat, województwo podlaskie, Poland

Czyżewo lies 70 kilometers (44 miles) southwest of Białystok and 51.7 kilometers (32.1 miles) southeast of Łomża. Its 1921 population of 1,895 included 1,595 Jews.

Upon occupying Czyżewo on June 22, 1941, the Germans started a program of extortion, abuse, and forced labor, in which they forcibly enlisted the help of a five-person Jewish Council (Judenrat), with Zevulon Grossbard as its chair.¹

The Germans appointed a Polish civil administration. Its head, or wójt, was Jan Nieniałtowski. They also recruited a Polish auxiliary force, mostly from a civil guard that had patrolled Czyżewo after the Russians fled.² By the end of August, a Gendarmerie post and a civil administration, led by an Amtskommissar, had replaced the German military administration.

Either on August 20 or 28, 1941, the Judenrat received orders for all Jews to assemble the next day at 4:00 A.M. for labor assignments outside of Czyżewo. Some German officials charged with appointing local Polish administrators told their Jewish translators to evade the assembly. Aware that the Germans had already murdered several nearby Jewish communities, others decided to flee to Ciechanowiec.³ However, most Czyżewo Jews reported as ordered. The Amtskommissar ordered about 110 people held back for a special labor assignment at an estate near Czyżewo. The group consisted of male craftsmen and a few women employed by the German administration.

A Gestapo force, perhaps either from Małkinia or Łomża, told the remaining Jews, about 1,500 to 1,750 people, they were being relocated to Zaręby Kościelne.⁴ The SS commander halted the march about halfway, at Szulborze Wielkie village and ordered the Jews confined to a school. The captives were brought in small groups to a forest behind Mi-anówek village, and executed in a Soviet-era antitank ditch. Among the victims that day also were about 500 members of the Jewish community of Szulborze-Koty, located across from Szulborze Wielkie.

The skilled workers held back from execution were returned to Czyżewo about a month after the mass killings and ordered to live in an open ghetto. The remnant ghetto was composed of five or six houses. Some survivors note they were all located on Polna Street.⁵ Another describes a larger ghetto area, composed of Polna, Niecała, and Przytorowa Streets.⁶ In August 1942, the ghetto was probably surrounded by a barbed-wire fence.⁷ Its only gate was guarded from the inside by a member of the reconstituted Judenrat, led by Alter Wolmer. The Polish police patrolled the fence from the outside. At least two Jews were shot dead for leaving the ghetto at night.⁸

Besides the craftsmen, the Czyżewo ghetto included more than 100 people who had hidden during the executions or had escaped other nearby Aktions, such as the mass execution, on September 2, 1941, of the Jewish residents (1,500 to 1,900 people) of Zaręby Kościelne.⁹ The Gendarmerie commander, likely in October, ordered the auxiliary police to round up about 30 orphans from the ghetto. At least two Polish policemen beat one child severely for resisting arrest. The Gendarmes executed the children.¹⁰ In the winter of 1941–1942, the German authorities deported many inmates to the ghetto in Ciechanowiec. After the expulsion, the Czyżewo ghetto population stood at around 200.¹¹

The Czyżewo ghetto resembled more of a labor camp, with its mostly young, single population; yet a few families survived partially intact, including three Węgierko (or Wengerko) siblings, whose parents and brother had perished in the execution, along with an aunt and her three young children, and parts of two related Kitaj families. The Judenrat assigned the Jews to the few houses. Family members lived together, though usually with others, as at least 5 unregistered and 10

registered people resided in each house. Because of the mass execution, most believed the future bleak. For this reason, a survivor notes, there were no marriages, pregnancies, or children born in the ghetto.¹²

The ghetto inhabitants performed a variety of tasks, mostly for German officials. Some skilled carpenters worked personally for the Amtskommissar, making furniture. (So impressed was he with the craftsmanship that he issued special orders exempting the furniture makers from wearing the yellow patches that all Jews in Czyżewo were required to wear on the chest and back.) Other ghetto inmates were assigned to kitchen details at a local Gestapo headquarters and at a mess hall for German soldiers. Women worked for German civilian officials as domestic servants and cooks. Some performed hard labor, paving the road to Wysokie Mazowieckie, sorting recovered Soviet armaments, and completing a rail spur from the train station to Czyżewo. Local Poles hired teenage boys through the local Arbeitsamt to work as shepherds. The boys lived with their employers. Conditions were not as bad as in most ghettos, because the corrupt Amtskommissar, in exchange for bribes, eased material conditions, even providing the Jews a few hours each day to barter material possessions with the local population for food.¹³ The local administration also provided potato rations.

In the fall of 1942, the ghetto residents learned of the mass killing of Jews at the Treblinka extermination camp from an escapee. In late October, rumors spread that German authorities had ordered peasants to bring their carts to Czyżewo to transport the Jews to Treblinka. A large number escaped from the ghetto and sought shelter in attics across Czyżewo, including in the Gestapo headquarters, and in the countryside.¹⁴

On November 2, 1942, members of the SS and the Gendarmerie, including local Polish Schutzmänner, liquidated the Czyżewo ghetto. They expelled its inmates to a transit camp in Zambrów, located 23.4 kilometers (14.5 miles) north of Czyżewo. The Czyżewo Jews were incarcerated there together with 17,300 to 19,800 Jews from nearby localities. In mid-January 1943, the Germans drove about 2,000 of the Zambrów inmates, including Jews from Czyżewo, Śniadowo, and Łomża, to the railway station in Czyżewo and ordered them onto a transport destined for the Auschwitz killing center. On January 17, at the Auschwitz II-Birkenau extermination camp, 1,775 people from the transport were gassed upon arrival. The remaining 225 people were men held back as concentration camp prisoners. Most of the prisoners from Czyżewo, including Bejnysz Lipa, Jankiel Gromadzyn, and Moszek Wysocki, perished before the end of January. Less than a handful survived until liberation. Mosheh Rajczyk (Raychik) was among the survivors.

Out of the dozens of Czyżewo and Zaręby Jews who had evaded the deportation to Zambrów, fewer than 25 survived the war. Etkā Żółtak worked on false identity papers for a German family in Czyżewo for 18 months before joining a group of Jewish partisans from Siemiatycze.¹⁵ Another 14 Jews from

Zaręby and at least 2 from Czyżewo were assisted by local Poles. Almost all the other fugitives were caught by Gendarmes or turned in by Polish informers and murdered.¹⁶ On March 20, 1942, during a search of a Polish family's property in Czyżewo-Sutki village, Gendarmes from the Czyżewo post discovered 18 Jews hidden there. The Gendarmes executed 15 of the fugitives and Franciszek Jędrzejczyk, their Polish aid-giver.¹⁷

The Amtskommissar held back from execution Simcha (Seymour) Moncarz and his brother Israel, his former furniture makers. Mosze Zylbersztein reportedly turned over a large sum of gold to the Gendarmes to remain alive. The three men worked as cabinetmakers for German officials, first in Czyżewo and then in Łomża. Some of the only Jews known to be still alive and officially working for the Germans in Distrikt Białystok in August 1944, they were sent to the Gross-Rosen concentration camp on the eve of the Red Army's arrival in Łomża, as part of a transport of 1,000 Poles.¹⁸ The two brothers survived the war.

In 1949, Stanisław Michałczyk, a former local Schutzmann at the Czyżewo post, received a 10-year sentence for rounding up children from the Czyżewo ghetto and beating one of them severely. After the conviction initially was overturned in 1951, he was sentenced to a 6-year sentence, reduced by half under the 1956 amnesty.

SOURCES A number of the archival sources cited below have appeared in publication in Paweł Machcewicz and Krzysztof Persak, eds., Wokół Jedwabnego, 2 vols. (Warsaw: IPN and KŚZ-pNP, 2002), vol. 2, Dokumenty, pp. 137–138 (AK, 203/III-59, pp. 2–6), p. 145 (202/III-7, vol. 1, pp. 7–8), p. 148 (AAN, 202/III-8/64), p. 152 (AAN, DR, 202/I-45, vol. 4, pp. 944–952, excerpts), pp. 370–371 (AŻIH, 301/383, Polish trans.), pp. 372–374 (AŻIH, 301/386, pp. 1–3, Polish trans.). Published memoirs from Czyżewo survivors are found in Shimon Kanc, ed., Yizker-bukh: Nokh der borev-gevorener Yidisher kehile Tshizsheve (Tel Aviv: Tshizsheyer Landsmanshafn in Yisrael un Amerike, 1961). There also is a yizkor book for Zaręby Kościelne, edited by Zelig Dorfman et al., Le-zikbron 'olam; di Zaromber Yidn vos zeynen umgekumen 'al kidush ba-shem (New York: United Zaromber Relief, 1947). A partial English translation of the first and a complete translation of the second are available at jewishgen.org.

Also valuable are several secondary accounts, including the entries in Abraham Wein, ed., Pinkas ha-kebilot. Encyclopaedia of Jewish Communities: Poland, vol. 4, Warsaw and Its Region (Jerusalem: Yad Vashem, 1989), pp. 218–221 (Zaręby Kościelne), pp. 381–384 (Czyżewo); and its English-language counterpart, Arnon Rubin, The Rise and Fall of the Jewish Communities in Poland and Their Relics Today, vol. 1, District Białystok (Tel Aviv: Tel Aviv University Press, 2006), pp. 60–62 (Czyżew Osada), pp. 240–243 (Zaręby Kościelne). Coverage of the Czyżewo ghetto also is included in Waldemar Monkiewicz, “Za cenę życia. O ratowaniu Żydów w Białostockiem w okresie okupacji niemieckiej,” Białostoccy Żydzi 2 (1997): 174; Mariusz Nowik, Zagłada Żydów na ziemi łomżyńskiej (Warsaw: Bellona, 2006); and Andrzej Żbikowski, “Pogromy i mordy ludności żydowskiej w Łomżyńskim i na Białostocczyźnie latem 1941 roku w świetle relacji ocalałych Żydów i dokumentów sądowych,” in Wokół Jedwabnego, vol. 1; Studia, pp. 220–221.

Polin, the Web site of the Foundation for the Preservation of Jewish Heritage Poland, contains much coverage on the history of the Czyżewo Jewish community, including photographs, a brief history of the ghetto, and a chapter from a forthcoming book by Karol Głębocki.

Documentation on the persecution and destruction in World War II of the Czyżewo and closely related Zaręby Kościelne Jewish communities can be found in the following archives: AAN (e.g., AK [203/III-59, pp. 2–6], DR [202/I-45, vol. 4, pp. 944–952, 202/III-132, p. 5, 202/III-7, vol. 1, pp. 7–8]); AŻIH (e.g., Ankiety, 301 [283, 383, 386, 545, 5095, 6558]); IPN (e.g., SAB 150); IPN-Bi (Ko [e.g., 52-53/88, 65/88, 96/88, 160/87, 207/88], S [7/80, 104/68/1-2, 109/68]); USHMM (RG-15.019M [IPN] [reel 1, 2/253-54, reel 13, 43/486-87, 489, reel 14, 46/124]); and VHF (# 5893, 9607, 10305, 16542, 37721).

Samuel Fishman, Martin Dean, and Laura Crago

NOTES

1. Simcha Moncarz, “In the Circle of the Agony of Death,” in Kanc, Yizker-bukh: Tshizsheve, p. 981.
2. IPN, SAB 150, cited by Żbikowski, “Pogromy,” pp. 220–221 (deposition, J. Nienałowski).
3. USHMM, RG-15.019M (IPN), reel 1, 2/19, pp. 1–2.
4. For Małkinia, AAN, AK, 203/III-59, pp. 2–6, DR, 202/III-132, p. 5; for Łomża, Moncarz, “In the Circle,” pp. 982–983; victim ranges from Yentil (Israel) Kitaj, “Terrible Days and Nights,” in Kanc, Yizker-bukh: Tshizsheve, p. 863; VHF, # 9607, testimony of Michael Kitaj (Kitaj); and lowest figure, 700, in Monkiewicz, “Za cenę życia,” p. 173.
5. Shmuel Kanc, “Der Umkum,” in Kanc, Yizker-bukh: Tshizsheve, p. 856; same terrain cited in USHMM, RG-15.019M, reel 14, 46/124, pp. 1–2.
6. AŻIH, 301/544, p. 1.
7. USHMM, RG-15.019M, reel 14, 46/124, p. 1, with late date here likely the date the ghetto was closed.
8. VHF, # 9607 and # 10305, testimony of Dora Rosenthal.
9. AŻIH, 301/386, testimony of Mindel and Rachela Olszak, in Wokół Jedwabnego, 2:373; IPN-Bi, S-104/68/1-2 and S-7/80, pp. 1–17, cited by Nowik, Zagłada, p. 153, listing 1,500 victims from Zaręby.
10. IPN, SAB 150; VHF, # 10305.
11. AŻIH, 301/386, in Wokół Jedwabnego, 2:373; with a zero likely dropped from the population of 20 reported at USHMM, RG-15.019M, reel 14, 46/124, p. 1.
12. VHF, # 10305.
13. USHMM, Acc.-2006.246, p. 2.
14. VHF, # 10305.
15. AŻIH, 301/283, testimony of Etki Żółtak, p. 1.
16. VHF, # 9607; AŻIH, 301/386, p. 3.
17. IPN-Bi, Ko-5/88, cited by Monkiewicz, “Za cenę życia,” pp. 173–174, including documentation that the aid-giver's surname was Jędrzejczyk and not Andrzejczyk, as reported by Moncarz.
18. Moncarz, “In the Circle,” pp. 982–985.

DĄBROWA BIAŁOSTOCKA (AKA DĄBROWA GRODZIĘŃSKA)

Pre-1939: Dąbrowa (Yiddish: Dombrova), town, Sokółka powiat, Białystok województwo, Poland; 1939–1941: Dombrova raion center, Belostok oblast', Belorussian SSR; 1941–1944: Dombrowa (from late 1942, Gartenstadt), Kreis Sokolka, Distrikt Bialystok; post-1998: Dąbrowa Białostocka, województwo podlaskie, Poland

Dąbrowa is located about 64 kilometers (40 miles) north-northeast of Białystok and 32 kilometers (20 miles) west of Grodno. Its alternate name, Dąbrowa Grodzieńska, which dates to 1842, was used after World War II in official documentation until at least 1950. Subsequently renamed Dąbrowa Białostocka, the town today lies about 20 kilometers (12.4 miles) west of the Polish border with the Republic of Belarus.

In 1921, the population of the larger Dąbrowa gmina stood at 3,015, including 1,218 Jewish residents. The Jews were concentrated in the town of Dąbrowa, where they made up 90 percent of the overall population. By the outbreak of World War II the Jewish population of the town was less than 1,200. In September 1939, the first month of World War II, the Germans occupied Dąbrowa for less than two weeks before evacuating it to make way for the Red Army.

During the German invasion of the Soviet Union, which began on June 22, 1941, a Wehrmacht unit destroyed the Jewish homes outside of Dąbrowa on June 25, as it crushed a pocket of Soviet resistance there. When the Germans entered the town early the next morning, the military commander claimed that the Jews had murdered a German officer the evening before. In retribution, he ordered his men to set Dąbrowa on fire. The number of Jews who perished in the blaze is unknown. Most survivors fled to Nowy Dwór (Nowy Dwór gmina, Sokółka powiat), Sokółka, or Suchowola. Between 300 and 600 Jews returned to Dąbrowa in the week following the fire.¹ They were subjected to further violence at the beginning of July, when a group of Germans arrived and ordered 27 young Jewish adults to accompany them for forced labor, outside of Dąbrowa. After the laborers did not return home, they were presumed to have been murdered by the Germans.²

After the murders, the Germans likely ordered the remaining Dąbrowa Jews confined to the borders of the town, in part to conscript them more easily for forced labor. Initially, a Polish guard supervised the brigades of Jewish forced laborers. The Jews razed structures destroyed in the fire. Likely from September 1941, ultimate authority for the open ghetto was transferred to at least five German Gendarmes permanently stationed in Dąbrowa. The Jews lived in the basements of burned-out homes and sheds. They suffered from starvation, as there was little food available in the devastated town.³

In the fall or perhaps the winter of 1941, the Germans established a closed ghetto for the Dąbrowa Jews. The date the ghetto was created varies in the sources. Some scholars believe the Jews were confined to the theater and mikveh immediately following the fire. Others note that the Germans in May 1942 first deported to the Suchowola ghetto between 100 and 300 Jews, largely those they deemed unfit for forced labor. They next ordered the remaining 200 members of the community to reside in the two buildings, the only habitable structures in Dąbrowa.⁴ The Jews in the Dąbrowa ghetto were conscripted for labor, widening and paving the road from Sokółka to Janów Sokółski, together with labor brigades from the Sokółka ghetto. The Dąbrowa Jews likely worked on the more northern section of the road, from Makowlany to Dąbrowa.

On November 2, 1942, the Germans liquidated the Dąbrowa ghetto. They ordered the surviving Jews into marching order and commanded them to run most of the way to a transit camp, just south of Grodno, located in Kiełbasin, about 28 kilometers (17.4 miles) from Dąbrowa. Those who could not keep up were shot.⁵

At Kiełbasin, the Dąbrowa Jews were reunited with surviving family members from the Suchowola ghetto, among the 22,000 to 29,000 local Jews imprisoned at the transit camp. On December 14, 1942, the Germans drove the Dąbrowa community from Kiełbasin to the train station at Łasośna and sent them from there to the Treblinka extermination camp. The next day, at Treblinka, all but 1 perished there. The survivor, Sonia Grabińska-Lewkowicz, was among a handful of women held back from the transport to work at the camp laundry, cleaning and pressing the uniforms of the Ukrainian guards. She also is the only woman known to have survived the August 1943 Treblinka uprising.⁶

Grabińska-Lewkowicz returned to Dąbrowa after its liberation in the summer of 1944 only to discover a Polish family constructing a home on the property of her parents. She spent the winter of 1944–1945 with another local Polish family. Five other Jewish survivors, who had fled to the Soviet Union shortly after June 22, 1941, also returned to Dąbrowa. After a group of Poles murdered David Weinstein, one of the returnees, the few remaining Jews migrated to larger cities before leaving Poland for other countries, most notably Israel.⁷

SOURCES Published primary and secondary sources include Serge Klarsfeld, ed., Documents Concerning the Destruction of the Jews of Grodno 1941–1944 (New York: Beate Klarsfeld Foundation, 1985), 1:447–449 (testimony of Sonia Lewkowicz); Michael A. Nevins, Dubrowa. Dąbrowa Białostocka. Memorial to a Shtetl, 2nd ed. (River Valley, NJ: M.A. Nevins, 2000); and the Dąbrowa entries in Shmuel Spector and Bracha Freundlich, eds., Pinkas ha-kehillot. Encyclopaedia of Jewish Communities: Poland, vol. 8, Vilna, Białystok, Nowogrodek (Jerusalem: Yad Vashem, 2005), pp. 244–246; and Arnon Rubin, The Rise and Fall of Jewish Communities in Poland and Their Relics Today, vol. 1, District Białystok (Tel Aviv: Tel Aviv University Press, 2006), pp. 62–65. Also valuable is the extensive explication of the YVA testimonies by Sonia Lewkowicz, in Yoram Lubling, Twice-Dead: Moshe Y. Lubling, the Ethics of Memory, and the Treblinka Revolt (New York: Peter Lang, 2007).

Archival documentation on the World War II history of the Jewish community of Dąbrowa Białostocka under German occupation can be found at IPN-Bi (e.g., 1/160 [former S-41/72]); and YVA (e.g., O-3/1560 and O-3/4181).

Laura Crago

NOTES

1. Nevins, Dubrowa, p. 20, for low figure; and “Dąbrowa,” in Spector and Freundlich, Pinkas ha-kehillot, 8:244–246, for high figure.

2. Testimony of Sonia Lewkowicz, in Klarsfeld, Documents, 1:447.

3. Nevins, Dubrowa, p. 20; and Lewkowicz, in Klarsfeld, Documents, 1:447.

4. Compare “Dąbrowa,” in Spector and Freundlich, Pinkas ha-kehillot, 8:244–246; and Nevins, Dubrowa, p. 20.

5. Lewkowicz, in Klarsfeld, Documents, 1:447.

6. Nevins, Dubrowa, pp. 20–21; and Lubling, Twice-Dead, pp. 12, 121–122, 151.

7. Nevins, Dubrowa, p. 21.

DROHICZYN (AKA DROHICZYN NAD BUGIEM)

Pre-1939: Drohiczyn (Yiddish: Drohitchin), town, Bielsk Podlaski powiat, Białystok województwo, Poland; 1939–1941: Drogichin, Semiatichi raion, Brest oblast', Belorussian SSR; 1941–1944: Drogitschin, Kreis Bielsk, Distrikt Białystok; post-1998: Drohiczyn, Siemiatycze powiat, województwo podlaskie, Poland

Drohiczyn lies on the Bug River, about 90 kilometers (about 56 miles) south southeast of Białystok. Its pre-war 1939 population, of about 2,800, included some 700 Jews.

A Wehrmacht unit occupied Drohiczyn in September 1939 but soon ceded it to Soviet occupation. Because of its location on the border with German-occupied Poland, Soviet officials, in April 1940, expelled almost the entire Drohiczyn population to Siemiatycze.

On June 22, 1941, German forces rapidly overran Drohiczyn. They burned the synagogue to the ground and plundered Jewish homes. During the first few weeks, a German military commandant recruited a local Polish auxiliary police force. As Jewish men returned from Siemiatycze, the auxiliary police rounded them up for forced labor. Some conscripts were not seen again. One week later, German forces arrested and then murdered 31 to 36 Jews, for allegedly cooperating with former Soviet authorities.¹

In August 1941, a German civil administration replaced the military occupation authorities. The first commander of the Drohiczyn Gendarmerie post was named Treptow. From the end of 1941, Lindert commanded eight Gendarmes at the post. Hans Frank replaced him in the summer of 1942.² Because of its small size, the Gendarmerie continued to rely on the Polish auxiliary police, particularly to enforce anti-Jewish policies. Survivors divide about the treatment they received from the Polish police, with some noting their brutality and others suggesting that because they knew the Jews, they looked the other way, particularly at moments seminal to survival.³

In August, German authorities in Siemiatycze officially permitted Jews from Drohiczyn to return home. About half are believed to have done so, though a survivor notes that 550 Jews, mostly Siemiatycze returnees, lived in Drohiczyn during the German occupation.⁴

In the summer of 1941, the Germans ordered the Drohiczyn Jews to wear white armbands. After the order was changed in the early fall to yellow stars, on the back and chest, the Jews crafted and wore metal lapel pins instead of the cloth patches worn everywhere else in Distrikt Białystok.⁵ The Germans, likely regional authorities in Siemiatycze, ordered a Jewish Council (Judenrat) established for Drohiczyn. Its head, Eliezer Reznik, was a livestock trader. The council, in turn, organized a Jewish police force, commanded by M. Panczyk. The council and the Jewish Police collected “contributions” for the Germans and organized forced labor, which in practice applied to all Drohiczyn Jews 11 to 45 years old.⁶

Authorities established an open ghetto in the late summer of 1941 by forbidding Jews from leaving Drohiczyn's borders and by reordering Jewish residential patterns. In August, local German officials forbade Jews from living with Christians or renting homes owned by them. The order forced many to move into houses in the old Jewish neighborhood.⁷

The Drohiczyn ghetto inmates mostly were conscripted for labor by the Gendarmerie. They worked at a number of tasks, including razing and constructing buildings for a new Gendarmerie post and cleaning the houses, offices, stables, uniforms, and horses of the Gendarmes. The Judenrat organized children to sweep Drohiczyn's streets. The Jews were beaten on the way to work by the Polish auxiliary police and the Gendarmes, especially by the Gendarme Johann Moczko (Motke) from near Oppeln.⁸

In March or April 1942, the authorities concentrated the Jews into a more formal open ghetto, established on one or two streets, including Bielsk Street and a street known in Yiddish as Breiter. In May 1942, the Jews were ordered to enclose the ghetto with a barbed-wire fence. The closed ghetto was guarded from the inside by the Jewish Police and externally mostly by the Polish auxiliary police.

The material existence of the Drohiczyn Jews deteriorated, largely because they were prohibited from bringing food into the ghetto. To provision the ghetto, the Judenrat transformed its main street into a vegetable garden. The young snuck out of the ghetto at night to trade material possessions for food with Poles in nearby villages. The poor diet combined with the overcrowded conditions in the ghetto, in which one large family shared a room, bred illnesses. Morbidity rates increased. The Gendarmes permitted the pre-war Burial Society to bury the dead at the Jewish cemetery.⁹

The Drohiczyn Jews learned about the deportation of other Jewish communities to the Treblinka death camp from fugitives who had fled from the liquidation of several different ghettos in the Generalgouvernement, including in Kosów Lacki and Sokołów Podlaski.¹⁰ After discovering on October 31, 1942, that the Germans had ordered local peasants to bring 50 to 100 carts to the ghetto on November 2, the Jews knew what to expect. Some considered setting the ghetto on fire as an act of resistance, but this plan was rejected because it only would expedite German plans for the ghetto's destruction. Instead, about half the inmates evaded the deportation, with most escaping before the ghetto was encircled.¹¹

At 6:00 A.M., on November 2, 1942, an SS unit, their Ukrainian auxiliaries, and members of the Gendarmerie, including the Polish Schutzmannen, surrounded the Drohiczyn ghetto. Eight people were shot on the spot for resisting deportation. The other Jews were expelled to the Siemiatycze ghetto. On the outskirts of Siemiatycze an elderly man jumped from one of the wagons. As the armed German guards pursued him into what then was forest, even more Jews escaped into the woods. Among them were Pesach Blumsztajn, who joined his wife and children already in hiding, and Hinda (or Inda) Sroszko.¹²

The Drohiczyn Jews were deported by rail to the Treblinka extermination camp in two deportations, together with the Siemiatycze Jewish community and a number of other smaller communities also expelled to the Siemiatycze ghetto. In the first deportation, on November 4 or 8, 1942, the Germans drove 2,450 people to the Siemiatycze railway station and ordered them onto trains destined for Treblinka. In the final expulsion, on November 10–11, approximately 3,200 Jews were expelled to Treblinka. Almost all those in the two transports were gassed immediately upon arrival, as the Germans held back just 153 men from the second transport for work at the Treblinka I labor camp. Whether any Drohiczyn Jews were in this group is unknown.

About 30 Drohiczyn fugitives received assistance from local Poles. In Miłkowice, Jadwiga Kosk and the Zaleska family, including sisters Józefa and Maria (Lewczuk), hid eight members of the Reznik family.¹³ In Makarki, the Żero family sheltered Hinda Sroszko and also Benyamin Blusztajn (Bashan), from the Ciechanowiec ghetto, and the Kopiec family aided Chaya Perlsztajn, a Sokołów Podlaski ghetto refugee, who had fled to Drohiczyn.¹⁴ In Koczery, the family of Adolf and Bronisława Milkowski sheltered Sara Mężynska (Gold), orphaned after other Poles reported her family's hiding place.¹⁵ Yad Vashem has recognized all of the families as Righteous Among the Nations.

However, most Drohiczyn fugitives were refused shelter by local Poles. Forced to hide in fields and small forested areas, most were captured and killed in searches organized by SS auxiliaries and the local Gendarmerie following the ghetto liquidation and again during the late summer months. Some suffocated in the bunkers they dug. Others, including the three children of Pesach Blumsztajn, died of hunger and disease.¹⁶ Many Poles also reportedly expelled, turned over, and even murdered Jews they had promised to protect.¹⁷ To protect the fugitives, Shlomo Grude and Shlomo Warszawski established self-defense organizations, which organized paid shelter and distributed warm clothing to fugitives and joined partisan units of Siemiatycze Jews to threaten retaliation against Poles who denounced Jews to authorities.¹⁸ As a result, 72 Jews from Drohiczyn and Siemiatycze survived the war.

However, after Soviet forces liberated Drohiczyn in the summer of 1944, the ongoing effort by some partisans to revenge the wartime deaths of Drohiczyn (and Siemiatycze) Jews provoked tensions, which most likely contributed to a group of local Poles murdering almost all of the partisan leaders, including Warszawski, Grude, his brother, and his cousin, Shlomo.¹⁹ The attacks culminated in April 1945 in an armed assault in nearby Siemiatycze on the house of another former partisan, in which 28 survivors, including many Drohiczyn Jews, lived.²⁰ The Jews repelled the attack, but not before the Poles, reportedly from the anti-Communist National Armed Forces (NSZ), murdered yet another survivor.

SOURCES Published testimonies from Jewish survivors can be found in David Sztokfisz, ed., Sefer Drohitchin: Yiskorbukh (Tel Aviv, 1969). Its substantial English section is available online at jewishgen.org. The testimony of Wolf Wisznia (Zev Wiśnia or Vishnia) appears in Polish translation in Paweł Machcewicz and Krzysztof Persak, eds., Wokół Jedwabnego, 2 vols. (Warsaw: IPN-KŚZpNP, 2002), vol. 2, Dokumenty, pp. 185–186 (AŻIH, 301/973, pp. 1–2), and is available under the Drohiczyn link on the Cementarze żydowskie w Polsce Web site at www.kirkuty.xip.pl/drohiczyn.htm. Because the Drohiczyn community lived for a part of the war in Siemiatycze and shared its fate, also useful, from two survivors of the latter community, is Miriam Kuperhand and Saul Kuperhand, Shadows of Treblinka (Urbana: University of Illinois Press, 1998). The Web site Ruch na rzecz Ziemi includes a section titled “Podlascy Żydzi” at www.nawschodzie.pl/podlascyzydzi/index.html, which includes, among other materials, interviews with Christians recognized by Yad Vashem as Righteous Among the Nations for sheltering Drohiczyn Jews.

Secondary accounts include Shmuel Spector and Bracha Freundlich, eds., Pinkas ha-kehillot. Encyclopaedia of Jewish Communities: Poland, vol. 8, Vilna, Białystok, Nowogródek (Jerusalem: Yad Vashem, 2005), pp. 262–265; Arnon Rubin, The Rise and Fall of Jewish Communities in Poland and Their Relics Today, vol. 1, District Białystok (Tel Aviv: Tel Aviv University Press, 2006), pp. 65–68; and for aid, Israel Gutman and Sara Bender, eds., The Encyclopedia of the Righteous among the Nations, vol. 2, Poland, 2 pts. (Jerusalem: Yad Vashem, 2004), pt. 1, pp. 371, 452, 518, pt. 2, p. 936; and Waldemar Monkiewicz, “Za cenę życia. O ratowaniu Żydów w Białostockiem w okresie okupacji niemieckiej,” Białostoccy Żydzi 2 (1997): 176–177, 189–191, 204. Because the wartime origins of the postwar tensions between Poles and Jews in Drohiczyn (and Siemiatycze) are poorly understood in the existing literature, it is better read together with the yizkor book, the AŻIH, 301/1257 testimony of Gerzon Lew, and the relevant sections of Kuperhand and Monkiewicz.

Documentation pertaining to the history of the Drohiczyn Jewish community during the Holocaust can be found in the following archives: AŻIH (301 [e.g., 973, 1257, 2130, 3145]); BA-L (ZStL, V 205 AR-Z 59/71); IPN (e.g., SAB [142, 218], SOB 254); IPN-Bi (e.g., Ko [44/88, 46/88, 51/88, 57/88, 70/88, 71/88, 73/88, 201/87], S-31/68); VHF (e.g., # 10644, 13985, 15406, 17626, 18121, 21468, 22924, 30031, 32574, 32719, 32879, 32889, 37064, 41607); and YVA (e.g., O-3 [3928, 6596], M-31, M-49/E [e.g., 2592, 3145, 6640]).

Martin Dean and Laura Crago

NOTES

1. VHF, # 41607, testimony of Ester Fiszgop.
2. BA-L, ZStL, V 205 AR-Z 59/71, pp. 32–35 (deposition, Czesław Terlikowski, October 22, 1968); VHF, # 41607.
3. Compare VHF, # 41607 with # 30031, testimony of Helen (Reznik) Kotkin. See also # 32574, testimony of Józefa Zaleska.
4. AŽIH, 301/973, p. 1.
5. VHF, # 41607.
6. Ibid., # 13985, testimony of Zev Vishnia, and # 30031.
7. Ibid., # 41607.
8. Ibid., # 13985.
9. AŽIH, 301/1257, testimony of Symcha Bursztajn, p. 1; VHF, # 41607, 13985.
10. VHF, # 30031; AŽIH, 301/973, pp. 1–2, though, compare with VHF, # 13985.
11. AŽIH, 301/2130, testimony of Gerzon Lew (Gershon Lev), p. 1, and 301/1257, p. 1.
12. Ibid., 301/3145, testimony of Pesach Blumsztajn, p. 1; Janina Żero testimony, Ruch Web site.
13. VHF, # 30031, 32574, and 32719, testimony of Maria Lewczuk.
14. Ibid., # 33917, testimony of Binyamin Bashan (or Blusztejn).
15. Ibid., # 32879, testimony of Maria Wislocka.
16. AŽIH, 301/3145, p. 1.
17. Ibid., 301/2105, testimony of Gerzon Lew, pp. 1–2.
18. VHF, # 13985, 15406; Lev, in Sztokfisz, Sefer Drobitchin, pp. 42 ff; Saul Kuperhand (Kalman Krawiec) testimony, in Kuperhand and Kuperhand, Shadows, pp. 140–141.
19. VHF, # 13985; Sztokfisz, Sefer Drobitchin, p. 562.
20. VHF, # 15406.

DRUSKIENIKI

Pre-1939: Druskieniki (Yiddish: Druzgenik), town, Grodno powiat, Białystok województwo, Poland; 1939–1940: Druskeniki, Porech'e raion, Belostok oblast', Belorussian SSR; 1940–1941: Druskininkai, Alytus apskritis, Lithuanian SSR; 1941–1944: Druskieniki, Kreis Grodno, Distrikt Białystok; post-1991: Druskininkai, Republic of Lithuania

Druskieniki, on the Niemen River, lies 45 kilometers (almost 28 miles) north of Grodno. By 1897, 613 Jews (49.7 percent of the total population) resided there. In 1921, in interwar Poland, Jews numbered 294 (29.7 percent) of its 989 residents. However, with the first postwar spa season, in 1923, and the rebuilding of the town and spa, hundreds more people settled in Druskieniki, which recorded a 96 percent population growth rate in the 1920s. Prominent Jewish physicians from Grodno, such as Chaim Blumstein, reestablished Jewish sanatoria there. By the 1930s, 500 to 600 Jews likely lived in Druskie-

A pre-war photograph of a sanatorium in Druskieniki, Poland, once owned by Dr. Chaim Blumstein. Blumstein and his family survived the Grodno ghetto during the Holocaust.

USHMM WS #19698, COURTESY OF ALEXANDRE AND RITA BLUMSTEIN

niki. About another 200 Jews lived in Rotnica, a residential community of Druskieniki, located 16 kilometers (9.9 miles) to the east.

In September 1939, the first month of World War II, Druskieniki came under Soviet occupation. Communist officials imposed their own economic and social order by nationalizing the sanatoria, transforming them into retreats for workers and Communist youth groups, and deporting the wealthiest Jews to the Russian interior. These efforts continued after September 7, 1940, the day Druskieniki was transferred from the Belorussian to the Lithuanian SSR.

With the German invasion of the Soviet Union, on June 22, 1941, only a small number of Jews evacuated eastward to the Soviet Union. Among them were 80 Jewish campers from Białystok. Known as the children of Druskieniki, they are the largest single group of Polish-Jewish children saved from the Holocaust.¹ The German military occupied Druskieniki on June 23, 1941. The military commander fired all Jewish employees of the spas and sanatoria. German soldiers there recruited young male Jews to clear bombed-out roads located hours from home. Several Jews perished from beatings they sustained there. The Germans ordered the Jews to wear a Star of David on a white armband. In August, the order was changed to yellow markings, worn on the back and the chest. By July, the Germans also had ordered the Jews to nominate a Jewish Council (Judenrat). Its members included Leib and Nison Frenkel (or Frankel), Pinchas Wolgel, Judel Talkowski, Moldel Tykocki, and Chaim Kagen.²

Although Druskieniki had belonged to the Lithuanian SSR, the Germans did not subject Jews there to the mass executions, which by fall 1941 had effaced almost all the Jewish communities of Lithuania. Some Jewish refugees from Marcinkańce sought refuge in Druskieniki in September 1941 after rumors indicated that their village was to be incorporated into Lithuanian territory. The Germans exerted direct civil control in Marcinkańce at the end of September, and the refugees almost all returned home.³

The German military administration in Druskieniki was replaced by a civil administration, led by an Amtskommissar surnamed Mariell. On October 1, 1941, Druskieniki, as a part of Kreis Grodno, was joined to Distrikt Białystok. A Gendarmerie post, under the command of Meister Schmitt, was established there.⁴ When the Germans in 1942 established the Staatsbad at Druskieniki, a retreat for German nationals and foreign visitors from neutral countries, they divided the administration of Druskieniki, creating an Amtskommissariat for Bad-Druskieniki (also known as Staatsbad Druskieniki) and Druskieniki-Land, for matters related to the local civilian population outside of the town.

Likely sometime in July 1941, the Germans expelled the Druskieniki Jews to a ghetto.⁵ Most sources describe the ghetto as occupying a group of damp wooden buildings, or huts, on the outskirts of town. However, the structures also seem to have formed part of a pre-war Jewish vacation center or sanatorium, as an itemized list of property subsequently cleared from the ghetto contains large quantities of household items on which such operations depended, including 5,000 pieces of cutlery and 3,000 washbasins. The German administration used the property to replace similar items in the rooms at the State Baths. The ghetto formally remained open throughout its existence, though some kind of fence likely existed there before its creation, given the terrain's former use.⁶

The Jews in the Druskieniki ghetto were ordered to surrender to the Germans all of their valuable possessions, including an opera glass, an iron, a gramophone, 63 records, two hotplates, two electric tea kettles, and 54 fur coats.⁷ They were conscripted for a variety of labor tasks. Besides roadwork and agricultural labor, some Jews worked behind the scenes at the spa, including at its laundry and kitchen facilities. Other Jews provided off-site labor in ghetto workshops, including at one that made shaved ice, seltzer water, and lemonade. The workshop ceased operations shortly after August 22, 1942, the date the physician for Kreise Grodno and Solkolka issued a memorandum blaming the Jews, the reputed carriers of filth and disease, at the bottling workshop for an epidemic of an intestinal infection at the spa.⁸

The Druskieniki ghetto was liquidated on November 2, 1942. The Jews were expelled together with the Jews of Rotnica to a transit camp in Kielbasin, just south of Grodno. Some young Jews fled from the liquidation of the two Jewish communities; 6 were shot dead on the spot.⁹ The remainder, some 805 people, joined 22,000 to 28,000 Jews from about 22 other places in the Grodno and Sokółka regions also deported to Kielbasin from November 2 to 5, 1942.¹⁰ Leib Frankel headed the transit camp's Judenrat.

Some sources note that the Druskieniki Jews were still at Kielbasin when the Germans closed the camp shortly after December 21, 1942, and sent its remaining 2,000 to 3,500 prisoners to the Grodno II ghetto. However, death records issued in 1943 at the Auschwitz death camp suggest they were deported there from the Kielbasin transit camp. A large part of the Druskieniki Jewish community likely arrived there on November 9, 1942, in a transport officially listed as carrying 1,000 Jews. A part of the Skidel Jewish community also was on the transport. The Germans held back 109 men and 104 women as prisoners of the Auschwitz concentration camp. The remaining Jews, at least 787 people, were gassed on arrival.¹¹

The Druskieniki Jews who had fled the deportation to Kielbasin also almost all perished. One Jew was killed in the Druskieniki Amtskommissariat on November 3, 1942. Nine more were murdered two days later, and another was shot dead there on November 10.¹² More Jews were killed during a raid, in the fall of 1943, on the farm of Maria and Hipolit Jaskielewicz, Lithuanians executed by the Germans in October for sheltering Jews. The few remaining survivors mostly joined a group of Marcinkańce and Porzecze fugitives, organized by the Kobrowski family, in the nearby forest. In 1943, the group joined the Soviet partisans of the Davidov brigade. Aron Frenkel, from Druskieniki, left the group to command another Soviet partisan unit.¹³ Also counted among Druskieniki survivors are the four-member Blumstein family. Assisted by Janina and Antoni Docha, they escaped the Grodno ghetto liquidation and were sheltered by Aniela Staniewska and Helena Zaniewska in a village near Indura.¹⁴

SOURCES Secondary accounts include the Druskieniki entry in Shmuel Spector and Bracha Freundlich, eds., Pinkas ha-kehillot. Encyclopaedia of Jewish Communities: Poland, vol. 8, Vilna, Białystok, Nowogródek (Jerusalem: Yad Vashem, 2005), pp. 273–274. An English translation of the entry is on the Druskieniki community page at jewishgen.org.

Documents pertaining to the Jewish community of Druskieniki under German occupation in World War II include AŽIH (301/736); GAGO; GARF (7021-86-40, p. 4); LCVA; RGVA (e.g., 1323-2-244, pp. 99–100); USHMM (RG-11.001M [RGVA], and RG-53.004M [GAGO], e.g., reel 1, 1-1-54, p. 38, and reel 2, 1-1-121, p. 142, and 1-1-150, pp. 10, 71–74, and 1-1-167, pp. 201–202; and reel 4, 1-1-335, pp. 31, 74–75, and 1-1-365, pp. 15–17); VHF (# 10713 and 48659); and YVA (e.g., O-3/8323, O-33/3472, and M-1/E/16-1-14). Some of the material above appears in Serge Klarsfeld, ed., Documents Concerning the Destruction of the Jews of Grodno 1941–1944, 6 vols. (New York: Beate Klarsfeld Foundation, 1985–1992), which includes testimony from a Druskieniki survivor, about the Kielbasin transit camp, in volume 1 (pp. 133–135).

Alexander Kruglov and Laura Crago

NOTES

1. “Saving the Children,” and Chana Lin-Kizelstein, “A Rescued Child Speaks,” in I. Schmulewitz et al., eds., Der Bialystoker Yizkor Buch (New York: The Bialystoker Center, 1982), pp. 133, 134–136, with an English translation of the yizkor book on jewishgen.org; and Lena Jedwab Rozenburg, Girl with Two Landscapes: The Wartime Diary of Lena Jedwab, 1941–1945 (New York: Holmes & Meier, 2002).

2. VHF, # 48659, testimony of Nelia Ostrovski; and USHMM, RG-53.004M (GAGO), reel 2, 1-1-150, pp. 71–74.

3. YVA, O-33/2112, Collective Eyewitness Report by Shloyme Peretz, Khane Garfing, Lyb Kobrowski, Khaeyem

Kobowsky, written down by Leyb Konikhovsky, Ulm, August 1948, with pagination from the Jonathan Boyarin translation, on the Kobrowski family history Web site at www.kobrowski.com.

4. USHMM, RG-53.004M, reel 3, 1-1-280, pp. 5, 7.

5. Klarsfeld, Documents, 1:133–135.

6. Judenrat membership from the itemized list of confiscated property at USHMM, RG-53.004M, reel 4, 1-1-365, pp. 15–17.

7. Ibid., reel 1, 1-1-54, p. 28, and reel 2, 1-1-150, pp. 10, 71–74.

8. Ibid., reel 2, 1-1-121, p. 142.

9. Ibid., RG-11.001M (RGVA), reel 81, 1323-2-244, p. 99.

10. Ibid., RG-53.004M, reel 1, 1-1-54, p. 38; and also at GARF, 7021-86-40, p. 4.

11. Sterbebücher von Auschwitz, 3 vols. (Munich: KG Saur, 1995), vol. 2, Namensverzeichnis, A–L, p. 71 (4002/1943), p. 310 (10698/1943 and 13905/1943), p. 530 (7466/1943); and vol. 3, M–Z, p. 888 (6766/1943), p. 1001 (10799/1943), p. 1013 (7355/1943 and 9582/1943), p. 1042 (8537/1943), p. 1065 (9156/1943), p. 1206 (6641/1943), p. 1362 (13906/1943), p. 1337 (6884/1943), and p. 1375 (7388/1943); and Stanisław Mączka, ed., Żydzi polscy w KL Auschwitz: wykazy imienne. Polish Jews in KL Auschwitz: Name Lists (Warsaw: ŻIH, 2004), pp. 99–100, for Jacob (or Josef) Rejzner, listed too in the 10799/1943 death record.

12. USHMM, RG-11.001M, reel 81, 1323-2-244, pp. 99–100.

13. Ibid., RG-53.004M, reel 2, 1-1-167, pp. 201–202; and AŻIH, 301/736, testimony of Aron Frenkel, pp. 1–4 (typescript).

14. Alexandre Blumstein, A Little House on Mount Carmel (Portland, OR: Vallentine Mitchell, 2002), pp. 152–154, 190–321, 421–422. In 1979, Yad Vashem recognized the aid-givers as Righteous Among the Nations.

GONIĄDZ

Pre-1939: Goniądz (Yiddish: Goniondz), town, Białystok powiat and województwo, Poland; 1939–1941: Gonendz, Mon'ki raion, Belostok oblast', Belorussian SSR; 1941–1944: Goniadz, Kreis Białystok, Distrikt Białystok; post-1998: Goniądz, Mońki powiat, województwo podlaskie, Poland

Goniądz lies 52.8 kilometers (32.8 miles) northwest of Białystok and 9 kilometers (5.6 miles) east-southeast of the Osowiec Fortress. Its 1921 population of 2,643 included 1,135 Jews.

The Germans occupied Goniądz for 10 days in September 1939. They burned the synagogue before evacuating the town to Soviet forces.

A Wehrmacht unit reoccupied Goniądz on June 26, 1941. Its military commander, after consulting with the local priest, appointed a collaborationist town council, led by Jan Balonowski. Balonowski named a night watch, commanded by Bronisław Perkowski, and a 25- to 30-man auxiliary police force. Bernard Kemp, rumored to have entered Goniądz with German forces, recruited and organized the force, to which he also belonged.¹ Its commander was Adam Potocki, a local Pole.

Królewska Street, ca. 1922, which subsequently became the Goniądz ghetto. The Yiddish caption reads, "The old market in Gonyandz [Goniądz]."

USHMM WS #02716, COURTESY OF RELLA SLOMAN

On July 3, 1941, the German military commander ordered all Jews to return to Goniądz. Although the order was issued in anticipation of the arrival of an SS unit the next day, it effectively established an open ghetto in Goniądz, because the Jews could no longer leave the town without permission. The penalty for evading the order was death.

On Friday, July 4, 1941, at an assembly, the SS humiliated elderly Jews and ordered the Polish police to identify and to beat about 40 former Jewish and Polish Communist officials and activists. Before leaving Goniądz, the SS gave the Polish authorities a free hand with the alleged Communists.² Held captive in a store cellar, some prisoners were released in exchange for payments. Others, particularly Jews, were tortured. On July 7, the night watch and auxiliary police, reportedly acting on SS orders, beat the prisoners to death. A Jewish survivor initially maintained 41 people were murdered but subsequently reduced the number to 20, including 14 to 17 Jewish men and women.³ Another survivor, just 13 years old at the time of the murders, noted the collaborators had killed 180 Jews and Poles.⁴

On July 6, 1941, the Polish police arrested five Jewish youths found outside Goniądz. German soldiers executed the teenagers, most likely for ignoring prohibitions on leaving Goniądz. To prevent Jews from fleeing the town, the night watchmen held captive in a barn another group of able-bodied Jews, conscripted for forced labor by the SS. The men were released about two weeks later.

Acting on German orders, the Polish administration issued a series of anti-Jewish decrees, though initially with some confusion. On July 14, 1941, Balonowski invited three Jews to serve on the town council. Within a week, he demanded the men resign and commanded them instead to form a six-member Jewish Council (Judenrat). The Judenrat chair was Pinkewicz. The Jews were ordered to wear yellow markings on their chests. Shortly before evacuating Goniądz, on July 20, the local military commander demanded a monetary "contribution," in American dollars, from the Jewish community.

On July 20–21, the Polish policemen, probably supervised by a small SS unit, unleashed a pogrom in which they murdered 20 Jews, including Josel Kobryński, burned alive in the Bet Midrash under a heap of desecrated religious texts.⁵ When the perpetrators threatened violence the next day, 15 Jewish women, conscripted for labor at the German military command in Osowiec, appealed to the colonel in charge there to intervene. He ordered a military police unit to Goniądz to arrest seven perpetrators, including Potocki. After members of the Goniądz town council claimed the SS had given them permission to murder the Jews, the commander released one underaged perpetrator and ordered the others shot for stealing Jewish property during the pogrom.⁶ In revenge, the Polish police arrested another 11 to 15 Jews, but the Osowiec military command ordered the prisoners released. The frustrated Poles appealed to the Gestapo in Białystok to arrest the Jews.

A Jewish eyewitness maintains the Polish administration next ordered a closed ghetto established on the old market square, supposedly in consultation with an SS commander, but the Judenrat succeeded, by paying a bribe of 750 grams (26.5 ounces) in gold, to suspend the order. However, another eyewitness, a non-Jew, suggests the collaborators demanded the payment not to forestall ghettoization but to prevent the loss of additional Jewish lives.⁷ In August 1941, the Polish authorities ordered a closed ghetto established. The Judenrat bribed authorities to halt construction of a fence around the old market square. The fence probably was never removed, as a local Pole remembers some members of the Jewish community living behind it.⁸

The establishment of a German Gendarmerie post in late August 1941 and the arrival of an Amtskommissar in early September imposed additional demands. Upon arriving in Goniądz, the Gendarmerie commander gave the Judenrat 24 hours to furnish his new house. The Amtskommissar demanded the Judenrat secure similar household items and provide him a residence. However, Polish threats abated as the Amtskommissar transformed the mayor into a figurehead and dissolved the town council by October. The Gendarmerie also subordinated the auxiliary police and night watch to its command, though, on September 11, the Gendarmes, acting on SS orders, rearrested the 11 Jews previously denounced by Polish authorities. When 1 prisoner escaped, the SS ordered the auxiliaries to arrest 5 Jews. The Poles rounded up 2 members of the Judenrat, including its secretary, A. Brzeziński. For a bribe, the Amtskommissar issued documentation enabling the prisoners' families to travel to Knyszyn to plead for the men's freedom. An underaged captive was released; the SS already had executed the other 14 men.⁹

The German civil administration expanded forced labor in Goniądz, conscripting about 500 Jews at a number of Wehrmacht enterprises established at the Osowiec Fortress. By the summer of 1942, 30 Goniądz Jews worked for a sapper unit commander on road and fortification projects. Another 150 produced uniform trousers at a tailoring shop. Others sorted abandoned Soviet munitions. The largest group of conscripts labored at the Osowiec train station, loading and unloading supplies destined for the Eastern Front.

In late September or October 1942, the Amtskommissar ordered a ghetto established, but the Judenrat provided coats to him and his wife to suspend the order. However, on a subsequent Sunday, the Amtskommissar ordered the Jewish residents of Dolistowo Street expelled from their houses, likely in an effort to establish either a discrete Jewish residential quarter or a ghetto. Three days later, the Jewish residents of Kościelna Street received similar orders. The Judenrat secured a temporary suspension of the second order.

On November 2, 1942, an SS unit, supported by the local German Gendarmerie, including local Polish Schutzmannen, surrounded Goniądz.¹⁰ The SS informed the Judenrat that it had been ordered to evacuate the approximately 900 to 1,280 Goniądz Jews to a labor camp closer to Osowiec. The Jews were driven instead to a transit camp in the village of Bogusze, located 4.8 kilometers (about 3 miles) north of Grajewo, near the railway station in Prostken, East Prussia. About 30 to 35 people who had evaded the deportation found refuge in the ghetto in Jasionówka. Most others, perhaps 70 people, were rounded up following the evacuation by a small SS force, German Gendarmes, and Polish Schutzmannen. They were brought to the Bogusze transit camp, where the Germans had ordered 5,000 to 9,000 Jews from nearby localities imprisoned to facilitate their deportation to extermination camps.

On December 15, 1942, the SS deported 2,500 to 5,000 inmates from the Bogusze transit camp, via Prostken, to the Treblinka extermination camp. The remaining 2,000 or so inmates were sent to the Auschwitz extermination camp on January 3, 1943. Upon arriving at Auschwitz II-Birkenau on January 7, 1943, at midnight, 1,489 people from the transport were gassed. Another 296 men and 215 women became Auschwitz concentration camp inmates. About 10 Goniądz Jews survived the Bogusze deportations, including 9 Auschwitz prisoners and 1 Treblinka deportee. The latter, Awrom Lejzer Rubin, a participant in the August 1943 Treblinka uprising, subsequently joined a partisan unit of Białystok ghetto survivors. He perished in war operations in June 1944.

Another approximately 10 Goniądz Jews survived hiding near Goniądz. Kazimierz and Agnieszka Łuszcz in Krzecz village sheltered four members of the Jewrejski family. In Oliszki village (Goniądz gmina), Antoni Wasilewski, under pressure from his sister, provided assistance to Herszel Piekarz (Herschel Baker). In May 1944, Gendarmes arrested and shot dead three Jews and their aid-givers, Bolesław and Helena Kulikowski, in Goniądz.

In 1949, 10 Polish collaborators, mostly former auxiliary policemen and night watchmen, were tried together for murdering 25 Jews and Poles in Goniądz on July 7, 1941. One received a six-year prison term; another, Perkowski, was sentenced to life in prison.¹¹ In 1950, Franciszek Kuczyński, a former auxiliary policeman, received a six-year prison term for having supervised Jews under German watch and for the murder of Kobryński.¹²

SOURCES Published eyewitness accounts can be found in I. Ben-Meir (Treshansky) and A.L. Fayans, eds., Sefer yizkor Gonyondz (Tel Aviv: Va'ade yots'e Gonyondz be-'Artsot ha-Berit uve-Yisrael, 1960); with an eyewitness account by survivor Herschel Baker, "World War Two" also included in Julius L. Baker and Jacob L. Baker, eds., Sefer Yedwabneh: Hist'oryah ve-zikaron (Jerusalem and New York: Yedwabner Societies in Israel and in the United States of America, 1980), pp. 91–100. A partial translation of the first and the complete English translation of the second are available at jewishgen.org.

Secondary works include the relevant entries in Shmuel Spector and Bracha Freundlich, eds., Pinkas ha-kehillot. Encyclopaedia of Jewish Communities: Poland, vol. 8, Vilna, Bialystok, Nowogrodek (Jerusalem: Yad Vashem, 2005), pp. 195–198; Arnon Rubin, The Rise and Fall of Jewish Communities in Poland and Their Relics Today, vol. 1, District Bialystok (Tel Aviv: Tel Aviv University Press, 2006), pp. 70–76; Waldemar Monkiewicz, "Za cenę życia. O ratowaniu Żydów w Białostockiem w okresie okupacji niemieckiej," Białostoccy Żydzi 2 (1997): 180, 198–199, 210; and Andrzej Żbikowski, "Pogromy i mordy ludności żydowskiej w Łomżyńskim i na Białostocczyźnie latem 1941 roku w świetle relacji ocalałych Żydów i dokumentów sądowych," in Paweł Machcewicz and Krzysztof Persak, eds., Wokół Jedwabnego (Warsaw: IPN-KŚZpNP, 2002), vol. 1, Studia, pp. 186–194. And in spite of their titles, also touching on the war are Arkadiusz Studniarek, "Żydzi goniący w okresie międzywojennym," Białostoczczyzna, nos. 61–62 (2001): 130 ff; and Artur Wiśniewski, "Sztetl Goniący," in Artur Markowski and Wojciech Śleszyński, eds., Sztetl- Wspólne Dziedzictwo. Szkice z dziejów ludności Żydowskiej Europy Środkowo-Wschodniej (Białystok: Instytut Historii Uniwersytetu w Białymstoku, 2003), pp. 169–179.

Documentation pertaining to the Goniądz Jewish community under German occupation in World War II includes: AŻIH (e.g., 301/1847); IPN (e.g., SAB 101, SOB [42, 115–115a], SWB [6–6d, 119]); IPN-Bi (e.g., 1/1488, Ko [55/87, 67/87, 134/87, 227/88]); VHF (e.g., # 33938, 36694, 43390); and YVA.

Laura Crago

NOTES

1. IPN, SOB 42, Tewel Jewrejski (Tuviah Ivri) deposition, cited by Żbikowski, "Pogromy," pp. 187–188.
2. Compare in IPN, SOB 42, Jewrejski and Pejsach Tykocki, depositions, cited by Żbikowski, "Pogromy," pp. 188–189.
3. Compare IPN, SOB 42, Jewrejski deposition, cited by Żbikowski, "Pogromy," p. 188, with Tuvia Ivri (Tewel Jewrejski), "The Destruction," in Ben-Meir and Fayans, Sefer yizkor Gonyondz, pp. 591–676; and 25 victims in IPN, SWB 6–6d, sentencing documents, cited by Żbikowski, "Pogromy," pp. 191–192.
4. IPN, SOB 42, Wolf Zarenczański deposition, cited by Żbikowski, "Pogromy," p. 189.
5. See depositions and interrogations in IPN, SAB 101, SOB 42, SWB 6–6d.
6. Ivri, "The Destruction," pp. 591–676.
7. IPN, SOB 42, Józef Dąbrowski deposition, cited in Żbikowski, "Pogromy," p. 189.
8. Studniarek, "Żydzi goniący," p. 131.
9. Ivri, "The Destruction," pp. 591–676.

10. Baker, "World War Two," p. 96.
11. IPN, SWB 6–6d.
12. Ibid., SAB 101.

GRAJEWÓ

Pre-1939: Grajewo (Yiddish: Grayeve), town, Szczuczyn powiat, Białystok województwo, Poland; 1939–1941: Graewo, raion center, Belostok oblast', Belorussian SSR; 1941–1945: Grajewo, Kreis center, Distrikt Białystok; post-1998: Grajewo, Grajewo powiat, województwo podlaskie, Poland

Grajewo lies 71 kilometers (44.1 miles) northwest of Białystok. Its 1937 population of 9,500 included 3,000 Jews.

The Germans occupied Grajewo for about three weeks from September 6–7, 1939. They set fire to the synagogue and the Bet Midrash and deported about 300 Jewish men to a forced labor camp in East Prussia. Four months after Soviet forces occupied Grajewo, on September 21, 1 survivor returned home.

On June 22, 1941, German border guards shelled and then occupied Grajewo. Two days later, the Wehrmacht established a military command post there. On June 25, Stadtkommandant Geiss ordered the Jews to wear yellow markings on the back and chest and made forced labor obligatory for all adult Jews.

On June 29, 1941, local Polish antisemites unleashed a one-hour pogrom after Sunday mass. Appeals by the priest Aleksander Pęza and Communist Party of Poland (KPP) activist Henryk Sobolewski failed to stem the bloodshed. Ten Jews perished and dozens of others were injured. Rumors circulated that the perpetrators had secured permission from a local Gestapo commander named Opper for the attack.¹ However, most scholars believe the Gendarmes' decision to end the violence at 3:00 P.M. by shooting dead three of the perpetrators and taking injured victims to the hospital indicates the pogrom did not have German authorization.

The next day, at 4:00 P.M., a Gestapo unit surrounded about 500 Jewish men already assembled at the market square. (Believing they had little to fear from the local German authorities, the men had reported there willingly.) The Jews were surprised to see the surviving instigators of the pogrom assisting the Gestapo as members of a Polish auxiliary police force. The Germans ordered the police to identify the Soviet collaborators from among the Jews. The men arbitrarily chose about 100 people and then, on German orders, brutally beat them. On Thursday, July 3, the Gestapo returned to Grajewo, with a photographer, and in an almost identical Aktion ordered the Polish police to drive about 300 Jews into the horse market. The Gestapo joined the Polish police in beating 97 alleged Communists. The Germans invited local Poles, gathered to watch, to participate.

The 300 men were held prisoner for about a month in a theater that Soviet authorities had constructed on the site of the Old Synagogue. The auxiliary police drove the Jews in the general prison population out daily for forced labor, subjecting them to meaningless, exhausting physical labor and beating them. The “Communists,” imprisoned in a separate isolation cell, were tortured by their Polish jailers. The Communists who did not perish were executed by the Germans in small groups, either at the Jewish cemetery or in the Kosówka Forest.² The auxiliaries reportedly offered, for a fee, to exchange Communist internees slated for execution with Jewish prisoners from the general prison population.

On August 5–6, 1941, the SS organized a “show trial” of the Communist prisoners as a supposed precondition for the emergence of the Grajewo ghetto. At the trial, the Polish auxiliaries signed affidavits identifying 70 to 120 Jews as Communists. A panel of SS officers, serving as “judges,” sentenced the “guilty” to death. Among the condemned Jews were about 30 to 80 men, including from the Communist cell block and some elderly religious leaders, and about 40 women, arrested because of their former employment in the Soviet administration or Komsomol membership.³ German guards supposedly comforted other Jewish prisoners, telling them that the death sentences were required in order for the remainder of the Grajewo Jewish community to remain alive. The Germans and Polish auxiliaries tortured the condemned and raped many of the women. On August 7, the Germans executed the survivors of those condemned at a mass grave at the Jewish cemetery.

Polish investigators initially believed the German perpetrators of the show trial were from Einsatzkommando 8 and maintained that its commander, Karl Strohammer, had played the role of chief judge. However, more recent research has shown that the head of Einsatzkommando 8 was not Strohammer but rather SS-Sturmbannführer Otto Bradfisch, who, on July 7, the date cited for the show trial by early investigators, was in Minsk (now in Belarus). More recently, historian Andrzej Żbikowski has suggested an operational group subordinated to the Tilsit State Police may have overseen the Grajewo show trial.⁴ Confusion exists, too, about the show trial victims. Postwar documentation for their mass grave notes that 193 Jews, Poles, Russians, and Red Army soldiers were executed there, a point that suggests that non-Jews were among the condemned.⁵ Uncertainties also remain about the number of Jews who perished in Grajewo in the summer of 1941. The postwar Polish documentation, for example, provides no insight into the comment of survivor Zelig Tenenbaum that just 1,600 Grajewo Jews were alive at the conclusion of the show trial.

On a Tuesday in August 1941, after the show trial, likely on August 10, Stadtkommandant Geiss informed the Jews at an assembly that now that the community had been “cleansed” of its “Communists,” the Germans would provide them an opportunity to live in peace, in a ghetto, with a Jewish administration.⁶ He ordered the 24 remaining Jewish prisoners released from jail to assist their families to relocate to a ghetto on Dolna Street. He gave the Jews five days to move there. The ghetto terrain, which spanned 7 hectares (17.3 acres), also included Rudzka and Łazienna Streets. It was enclosed by a barbed-wire fence.⁷

At the assembly, Geiss also had nominated Zuker Saltzman as the chair of a Jewish Council (Judenrat). On Geiss’s orders, the Judenrat established a Labor Office a few days later. It also organized a police force, initially to patrol the ghetto from Polish marauders. Karbowski, a lawyer from Łomża, was its commander, and Meier Klecki, its deputy commander. Two weeks later, Geiss ordered the Judenrat to pay a 1-million Reichsmark (RM) contribution to the town treasury, threatening to expel the Jews from Grajewo if they failed to raise the sum. The Jews sold whatever they could to local Poles to meet the demand.

The Grajewo Judenrat created workshops in the ghetto to meet the needs of its inhabitants. A bakery, a food store, and a shoe-making facility provided them low-cost goods. The sanitation force ordered swamps drained and vegetables planted throughout the ghetto. Ghetto residents were conscripted for road improvement work. Others cleaned roads and worked on construction projects for the German Gendarmerie, established in late August 1941. They left for work each morning without an armed guard but were required to have passes, issued by German authorities, permitting them to be outside the ghetto. The Amtskommissar, Hans Pogoda, who assumed responsibility for Grajewo that same month or in early September, permitted peasants from local villages to enter the ghetto twice weekly on market days to sell potatoes as well as peat and wood for fuel. Ignoring German orders forbidding Jews to purchase poultry and livestock, the peasants smuggled live chickens and calves into the ghetto to sell.

According to a Jewish eyewitness, the preexisting tensions between Christians and Jews remained. When the peasants began bypassing the square to sell their goods exclusively in the ghetto, local Christians complained to German authorities that the ghetto was better provisioned than the town.⁸ Polish eyewitnesses also noted that local German authorities furthered tensions by ordering Jewish forced laborers to dig the mass graves of Poles slated for execution.⁹

Early on November 2, 1942, members of the SS surrounded the Grajewo ghetto in preparation for its liquidation. The next day, they drove its residents to a transit camp, located 4.8 kilometers (3 miles) to the north in Bogusze, a war-devastated village near the railway station in Prostken, East Prussia. At least six families were murdered for evading the deportation orders.¹⁰

The Grajewo Jews lived at the Bogusze transit camp for about a month with about 5,000 to 9,000 Jews from other nearby localities. On December 15–16, 1942, German camp guards sent 3,000 to 5,000 inmates, including Saltzman, from the Prostken railway station, to the Treblinka extermination camp. The second and final deportation, of about 2,000 Jews, occurred on January 3, 1943. Four days later at the Auschwitz II-Birkenau killing center, the Germans held back 296 men and 215 women from the transport for labor. The remaining 1,489 Jews were gassed on arrival. Incomplete records indicate that at least 32 people from Grajewo were prisoners at Auschwitz. Of these, only a handful survived the war.

Also counted among Grajewo survivors are Runia (Rachel) Lunia and her husband, a physician. Refugees to Grajewo in the Soviet period, the two recognized their hometown of Częstochowa when the Auschwitz transport train stopped there briefly. They exited from the passenger cars to which Bogusze medical personnel had been assigned and were reunited with family.¹¹

SOURCES A published account by Nachmann Rapp, “History of the Grayevo Ghetto,” in George Garin et al., eds., Grayeve yisker bukh (New York: United Grayever Relief Committee, 1950), pp. xix–li, remains the standard work on the history of the ghetto. The authors also have relied on the testimony deposited in the underground archives of the Białystok ghetto, also known as the Mersik-Tenenbaum Archives, cited as AŻIH, 204/10, and titled “Testimony of Zelig Tenenbaum and a few other boys from Grajewo about events in the town from the beginning of the German occupation.” The Tenenbaum testimony is summarized in Andrzej Żbikowski, “Pogromy i mordy ludności żydowskiej w Łomżyńskim i na Białostocczyźnie latem 1941 roku w świetle relacji ocalałych Żydów i dokumentów sądowych,” in Paweł Machcewicz and Krzysztof Persak, eds., Wokół Jedwabnego, vol. 1, Studia (Warsaw: IPN and KŚZpNP, 2002), pp. 180–183. Żbikowski also discusses here the initial Polish investigations into the German perpetrators of anti-Jewish violence in Grajewo during the summer of 1941 and proposes some alternatives in chapter 5 of his U genezy Jedwabnego. Żydzi na kresach północno-wschodnich II Rzeczypospolitej, wrzesień 1939–lipiec 1941 (Warsaw: ŻIH, 2006).

Also useful is Arnon Rubin, The Rise and Fall of Jewish Communities in Poland and Their Relics Today, vol. 1, District Białystok (Tel Aviv: Tel Aviv University Press, 2006), pp. 77–81, an English-language account based on the Grajewo entry in Abraham Wein, ed., Pinkas ha-kehillot. Encyclopaedia of Jewish Communities: Poland, vol. 4, Warsaw and Its District (Jerusalem: Yad Vashem, 1989), pp. 165–166.

Documentation on the history of the Jews of Grajewo under German occupation can be found in the following archives: AŻIH (e.g., 204/10 [old 10/131], 301/2600); IPN-Bi (e.g., 1/1151, 1/227-28, S-15/66 [Bogusze]); USHMM (e.g., RG-15.019M [IPN], 2/232, 46/106); VHF (e.g., # 3129); and YVA (e.g., M-11 [i.e., AŻIH, 204/10]).

Laura Crago and Monika Tomkiewicz

NOTES

1. Rapp, “History,” pp. xxxi–xxxiv, xl.
2. AŻIH, 204/10 (old 10/131), pp. 1–22.
3. Ibid., for low figures; and Rapp, “History,” p. xxxviii, for high victim range.
4. See Żbikowski, “Pogromy,” p. 183; and Żbikowski, U genezy Jedwabnego, p. 225.
5. USHMM, RG-15.019M (IPN), reel 1, 2/235, pp. 1–2.
6. Rapp, “History,” p. xl.
7. USHMM, RG-15.019M, reel 14, 46/106, pp. 1–2; and IPN-Bi, 1/227, vol. 1, pp. 66–67, 226 (depositions, Antoni Zieliński and Alfred Neuman, respectively).
8. Rapp, “History,” pp. xlii–xliv.
9. IPN-Bi, 1/227, vol. 1, p. 13 (deposition, Bronisław Kraśniński), vol. 2, pp. 47–49 (letter, Grajewo police commander).
10. IPN-Bi, vol. 1, p. 33 (deposition, Józef Olszewski).
11. VHF, # 3129, testimony of Runia (Rachel) Lunia.

GRÓDEK BIAŁOSTOCKI

Pre-1939: Gródek (Yiddish: Horodok), village, Białystok powiat and województwo, Poland; 1939–1941: Gorodok, Zabłudov raion, Belostok oblast’, Belorussian SSR; 1941–1944: Grodek, Kreis and Distrikt Białystok; post-1999: Gródek, Białystok powiat, województwo podlaskie, Poland

Gródek is located 37 kilometers (23 miles) east-southeast of Białystok. According to the 1921 population census, 1,508 Jews lived in Gródek. In 1939, on the eve of World War II, there were 1,150 Jews in Gródek, about 50 percent of the total population.¹

In September 1939, German forces briefly occupied the town before the arrival of the Soviets. Under Soviet rule, a number of people, mainly Poles, were deported to the east. German forces occupied Gródek again on June 27, 1941. After two hours, the Germans started searching Jewish houses on the pretext of looking for arms, but they took any valuable items they found, such as gold or leather. Initially, the German military controlled Gródek, but after a few weeks, authority was transferred to a German civil administration. Gródek was incorporated into Kreis Białystok, within Distrikt Białystok, which was in most respects treated as territory incorporated directly into the Third Reich.

A German Amtskommissar, Paul Melzer, was in charge of the administration in Gródek, and he introduced a series of anti-Jewish measures. His first decree was to forbid Christians from selling food to Jews. He also spread anti-Jewish propaganda among the Christians, blaming the Jews for the war, and argued that the first step to help the Germans in eradicating the Jews was not to sell them food. The Amtskommissar named the Belorussian Serenko as head of the municipal administration (gmina) because he supported antisemitic policies. Further new decrees followed daily: Jews were forbidden to walk on the sidewalks; they were forced to wear distinguishing yellow badges; and they had to perform forced labor, during which the local auxiliary police, composed of Poles and Belorussians, frequently beat them.

In order to assist with the implementation of their decrees, the German authorities established a Jewish Council (Judenrat) of 10 people, which was chaired by former teacher Shmuel Zbenowicz. After some time, members of the Gestapo arrived in Gródek. Despite efforts by the Judenrat to bribe them, the Gestapo men beat all the members of the Judenrat 50 times each. Zbenowicz had his fingers broken and his teeth knocked out before they shot him. The Gestapo also demanded that the Jews supply them with watches and suits before leaving. This treatment of the Judenrat had a devastating impact on the community. The German Gendarmerie (Order Police) also made daily demands for the Jews to deliver items such as furniture or 20 pairs of boots within a few hours, threatening to shoot everybody if they did not comply.²

In the fall of 1941 (probably at the end of October), or according to some sources in the late summer of 1942, the Amtskommissar ordered the establishment of a ghetto.³ Within 24 hours, all the Jews had to move into the so-called Piaski quarter, which they could not leave without special permission. Non-Jews who lived there moved into the former “shtetl” area. There was also an 11-man Jewish militia, which provided the internal guards at the ghetto gate.⁴ Forced labor was organized by the Judenrat, and the tasks included construction work on the main road from Białystok to Baranowicze, which entailed a long march on foot to the work site. In the winter of 1941–1942, hunger and cold added to the misery of the Jews in Gródek.

At the start of 1942, the first Aktion was carried out in the ghetto. The German police shot 13 people declared “mentally ill,” and shortly afterwards they arrested 15 Jews alleged to be Communists. When 1 of the 15, a man named Botovitski (or Borovitsky), succeeded in escaping, the Germans took his wife and children hostage and threatened to kill 100 others or even the entire ghetto if he was not surrendered. Shortly afterwards, he was handed over to the Germans. After three weeks in prison under terrible conditions, the Germans shot the 15 prisoners.⁵

On November 1, 1942, there was a mood of unease in the ghetto, as the Jews had received news of the arrival of many peasant wagons from the surrounding countryside. During the night, German police and their collaborators surrounded the ghetto. Early the next morning, the Gestapo visited the Judenrat. They ordered all the Jews to appear at the marketplace within one and a half hours, as the Jews were going to be transferred to another place. At 6:30 A.M., while it was still dark, the Jewish Police went from house to house to inform the Jews to get ready to leave. Most Jews expected that this would be the end. The Gendarmerie and local police began to drive the Jews out of the houses, and the Jews did not know where to run or hide. A number of them tried to break out of the ghetto and were shot by the guards. There were heartrending decisions to make. The mother of a man named Sima urged her son to leave his family behind and try to save himself and take revenge; yet the close guard made it impossible to escape.⁶

The remaining Jews then assembled on the square with their meager possessions in small bundles together with their children. At about 7:00 A.M., they received an order to form a column in family groups to leave through the gate. The Jews then boarded the wagons under close guard. Anyone who did not move quickly enough was severely beaten. After waiting for the similar convoy of carts from the nearby ghetto of Michałowo to join them, the Jews were escorted initially to the transit camp in Białystok, located in a former cavalry barracks. Only a few, such as Nachemiasz Szuklaper and his sister, managed to escape from the convoy on the way.⁷ In the transit camp they were held together in terrible conditions with other Jews from the region; 40 Jews who tried to escape were shot by the Germans.⁸ From the transit camp they were sent on to the Treblinka extermination camp by train at the end of November 1942. Three groups of Jews designated as craftsmen were transferred to the Białystok ghetto from the transit camp, thanks to the intervention of the head of the Białystok Judenrat, Ephraim Barash. Only a handful of Jews from Gródek managed to escape to the partisans or survive the German occupation in hiding or with false documents.

After the war, Paul Melzer, the former Amtskommissar in Gródek, was one of the few leading officials in Distrikt Białystok to be tried by the Polish authorities. He was tried specifically for his role in the shooting of seven members of the Polish underground movement in 1942.⁹

SOURCES Publications on the fate of the Jews of Gródek during the Holocaust include Moshe Simon, ed., Horodok: A Yizkor Bukh (Tel Aviv: Association of Former Gorodok Residents in Israel and Argentina, 1963); there is also a brief article in Shmuel Spector and Bracha Freundlich, eds., Pinkas ha-kehillot. Encyclopaedia of Jewish Communities: Poland, vol. 8, Vilna, Białystok, Nowogródek (Jerusalem: Yad Vashem, 2005), pp. 231–234; and its English-language counterpart, Arnon Rubin, The Rise and Fall of Jewish Communities in Poland and Their Relics Today, vol. 1, District Białystok (Tel Aviv: Tel Aviv University Press, 2006), pp. 81–83.

Documentation concerning the extermination of the Jews of Gródek can be found in the following archives: AŻIH (301/978 and 3593); IPN (e.g., SAB 140, SOB 398, SWB 260, 280–281); IPN-Bi (e.g., 7/9777, 1/1656, S-136/68/1–2); and YVA (e.g., M-11/48). It should be noted in particular that IPN-Bi, 1/1656 [old N-1/43], reportedly contains a list of all the Jews imprisoned in the Gródek ghetto.

Alexander Kruglov and Martin Dean
trans. Steven Seegel

NOTES

1. AŻIH, 301/978, testimony of Josef Abramicki.
2. Ibid.; YVA, M-11/48; Simon, Horodok, p. 90, dates the murder of Zbenowicz in the winter of 1941–1942, following impossible demands for fresh flowers by the Gestapo.
3. YVA, M-11/48, dates the establishment of the ghetto at the end of October 1941 and is the source written closest to the actual events. Other sources indicate the ghetto was not formed until August or September 1942. See Simon, Horodok, pp. 86, 90; and AŻIH, 301/978.
4. YVA, M-11/48.
5. Ibid.
6. Ibid.; Sima (his surname is unknown) is the author of this report, which was preserved in the Tenenbaum archive from the Białystok ghetto, now located in Yad Vashem.
7. AŻIH, 301/3593, testimony of Nachemiasz Szuklaper. He managed to escape to Warsaw and survived in hiding there.
8. Ibid., 301/978.
9. IPN, SOB 398.

GRODNO

Pre-1939: Grodno (Yiddish: Grodne or Hurodno), city and powiat center, Białystok województwo, Poland; 1939–1941: Grodno raion, Belorussian SSR; 1941–1944: Grodno (from 1942, Garten), Kreis center, Distrikt Białystok; post-1991: Hrodna, voblasts' center, Republic of Belarus

Jews move their belongings into the Grodno ghetto, 1941–1942.
USHMM WS #74339, COURTESY OF ŻIH

Grodno lies 85 kilometers (53 miles) northeast of Białystok. In 1931, 21,159 Jews comprised 42.5 percent of the population of the city of Grodno.

During the Soviet occupation, Grodno swelled with refugees fleeing from German-occupied Poland. By the summer of 1941, the city numbered 50,000 inhabitants, about half of them Jews.

The Germans captured Grodno on June 23, 1941. A local military commandant's office (Ortskommandantur) initially administered the city. The Schutzpolizei and the Wehrmacht established regional headquarters in Grodno. From December 1941 to March 1943, SS-Obersturmführer Heinz Errelis commanded the local Security Police post, which was subordinated to the Security Police (KdS) in Białystok, under the leadership, from April 1942, of Dr. Wilhelm Altenloh.

The Wehrmacht initiated the first German anti-Jewish measures in Grodno: the formation of a Jewish Council (Judenrat), wearing of markings, confiscations, and forced labor. Units of Einsatzgruppe B also committed murders, and some local Poles took advantage of the situation to steal from the Jews.

The Germans established two closed ghettos in Grodno on November 1, 1941. The main ghetto, known as Ghetto I (or Ghetto A), was located in the old Jewish quarter around the Old Synagogue. Dominikańska and Zamkowa Streets became two of its borders. Ghetto II (or Ghetto B) was about 2 kilometers (1.2 miles) from the first ghetto, on the other side of the Niemen River, in Słobotka, the poorest suburb of Grodno. The authorities conceived of Ghetto I as a place for working people with skills, and Ghetto II as a residential area for the elderly and those unable to work. In practice, many artisans lived in Ghetto II because they either worked there for the Judenrat or had been unable to find housing in Ghetto I. Orders to move into the ghettos left people with little time to pack and just six hours to transport their belongings. Snowfall and the construction of 2-meter-high (6.6-foot-high) barbed-wire fences around the ghettos on the resettlement day further complicated the process.

Until November 1942, both ghettos were the responsibility of the Stapoleitstelle in Białystok, in cooperation with the Grodno city administration, led from August 1941 by German mayor George Stein. The Schutzpolizei, commanded by Captain Franz Osterode, with a force of approximately 40 to 50 German and 30 local policemen, patrolled the outside of the ghettos. A Jewish police force, under the command of Aaron Rubinczyk, maintained law and order inside the ghettos and patrolled the fences from the inside and at their gates, located in Ghetto I at Zamkowa Street and in Ghetto II at Skidel Street, near Artillery Street.

The average living space in the ghettos was about 2 square meters (21.5 square feet) per person. In Ghetto I, between 15,000 and 20,000 people lived in an area of about 0.5 square kilometers (less than 0.2 square miles). They resided in stone dwellings previously inhabited by impoverished Jews. The approximately 4-square-kilometer (1.5-square-mile) area of Ghetto II offered more physical space, for about 10,000 people, but fewer houses. The housing there consisted of small, wooden houses formerly owned by poor Christians.

Brawer, the head of the Jewish Council, oversaw a ghetto administration divided into two parts, with Ghettos I and II supervised, respectively, by Icchak Gorzański and Abraham Zadaj, both lawyers. The council's offices included provisioning, housing, health care, police, legal matters, social welfare (including synagogue operations in Ghetto I), statistics, trade, and employment. The two administrations employed 850 people.

The council established a reputation for its abilities to address questions of material survival. Brawer, for example, negotiated from German authorities a larger food allocation for the ghettos. The organizational talents of Jakub (or Jakow) Efron, head of the provisioning department, enabled the Judenrat to distribute rations to all registered ghetto inhabitants; to offer subsidized or free daily meals to as many as 3,000 residents, for example, in Ghetto I; to provide workers with thousands of cups daily of ersatz coffee; and to grow food in ghetto gardens. The Judenrat's finance department, led by Jehoszua Suchowlański, a former deputy mayor of Grodno, imposed stiff taxes to meet the council's new responsibilities, which also included fulfilling demands of the German authorities for furniture, fur coats, alcoholic beverages, and other valuables. It even used a sign tax to collect revenue from proprietors of illicit stores, which provided a variety of services and unobtainable goods, such as oil produced from sunflower seeds on a press smuggled into the ghetto. Survivors remember the Grodno ghettos as places in which people, although hungry, did not starve, as happened in some other large ghettos.¹

The Jewish Council also oversaw labor conscription. Some Jews worked on road and railway construction projects. The most secure employment was thought to be at workshops outside of the ghetto organized by the Grodno Kreiskommissar, Landrat von Ploetz, to produce clothing, shoes, and even snowshoes and skis for the Wehrmacht and the Gestapo.

An underground youth movement organized resistance. It initially focused on reestablishing educational activities and on material assistance. In early 1942, Mordecai Tenenbaum (Tenenboim) (Dror) and Tosia Altman (Ha-Shomer Ha-Za'ir) traveled to Grodno to tell the youth and the Judenrat that they believed the Germans intended to murder the Jews and to appeal for armed resistance. They discovered the Judenrat more committed to the idea that the contributions of Grodno Jews to the German war industry would secure their survival. The Grodno youth endorsed the positions of its leaders but divided over a course of action. According to activist Liza Chapnik (or Tzepnick), "One group urged us to prepare for armed resistance, that is, for an uprising in the Grodno ghetto. . . . The other group argued for leaving the ghetto at night and going to the neighboring forests where we could join the partisans and fight against the Nazis with them."² Ha-Shomer Ha-Za'ir created a ghetto laboratory to forge documents, enabling the establishment outside the ghetto of a network of mostly women couriers, including Chapnik, to maintain contact with the Białystok resistance.

On November 2, 1942, in conjunction with the liquidation of the ghettos in Distrikt Białystok, the Security Police assumed responsibility for the Grodno ghettos and ordered them sealed. Gestapo officers Kurt Wiese and Otto Streblow, appointed the commandants, respectively, of Ghettos I and II, subjected the Grodno Jews for the first time in the war to sustained, arbitrary violence. On November 2, for instance, they entered Ghetto II to shoot at Jews, who—unaware of the closure order—had gathered by the gate to leave for work.³ The Security Police ordered searches of the few workers it permitted to leave the ghetto, beginning on November 3, mainly the artisans employed at Wehrmacht and Gestapo enterprises. It shot dead those discovered smuggling food back to the ghetto. A curfew was imposed; electricity and water supplies to the ghettos were circumscribed.

The Security Police next launched a five-month-long liquidation of the Grodno ghettos, beginning in Ghetto II. The Germans ordered the Jewish Council there to draw up a list of 1,000 to 4,000 people to be transferred to Ghetto I. The transferees included artisans with "useful" professions and those with family in Ghetto I.⁴ On November 15, 1942, about 1,000 to 2,000 of the remaining Ghetto II residents were sent to the Auschwitz extermination camp. On November 21, a second transport carried to Auschwitz the rest of the Jews from Ghetto II, between 2,000 to 3,500 people. From the two transports, which likely included about 4,000 ghetto residents, the Germans held back just 598 people (470 men and 128 women) as concentration camp prisoners. The rest were gassed on arrival.⁵

The liquidation of Ghetto I began at the end of November 1942. To make room for the transferees from Ghetto II, approximately 4,500 Jews from Ghetto I were expelled to the Kielbasin transit camp, just outside of Grodno, where almost all the Jews of the Sokółka and Grodno regions also had been concentrated before being deported to extermination camps. Wiese relied on violence, including public executions, to secure compliance. The Jewish Council members drew up the deportation lists and read out sentencing orders at the executions. However, in mid-December, Errelis began publicly humiliating the council leaders and interfering in the operations of the Judenrat, as the Security Police turned to its Jewish liaison men and the Jewish Police. Gorzański and Rubinczyk were among a group of expellees driven to Kielbasin in early December, with the Jewish Police commander sent there reportedly for refusing to tie nooses on the first public hanging victims.⁶ Because of a shortage of railway cars, many Kielbasin inmates were transported in mid-December to the much closer extermination camp at Treblinka. A group of Grodno youth on one of the transports launched a spontaneous rebellion at Treblinka, which resulted in the deaths of three SS men. Shortly after December 21, the Germans closed the Kielbasin transit camp and marched its remaining 2,000 to 3,500 inmates, including the Jews from Suchowola and Sopoćkinie, to the Grodno I ghetto.

The liquidation of Ghetto I continued in January and February 1943. The first large Aktion, remembered as "Operation 10,000," began on January 18, 1943. Over a period of five days, some 11,650 people were deported to Auschwitz on transports that carried between 1,500 and 3,650 Jews. Of these, 9,851 were murdered upon arrival, while 1,799 (1,096 men and 703 women) were held back as prisoners of the concentration camp.⁷ During the deportations, three members of the Zionist underground attempted to assassinate Streblow, the Ghetto II commandant. Others had broken open the doors and windows of the Great Synagogue in an attempt to stir a revolt among the thousands of Jews incarcerated there, pending their expulsion to the Łosośna train station. Both efforts met with bloody reprisals.⁸ Even though the Germans shrunk the ghetto after each deportation, declaring the empty structures just beyond its new borders a "no-man's land," about 1,500 people still managed to evade deportation. Fearing the personal repercussions of not fulfilling the deportation quota, the Jewish Police extricated people from hiding and seized off the streets many of the "useful artisans" and their families, given dispensations from the deportation.

During the second Aktion, on February 13–16, 1943, known as "Operation 5000," only a few hundred "essential workers" were held back from deportation. On February 13, the remaining Jews, including the surviving Judenrat members, led by Brawer, were incarcerated in the synagogue. When several Jewish liaison officers were found hiding in the no-man's land, just beyond the new borders of the ghetto, Wiese shot Brawer dead. Accounts of the February deportations vary. One interpretation estimates that beginning on February 13, 1943, at least three transports departed for the Treblinka extermination camp, including a train designated as leaving from Białystok but having been rerouted to Grodno. Another version notes that surviving railway schedules confirm just two transports from Grodno to Treblinka, on February 14 and 16, and estimates they carried, respectively, 2,500 and 1,600 Grodno Jews to their deaths.⁹

Because most of the Jewish Police had exercised less vigilance during the February Aktion, a number of people managed to escape from the ghetto. Some of them reached the Wilno or the Białystok ghettos and joined the underground movements there. Another 26 to 30 youths, led by Leib Rejzer, from the Communist underground, fled to Skidel, where a Belorussian, Kostia Bucko, transported them to the Radun Forest. In May 1943, they joined the Soviet partisans.¹⁰ Others found shelter with Christians, including the Łosośna peasant Paweł Harmuszko, a Żegota member, attributed with directly assisting 8 Grodno Jews and arranging false documents and transporting to shelters about 200 other Jews from the Grodno and Warsaw ghettos.¹¹

Another approximately 500 Jews lived illegally in the ghetto with about 650 Jews (and some of their families) declared “useful artisans” by the Security Police. The ghetto now encompassed three buildings between the Zamkowa entrance and the synagogue. It was administered by a Judenrat, headed by the new Jewish Police commander. In mid-March 1943, the Security Police in Grodno transferred all but 10 to 15 male artisans to the Białystok ghetto. Shortly after August 15, 1943, the last Jewish artisans in Grodno were transferred to a Łomża prison, where they joined a group of craftsmen, including some Grodno Jews, expelled there from the Białystok ghetto. The men were deported to the Stutthof concentration camp.¹² Of the 25,000 Jews residing in both ghettos, only a few hundred survived the war.¹³

In March 1966, Altenloh and Errelis were tried in Bielefeld, Germany, for various wartime crimes, including murder. They were found guilty as accessories to murder through their participation in the deportation of at least 3,500 people from Ghetto I in Grodno during the Aktion in February 1943 and of at least 6,500 people from the Białystok ghetto. They, respectively, received 8- and 6.5-year prison terms.¹⁴ At another major trial, which began in March 1968 in Cologne, Germany, Errelis and Wiese were accused of active participation in the persecution and deportation of the Grodno Jews. Due to insufficient evidence, Errelis was acquitted. Indicted on many separate counts of murder, Wiese received seven consecutive life sentences.

SOURCES Some of the archival documentation cited below, as well as firsthand accounts of the Grodno ghettos, can be found in Serge Klarsfeld, ed., Documents Concerning the Destruction of the Jews of Grodno 1941–1944, 6 vols. (New York: Beate Klarsfeld Foundation, 1985–1992). Published survivor accounts also are included in Dov Rabin, ed., Grodnab-Grodne (Jerusalem: Hevrat Entsiklopedyah shel galuyot, 1973); and in Grodner Opklangen (Buenos Aires), nos. 1–18 (1949–1968). Grodno survivors have authored a number of memoirs and accounts, including, in English, Alexandre Blumstein, A Little House on Mount Carmel (Portland, OR: Vallentine Mitchell, 2002); the interviews of Liza Chapnik and Bronka Klibanski, in Dalia Ofer and Lenore Weitzman, eds., Women in the Holocaust (New Haven, CT: Yale University Press, 1999); Harold Gordon, The Last Sunrise: A True Story. A Biography of a Ten-Year-Old Boy in Nazi Concentration Camps during World War Two (Salinas, CA: H&J Publishers, 1989); Daniel Klovsky, The Road from Grodno (Samara: OFORT Press, 2003); and Felix Zandman, Never the Last Journey (New York: Schocken Books, 1995).

The most comprehensive secondary account of the Grodno ghettos by Tikva Fatal-Knaani, Zo lo otah Grodnob, Kebilat Grodnob u-sevivatab ba-milhamab uva-sho'ab 1939–1943 (Jerusalem: Yad Vashem, 2001), forms the basis for the English-language “Lost Jewish Worlds—Grodno,” on the Yad Vashem Web site (www.yadvashem.org); and “Grodno ghetto,” on the Aktion Reinhard Camps Web site www.deathcamps.org.

Documentary evidence for the Grodno ghettos and the destruction of the Grodno Jewish community includes AŻIH (e.g., 204 [unnumbered, i.e., YVA, M-11/30, below] and 301 [e.g., 555, 748, 885, 1903, 2128, 4921, and 5387]); BA-L (e.g., B 162/2062-94, 14223, 14309, and 27316-19); FVA (e.g., HVT/76, 1962, and 3560); GAGO; GARF (e.g., 7021-86-40); NARA; NARB (845-1-8 and 861-1-7); IPN-Bi (old numeration, e.g., Ko-58/93); USHMM (e.g., RG-53.004M [GAGO] [7 microfilm reels], RG-10.052*01, RG-50.030*0372, RG-50.120*0074 and *0159, RG-50.378*0024, and Acc. 1995.A.653); VHF (e.g., # 715, 959, 6485, 19914, 23708, 25406, and 34555); and YVA (e.g., M-11/30 [also at AŻIH, 204], M-11/B, O-3/6588, and O-33/297, 303, 2434, and 6815).

Katrin Reichelt, Avinoam Patt, and Laura Crago

NOTES

1. Klovsky, The Road, pp. 26–31.
2. Liza Chapnik, “The Grodno Ghetto and Its Underground: A Personal Narrative,” in Ofer and Weitzman, Women in the Holocaust, p. 114.
3. Klarsfeld, Documents, 4:60 and 5:331, 438–446.
4. Zandman, Never, pp. 60–61.
5. Stanisław Mączka, ed., Żydzi polscy w KL Auschwitz: Wykazy imienne (Warsaw: ŻIH, 2004), pp. 105–107, 119, providing the low and official estimates.
6. Zandman, Never, pp. 60, 64–75.
7. Mączka, Żydzi polscy, pp. 155–161.
8. With Mordechai Tenenboim-Tamarof, Dappin min ha-Delekhah, 2nd ed. (Jerusalem: Yad Vashem, 1984), p. 23, noting three underground members killed for attacking Streblow.
9. Compare Klarsfeld, Documents, 5:121–122, 443–445, and Fatal-Knaani, Zo lo otah Grodnob, p. 206.
10. YVA, O-33/287, testimony of Eliezer Kaminski, in English translation on the Lida ShtetLinks page, at jewishgen.org; and YVA, M-41/141-70632, Matrosov partisan accounts.
11. Emanuel Ringelblum, Polish-Jewish Relations during the Second World War, ed. Joseph Kermish et al., trans. Danuta Dabrowska et al. (repr., Evanston, IL: Northwestern University Press, 1992), pp. 239–240.
12. Klovsky, The Road, pp. 48–85.
13. GARF, 8114-1-964, includes a list of 147 Jewish survivors from Grodno.
14. Klarsfeld, Documents, vols. 4 and 5.

GRODZISK (AKA GRODZISK KOŁO SIEMIATYCZ)

Pre-1939: Grodzisk, village, Bielski Podlaski powiat, Białystok województwo, Poland; 1939–1941: Gorodisk, Bransk raion, Belostok oblast', Belorussian SSR; 1941–1944: Grodzisk, Kreis Bielsk, Distrikt Białystok; post-1998: Siemiatycze powiat, województwo podlaskie, Poland

VOLUME II: PART A

Grodzisk lies 44 and 93.5 kilometers (about 27 and 58 miles) southwest of Bielsk Podlaski and Białystok, respectively. Before World War II, it was a private estate. In 1921, 34 Jews lived there.

The Germans occupied Grodzisk for a few days in September 1939 before evacuating it for Soviet occupation.

The Germans retook Grodzisk a few days after June 22, 1941. They initially established an outpost of the Siemiatycze Gendarmerie to administer and patrol the area around Grodzisk. According to Polish documentation, from the Main Commission for the Investigation of Hitlerite Crimes (OKBZH) in Białystok, the men responsible for the Jews in Grodzisk before May 1942 were Jan Jaczewski, Jan Aleksiejuk, Jozef Kobus, Jozef Wojciuk, Konstanty Balejko, and Bazyli Bale[j]ko.¹ By the spring of 1942, a regular Gendarmerie post had been created in Grodzisk. Among those assigned there from May 1942 were Wiktor Waloch, Jozef Koletschke, and three additional men, surnamed Matt [or Mott], Gertsman, and Kall [or Kahl or Kohl].² Shortly after the Gendarmerie post was created, an Amtskommissariat was established in Grodzisk. It was led by a person surnamed Klein.

In May 1942, the Grodzisk Amtskommissar ordered a formal ghetto established. Its terrain consisted of one house, on a half hectare (about 1.2 acres) of land. The Polish postwar documentation does not mention whether the ghetto was open or closed.³ However, it seems likely the ghetto was closed, as several survivors from other ghettos in Kreis Bielsk note the Kreiskommissar, in the spring of 1942, ordered the establishment of closed ghettos in the Kreis.⁴ Klein, the Amtskommissar, oversaw the ghetto.

About 40 Jews resided in the Grodzisk ghetto. They labored in workshops established in the ghetto and in agricultural work outside the ghetto. The Germans provided neither rations nor food to ghetto residents; rather, they expected the Grodzisk Jews to use their own resources to locate and purchase food.⁵

In late October 1942, the Germans ordered the Grodzisk ghetto liquidated. At the command of the Gendarmes from the Grodzisk precinct, local peasants brought their carts to the ghetto to transport the Jews to the ghetto in Siemiatycze, located about 17.4 kilometers (10.8 miles) west-southwest of Grodzisk. There the Grodzisk Jews shared the fate of the Siemiatycze Jews. They were sent to their deaths at the Treblinka extermination camp in two railway deportations, the first on November 4 or 8 and the second on November 10 or 11.⁶ Almost all the approximately 5,500 people in the two transports were gassed immediately upon arrival at Treblinka. Only about 152 men from the second Siemiatycze transport were held back for labor at the Treblinka I labor camp. It is not known whether any Grodzisk Jews were among the prisoners. The only 2 survivors were from Siemiatycze.⁷

Szajko Kajlis (Kejles), the only Grodzisk Jew known to have escaped from the Siemiatycze ghetto before its liquidation, sought shelter with the local population and later in a bunker in a local forest.⁸

After the deportation, Gendarmes in Grodzisk ordered the ghetto effaced. They commanded its only house be demolished.⁹

The Gendarmes searched regularly for Jews who had evaded the November 1942 liquidation of Distrikt Białystok's provincial ghettos. In 1942, they shot dead three Jews in the forest near the villages of Porzeziny-Mendle and Kosianka-Trojanówka. Because the Gendarmes had extricated the victims from hiding places in Grodzisk, OKBZH investigators in Białystok concluded they were escapees of the liquidation of the Grodzisk ghetto.¹⁰

Whether Kajlis or any other member of the Grodzisk Jewish community survived the war is unknown.

SOURCES Documentary evidence about the Jewish community of Grodzisk during the Holocaust is located at IPN (e.g., ASG, SOB 331); IPN-Bi (e.g., 1/236, 1/1030, S-33/68); and USHMM (RG-15.019M [IPN] 46/47).

Laura Crago and Monika Tomkiewicz

NOTES

1. IPN-Bi, 1/236, vol. 1, p. 10. The Polish documentation suggests the men were Gendarmes; it is possible also that they were members of an auxiliary police unit directly subordinated to the German Gendarmerie in Siemiatycze.

2. Ibid., p. 114.

3. IPN (also USHMM, RG-15.019M), reel 14, 46/47, pp. 1–2.

4. See, for example, AŻIH, 301/1463, testimony of Jehoszua (Joszua) Kejles, pp. 1–3, in Polish trans. in Paweł Machcewicz and Krzysztof Persak, eds., Wokół Jedwabnego, vol. 2, Dokumenty (Warsaw: IPN and KŚZpNP, 2002), p. 335.

5. USHMM, RG-15.019M, reel 14, 46/47, pp. 1–2.

6. With different dates for the deportations provided in AŻIH, 301/4086, testimony of Kalman Krawiec (Saul Kuperhand), p. 1 (Polish trans.); AŻIH, 301/1463, in Machcewicz and Persak, Wokół Jedwabnego, 2:334–336.

7. Saul Kuperhand, “Escape from Treblinka,” in Miriam Kuperhand and Saul Kuperhand, Shadows of Treblinka (Urbana: University of Illinois Press, 1998), pp. 104–142, 173–174; AŻIH, 301/4086, pp. 1–73; VHF, # 7713, testimony of Binyamin Rock.

8. IPN-Bi, 1/236, vol. 1, pp. 90–91 (deposition, Jan Prokopiuk, January 8, 1976).

9. USHMM, RG-15.019M, reel 14, 46/47, p. 1.

10. IPN-Bi, 1/236, vol. 1, pp. 33–34.

INDURA

Pre-1939: Indura (Yiddish: Amdur), village, Grodno powiat, Białystok województwo, Poland; 1939–1941: Grodno raion, Belostok oblast', Belorussian SSR; 1941–1944: Kreis Sokolka, Distrikt Białystok; post-1991: Hrodna raen and voblasts', Republic of Belarus

Indura lies about 25 kilometers (15.5 miles) south of Grodno. In 1921, its Jewish population stood at 1,709. With the outbreak of World War II, and the subsequent occupation of Indura by the Red Army shortly after September 17, 1939, refugees from German-occupied Poland likely brought the Jewish population to around 2,500.

A Wehrmacht unit occupied Indura within days of the German invasion of the Soviet Union on June 22, 1941. The local military command likely made forced labor compulsory for all Jews, as 3 Jews are known to have been murdered in late June or early July for reporting late to a labor assignment. The bodies of the victims were tied with barbed wire to telegraph poles to remind the Jewish community of the penalties for defying German orders. In July, an SS unit from Grodno arrived in Indura and ordered all the Jews expelled from their homes and assembled at a meadow outside the town. The SS took away 33 men and executed them.¹ The SS likely also issued a series of anti-Jewish decrees, including prohibitions on leaving the borders of the town without permission and mandates to wear yellow identifying marks, on the chest and back. German authorities appointed a collaborationist local administration, led by Mayor Bronisław Chmielewski.²

German authorities ordered the appointment of a Jewish Council (Judenrat). One of the council members was a local teacher, surnamed Gutman. A Jewish police force, commanded by Jozef Karlinski, also was appointed.

With the establishment of a German civilian administration in Indura in the late summer or early fall of 1941, local German authorities ordered a ghetto established. The order likely was issued before the Jewish community of Grodno was confined to a ghetto on November 1, 1941, as Grodno survivors mention that by then the Jewish communities in the smaller towns and settlements near Grodno, including in Indura, already had been confined to ghettos.³

By November 1942, the Indura ghetto population was composed largely of women and children.⁴ Some of the remaining men had been conscripted for forced labor. Feivel Wolf, a survivor of the Krynki ghetto, who had lived in Indura with his sister during the Soviet occupation, notes in his testimony that 50 Indura Jews were among at least 300 Jews conscripted from a number of nearby ghettos and settlements in the spring of 1942 for road and agricultural labor in the southern part of Kreis Grodno. The Indura conscripts lived in a large school close to Massalany (or Masalany), near Wielkie Ejsymonty. They worked on widening and paving the road from Massalany to Łunna-Wola.⁵

In preparation for the liquidation of the provincial Jewish communities of Distrikt Białystok, the Germans on either November 1 or 2, 1942, drove to the Indura ghetto the Jews of Odelsk, a small Jewish community, about 10 kilometers (6.2 miles) west of Indura.⁶ Likely included in the Odelsk expulsion were Jews from a number of other nearby communities, including the residents of the Jewish agricultural settlement Kolonja (or Kolonia) Izaaka, located 1.5 kilometers (0.9 mile) southwest of Odelsk. (In 1921, the Odelsk Jewish population had numbered 164. In 1931, 139 Jews had lived in Kolonja Izaaka.) Although the documentation for the inclusion of Jews from Kolonja Izaaka in the Odelsk expulsion to Indura is sparse, evidence from other parts of Distrikt Białystok and subsequent events in Indura suggest that SS commanders in charge of the liquidation Aktion consolidated nearby Jewish communities and expelled them together to a number of transit camps or larger ghettos closer to railway stations to facilitate their expulsion to the region's killing centers.

On November 1, 1942, German security officers, Gendarmes, and Polish auxiliary police also had rounded up the remaining 300 Jews still working in the southern part of Kreis Grodno, including the approximately 50 former residents of the Indura ghetto. Held overnight in Massalany, the captives were driven early the next morning towards Indura.

Early in the morning of November 2, 1942, the Germans liquidated the Indura ghetto by expelling the Jews of Indura, Odelsk, and Kolonja Izaaka to a transit camp, located just south of Grodno, at Kielbasin; 2 Jews were shot, either during the expulsion Aktion or in the days following it.⁷ About 5 kilometers (3.1 miles) outside of Indura, the 300 Massalany prisoners were joined to the Indura prisoners. The two groups, a total of about 2,800 people, were driven together to the Kielbasin transit camp.⁸

The Germans also used the Indura ghetto to carry out the expulsion of the Jews of Krynki, a town located 25 kilometers (15.5 miles), by road, south-southwest of Indura. Because more than 60 kilometers (37.3 miles) separated Krynki from the Kielbasin transit camp, the SS commander in charge of the Krynki deportation halted the forced march in Indura on the evening of November 2, 1942. The Wolf testimony, which mentions that upon reaching Indura, "the Krynki Jews spent the night in the emptied ghetto," is one of only two known sources to mention the existence of the Indura ghetto.⁹

At Kielbasin, some of the Indura Jews debated their subsequent fate, particularly from November 9, 1942, when the Germans began sending the 22,000 to 28,000 inmates to the Auschwitz and Treblinka extermination camps. Some Indura Jews believed the dire circumstances at the transit camp suggested the Germans were sending the Jews not to labor, as they claimed, but to their deaths. However, most contemplating escape from Kielbasin came under pressure from family members not to abandon them. As a result, less than a handful of Indura Jews fled from the transit camp.¹⁰ Days after the Krynki Jews were expelled from Kielbasin, the Indura community, either on November 17 or 27, also was driven to the train station at Łosośna and ordered onto trains destined for Treblinka.¹¹ (The Indura Jews are presumed to have been murdered at Treblinka, because no documentation in Auschwitz records exists to indicate that they were sent there.) A similar absence of Auschwitz documentation for the Jews of Odelsk and Kolonja Izaaka suggests they, too, were sent to Treblinka. Because neither community was among the handful of communities known to have been at Kielbasin after the Indura deportation, they were sent to Treblinka on an earlier transport. The Jews from Indura, Odelsk, and Kolonja Izaaka all were gassed on arrival at Treblinka.

SOURCES The only known eyewitness accounts to touch on Jewish life in Indura during the German occupation and subsequently at Kielbasin remain the testimonies of Fajwel (or Feivel) Wolf, including at AŽIH, 301/3600, cited below, and “The Struggle for Survival (from Krynki until Kelbasin),” in Dov Rabin, ed., Pinkas Krinki (Tel Aviv: ha-Irgunim shel yots’e Krinki bi-Medinat Yi’sra’el uva-tefutsot, 1970). The Krynki yizkor book is available in a complete English translation, by Dora Rytman and Judie Goldstein, at www.jewishgen.org/yizkor/Krynki/krynki.html.

Important, too, are the relevant entries in Shmuel Spector and Bracha Freundlich, eds., Pinkas ha-kebilot. Encyclopaedia of Jewish Communities: Poland, vol. 8, Vilna, Białystok, Nowogródek (Jerusalem: Yad Vashem, 2005), pp. 93–94 (Odelsk), pp. 132–135 (Indura), and pp. 544–546 (Kolonja Izaaka). English translations of the Odelsk and Kolonja Izaaka entries, by Irwin Keller, are available under the links section on the Kolonja Izaaka ShtetLinks page, also authored by Keller, at www.shtetlinks.jewishgen.org/Kolonja/links.html. The ShtetLinks page details the challenges of documenting the wartime fate of the Jewish community of Kolonja Izaaka and the wartime and postwar destruction of the settlement. Because the available documentation is so sparse, it is impossible to determine whether the Germans during World War II confined the Jews of Kolonja Izaaka and Odelsk to ghettos.

Documentation pertaining to the Jewish communities of Indura, Odelsk, and Kolonja Izaaka under the World War II German occupation includes AŽIH (301/3600); GAGO (e.g., 1-1-280, p. 80); GARF (7021-86-39, pp. 2 verso, 10, and 73); NARB (845-1-8, pp. 48–49, 861-1-7, p. 7 verso, and 861-1-8); and USHMM (RG-22.002M [GARF], reel 13, 7021-86-39, and RG-53.002M [NARB], reel 5, 845-1-8, reel 7, 861-1-8, and RG-53.004M [GAGO], e.g., 1-1-280).

Laura Crago

NOTES

1. Wolf, “The Struggle,” pp. 280–281.
2. USHMM, RG-53.004M (GAGO), reel 3, 1-1-280, p. 80.
3. See, for example, Daniel Klovsky, The Road from Grodno (Samara: OFORT Press, 2003), p. 24.
4. USHMM, RG-53.002M (NARB), reel 5, 845-1-8, pp. 48–49.
5. Wolf, “The Struggle,” p. 283.
6. Ibid.
7. USHMM, RG-22.002M (GARF), reel 13, 7021-86-39, pp. 2 verso and 10.
8. Wolf, “The Struggle,” p. 284; and USHMM, RG-53.002M, reel 5, 845-1-8, p. 49.
9. Wolf, “The Struggle,” p. 284.
10. Ibid., pp. 287–288.
11. The Indura deportation date is dependent on two varying dates provided for the Krynki expulsion, in Wolf, “The Struggle,” p. 287; and Lola Wolf-Resnick, “The Downfall of the Jewish Community of Krynki,” in Rabin, Pinkas Krinki, p. 272.

JANÓW SOKÓLSKI

Pre-1939: Janów (Yiddish: Yanova), village, Sokółka powiat, Białystok województwo, Poland; 1939–1941: Ianov, Sokulka raion, Belostok oblast’, Belorussian SSR; 1941–1944: Janow,

Kreis Sokolka, Distrikt Bialystok; post-1998: Janów, województwo podlaskie, Poland

Janów lies 49 kilometers (30.4 miles) north of Białystok and 24.5 kilometers (15.2 miles) west-northwest of Sokółka. Because its name is shared with many other towns and villages in Poland, it usually is referred to as Janów Sokółski, for the Sokółka powiat in which it is located. In 1921, its Jewish population stood at 1,027.

In World War II, the Germans initially occupied Janów but soon evacuated the town to make way for the Red Army, shortly after September 17, 1939. Under the Soviet occupation, the Jewish population grew, perhaps to 2,500, as refugees from German-occupied Poland settled there.¹ With the German invasion of the Soviet Union on June 22, 1941, many Janów Jews sought shelter in larger, nearby towns, including Sokółka and Suchowola.

The Germans reoccupied Janów on June 26, 1941. They imposed a number of anti-Jewish decrees, including prohibitions on walking on sidewalks and mandates to wear yellow distinguishing marks on clothing. They made forced labor obligatory. The Germans ordered the establishment of a Judenrat. It largely organized the Jewish community to meet German demands for forced labor. It is not known whether the Jews were subjected to either popular or SS antisemitic violence in the summer of 1941, as happened in many other places in Distrikt Bialystok, including in Korycin, located 11.3 kilometers (7 miles) west-southwest of Janów, where members of an auxiliary police force terrorized the Jewish population for two months before the establishment of a German civil administration at the end of August.² Postwar Polish documentation for Janów notes only that between June 1941 and 1943 the SS together with Gendarmes assigned to the village murdered 13 of its Polish and Jewish residents.³

The Germans also established a ghetto in Janów. In the first days of the occupation, military authorities prohibited Jews from living under the same roof as local Christians or from maintaining contact with them. With the establishment of a Gendarmerie post at the end of August or perhaps in early autumn 1941, the Jews were expelled from their homes and moved into a separate residential quarter or an open ghetto.⁴ Because the housing in the ghetto was not adequate to accommodate everyone, the Germans, in September, deported a substantial part of the Janów community to Suchowola. Based on a testimony of a survivor, historian Szymon Datner concluded that 1,500 Jews from Janów were sent to the Suchowola ghetto. However, another survivor places the Janów ghetto population at 1,600, a figure that suggests that less than 800 people were expelled to Suchowola.⁵

The Janów ghetto was never enclosed by a fence. However, its Jewish residents were not permitted to leave the ghetto without special permission. The Jewish quarter was guarded closely by German Gendarmes and members of a local Polish auxiliary police force. Even after the expulsions, overcrowded conditions remained. Three or four families crowded into the small houses located in the ghetto. Resulting problems with sanitation gave way to a typhus epidemic. Morbidity was high. In the spring of 1942, the Jews were conscripted for forced labor on the Janów-to-Sokółka road construction project, mostly on the road between Janów and Korycin. Filipowicz, the Polish supervisor of the Jewish labor brigade, routinely beat the prisoners with a rubber truncheon. Blows he inflicted led to the death of Szolem Tawaliński.⁶ A small number of Jews, employed by local Christians through the German labor board, were permitted to live outside the ghetto, usually in the barns or workshops of their employers.⁷

On November 2, 1942, the Germans, including SS troops and Gendarmes, with assistance from local Polish auxiliary policemen, surrounded the Janów ghetto in preparation for its liquidation. The Jews were told they were being sent to a labor camp, with much better material conditions, and given two hours to pack their belongings and to report to the market square. Several people took advantage of the packing period to hide or to escape. Some of the fugitives fled to Jasionówka to seek refuge in the ghetto there.⁸ At the market square, the women and children were loaded into carts, and the men were ordered to follow behind on foot. The Jews were brought first to the Sokółka ghetto. On November 5, they were marched, together with almost all of the Sokółka Jewish community, about 38 kilometers (23.6 miles) to a transit camp, located in Kiełbasin, a former estate outside of Grodno. The Korycin Jews, a community for which little documentation exists, also were rounded up on November 2, 1942, and marched, via the Suchowola ghetto, to the Kiełbasin transit camp.

At Kiełbasin, the Janów Jews were reunited with family members, who earlier had sought refuge in Sokółka or had been expelled to the Suchowola ghetto. (With the exception of about 600 Jews from the Sokółka ghetto and 250 to 350 Jews from the Krynki ghetto, the Germans, between November 2 and 5, 1942, had concentrated all of the Jews of Kreis Sokolka at the Kiełbasin transit camp.) The Janów community lived there in terrible conditions for five or six weeks. Most sources note the Janów Jews were sent in mid-December to the Treblinka death camp. However, a survivor remembers the Janów community among those sent, on December 5, with his community, Łunna, to the Auschwitz death camp.⁹ The Korycin community likely was sent to Auschwitz, in a different transport, which arrived on November 14 at Birkenau.

Only two Janów Jews are believed to have survived the war. Abram Lipcer (or Lipzer) jumped from the train taking the Janów Jews to their deaths. He made his way back to the Janów area, to Trofimówka village, where he was given shelter by Waław Andresiewicz (or perhaps Andrusiewicz). (Lipcer and his family had assisted Andresiewicz during the Soviet occupation; the Pole, in turn, had employed Lipcer as an agricultural laborer during the German occupation, enabling him to live outside the ghetto.) The second survivor, Abraham Kantorowski, though born in Janów, had resided in the Sokółka ghetto.¹⁰ There were four survivors known from Korycin.

SOURCES The existing documentary material for Korycin, including AŻIH, 301/1251, remains too sparse to determine whether a ghetto existed there.

Two testimonies appear in Paweł Machcewicz and Krzysztof Persak, eds., Wokół Jedwabnego, 2 vols. (Warsaw: IPN and KŚZpNP, 2002), vol. 2, Dokumenty, pp. 244–245 (AŻIH, 301/1251, orig. Polish), and pp. 218–222 (AŻIH, 301/3518, Polish trans.).

Secondary sources include Shmuel Spector and Bracha Freundlich, eds., Pinkas ha-kehillot. Encyclopaedia of Jewish Communities: Poland, vol. 8, Vilna, Białystok, Nowogródek (Jerusalem: Yad Vashem, 2005), pp. 369–371 (Janów Sokółski) and pp. 548–549 (Korycin); and its English-language counterpart, Arnon Rubin, The Rise and Fall of Jewish Communities in Poland and Their Relics Today, vol. 1, District Białystok (Tel Aviv: Tel Aviv University Press, 2006), pp. 85–87 (Janów Sokółski) and pp. 113–115 (Korycin). Though more cursory, also useful, particularly for population and deportation figures, are Szymon Datner, “Eksterminacja ludności żydowskiej w Okręgu Białostockim,” BŻIH, no. 60:47 (tab. 7, 1966.); and Czesław Pilichowski et al., eds., Obozy hitlerowskie na ziemiach polskich 1939–1945: Informator encyklopedyczny (Warsaw: PWN, 1979), p. 203.

Archival documentation on the World War II history of the Janów Sokółski and Korycin Jewish communities under German occupation can be found at AŻIH (e.g., Ankiety [un-numbered], 204 and 301/391, 1251, 1260, and 3518); IPN-Bi (e.g., old numeration, S [e.g., 5/79, 12/79, 13/79, 609/71 (Korycin)]); USHMM (RG-15.019M [IPN], reel 1, 1/197, and reel 14, 46/83); and YVA (e.g., M-11/198 and M-11B/132).

Laura Crago

NOTES

1. AŻIH, 301/1251, testimony of Samuel Goldberg, p. 1.
2. Ibid.
3. USHMM, RG-15.019M (IPN), ASG, reel 1, 1/197, pp. 1–2.
4. Ibid., reel 14, 46/83, pp. 1–2, reported no ghetto; but on the basis of subsequent responses by postwar officials in Janów to the Ankiety questionnaire, a still unnumbered collection, at AŻIH, Polish historians subsequently have described the Jewish quarter as a ghetto. See Pilichowski et al., Obozy, p. 203.
5. Compare Datner, “Eksterminacja,” p. 47 (tab. 7); and AŻIH, 301/1251, pp. 1–2.
6. AŻIH, 301/1251, p. 2; and 301/1260, testimony of Abram Lipcer (or Lipzer), p. 2.
7. Ibid., 301/1260, p. 2.
8. Ibid., pp. 1–2; and 301/3518, testimony of Szymon Złotoryński, in Machcewicz and Persak, Wokół Jedwabnego, 2: 220.
9. Testimony of Eliezer Eisenschmidt, information from Ruth Marcus to Laura Crago, March 2009.
10. AŻIH, 301/391, testimony of Abraham Kantorowski, pp. 1–4.

JASIONÓWKA

Pre-1939: Jasionówka, town, Białystok województwo, Poland; 1939–1941: Yashinovka, Belostok oblast', Belorussian SSR;

1941–1944: Jasionówka, Kreis Białystok, Distrikt Białystok; post-1998: Jasionówka, Mónki powiat, województwo podlaskie, Poland

Jasionówka is located 32 kilometers (20 miles) north-northwest of Białystok. In 1897, the Jewish population was 1,154 (of a total population of 1,565). In 1939, on the eve of World War II, there were more than 1,500 Jews living in Jasionówka.¹ In September 1939, German forces briefly occupied the town before retreating to make way for the Soviet occupying forces. The Jews greeted the Red Army warmly as liberators at this time.

German forces again occupied the town on June 27, 1941, five days after the start of their invasion of the Soviet Union. In the summer of 1941, a German military commandant's office (Ortskommandantur) controlled the town, but by the fall of 1941, authority had been transferred to a German civil administration. Initially, Jasionówka was governed by the Amtskommissar in Knyszyn, but in June 1942 it became an administrative center with its own Amtskommissar within Kreis Białystok. In Jasionówka, the Germans established a Polish auxiliary police commanded initially by Leon Kownacki, which in the fall of 1941 became subordinated to the Gendarmerie post in Knyszyn.

Around the time of the German arrival in Jasionówka, local antisemites and German soldiers staged a pogrom lasting several days, during which at least 70 Jews were killed and many Jewish houses were robbed and burned. Torah scrolls were taken from the synagogue and burned. The pleas of the local priest Cyprian Łozowski for the looting to stop went unheeded.² In July 1941, during the course of a series of raids conducted by the Security Police assisted by local collaborators, around 50 additional Jews and Belorussians, mainly from among the more established citizens, were arrested and shot.³ A local Polish schoolteacher named Władysław Grodzki was appointed to run the town and assisted the Germans in selecting young Jews to be shot, sometimes releasing them in return for a hefty bribe.⁴ Jews were also made to perform forced labor, which initially comprised the clearing up of rubble and construction work. After work, the Jewish forced laborers were on occasion forced to undress, sing, and dance.⁵

As most of the houses had been burned, the Jews were forced to move together into a few buildings, living in very overcrowded conditions. The Jews also elected a Jewish Council (Judenrat) of seven persons, which tried to appease the authorities with bribes. By 1942, Szloma Szuster, the owner of a tannery, was appointed as its head. There was no Jewish police force, but messengers were used to assist with the implementation of German orders. Jews were not permitted to trade with the local peasants and were supposed to survive on meager rations that were much less than those distributed to non-Jews. The Judenrat also organized forced labor, which included work on the surrounding farms as well as in the remaining factories and workshops in the town. The Amtskommissar and the German Gendarmerie in Knyszyn demanded frequent contributions in money, gold, furs, and clothing from the Jews.⁶

At the end of 1941, a large group of Jews, mostly refugees from other places, were expelled to Suchowola, about 10 kilometers (6.2 miles) to the north. Around this time, Jews were obliged to wear white armbands bearing the Star of David; after two months these were exchanged for yellow patches to be worn on the chest and back. The Jewish community experienced several scares during the summer of 1942, especially after the arrest of David Stolar for alleged anti-German activity. This caused the Jews of Jasionówka to flee the town briefly in July, as they feared the Germans would kill them. After this, many families prepared hiding places or made arrangements with local peasants, in case of an Aktion. In the late summer of 1942, a squad of four German Gendarmes was also stationed in Jasionówka, which resulted in raids on Jewish houses and closer German supervision.⁷

In the fall of 1942, an order was issued to the German Amtskommissar in Jasionówka for the establishment of a ghetto there. The order was difficult to implement, as large parts of the town had burned in 1941, and the Jews were already living with four or five families in each house. The Amtskommissar designated the ghetto be established in a small area near the monastery. The Jewish Council attempted to defer this order due to the serious effects on hygiene that would result from concentrating 250 families into this small space. However, the Jewish Council expected in any case that the Jasionówka ghetto would soon be dissolved and the inhabitants evacuated, as they learned from Jewish resistance forces in Białystok that the Germans planned to liquidate most ghettos in the region in November 1942.⁸

In early November 1942, a number of Jews from the surrounding villages were brought into the Jasionówka "ghetto," which was now designated as a labor camp (Arbeitslager). The Amtskommissar claimed that his intervention had assisted in having the Jews of Jasionówka temporarily spared from the evacuations that had struck most other Jewish communities nearby. In exchange for further bribes, the Jewish Council

Soldiers of the Waffen-SS and the Wehrmacht confront Jews who have been rounded up in Jasionówka, June 28, 1941.

USHMM WS #32525, COURTESY OF DHM

was even able to accept some 400 Jewish refugees who came to Jasionówka, having escaped from the Aktions in the surrounding towns.⁹

In January 1943, the Jews took heart from news of the German defeat at Stalingrad, and young Jews began to plan armed resistance, as they expected a deportation Aktion. Then, on January 24–25, 1943, a force of some 300 German police and their collaborators surrounded the town. The Aktion was organized by the head of the Security Police in Białystok, Dr. Wilhelm Altenloh. All the Jews (some 2,000 people) were rounded up and assembled on the market square. Then they were transported on sleighs to the Knyszyn railway station and loaded into railway wagons. About 30 Jews were killed on the spot in Jasionówka during the Aktion. Initially the trains reached Białystok after three days. The prisoners received neither food nor water. From here, most Jews were deported to the extermination camp at Treblinka, although one group selected for work was sent to a labor camp in Częstochowa.¹⁰ On the way to Treblinka, about 300 Jews managed to escape by jumping from the railway wagons.

In addition, about 100 Jews hid in bunkers in Jasionówka during the roundup. Bernhard Schuster described their situation:

After most of the Jews were taken away from Jasionówka, an eerie silence fell upon the town. Now and then the silence was broken by shots fired at Jews who had been hiding and were trying to flee town under cover of darkness. We stayed in the hiding place for two days and two nights, without food or warm clothing, but could stay there no longer. We decided to make a run for it, two at a time, until we reached the woods where we planned to meet up and go to the farmer who had promised to give us shelter.

Unfortunately, Schuster's mother and youngest sister, Tzipe, did not make it past the armed guards.¹¹ Some of the escapees subsequently found shelter with Polish peasants, survived in the forests, or smuggled their way into the Białystok ghetto, where they shared the fate of the Jews there. However, the majority of those who escaped and hid were soon captured and killed by the Germans and their collaborators, many being betrayed by local peasants. Only a few local inhabitants, such as Józef and Waleria Kownacki and Stefan and Józefa Gołębicki, risked their lives to hide Jews at this time.¹²

After the Red Army drove out the German occupation forces in August 1944, about 80 Jewish survivors returned to Jasionówka. The Germans and local inhabitants had taken virtually all their property. The survivors soon left Jasionówka and also Poland for Palestine (Israel) and other countries in the West.¹³

SOURCES Information on the Jewish community of Jasionówka and its fate under German occupation can be found in the following publications: Bernhard Schuster, I Will Die Tomorrow But Not Today: Memoirs of Bernhard (Berl) Schuster

(Rochester, NY: Winterman Ink, 2002); Czesław Pilichowski et al., eds., Obozy hitlerowskie na ziemiach polskich 1939–1945: Informator encyklopedyczny (Warsaw: PWN, 1979), p. 205; and Shmuel Spector and Bracha Freundlich, eds., Pinkas ha-kehilot. Encyclopaedia of Jewish Communities: Poland, vol. 8, Vilna, Białystok, Nowogródek (Jerusalem: Yad Vashem, 2005), pp. 372–374.

Documentation on the extermination of the Jews of Jasionówka can be found in the following archives: AŻIH (301/1274, 1466, 4923); IPN (e.g., “Ob,” syg. 177; SAB 49; SOB 47, 50, and 366; SWB 242 and 243); IPN-Bi (e.g., 20/67, S-267/58, 3/126, 3/127); StA-Det (D21A, No. 6252); USHMM (1996.A.0100; and RG-10.055*01 [English trans. of AŻIH, 301/1274]); VHF (# 7458, 17143, 21899, and 48379); and YVA (e.g., M-11/58, 150, 197-98 and B104).

Alexander Kruglov and Martin Dean
trans. Steven Seegel

NOTES

1. AŻIH, 301/1274, testimony of Fajga Szuster-Rozenblum, November 24, 1945; and 301/4923, testimony of Bernard Jehoschua, May 28, 1945.

2. Ibid., 301/1274, 4923, and 1466, testimony of Szloma Szuster and Izrael Goniadzki, October 17, 1944; Schuster, I Will Die Tomorrow, p. 26.

3. AŻIH, 301/1274. IPN, SOB 47, case of Antoni Forenciewicz (1945–1950), who was acquitted, indicates that 150 Jews were killed on the first day of German occupation (June 27 or 28, 1941) and 40 Jews and Belorussians one week later.

4. In 1950, Grodzki was tried for participating, as a member of the Polish auxiliary police in Jasionówka and from 1943 as the town's police commander, in the murder of several Jewish Communists in a nearby forest, as well as in the murder of other Jews. He was sentenced to death and executed. See IPN, SAB 49, case of Władysław Grodzki (1947–1959).

5. AŻIH, 301/4923; USHMM, RG-10.055*01 (English trans. of AŻIH, 301/1274).

6. AŻIH, 301/4923.

7. USHMM, RG-10.055*01; Schuster, I Will Die Tomorrow, p. 29, includes a sketch of the hiding place prepared by his family over the tannery they owned.

8. AŻIH, 301/1274, p. 14; Pilichowski et al., Obozy hitlerowskie, p. 205; AŻIH, 301/1466, however, states that there was no ghetto in Jasionówka.

9. AŻIH, 301/1274.

10. Pilichowski et al., Obozy hitlerowskie, p. 205; AŻIH, 301/4923; Schuster, I Will Die Tomorrow, p. 31.

11. Schuster, I Will Die Tomorrow, p. 33.

12. Israel Gutman, ed., The Encyclopedia of the Righteous among the Nations: Rescuers of Jews during the Holocaust—Poland (Jerusalem: Yad Vashem, 2004), p. 392.

13. AŻIH, 301/1274, 4923; Schuster, I Will Die Tomorrow, p. 35.

JEDWABNE

Pre-1939: Jedwabne (Yiddish: Yedwabne), town, Łomża powiat, Białystok województwo, Poland; 1939–1941: Edwabno, raion center, Belostok oblast', Belorussian SSR; 1941–1944: Jedwabne, Kreis Lomscha, Distrikt Białystok; post-1998: Łomża powiat, województwo podlaskie, Poland

Jedwabne lies 21 kilometers (13 miles) northeast of Łomża. Its 1921 population of 1,222 included 757 Jews, 442 Roman Catholics, and 23 Protestants.

A Wehrmacht unit briefly occupied the Jedwabne area in September 1939. The Germans deported about 300 men to East Prussian labor camps before ceding the region to Soviet occupation.

A Soviet report, from mid-1940, listed the population of the larger Edwabno raion as composed of 37,300 Poles, 1,400 Jews, and 185 Belorussians. The Jewish population figures include the residents of Jedwabne, Wizna, Przytuły, and Radziłów. The survey recorded a population for the Edwabno sel'sovet, composed of Jedwabne and its surrounding villages, of 2,385, including 563 Jews, and for the Vizna sel'sovet, of 3,187, including 476 Jews. Another source claimed the 1940 population in Jedwabne proper included 1,763 Poles, 562 Jews, and 97 Belorussians. Locals remember 700 to 1,400 Jews residing in Jedwabne prior to June 22, 1941.

A Wehrmacht unit reoccupied Jedwabne by June 23, 1941. The Germans immediately established a Feldgendarmerie post (subordinated to the Wehrmacht), commanded by Hauptwachtmeister Adam, and appointed a collaborationist civilian town council, led by Mayor Marian Karolak. Other council members included Eugeniusz Śliwiecki, Józef Sobutka, Józef Wasilewski, and perhaps Karol Bardoń, also employed by the Germans as a translator. Karolak recruited a local police force.¹ Its members included Jerzy Laudański and Eugeniusz Kalinowski.

On June 25, 1941, a group of Poles, including Sobutka, Kalinowski, and Jerzy Laudański, rounded up and tortured local former Soviet administrators before turning them over to the Feldgendarmerie. The Feldgendarmes executed six of the accused, including three Jews.² Tubin Kornecki likely was among the Jewish victims. Other Jews, including Eljahu (Eliasz) Krawiecki, who was brutally tortured (according to hearsay by Sobutka), died from their injuries.³ Chaja Kubrzańska and Basia Binsztejn, whose husbands had evacuated with Soviet troops, drowned their children and themselves, rather than fall into Polish hands.⁴

After the local priest ordered the violence to cease, insisting the Germans would soon settle accounts with the Jews, Jedwabne became a refuge for many local Jews. When, on June 26, 1941, the Polish civil head (wójt) ordered the Jewish residents of Wizna expelled, supposedly because of extensive war devastation there, about 230 to 240 Wizna Jews sought shelter in Jedwabne. (That day, or perhaps during two visits, a small SS unit, of one to six men, had executed about 50 Jewish men in Wizna.)⁵ Refugees also arrived from Radziłów, where on July 7 local Polish collaborators had driven the Jews into a barn and burned them alive.

Early on July 10, 1941, a small (two- to eight-man) German unit, likely from the SS, arrived in Jedwabne to order the Jews to assemble at the town square, ostensibly for weeding duties. The unit commander and perhaps also the Feldgendarmerie commander had met earlier with Karolak and Sobutka, probably to permit the local population to settle accounts with the Jews.⁶ However, the Germans did not participate directly in the ensuing violence. Rather, Karolak had the tacit support of almost the entire non-Jewish population and is known to have mobilized directly 92 to 115 local men to drive the Jews to the square and surround them there. The Polish collaborators humiliated, raped, and beat to death some of the assembled Jews. About 50 to 70 men were forced to dismantle the Lenin statue and to carry its pieces to a nearby barn, in which the Polish collaborators beat them to death. The collaborators drove the rest of the assembled Jews to the barn, doused it with accelerant, and set it afire.

Some set the number of victims at 2,000, including 230 Wizna Jews, and others at 1,400, including refugees from Wizna and Radziłów. Until recently, the most widely accepted death toll was 1,600, likely drawn from the testimony of Szmul Wasersztejn.⁷ However, the Soviet population figures and an incomplete and controversial forensic investigation in 2002, which estimated 300 to 400 people perished in the barn, have led some to argue the fire claimed fewer lives. The number of survivors also varies, with Rywka Fogiel (Rivka Fogel) remembering 125 and Menachem Finkelsztejn, a Radziłów survivor, mentioning 302.

Although many survivors fled to Łomża and other localities, a ghetto was established within a few days to a few weeks after the fire for the rest of the survivors.⁸ Official postwar Polish documentation, from 1945, notes the ghetto was created on July 20, 1941.⁹ The date suggests the ghetto already existed before a regular Gendarmerie post (subordinated to the Order Police), commanded by Alois (August) Achilles, and a German civil administration, led by Amtskommissar Hermann Zimmermann, were established in August.

The Jedwabne ghetto occupied a 5,000-square meter (1.2-acre) area on the Old Square. It consisted of two houses, near the Gendarmerie post.

The 1945 documentation places its population at 50; a 1951 survey noted a population of 200, including 100 Jews from Stawiski.¹⁰ However, no eyewitnesses remember Jews from beyond Jedwabne ever consolidated in the ghetto. Polish eyewitnesses described its population as made up of Jedwabne Jews “who by chance had escaped” or “all Jews saved from the pogrom, who had hidden.”¹¹ Others provided figures ranging from “over 50” to “about a few hundred Jews found in the town or caught in the surrounding area.”¹²

Some Jedwabne ghetto inmates worked for the Gendarmerie, either as craftsmen or in agricultural labor. The local authorities also permitted local Poles to contract Jewish labor. About 15 ghetto inmates perished in a still not elucidated incident, described by Finkelsztejn as a “provocation” in which local Poles hung up anti-German posters and then held the Jews responsible for them.

Most eyewitnesses note the Jedwabne ghetto was dissolved from one to three months after it was established, with the fall of 1941 most often cited and November listed in the 1945 documentation as the month its residents were expelled to the Łomża ghetto.¹³ From there, they were deported on November 2, 1942, together with the Łomża Jews to a transit camp, located in Zambrów. However, survivor Izrael (Józef) Grądowski maintains the Jedwabne ghetto existed until November 2, 1942, when the Gendarmes deported its inmates to the Zambrów transit camp.¹⁴

The Jedwabne survivors at the Zambrów transit camp were sent to the Auschwitz extermination camp as a part of the four transports of Łomża Jews that arrived there on January 13, 17, 18, and 19, 1943. They almost all were gassed on arrival. The existing documentation notes that only 3 people were held back as concentration camp prisoners. Two, Mosze (Mietek) Lasko and Itzhok Yankel Neumark, survived the war. Although both men were in Jedwabne the day the community was murdered, only the first had lived in the Jedwabne ghetto. The third person, Benjamin Kosacki, perished at Auschwitz in 1942. Because his death record only notes he had resided in Szczepankowo prior to his expulsion to Zambrów, it is not possible to determine if he ever resided in the Jedwabne ghetto.

A large number of Jedwabne Jews fled from the 1942 liquidation of the Łomża and Jedwabne ghettos. Hersz Goldberg and his son sought shelter in Przestrzele village but were caught and shot dead. In Janczewo village (Jedwabne gmina, Łomża powiat), Aleksander and Antonina Wyrzykowski sheltered seven Jews, including Wasersztejn, Jakub (Jankiel) Kubrzański (Kubran), Berek and Mojżesz Olszewicz, Lejka Amrufel (Kubran), Elka Sosnowska (Olszewicz), and Izrael Grądowski.¹⁵

Avigdor Nieławicki (Kokhav) and Rywka Fogiel, both Wizna refugees in Jedwabne the day the Jews were murdered, also are counted as Jedwabne survivors. Another approximately 10 Jedwabne Jews survived the war either in the Soviet interior or the Red Army.

In 1947, Całka Migdał, a pre-war émigré from Jedwabne, demanded Polish authorities investigate the mass murder of the Jewish community. The letter prompted a criminal investigation and two trials. At the first, in 1949, 12 of the 22 accused were convicted. They received prison terms ultimately ranging from 8 to 15 years.

SOURCES The Jedwabne yizkor book, Julius L. Baker and Jacob L. Baker et al., eds., Sefer Yidvabneh: Historyah ve-zikaron (Jerusalem: Hotsa'at ya'ad yots'e Yidvabne, 1980), includes accounts by Jedwabne and Wizna survivors. Its English sections are available at jewishgen.org. Survivor Szmul Wasersztejn is the author of a separate account, Samuel Wasserstein Kahn, La denuncia: 10 de Julio de 1941 (San José, Costa Rica: Editorial Guayacán Centroamericana, 2001), published posthumously by his son. By the time of its publication, however, the documentary film Neighbors, by Agnieszka Arnold, about Polish complicity in the Jedwabne murders, had already aired on Polish television in April 2000.

It was the book by Jan T. Gross, Neighbors: The Destruction of the Jewish Community in Jedwabne Poland (Princeton, NJ: Princeton University Press, 2001), that unleashed a wide-ranging national debate in Poland and abroad, focused on events in Jedwabne, the larger question of Christian-Jewish relations during World War II, and the postwar neutralization and falsification of Polish historical memory about the war.

Representative articles from the debates, which occurred on the pages of the Polish national press, have been translated into English and compiled in a wide range of publications, including Jacek Borkowicz and Israel Gutman et al., eds., Thou Shalt Not Kill: Poles on Jedwabne (Warsaw: Więź, 2001); Antony Polonsky and Joanna B. Michlic, eds., The Neighbors Respond: The Controversy over the Jedwabne Massacre in Poland (Princeton, NJ: Princeton University Press, 2004). English translations of many other articles can be found virtually on, among others, the Web site of Pogranicze (www.pogranicze.sejny.pl), the publisher of the Polish-language edition of Neighbors, Sąsiedzi: Historia zagłady żydowskiego miasteczka (Sejny: Pogranicze, 2000); José Gutstein's Jewish community of Radziłów Web site (www.radzilow.com); and the We Remember Jewish Jedwabne! zchor Web site (www.zchor.org), with the latter including mostly English-language press coverage.

The books and Web sites almost all contain contributions by Anna Bikont, a journalist for Gazeta Wyborcza and the author of My z Jedwabnego (Warsaw: Prószyński i S-ka, 2004), which intersperses her press articles about the murder of the Jedwabne (and Radziłów) Jewish communities with a compelling diary of her experiences investigating the massacre and commemorates the Jedwabne Jewish community by physically reconstructing its topography, including details of the specific fates of its members.

Other secondary sources include Alexander B. Rossino, "Polish 'Neighbors' and German Invaders: Contextualizing Anti-Jewish Violence in the Białystok District during the Opening Weeks of Operation Barbarossa," Polin: Studies in Polish Jewry 16 (2003); and Dariusz Stola, "Jedwabne: Revisiting the Evidence and Nature of the Crime," Holocaust and Genocide Studies 17:1 (Spring 2003): 139–152, which places the murder of the Jedwabne Jewish community in the larger German context of the war in Marek Jan Chodakiewicz, The Massacre in Jedwabne, July 10, 1941: Before, During, and After (Boulder, CO: East European Monographs, 2005), is polemical but provides insight into the arguments forwarded by Gross's opponents. Unfortunately, because the relevant entry in Abraham Wein, ed., Pinkas ha-kehillot. Encyclopaedia of Jewish Communities: Poland, vol. 4, Warsaw and Its Region (Jerusalem: Yad Vashem, 1986), pp. 241–243, was written before the publication of Gross's book, it presents an earlier view of the Jedwabne massacre, which its English-language counterpart, Arnon Rubin, The Rise and Fall of the Jewish Communities in Poland and Their Relics Today, vol. 1, District Białystok (Tel Aviv: Tel Aviv University Press, 2006), pp. 92–103, 275–280, overcomes by adding English-language translations of excerpts from Bikont, My z Jedwabnego, from the IPN investigation, and from YVA, including in the latter case the documentation related to the 1976 nomination of Aleksander and Antonina Wyrzykowski as Righteous Among the Nations.

The IPN investigation, Paweł Machcewicz and Krzysztof Persak, eds., Wokół Jedwabnego, 2 vols. (Warsaw: IPN and KŚZPNP, 2002), includes in its first volume eight essays that all touch on the Jedwabne Jewish community in some way: the most detailed information about the July 10, 1941, murder included in Edmund Dmitrów, "Oddziały operacyjne niemieckiej Policji Bezpieczeństwa Służby Bezpieczeństwa a początek zagłady Żydów w Łomżyńskim i na Białostocczyźnie latem 1941 roku,” pp. 273–351; the postwar trials covered by Andrzej Rzepliński, “Ten jest z ojczyzny mojej?” pp. 353–459; the most substantive of the limited coverage about the ghetto presented at the end of the contribution, on demographics, by Marcin Urynowicz, “Ludność żydowska w Jedwabnem,” pp. 83–104; and Tomasz Szarota, “Kalendarium,” p. 470 (AŻIH, Ankiety, Jedwabne), providing a transcription, from a privately owned copy of important but lost documentation.

Documentary material for Jedwabne and the closely related community of Wizna is included in the original Polish or in Polish translation in Wokół Jedwabnego, vol. 2, Dokumenty, pp. 223–225 (AŻIH, 301/152), p. 226 (AŻIH, 301/613), pp. 227–228 (AŻIH, 301/2405), p. 339 (AŻIH, Sekretariat, January 1948, Całka Migdał to CKŻP, December 29, 1947), pp. 230–233, 236–237 (AŻIH, 301/5825), pp. 234–235 (AŻIH, 301/6064), pp. 260–262 (AŻIH, 301/1846), pp. 361–364 (AŻIH, 301/384 [Wizna]), pp. 365–366 (AŻIH, 301/4391 [Wizna]), pp. 432–712 (AAN, Sąd Najwyższy, 2/10318; IPN, III-923; SOŁ 123, excerpts), including here on pp. 434–435, 518–519 (part. and complete trans., AŻIH, 301/152), pp. 723–815 (SWB 145, excerpts), pp. 828–862 (IPN-Bi, 1/159; IPN, W-384, excerpts).

Some of the above documentation has appeared in publication, including in George Gorin et al., eds., Grayeve yisker bukh (New York: United Grayever Relief Committee, 1950), pp. 232–234 (AŻIH 301/1846, Polish); and in English translation, in Gross, Neighbors, and on the Jewish community of Radziłów Web site.

Additional archival documentation pertaining to the Jewish community of Jedwabne during World War II, under the German occupation, includes BA-L (e.g., ZStL, V 205 AR-Z 233/74 [IPN, W-384]; USHMM (RG-15.019M [IPN], 2/245, 46/62); VHF (# 31971, testimony of Avigdor Kokhav); YVA (e.g., 03/3151–3844/420).

No entry appears in this Encyclopedia for Wizna because the documentation, mostly the testimonies of Awigdor Nieławicki (Avigdor Kokhav), describes Jewish survivors employed by the German Gendarmerie eventually in Wizna but does not indicate whether they were confined to a ghetto.

Laura Crago

NOTES

1. IPN, SOŁ 123, pp. 630–632 (deposition, Julia Sokołowska, January 20, 1949).

2. Ibid., pp. 496–506 (autobiography, Bardoń, April 7, 1952); SWB 145, pp. 217–218 (deposition, Mieczysław Gerwad, July 1, 1953); III-923, pp. 158–61 (denunciation, Stanisława Wiśniewska, September 24, 1949).

3. Ibid., SWB 145, pp. 92–99 (trial protocol, testimony, Józef [(Izrael)] Grądzki, December 11, 1953); and perhaps in SOŁ 123, p. 690 (deposition, Stanisława Sielawa, January 26, 1949), which holds J. Ładański and Kalinowski responsible.

4. Compare Baker and Baker et al., Sefer Yidwabneh, p. 104 (testimony of Rivka Fogel), AŻIH, 301/152, testimony of Szmul Wasersztejn, pp. 1–6.

5. AŻIH, 301/4391, testimony of Izrael Lewin, pp. 1–5, 301/384, testimony of Awigdor Nieławicki, pp. 1–3; Bikont, My, pp. 199–209 (Kokhav interview).

6. IPN, SWB 145, pp. 238–239 (deposition, Stanisław Danowski, August 7, 1953); SOŁ 123, p. 665 (interrogation, J. Ładański, January 16, 1949).

7. AŻIH, 301/1846, testimony of Menachem Finkelsztejn, pp. 1–2; USHMM, RG-15.019M (IPN), reel 1, 2/245, pp. 1–2.

8. Compare IPN, W-384, vol. 1, pp. 35–36, 39–40 (depositions, respectively, Bolesław Olszewski and Czesław Strzelczyk, May 27, 1967), and p. 32 (deposition, Grądzki, May 27, 1967).

9. USHMM, RG-15.019M, reel 14, 46/62, pp. 1–2.

10. Compare ibid. with Machcewicz and Persak, Wokół Jedwabnego, 1:470.

11. IPN, W-384, respectively, vol. 2, pp. 4–5 (deposition, Feliks Kowalski, June 29, 1971), vol. 1, pp. 35–36.

12. Ibid., respectively, vol. 2, pp. 23–25 (deposition, Sokołowska, April 10, 1974), vol. 1, pp. 39–40.

13. Ibid., vol. 1, pp. 35–36, vol. 2, pp. 14–16 (deposition, Jan Michał Kiełczewski, April 9, 1974).

14. Ibid., vol. 1, p. 32; IPN-Bi, 1/159, pp. 125–126 (deposition, Grądzki, November 15, 1967); AŻIH, 301/1846, pp. 1–2.

15. AŻIH, 301/5825, Aleksander and Antonina Wyrzykowski Yad Vashem documentation, pp. 1–10, 301/6064, testimony of Aleksander Wyrzykowski, pp. 1–3.

JEZIORY

Pre-1939: Jeziory (Yiddish: Azher), village, Grodno powiat, Białystok województwo, Poland; 1939–1941: Ozery, Grodno raion, Belostok oblast', Belorussian SSR; 1941–1944: Jeziory, Kreis Grodno, Distrikt Białystok; post-1991: Azery, Hrodna raen and voblasts', Republic of Belarus

Jeziory, on Lake Białe, lies about 32 kilometers (20 miles) east-northeast of Grodno. In 1921, in interwar Poland (1918–1939), the 867 Jews in Jeziory comprised 49.4 percent of its population.

In World War II, Jeziory came under Soviet rule as a result of the Molotov-Ribbentrop Pact, shortly after September 20, 1939. With the German invasion of the Soviet Union on June 22, 1941, the village sustained damage from aerial bombardment. Little is known about the arrival within a few days of a German military unit. By July, the Germans had ordered the Jews in Jeziory to establish a Jewish Council (Judenrat). The Germans appointed a local civil administration, led by a mayor, and an auxiliary police force. The local administration most likely initially represented German interests, as the Jeziory mayor received directives from the Security Police in Grodno as late as September 24, 1941. Later that fall, a German civil administration was created for Jeziory, which, on October 1, was attached, with the remainder of Kreis Grodno, to Distrikt Białystok. The Jeziory Amtskommissar was Willutzki. A Gendarmerie post, under the command of Hauptwachmeister Berg, also was established there.¹

From the first day of the German invasion, Jeziory swelled with Jews fleeing German violence. The first refugees arrived after their train was bombed just outside of Jeziory. By the summer, some Jews from Porzecze, 23 kilometers (14.3

miles) to the north, fled there, most likely to escape the German mass execution of their community's men. In late September, an unknown number of refugees from Ejszyszek, about 88 kilometers (54.7 miles) to the east-northeast, also had arrived in Jeziory, having fled the mass execution of their community.

On September 24, 1941, the inspector for the outlying districts of the Gendarmerie-Kreisführer in Grodno directed civil authorities in Jeziory and in Porzecze to establish ghettos for the Jewish inhabitants of their villages.² There is no information available about the location of the Jeziory ghetto. It was fenced with barbed wire. The authorities consolidated a number of smaller communities in Jeziory, including 40 Jews from Pietkowo. Most likely sometime around May 1942, the ghetto population expanded further, as Jews either fled or were brought to the Jeziory ghetto from Nowy Dwór and Wasiliszek.³

In addition to losing their homes, the Jews in the Jeziory ghetto (and throughout Distrikt Białystok) were required to surrender to the Germans their remaining valuables, such as their fur coats and electrical appliances. Only one Jeziory Jew, Esther Rechman, officially turned in electrical appliances, handing over in July 1942 an iron and an electric heater.⁴ The Jeziory Jews worked at forestry labor, felling trees, and at agricultural labor, on local tobacco plantations. In the spring and summer of 1942, they cobbled and paved the Jeziory-to-Grodno and the Jeziory-to-Ostryna roads.⁵

The Jeziory ghetto was liquidated on November 2, 1942. The Jews were driven to the Kielbasin transit camp, just south of Grodno. An unknown number evaded the expulsion order. Perhaps to root out the fugitives, the Germans ordered a part of the ghetto burned immediately after the Jewish community's expulsion to Kielbasin. On November 3, 1942, 2 Jews were shot just outside of Jeziory. The remainder of the community, about 1,370 people, joined Jews from 22 other places (about 22,000 to 28,000 people) in the Grodno and Sokółka regions also deported to Kielbasin from November 2 to 5, 1942.⁶ They lived there in terrible conditions before being sent to the extermination camps.

Because there are few survivors from Jeziory, the details of the deportation are unknown. Some evidence indicates that the Jeziory Jews were on the first transport from Kielbasin, which arrived at the Auschwitz extermination camp on November 9, 1942. However, Jakob Tobolski, the only person on the transport born in Jeziory, may have resided in Skidel, another community on the transport, since a Łunna survivor remembers that the Jeziory Jews were deported together with his community to Auschwitz on December 5. The Jeziory Jews also sometimes are mentioned among the communities that were sent in mid-December 1942 from Kielbasin to the Treblinka extermination camp.⁷

Immediately after the deportation of the Jeziory Jews to Kielbasin, the Amtskommissar ordered the remaining Jewish property there collected. He distributed a part of it to the Jeziory and Bondary Gendarmerie posts, to the Jeziory hospital and the forest service office, and to several German charitable organizations in Grodno. Several Reich and ethnic Germans in Jeziory also received Jewish property to furnish their apartments and rooms. Some 24 pieces of clothing were reserved for Polish employees of the Amtskommissariat. The remainder of the property was sold off. The Amtskommissariat collected 57,051.09 Reichsmark (RM) in proceeds. After paying 6,877.68 RM for guards, labor, and cart rentals, it deposited 50,173.41 RM into a trustee account of the Landratsamt in Grodno.⁸

Members of the Jeziory Gendarmerie continued to uncover and to murder Jews who had fled the liquidation of the ghetto. On November 28, 1942, the police shot another two Jews, just outside the village. On March 17, 1943, the Jeziory Gendarmerie surrendered to the Grodno Kreiskommissar 2,247.00 RM that it had recovered from Jewish shooting victims. In April, it submitted another 1,483.55 RM, collected under similar circumstances.⁹

SOURCES Secondary accounts include the entries in Shmuel Spector and Bracha Freundlich, eds., Pinkas ha-kehillot. Encyclopaedia of Jewish Communities: Poland, vol. 8, Vilna, Białystok, Nowogródek (Jerusalem: Yad Vashem, 2005), pp. 364–367; and Encyclopaedia Judaica, 2nd ed. (Detroit: Macmillan Reference USA, 2007), 15:557.

Documentation for the history of the Jewish community of Jeziory under German occupation in World War II includes GAGO (e.g., 1-1-150, pp. 12–13; 1-1-335, pp. 35, 45, 72–73; 1-1-365, pp. 18, 25–26; and 1-1-512, pp. 42, 85, 162–166); RGVA (e.g., 1323-2-244, pp. 99, 108; and 1323-2-250, pp. 117, 135); and USHMM (RG-11.001M [RGVA] and RG-53.004M [GAGO]).

Laura Crago and Alexander Kruglov
trans. Steven Seegel

NOTES

1. USHMM, RG-53.004M (GAGO), reel 3, 1-1-280, pp. 6–7.
2. RGVA, 1323-2-250, pp. 117, 135, in Wolfgang Curilla, Die deutsche Ordnungspolizei und der Holocaust im Baltikum und in Weissrussland 1941–1944 (Paderborn: Ferdinand Schöningh, 2006), pp. 530–531.
3. AZIH, 301/2254, testimony of Abraham Blumenthal, pp. 1–2.
4. USHMM, RG-53.004M, reel 2, 1-1-150, p. 12.
5. Ibid., reel 5, 1-1-512, e.g., pp. 42, 85, 95, 145, 162–166.
6. Ibid., RG-11.001M (RGVA), reel 81, 1323-2-244, p. 99, and RG-53.004M, reel 1, 1-1-54, p. 38, which also is at GARF, 7021-86-40, p. 4.
7. Stanisław Mączka, ed., Żydzi polscy w KL Auschwitz: wykazy imienne. Polish Jews in KL Auschwitz: Name Lists (Warsaw: ŻIH, 2004), pp. 99–100; Eliezer Eisenschmidt interview, information from Ruth Marcus to Laura Crago, April 7, 2009; and the details about the arrival of the Jeziory-born Roza Sara Lebin in Sterbebücher von Auschwitz, 3 vols. (Munich: KG Saur, 1995), vol. 2, Namensverzeichnis, A–L, p. 701 (12420/1943), important here because no women on the Łunna transport were held back as prisoners of Auschwitz II-Birkenau.
8. USHMM, RG-53.004M, reel 4, 1-1-335, pp. 72–73, and 1-1-365, pp. 18, 25–26.

9. Ibid., RG-11.001M, reel 81, 1323-2-244, p. 108, and RG-53.004M, reel 4, 1-1-335, pp. 35, 45.

KAMIENIEC LITEWSKI

Pre-1939: Kamieniec Litewski (Yiddish: Kamenetz-Litovsk), town, Brześć nad Bugiem powiat, województwo poleskie, Poland; 1939–1941: Kamenets, raion center, Brest oblast', Belorussian SSR; 1941–1944: Kamenez-Litowsk, Kreis Bielsk, Distrikt Bialystok; post-1991: Kamianets, raen center, Beras'tse voblasts', Republic of Belarus

Kamieniec Litewski lies 40 kilometers (24.9 miles) north-northwest of Brześć nad Bugiem. In interwar Poland, it was located about 65 kilometers (40.4 miles) southeast of Bielsk Podlaski, via two indirect routes, one of which led north to Białowieża and from there almost due west to Bielsk. In 1921, the Kamieniec population stood at 2,348, including 1,902 Jews, 287 Russian Orthodox, and 158 Roman Catholics. Another 375 Jews lived in the Kamieniec Litewski gmina, including 305 in Zamosty (Yiddish: Zastavye) and in Łotowo, an adjoining agricultural colony, and 47 in Sarowo, another Jewish agricultural colony. By 1928, 3,780 Jews lived in Kamieniec Litewski proper.

At about 7:00 P.M., on June 22, 1941, the first day of the German invasion of the USSR, a Wehrmacht unit occupied Kamieniec Litewski. A military commandant ruled the town until about August 1, when a German civilian administration, headed by an Amtskommissar, was established. A Gendarmerie post also was created, and a local auxiliary police force recruited. A Judenrat was established in mid-July headed by Shlomo Mandelbrat, and forced labor and extortion began. In the summer of 1941, Kamieniec was incorporated into Kreis Prużana. On October 31, 1941, German authorities abolished the Kreis and joined Kamieniec instead to Kreis Bielsk in Distrikt Bialystok.

In early July 1941, an SS unit arrested 108 Jewish men from Kamieniec Litewski and executed them near the village of Murany (or Muryny)-Wielkie. Not realizing the men had been murdered, Mandelblat appealed to the local Roman Catholic priest to procure their release but was told nothing could be done, as they had been arrested for communism. Before departing Kamieniec, the SS commander issued a number of anti-Jewish decrees, including a directive to wear yellow markings, on the back and chest, and a prohibition on leaving Kamieniec.¹

Kamieniec's location, about 37 kilometers (23 miles) south of Białowieża, the southern gateway to the Puszcza Białowieska (Belarusian: Belavezhskaia pushcha), the primordial Białowieża Forest, and its status as a historic community of the forest, which once bore its name, likely motivated German orders for the deportation, by train, of a third to a half of its Jewish residents to Prużana, a community located some 51 kilometers (31.7 miles) to the northeast, on the eastern edge of the forest. A survivor remembers the expulsion occurring at the end of 1941; however, the Germans expelled the Jews from almost all the other Białowieża Forest communities, including Białowieża, Hajnówka, Narewka Mała, and Narew, in early to mid-August.

Some historians believe the expulsions were a first step by Reichsforstmeister Hermann Göring to transform the Białowieża Forest into a vast nature and hunting preserve for the Nazi leadership and to create the optimal conditions to foster the propagation of its rare animals, including the visent (the European bison). However, on July 4, 1941, German Police Battalion 309, responsible for incarcerating in a makeshift labor camp the male Jews of Hajnówka and other nearby communities, reported it had done so to prevent a partisan insurgency from emerging in the woodland. (Because the Jews, the police claimed, supported Red Army soldiers hiding there, they recommended the expulsion of all Jewish men from the forest communities north and northeast of Hajnówka.)²

In practice, the police recommendation led to the execution, in early and mid-August 1941, of all or part of the Jewish men of the communities of the Białowieża Forest and the expulsion to a number of ghettos of most of the surviving men and all of the women, children, and the elderly. The Hajnówka and Narew communities, for example, were among those expelled to Prużana. Survivors of anti-Jewish violence in Białowieża and Narewka, mostly women, children, and the elderly, were sent to Kobryń and Antopol in Reichskommissariat Ukraine.

Those people expelled from Kamieniec Litewski and sent to Prużana were permitted to bring only 15 kilograms (about 33 pounds) of luggage. Many people evaded the deportation orders, fearing that the Germans planned to execute a large part of the community. Some Christians provided the fugitives hiding places; others, including the wife of a forester, surreptitiously handed the deportees foodstuffs. Another group of Christians looted the property left behind by the Jews.

In the autumn of 1941, the Germans ordered an open ghetto established in Kamieniec Litewski for those held back from the deportation. This group included craftsmen, other "essential" workers employed by the local German administration, and their families. Initially, the ghetto was an open ghetto, composed of a few houses on Brześć Street.

Conditions in the ghetto were poor. Overcrowding was made worse as many Jews who had fled and some of those expelled to Prużana paid bribes to German authorities, including members of the Kamieniec Litewski Gendarmerie post, to return home. As a result, as many as 10 people crowded into a single room in one of the houses on the ghetto's terrain. The Gendarmes, particularly an officer named Werbel, beat Jews found illicitly outside the ghetto, usually bartering their possessions with local Christians for food.

On January 1, 1942, the Germans surrounded the Kamieniec Litewski ghetto and drove its inmates to a new ghetto, located on Kobryń and Litewski Streets. Likely, the new ghetto was fenced, as the Bielsk Podlaski Kreiskommissar, Landrat Tubenthal, is known to have ordered in the late spring of 1942 the closing of all the ghettos in his Kreis, though some Jewish communities were able to postpone the implementation of the decree until late August. The reason for the relocation of the Kamieniec ghetto is unknown. During the resettlement, many individuals fled, fearing they were being driven to be executed. At least five people were shot dead for evading the relocation order.³

In June 1942, the Germans executed another 140 Jews from Kamieniec Litewski.⁴ At least one family in the Prużana ghetto determined not to return home after a representative it sent to Kamieniec reported that the Jews there were confined to their residences and lived in fear of another execution.⁵

On November 12, 1942, the Kamieniec Litewski ghetto was liquidated. That day, members of the 5th Battalion of Police Regiment II (known before July 29, 1942, as the 1st Company of Reserve Police Battalion 13) marched about 2,500 Jews from Kamieniec to the ghetto in Wysokie Litewskie, about 31 kilometers (19.3 miles) to the west-southwest.⁶ Likely, Jews from Zamosty, Łotowo, Sarowo, and other smaller nearby communities were included in the expulsion. By 4:00 P.M., the Jews had been loaded into freight wagons at the Wysokie train station. They were sent, likely together with the Wysokie Litewskie Jews, to the Treblinka extermination camp. They all were gassed on arrival.

Some Kamieniec Litewski Jews fled the ghetto's liquidation. The hiding places of most, including Dr. Gelberg, his daughter, and son-in-law, were revealed to authorities. After a local postman reportedly denounced Halina Weidenberg, a physician employed by the municipal authorities, believed to be a Christian, for receiving postcards written in Yiddish, she also was executed by the Gendarmes. Dora Galperin, the only known survivor from among those who sought shelter in and around Kamieniec, was assisted by about eight different Christian families.⁷

Among the 10 Kamieniec Litewski survivors were a few Prużana ghetto prisoners. Deported from Prużana to the Auschwitz extermination camp between January 31 and February 2, 1942, on four transports, which carried the approximately 9,161 ghetto inmates, the Kamieniec Jews constituted a handful of the 1,675 people—1,183 men and 492 women—held back as prisoners of the Auschwitz concentration camp. Dwora Rudnicki was among an even smaller number of Kamieniec Jews who survived until liberation.

In 1947, Dymitriusz Kitajewski, the local commander of the auxiliary police force in Dmitrowicze, some 2 kilometers (1.2 miles) almost due north of Kamieniec Litewski, was tried in Poland and sentenced to life in prison for participating in the shootings of the civilian population, including Dr. Gelberg and the members of his family found there in hiding. Sentenced initially to life in prison, Kitajewski received the death penalty, in 1955, after Poland's Supreme Court reviewed his case. The sentence does not appear to have been carried out, as Kitajewski was tried in 1968 for other shootings of civilians, receiving a 7-year sentence, which on review was increased to 12 years.

In 1959, Grzegorz Krawczyk, another auxiliary policeman from Dmitrowicze tried in Poland, received a life sentence for participating in the murders of Jews and Soviet prisoners of war (POWs). Some of the murders likely involved Jews from the pre-war Abramowo Jewish agricultural colony, also known as Plesiszcz, as the 97 Jews there in 1921 formed the largest part of the 124 Jewish inhabitants of the pre-war Dmitrowicze gmina. Krawczyk was released conditionally in 1973. Few other details are known about the specific experiences of the Abramowo Jewish community under the German occupation in World War II.

SOURCES The Kamieniec Litewski yizkor book, Shemu'el Aizenshtadt, ed., Sefer yizkor li-kehilot Kamenits de-Liṭa, Zaštavyah veba-kolonyot (Tel Aviv: Irgun yots'e Kamenits de-Liṭa ve-Zaštavyah be-Yisrael uve-Artsot-ha-Berit, 1970), provides several accounts by survivors, including in a separate English section testimonies by Dora Galperin (or Halperin), "The Tragedy and Destruction of Kamenetz," and Dwora Rudnitsky-Singer, "My Life in Ghettos and Concentration Camps." As its title implies, there also is some coverage of the surrounding communities, particularly of the agricultural colonies of Zamosty, Łotowo, Sarowo, and the physically more distant Abramowo. The yizkor book is available online at the Dorot Division, New York Public Library, with its English section also available at the Kamieniec Litewski ShtetLinks page, at jewishgen.org.

Some coverage of the ghetto is provided in the discussion about commemorating it, in Il'ia Razumovskii, "Pamiat' ob uznikakh Kamenetskogo getto," press release, May 27, 2009, available at the Web site of the Agentstvo evreiskikh novostei, www.aen.ru/?page=brief&article_id=53526. The article also provides the present-day Russian names of the streets of the second ghetto as Proletariat and Chkalov Streets. Still forthcoming is a larger Russian-language study of the Kamieniec Jewish community by local historian G.S. Musevich, Narod, kotoryi zbil sredi nas, which includes several chapters on the World War II period. An English translation of the work is planned: see "A New Book about Jews of Kamenets," June 10, 2009, on the Web site of the Brest-Belarus group, www.brest-belarus.org/sp/the_people.i.html.

A relatively large number of works examine anti-Jewish violence and other forms of German force used against the Jewish communities of the Białowieża Forest. These works include Simon Schama, Landscape and Memory (New York: Knopf, 1995), pp. 70–74; Stuart Franklin, "Białowieża Forest, Poland: Representation, Myth, and the Politics of Dispossession," Environment and Planning A 34:8 (2002): 1459–1485; Heinrich Rubner, Deutsche Forstgeschichte, 1933–1945: Forstwirtschaft, Jagd und Umwelt im NS-Staat (St. Katharinen: Scripta Mercaturae Verlag, 1985); Lutz Heck, Animals: My Adventure, trans. E.W. Dicks (London: Methuen, 1954); Piotr Daszkiewicz and Jean Aikhenbaum, Aurochs, le retour d'une supercherie nazie (Paris: Histoire, Sciences, Totalitarisme, Ethique et Société, 1999); and Frank Fox, "Jews and Buffaloes, Victims of Nazi Pseudo-science," East European Jewish Affairs 31:2 (2001): 82–93.

Although some of the above-cited works focus on German long-term plans for the forest, in the absence of a direct documentary link, most historians take at face value the reports of security forces, from the summer of 1941, that describe the Białowieża expulsions as motivated by a more immediate military need to prevent the emergence of a partisan insurgency there. These historians include Szymon Datner, “Eksterminacja ludności żydowskiej w Okręgu Białostockim,” BŻIH, no. 60 (1966): 21–22; Waldemar Monkiewicz, Białowieża w cieniu szwastyki (Białystok: KAW, 1984); and Andrzej Żbikowski, “Pogromy i mordy ludności żydowskiej w Łomżyńskim i na Białostocczyźnie latem 1941 roku w świetle relacji ocalałych Żydów i dokumentów sądowych,” in Paweł Machcewicz and Krzysztof Persak, eds., Wokół Jedwabnego, 2 vols. (Warsaw: IPN and KŚZpNP, 2002), vol. 1, Studia, p. 263. A similar approach appears in Michael Imort, “Forestopia: The Use of the Forest Landscape in Naturalizing National Socialist Ideologies of Volk, Race, and Lebensraum, 1918–1945” (Ph.D. diss., Queen’s University, Kingston, Ontario, 2000), which, in spite of its title, devotes a chapter to discussing the use in late 1942–1943 of the Forstschutzkommando (Forest Protection Commando) to eradicate partisan groups operating in the Białowieża Forest.

Also useful are the relevant entries in Pinkas ha-kehilot. Encyclopaedia of Jewish Communities: Poland, including, in vol. 5, Volhynia and Polesie, Shmuel Spector, ed., (Jerusalem: Yad Vashem, 1990), p. 219 (Abramowo), p. 250 (Zamosty), p. 263 (Łotowa), p. 274 (Sarowo), pp. 299–305 (Prużana), and pp. 312–315 (Kamieniec Litewski); and vol. 8, Vilna, Białystok, Nowogródek, ed. Shmuel Spector and Bracha Freundlich (Jerusalem: Yad Vashem, 2005), pp. 139–140 (Białowieża), pp. 288–289 (Hajnówka), pp. 457–459 (Narew), and pp. 459–460 (Narewka Mała).

Documentation about the life and death of the Jewish community of Kamieniec Litewski during the World War II German occupation includes AŻIH (301/2604); GABO (e.g., 514-1-151, p. 4); GARF (e.g., 7021-83-16, pp. 2, 7, and 7021-148-186); IPN (e.g., SOE 83, SWB 189-90, and SWOI 41-43); USHMM (RG-22.014M [GARF, 7021-148-186], reel 18, p. 165); and YVA. The case of Grzegorz Krawczyk is cited above as IPN, SWB 189-90. The two Kitajewski cases are cited above as IPN (SOE 83 and SWOI 41-43).

Laura Crago and Alexander Kruglov

NOTES

1. GARF, 7021-83-16, p. 2; and Rudnitsky-Singer, “My Life,” pp. 106–108.
2. GARF, 7021-83-16, p. 7; and BA-MA, RH 26-221/10, War Diary, 221st Security Division, cited in Żbikowski, “Pogromy i mordy,” p. 263.
3. Galperin, “The Tragedy,” p. 94.
4. Marat Botvinnik, Pamiętniki genotsida evreev Belarusi (Minsk: Belaruskaja Navuka, 2000), p. 127.
5. Rudnitsky-Singer, “My Life,” p. 108.
6. USHMM, RG-22.014M, reel 18 (GARF, 7021-148-186), p. 165 (War Diary, 1st Company, Reserve Police Battalion 13, November 12, 1942).
7. Galperin, “The Tragedy,” pp. 94–101.

KAMIONKA (AKA KAMIONKA KOŁO GRODNO)

Pre-1939: Kamionka, village, Szczuczyn powiat, Nowogródek województwo, Poland; 1939–1941: Kamenka, Shchuchyn raion, Baranovichy oblast’, Belorussian SSR; 1941–1944: Kamionka,

Kreis Grodno, Distrikt Białystok; post-1991: Kamenka, Hrodna raen and voblasts’, Republic of Belarus

Kamionka lies about 60 kilometers (37.3 miles) east-southeast of Grodno and 12 kilometers (7.5 miles) west-southwest of Szczuczyn. Historically, a part of the Grodno region, Kamionka was incorporated, in May 1929, into the newly formed Szczuczyn powiat, in the Nowogródek województwo. However, it remained popularly known as Kamionka koło Grodna (Kamionka near Grodno), likely to distinguish it from at least 12 identically named places in the interwar Nowogródek and Białystok województwa. In 1921, the Kamionka population of 569 included 326 Jews. By 1929, 70 of the 135 families residing in Kamionka were Jewish.

A Wehrmacht unit occupied Kamionka within days of the German invasion of the USSR on June 22, 1941. In autumn 1941, the Germans incorporated Kamionka into Kreis Grodno. The incorporation transformed Kamionka into a frontier town on the northeasternmost boundary of Distrikt Białystok, with about 6 kilometers (3.7 miles) separating it from the border of Generalkommissariat Weissruthenien. Likely for this reason, the Kamionka Gendarmerie post was organized and remained at least through February 1942 under the supervision of German police authorities in Szczuczyn and Lida. Locally, it was led by Hauptwachmeister Rosenboom. An Amtskommissar in Kamionka, surnamed Bestek, likely assumed his position in the fall of 1941.¹

Little is known about the history of the Kamionka Jewish community during the German occupation. In the early summer of 1942, the Germans sent a few hundred men from Kamionka to a forced labor camp in Wołkowysk. German documentation notes that on November 2, 1942, 417 Jews from Kamionka were expelled to a transit camp in Kiełbasin, a few kilometers south of Grodno.² The Kamionka laborers in Wołkowysk were driven that same day to another transit camp established at a pre-war cavalry barracks there.

German documentation from immediately after the expulsion of the Kamionka community to Kiełbasin suggests that the Germans had ordered a ghetto established in Kamionka. A police report notes that on November 3, 1942, local Gendarmes shot dead a Pole discovered looting property in the Kamionka ghetto.³ The absence of additional documentation makes it impossible to determine the location of the ghetto or whether the ghetto was open or closed.

At Kiełbasin, the Kamionka community lived in deplorable conditions with about 23,000 to 28,000 Jews from about 22 other communities in Kreis Grodno and Kreis Sokółka. The Germans began sending the Kiełbasin inmates to the Auschwitz and Treblinka extermination camps on November 9, 1942, with the last transport leaving the train station at Łosośna on December 20 or 21, 1942. Because no documentation exists in Auschwitz records for a Jewish prisoner from Kamionka, the community likely was among those sent from Kiełbasin to Treblinka. In Wołkowysk, a large number of the Kamionka laborers perished at the transit camp from diseases related to exposure and malnutrition, contracted at the labor camp, or from typhus, a by-product of the unsanitary conditions at the transit camp. The survivors likely were expelled from the transit camp together with the Jews from the Zelwa area and sent in the second Wołkowysk transport on either November 26 or December 2, 1942, to the Treblinka extermination camp.⁴

After the Kamionka Jews were sent to Treblinka, members of the Kamionka Gendarmerie post, on February 28, 1943, shot at least one Jewish fugitive. On March 9, the post commander surrendered to the Grodno Kreiskommissar items found on the victim valued at 174.00 Reichsmark (RM), including a bar of gold, foreign currency, and jewelry.⁵

SOURCES The Kamionka laborers at the Wołkowysk transit camp are discussed in the testimony by survivor Yitzhak Reznik, which is summarized and presented as “Krzemienica” in the second Wołkowysk yizkor book, Moses Einhorn, ed., Volkovisker Yisker-Bukh (New York, 1949). An English translation is available in Sefer zikaron Volkovisk. The Volkovysk Memorial Book, trans. Jacob Solomon Berger (Mahwah, NJ: J.S. Berger, 2000), pt. 1, pp. 316–318. Coverage of visits by the descendants of the Kamionka Jewish community on the Kamienka ShtetLinks page at jewishgen.org suggests that several Jewish families resided there after the war.

Documentation pertaining to the history of the Kamionka Jewish community under the German occupation in World War II includes GAGO (e.g., 1-1-54, pp. 37–38, and 1-1-335, p. 39); GARF (7021-86-40, pp. 4, 56, 58); NARB (845-1-8, p. 31); RGVA (1323-2-244, p. 99); and USHMM (e.g., RG-11.001M [RGVA], reel 81, 1323-2-244, p. 99; RG-22.002M [GARF], reel 13, 7021-86-40, pp. 4, 56, 58; RG-53.002M [NARB], reel 5, 845-1-8, p. 31; and RG-53.004M [GAGO], e.g., reel 1, 1-1-54, pp. 37–38, and reel 4, 1-1-335, p. 39). Some of the above documentation also appears in Serge Klarsfeld, ed., Documents Concerning the Destruction of the Jews of Grodno 1941–1944, vol. 6 (New York: Beate Klarsfeld Foundation, 1985).

Laura Crago

NOTES

1. USHMM, RG-53.004M (GAGO), reel 1, 1-1-2, pp. 136–137, and reel 3, 1-1-280, pp. 5–7.
2. Ibid., reel 1, 1-1-54, pp. 37–38, with a Russian translation at GARF, 7021-86-40, pp. 56, 58; and at NARB, 845-1-8, p. 31.
3. USHMM, RG-11.001M (RGVA), reel 81, 1323-2-244, p. 99.
4. Reznik, “Krzemienica,” pp. 317–318.
5. USHMM, RG-53.004M, reel 4, 1-1-335, p. 39.

KLESZCZELE

Pre-1939: Kleszczele, town, Bielsk Podlaski powiat, Białystok województwo, Poland; 1939–1941: Kleshcheli, raion center, Brest oblast', Belorussian SSR; 1941–1944: Kleszczele, Kreis Bielsk, Distrikt Białystok; post-1998: Hajnówka powiat, województwo podlaskie, Poland

Kleszczele now lies near the Polish border with the Republic of Belarus, 24.7 kilometers (15.4 miles) southeast of Bielsk

Podlaski and 75.2 kilometers (46.7 miles) south-southeast of Białystok. About 700 Jews resided there on the eve of World War II. After Kleszczele came under Soviet occupation in September 1939, during the first month of World War II, the Jewish population increased slightly to 750.¹

German forces occupied Kleszczele on June 23, 1941. The German authorities appointed a provisional Polish administration, under the leadership of a mayor, a local pre-war teacher surnamed Mediewicz. A Polish auxiliary police force also was organized. Its members included Antoni Parfinowicz.

The auxiliary police imposed a regime of forced labor on the Jews. They arrested, beat up, and then turned over at least two Jews, Icchak Złotnik and Jakow Farber, to German authorities in Bielsk Podlaski as alleged Communists. The men were executed. Parfinowicz and other auxiliary policemen joined together to extort several Jews, threatening to hand them over to German authorities if they did not provide regular payments to the auxiliary police.²

In August 1941, a German civil administration took over from the temporary military authorities in Kleszczele. The new Amtskommissar immediately introduced a series of restrictions on the Jewish population. A Jewish Council (Judenrat), headed by Wajman (or perhaps Wiener), was established. The German authorities ordered the Judenrat to collect a number of onerous “contributions” from the Jewish population. The Jews were ordered to wear distinguishing patches in the image of the Star of David. They were forbidden from walking on the sidewalks and could not greet Germans. Forced labor continued as the Jews worked on the railroad, at a concrete plant, and in agriculture.³

In August or early autumn 1941, the Germans established an open ghetto in Kleszczele. They prohibited Jews from living in the same houses as Christians. The order forced many Jews to find housing in the pre-war Jewish neighborhood, a small area of a few streets around the market square. The Germans required Jews to identify their houses by painting a Star of David on them.⁴

In May 1942, Johann Otto, the Kleszczele Amtskommissar, most likely acting on a decree of the Bielsk Kreiskommissar, Landrat von Büнау, ordered the establishment of a closed ghetto. It included between 30 and 48 homes located on the market square and within the area of Kościuszko, Ciasna, and Kopernik Streets. The ghetto was surrounded by a tall wooden fence, topped with barbed wire. Postwar Polish court documentation lists its population as 678. Each ghetto resident was allotted only about 2 square meters (22 square feet) of space in which to live. Tailors, cobblers, glaziers, and carpenters labored on various projects for local German officials and the local population in craft workshops established in the ghetto. Some inmates left the ghetto daily for the railroad station, in Czeremcha, to engage in tasks ranging from unloading wagons to building locomotives. Others departed the ghetto for agricultural labor, on the estate of the Kleszczele Amtskommissar.⁵ The Germans also ordered dismantled the 1881 wooden synagogue. Its building materials were used to build homes on Boćki Street.

Provisioning in the ghetto was almost nonexistent. Most inmates procured food illegally by sneaking away from work assignments outside the ghetto to trade with local Christians. Many local Christians, both Poles and Belorussians, supplied the Jews with food, either in exchange for goods or services or for no compensation. Even so, hunger and overcrowding bred unsanitary conditions, which led to an outbreak of typhus. The epidemic claimed the lives of many of the elderly and children. In September 1942, Wajman was arrested, based on a denunciation of a local Polish Gestapo informant who reported the Jewish Council chair had criticized the German administration. The Gestapo shot him in Bielsk Podlaski.⁶

At the beginning of November 1942, German forces sealed off the ghetto and refused to permit workers to leave for work. The Germans announced that the ghetto inmates would be sent to labor camps in Ukraine. Because of the tight guard around the ghetto and concern for the other members of their families, only a few Jews attempted to escape.⁷ On November 5, the Germans transferred about 1,250 Jews from the nearby communities of Milejczyce and Nurzec (Milejczyce gmina, Bielsk Podlaski powiat) to the Kleszczele ghetto. The next day, 6 Jews were shot during a final roundup of ghetto residents. The surviving Jews were taken on November 6 to a transit camp located in a former cavalry barracks on the southern outskirts of Białystok. The Kleszczele Jews were deported from the Białystok transit camp sometime between the end of November and December 15 to the Treblinka extermination camp.⁸ They were gassed on arrival.

A few Jews managed to escape at the time of the roundup. Josef Białostocki discovered many of his Christian acquaintances were unwilling to shelter him, because they feared German retaliation. He ultimately received a warm welcome from Anna and Szymon Markiewicz. The couple constructed a hiding place for him in their barn. Zelman (or Zenon) Wasserman and Symcha Bursztajn found refuge with Waleria Skarżyńska and her son Kazimierz in Saki village (Kleszczele gmina, Bielsk Podlaski powiat). Only two or three other Jews from the Kleszczele ghetto survived until the Red Army drove the German occupying forces from the town on July 20, 1944.⁹

In October 1946, Parfinowicz was charged with participating, as a member of the auxiliary police, in the 1941 arrests and beatings of several Kleszczele Jews and with forcing Jews to surrender valuables. At his trial in April 1947, in Białystok, the judge postponed the proceedings until January 1948 to enable Wasserman, the state's main witness, to come from his new home in France to testify. Even though investigators had collected a wealth of evidence against Parfinowicz, including depositions from Jewish survivors, he was found not guilty after Wasserman did not appear.¹⁰

SOURCES Information on the Kleszczele ghetto can be found in the relevant entries in Shmuel Spector and Bracha Freundlich, eds., Pinkas ha-kehillot. Encyclopaedia of Jewish Communities: Poland, vol. 8, Vilna, Białystok, Nowogródek (Jerusalem: Yad Vashem, 2005), pp. 558–560; in its English-language counterpart, Arnon Rubin, The Rise and Fall of Jewish Communities in Poland and Their Relics Today, vol. 1, District Białystok (Tel Aviv: Tel Aviv University Press, 2006), pp. 104–106; and Tomasz Wiśniewski, Bóznice Białostoczczyzny. Heartland of the Jewish Life: Synagogues and Jewish Communities in the Białystok Region (Białystok: David, 1991), pp. 160–161.

Christian aid to Kleszczele Jews is covered in Israel Gutman and Sara Bender, eds., The Encyclopedia of the Righteous among the Nations: Rescuers of Jews during the Holocaust, vol. 2, Poland, 2 pts. (Jerusalem: Yad Vashem, 2004), pt. 1, pp. 492–493, for the 1965 nomination of Anna and Szymon Markiewicz as Righteous Among the Nations; and Waldemar Monkiewicz, “Za cenę życia. O ratowaniu Żydów w Białostockiem w okresie okupacji niemieckiej,” Białostoccy Żydzi 2 (1997): 215–216. A list of the Kleszczele survivors appears on the sketches for a monument, with the 1993 plans available at www.bagnowka.com/?m=cm&g=zoom&img=2478&gal=38. Information about the postwar trial is in Andrzej Żbikowski, “Pogromy i mordy ludności żydowskiej w Łomżyńskim i na Białostoczczyźnie latem 1941 roku w świetle relacji ocalałych Żydów i dokumentów sądowych,” in Paweł Machcewicz and Krzysztof Persak, eds., Wokół Jedwabnego, 2 vols. (Warsaw: IPN-KŚZpNP, 2002), vol. 1, Studia, pp. 223–224.

Also useful are Szymon Datner, “Eksterminacja ludności żydowskiej w Okręgu Białostockim,” BŻIH, no. 60 (1966): 15, 17, 38 (tab. 3); and Czesław Pilichowski et al., eds., Obozy hitlerowskie na ziemiach polskich 1939–1945: Informator encyklopedyczny (Warsaw: PWN, 1979), p. 232.

Documents on the fate of the Jews of Kleszczele during the Holocaust can be found in the following archives: AŻIH (204 [e.g., YVA M-11/B77, 193], 301 [e.g., 979, 1853]); IPN (e.g., ASG, SOB 43); IPN-Bi (e.g., Ko-5/90, S [19/75, 38/68]); USHMM (RG-15.019M [IPN], reel 1 [1/136] and reel 14 [46/48]); and YVA (e.g., M-11[B77, B193], M-33, M-49-E [e.g., 6640], O-3/3262, O-59/15). A Polish-language translation of AŻIH, 301/979, is available at the Archiwum Etnograficzne at www.archiwumetnograficzne.edu.pl/readarticle.php?article_id=33.

Martin Dean and Laura Crago

NOTES

1. AŻIH, 301/979, testimony of Symcha Bursztajn, p. 1.
2. IPN, SOB 43, cited by Żbikowski, “Pogromy,” pp. 223–224.
3. AŻIH, 301/979, pp. 1–2.
4. Ibid., p. 1.
5. USHMM, RG-15.019M (IPN), reel 14, 46/48, pp. 1–2; and low structure figure in AŻIH, 301/979, pp. 1–2.
6. AŻIH, 301/979, p. 1.
7. Ibid., 301/1853, testimony of Symcha Bursztajn, p. 1 (typescript).
8. USHMM, RG-15.019M, reel 1, 1/136, pp. 1–2.
9. Number of survivors varies at USHMM, RG-15.091M, reel 14, 46/48, p. 2; AŻIH, 301/1853, p. 2 (typescript), and 301/979, p. 2.
10. IPN, SOB 43.

KNYSZYN

Pre-1939: Knyszyn (Yiddish: Knisbin), town, Białystok powiat and województwo, Poland; 1939–1941: Knysbin, Mońki raion, Belostok oblast', Belorussian SSR; 1941–1944: Knischin, Kreis Białystok, Distrikt Białystok; post-1998: Knyszyn, Mońki powiat, województwo podlaskie, Poland

Knyszyn lies 29.1 kilometers (18.1 miles) northwest of Białystok and 13.2 kilometers (8.2 miles) southwest of Jasionówka. Its 1921 population of 3,559 included 1,235 Jews. In 1939, on the eve of World War II, the Knyszyn kehillah numbered 1,450.

A Wehrmacht unit occupied Knyszyn on June 27, 1941. Soldiers rounded up five Jews, accused them of communism, and shot them. The Germans appointed a local Polish administration and an auxiliary police force. Policeman Edward Bibiński organized local antisemites to mark houses with crosses and Stars of David. However, Franciszek Bryks, pastor of the Roman Catholic Church, convinced the men to call off the pogrom and urged Roman Catholic faithfuls during Mass to assist Jews rather than to pursue them.¹ The relative peace in Knyszyn transformed it into a refuge for Jews fleeing violence in Szczuczyn (Białostocki), Grajewo, and Radziłów.

The German-appointed sołtys (village head) soon ordered the Jewish refugees to leave Knyszyn. Some Poles denounced several Knyszyn Jews as Communists. Auxiliary policeman Edward Zeler probably beat the men before surrendering them to German authorities on July 5, 1941.² The Germans took Rabbi Polak with them, who was to provide a character reference for an arrestee. Never heard from again, the men are presumed to have been shot by the Germans.³

A German civil administration was created in Knyszyn in early August 1941. A man named Labusch served as the first Knyszyn Amtskommissar. By fall 1942, the position was filled by either Bohr or Andrzejewski, the longest-serving Amtskommissar. A Gendarmerie post also was established.

The new German administrators immediately ordered the establishment of a Jewish Council (Judenrat). Its chair, Motel Zapasner, was a merchant. They ordered the Jews to wear white armbands with a blue Star of David. At an assembly, ordered by the Amtskommissar in early September, the Jews were read a new list of anti-Jewish decrees, including orders that replaced the armbands with yellow patches, worn on the back and chest, and mandated forced labor of all adult Jews. The Germans threatened to deport unemployed men from Knyszyn. The Judenrat subsequently bribed officials to permit the men to stay. The Germans also humiliated religious Jews with beards, ordering them to box each other and to dance as a photographer took pictures.⁴

In the fall of 1941, the Amtskommissar announced the establishment of a closed ghetto in Knyszyn. However, a delegation of Poles, including Bryks, hospital director Edward Nowicki, and pharmacist Marian Rzeźnicki, cited public health concerns to appeal successfully for the order's suspension, though the Judenrat likely also was required to pay a bribe.⁵

The Germans instead established an open ghetto by circumscribing Jewish movement in Knyszyn, declaring a part of it off limits to Jews.⁶ They expelled Jews from Mońki and nearby localities to Knyszyn and imposed the death penalty on Jews found outside Knyszyn without permission. The Gendarmes also enforced prohibitions on nonregistered Jews living in Knyszyn. As many as 150 survivors of the German mass execution of the Jewish community of Tykocin (Yiddish: Tiktin), probably on August 15–16, 1941, found it impossible to regularize their residence in Knyszyn. Petrified they would be denounced and shot, the refugees mostly fled to the Białystok ghetto.⁷

Some Poles denounced to German authorities purported Jewish Communist sympathizers. Almost none of the Jews were Communists; rather, they were people against whom the Poles held personal grudges. The denunciations led the Germans to murder at least 15 Knyszyn Jews in 1941, including the restaurant owner Barach Cybelman. On Simchat Torah (October 14), the SS arrested 13 more Jews, also denounced by Poles. The Jewish Council paid several hundred dollars in bribes to procure their freedom, but the SS already had murdered them.⁸

About 300 Jewish and Polish laborers in Knyszyn worked for the German construction firm Hermann Klammt. The conscripts renovated the nearby railway line to Białystok and the roads to Białystok, Mońki, and Jasionówka. The Judenrat Labor Office arranged supplementary rations for the conscripts, providing them with bread and meat twice weekly. The Germans also ordered the Judenrat to establish a shoemaking workshop. Other work assignments included street cleaning, farm labor, and forestry labor.

The Jewish Council was required to pay the salaries of several German officials brought to Knyszyn to oversee the shoemaking workshop. The local German administration demanded the Jews surrender their fur coats, jewelry, silver, and gold. German administrators changed the council leadership several times, hoping the new appointees would extract more materially from the Jews.⁹ In exchange for services, some Germans occasionally permitted the Judenrat to buy the freedom of the imprisoned. Gendarme Leutnant Schultz freed a Jasionówka ghetto resident from the Knyszyn jail in exchange for a local Jewish tailor making him an overcoat from cloth provided by the Judenrat.¹⁰

By the fall of 1942, rumors escalated that the German authorities would soon deport the Knyszyn Jews. At the end of October, Dorota Śniegiewicz learned from a Judenrat member in the Białystok ghetto that the Germans on November 2 would liquidate most of the Jewish communities in Distrikt Białystok. Subsequent inquiries by the Knyszyn Judenrat to the local Amtskommissar about whether the Jews were slated for evacuation were met by reassurances that they likely would not be sent away, as the administration had received permission to sell them winter heating materials and potatoes from German reserves.¹¹

On November 2, 1942, at 6:00 A.M., Knyszyn was surrounded by an SS detachment of about 300 men, reinforced by members of the local German Gendarmerie, German administrators from surrounding towns, including from Jasionówka, and the Polish auxiliary police.¹² After local officials secured payment for the winter rations, the SS commanded Judenrat members to go from house to house to order the Jews to stand outside of their homes. In relaying the German command, the Judenrat officials urged the Jews to act according to their consciences, as they did not know what the orders portended.¹³ A large number of people attempted escape. Polish staff at the hospital successfully hid 32 fugitives.¹⁴ Another 75 were killed. In addition to those fleeing from the roundup, the murdered included the infirm and elderly, deemed too frail by the SS to make the trip.

The Germans transported the remainder of the Knyszyn Jewish community, believed to have numbered about 1,300 people, to a transit camp located on the southern outskirts of Białystok, at a pre-war encampment of the Polish 10th Cavalry Division. They joined 12,000 to 15,000 Jews from nearby localities deported there that same day. The Białystok Judenrat intervened to secure the release of about 10 Knyszyn families. Beginning at the end of November, the Germans sent the transit camp inmates in several transports to the Treblinka extermination camp. They all were gassed on arrival.

Most of the approximately 80 Jewish fugitives sought shelter in the ghetto in Jasionówka. About 20 Knyszyn Jews subsequently survived the Jasionówka ghetto liquidation on January 24–25, 1943, by jumping either from the trucks deporting them to the train station or from the train taking them to the extermination camp.¹⁵ Others stayed outside of ghettos. Śniegiewicz lived in Białystok on false identity papers, purchasing arms and explosive materials for the Jewish underground for the planned ghetto uprising.

Others found shelter with local Poles. Samuel Suraski's workmate and friend, shoemaker Czesław Dworżańczyk, sheltered him. Seven members of Ber Ślodki's family found safety with Krzysztof Dąbowski's family in Długołęka village. Antoni and Jadwiga Uszczanowski hid seven more survivors. In April 1943, the Germans, acting on a denunciation, arrested the Uszczanowskis and shot Antoni dead for refusing to reveal the hiding places of the Jews they were protecting. Because of similar denunciations, the Germans torched the bunkers of several Jews and the residences of at least two Poles. The Jews only sometimes escaped alive.

After the war, many of the 50 Jewish survivors returned to Knyszyn. But in May 1945, an armed Polish gang murdered Krzysztof Dąbowski for refusing to surrender gold he was falsely rumored to have received for sheltering the Ślodki family. The survivors and some of the Polish aid-givers emigrated.

In 1953, Zeler was found innocent of several charges, including rounding up Jews during the liquidation of the Knyszyn ghetto.

SOURCES Some of the archival documentation below has been published, including in Polish translation, in Paweł Machcewicz and Krzysztof Persak, eds., Wokół Jedwabnego, 2 vols. (Warsaw: IPN-KŚZpNP, 2002), vol. 2, Dokumenty, pp. 346–355 (AŻIH, 301/1971). A part of the AŻIH, 301/3959, testimony, by Samuel Suraski, is in English and Hebrew translation on the RelatioNet project Web site, at <http://sush12knpo.blogspot.com/2007/07/memories-about-town-of-knyszyn-during.html>. Parts of the Polish-language AŻIH testimonies by Knyszyn survivors appear in English translation in the electronic monthly Nowy Gонец Knyszyński, published by the government of the town of Knyszyn. They are available under the history section of the journal index, located on the homepage of the Knyszyn town Web site at www.knyszyn.pl. Published testimonies from the Poles Józef Piasecki and Jadwiga Ciurzycka appear in “Knyszyn we wspomnieniach mieszkanców. Eksterminacja Żydów,” Białostoczczyzna, no. 3/31 (1993): 111–113, available electronically at the Podlaska Digital Library.

The above-cited Nowy Gонец Knyszyński includes more than 20 articles, in Polish and English translation, about the Knyszyn Jewish community in World War II. They are best read in conjunction with the Knyszyn entry in Shmuel Spector and Bracha Freundlich, eds., Pinkas ha-kehillot. Encyclopaedia of Jewish Communities: Poland, vol. 8, Vilna, Białystok, Nowogródek (Jerusalem: Yad Vashem, 2005), pp. 561–565. An English translation is available in Arnon Rubin, The Rise and Fall of Jewish Communities in Poland and Their Relics Today, vol. 1, District Białystok (Tel Aviv: Tel Aviv University Press, 2006), pp. 106–109. Also valuable are Edmund Chodorowski, “Knyszyn w latach II wojny światowej,” Białostoczczyzna, no. 3/31 (1993): 60–70, at the Podlaska Digital Library; and the relevant entry in Andrzej Żbikowski, “Pogromy i mordy ludności żydowskiej w Łomżyńskim i na Białostoczczyźnie latem 1941 roku w świetle relacji ocalałych Żydów i dokumentów sądowych,” in Wokół Jedwabnego, vol. 2, Studia, pp. 207–208.

A large literature exists on Christian aid to Jews in Knyszyn, including, among others, in Israel Gutman and Sara Bender, eds., The Encyclopedia of the Righteous among the Nations: Rescuers of Jews during the Holocaust, vol. 2, Poland, 2 pts. (Jerusalem: Yad Vashem, 2004), pt. 1, p. 164, pt. 2, pp. 840–841; and Kazimierz Radzajewski, “Czesław Dworżańczyk—sprawiedliwy,” Gazeta współczesna, July 3, 2008, for the recognition by Yad Vashem as Righteous Among the Nations of Krzysztof and Helena Dąbowski, Antoni and Jadwiga Uszczanowski, and Czesław Dworżańczyk, respectively. The RelatioNet site recounts, in English and Hebrew, the search of Hadar Suraski for the Christian aid-giver of her grandfather Samuel.

Documentation relating to the World War II history of the Knyszyn Jewish community under German occupation can be found at AŻIH (e.g., 301/658, 301/985, 301/1276, 301/1468, 301/2185, 301/2966, 301/3958, 301/3959); FVA (e.g., HVT-3639); IPN (e.g., SOB [104, 368, 425], SWB [54, 219–20, 223–24, 230, 237]); IPN-Bi (3/99, 3/113 [W-6/66], 3/123 [W-5/66], 7/988 [III-1747 KSL-7625], S [6/73 (powiat Mońki), 11/82, 222/68]); USHMM (e.g., Acc.1995.A.1193, RG-50.120*0192); VHF (e.g., # 546, 89734); and YVA. The IPN-Bi and IPN documentation includes the postwar investigations of a number of Polish collaborators of a penal camp established in Knyszyn for Jewish and non-Jewish residents of the Amtskommissariat.

Laura Crago

NOTES

1. AŻIH, 301/1276, testimony of Fania Brzezińska, pp. 5–6; and AŻIH, 301/3959, testimony of Szmuel Suraski, in Machcewicz and Persak Wokół Jedwabnego, 2:239.
2. IPN, SOB 425.
3. AŻIH, 301/3959, in Machcewicz and Persak, Wokół Jedwabnego, 2:239.
4. AŻIH, 301/1276, pp. 6–7, and 301/2185, testimony of Dorota Śniegiewicz, pp. 1–2; and AŻIH, 301/3959, in Machcewicz and Persak, Wokół Jedwabnego, 2:240.
5. AŻIH, 301/3959, in Machcewicz and Persak, Wokół Jedwabnego, 2: 238, 240; and AŻIH, 301/2185, p. 2.
6. AŻIH, 301/1276, p. 25.
7. USHMM, RG-50.120*0192, testimony of Avraham Kapitza.
8. AŻIH, 301/1276, p. 8; and AŻIH, 301/3959, in Machcewicz and Persak, Wokół Jedwabnego, 2:239.
9. AŻIH, 301/2185, p. 2.
10. Ibid., 301/1276, p. 10.
11. Ibid., 301/2185, p. 3, and 301/1276, pp. 11–15.
12. IPN, SOB 425.
13. AŻIH, 301/3959, in Machcewicz and Persak, Wokół Jedwabnego, 2:240.
14. Testimony of Jadwiga Ciurzycka, in “Knyszyn,” pp. 112–113.
15. VHF, # 546, testimony of Tauba Schuster (Goldsztejn); and AŻIH, 301/985, testimony of Tema Kaplan, p. 2.

KRYNKI

Pre-1939: Krynki (Yiddish: Krinik), town, Grodno powiat, Białystok województwo, Poland; 1939–1941: Krynki raion, Belostok oblast', Belorussian SSR; 1941–1944: Kreis Sokolka, Distrikt Białystok; post-1999: województwo podlaskie, Poland

Krynki lies on the Krynki River 47.1 kilometers (29.3 miles) east-northeast of Białystok and 25.8 kilometers (16 miles) southwest of Sokółka. Its 1921 population of 5,206 included 3,495 Jews. In September 1939, the first month of World War II, the Germans initially occupied Krynki but soon evacuated it to make way for Soviet forces. The Jewish population swelled to more than 4,000 under Soviet rule, as refugees from German-occupied Poland settled there.

The Yiddish caption reads: “Krynka [Krynki] Jews force-marched to work by the Nazis in 1942.”

USHMM WS #49113, COURTESY OF YIVO

Following the German invasion of the Soviet Union on June 22, 1941, German bombardment damaged Krynki and killed a number of residents including 50 Jews. A Wehrmacht unit captured Krynki on June 28. On June 30, German security forces executed 16 Jews. In July, more Jews were executed, for communism, after denunciations by Polish “informants,” likely members of the newly appointed auxiliary police force.¹ German military authorities mandated forced labor for adult Jews. In late August, a civilian administration, led by an Amtskommissar, replaced the military commandant. A Gendarmerie post was established, employing about six soldiers.

In late November 1941, local German authorities ordered a Jewish Council (Judenrat) created and began organizing a ghetto. Located in a Jewish neighborhood, the ghetto spanned from southwestern to northeastern Krynki. Its boundary included the southern sides of Kościelna Street, the market square, and a part of Rynkowa Street. From there, the ghetto area encompassed 3 hectares (7.4 acres), south to the Krynki River. At its most northeastern point, on Rynkowa Street, the boundary turned south along the western sides of Cerkiewna and then Indura Streets. Jews constructed the fence, from wooden planks and barbed wire, and two guard towers. The main entrance, a wooden gate, opened to the market square, near Garbarska Street.

On December 21, 1941, local authorities gave the Jews several days to move into the ghetto. German and Polish policemen searched the Jews at the gate, confiscating about half of their possessions. A number of Christians watched the move, eager to claim the items that the Jews were forced to leave behind.

A German “ghetto commander” named Mangel oversaw the Krynki ghetto. He likely was appointed by the Sokolka Kreiskommissar, Landrat Amman. Mangel issued instructions to the Jewish Council. A 25-member Jewish police force, commanded by Yankel Kazaltchik (or Kozolczyk), assisted the Judenrat to carry out the orders. Polish policemen guarded the outside of the ghetto. The ghetto population initially stood at about 4,500.²

Every morning Jews would assemble at 6:00 A.M. to be escorted to work outside the ghetto by the Polish police. Some worked in tanning factories; others repaired roads, dug peat, or cut wood. About 40 Jews worked six-day stints on nearby estates. Because inmates received a daily 100-gram (3.5-ounce) bread ration and some potatoes, work outside the ghetto provided the opportunity to barter material possessions with the local population for extra food. The police beat those caught smuggling produce into the ghetto. In January 1942, the Germans ordered 20 men arrested. Sources disagree about whether the men were notables held hostage for ransom or a group of mainly ritual slaughterers (shochtim) denounced for smuggling calves into the ghetto. Despite a ghetto-wide effort to ransom them from a Białystok prison, they were executed by May 1942.³

Early in the morning of April 1, 1942, one day before the start of Passover, the 3rd Company of Police Battalion 91, under the command of Wilhelm Ahrens, arrived in Krynki. At 8:00 A.M., on the market square, Ahrens ordered his men to search the ghetto for concealed weapons, food, leather, and metal goods and to kill Jews too sick or too old for work. The police searched the houses in the ghetto and ordered confiscated items brought near the large synagogue. Soon, the police started shooting Jews. By the time the company departed Krynki at midday, the policemen had murdered 39 mostly elderly men and women, including Reb Leib Segal.⁴

After Passover 1942, the Germans transferred to the Krynki ghetto about 1,200 Jews from Brzostowica Wielka. The Germans held back about 200 people from the approximately 700-member Brzostowica community to widen and pave the road from Białystok to Wołkowysk. Among the 500 additional deportees were conscripts from other ghettos brought to Brzostowica for road construction and Jews from southern Kreis Grodno and eastern Kreis Sokolka ordered in mid-February 1942 to reside in Brzostowica Wielka. Among the latter were the communities of Spudwiły and Brzostowica Mała.

Conditions worsened in the Krynki ghetto as the new inmates increased the population to 5,500 to 5,700, reducing the 1.5 square meters (16 square feet) of residential space initially accorded each inmate. Orders in 1942 to exclude Garbarska Street from the ghetto increased congestion. A pedestrian bridge, constructed over the street, enabled contact between the two ghettos, but the resulting sanitation problems from overcrowding raised the mortality rate from typhus. At least 200 inmates were sent on work assignments outside the ghetto in May 1942. The conscripts worked at construction and agricultural labor in Kreis Grodno, including working on road construction in Wielkie Ejsymonty, building barracks at a labor camp in Zielona, and working at a fishery in Repla, in Kreis Wolkowysk.⁵

Upon learning of the destruction of Jewish communities, including Słonim, in Generalkommissariat Weissruthenien, some Krynki Jews pleaded to join partisans they encountered during forestry labor. Interested only in robbing the Jews of their axes, the partisans dismissed the requests. By late December 1942, a number of Krynki refugees to Białystok had established a partisan organization. The 20 to 40 pre-war Communists and Bundists in the Krynki group were the first large underground organization to abandon the Białystok ghetto for the forests.⁶

On November 2, 1942, the Krynki ghetto was liquidated. An underground Bundist publication in the Warsaw ghetto subsequently claimed that the Krynki Jews resisted the expulsion with arms, resulting in the deaths of 12 Gendarmes.⁷ However, Krynki survivors do not recall such an uprising. The Germans held back approximately 350 people, mostly tanning factory workers and a few others, to clean out the ghetto. The remaining Jews were taken 60 kilometers (37.3 miles) over two days to a transit camp in Kielbasin, near Grodno. A day earlier, on November 1, German security officers, Gendarmes, and Polish auxiliary police had rounded up all the remaining Jewish laborers in southern Kreis Grodno and eastern Kreis Sokolka, including 150 former Krynki ghetto residents and about 150 others from Indura, Lunna, and Brzostowica. Held overnight in Massalany (or Masalany), near Wielkie Ejsymonty, the captives were driven the next day to Kielbasin.

The Krynki inmates at Kielbasin were sent to the Treblinka extermination camp. Two survivors provide different dates, November 15 and 25, for the expulsion. Contextual evidence in one of the accounts further suggests that the community may have been sent to Treblinka about a week before the SS closed the transit camp, shortly after December 20–21.⁸ The Krynki Jews were gassed on arrival at Treblinka.

On January 23, 1943, the surviving Jews in Krynki were driven to Sokółka and sent to the Auschwitz death camp on a transport, which also carried inmates from the Sokółka and Jasionówka ghettos. Forewarned by a Polish policeman of the impending expulsion, at least 50 Krynki Jews fled the evening before the deportation.⁹ Others jumped from the train. Some of the fugitives arrived on January 25 at the Białystok ghetto. That same day, at Auschwitz II-Birkenau, the Germans held back from the transport 193 people—161 men and 32 women—as concentration camp prisoners. The remaining 2,107 people on the transport were gassed on arrival. Less than 10 Krynki prisoners survived until liberation.

A handful of Jews survived the war hiding near Krynki. Piotr and Stanisława Begański sheltered Eliahu and Frida Kuszniir (or Kushnir). A Russian engineer named Dmitrov hid Leah Wolf (later, Lola Resnick) and Perl Lewi. Feivel Wolf ultimately joined a partisan unit. The ranks of the Krynki group were decimated during an armed struggle, on February 10, 1943, to break a German encirclement of the forest, near Lipowy Most. Only three members of the group survived the war.

Wilhelm Ahrens was sentenced by a Soviet military tribunal in 1950 to 25 years in prison. He returned to West Germany under an amnesty in 1955. He was tried in Düsseldorf, together with two other members of Police Battalion 91, for the murders in Krynki on April 1, 1942. The three men, in 1973, were acquitted on legal grounds, as no “base motives” could be found for the killings.¹⁰

SOURCES Published sources on Krynki include Abraham Soyfer (or Soifer), ed., Krinki in burban (Montevideo: Di Krinker Hilfs-Faraynen fun Urugvay un Argentine, 1948); Dov Rabin, ed., Pinkas Krinki (Tel Aviv: ha-Irgunim shel yots’e Krinki bi-Medinat Yisrael uva-tefutsot, 1970) (available in a complete English translation, by Dora Rytman and Judie Goldstein, at www.jewishgen.org/yizkor/Krynki/krynki.html); Hurban Volkovisk be-Milhemet ha-’olam ha-sheniyah, 1939/1945 (Tel Aviv: Vaad irgun yots’e Volkovisk be-Erets-Yisra’el, 1946) (available in an English translation as Sefer zikaron Volkovisk. The Volkovysk Memorial Book, trans. Jacob Solomon Berger [Mahwah, NJ: J.S. Berger, 2000], pt. 2).

Katarzyna Fąfara, “Holocaust Krynskich Żydów. Pamięć dla przyszłości,” an electronic source, is helpful for its map and description of the Krynki ghetto boundaries. Some information on the Krynki community is included in Stefan Klemp, Nicht ermittelt: Polizeibataillone und die Nachkriegsjustiz: Ein Handbuch (Essen: Klartext, 2005), pp. 210–213. Also important are the relevant entries in Shmuel Spector and Bracha Freundlich, eds., Pinkas ha-kehillot. Encyclopaedia of Jewish Communities: Poland, vol. 8, Vilna, Białystok, Nowogródek (Jerusalem: Yad Vashem, 2005), pp. 138–139 (Brzostowica Wielka) and pp. 568–575 (Krynki); and in its English-language counterpart, Arnon Rubin, The Rise and Fall of Jewish Communities in Poland and Their Relics Today, vol. 1, District Białystok (Tel Aviv: Tel Aviv University Press, 2006), pp. 116–124 (Krynki). For Stanisława and Piotr Begański, honored by Yad Vashem in 1965 as Righteous Among the Nations, see Israel Gutman and Sara Bender, eds., The Encyclopedia of the Righteous among the Nations: Rescuers of Jews during the Holocaust, vol. 2, Poland, 2 pts. (Jerusalem: Yad Vashem, 2004), pt. 1, pp. 88–89.

Documents on the annihilation of the Jewish communities in Krynki and Brzostowica Wielka under the German occupation in World War II can be found in the following archives: AŻIH (e.g., Ankiety, and 301/1288, 3154, and 3600); BA-L (B 162/14498); IPN (e.g., ASG [46/85]); USHMM (RG-15.019M [IPN], 46/85, and RG-15.079M [AŻIH], II/338/a [CD: # 8, 423.II/338/1], pp. 44–45); IPN-Bi (Ko-12/89, Ko-54/89, S-48/68, S-54/67 [Polish witness depositions for BA-L (B 162/14498)], S-860/71 [Brzostowica Wielka]); VHF (# 17461, 18378, 26458, 37482, and 47393); and YVA (e.g., O-3/1327 and M-11/58, B 85). The Ringelblum archive documentation cited below also has appeared in BŻIH, no. 76 (1970): 49–79.

Martin Dean and Laura Crago

NOTES

1. YVA, O-3/1327, cited in Andrzej Żbikowski, U genezy Jedwabnego (Warsaw: Żydowski Instytut Historyczny, 2006), p. 343; and AŻIH, 301/1288, testimony of Chaim Wajner, pp. 1–2.
2. USHMM, RG-15.019M (IPN), ASG, reel 14, 46/85, pp. 1–2.
3. Compare VHF, # 26458; and Rubin, The Rise, p. 121.
4. BA-L, B 162/14498 (Urteil LG-Dü, 8 Ks 2/71), pp. 20–28; and Rabin, Pinkas Krinki, pp. 317–318.
5. VHF, # 18378, testimony of Steven Guzik.
6. Rabin, Pinkas Krinki, pp. 312–314.
7. Wiadomości, no. 5, January 1–6, 1943, pp. 1–2, in USHMM, RG-15.079M (AŻIH), Ring II/338/a [CD: # 8, 423.II/338/1], pp. 44–45.
8. Rabin, Pinkas Krinki, respectively, pp. 287 and 272.
9. VHF, # 26458, testimony of Lola Resnick.
10. See Urteil LG-Dü, 8 Ks 2/71.

KRZEMIENICA KOŚCIELNA

Pre-1939: Krzemienica Kościelna, village, Wołkowysk powiat, Białystok województwo, Poland; 1939–1941: Kremianitsa, Zel'va raion, Grodno oblast', Belorussian SSR; 1941–1944: Krzemienica Koscielna, Kreis Wołkowysk, Distrikt Białystok; post-1991: Kramianitsa, Hrodna voblasts', Republic of Belarus

Krzemienica Kościelna is located 60 kilometers (47.5 miles) southeast of Grodno in interwar Poland's Wołkowysk powiat.

It was bounded in the north by the Piaski gmina, in the east by the Zelwianka River, in the south by the Zelwa and Izabelin gminas, and in the west by the Biskupice gmina, which surrounded the town of Wołkowysk.

The Jews in the Krzemienica gmina, some 126 in number in 1921, were dispersed across its territory, living mostly as the only Jewish inhabitants in about 13 small villages. In some of the villages, including Awdziejewicze, Derkacze, and Podbłocie, they had worked the land as farmers for generations. A handful of Jews settled in Krzemienica only after it came under Soviet occupation during the first month of World War II, in September 1939. Yitzhak Resnick, for example, was ordered there to establish a medical clinic. He and his brother's family increased the Jewish population of Krzemienica village to about 23 (four families).

The Germans occupied Krzemienica at the end of June 1941. In the fall of 1941, they established the Krzemienica Koscielna Amtskommissariat on the lands of the pre-war gmina. The German presence there was small. In addition to the Amtskommissar and his family, six Germans worked as Gendarmes in a police station in Krzemienica. Another German was assigned to the Amtskommissariat as a production manager. To assist them, the Germans established a local auxiliary police force, composed mostly of Poles.

German military authorities, in July, ordered a 3-person Jewish Council (Judenrat) formed for the approximately 70 Jews in the Krzemienica Koscielna Amtskommissariat. The Judenrat was headquartered in Krzemienica but represented all of the Jewish inhabitants of the Amtskommissariat. The German authorities dispossessed the Jews of their movable property, including valuables, farming implements, and machinery. Officials in Kreis Wołkowysk revoked the leases held by Jews on farmsteads, expropriated all arable land owned by Jews, and confiscated their horses and livestock.

The Krzemienica Amtskommissar transformed every Jewish house into an open ghetto by forbidding their residents from leaving the dwellings in which they lived, except to work at forced labor. The German administration conscripted the Jews for construction work. They built a Gendarmerie post, stables, a post office, and many other structures in Krzemienica village. In spring 1942, the Jews worked on local road construction projects.

The Krzemienica Jews devised ways to soften the anti-Jewish decrees, which effectively kept them prisoner in their homes. Small gifts to the Amtskommissar and his wife, including a pair of boots and a fur coat, enabled the Judenrat to mitigate some anti-Jewish decrees. Equally important, the Germans all sought the medical services of Resnick, although it was illegal under Nazi racial laws for them to do so. The doctor exploited his illicit professional relationships with local German officials to secure for the Jews various permits that enabled them to enter the forest to gather wood for winter heating fuel, to travel occasionally between villages within the Amtskommissariat, and to gather together in Krzemienica in 1942 for Passover and High Holiday services.

VOLUME II: PART A

The Germans expelled the Jews from the Krzemienica Amtskommissariat on November 2, 1942. Beginning at 4:00 A.M., a Gendarme, accompanied by two members of the auxiliary police, went from house to house, giving the Jews 10 minutes to dress and to pack food for three days, long underwear, and work clothes. The auxiliary police drove from their houses those Jews who took more than the allotted time. At 7:00 A.M., when all of the Jews of the Amtskommissariat had been gathered in the courtyard of the Gendarmerie post, the Gendarmes and the auxiliary police drove them to Zelwa. At the Zelwa train station, the Krzemienica Jews were transferred to the control of a large SS contingent waiting there for about 2,400 Jews to arrive from communities, including Zelwa, from the most eastern parts of Kreis Wołkowysk. The SS randomly beat up the Jews assembled at the train station and dispossessed them of the few possessions they had been allowed to bring before driving them at 2:00 P.M. onto cattle wagons, on a train destined for a transit camp, located just outside Wołkowysk on the grounds of a pre-war Polish cavalry garrison.

At the transit camp, where the SS had consolidated the approximately 20,000 Jewish inhabitants of Kreis Wołkowysk to facilitate their deportation to extermination camps, the Jewish communities from the Zelwa deportation lived together in deplorable conditions for about a month in two subterranean barracks. Several hundred deportees from a labor camp in Brzostowica Wielka also resided in the Zelwa bunkers. (Because the labor camp was located in Kreis Grodno, the deportees came mostly from there, including from the ghetto in Łunna.) The Zelwa bunkers likely also were the temporary residence of about 150 young men from the ghetto of Kamionka, brought to a labor camp in Wołkowysk in the early summer of 1942.¹ The men's numbers suggest they came from the so-called Kamionka near Grodno (Kamionka koło Grodna), which during World War II was a settlement in Kreis Grodno located about 24 kilometers (almost 15 miles), by road, west of the town of Szczuczyn.

The Krzemienica Jews were expelled from the transit camp and sent, either on November 26 or December 2, 1942, in the second Wołkowysk transport to the Treblinka extermination camp. The transport, also named the Zelwa deportation for the larger community expelled with the Krzemienica Jews, likely also included the former Brzostowica labor camp inmates and the Jewish laborers from Kamionka, though many of the latter already had perished from exposure, likely contracted at the labor camp or from diseases related to malnutrition and starvation. Whether the communities of Jałówka, Mścibów, Piaski, and Mosty were on the same transport or were sent to Treblinka on subsequent transports remains an open question. Almost all the approximately 18,300 Jews in the Wołkowysk transports to Treblinka were gassed on arrival, as the Germans are known to have held back only 60 to 70 men from the Jałówka and Mścibów transport as prisoners of the Treblinka I labor camp, with only 1 known survivor from among the prisoners.

Of the Krzemienica Jews, only Resnick and his family are known to have escaped the deportation to Treblinka. (Physicians were held back to help contain a typhus epidemic at the camp.) Resnick's brother, sister, and niece were among the last group of 1,700 to 2,000 Wołkowysk inmates sent on January 26, 1943, to the Auschwitz extermination camp. They all perished there. However, Resnick fled the transit camp, together with the Mosty physician Noah Kaplinsky, on the day of the Auschwitz deportation. The two made their way to Krzemienica, where they were sheltered by a local Christian family. Also counted among survivors are Nachum and Shimon Reznitsky, two brothers from Krzemienica, who had fled to Independent Lithuania during the Soviet occupation and immigrated from there to Palestine.

SOURCES This entry is based on the two published testimonies about the Jewish communities of Krzemienica Kościelna. The first, by Yitzhak Reznik, is summarized in "Krzemienica," in Moses Einhorn, ed., Volkovisker Yisker-Bukh (New York, 1949); and the second, by Nakhum Reznitsky, "Krzemienica," appears in the third Wołkowysk yizkor book, compiled by Katri'el Lashovits, ed., Volkovisk: Sipurah shel kehilah Yehudit-Tsionit bushmedab ba-Sho'ah (Tel Aviv: K. Lashovits, 1988). Both testimonies are available in English translation in the Wołkowysk yizkor book trilogy Sefer zikaron Volkovisk. The Volkovysk Memorial Book, trans. Jacob Solomon Berger (Mahwah, NJ: J.S. Berger, 2000), pt. 1, pp. 316–318, and pt. 3, pp. 106–107, respectively. The fate of Reznik's brother and his family at Auschwitz is covered in Izaak Goldberg, The Miracles versus Tyranny: The Fight for Life and Death between the Jewish People and the Nazis (New York: Philosophical Library, Inc., 1979).

Laura Crago

NOTE

1. Noah Kaplinsky, "Volkovysk in Its Death Throes," from Hurban Volkovisk be-Milhemet ha-'olam ha-sbeniyah, 1939/1945 (Tel Aviv: Vaad irgun yots'e Volkovisk be-Erets-Yisrael, 1946), in Sefer zikaron Volkovisk, pt. 2, p. 44.

KUŹNICA BIAŁOSTOCKA

Pre-1939: Kuźnica Białostocka, village, Sokółka powiat, Białystok województwo, Poland; 1939–1941: Kuznitsa, Sokulka raion, Belostok oblast', Belorussian SSR; 1941–1944: Kuznitsa, Kreis Sokolka, Distrikt Białystok; post-1998: Kuźnica, village, Sokółka powiat, województwo podlaskie, Poland

Kuźnica is located 15.5 and 56.2 kilometers (about 9.6 and 35 miles) north-northeast, respectively, of Sokółka and Białystok. Today, it lies on the Polish border with the Republic of Belarus. In 1931, the population of Kuźnica Białostocka stood at 1,428, including 556 Jews.

In World War II, Kuźnica was occupied first by the Germans, for about two weeks. They evacuated the village in the middle of September 1939 to make way for the Red Army. During the Soviet occupation, the Jewish population may have swelled to 1,000, as refugees from German-occupied Poland settled there.

A Wehrmacht unit reoccupied Kuźnica Białostocka about a week after Germany, on June 22, 1941, invaded the Soviet Union. The military commander immediately established a stringent curfew, ordering all Jews confined to their homes. When permitted outside, the Jews were forbidden to maintain contact with Christians. They were required to wear a yellow patch on their clothing. The men were ordered to shave their beards and side locks. The Germans made forced labor obligatory for almost every Jew, from young children to the elderly.¹ The Germans also ordered a Jewish Council (Judenrat) established. Its primary responsibility was to turn over valuables, to pay fines imposed on the Jewish community, and to meet German demands for forced labor. To help enforce the anti-Jewish decrees, the Germans established a Polish auxiliary police force.

In August 1941, the Germans, most likely an SS unit that had arrived in Kuźnica, burned the Jewish neighborhood. In November, the Germans deported most of the survivors to the Grodno ghetto. Among the deportees was Stanisław Bałc (also, Sądokierski or Sandomierski), a Soviet-era refugee from Warsaw. Rather than be deported to Grodno, some Kuźnica Jews fled to the Sokółka ghetto.² The Germans ordered a part of the community to remain in Kuźnica. What factors determined which Jews were deported or retained is not known.

The fire likely led the Germans to gather the Jews ordered to remain in Kuźnica Białostocka into a ghetto. However, sparse documentation makes it difficult to determine specifically how Jewish residential patterns were reordered after the fire. Scholars, in fact, disagree about whether a ghetto was established in Kuźnica. There are nonetheless some suggestions in the post-war depositions of Christians, collected after the war by the Polish Institute of National Remembrance (IPN), that the Germans instituted at least an open ghetto in Kuźnica Białostocka. In addition to tightly controlling when Jews could be outside of their homes, the Gendarmes enforced prohibitions on Jews leaving the settlement without permission. In 1942, a Gendarme found a 60-year-old Jewish man, named Abel, heading towards Podlipki village (Kuźnica gmina, Sokółka powiat). He beat and kicked Abel so severely that the man died the next day from his injuries.³

Living conditions were difficult for the Jews in Kuźnica Białostocka. Overcrowding was a persistent problem. Food was next to impossible to obtain in the burned-out town. Some Christians, for payment, did provide the Jews with provisions. Others smuggled bread and potatoes to their Jewish friends for no compensation. The Germans executed the Jews they caught conducting such transactions.⁴ Police terror and humiliation was a part of Jewish existence. In the fall of 1941, the Germans ordered a group of young women to clean some public latrines. When they protested, the women were arrested for insubordination and are presumed to have been executed. Another time, the Germans demanded the Judenrat order Rabbi Eckstein to join a forced labor brigade working to retrieve boulders in the river. The policeman charged with guarding Eckstein beat him.⁵ A local Christian, Adolf Wołyniec, likely a member of the auxiliary police, was tried after the war for beating Jews in Kuźnica.⁶

On November 2, 1942, the Germans surrounded Kuźnica, in preparation for the expulsion of the Jewish community. Jews too sick or too old to travel were shot outside of their houses. The rest were loaded onto wagons or marched on foot the approximately 16 kilometers (9.9 miles) northeast to a transit camp, located in Kielbasin, a former estate just south of Grodno.⁷ Perhaps because an inmate from Kuźnica was appointed one of the two Jewish assistants of Karl Rinzler, the notoriously brutal commandant of the transit camp, the community was among the last to be expelled from Kielbasin. Sometime after December 14, 1942, they were driven on foot to the train station at Łosośna.⁸ Some sources claim they were sent from there to the Auschwitz extermination camp. However, the timing of the expulsion suggests the Kuźnica Jews more likely were sent to the Treblinka extermination camp and gassed on arrival. (German reversals at the Battle of Stalingrad [July 17, 1942–February 2, 1943] and simultaneous pressure created by German troops elsewhere returning home for the Christmas holidays created a shortage of railway stock for the expulsion of the Jews of Distrikt Białystok to the extermination camps. As a result, the Germans began, from mid-December, to send the Kielbasin inmates to Treblinka, which was much closer than Auschwitz.)

A number of Jews evaded deportation to Treblinka. Most likely on the day of the expulsion from Kuźnica Białostocka, 15 young families made their way to the Krynki ghetto, one of a handful of provincial ghettos that remained in Distrikt Białystok after November 2, 1942. Denied admittance there, they were forced to seek shelter elsewhere.⁹ Some Christian families also extended shelter to Kuźnica Jews. Anna Wojtkiewicz Rudź, the Christian mother-in-law of Stanisław Bałc, and her cousin, Józef Januszkiewicz, arranged the escape of Bałc from the Grodno ghetto. They hid him first in Radziewiczze village (Kuźnica gmina, Sokółka powiat) and then, with assistance from the local sołtys, in Nowodziel village.¹⁰ In Nowodziel, Jan Kocisz also extended shelter to a Kuźnica rabbi and his daughter.¹¹ Paulina Rapiej (later Borowik), a resident of Czuprynowo village, hid two daughters of a Kuźnica physician in a basement she dug for them in her home.¹²

The subsequent fates of the Jews are not known, but most are believed to have been among the 19 Jews known to have been executed after November 2, 1942, by members of the Kuźnica Gendarmerie post; 6 victims, discovered together in 1942, were executed by Gendarmes Paul Neuman, Franz Iwanski, Arthur Langner, and Fritz Teubert.¹³ A Jewish woman, her 14-year-old daughter, and three men in their 20s, executed in 1943, likely also were from Kuźnica.¹⁴ Another 6 victims had jumped from a train, probably the March 1943 transport that brought the surviving Jews of the Grodno I ghetto to the Białystok ghetto.¹⁵ The pre-war residences of 2 Jewish men shot in December 1943 by Gendarme Paul Neuman are unknown.¹⁶

SOURCES The sparse secondary accounts about the Kuźnica Białostocka Jewish community during World War II are divided about the existence of a ghetto. For works maintaining the documentation is insufficient to determine whether a ghetto existed in Kuźnica, see “Gmina żydowska przed 1939—Kuźnica,” on the educational section of ŻIH’s Web site, at www.jewishinstitute.org.pl/pl/gminy/miasto/64.html; and “Kuźnica,” on Polin, the Web site of the Foundation for the Preservation of Jewish Heritage in Poland, at <http://polin.org.pl>. The latter site notes the fire likely made the establishment of a ghetto impossible. For the works of historians asserting that a ghetto existed in Kuźnica, see the relevant entries in Shmuel Spector and Bracha Freundlich, eds., Pinkas ha-kehillot. Encyclopaedia of Jewish Communities: Poland, vol. 8, Vilna, Białystok, Nowogródek (Jerusalem: Yad Vashem, 2005), pp. 543–544; and Shmuel Spector and Geoffrey Wigoder, eds., Encyclopedia of Jewish Life before and during the Holocaust, 3 vols. (Jerusalem: Yad Vashem; New York: New York University Press, 2001), 2:695, with the second mistakenly locating Kuźnica today in the Republic of Belarus. Also useful, particularly for population and deportation figures, is Szymon Datner, “Eksterminacja ludności żydowskiej w Okręgu Białostockim,” BŻIH, no. 60 (1966): 47 (tab. 7); and for Christian aid to Kuźnica Jews, Waldemar Monkiewicz, “Za cenę życia. O ratowaniu Żydów w Białostockiem w okresie okupacji niemieckiej,” Białostoccy Żydzi 2 (1997): 173, 208. The brief references to the Kuźnica Białostocka community in the testimony of Feivel (or Fajwel) Wolf, “In Rinzler’s Hell,” in Dov Rabin, ed., Pinkas Krinki (Tel Aviv: ha-Irgunim shel yots’e Krinki bi-Medinat Yi’sra’el uva-tefutsot, 1970), remain the most significant means, at present, to date the expulsion of the Kuźnica Jews to the Treblinka extermination camp.

Archival documentation for the Kuźnica Białostocka Jewish community under German occupation during World War II includes IPN (SOB 389); IPN-Bi (Ankiety, ASG, Ds-86/67, Ko-109/87, and S-610/71); USHMM (RG-15.019M [IPN], reel 1, 2 [200–202, and 204]); and YVA (M-1-B/1530, M-1-E/1486, M-49-E (e.g., 5387), and O-22/50).

Laura Crago and Monika Tomkiewicz

NOTES

1. “Kuźnica,” in Spector and Freundlich, Pinkas ha-kehillot, 8:543.
2. IPN-Bi, Ko-109/87 (formerly 1/1030), p. 45 (deposition, Zygmunt Rudź, for Grodno; and Datner, “Eksterminacja,” p. 47 (tab. 7), for Sokółka.
3. IPN-Bi, S-610/71 or Ds 86/67 (1/387), p. 6 (deposition, Stanisław Czepiel).
4. “Kuźnica,” in Spector and Freundlich, Pinkas ha-kehillot, 8:543.
5. Ibid., with sources noting the last rabbi of Kuźnica was not Eckstein but Ajzyk Lejb Stolar.
6. IPN, SOB 389, case of Adolf Wołyniec.
7. Ibid., p. 4 (deposition, Józef Czepiel).
8. Wolf, “In Rinzler’s Hell,” pp. 285–291.
9. “Kuźnica,” in Spector and Freundlich, Pinkas ha-kehillot, 8:544.
10. IPN-Bi, Ko-109/87, p. 45.
11. Ibid., p. 60 (administrative note, Commander of Citizen’s Militia in Kuźnica).

12. Ibid., p. 39 (deposition, Edward Rapiej).
13. USHMM, RG-15.019M (IPN), ASG, reel 1, 2/200, pp. 1–2.
14. IPN-Bi, Ds 86/67 or S-610 (1/389), p. 19 (deposition, Edward Kurczewski); and S-610/71 or S-620 (1/387), p. 6.
15. USHMM, RG-15.019M, reel 1, 2/202, pp. 1–2, with the December 1943 date listed here likely incorrect, as no Jews were concentrated anywhere in the region by then.
16. Ibid., reel 1, 2/203, pp. 1–2.

ŁAPY

Pre-1939: Łapy, town, Wysokie Mazowieckie powiat, Białystok województwo, Poland; 1939–1941: Łapy, raion center, Belostok oblast’, Belorussian SSR; 1941–1944: Kreis Białystok, Distrikt Białystok; post-1998: Łapy, Białystok powiat, województwo podlaskie, Poland

Łapy lies on the Narew River, about 28 kilometers (17.4 miles) southwest of Białystok. From 1870, it was home to a large shop established to repair the locomotives and wagons used on the Warsaw-to-St. Petersburg railway. Its 1921 population of 3,495 included 624 Jews.

In World War II, Łapy initially sustained German aerial bombardment, with several Jews perishing in the attacks.¹ After briefly occupying the town, the Germans withdrew at the end of September, 1939, to make way for the Red Army.

The Germans reoccupied Łapy around June 24, 1941. They immediately searched Jewish homes for valuables and to find evidence of Communist sedition. As a result of the searches, 13 Jews were arrested and shot in the early summer of 1941.²

The Germans ordered a Judenrat created; however, evidence of its activities remains scarce.

In July 1941, the Germans established an open ghetto in Łapy, likely by forbidding Jews from leaving the boundaries of the town without permission. Szymon Datner, the first scholar to recognize the existence of an open ghetto in Łapy, does not indicate whether the Germans took additional steps to limit Jewish residence there. The Germans conscripted the Łapy Jews for forced labor. Women worked at agricultural labor on nearby estates. Men labored on local road construction projects and unloaded materials and repaired track beds at the railway station and at the train repair facility, controlled in this period by the SS.³

The Germans consolidated some smaller nearby Jewish communities in the Łapy ghetto, including, in September 1941, the 17 Jewish residents of Kowalewszczyzna village. However, Jews in other nearby communities were sent to ghettos much further away. In August 1942, for instance, Gendarmes at the Łapy Gendarmerie ordered the Jewish inhabitants of Pietkowo deported. When 33 of the 40 Jews fled to Łapy, the Gendarmes refused the 25,000 Reichsmark (RM) bribe the fugitives offered to live in the Łapy ghetto. Instead, they ordered the Łapy Judenrat to turn over the Pietkowo Jews. They were sent in a closed train wagon to the ghetto in Jeziory, in Kreis Grodno.⁴

At the end of October, some local Poles had informed the Jews that they had been ordered to bring 150 wagons on November 2, 1942, to Łapy to assist with the deportation of the Jewish community. Many Jews are believed to have sought hiding places outside of Łapy. Another approximately 300 Jews from Łapy and Sokoły decided to flee, at 4:00 A.M., while they were waiting for the start of labor at the railway station and saw an SS unit approaching Łapy.

The SS took the rest of the Łapy Jewish community to a transit camp located on the southern outskirts of Białystok on a former training ground of the Polish 10th Cavalry Brigade. Some of the Łapy fugitives likely accepted “safe transit” offers to the Białystok transit camp extended by local Gendarmerie commanders in order to secure the return of hundreds of Łapy and Sokoły Jews known to have fled from the deportation.⁵ The only known Łapy survivor of the transit camp was Jadwiga Chinson Kretowicz, rescued from there by her husband Józef, a Christian. The rest of the Łapy Jews, perhaps as many as 450 people, were sent to the Treblinka extermination camp sometime between the end of November and December 15, 1942. They were all gassed on arrival.

Some Jewish fugitives in Łapy are known to have been sheltered by local Poles. Julian Charin, a prominent local physician and a member of the Polish Home Army (AK), received assistance from many Poles, arranged mostly by Henryk Bagiński and Feliks Zalewski, the respective heads of Roman Catholic churches in Łapy and Topczewo village. However, after another Pole betrayed Charin’s hiding place, he was shot on March 18, 1943, outside of Topczewo, by members of the Topczewo Gendarmerie post. The AK likely revenged his murder by executing the informant. Charin’s sister, Mina (later Omer), survived the war, sheltered first by Charin’s fiancée, Maria Kuzin, then by Zalewski, and finally by another priest in Hodyszewo village, most likely Józef Perkowski. In Łapy, Bagiński was determined to protect Kretowicz, whose conversion to Christianity he had sponsored. He used his Sunday homilies to urge his parishioners not to reveal the hiding places of Jews to authorities. She survived the war, as did the sisters Lea and Rivka Srebolov, sheltered by the owner of a Łapy cycle shop.⁶ Icchak Żółty reportedly perished at the hands of his Polish aid-giver when he could no longer afford to pay him.⁷

Only about 12 Łapy Jews, including 2 who had been in the Soviet interior, survived the war.

SOURCES Several published memoirs touch on life in Łapy during the war, including Sol Rubenstein and Toby Rubenstein, “Our Family: Łapy, Poland,” on the virtual Museum of Family History at www.museumoffamilyhistory.org/sfoah-lapy-rubinstein.htm; and the relevant sections on Łapy by the chronicler of the Sokoły Jewish community in Avidgor Ben-Dov, ed., Deliverance. The Diary of Michael Maik. A True Story, trans. Laia Ben-Dov (Kedumim, Israel: Keterpress, 2004).

Secondary works include Szymon Datner, “Eksterminacja ludności żydowskiej w Okręgu Białostockim,” BŻIH, no. 60 (1966): 14, 35 (tab. 2); Leopold Lazarowitz and Simon Malowist, “Martyred Physicians,” in Louis Falstein, ed., The Martyrdom of Jewish Physicians in Poland (New York: Exposition Press, 1963), pp. 326–327, for Charin; and the relevant entry in Abraham Wein, ed., Pinkas ha-kehillot. Encyclopaedia of Jewish Communities: Poland, vol. 4, Warsaw and Its Region (Jerusalem: Yad Vashem, 2005), pp. 245–246.

As the entry indicates, a small literature examines the efforts of a group of about seven local priests, including in Łapy, to shelter Jews. Stanisław Falkowski, the most well known, is best remembered for assisting Józef Fajwiszys, the 15-year-old son of the noted religious composer and conductor Izrael Fajwiszys, as detailed in “Juzio,” in Władysław Bartoszewski and Zofia Lewinówna, eds., Ten jest z ojczyzny mojej: Polacy z pomocą Żydom, 1939–1945, 3rd ed. (Warsaw: Świat Książki, 2007). However, at least one Polish scholar believes the priests, likely led by Roch Modzielewski, in Piekuty Nowe, and Józef Perkowski, from Hodyszewo village, assisted 40 to 60 fugitives of the liquidation of ghettos in Białystok, Brańsk, Czyżewo, Łapy, and Sokoły. Here see Waldemar Monkiewicz, “Za cenę życia. O ratowaniu Żydów w Białostockiem w okresie okupacji niemieckiej,” Białostoccy Żydzi 2 (1997): 163 ff. Most of the Jews were highly assimilated into Polish culture; others were Christian converts.

Documentation about the history of the Jews of Łapy under German occupation includes IPN-Bi (e.g., Ds [7/69, 298/68, 315/69, 317/68, 323/68, 325/68], Ko [27/87, 35/87, 50/80, 58/87, 107/88], Kpp [4/85], S [19/69, 101/69, 266/689, 311/68, 326/68, 315/69]); and YVA (e.g., O-16/3950, O-3/1336). Accounts describing forced labor at the train station and railway car repair facility are at AŻIH (e.g., 301/3602, 301/3950).

Laura Crago

NOTES

1. Rubenstein and Rubenstein, “Our Family.”
2. Maik, Deliverance, pp. 40–41.
3. Ibid., pp. 61–66, 75–82.
4. AŻIH, 301/2254, testimony of Abraham Blumental, p. 1; Zalman Sukman, “In the Village of Pietkowo,” in Shemu’el Kalisher, ed and trans., Sokoli—ba-ma’avak le-bayim (Tel Aviv: Irgun yots’e Sokoli be-Yisrael, 1975), pp. 221–223, available in English trans. at jewishgen.org.
5. Maik, Deliverance, p. 94.
6. Ibid.; Rubenstein and Rubenstein, “Our Family.”
7. Rubenstein and Rubenstein, “Our Family.” Icchak Żółty belonged to the same Żółty family discussed in the Sokoły entry.

ŁOMŻA

Pre-1939: Łomża, town and powiat center, Białystok województwo, Poland; 1939–1941: Łomża, raion center, Belostok oblast’, Belorussian SSR; 1941–1944: Lomscha, Kreis center, Distrikt Białystok; post-1998: Łomża, powiat center, województwo podlaskie, Poland

Łomża lies on the Narew River, about 80 kilometers (50 miles) west-northwest of Białystok. Its 1921 population of 22,014 included 9,131 Jews, the third-largest Jewish population of any locality in the pre-war Białystok województwo.

From September 1 to September 9, 1939, nearly 1,000 Łomża inhabitants perished during almost daily German aerial bombardments. On September 10–11, the Germans occupied Łomża. German soldiers deported about 500 male Jews to a forced labor camp located near Königsberg. They almost all perished there.¹ Before evacuating Łomża to Soviet forces, Wehrmacht units in German-occupied Poland drove thousands of Jews, including those from Ostrów Mazowiecka and Ostrołęka, across the future German-Soviet border near Łomża. Thousands more arrived in Łomża voluntarily. However, in May 1940, Soviet authorities ordered the refugees to move further from the border. According to German estimates, the Łomża Jewish population stood at 7,500 to 9,000 by late June 1941. Jewish survivors place it at 12,000.

The Germans reoccupied Łomża on June 24–25, 1941. In early July, the SS established offices there. In October 1941, or in early 1942, Wolfgang Erdbrügger became the Gestapo chief for Kreis Lomscha. In late 1942, Ennulat replaced him. A regional civil administration, under Lomscha Kreiskommissar Dr. Karl (or Klaus) Heinrich Hermann von Groeben, was established in July or early August 1941. A German was appointed mayor. The Germans organized a Polish auxiliary police force. Little is known about its formation.

On July 4, Hermann Göring visited Łomża. That day, the Łomża military commander ordered Jews to wear yellow patches on the chest and back and for the kehilla to send 50 to 150 men to assist the SS to move into its new headquarters and houses. The SS took the Jews to a Soviet-era munitions testing range in the Czerwony Bór Forest, known as Giełczyn, and executed them.² A few days later, when the Łomża military commander ordered the kehilla to send 50 to 100 men for another Gestapo work assignment, at least two communal leaders, Rabbis Yaakov Tablicki and Yankl Gelciński (or Galczyński), were shot for refusing the order.³ From July 6 to July 20, the SS unleashed random anti-Jewish violence, rounding up and murdering about 1,000 to 2,000 mostly male Jews and executing them at Giełczyn.⁴

Destitute Jewish men sleep in the doorway of a building in the Łomża ghetto, ca. 1941.

USHMM WS #33456, COURTESY OF GFH

Around July 20, 1941, the SS suspended the violence, and military authorities ordered the formation of a 24-person Jewish Council (Judenrat). Its chair was Mendel Moszyński, a Łomża native, expelled from Germany in 1938. He probably was succeeded by Kaliński, a soap factory owner. The Germans ordered a 25-member Jewish police force created. Its commander, Solomon Herbert, also was a German refugee. The Germans made forced labor compulsory for all adult Jews.

At the end of July, the Germans ordered a ghetto established in an area of approximately 30,000 square meters (7.4 acres) in the old Jewish neighborhood, in Old Town, near the Narew River.⁵ Initially, it was unfenced, but once Jews moved there, they were forbidden from leaving the area without permission.

Although the Jews knew a ghetto was to be created, they may not have been given a specific date to move there. One day in early August, the Gendarmerie gave all Jews 15 minutes to relocate to the ghetto. The Jews could take only 20 kilograms (44 pounds) of belongings. German Gendarmes and Polish auxiliary police surrounded the established entry point to inspect the Jews' possessions and to forcibly confiscate valuables.⁶ That evening, German security forces shattered windows of houses in the ghetto, stole Jewish belongings there, and unsuccessfully attempted to provoke Poles who had not yet moved from the ghetto to attack Jews.⁷

On August 16, 1941, the Germans ordered the Jews assembled on Plac Zielony for a population survey. Upon its completion, the community was ordered to pay a population tax of 25 kilograms (55 pounds) in gold. The Germans threatened to open fire on the new Jewish quarter if the sum was not raised. The Germans also arrested 200 people from a list. The arrestees were executed at Giełczyn.⁸

In early September, the Germans expelled to the Łomża ghetto the Piątница and Łomżyca Jewish communities (about 250 to 300 people). The deportees joined a flood of refugees, including a small number of survivors of anti-Jewish violence in Wizna, Stawiski, Jedwabne, and Rutki-Kossaki. Many Soviet expellees also returned to Łomża to enter the ghetto. In early September, the Judenrat paid half a million Reichsmark (RM) in a bribe for a ghetto expansion. It pushed the ghetto borders to the Narew River and added several apartment buildings near the Great Synagogue.⁹

The SS relied on another large-scale execution to further reduce the ghetto population. On September 1 or 17, 1941, or perhaps on Yom Kippur, with varying dates provided in different sources, the Arbeitsamt ordered all unemployed Jews, regardless of age, to assemble on Plac Zielony to be assigned jobs. An SS unit from Ostrołęka arrested 1,000 to 2,200 of the assembled Jews. Former residents of Piątница and Łomżyca may have been overrepresented in the group because they had yet to secure jobs. Outside of town, the SS released some skilled craftsmen. The remaining captives, 500 to 2,000 people, were executed at Giełczyn.¹⁰

After the execution, the Germans ordered a fence constructed around the ghetto by October 1, 1941. Its main gate was on the corner of Senatorska Street and the Old Square. In November, the Germans deported Jews from nearby localities to the ghetto, including the inmates of the short-lived Jedwabne ghetto. Postwar officials in Łomża maintained the Jedwabne refugees increased the Łomża ghetto population by 1,000, but more recent research indicates the figure is too high. Likely, 7,000 to 8,000 people resided in the Łomża ghetto. However, this figure, most often cited by survivors, is difficult to reconcile with some estimates that as many as 5,000 Łomża Jews had perished in SS executions by the middle of October, unless the high 1941 Jewish population estimate of 12,000 is taken into account.¹¹

Some ghetto inmates labored at workshops eventually established in the ghetto for producing ammunition, soap, leather goods, boots, clothing, and grease. Most worked outside the ghetto at the sugar refinery, cotton gauze factory, and sawmill. Skilled and unskilled workers, from locksmiths and barbers to cleaning women, were assigned to the Gendarmerie, the Schutzpolizei, and the SS, in both Łomża and Ostrołęka. Still others labored for the Łomża municipal administration at tasks from street cleaning to construction and forestry projects. In the spring of 1942, approximately 600 conscripts worked on the Ostrołęka-to-Łomża and Rutki-to-Zambrów road construction projects.

Material conditions in the ghetto were poor. The bread rations were inadequate. Fuel, such as wood for winter heating, was impossible to obtain. Most Jews had difficulties finding Poles willing to barter food and fuel for material possessions.¹² The Polish auxiliary police brutally enforced prohibitions against Jews bringing food into the ghetto. At a checkpoint on the outskirts of town, several policemen discovered three Jews smuggling food on their way home from an Ostrołęka work detail and beat them to death.¹³ The Germans ordered the bodies of some Jews caught illicitly outside the ghetto strung to the ghetto gates. Under these conditions, gold became the only currency accepted for ordinary necessities such as firewood.¹⁴

At times the police used labor conscription as a guise for executions. The Gendarmes entered the ghetto to round up 30 to 40 Jews for a “work assignment.” The Jews never returned. Laborers sent on official Gestapo work assignments also disappeared. The Judenrat decided to fill all future Gestapo labor requests with the chronically ill and the physically and mentally handicapped.¹⁵

With about 8,000 people living in apartments previously occupied by 4,000, overcrowding also created problems with sanitation. The Jewish hospital continued to function, but the absence of medicine led in October 1942 to a typhus epidemic, which claimed many lives.

In late October 1942, many Jews received hints of the ghetto’s impending liquidation. On October 31, Manko, the German security officer responsible for the ghetto, ordered the Jewish Police to collect the best bedding from the ghetto and personally appropriated furniture from Jewish residents. He forcibly removed the Judenrat’s treasury. Most inmates believed their lives at risk. A few hundred fled. At 10:00 P.M., the SS augmented the ghetto’s Polish guard, illuminated its fence, and ordered a shoot-to-kill search for Jewish fugitives.

The ghetto was surrounded by SS reinforcements and Ukrainian auxiliaries.¹⁶

At 6:00 A.M., on November 2, 1942, an SS commander informed the Judenrat that because of the typhus epidemic the Łomża Jews were being transferred to a supposedly cleaner, disease-free camp in Zambrów, about 27 kilometers (17 miles) south of Łomża. Most of the escapees rounded up during sweeps of the forest a few days later also were brought to the Zambrów camp, a pre-war garrison at which the Germans had imprisoned 17,500 to 20,000 Jews from nearby localities to facilitate their expulsion to the extermination camps.

The Łomża Jews were among some of the first and last transit camp inmates to be deported from the Zambrów transit camp. They arrived at the Auschwitz extermination camp on January 13, 17, and 19, 1943, in three transports each carrying about 2,000 people. The Germans chose from the first transport 148 men and 50 women as concentration camp prisoners. They held back 225 men and no women from the second transport, which included the Czyżewo and Śniadowo communities. In the last transport, which also carried a part of the Zambrów community, the Germans held back another 164 men and 134 women as prisoners. The remaining 5,279 Jews were gassed on arrival. No known arrival record exists for a fourth transport of Łomża Jews that arrived in Auschwitz on January 17 or 18.¹⁷ Documentation also is sparse for a small Zambrów transport to a subcamp of the Stutthof concentration camp in Schippenbeil.¹⁸

No more than 16 of Łomża’s concentration camp prisoners lived to see the war’s end. About an equal number of fugitives survived hidden in and around Łomża.¹⁹

SOURCES A number of the archival sources cited below have been published in Polish in Paweł Machcewicz and Krzysztof Persak, eds., Wokół Jedwabnego, 2 vols. (Warsaw: IPN and KŚZpNP, 2002), vol. 1; Studia, p. 470 (AŻIH, Jedwabne ghetto inquiry); vol. 2; Dokumenty, p. 148 (AAN, 202/III-8/64), p. 152 (AAN, 202/I-45/944-52), pp. 230–233, 236–237 (AŻIH, 301/5825); and Mariusz Nowik, Zagłada Żydów na ziemi łomżyńskiej (Warsaw: Bellona, 2006), pp. 108–109, 118 (AŻIH, 301/2205).

The 1939 German occupation of Łomża forms a part of the subject of Chaim Shapiro, Go My Son: A Young Jewish Refugee’s Story of Survival (Jerusalem: Feldheim, 1989). The yizkor book also contains testimonies by Jewish survivors. It is available in Hebrew, Sefer zikaron li-kehillat Lomzah, ed. Yom-Ṭov Leyński (Tel Aviv: Hotsa’at Irgun’ole Lomzah be-Yiśra’el Sefer Zikaron Lekehillas Lomza, 1952), and in Yiddish, Lomzshe, ir oyfkum un untergang, ed. H. Sobotka, trans. Ya’akov Kopl Brukhanski (New York, 1957). It is best read together with Chaim Shapiro, “How Not to Write a ‘Yizkor Book,’” Jewish Observer 14:8 (1980): 18–25. Polish eyewitness testimonies describing the executions of Jews at Giełczyn are in Zdzisław Sędziak, “Las giełczyński oskarża,” Ziemia Łomżyńska, no. 3 (1987): 228–231.

Secondary accounts include the Łomża entry in Abraham Wein, ed., Pinkas ha-kehillot. Encyclopaedia of Jewish Communities: Poland, vol. 4, Warsaw and Its Region (Jerusalem: Yad Vashem, 1986), pp. 249–262, with English translations available at Haskendim, a Jewish genealogy Web site, at www.hashkedim.com/lomza.html; and in Arnon Rubin, The Rise and Fall of the Jewish Communities in Poland and Their Relics Today, vol. 1, District Białystok (Tel Aviv: Tel Aviv University Press, 2006), pp. 125–131.

Archival documentation on the World War II history of the Łomża Jewish community under German occupation includes AAN (e.g., 202 [I-45/4/944-52, III-8/2/64]); APŁmż (e.g., 106/48); AŻIH (e.g., Ankiety [Jedwabne, Łomża], 301 [735, 1990, 2255, 2736, 3810, 4866, 4940, 4958, 5825, 6064]); BA-L (e.g., B 162/5863 [205 AR-Z 13/62, 205 AR 2689/65]); BA-MA (e.g., RH 26-211/84); IPN (e.g., ASG); IPN-Bi (e.g., Ko-57/86, Ko-116/66, S-127/68); USHMM (e.g., RG-15.019M [IPN], reel 1, 2/174, 2/189, reel 14, 46/68); VHF (e.g., # 3473, 8378, 10975, 12830, 15371, 16564, 22626, 31971, 40131, 43021, 47523); and YVA (e.g., O-3/2930, M-49E [AŻIH] [e.g., 544]).

Laura Crago and Monika Tomkiewicz

NOTES

1. AŻIH, 301/735, testimony of Izaak Wiernik, pp. 1–3 (Polish trans.).

2. High and low range, respectively, in ibid.; also, 301/2267, testimony of Liza Bursztyn, p. 1.

3. Shapiro, “How,” pp. 18–25; BA-MA, RH 26-211/84, Sicherungsdienst 221, July 9–11, 1941, in Anlagen zum Kriegstagebuch, in Polish trans. in Machewicz and Persak, Wokół Jedwabnego, 2:161, respectively, for two and three executed.

4. AŻIH, 301/735, pp. 5–6; IPN-Bi, S-122/68, vol. 1, pp. 14–15 (deposition, Aleksander Konopko).

5. AŻIH, 301/735, p. 7.

6. Ibid., 301/1990, testimony of Pinches (Pinchas) Gruszniewski, p. 1, 301/4866, testimony of Josef Chojnower (Chojnowski), p. 4, for differing interpretations about the relocation process.

7. Ibid., 301/2267, p. 1.

8. VHF, # 3473, testimony of Benek Bolender; AŻIH, 301/2267, p. 2, 301/4866, p. 4, for differing interpretations about victims targeted.

9. AŻIH, 301/4958, testimony of Chaim Stawicki (or Sawicki), p. 1; VHF, # 12830, 43021, testimonies, respectively, of Hyman Rozenblum and Sydney Bloom.

10. Low range at AŻIH, 301/4866, pp. 4–5; high range, in 301/2267, p. 2, repeated at 301/4940, testimony of Samuel Lewent, p. 1; AAN, 202-III-8, vol. 1, p. 64, and I-45, vol. 4, pp. 944–952, for the Delegatura estimate of 1,800 Jews executed on September 1, 1941.

11. USHMM, RG-15.019M (IPN), reel 1, 2/174, pp. 1–2, notes 7,000 Jews and 5,000 Poles executed at Giełczyn.

12. AŻIH, 301/2267, pp. 1–2.

13. Ibid., 301/4866, p. 6.

14. IPN-Bi, S-122/68, pp. 6–7 (deposition, Franciszek Żero); AŻIH, 301/2267, p. 1.

15. AŻIH, 301/735, p. 9.

16. Ibid., 301/2267, p. 2, 301/1990, p. 1, 301/4866, p. 6.

17. See ibid., 301/4940, p. 1, for Lewent’s prisoner number, 89221, among a chronological group of 456 numbers from the period of the Zambrów transit camp deportation, unreported in Stanisław Mączka, ed., Żydzi polscy w KL Auschwitz (Warsaw: ŻIH, 2004), pp. 146–152.

18. AŻIH, 301/4958, p. 1.

19. Ibid., 301/735, pp. 10–12, 301/3810, testimony of Szewa and Owsiej Lewita, pp. 1–7.

ŁUNNA (AKA WOLA OR ŁUNNA-WOLA)

Pre-1939: Łunna, village, Grodno powiat, Białystok województwo, Poland; 1939–1941: Łunna, Skidel’ raion, Belostok oblast’, Belorussian SSR; 1941–1944: Kreis Grodno, Distrikt Białystok; post-1991: Łunna, Masty raen, Hrodna voblasts’, Republic of Belarus

Łunna lies on the Niemen River about 35 kilometers (21.8 miles) southeast of Grodno. Its popular name, Łunna-Wola, dated to World War I, when German occupation authorities annexed to Łunna the neighboring southeastern village of Wola. Jewish residents also referred to their religious community as Łunna-Wola to recognize a union dating either from the war or its aftermath. In 1938, Łunna counted 1,964 residents, including 1,279 Jews, 536 Roman Catholics, and 149 Russian Orthodox believers. The Wola population numbered 548, including 392 Jews, 84 Roman Catholics, and 72 Russian Orthodox people.

Initially occupied in World War II by the USSR, Łunna, on June 22, 1941, came under Luftwaffe attack, targeted at a bridge and at an airbase constructed by Soviet authorities across the Niemen in Czerlona. Dozens of Jews perished, including the wife and two daughters of Tuvia Rotberg, the rabbi of Łunna.

The Wehrmacht occupied Łunna and Wola by June 28, 1941. A German military commander appointed a civilian administration, including a mayor, Stefan Nawracki, and a town council secretary, Franz Kaluzny. Both men likely were ethnic Germans. An auxiliary police force, composed of 12 to 15 mostly ethnic Poles, was led by Michał Urbanowicz. By the fall of 1941, a German civilian administration was established in Łunna. It was led by an Amtskommissar, a position filled by Teschner and, then from March 1943, by Fritz Kräkel. A Gendarmerie post, commanded by Meister Richter, employed at least four Reich Germans on each shift.¹

Upon occupying Łunna, the local military commander ordered the murder of at least three Jews, including Motel and Mula (or Shmuel) Murstein, falsely denounced as Communists by a local Polish shoemaker. A denunciation by the same shoemaker a few weeks later brought the execution of about six Jewish and Belorussian Communists.² Soldiers conscripted the Jews daily to clear away bombed-out buildings and to clean their wagons and horses. Some soldiers plundered Jewish homes. The military commander demanded the Jews surrender a large part of their valuables. He also issued a number of anti-Jewish decrees, including mandates to wear armbands, subsequently changed to a yellow Star of David on the chest and back; prohibitions on leaving the town without permission; and orders making forced labor obligatory for all adults.

By the end of July, the Germans had ordered a Jewish Council (Judenrat) and a Jewish police force established. The Judenrat chair, Jakob Welbel, was a pre-war kehillah officer. Other council members included Abraham Jedwab, the liaison with the Germans; Zalman Gradowski, the sanitation officer; Yudel Nowik, responsible for food distribution; and Berl Kaplan, the labor coordinator. The Jewish Police commander, Israel Schneor, from a family of blacksmiths, oversaw a six- to eight-member force, which included Eliyahu Kaplan, the son of teacher Mendel Kaplan.

In the summer or early fall of 1941, an SS unit arrived in Łunna and compelled the Jews to remove and to burn the Torah scrolls and other holy books from the synagogues and Houses of Prayer. At least one Torah, saved from destruction by Chaykel Friedman, enabled the community to maintain an important part of its religious life.

In September 1941, on the eve of the Sukkot holiday, the Germans ordered a ghetto to be established in Wola. The Jewish residents of Wola remained in their houses, which were expected to accommodate the Łunna Jews. In one account, the move to the ghetto was orderly, with the Łunna Jews allowed to bring to Wola items for their personal use, including beds and construction materials. However, another survivor remembered the Jews receiving no advanced notice of the move and the Germans and the auxiliary police forcibly removing from the Jews the few possessions they had time to pack before being driven out of their homes to Wola.³

The Germans ordered the ghetto surrounded by a barbed-wire fence. Because they insisted traffic continue unobstructed on Wołpiańska Street, the main road through Wola, the fence divided the ghetto, with the houses on either side of the road forming the boundaries of two separate ghettos. A wooden bridge, constructed over the road, provided for pedestrian traffic between the ghettos. The auxiliary police guarded the ghettos from the outside. The Jewish Police maintained order inside the ghettos.

Some ghetto inmates worked at the former Soviet air base, disassembling Russian planes and sorting and packing their parts for shipment to the Reich. Others labored at the Łunna sawmill. Local Christians also contracted Jewish labor for agricultural work, home repairs, and construction projects. The Amtskommissar ordered ghetto inmates to perform a number of short-term tasks. When a water-supply pipe broke at the Łunna sawmill, Teschner commanded women and children from the ghetto to work around the clock for several days in freezing temperatures to carry water from the river to power the generator. The most dangerous and humiliating labor came when Teschner hosted hunting parties and organized a brigade of ghetto laborers to swim out to retrieve fowl shot by his guests.⁴

Because five to seven families were assigned to each of the houses in the ghetto and even more families lived together in the Bet Midrash and the synagogue, the inmates eased overcrowding by adding a second floor to the synagogue. In summer vacation residences, they constructed basements, for makeshift furnaces, to make the houses habitable in the winter. Some families dug subterranean bunkers in which to live. Because the fence had left half of the ghetto waterless, the Judenrat organized families to dig wells. After the Germans ordered all Jewish livestock confiscated, the Judenrat arranged for the return of 10 cows, with which it supplemented the skim milk rations of children. Some residents planted vegetable gardens. Others illicitly took orders for clothes and shoes from Christians across the fence or peddled homemade items, such as lighters (made from airplane tubing), for which food was accepted as payment. Some craftsmen snuck out of the ghetto to work in villages, for example, to sew clothes for Christians in exchange for bread, butter, and flour.

The local auxiliary police checked the ghetto fence daily, fining the Judenrat 10 Reichsmark (RM) for every suspected breach. Illegal departures from the ghetto sometimes resulted in death. Meister Richter executed Joseph Burstein, on July 3, 1942, for escaping from the ghetto during the night and allegedly resisting arrest. He shot Josel Niemenski, on the night of July 10, for a similar offense.⁵ Two butchers, including one surnamed Levine, caught outside the ghetto also were executed.

In the spring of 1942, the Germans ordered hundreds of male Jews conscripted for labor outside Łunna. One group, sent to the Grodno I ghetto, joined a railway labor brigade. Another 120 to 150 men were sent to a labor camp near Brzostowica Wielka, to widen and pave the Białystok-to-Wołkowysk road. Most Łunna inmates at the camp returned to the ghetto in the early fall of 1942.

By then many Łunna ghetto residents no longer had the material possessions to barter for food or to meet German material demands. In the fall of 1942, the Polish police regularly entered the ghetto to harass its residents. Teschner also threatened the Judenrat members with death for not coming up with a list of demanded items. A local physician may have supplied the Judenrat the items covertly.⁶ Overcrowding and the poor diet had bred disease. Many were sick with typhus by late October 1942.⁷

On November 2, 1942, the Germans liquidated the Łunna ghetto, expelling its approximately 1,550 residents to the Kielbasin transit camp. They lived there in deplorable conditions for over a month together with 22,000 to 28,000 other Jews from about 22 nearby communities. Among the Łunna Jews subjected to the arbitrary violence of Karl Rinzler, the camp commander, was Rivka Pacowski, a hair stylist assigned to give him a daily shave. One day Rinzler shot her dead.⁸ The Łunna Jews smuggled to Kielbasin the surviving Torah and commemorated the second day of Hanukkah on December 5, 1942, before being expelled to the railway station for deportation to the Auschwitz extermination camp.⁹

Upon arriving at Auschwitz II-Birkenau on December 8, 1942, almost all the Jews in the transport, likely between 2,169 and 2,769 people, were murdered, as the Germans held back just 231 men, including about 150 from Łunna, as concentration camp prisoners. By the fall of 1944, the approximately 30 surviving Łunna prisoners mostly were assigned to the Sonderkommando unit. There, Zalman Gradowski, the Judenrat member, and Józef Dereszyński joined 5 others in planning the Sonderkommando uprising on October 7, the only armed uprising at Auschwitz. They perished during the suppression of the rebellion, along with at least 3 other former Łunna ghetto residents.

The Łunna Jewish community was not reestablished after the war. The less than 15 survivors emigrated, settling mostly in the United States, Canada, Argentina, and Israel.

SOURCES As well as archival documentation, this entry is also based on the extensive research of Ruth Marcus, a daughter of a Łunna native, Yitzchak “Yitzl” Eliashberg. Her work is available in English on the Lunna ShtetLinks site at jewishgen.org, www.shtetlinks.jewishgen.org/lunna, with the material cited in the entry drawn from the several sections available under the link titled “During World War II and the Holocaust.” Marcus also published a part of her research in Hebrew as Once There Was a Small Shtetl Named Lunna (Ruth Marcus, 2005). An Eisenschmidt testimony appears, too, in Gideon Greif, We Wept without Tears: Testimonies of the Jewish Sonderkommando from Auschwitz (New Haven, CT: Yale University Press, 2005), pp. 215–256.

Though from a former Łunna resident of the Białystok ghetto, also valuable is Etel Berachowicz-Kossowska, “The Destruction of Łunna-Volie,” Grodner Opklangen. Ecos de Grodno (Buenos Aires), no. 2 (1949), in an English translation, by Yeshaya Metal, at the Lunna ShtetLinks site under the Yevnin Family Album link.

A testimony by Nathan[-Nisel] Lewin about the experiences of the Łunna community at Kiełbasin is in Serge Klarsfeld, ed., Documents Concerning the Destruction of the Jews of Grodno 1941–1944, 6 vols. (New York: Beate Klarsfeld Foundation, 1985–1992), 1:188–189.

Questions exist about the official figures for the Łunna transport to the Auschwitz extermination camp. See Stanisław Mączka, ed., Żydzi polscy w KL Auschwitz: Wykazy imienne. Polish Jews in KL Auschwitz: Name Lists (Warsaw: ŻIH, 2004); USHMM, RG-53.004M (GAGO), 1-1-54, pp. 37–38; GARF, 7021-86-40, p. 4; Amidst a Nightmare of Crime. Manuscripts of Members of Sonderkommando (Oświęcim: State Museum at Oświęcim, 1973), pp. 75–207; Ber Mark, The Scrolls of Auschwitz, trans. Sharon Neemani (Tel Aviv: Am Oved, 1985), pp. 173–205; Tikva Fatal-Knaani, Zo lo otah Grodnah, Kehilat Grodnah u-sevivatah ba-milhamah uva-sho’ab 1939–1943 (Jerusalem: Yad Vashem, 2001), pp. 184–185.

The first 20 pages of the Gradowski diary, which cover the period of the Łunna ghetto, still await publication. The diary is not a part of the historical collections of the Auschwitz-Birkenau State Museum because the Red Army investigators who discovered the manuscript in March 1945 buried in metal canisters in the ashes near crematorium II at Birkenau donated it to the Museum of Military Medicine, now in St. Petersburg, Russia.

Helpful, too, is the Łunna entry in Shmuel Spector and Bracha Freundlich, eds., Pinkas ha-kehillot. Encyclopaedia of Jewish Communities, Poland, vol. 8, Vilna, Białystok, Nowogrodek (Jerusalem: Yad Vashem, 2005), pp. 380–383.

Documents concerning the history of the Łunna Jewish community under German occupation in World War II include GAGO (e.g., 1-1-2, p. 251, 1-1-54, pp. 2, 37–38, 1-1-141, p. 2, and 1-1-335, pp. 83–84); GARF (7021-86-40, pp. 4, 56, 58); IPN (e.g., SOOI 26); NARB (845-1-8, p. 31); RGVA (e.g., 1323-2-244, p. 98); USHMM (e.g., RG-11.001M.15 [RGVA] and RG-53.004M [GAGO]); VHF (# 2004, 2144, and 42375); YIVO (46); and YVA (e.g., O-3/5227).

Laura Crago

NOTES

1. USHMM, RG-53.004M (GAGO), reel 3, 1-1-280, pp. 5, 7–8, 1-1-295, pp. 54, 61–72, and 1-1-312, pp. 75–78.
2. Eliezier Eisenschmidt interview, information from Ruth Marcus to Laura Crago, March 17, 2009.
3. Compare Eisenschmidt testimony, in Marcus, “During World War II and the Holocaust”; and VHF, # 2144.
4. VHF, # 2144.
5. USHMM, RG-53.004M, reel 1, 1-1-2, p. 251, and reel 2, 1-1-141, p. 2.
6. Berachowicz-Kossowska, “The Destruction”; and VHF, # 2004, testimony of Leon Lewin.
7. Eisenschmidt, in Greif, We Wept, pp. 217–218; and VHF, # 2144.
8. Klarsfeld, Documents, 1:188–189.
9. Eisenschmidt interview, March 17, 2009, Marcus to Crago.

MARCINKAŃCE

Pre-1939: Marcinkańce (Yiddish: Marcinkonis), village, Grodno powiat, Białystok województwo, Poland; 1939–1940: Martsynkantsy, Belostok oblast’, Belorussian SSR; 1940–1941: Marcinkonys, Alytus uezd, Lithuanian SSR; 1941–1944: Marcinkance, Kreis Grodno, Distrikt Białystok; post-1991: Marcinkony, Varena rajoras, Alytus apskritis, Republic of Lithuania

Marcinkańce lies in a forest about 50 kilometers (31 miles) north-northeast of Grodno. By 1929, about 40 percent of its 860 residents were Jews.

On June 24, 1941, a Wehrmacht unit passed through Marcinkańce. A small German military force remained in the village to secure the Marcinkańce train station. A group of Lithuanian “partisans” or white armbands, led by J.J. Žuraula, assumed control of the local civilian administration.

The Lithuanian officials conscripted the Jews for forced labor at the train station and compelled them to engage in meaningless, humiliating tasks. The Lithuanian police arrested several Jews for communism, including Moishe Sosnovich and David Podbenesky, the first Jews executed in Marcinkańce under German occupation. Lithuanian and German authorities periodically arrived to loot Jewish property.¹ The Lithuanian heads of the Alytus County civilian and military administrations issued a series of county-wide anti-Jewish decrees, including a directive on July 12, 1941, that required Jews to wear a yellow Star of David on their backs and chest, forbade them from leaving their towns without a special permit, and made forced labor obligatory for all adult Jews.²

Most likely in July, the authorities ordered the Jews to establish a Jewish Council (Judenrat). Aaron Kobrowski (or Ko-brovsky), a merchant, was its chair. The council collected the “contributions” demanded of the Jews. To raise them, it taxed community members. The taxes subsequently went to bribe German civil administrators and officials.

By early fall of 1941, the Marcinkańce Jews believed they would be enveloped by the mass murder of the Lithuanian Jews, even though the commander of the train station promised his protection and a new Lithuanian civil administrator, who arrived in early September, complained about German officials thrice rejecting his appeals to include them in the ongoing executions. Fearing an impending German recognition of the 1940 southern territorial extension of Lithuania might lead to their deaths, the Jews, on September 19, 1941, fled en masse to the ghetto of Druskieniki in a Lithuanian border town, with a famous spa, over which the Germans early had exercised authority. On October 1, 1941, the Germans incorporated Marcinkańce into Kreis Grodno, which, in turn, was subordinated to the German police and civilian authorities in Białystok. When the German police drove out the Lithuanian administrators of Marcinkańce, the Jews returned home.

Most likely at the beginning of November 1941, Czapons, the German Amtskommissar in Marcinkańce, ordered the Jews to move to a ghetto. Initially, it was located in just 3 houses 1 kilometer (0.6 mile) from Marcinkańce. The Jewish Council bribed Czapons to enlarge the ghetto. The next day, he announced an expanded ghetto area, of 14 small houses, located on 1.5 hectares (3.7 acres) of land, near the railway station. The Jews were required to surround the ghetto with a wooden fence. A small, six- to seven-person Jewish police force, commanded by Berke Aizenshtat, guarded the ghetto from the inside. The Jewish Police understood its duty broadly. It believed its mission was to protect the Jewish community from threats posed by all Christians.³

In Marcinkańce the Germans concentrated Jews from other nearby localities, including from Rudnia, Kolaniki (Lithuanian: Kabeliai), and Olkieniki (Lithuanian: Valkininkai). A handful of Jews from Varėna (part of which prior to the war had been Polish Orany) and Butrimonys also had fled to Marcinkańce. The Jews from these communities probably numbered less than 50 people, as almost all sources place the ghetto population at 300 to 400 people.

Material conditions in the ghetto were better than in most places. Admittedly, ghetto inmates were conscripted for labor at four main workplaces: the railway station, on the roads, in forestry labor, and in the mushroom-processing (canning) factory. But some of the Jews managed to resume their pre-war trade with the inhabitants of neighboring villages. As a result, according to survivors, “Compared to the other ghettos, the Jews of the Marcinkańce ghetto lived very well.”⁴

However, in the summer of 1942, tensions reemerged after 70 Jewish refugees arrived in Marcinkańce with horrific accounts of the massacre of entire Jewish communities in the east. As a result, the Jewish Police intensified their watch for any unusual activity by the Germans. By the fall of 1942, a group of young people made plans to join the partisans. The Jewish Council arranged for them to smuggle 12 guns into the ghetto. The resistance movement did not have a chance to act because the German Aktion to liquidate the ghetto started before its preparations were complete.

At about 5:00 A.M., on November 2, 1942, a small force of about 16 Germans, under the command of Gendarmerie Hauptwachmeister Albert Wietzke, from the nearby Sobakińce (Polish: Sobakińce) post, surrounded the ghetto. Among the Germans were local forestry, agricultural, railway, and customs officials mobilized to assist the Gendarmes. At 6:00 A.M., Amtskommissar Czapons informed the Judenrat that the Jews had been ordered sent to another location for work and gave them three hours to pack their belongings. The timing of events indicates that the Jews were to be deported, first to the Kiełbasin transit camp, near Grodno, and from there to either the Auschwitz or Treblinka extermination camps.

However, the Marcinkańce Jews resisted the deportation order. Forewarned by the Jewish Police of the arrival of the Germans, most of the Jews had refused to assemble. At 8:00 A.M., a frustrated Wietzke demanded that the Jewish Council members bring the Jews from their houses. Once about 150 Jews had appeared, Kobrowski, the Judenrat chair, cried out: “Jews, whoever wants to live, let him run where he can!”⁵ As the Jews fled, Wietzke and another Gendarme inside the ghetto opened fire.⁶ The perimeter guards shot Jews escaping over the ghetto’s fence. About 105 to 190 Jews were shot dead or perished subsequently in grenade attacks when they followed the example of the Judenrat chair and refused to abandon their bunkers.⁷

The Gendarmes, assisted by the local police and peasants from several nearby villages, searched for the 150 to 200 surviving Jews. Only a few peasants, such as the Lithuanian Jonas Balevičius from Mustejka (Lithuanian: Musteika), did all they could to help the Jews. As a result, 90 to 100 of the Jews were murdered over the next few weeks.⁸

Before the 1943 New Year, some of the survivors managed to obtain arms. Eight Jews, led by Moishe Kobrowski, raided a Marcinkańce bakery, shooting the German baker dead and stealing enough bread for two months. Fearing denunciations by local peasants, the Jews in the Kobrowski group decided to move deeper into the forest. There, they formed a family company, led by Icchak Kobrowski, a brother who had fled from the Grodno I ghetto. A few survivors from Druskieniki and Porzecze joined the group, which in 1943 was recognized as a separate family unit of the Soviet partisan Davidov brigade.

About 46 Marcinkańce Jews, mostly those from the Kobrowski family group, survived the war. After the Red Army liberated Marcinkańce in June 1944, some of the survivors joined the new village police force and assisted a Soviet People’s Commissariat of Internal Affairs (NKVD) unit searching for German collaborators. Of those arrested, 14 were executed for various crimes, including for denouncing the hiding places of Jews.⁹

SOURCES Some of the archival documentation cited below, including an English translation of YVA, O-33/2112, at the

New York Public Library, Dorot Jewish Division, titled “Part II: Liquidation and Heroic Epic of the Jews of Marcinkonis,” by its compiler, Lejb Koniuchowsky (or Konikhovsky), is available on the Kobrowski family history Web site, at www.kobrowski.com. The translation served as the basis for Koniuchowsky, “The Liquidation of the Jews of Marcinkonis: A Collective Report,” YIVO Annual of Jewish Social Science 8 (1953): 205–223. It also is available, along with several alternate translations of the YVA documentation, at the Kobrowski family history Web site.

An official World War II German investigation into the November 2, 1942, massacre of Marcinkańce’s Jewish community during the ghetto’s liquidation was brought to light by Christopher R. Browning, “The Holocaust in Marcinkance in the Light of Two Unusual Documents,” in Shmuel Almog, ed., The Holocaust—the Unique and the Universal: Essays Presented in Honor of Yehuda Bauer (Jerusalem: Yad Vashem and the Avraham Harman Institute of Contemporary Jewry, Hebrew University, 2001), pp. 66–83. It is placed in a larger context by the same author in Browning, Nazi Policy, Jewish Workers, German Killers (New York: Cambridge University Press, 2000), pp. 143–169. The documentation on which Browning built his studies is included in the archival references listed below. Also valuable are the relevant sections of a memoir from a nephew of the Kobrowski family brigade commander, by Alexandre Blumstein, A Little House on Mount Carmel (Portland, OR: Valentine Mitchell, 2002); and the work by Arūnas Bubnys, “Holocaust in Lithuanian Province in 1941,” on the Web site of the International Commission for the Evaluation of the Crimes of the Nazi and Soviet Occupation Regimes in Lithuania (Tarpautinė komisija nacių ir sovietinio okupacinių režimų nusikaltimams Lietuvoje įvertinti), at www.komisija.lt/en/.

Documentation on the fate of the Jews of Marcinkańce during the Holocaust includes AŽIH (301/5387); GAGO (1-1-59, pp. 1–22); GARF (7021-94-3, p. 26); RGVA (1323-2-244, pp. 99–108); USHMM (e.g., RG-11.001M [RGVA] and RG-53.004M [GAGO], e.g., reel 2, 1-1-150, p. 18, and reel 4, 1-1-335, pp. 25, 68–72); VHF (# 24735, 30395, 49631, and 48001); and YVA (e.g., O-33/2112).

Katrin Reichelt, Martin Dean, and Laura Crago

NOTES

1. YVA, O-33/2112, Collective Eyewitness Report by Shloyme Peretz, Khane Garfing, Lyb Kobrowski, Khaeyem Kobowsky, written down by Leyb Konikhovsky, Ulm, August 1948 (hereafter cited as Konikhovsky report). Quotations and pagination from the translation by Jonathan Boyarin, on the Kobrowski family history Web site cited from there, pp. 1–5.

2. Bubnys, “Holocaust in Lithuanian Province in 1941,” p. 5.

3. Konikhovsky report, pp. 8–9, noting the ghetto was established the day after Passover 1942; and Bubnys, “Holocaust in Lithuanian Province,” p. 10, for the cited date, which better coincides with the timing of the establishment of ghettos in Kreis Grodno.

4. Konikhovsky report, pp. 9–10.

5. Ibid., pp. 10–14; and AŽIH, 301/5387, testimony of Josef Niankowski, p. 2, noting the Judenrat chair warned: “Run away! They are leading us to our deaths!”

6. Whether Wietzke opened fire once the Jews had started to flee or fired while the Jews were standing within the confines of the ghetto formed the basis of a German investigation, prompted by forestry officer Hans Lehmann, who, though standing 300 to 350 meters (about 1,000 feet) away from Wietzke, reported that no Jews had left the fenced area when the attack began; see USHMM, 53.004M (GAGO), reel 1, 1-1-59, pp. 1–22.

7. Ibid., pp. 2–11, 14–16, with 132 victims listed here, on pp. 2–5; and ibid., RG-11.001M (RGVA), reel 81, 1323-2-244, p. 99, noting 150 victims. Jewish survivors mention 105 and 190 victims, respectively, in Konikhovsky report, pp. 10–14; and AŽIH, 301/5387, p. 1.

8. Respectively, AŽIH, 301/5387, p. 2; and Konikhovsky report, pp. 14–31; with USHMM, RG-11.001M (RGVA), reel 81, 1323-2-244, pp. 99–108, noting about half as many victims shot in Kreis Grodno in November.

9. Konikhovsky report, pp. 10–78; GARF, 7021-94-3, pp. 26–28, noting the murder of 289 Jews, including 85 women and 132 children; and Bubnys, “Holocaust in Lithuanian Province,” p. 10.

MICHAŁOWO (AKA MICHAŁOWO-NIEZBUDKA)

Pre-1939: Michałowo, village, Białystok powiat, Białystok województwo, Poland; 1939–1941: Mikhalovo, Zabłudov raion, Belostok oblast’, Belorussian SSR; 1941–1944: Michalowo, Kreis Bialystok, Distrikt Bialystok; post-1998: Michałowo, Białystok powiat, województwo podlaskie, Poland

Michałowó lies on the Supraśl River, almost 35 kilometers (21.7 miles) east-southeast of Białystok and 9.3 kilometers (5.8 miles) south-southeast of Gródek Białostocki. Its transformation after 1832 into a regional center for the manufacture of wool flannel and cording depended on skilled German-speaking craftsmen from Prussia. Jews came to outnumber its approximately 1,000 German residents only after World War I. Its 1921 population of 2,176 included 887 Jews, 534 Russian Orthodox followers (Belorussians), 458 Roman Catholics (Poles), 291 Protestants (Germans), and 6 people of other religious faiths. In 1937, on the eve of World War II, 732 Jews lived in Michałowó.

Michałowó marked one of the easternmost points of the German military advance in September 1939. However, in mid-September, German forces ceded Michałowó to Soviet occupation under the terms of the Molotov-Ribbentrop Pact. In 1940, Soviet authorities transferred to the Reich the 196 ethnic German residents of Michałowó. On June 21, 1941, local authorities in Michałowó arrested 20 Jews, mostly large factory owners and their families, and deported them to Kargosok, Tomsk, Siberia.

On June 23, 1941, the second day of the German invasion of the USSR, a Red Army unit accidentally set its barracks on fire as it was evacuating Michałowó. The blaze, which engulfed all of Fabryczna Street, destroyed many residential buildings and an even greater number of businesses. Four days later, on June 27, a Wehrmacht unit captured Michałowo.

Orsche (Arsche), the German military commander, immediately ordered the Michałowo Jews confined to a ghetto. He ordered it established in the center of the fire damage, on Sienkiewicz, Gródek, Leśna, and Fabryczna Streets. It was fenced with barbed wire. It was policed 24 hours a day, on the orders of the local military administration.¹

The ghetto population stood at 1,500.² Its population included as many as several hundred Jews expelled from Zabłudów. The origins of the additional 575 to 600 inmates are unknown.

The inmates of the Michałowo ghetto resided in 12 peasant farmhouses and in the charred ruins of factory buildings. The rubble on which the ghetto stood combined with the overcrowding to spark hunger and the onset of disease. Orsche imposed tough penalties on local villagers for extending assistance to the ghetto inmates. After Gendarmes caught Teofila Wieremiejczyk providing milk to several ghetto residents, they beat her husband and ordered him to pay a 50 Reichsmark (RM) fine.³

With the arrival, probably at the beginning of September 1941, of German civil officials in Gródek Białostocki, Paul Melzer, the new Amtskommissar, ordered the Jews released from the Michałowo ghetto and permitted them to return to their pre-war homes. Many Jews discovered they no longer had places to live, because Poles and Belorussians, whose homes had been burned to the ground, had taken over all of the Jewish houses that had survived the fire.

Melzer demanded the Michałowo Jews turn over whatever material possessions they had managed to save from the fire. He ordered the Jews conscripted for street cleaning and road construction projects.⁴ Because little else is known about the subsequent wartime history of the Michałowo Jewish community, it is impossible to determine whether Melzer later ordered an open ghetto established there.

On November 2, 1942, an SS unit arrived to transfer the Michałowo Jews to a transit camp located on the southern outskirts of Białystok, at the pre-war training grounds of the Polish 10th Cavalry Regiment. The Michałowo expulsion was part of a larger SS Aktion in which Lothar Heimbach, the head of the Białystok Gestapo, and Fritz Friedel, the Judenreferent at Białystok, organized the liquidation of almost all the provincial ghettos of Distrikt Białystok on one day. Friedel ordered SS officials to each Kreis, designating them as special plenipotentiaries. In Kreis Białystok the plenipotentiaries were Berg Tripps and Richard Dibus. The Commanding Officer of the Security Police and SD (KdS) in Białystok coordinated the liquidation Aktion with the civil administration (Kreiskommissaren) and received support from the Gendarmerie.⁵

The Michałowo Jews lived at the Białystok transit camp for 3 to 10 weeks before the Germans sent them to the Treblinka extermination camp. In Michałowo, Gendarmes searched for Jewish fugitives. A few months after the deportations, they shot dead the teenage sons of Mielnicki, the former mill owner, in the meadow near the Jewish cemetery.⁶ According to Christian witnesses, in the spring of 1943, German functionaries shot 100 to 300 Jews, including women and children, in the nearby Kosaczewo Forest.⁷ Whether the Jews were from Michałowo or from other local ghettos is unknown.

Some Michałowo Jews managed to find temporary refuge in the Białystok ghetto. Among them was survivor Mery (Marie) Kaplan (later Mendelson). In August 1943, during the final liquidation of the ghetto, first Otto Beneschek and later Artur Schade, Nazi Party members charged with managing textile plants in Białystok, sheltered Kaplan. Schade, a member of the Białystok-based German anti-Fascist resistance cell headed by Otto Busse, assisted Kaplan and several other Białystok Jews in joining the “Kadima” partisan group.⁸

After the war, Melzer was tried in Poland and found guilty of the executions in 1942 of seven Polish citizens suspected of belonging to the underground. He was sentenced to death.⁹

SOURCES Important published works include the yizkor book by Zipora Lyvne, Ayarati Mikhalovab: Pirke bavai be-baye ayarab Yebudit (Tel Aviv: ‘Am ha-sefer, 1975); the relevant entry in Shmuel Spector and Bracha Freundlich, eds., Pinkas ha-kehillot. Encyclopaedia of Jewish Communities: Poland, vol. 8, Vilna, Białystok, Nowogródek (Jerusalem: Yad Vashem, 2005), pp. 417–420; Szymon Datner, “Eksterminacja ludności żydowskiej w Okręgu Białostockim,” BŻIH, no. 60 (1966):16, 24–25; Israel Gutman and Sara Bender, eds., The Encyclopedia of the Righteous among the Nations: Rescuers of Jews during the Holocaust, vol. 5, pt. 1, Europe and Other Countries (Jerusalem: Yad Vashem, 2007), pp. 1–2, 143; Leszek Nos, Monografia Gminy Michałowo (Białystok, 1996), available electronically at www.michalowo.ug.gov.pl/; and the effort by young Michałowo Poles to understand their multiethnic past of their village, Zobaczyć to, czego nie ma. Księga pamięci Michałowa (Białystok: Fundacja Uniwersytetu w Białymstoku Uniwersitas Bialostocensis, 2007), available electronically at www.supelek.uwb.edu.pl/Ksiega.pdf.

Archival documentation pertaining to the Jewish community of Michałowo under German occupation includes AŻIH (i.e., Ankiety); BA-L (B 162/14223); IPN (SOB 398); IPN-Bi (1/507, 1/771, S-147/68); VHF (e.g., # 45421); and YVA.

Elżbieta Rojowska and Laura Crago

NOTES

1. IPN-Bi, 1/507 (deposition, C. Rzaczkowski).
2. AŻIH, Ankiety, as cited in Czesław Pilichowski et al., eds., Obozy hitlerowskie na ziemiach polskich 1939–1945. Informator encyklopedyczny (Warsaw: PWN, 1979), p. 317.
3. IPN-Bi, 1/507 (deposition, H. Krzętowska).
4. Ibid. (deposition, Rzaczkowski).
5. See BA-L, B 162/14223 (II 205 AR-Z 226/60, Verdict, LG-Biel, April 14, 1967, case of Dr. Wilhelm Altenloh and others), pp. 57–77.
6. IPN-Bi, 1/507 (deposition, Rzaczkowski).
7. Ibid. (depositions, J. Jarocki and M. Syta).
8. VHF, # 45421; Yad Vashem recognized Schade, in 1995, and Beneschek, in 1996, as Righteous Among the Nations.
9. IPN, SOB 398.

MILEJCZYCE

Pre-1939: Milejczyce, village, Bielsk Podlaski powiat, Białystok województwo, Poland; 1939–1941: Mileichytsy, Kleshcheli raion, Brest oblast', Belorussian SSR; 1941–1944: Milejczyce, Kreis Bielsk, Distrikt Białystok; post-1998: Siemiatycze powiat, województwo podlaskie, Poland

Milejczyce lies 75 and 40 kilometers (47 and 25 miles), by road, south of Białystok and Bielsk Podlaski, respectively. In the 1920s, it was transformed into a leading Jewish retreat for those suffering from tuberculosis. Between 2,000 and 4,000 Jews annually sought cures at the sanatoria established amid the pine forests surrounding Milejczyce. In 1935, the full-time Jewish population of 894 made up 45 percent of its 2,000 inhabitants.

In September 1939, the German army briefly occupied Milejczyce. There were no casualties among the civilian population before the Germans withdrew to make way for the Red Army, under the Molotov-Ribbentrop Pact. During the Soviet occupation, the Jewish population expanded to 1,275.

On June 23, 1941, German forces again captured Milejczyce after a brief battle. As the German troops advanced through Milejczyce, a member of the Soviet Home Guard (factory protection service) shot a German officer at the cable factory. In reprisal, the Germans arrested 183 local inhabitants, locked them in a cellar on the market square, and shot 10 of the prisoners. Among the murdered were three Jews, Chaim (or Rubin), Szmul (or Srulko), and Icko Widzowski, three Poles, and four Belorussians.¹ After a senior German officer intervened, the remaining prisoners were released.

Once the town was no longer in the area of the front line, a German civil administration was established under the control of the Amtskommissar in Kleszczele. A German was named head, or mayor, of Milejczyce. In the summer of 1941, a German Gendarmerie (rural police) post was established in the former Jewish communal building. Its commander initially was Gendarmerie Meister Hugo Günther. In 1942, Hauptwachtmeister Franz Schülke replaced him; Josef Schleicher later succeeded Schülke. Among the 21 Gendarmes based in Milejczyce were Franz Krotki and Hans Brochmann. They were assisted by roughly the same number of non-German local policemen.²

In the spring of 1942, most likely acting on orders issued by the Bielsk Kreiskommissar authorities in Milejczyce, Jews were confined to a ghetto located on Rogacka and Kuźmicki Streets. Likely in August, the Jews were made to erect a wooden fence, topped with barbed wire, around the ghetto. The ghetto population of 1,000 included refugees from the nearby localities of Nurzec (Milejczyce gmina, Bielsk Podlaski powiat), Siemiatycze, and Drohiczyn.³

The Gendarmerie had orders to prevent the Jews from leaving the ghetto, although the guard was not particularly strict. The Jews were made to perform forced labor, including road construction work, and to complete other tasks for the Germans. The conditions of life inside the ghetto were poor, as there was insufficient food and overcrowding. A Jewish Council was appointed. A Jewish police force maintained order inside the ghetto.⁴

On the first days of November 1942, most likely on November 3–4, members of the local Gendarmerie, assisted by forces of Reserve Police Battalion 13, liquidated the ghetto. The Germans shot 3 Jews they deemed unfit to travel. An armed escort transported the rest of the Milejczyce Jewish community to the Kleszczele ghetto. The Germans permitted the Jews to take with them only a small amount of hand luggage, consisting of food and personal items. Because they comprised too great a burden during the forced march to Kleszczele, most Jews discarded these items.⁵ On November 4 or 5, the Germans deported the roughly 1,000 Jews from Milejczyce, along with the Jewish communities of Kleszczele and Nurzec, to a transit camp located in a pre-war cavalry garrison on the southern outskirts of Białystok. From there, the Jews were sent to their deaths at the Treblinka extermination camp between November 10 and December 15, 1942.

After the liquidation Aktion, the Germans collected all the property of the deported Milejczyce Jews. The Gendarmes also arrested a number of locals they caught in the former ghetto area, presumably for plundering. After three days, the Gendarmes took the arrestees, about 12 people in total, to the ghetto square and shot them there.⁶

Information is sparse about Jewish survivors from Milejczyce. Jechezkel Rozencajg (Rosenzwaig) survived the war in a forest bunker near Morze village (now in Grodzisk gmina, Siemiatycze powiat) with 17 others, mostly fugitives from the liquidation of the ghetto in Siemiatycze. After the Soviet liberation of Milejczyce, he joined the Polish 1st Army. He perished in combat in the Battle of Berlin.

SOURCES Secondary sources include Shmuel Spector and Bracha Freundlich, eds., Pinkas ha-kehillot. Encyclopaedia of Jewish Communities: Poland, vol. 8, Vilna, Białystok, Nowogrodek (Jerusalem: Yad Vashem, 2005), pp. 422–423; and Arnon Rubin, The Rise and Fall of Jewish Communities in Poland and Their Relics Today, vol. 1, District Białystok (Tel Aviv: Tel Aviv University Press, 2006), pp. 133–134. On Rozencajg, the only known survivor, see Szymon Datner, “Ratownictwo na Białostocczyźnie,” in Władysław Bartoszewski and Zofia Lewinówna, eds., Ten jest z ojczyzny mojej: Polacy z pomocą Żydom, 1939–1945, 2nd ed. (Kraków: Znak, 1969), p. 739; and Waldemar Monkiewicz, “Za cenę życia. O ratowaniu Żydów w Białostockiem w okresie okupacji niemieckiej,” Białostoccy Żydzi 2 (1997): 206.

The main source for this entry is the postwar German investigation into crimes committed in Milejczyce during the German occupation, which can be found in BA-L (B 162/9446). Additional archival documentation for the Milejczyce ghetto includes AŻIH (301/979); GARF (7021-148-186); IPN (e.g., ASG); IPN-Bi (e.g., S [6/69, 24/72, 32/68, 286/68]); and USHMM (RG-15.019M [ASG], reel 1, 1/142, reel 14, 46/51).

Martin Dean and Laura Crago

NOTES

1. USHMM, RG-15.019M (IPN), reel 1, 1/142, pp. 1–2.
2. BA-L, B 162/9446, pp. 152–154 (statement, Hugo Günther, December 6, 1961).
3. Ibid., pp. 150–151 (statement, Hugo Günther, July 5, 1955), in which the former Milejczyce Gendarmerie post commander recalled the ghetto being established in the spring of 1942. Polish postwar documentation notes it was created in August 1942; see USHMM, RG-15.019M, reel 14, 46/51, pp. 1–2, with the later date perhaps the month the ghetto was closed.
4. BA-L, B 162/9446, pp. 68–74, 86–91 (respectively, statements of Andrzej Michnowski, August 5, 1971, and Antoni Prokopowicz, August 5, 1971).
5. Ibid., pp. 68–74, 86–91, 81–85 (statement, Konstanty Pachwieciewicz, August 5, 1971); GARF, 7021-148-186, War Diary of Reserve Police Battalion 13, November 1–5, 1942.
6. BA-L, B 162/9446, pp. 68–74, 81–85.

NAREW

Pre-1939: Narew (Yiddish: Narev), village, Bielsk Podlaski powiat, Białystok województwo, Poland; 1939–1941: Narev, Gainovka raion, Brest oblast', Belorussian SSR; 1941–1944: Narew, Kreis Bielsk, Distrikt Białystok; post-1998: Hajnówka powiat, województwo podlaskie, Poland

Narew lies 29.2 kilometers (about 18.1 miles) northeast of Bielsk Podlaski. Although its name derives from its location on the Narew River, its history also is tied to the Puszcza Białowieża, or the Białowieża Forest, an ancient woodland that once encircled it. On the eve of World War II, about 300 Jews resided there.

The Germans occupied Narew for four days in September 1939 before ceding the village to Soviet occupation.

A Wehrmacht unit reoccupied Narew by the end of June 1941. From June 30, about 300 Jews from Zabłudów, including the rabbi, fled to Narew after the Germans set fire to their town and expelled them.

The Germans, as they did in Distrikt Białystok as a whole, most likely ordered the Jews confined to the borders of Narew in early July 1941 and required them to establish a Judenrat. On July 21, 1941, an SS contingent, from Białowieża village, gave the Narew Jews one week to raise a payment of 1 kilogram (2.2 pounds) in gold, 19 kilograms (42 pounds) of silver, and 100,000 rubles in cash. The Jews sold everything they owned to collect the payment but failed to come up with the precious metals. When the SS came to collect the tribute, they beat the Jewish representatives for not meeting their demands.¹ The Germans also shot dead 16 Jews on three separate occasions. In the largest of these murders, probably during one of two Aktions to deport the Jews, 12 people perished in the forest.²

From early July 1941, the Jewish communities of the Białowieża Forest, including the Narew Jews, became victims of a German drive to depopulate the woodland. German Security Police initially claimed the expulsions were to prevent Soviet troops, cut off from their units, from establishing partisan operations in the forest. Because the expulsions also encompassed non-Jewish communities, beginning with 183 families deported on July 25, 1941, from Buda Paszucka, Pogorzelce, and Teremiski to Prużana, and continuing through October, some historians believe the depopulation drive was motivated more by conservation initiatives, sponsored by Hermann Göring, to expand and to transform the woodland into a vast nature and hunting preserve for the Nazi leadership. By the fall of 1941, Göring had appointed Ulrich Scherping to head the forest, which in practice became an extraterritorial unit within Distrikt Białystok, probably administered by the Reichsforstamt (Reich Forestry Office).

On August 9–10, 1941, the 3rd Company of Police Battalion 322 began clearing Jews from the forest. That day, its members rounded up the 500 Jewish residents of Białowieża village, home to the forest hunting lodge. They confined male craftsmen, women, children, and the elderly to the village and executed the rest of the men, about 77 people. The survivors were deported to Kobryń and Antopol. In Narewka Mała, a village sometimes confused with Narew, men from the same police battalion, on August 14, shot 282 male Jews (those aged between 16 and 65), outside of Zabłotyczna village.³ The survivors—259 women and 162 children—were sent by truck to Kobryń.⁴ On the forests' buffer peripheries, the Germans tended to expel Jewish communities wholesale, as had occurred in July in Szereszów, where 800 Jews were forcibly marched to Antopol and Dereczyn. Similar brutality marked the expulsion of the Jewish community in Hajnówka, in early August, during which the men were ordered to crawl on their hands and knees to Prużana. In other places, such as Kamieniec Litewski, on the southern forest periphery, the Germans held back a small number of craftsmen and expelled the rest of the Jews in late 1941 to Prużana.

In Narew, more in the forest's western buffer periphery, an SS unit surrounded the village on the Sukkot holiday in October 1941. The unit commander divided the Jews into the able-bodied and less fit. The elderly, women, and children from Narew and the Zabłudów refugees were deported to the Prużana ghetto. Those who resisted by fleeing into the forest were rounded up, beaten, and shot dead.⁵

The Germans established a closed ghetto for the Jews held back from the expulsion. Its precise area, listed on postwar Polish documentation as 185 by 100 meters (about 4.6 acres), suggests the Jews were confined to a small part of the village. Because the official completing the documentation erred by one year in noting the ghetto's liquidation, it seems likely he made a similar mistake in noting that the ghetto was established in September 1942, rather than in September 1941.⁶ However, it is difficult to say because no other readily available documentation mentions the date on which the ghetto was established.

The inmates of the Narew ghetto likely were overwhelmingly male. Whether the families of the men attempted to return to Narew and were permitted to remain there, as had occurred in Kamieniec Litewski, is unknown. The Narew ghetto inmates labored at craft workshops, undoubtedly under Christian supervision, most likely for the Gendarmerie and the Forstschutzkommando (Forest Protection Commando) stationed there. They also cobbled the streets, sidewalks, and market square in Narew. For the second project, the conscripts used mazevot (gravestones) from the cemetery, located south of Narew, in the so-called Gnolica Forest, near Makówka village.

On November 4, 1942, the Germans liquidated the Narew ghetto by conveying its inmates to the ghetto in Bielsk Podlaski. On November 13, during the final liquidation of the Bielsk ghetto, they sent them to the Białystok ghetto.⁷ The deportees are believed to have been expelled during the first mass deportation Aktion, from February 5 to February 12, 1943, and deported from Białystok to the Auschwitz or Treblinka extermination camps, where they perished.⁸

The Jews of the Narew community in the Prużana ghetto shared the fates of the almost 10,000 Jews there. That ghetto was liquidated over the course of four days, from January 29 to February 1, 1943, with about 2,500 Jews deported each day from there to Auschwitz. Most of the Jews in the transports were gassed on arrival at Auschwitz. The Germans selected 1,775 Prużana deportees for work. Less than a handful of the Narew deportees to Prużana are believed to have survived as prisoners of the Auschwitz concentration camp.

No more than 10 Narew Jews survived the war. Lejb Wacht (or Vacht), the author of the only account of life in the Narew ghetto, fled as the Germans expelled the Jews to Bielsk Podlaski. The family of Andrzej Iwaniuk, in Gradoczno village, sheltered him. Others, such as Yehuda Leytler, had been deported to the Russian interior in the Soviet period.⁹ Also counted among Narew survivors are the immediate family members of the lawyer Aron Wirszubski. Deported from Wysokie Litewskie to Hajnówka in the Soviet period, Wirszubski was shot dead during the expulsion of the Hajnówka Jewish community. After the liquidation of the Prużana ghetto, Wirszubski's wife and daughters were extended protection by two Roman Catholic priests in Narew.¹⁰

A postwar investigation, conducted in both Poland and Germany, centers on the shooting in Narew of several individual Jews, including a chemist, after the liquidation of the ghetto. It is based on the witness testimonies of local Poles. It did not result in any indictments.¹¹ Two local residents of the Narewka Mała area also were tried on a number of charges related to assisting the 3rd Company of Police Battalion 322 to extricate Jews and non-Jewish Communists from hiding places in Narewka Mała during the August 1941 executions, with one of them also charged with the subsequent plunder of Jewish property.¹²

SOURCES The bibliography for the Kamieniec Litewski entry surveys the historiographical debates surrounding the Białowieża Forest expulsions. The timing of the expulsions presented in this entry follows the chronology established by Andrzej Angrick et al., “‘Da hätte man schon ein Tagebuch führen müssen.’ Das Polizeibataillon 322 und die Judenmorde im Bereich der Heeresgruppe Mitte während des Sommers und Herbstes 1941,” in Helge Grabitz et al., Die Normalität des Verbrechens: Bilanz und Perspektiven der Forschung zu den nationalsozialistischen Gewaltverbrechen: Festschrift für Wolfgang Scheffler zum 65. Geburtstag (Berlin: Hentrich, 1994), pp. 336–339, a work based mainly on the war diary of Police Battalion 322. Other sources, including Szymon Datner, “Eksterminacja ludności żydowskiej w Okręgu Białostockim,” BŻIH, no. 60 (1966): 21, provide the dates on which survivors remember the expulsions as having occurred, and still others note, in particular, that all or all but 77 Jewish men from Białowieża village were executed.

Also useful are the relevant entries in Shmuel Spector and Bracha Freundlich, eds., Pinkas ha-kehilot. Encyclopaedia of Jewish Communities: Poland, vol. 8, Vilna, Białystok, Nowogródek (Jerusalem: Yad Vashem, 2005), pp. 139–140 (Białowieża), pp. 288–289 (Hajnówka), pp. 457–459 (Narew), pp. 459–460 (Narewka Mała); Arnon Rubin, The Rise and Fall of Jewish Communities in Poland and Their Relics Today, vol. 1, District Białystok (Tel Aviv: Tel Aviv University Press, 2006), p. 39 (Białowieża), pp. 136–138 (Narew), pp. 138–139 (Narewka Mała); Tomasz Wiśniewski, Jewish Białystok and Surroundings in Eastern Poland: A Guide for Yesterday and Today (Ipswich, MA: Ipswich Press, 1998), p. 93; for survivors, Szymon Datner, Las Sprawiedliwych (Warsaw: Książka i Wiedza, 1961), p. 56; and Waldemar Monkiewicz, “Za cenę życia. O ratowaniu Żydów w Białostockiem w okresie okupacji niemieckiej,” in Białostoccy Żydzi (Białystok: Instytut Historii Uniwersytetu Warszawskiego Filii w Białymstoku, 1997), 2:180–181.

Archival documentation pertaining to the fates of the Jewish communities of Narew, Białowieża, Narewka Mała, and Hajnówka under German occupation during World War II includes AŻIH (e.g., Ankiety, 301 [1270, 1970]); BA-L (B 162/15965); IPN (e.g., SAB [25, 36], SWB 185); IPN-Bi (Ds-99/69, S [16/80, 105/67, 74/03/Zn, 296/68/1-2, 356/71]); USHMM (RG-15.019M [ASG (IPN)], e.g., reel 14, 46/52], RG-48.004M [VHAP], reel 2); VHF (e.g., # 21890, 28351, 45233); and YVA (M1-Q/294, M49E/1270, M11B/11).

Laura Crago

NOTES

1. AŻIH, 301/1270, testimony of [Lejb] Wacht, p. 1.
2. USHMM, RG-15.019M, reel 14, 46/52, p. 1.
3. Ibid., RG-48.004M, reel 2, War Diary of 3. Co., Pol. Bn. 322, August 14, 1941, entry; AŻIH, 301/1846, testimony of Szymon Kamiński, pp. 1–2; IPN-Bi, S-74/03/Zn.
4. AŻIH, 301/1846, pp. 1–2; 301/2212, testimony of Benjamin Wolf, pp. 1–30.
5. Ibid., 301/1270, p. 1.
6. USHMM, RG-15.019M, reel 14, 46/52, p. 1.
7. AŻIH, 301/1270, p. 1.
8. Ibid.
9. VHF, # 21890, testimony of Yehuda Leytler.
10. Ibid., # 28351 and 45233, testimonies, respectively, of Sara (Wirszubska) Szymańska and Adela (Wirszubska) Boddy.
11. BA-L, B 162/15965 (V 205 AR-Z 76/75 [Narew]), pp. 80–82; IPN-Bi, 356/71.
12. IPN, SAB 25, 36.

NURZEC

Pre-1939: Nurzec, village, Bielsk Podlaski powiat, Białystok województwo, Poland; 1939–1941: Nuzhets, Bel'sk raion, Belostok oblast', Belorussian SSR; 1941–1944: Nurzec, Kreis Bielsk, Distrikt Białystok; post-1998: Siemiatycze powiat, województwo podlaskie, Poland

Nurzec, lies 96 kilometers (60 miles) south of Białystok. Before World War II, it was part of a landed estate owned by the Narbut family.

During World War II, the Germans briefly occupied Nurzec in September 1939 before ceding it to Soviet occupation. A Wehrmacht unit recaptured the estate by the end of June 1941.

The Germans established a ghetto in Nurzec in August 1942. Its terrain consisted of six homes. It likely was fenced, as the Kreiskommissar of Bielsk ordered the establishment of closed ghettos throughout the Kreis in the spring of 1942.

Because no Jews were pre-war inhabitants of Nurzec, the 250 ghetto inmates likely had been relocated there from nearby localities in the pre-war Milejczyce gmina. They probably came from places such as the residential area surrounding the nearby railway station known as Nurzec-Stacja and from Rogacze, Zabłocie, and Chanie, where 38 and 23, 14, and 7 Jews, respectively, had resided in 1921. The ghetto inmates also may have been brought from localities near Nurzec in the pre-war Siemiatycze gmina, such as Moszczona Pańska, home to 6 Jews in 1921. (In the pre-war Bielsk Podlaski powiat, in particular, a large number of extended Jewish families had lived scattered across scores of similar small villages.) As many as 200 Jews may have resided in the villages surrounding Nurzec. Unfortunately, there is no information about the specific fates of these Jewish communities during World War II. Given the absence of a historic Jewish community in Nurzec, it also is possible that the ghetto was more like a labor camp, with the Jews consolidated there specifically for labor on the estate. Until additional documentation emerges, it is impossible to draw definitive conclusions.

Conditions in the Nurzec ghetto were poor. The largest house in the ghetto was occupied by 100 people. Its inmates worked mostly in their pre-war occupations as tailors, shoemakers, and glass workers in workshops established in the ghetto. Some ghetto inmates were conscripted for railway repair work and forestry labor.

The Nurzec ghetto was liquidated in early November 1942. The Germans marched its inmates first to the ghetto in Milejczyce and then on November 5, together with the Milejczyce community, took them to the ghetto in Kleszczele. The next day all of the Jews consolidated in the Kleszczele ghetto were deported to a transit camp, located in Białystok, on the former training ground of the pre-war Polish Army's 10th Cavalry Brigade. The former inmates of the Nurzec ghetto were expelled from the Białystok transit camp and sent, between November 10 and December 15, to the Treblinka extermination camp. They were all gassed on arrival.

No Jews from the Nurzec ghetto are believed to have survived the Holocaust. Little remains to commemorate the former ghetto site. Destroyed during World War II, the Nurzec estate complex was not rebuilt. Instead, after the war the area was converted into a public recreational and sports center.

SOURCES Archival documentation for the Jewish community of Nurzec during World War II remains scarce. It includes IPN-Bi and USHMM (RG-15.019M [IPN] 48/50). This entry was based entirely on the latter source.

Laura Crago

ORLA

Pre-1939: Orla, village, Bielsk Podlaski powiat, Białystok województwo, Poland; 1939–1941: Orlia, Bel'sk raion, Belostok oblast', Belorussian SSR; 1941–1944: Orla, Kreis Bielsk, Distrikt Białystok; post-1998: Bielsk powiat, województwo podlaskie, Poland

Orla lies 62.8 kilometers (39 miles), by road, south-southeast of Białystok and 12.3 kilometers (7.6 miles) southeast of Bielsk Podlaski. In 1921, 1,167 Jews resided there.

In September 1939, the Germans occupied Orla but shortly after evacuated it to make way for the Red Army. The Jewish population expanded during the Soviet occupation, as 1,450 to 2,000 Jews resided in Orla by early June 1941.¹

On June 25, 1941, German forces reoccupied Orla. Supposedly in reprisal for sporadic shootings by some Soviet soldiers, the Germans burned 10 Jewish houses on Kleszczele Street. The German military commander, a captain, demanded from Rabbi Halperin (Halpern) a list of all Jews aged over 10 years and ordered them to report for an assembly the next day on the market square. There, the commander issued orders requiring adult Jews to perform forced labor and to wear distinctive yellow symbols on their clothes. The Germans beat those who showed up late.

Some days later, at another mandatory assembly in the synagogue, the military commander threatened to shoot the rabbi's son and others for refusing to agree with the assertion that Jews preyed on Christian blood. Wiatkowski (or Wiotkowski), a local Belorussian teacher employed as a translator for the Germans, interceded on behalf of the Jews.² The commander instead ordered the Jews to surrender their horses and valuables on pain of death. The order was enforced by searches of Jewish houses. The Germans ordered the Torah in the synagogue desecrated. In addition, they required 150 Jews to report daily for forced labor.

In late August or early in the fall of 1941, the Germans established a civil administration for Orla, under the control of an Amtskommissar. The first Amtskommissar was soon transferred to Białowieża. His replacement likely was Zandeky. The German authorities established a local administration, appointing Shorf (or Scharf) the mayor. They ordered that a Jewish Council (Judenrat) be established, composed of perhaps 12 members. Authorities ordered the Jews to mark their houses with yellow signs and to pay a large “contribution” of 0.5 kilogram (1.1 pounds) of gold, 3 kilograms (6.6 pounds) of silver, and 40,000 rubles.

In early March 1942, the Amtskommissar expelled to Orla the non-Jewish inhabitants of several nearby villages. The expulsions marked the first step in establishing the Orla ghetto. In Orla, German authorities ordered the residents of entire streets to evacuate their houses for the new arrivals. All of the houses on Nowa Szosa Street, for example, were assigned to people from Antonowo-Kolonia. Their former Christian residents were ordered to reside in houses in the north of the village; their former Jewish residents were assigned to houses in the southwest, in the part of Orla ultimately demarcated for the ghetto.³ Likely, at this time Jews from other nearby villages were expelled to Orla. The Amtskommissar seized Jewish houses, shops, and stalls at the market square and sold them off cheaply to non-Jews, mainly for building materials.

On March 20, 1942, the Germans ordered all Jews still living outside the area designated for the ghetto to relocate there. The ghetto was composed of an area based around Koszelowska, postwar 1 Maja, and Kleszczelowska Streets. As the Jews moved in, a gauntlet of Gendarmes robbed them. In April, the ghetto was surrounded by a wooden fence. Its construction likely led to the establishment of two separate ghettos, a large ghetto and a small one.⁴ After a fire in April 1942 destroyed several houses inside the ghetto, the Jewish Council asked local officials to expand the ghetto. They responded by shooting a man for allegedly setting the fire and threatened to evacuate 300 Jews to the ghetto in Prużana. The authorities ultimately permitted the Jews to dismantle two unused houses from outside the ghetto and to rebuild them inside.⁵

With about 2 square meters (22 square feet) available per person in the ghetto, overcrowded conditions led to the spread of disease and a high death rate, especially among small children and the elderly. The Jewish Police assembled 400 inmates daily for forced labor. They also met German demands for possessions, including jewelry and furniture, and were subjected to searches and seizures. Compared with some ghettos, material conditions were not horrendous. Lax guarding enabled the Jews to barter material possessions for food with local Slavs at the ghetto fence. Some Jewish craftsmen snuck out of the ghetto to work for the local population. In the spring of 1942, Gendarmes executed 3 Orla Jews, Matie Szumacher, a carpenter, and his two sons, for working illicitly on a construction project in a nearby village.⁶

At 5:00 A.M. on November 2, 1942, German police forces encircled the ghetto and informed the Jews that they were being sent to work near the Black Sea or in the Caucasus and could take almost none of their belongings. Some Jews had fled the ghetto, but they returned to accept the fate of the community after the SS threatened to execute their families. A few Jewish women who had lived the entire time outside the ghetto reported for the evacuation. The next day, on November 3, the German forces marched the Orla Jews on foot to Bielsk Podlaski. A group of 5 Jews managed to flee, but the

Gendarmerie subsequently caught them and shot them in the Szernie and Dubicze Tofiłowce villages.⁷

About 200 Orla craftsmen, their families, and a few other community members, including Rabbi Halperin, were incarcerated briefly in the ghetto in Bielsk Podlaski before being sent on to the Białystok ghetto. One source suggests the Białystok expulsion occurred on November 3; another notes the Germans transferred 49 craftsmen and their families on November 6; a third reports the later date, adding that 200 people, from 48 families, were transferred from the Bielsk to the Białystok ghetto.⁸

Because one account mentions only the arrival in the Bielsk ghetto of the Orla craftsmen, it may suggest that the rest of the Orla Jews were sent directly from the train station in Bielsk Podlaski to the Treblinka extermination camp.⁹ In most other accounts, the Orla Jews were first consolidated in the Bielsk ghetto, which had been transformed into a makeshift transit camp, before being transferred to Treblinka. On November 16–17, local security forces in Bielsk and members of the 1st Company of Police Reserve Battalion 13 marched a large group of Jews from the Bielsk ghetto to the train station, but it is unknown if the remaining Orla Jews were among those deported or if they were sent on another transport to Treblinka.¹⁰ Those sent to Treblinka were all gassed on arrival.

The 200 surviving craftsmen and their families spent about a month, first in the Białystok ghetto and then at a labor camp in Pietrasze, on the northern outskirts of Białystok, making winter boots for the Wehrmacht. By early December 1942, the workers had been returned to the empty Bielsk Podlaski ghetto to work at a similar factory. Most likely in January 1943, they were sent again to the Pietrasze labor camp, which by then had been transformed into a makeshift transit camp. About two weeks later, the women and children were sent to the Treblinka extermination camp, where they were gassed on arrival. The male craftsmen likely were deported to other concentration camps for labor, but no accounts by survivors have been located.

According to survivor Symcha Bursztajn, there were no survivors of the Orla ghetto.¹¹

SOURCES A Polish translation of AŻIH, 301/1963, cited below, is available on the virtual Archiwum Etnograficzne, at www.archiwumetnograficzne.edu.pl/readarticle.php?article_id=24. A testimony by a Christian eyewitness, in Michał Mincewicz, “Żydzi w Orli—wspomnienie Zenaida Niedzielska,” Tygodnik Podlaski, March 28, 2007, is most accessible at Polin, the Web site of the Foundation for the Preservation of Jewish Heritage in Poland (www.fodz.pl). Helpful for its discussion of the fates of the craftsmen deported from Orla to the Bielsk Podlaski and the Białystok ghettos is Meir Pekar, “In the Bielsk Ghetto and the Camps,” in Haim Rabin, ed., Bilsk Podlaski sefer yizkor le-zikbram ba-kadosh shel Yebude Bilsk she-nispu ba-Sbo’ah ba-natsit ba-shanim 1939–1944 ([Tel Aviv]: Irgun ole Bilsk be-Yisrael, 1975). An English translation is available at jewishgen.org.

Additional information on the Orla ghetto can be found in Szymon Datner, “Eksterminacja ludności żydowskiej w Okręgu Białostockim,” BŻIH, no. 60 (1966): 15, 25, 39; Grzegorz Sosna and Doroteusz Fionik, Orla nad Podlasie: Dzieje Cerkwi, miasta i okolic (Białystok: Białoruskie Towarzystwo Historyczne, 1997), pp. 72–73; and the relevant entry in Shmuel Spector and Bracha Freundlich, eds., Pinkas ha-kebilot. Encyclopaedia of Jewish Communities: Poland, vol. 8, Vilna, Białystok, Nowogródek (Jerusalem: Yad Vashem, 2005), pp. 104–106; and its English-language counterpart, Arnon Rubin, The Rise and Fall of Jewish Communities in Poland and Their Relics Today, vol. 1, District Białystok (Tel Aviv: Tel Aviv University Press, 2006), pp. 142–145.

Testimonies on the Orla ghetto and the German occupation of the town can be found in the following archives: AŻIH (e.g., 204 [old 2/123], 301/1963); BA-L (B 162, ZStL, V 205 AR-Z 112/77); IPN-Bi (S-212/68); and YVA (M-11 [50, 53]).

Martin Dean and Laura Crago

NOTES

1. YVA, M-11/50, Rabbi Halpern, “My recollections,” for low figure; and AŻIH, 301/1963, testimony of Symcha Bursztajn, p. 1, for high figure.

2. See AŻIH, 301/1963, p. 1, in which Wiotkowski is described as among “the warmest” supporters of the Germans.

3. Mincewicz, “Żydzi w Orli.”

4. Ibid.

5. YVA, M-11/50.

6. Ibid.; BA-L, B 162, ZStL, V 205 AR-Z 112/77, pp. 58–61 (statement, Josef Nazarewicz, February 6, 1976); AŻIH, 301/1963, p. 2.

7. AŻIH, 301/1977, testimony of Symcha Bursztajn, p. 3; BA-L, B 162, ZStL, V 205 AR-Z 112/77, p. 129.

8. Compare Peker, “In the Bielsk Ghetto,” p. 33; AŻIH, 301/1977, p. 3, 301/3944, p. 1.

9. Peker, “In the Bielsk Ghetto,” p. 33.

10. On the transfer, see Wolfgang Curilla, Die deutsche Ordnungspolizei und der Holocaust im Baltikum und in Weissrussland, 1941–1944 (Paderborn: Ferdinand Schöningh, 2006), p. 602.

11. AŻIH, 301/1963, p. 2.

OSTRYNA

Pre-1939: Ostryna (Yiddish: Ostrin), village, Nowogródek województwo, Poland; 1939–1941: Ostrino, Vasilishki raion, Baranovichi oblast', Belorussian SSR; 1941–1944: Ostryna, Kreis Grodno, Distrikt Białystok; post-1991: Astryna, Shchuchyn raen, Hrodna voblasts', Republic of Belarus

Ostryna lies 55 kilometers (34.2 miles) east-northeast of Grodno. Its 1921 population of 1,572 included 1,067 Jews. During World War II, it came under Soviet occupation on September 19, 1939. By 1940, refugees from German-occupied Poland had increased the Jewish population to 2,000, out of a total population of 2,744.

On June 24, 1941, the Germans reoccupied Ostryna. The local German military commander immediately organized a collaborationist local administration. A Pole filled the position of civil administrator (wójt). German authorities recruited local Belorussians and Poles for an auxiliary police force. The military commander issued a series of anti-Jewish decrees that forbade contact with Christians, prohibited movement beyond Ostryna, required the wearing of yellow markings on the chest and back, and made forced labor obligatory for all adults. He also ordered that a six-person Jewish Council (Judenrat) be established. Its chair, Josel (Josef) Wigdorowicz, was a founder of the Tarbut school. Abram Słocznik, a baker, was named the Jewish Police commander.

In early July, at least eight Jews, including Icchak Rewicz, a tailor, and Dawid Sadecki, and a number of Christians were arrested on the basis of denunciations by local Poles. They were executed by the members of a Wehrmacht Feldgendarmerie detachment that had assumed responsibility for policing in and around Ostryna.¹

In late August, soldiers from the 12th Company of the 707th Infantry Division assumed responsibility for Ostryna. Under the command of Oberleutnant Josef Kiefer, the soldiers perpetrated anti-Jewish violence across a region including Ostryna and Jeziory in Distrikt Białystok and Szczuczyn and Lida in Generalkommissariat Weissruthenien. Leutnant Oskar Ritterbusch, the commander of the 1st Platoon, served as the Ostryna Ortskommandant through at least October 15, 1941. In late autumn, his unit was relieved by the 2nd Platoon, commanded by Leutnant Ernst Schaffitz. The 2nd Platoon likely remained in Ostryna until the end of January 1942, by which time a German civil administration had been established.²

In the late summer or early fall of 1941, the soldiers from the 12th Company and the local police helped an SS unit force the Ostryna Jews to collect the ritual objects from the synagogue and Bet Midrash. Shortly afterwards, the Jews were ordered assembled on the market square at 2:00 p.m., on pain of death. As they waited there, the officials and the local police searched their houses for valuables. At least seven Jews found during the search were shot dead. Near dusk, the Germans permitted the assembled Jews to return to their plundered homes.

In October 1941, the Ortskommandant ordered an open ghetto established in Ostryna. It was located near the market square between Grodno, Nowy Dwór, Wilno, and Cerkiew Streets. To exclude the square from its terrain, the ghetto was divided into two parts: the area from Wilno Street to the synagogue, including housing formerly used by railway signalmen, comprised ghetto no. 1; the area beyond the synagogue, including Cerkiew and Wasiliszk Streets, made up ghetto no. 2. Local authorities imposed a curfew, from 5:00 p.m. to 8:00 a.m., and forbade the inmates to be outside on Sundays and holidays. A Jew found a few steps outside his house during the curfew could be shot, as some were. Perhaps as late as March, authorities expelled to the ghetto about 500 Jews from Nowy Dwór.

Sometime shortly after October 12, 1941, on a Sunday following the Sukkot holiday, soldiers, likely from the 1st Platoon, assisted by local police, rounded up about 80 Jews from the ghetto and executed them at the Jewish cemetery. To protect the community, Wigdorowicz, in November 1942, refused German orders to submit a list of 100 men for work outside Ostryna. Authorities sent him to a labor camp in Starosielce.

His successor, Berl Parecki, surrendered the youth. Sent to the same camp, they almost all perished. In late December, soldiers, likely from the 2nd Platoon, ordered the Jews to assemble on the market square and then executed in front of them 10 physically handicapped community members. About a month prior, a small SS contingent had murdered the rabbi of Ostryna, Shimon Gershonowitz. Just after the 1942 New Year, soldiers from the 2nd Platoon executed the remaining religious leaders, teachers, and their families.³

The arrival of German civilian administrators, by early February 1942, brought changes to the ghetto. At the end of Passover, in April 1942, police from the Ostryna Gendarmerie, commanded initially by Meister Petzek, ordered the Jews living in ghetto no. 2 to move to ghetto no. 1. The Germans then ordered the reduced ghetto area fenced. The closed ghetto included Wasiliszki and Wilno Streets, the synagogue, and its courtyard. The authorities permitted the Jews to transfer belongings to the closed ghetto but declared the move-in period completed before they had finished. A policeman, Jan Lach (or Lachowski), a Pole from Nowy Dwór, shot dead 12-year-old Nachmann Kaplan when the boy refused to stop moving items into the ghetto.⁴

About 25 to 30 people were crowded into a single house in the closed ghetto. To provide living space, the synagogue was subdivided into cells. Food was scarce, as the Germans provided daily individual rations only for skim milk and 100 grams (3.5 ounces) of bread. No public kitchen or other assistance was organized for the hungry. Every prisoner had to obtain food on his or her own.⁵

The Roman Catholic priest in Ostryna counseled his faithful at Mass not to participate in the German persecution of the Jews and smuggled food into the ghetto for some Jews. Perhaps, as a result, some local Slavs bartered food at the ghetto fence. Such transactions were dangerous for Jews. At least two were shot for talking to a non-Jew across the fence.

On German orders, the Judenrat organized carpentry and tailoring workshops, just outside the ghetto, for craftsmen to complete work for German officials for no remuneration. The most fortunate were considered conscripts employed by Christians, on contracts negotiated with German officials, because they were better treated and had access to food. By the spring of 1942, many ghetto inmates worked weeklong labor stints, either at a plywood factory on Lithuanian territory or at a camp, organized for improvements on the road to Szczuczyn and the road to Jeziory.⁶ The conscripts returned home on Sundays. On June 6, 1942, at an assembly, the Ostryna Amtskommissar chose 100 men for immediate deportation to the Starosielce labor camp. Not including the men sent permanently to Starosielce, the regular ghetto population stood at about 1,200 to 1,300, with another 700 prisoners conscripted for work during the week outside Ostryna.

At the end of October 1942, the Germans convened a Judenrat meeting to order all ghetto inmates assembled with their movable property at the marketplace on November 2. A group of 12 youths ran away to the nearby forests. They were rounded up and executed. On November 2, the Germans liquidated the Ostryna ghetto. They transported the 1,969 Jews over the course of two days to a transit camp, in Kielbasin, located south of Grodno.⁷ Many Ostryna Jews perished just outside the camp when SS guards ordered them to run the last 5 kilometers (3.1 miles) and shot dead those who fell behind.

Imprisoned at Kielbasin for about a month with about 22,000 to 28,000 Jews from nearby communities, the Ostryna Jews were sent to the Auschwitz extermination camp at the end of November 1942 in a transport, officially of 1,000 people. On December 2, at Birkenau, the SS held back from the transport 238 people—178 men and 60 women—as concentration camp prisoners. The remaining Jews on the transport—at least 762 people—were gassed on arrival.⁸ The Starosielce inmates were sent on November 19 to the Treblinka extermination camp. A few Ostryna Jews in the Treblinka deportation jumped from the transport train. Michal-Meer Jezierski, among the survivors, subsequently joined a partisan unit.

Two Jewish survivors resided in Ostryna after the war. The 8 to 13 others immigrated mostly to the United States and Israel.

Extradited to Poland, Schaffitz was tried in Warsaw in 1948 and sentenced to death for the mass executions of Jews in Szczuczyn, Lida, and Baranowicze. In 1949, the sentence was commuted to life in prison. (He died there in 1956.)⁹ In the late 1960s, West German investigators studied the wartime activities of Kiefer and Ritterbusch but concluded they lacked the evidence to proceed legally against them.¹⁰ In Poland, three former auxiliary policemen, including Jan Lach, also were investigated for murdering Jews in Ostryna between 1942 and 1943 but ultimately were tried for murdering partisans.¹¹

SOURCES Some archival materials cited below, including YVA, O-3/7431, and a large part of BA-L, B 162/26286 (202 AR 2403/65), have appeared in English translations, respectively, by Shoshana Stifel and Irene Newhouse, on the Lida ShtetLinks pages at jewishgen.org, respectively, at www.shtetlinks.jewishgen.org/lida-District/yv-glembocki.htm and www.shtetlinks.jewishgen.org/lida-District/kiefer.htm. Copies of some of the GAGO materials also appear in Serge Klarsfeld, ed., Documents Concerning the Destruction of the Jews of Grodno 1941–1944, vol. 6 (New York: Beate Klarsfeld Foundation, 1992).

The entry also is based on the three published testimonies by Ostryna survivors, including a collective testimony by Shlomo Bojarski, Michal-Meir Jezierski (or Mikhail-Meer Ezierskii), Abraham Kazimierz, Yitzhak Reznik, and Moshe Shulaner, in the regional yizkor book edited by Yosef Kohen-Tsedek et al., Sefer zikaron li-kehilt Ostrin, Shts'uts'in, Vasilishki, Novidvor, Roz'ankab (Tel Aviv: Irgun yots'e Ostrin be-Yisrael, 1966). An English translation of the book is available at www.jewishgen.org/yizkor/szczuczyn-belarus/szczuczyn.html, though at this writing only the chapters about the pre-World War II history of the Ostryna Jewish community have appeared.

Useful secondary accounts include the Ostryna entry in Shmuel Spector and Bracha Freundlich, eds., Pinkas ha-kehilot. Encyclopaedia of Jewish Communities: Poland, vol. 8, Vilna, Bialystok, Nowogrodek (Jerusalem: Yad Vashem, 2005), pp. 100–102; and Pamiats’ Historyka-dakumental’naia kbro-nika Shchuchynskaha raiona (Minsk: Belarускаia Entsyklapedyia, 2001), with the second providing useful demographic information and a list of those from the raion who perished during the war.

Archival documentation on the Jewish community under German occupation during World War II includes AŻIH (301/748); BA-L (B 162/26286 [202 AR 2403/65]); GAGO (1-1-54, pp. 37–38, 1-1-335, p. 85); GARF (e.g., 7021-86-36, 7021-86-40, pp. 4, 56, 58); IPN (SOW 64, SWB 264-267); IPN-Bi (1/1194 [Ko-250/88], 3/129 [W-52/68], 7/575/1-2 [II-1335/KSL14808]); NARB (845-1-8, p. 31); USHMM (RG-22.002M [GARF], RG-53.004M [GAGO]); VHF (# 13477); and YVA (e.g., O-3/300, O-3/7431, M-49E [e.g., 78]).

Siarhej Pivavarchyk, Martin Dean, and Laura Crago

NOTES

1. VHF, # 13477, testimony of Vladimir Glemobotzkiy (sic).
2. USHMM, RG-53.004M (GAGO), reel 1, 1-1-2, pp. 19, 130–131.
3. BA-L, B 162/26286 (202 AR 2403/65). Although West German investigators attributed Schaffitz and his men with the October 1941 murders, their timing suggests they more likely were the work of Ritterbusch and his platoon.
4. VHF, # 13477, identifying two policemen, Jan Lach and Jan Lachowski, but attributing the murder to Lach, and postwar Polish investigators deciding “Lach” was an alias used by Lachowski.
5. YVA, O-3/7431, testimony of Vladimir Glembocki.
6. VHF, # 13477.
7. USHMM, RG-53.004M, reel 1, 1-1-54, pp. 37–38.
8. Stanisław Mączka, ed., Żydzi polscy w KL Auschwitz: wykazy imienne (Warsaw: ŻIH, 2004), pp. 122–125.
9. IPN, SOW 64.
10. BA-L, B 162/26286 (202 AR 2403/65).
11. IPN-Bi, 3/129 (W-52/68), 7/575/1-2 (II-1335, KSL-14808); IPN, SWB 264–267.

PIASKI

Pre-1939: Piaski (Yiddish: Piesk), village, Wołkowysk powiat, Białystok województwo, Poland; 1939–1941: Peski, Mosty raion, Grodno oblast’, Belorussian SSR; 1941–1944: Piaski, Kreis Wołkowysk, Distrikt Białystok; post-1991: Peski, Masty raen, Hrodna voblasts’, Republic of Belarus

Piaski lies on the Zelwianka River. In interwar Poland, it was located 25 kilometers (15.5 miles) north-northeast of Wołkowysk. In 1921, 1,249 Jews lived there. In World War II, after Piaski first came under Soviet occupation, refugees from German-occupied Poland increased the Jewish population to around 1,500.

A Wehrmacht unit occupied Piaski by the end of June 1941. Its military commander likely appointed a local civilian administration, headed by Vicentii Semashko. The auxiliary police force, according to Jewish survivors, was composed mostly of Belorussians, though Poles also were members.¹ Among the auxiliary policemen were Anton Franz, Michał and Czesław Zabołotski, and men surnamed Putilovskii and Tishevskii. A German civil administration was established in the fall of 1941 when the Piaski Amtskommissariat was incorporated into Kreis Wolkowysk in Distrikt Białystok.

In the summer and early fall of 1941, regional German military administrators introduced a series of anti-Jewish decrees, including orders requiring the wearing of yellow markings on the chest and back, registration, prohibitions on movement beyond the place of registration, compulsory forced labor of all adult Jews, and the formation of Jewish Councils (Judenräte). The Piaski Judenrat was led by Rachmiel Halperin (or Galperin).

In the meantime, Piaski was flooded with Jewish refugees from war-devastated Wołkowysk.² Because the Piaski Amtskommissar was considered less willing than his counterparts in Kreis Wolkowysk to tolerate anti-Jewish violence and raids on Jewish property, some Jews subsequently fled there in the spring of 1942 from other ghettos, including from Różana.³ The refugees may have increased the Jewish population to 2,000.

The Różana refugees were surprised to discover that the Piaski Jews lived under the German occupation largely as they had before the war, working in agriculture. By early summer 1942, they remained healthy because of their ready access to food.⁴ However, Piaski Jews remember the Germans conscripting them for forced labor on road construction projects, including between Piaski and Mosty, then a village about 8 kilometers (5 miles) north-northeast by road, and at a factory, also in Mosty, to produce wooden crates for German aircraft parts. Jewish factory conscripts received flour in remuneration for their labor. The Judenrat assigned another 30 young men and women to work three-month stints at a Wołkowysk labor camp to work on railway lines.⁵

In July 1942, a ghetto was established for the Jews of Piaski, across from the residence of the Amtskommissar, in the old Jewish neighborhood, near the Jewish cemetery. One of its boundaries ended just before the Zelwianka River. The ghetto was fenced with barbed wire. The Amtskommissar forbade Jews forced to move to the ghetto from bringing anything with them from their former houses.⁶

The role played by the auxiliary police in enforcing the German decree confining the Piaski Jews to the ghetto is debated. According to a survivor, the police, longtime friends or acquaintances of almost all the Jews, humiliated and pelted ghetto inmates with stones for appealing to be released to barter with local Christians for food.⁷ Because there was just one well in the ghetto, the police also released the Jews from the ghetto daily at sundown to bring two pails of water from the river and exercised their authority by whipping the last water bearers to arrive back at the ghetto’s gate.⁸ However, another survivor has attributed lax policing with saving the lives of some Jews, particularly after local German authorities charged the police with sealing the ghetto in the last week of October 1942, and some policemen abetted the escape of several Jews and in one instance even sheltered Jews, in anticipation of the ghetto's liquidation.⁹

The Piaski ghetto was sealed earlier than other ghettos in Distrikt Białystok because the Germans consolidated other smaller Jewish communities there. On November 2, 1942, Gendarmes and auxiliary policeman, for example, drove 360 Jews from Mosty to the Piaski ghetto. Other Jews likely were brought there from the north and northwest of Kreis Wolkowysk, as a Mosty survivor remembers 2,500 Jews from the region spending the night together in the Piaski ghetto.¹⁰

On November 3, 1942, an SS unit ordered the Jews in the Piaski ghetto on an eight-hour march to a transit camp located outside of Wołkowysk in a pre-war Polish cavalry garrison. The SS commander promised transport to those too old or too sick to move from their beds and to several women in advanced stages of pregnancy. After the other Jews had departed at noon, he ordered those awaiting transport to be consolidated together, either in a house near the Jewish cemetery or in a former school building. In one account, the SS set fire to the building as auxiliary policemen threw the elderly into the flames alive. About 20 Piaski Jews and another 3 Jews from Mosty perished in the blaze, which also destroyed a large part of the ghetto. Another account notes the Germans shot the Jews dead.¹¹

At the transit camp, the Piaski deportees joined the approximately 17,500 other Jews from Kreis Wolkowysk also driven there to facilitate their deportation to extermination camps. The Piaski and Mosty Jews were crowded together in two of six subterranean barracks constructed underneath two large dilapidated horse stables, which together formed an internally fenced-off block within the camp. The Jews from the Zelwa and Świsłocz expulsions, with the latter also encompassing the Jałówka and Mścibów communities, were assigned to the remaining barracks in the block. They lived there for about a month with little food and limited sanitation facilities. Many perished in a typhus epidemic that claimed hundreds, if not thousands, of lives.

Some sources note the Piaski (and Mosty) Jews were expelled from the transit camp, together with the Zelwa, Jałówka, and Mścibów communities, and sent on December 2, 1942, in the second Wołkowysk transport, to the Treblinka extermination camp. Other eyewitnesses remember the second transport including only the Zelwa community. They describe the Piaski (and Mosty) Jews as being on one of the subsequent transports, which left Wołkowysk for Treblinka every three to seven days, until the middle of December, when only 1,700 to 2,000 inmates, from Wołkowysk and Świsłocz, remained at the transit camp.¹² Almost all of the approximately 18,300 Jews in the Wołkowysk transports to Treblinka were gassed on arrival, as the Germans are known to have held back only 60 to 70 men from the Jałówka and Mścibów transport as prisoners of the Treblinka labor camp. There is only one known survivor from among the prisoners.¹³

A number of Piaski Jews evaded the Treblinka deportations. Ordered to help contain the typhus epidemic, Piaski physician

Eliezer Epstein was in the final group of 1,700 to 2,000 inmates sent from Wołkowysk on January 26, 1943, to the Auschwitz extermination camp and among a handful of survivors from the 350 people held back from the transport as prisoners of the concentration camp. At least 15 Piaski Jews, including Szymon Warszawski and Meir Rakhkin, escaped from the ghetto or subsequently from the transit camp and joined the Soviet Pobedka (Victory) partisan unit, a part of the A.S. Sabarov Brigade. Attacks on troop trains and supply convoys and the kidnapping and murder of scores of German officials and soldiers won the partisans in the unit Soviet military distinctions after the war. However, one former partisan, a survivor of the Piaski ghetto, has questioned the single-minded commitment to military operations of unit commander Yitzhak Atlas, a Łódź physician and Soviet-era refugee, because the activities, combined with German reprisal actions, claimed the lives of at least 80 percent of the unit's approximately 360 Jews.¹⁴

SOURCES The yizkor book Pyesk u-Most: Sefer yizkor (Tel Aviv: Irgun yots'e Pyesk u-Most be-Yisrael yeha-tefutsot, 1975) includes several testimonies by Piaski survivors, though at this writing none of them have appeared in the English translation of the yizkor book, available at jewishgen.org. The expulsion from the Piaski ghetto to the Wołkowysk transit camp forms a part of the contribution by Mosty physician Noah Kaplinsky, in "Wolkowysk in Its Death Throes," originally published in Hurban Wolkowysk be-Milhemet ha-'olam ha-sheniya, 1939/1945 (Tel Aviv: Vaad Irgun yots'e Wolkowysk be-Yisrael, 1946), and in English as Sefer zikaron Wolkowysk. The Wolkowysk Memorial Book, trans. Jacob Solomon Berger (Mahwah, NJ: J.S. Berger, 2000), pt. 2, pp. 35–42. Other accounts by Piaski survivors include Raḥel Shtilerman, 'Ayarab 'al hol (Tel Aviv: Yesod, 1968); and Maxime Rafailovitch (or Michael Jourdan–Lichtenstein), "The End of the Piaski Community," available online at the Lida ShtetLinks homepage www.shtetlinks.jewishgen.org/Lida-District/piaski.htm.

Other sources in English for the study of the Pobedka partisans, to which almost all Piaski survivors belonged, include the study of its commander, by Samuel Bornstein, "Dr. Yehezkel Atlas, Partisan Commander," in Jacob Glatstein et al., eds., Anthology of Holocaust Literature (Philadelphia: Jewish Publication Society of America, 1969), pp. 299–306; and the account by Moshe Slutsky, "The Partisanas," in Yerachmiel Moorstein, ed., Sefer zikaron Zel'ah ([Israel]: Irgun yots'e Zel'ah be-Yisrael, 1984), in an English translation by Jacob Solomon Berger, as Yerachmiel Moorstein, ed., Zelva Memorial Book (Mahwah, NJ: J.S. Berger, 1992), pp. 71–76.

Also useful is the relevant entry in Shmuel Spector and Bracha Freundlich, eds., Pinkas ha-kehilot. Encyclopaedia of Jewish Communities: Poland, vol. 8, Vilna, Bialystok, Nowogrodek (Jerusalem: Yad Vashem, 2005), pp. 525–529; and the perspective of local Belarusians provided in Natal'ia Slizh, "Zhizn evreiskoi obshchiny glazami belorusov v 1930–1940-e gg. (na primere derevni Peski Grodnenskoï oblasti)," Diaspory (Moscow) 4 (2003): 268–278.

Archival documentation for the Jewish community of Piaski under the German occupation in World War II includes FVA (HVT-4185); GARF (7021-86-43, pp. 5–15); USHMM (RG-22.002M [GARF], reel 13, 7021-86-43, pp. 5–15); VHF (# 13415, 15651, 19344, and 35581); and YVA (e.g., M-33 [GARF]/711, pp. 5–15). A portion of the ChGK report for Piaski also appears in Leonid Smilovitskii, Katastrofa evreev v Belorussii 1941–1944 gg. (Tel Aviv: Biblioteka Matveia Chernogo, 2000), p. 191, in English translation as “Peski (Piaski),” in Holocaust in Belarus, at www.jewishgen.org/Yizkor/belarus/bel178.html yizkor book.

Laura Crago and Alexander Kruglov
trans. Steven Seegel

NOTES

1. VHF, # 35581, testimony of Michael Jourdan-Lichtenstein with Maxime Rafailovitch.
2. AŽIH, 301/37, testimony of Ida Mazur, p. 1.
3. VHF, # 35581.
4. Ibid.
5. Ibid., # 13415, testimony of Dora (Zhukovskaia-)Levina.
6. Ibid.
7. Rafailovitch, “The End.”
8. VHF, # 13415.
9. Ibid., # 19344, testimony of Itsko Zhukovskii.
10. GARF, 7021-86-43, pp. 10, 12.
11. Compare ibid., pp. 5–15; and Rafailovitch, “The End.”
12. Compare, e.g., Moses Einhorn, “Destruction of Wolkovisk,” in Einhorn, ed., Volkovisker Yisker-bukh (New York, 1949), p. 921; and Kaplinsky, “Volkowysk,” in Sefer zikaron Volkovisk, pt. 2, p. 41.
13. BLH, testimony of Leib Aronzon, in an English trans. on the Jałówka homepage of the Avotaynu Web site (www.avotaynu.com), with the author remembering the expulsion of the second Wolkowysk transport occurring on December 2, 1942.
14. In English, compare Bornstein, “Dr. Yehezkel Atlas,” pp. 299–306; and VHF, # 35581.

PIĄTNICA

Pre-1939: Piątnica (Yiddish: Piontnitza), village, Łomża powiat, Białystok województwo, Poland; 1939–1941: Piatnitsa, Lomzha raion, Belostok oblast', Belorussian SSR; 1941–1944: Piatnitsa, Kreis Lomscha, Distrikt Białystok; post-1998: Piątnica, Łomża powiat, województwo podlaskie, Poland

Piātnica lies across the Narew River from Łomża, about 2 kilometers (1.2 miles) northeast of the city. About 250 Jews resided there on the eve of World War II.¹

A Wehrmacht unit occupied Piātnica on June 28, 1941. The military commander invested local Poles with day-to-day authority over the village. Jan Wojewoda served as the village administrator (sołtys), and Czesław Darkowski, as the vice village administrator (podsołtys).

Christian-Jewish relations were tense. After the Germans had departed, Wojewoda and Darkowski organized a roundup of the Jews, drove them to the synagogue, and threatened to burn them alive. Gendarmes in Łomża, guarding the bridge over the Narew, heard the screams of the Jews as they were being herded into the synagogue. They rushed to Piātnica to issue orders forbidding the Poles to murder the Jews and to drive them away from the assembled Jews.²

At the beginning of July 1941, Wojewoda and Darkowski established a ghetto for the Piātnica Jews. Leon Malek (or Malko), appointed by the Germans as the civil administrator (wójt) of the larger Drozdowo gmina, to which Piātnica then belonged, also participated in the decision to concentrate the Piātnica Jews into a small residential neighborhood. The men allowed the Jews to bring to the ghetto only what they could carry in a small bundle and ordered them to leave the remainder of their property at their former residences. The role played by the Germans in the establishment of the ghetto is unknown, but they did not intercede to forestall its emergence. Whether prohibitions were placed on Jewish movement beyond the ghetto also is unknown. Poles living in the ghetto area were not made to move. Rather, they were expected to house the Jews from the other parts of Piātnica.

Wojewoda, Darkowski, and Malek likely established the Piātnica ghetto to claim the property they had forced the Jews to abandon. The sołtys and podsołtys took ownership over the homes, workshops, and tools of the Jews. Malek received their cows and horses. The men probably enforced the ghettoization orders by turning over protestors to the German authorities. Darkowski, also an auxiliary policeman for three months at the beginning of the occupation, handed at least four Jews, including Gołda Matys, over to German authorities. The Jews were not seen again. In the middle of August 1941, the Germans liquidated the Piātnica ghetto. They ordered the Jews deported to the Łomża ghetto. Wojewoda helped the Gendarmes, presumably sent from Łomża, to round up the Piātnica Jews.

Wojewoda and Darkowski decided to hold back 12 Jews from the expulsion. They held the Jews prisoner and compelled them for three months in the fall of 1941 to remodel their houses. The prisoners included Eliaż Czerwonka, Nachman Markiewicz, and Fajba Żołędź. Then one day, after the establishment of a Gendarmerie post in Piātnica, likely in the early fall of 1941, the Poles marched their Jewish captives to the gmina administrative offices and handed them over to the German authorities. The Germans shot the men in the Giełczyń Forest.³

After the war, Wojewoda, Darkowski, and Malek were tried for a number of crimes, including on charges related to anti-Jewish compulsion and violence in Piātnica. Malek was charged with stealing Jewish-owned livestock.⁴ Wojewoda and Darkowski were charged with organizing a ghetto for the Piātnica Jews and serving as accessories in the deaths of 24 Jews, including the 12 men they had held captive in their homes. Although witnesses presented much evidence during the investigation to suggest the men were guilty of establishing a ghetto in Piātnica, Wojewoda and Darkowski, in February 1951, were found not guilty.

SOURCES The deposition of Cwi Baranowicz, recorded in 1967 in New York at the request of West German prosecutors investigating Nazi crimes in the Białystok and Łomża regions, is widely available in a number of sources, including Piotr Jendroszczyk and Maciej Rybiński, “Czy Żydów w Jedwabnem zabiło Gestapo?” Rzeczpospolita, March 21, 2001; Wojciech Kamiński, “Tajemnice archiwów,” Życie, March 23, 2001; and “Niemieckie dokumenty o Jedwabnem,” Głos, no. 12 (2001). As the titles suggest, poor and partial translations of the deposition initially led some Polish journalists to conclude that Baranowicz was describing events in Jedwabne. A more careful translation revealed that he was discussing Piątnica.

Useful secondary works on the history of Piątnica’s Jewish community under German occupation include the relevant entries in Andrzej Żbikowski, “Pogromy i mordy ludności żydowskiej w Łomżyńskim i na Białostocczyźnie latem 1941 roku w świetle relacji ocalałych Żydów i dokumentów sądowych,” in Paweł Machcewicz and Krzysztof Persak, eds., Wokół Jedwabnego, 2 vols. (Warsaw: IPN-KŚZpNP, 2002), vol. 1, Studia, pp. 227–228; and Abraham Wein, ed., Pinkas ha-kehillot. Encyclopaedia of Jewish Communities: Poland, vol. 4, Warsaw and Its District (Jerusalem: Yad Vashem, 1989), pp. 249–262 (Łomża), pp. 348–349 (Piątnica).

Documentation covering the history of the Jewish community in Piątnica during World War II includes AŻIH (301/4958); IPN (e.g., SAB 24, 212); and IPN-Bi (3/115, 07/1092).

Laura Crago

NOTES

1. AŻIH, 301/4958, testimony of Chaim Stawicki, p. 1.
2. Deposition of Cwi Baranowicz, cited by Kamiński, “Tajemnice archiwów.”
3. IPN, SAB 212.
4. Ibid., SAB 24.

POROZÓW

Pre-1939: Porozów (Yiddish: Porosavo), village, Wołkowysk powiat, Białystok województwo, Poland; 1939–1941: Porozovo, raion center, Brest oblast’, Belorussian SSR; 1941–1944: Porozow, Kreis Wolkowysk, Distrikt Bialystok; post-1991: Porazava, Suislach raen, Hrodna voblasts’, Republic of Belarus

Porozów lies 90 kilometers (56 miles) south-southeast of Grodno. By World War II, after Porozów came under Soviet occupation on September 26, 1939, the Jewish population stood at about 600 people.

On June 25, 1941, the fourth day of the German invasion of the USSR, a Wehrmacht unit briefly occupied Porozów. Its commander immediately demanded that the village’s inhabitants assemble on the market square. As he counted the population, he ordered every tenth male Jew arrested. The 20 detainees were executed, likely at the Jewish cemetery. The remaining men, both Jews and Christians, were incarcerated overnight in the Roman Catholic Church, providing the German soldiers an opportunity to rob Jewish homes. After the men were released, about 24 Jewish refugees found shelter with the Porozów Roman Catholic priest, Grabowski. He also arranged travel permits for the refugees, enabling them to return on July 1 to Białystok.¹ In the meantime, on June 25, a small group of Red Army soldiers had reoccupied Porozów. A larger German force drove them from the village the next day.

The new military commander, a young lieutenant, appointed a provisional civilian administration under the leadership of Radzwiński (or Radivinsky), a local Pole. The commander also announced a series of anti-Jewish decrees. The first required the Jews to wear white armbands, with a Star of David, and most likely forbade them from leaving the village without official permission. Another order required the establishment of a Jewish Council (Judenrat). It was led by a baker named Lew.

About a week after they had arrived, the German soldiers departed Porozów, leaving the village for several months in the hands of the newly appointed Polish administrators. One survivor notes that the Poles left the Jews in peace. Another account claims Radzwiński collaborated with the German administration, presumably in Wołkowysk, to extract material contributions from the Jews.² In October 1941, a Gendarmerie post, manned by four to six Germans, was established in Porozów. In November, an Amtskommissar arrived, as Porozów became an administrative center of Kreis Wolkowysk, in Distrikt Bialystok.

Because the Gendarmes and the Amtskommissar appeared interested above all in their material enrichment, the Porozów Judenrat used gifts and monetary contributions to evade the imposition of most of the anti-Jewish decrees, such as the order in September 1941 that formally made forced labor obligatory for all adult Jews. When some Jews fleeing anti-Jewish violence arrived in Porozów from Słonim, the Judenrat bribed the German officials to regularize their residency.

The relative calm came to an end in the summer of 1942 after the Porozów Amtskommissar was transferred, most likely in July. Two weeks after his replacement arrived, he ordered the Jews to the market square so that the German Gendarmes and members of the auxiliary police could search and strip their homes of valuables. Two Jews, including a refugee from Słonim, were shot that evening. A week later, the Amtskommissar ordered the arrest of all the able-bodied male Jews in the village. After many of them were beaten severely, the Judenrat paid a bribe to secure their release a week later. In exchange, the Judenrat also likely conceded to German demands for 25 young people to be sent to a labor camp to widen and pave the road from Wołkowysk to Zelwa and for Jewish craftsmen in Porozów to be conscripted daily for forced labor.

The new Amtskommissar also decided to use the discretionary authority supposedly extended to the heads of local German administrations throughout Kreis Wolkowysk to establish a ghetto in Porozów in August 1942.³ The ghetto was located on two small streets between Kościelna (Church) and Nowy Dwór Streets. It was surrounded by a barbed-wire fence.

Because the Porozów Amtskommissariat lacked Christian medical personnel, several Jewish health professionals were exempted from the ghettoization orders and were permitted to continue serving non-Jewish patients. They included the physicians Aleksander Rozenbaum and Motel (or Marek) Kaplan, a dentist (Kaplan's wife), a pharmacist, and their extended families. Kaplan had been ordered from Wołkowysk to Porozów in the Soviet period to establish a medical clinic; Rozenbaum, originally from Kalisz, had fled the German occupation of Warsaw in September 1939.⁴ It seems unlikely that the Germans consolidated other Jewish communities in the Porozów ghetto, as the 50 Jews of Nowy Dwór, the closest large Jewish community, had been driven from their houses by a Wehrmacht unit in July 1941 and marched to Prużana.

Material conditions in the Porozów ghetto were poor. Because almost all the able-bodied men and women had been sent to work on the road construction project, those who remained in the ghetto found it difficult to supplement their meager rations, as only a few of them were physically able to sneak out of the ghetto to barter with local Christians for food. Overcrowding, a problem from the outset, became more severe in October when the Jewish road laborers throughout the eastern parts of Distrikt Białystok were returned to their home ghettos. Poor sanitation and the limited food supply led to the outbreak of several small-scale epidemics within a month of the establishment of the ghetto.

On November 2, 1942, the Porozów ghetto was liquidated. At 3:00 A.M., the Amtskommissar read an order to the head of the Judenrat and to Kaplan, the representative of the medical personnel, that stated that the Jews were to be transferred to a labor camp. The order gave three hours for packing a limited number of belongings, such as work clothes, two pairs of underwear, and two blankets, before assembling at the market square. The Amtskommissar permitted about 50 people, deemed too sick or old to make the trip, to remain behind. After a three-hour delay, the remaining Jews, about 550 people, were expelled from Porozów. With the exception of mothers with young children, loaded onto a limited number of previously requisitioned peasant carts, the Porozów Jews were marched on foot to the Wołkowysk transit camp, located in the former garrison of the pre-war Polish 3rd Regiment of Mounted Rifles. They arrived there at 10:00 P.M. A few days later, about 30 to 40 of the elderly and sick were brought from Porozów to the camp. The remaining 10 to 20 Jews, mostly the advanced elderly, were executed in the Nowy Dwór Forest, just outside Porozów.⁵

At the transit camp, the Porozów Jews joined about 19,400 other Jews from nearby communities concentrated there between November 2 and 3, 1942. Crowded into underground bunkers and dilapidated wooden stables, the prisoners lived in deplorable conditions: exposed to subfreezing temperatures; malnourished from the daily ration of a small bowl of potato broth and 300 grams (10.6 ounces) of bread; and denied regular access to water. Within two weeks, these conditions had contributed to an outbreak of a particularly virulent strain of typhus, which claimed hundreds of lives. Others perished from brutal beatings or were shot for small infractions of camp regulations by the SS members who oversaw the camp, including its commandant Zirka.

At the end of November, the SS began liquidating the camp, sending most of its inmates, in several transports, to the Treblinka extermination camp. Almost all the Porozów Jews were among a group of 3,000 to 5,000 people sent, likely on December 2, on the second transport to Treblinka. Only 60 to 70 men from this transport were held back as prisoners of the Treblinka I labor camp. The remaining Jews were gassed on arrival.⁶ Because of the typhus epidemic at the transit camp, the Porozów physicians and their wives were held back from the deportation. Zaydl Trop and Fishl Khananovich, from Porozów, also managed to evade the deportation. The 6 were among the 1,700 to 2,000 Wołkowysk inmates sent on January 26, 1943, to the Auschwitz extermination camp and among the 350 people (270 men and 80 women) held back from the transport as prisoners of the concentration camp.⁷ Only Kaplan and his sister survived.

A handful of Porozów Jews may have survived by fleeing to the forests and joining Soviet partisans there. They likely did so in units operating in the forests north of Wołkowysk, as the Soviet commander in the forests to the south, around Porozów (and Różana), reportedly was an antisemite who murdered all the Jews he discovered hiding there.⁸

SOURCES Copies of almost all the archival documents, accompanied by English translations or summaries, can be found on the Web site "Porozow—A Tribute to Its Former Jewish Community," at www.porozow.net. Its author and compiler, Scott D. Seligman, has established a repository of almost every known source about the Porozów Jewish community. The documentation there includes the account by Wołkowysk physician and Porozów survivor Marek Kaplan, originally published in the second Wołkowysk yizkor book, Moses Einhorn, ed., Volkovisker Yisker-Bukh (New York, 1949), and available in an English translation as "The Incidents in Porozow," in Sefer zikaron Volkovisk. The Volkovysk Memorial Book, trans. Jacob Solomon Berger (Mahwah, NJ: J.S. Berger, 2000), pp. 312–315; and the summary work, "Porozów," from the fourth Wołkowysk yizkor book, Katri'el Lashovits, ed., Volkovisk: Sipurah shel kebilah Yehudit-Tsiyonit bushmedah ba-Sho'ah (Tel Aviv: K. Lashovits, 1988), p. 104.

In addition to these sources, a brief discussion of the Porozów ghetto appears in the May 2008 contribution by Pole and former Porozów native Wiktor Szałkiewicz, "Porozów, którego już nie ma . . .," available at www.kresy24.pl. The memoir by physician and Wołkowysk survivor Izaak Goldberg, The Miracles versus Tyranny: The Fight for Life and Death between the Jewish People and the Nazis (New York: Philosophical Library, Inc., 1979), offers a thorough treatment of life at the Wołkowysk transit camp and provides some coverage of the experiences and fates at Auschwitz of the two Porozów physicians.

Useful, too, is the Porozów entry in Shmuel Spector and Bracha Freundlich, eds., Pinkas ha-kebilot. Encyclopaedia of Jewish Communities: Poland, vol. 8, Vilna, Białystok, Nowogrodek (Jerusalem: Yad Vashem, 2005), pp. 523–525.

Archival documentation for the history of the Porozów Jewish community includes GARF (7021-86-44, e.g., pp. 1, 35); NARB (845-1-8, p. 47); and USHMM (e.g., RG-22.002M [GARF], reel 13); and VHF (# 48539).

Laura Crago and Alexander Kruglov

NOTES

1. AŻIH, 301/3766, testimony of Kalman Barakin, excerpted in Polish trans., in Michał Grynberg and Maria Kotowska, eds., Życie i zagłada Żydów polskich 1939–1945: Relacje świadków (Warsaw: Oficyna Naukowa, 2003), p. 386.

2. Compare Kaplan, “The Incidents,” pp. 312–315; and “Porozow,” in Lashovits, Volkovisk, p. 104.

3. Kaplan, “The Incidents,” p. 314.

4. VHF, #48539, testimony of Naomi (Kaplan-Rozenblum) Warren.

5. GARF, 7021-86-44, p. 35, listing 10 Jewish victims.

6. BLH, testimony of Leib Aronzon, in an English trans. on the Jałówka homepage of the Avotaynu Web site (www.avotaynu.com).

7. Stanisław Mączka, ed., Żydzi polscy w KL Auschwitz: wykazy imienne (Warsaw: ŻIH, 2004), pp. 162–163.

8. See AŻIH, 301/2002 and 2114, respectively, testimony of Jasza Klin, p. 1, and testimony of Hanka Szpiler-Wołk (or Volk), p. 2.

PORZECZE

Pre-1939: Porzecze, village, Grodno powiat, Białystok województwo, Poland; 1939–1941: Porech’e, raion center, Belostok oblast’, Belorussian SSR; 1941–1944: Poretschje, Kreis Grodno, Distrikt Białystok; post-1991: Parechcha, Hrodna raen and voblasts’, Republic of Belarus

Porzecze lies on Lake Mołotniewo (Russian: Molochnoe), about 41 kilometers (25.5 miles) northeast of Grodno. On the eve of World War II, about 80 Jewish families, numbering about 400 people, were living there.

Initially occupied in World War II by Soviet forces, Porzecze did not come under German occupation until shortly after June 22, 1941. The German military commander in Porzecze appointed a provisional civil administration and a local auxiliary police force from among the village’s Poles and Belorussians. The local administration most likely represented German interests after the departure of the military from there, as the Porzecze mayor received directives from the Security Police in Grodno as late as September 24, 1941. A German civil administration and a Gendarmerie post were established there around October 1, the day Kreis Grodno was incorporated into Distrikt Białystok. The Amtskommissariat was headed by a man surnamed Kirm. The Gendarmerie was under the command of Hauptwachtmeister Papenbrock.¹

An unknown German unit embarked immediately on anti-Jewish violence in Porzecze, murdering almost all the village’s Jewish men within the first two weeks of the military occupation. The first victims were 30 Jews identified as Communists by some local Christians. The next day, the Germans took another 40 Jewish men to work outside the village. When they did not return, they were presumed to have been murdered. Some of the remaining men are believed to have sought shelter in Jeziory. After the murders, only about 25

male Jews remained in Porzecze. They included brothers Lejb (or Leon) and Moses Borovnick (or Borownicki), teenagers who had attempted to flee to Soviet-occupied territory. About two weeks into their journey, some German soldiers ordered them to return home. When they arrived there a week later, they discovered almost no men in the Porzecze Jewish community.²

In the meantime, the Germans had imposed a number of restrictions on the surviving Jewish population, issuing decrees that required the Jews to wear a patch with the Star of David on their clothes, forbade contact with local Christians, restricted the Jews to the borders of the village, and mandated forced labor. The Germans also ordered that a six-person Jewish Council (Judenrat) be established. Its chair, Meir Szalkowicz, was the son of the rabbi. They ordered the formation of a three-person Jewish police force. Different groups of Germans also demanded from the Jews several large payments, or ransoms, so named because each time the Germans called for the contributions, they held a number of Jews hostage, pending their receipt.

On September 24, 1941, the inspector for the outlying districts of the Gendarmerie-Kreisführer in Grodno directed civil authorities in Porzecze (and Jeziory) to create ghettos for the Jewish inhabitants of their villages.³ The Porzecze ghetto was established just outside the village in about 20 small houses. The houses most likely had comprised a small settlement built by the railway in the 1850s for its agricultural and forestry workers. At the time the Jews were moved there, the houses had been inhabited mostly by Polish peasants. The ghetto initially was unfenced. According to one survivor, it remained an open ghetto until its liquidation in November 1942. However, another account notes that the ghetto was fenced in the winter of 1941–1942, after the Germans resettled some Polish farmers in the Jews’ former homes.⁴

The Germans and likely their local collaborators compelled the Jews to remain within the ghetto by frightening and terrorizing them, mostly by entering the ghetto and shooting their guns into the air. Ghetto inmates worked for the Germans in forestry labor. Material conditions were not as terrible as in some ghettos, as the Jews found they could leave the ghetto rather easily to exchange their remaining possessions with local peasants for food.

On November 2, 1942, the Germans liquidated the Porzecze ghetto. That day, they ordered the Jews to assemble in front of the Judenrat’s headquarters for deportation to a labor camp. During the Aktion, at least 15 Jews fled to the forest; 2, a woman and a man, were killed immediately.⁵ The rest of the Jews, about 234 people, were brought on peasant wagons to the Kiełbasin transit camp, about 5 kilometers (3.1 kilometers) southwest of Grodno.⁶ Immediately after the deportation of the Jews to Kiełbasin, the Amtskommissar ordered the remaining Jewish property there collected and sold. The proceeds, 10,624.51 Reichsmark (RM), were deposited into a trustee account of the Landratsamt in Grodno.⁷

At Kielbasin, the Jews from Porzecze joined Jews from about 22 other communities and labor camps (about 22,000 to 28,000 people) consolidated there between November 2 and 5, 1942. The Porzecze Jews lived at Kielbasin for more than a month, in terrible conditions, with little food, subjected to the elements in underground bunkers. Many perished from illnesses related to the poor diet and unsanitary conditions. Most of the Porzecze Jews likely were deported on December 5, 1942, the second day of Hanukkah, together with the Jews of Lunna, to the Auschwitz extermination camp. Almost all of them were gassed on arriving at Auschwitz, on December 8. Records available at this writing document only 2 Porzecze Jews, Chaim Kamiński and Icek Rud, held back as prisoners of the concentration camp. Both men perished there.⁸ Some Porzecze Jews also were on the last transport from Kielbasin, most likely sent to the Treblinka extermination camp. Others, including the Borovick brothers, were among the 2,000 to 3,500 Jews still at the transit camp when the Germans closed it shortly after December 21 and sent its remaining inmates to the Grodno I ghetto. In Grodno, the remaining Porzecze Jews either perished there from illnesses they had contracted at the transit camp or were deported to Auschwitz a month later, during the January 18–22, 1943, Grodno ghetto liquidation Aktion. The Borovick brothers, for instance, arrived at Auschwitz on January 24, 1943. The extant arrival records are too scarce to determine whether other Porzecze Jews were on the transport.⁹

Most of the Porzecze Jews who had fled to the forests also perished in the months following the ghetto's liquidation. On November 22, 1942, for example, police from the Porzecze Gendarmerie post uncovered a forest bunker and shot dead the 6 Jews they found hiding there. Three days later, they murdered 10 more Jews.¹⁰ A few Porzecze Jews are believed to have reached the forest encampment of the Kobrowski family, a group of Jews who had fled the liquidation of the ghetto of Marcinkańce.¹¹ The group subsequently joined the Soviet partisans of the Davidov brigade.

SOURCES Although no yizkor book with memoirs from Porzecze survivors has appeared, survivor Leon Borovick did publish a volume, titled Zibn zunen: Lider (New York: Matones, 1980), in which he recounts lyrically his experiences in Porzecze during World War II and later at Auschwitz. He recites and sings some of the works from the volume in his VHF testimony.

Useful also is the Porzecze entry in Shmuel Spector and Bracha Freundlich, eds. Pinkas ha-kehillot. Encyclopaedia of Jewish Communities: Poland, vol. 8, Vilna, Bialystok, Nowogrodek (Jerusalem: Yad Vashem, 2005), pp. 518–519.

Archival documentation pertaining to the Jewish community of Porzecze during the Holocaust includes GAGO (1-1-54, p. 38, and 1-1-335, pp. 64–67); GARF (7021-86-40, pp. 4, 56, 58); NARB (845-1-8, p. 31); RGVA (1323-2-244); USHMM (RG-22.002M [GARF], reel 13; and RG-53.004M [GAGO], e.g., reels 1, 1-1-54, p. 38, reel 2, 1-1-150, pp. 24–25, and reel 4, 1-1-335, pp. 64–67); VHF (# 25938); and YVA.

Alexander Kruglov and Laura Crago
trans. Katrin Reichelt

NOTES

1. USHMM, RG-53.004M (GAGO), reel 3, 1-1-280, pp. 6–7.
2. VHF, # 25938, testimony of Leon Borovick
3. RGVA, 1323-2-250, pp. 117, 135, cited in Wolfgang Curilla, Die deutsche Ordnungspolizei und der Holocaust im Baltikum und in Weissrussland 1941–1944 (Paderborn: Ferdinand Schöningh, 2006), pp. 530–531.
4. Compare VHF, # 25938; with “Porzecze,” in Spector and Freundlich, Pinkas ha-kehillot, 8:518–519.
5. USHMM, RG-11.001M (RGVA), reel 81, 1323-2-244, p. 99.
6. Ibid., RG-53.004M, reel 1, 1-1-54, p. 38; and GARF, 7021-86-40, p. 4.
7. USHMM, RG-53.004M, reel 4, 1-1-335, pp. 64–67.
8. Stanisław Mączka, ed., Żydzi polscy w KL Auschwitz: wykazy imienne (Warsaw: ŻIH, 2004), pp. 131–132.
9. Alexandre Blumstein, A Little House on Mount Carmel (Portland, OR: Vallentine Mitchell, 2002), pp. 174–176; and Mączka, Żydzi polscy w KL Auschwitz, pp. 160–161.
10. USHMM, RG-11.001M (RGVA), reel 81, 1323-2-244, p. 99, with some of the murdered Jews among those who fled from the ghetto of Marcinkańce.
11. Blumstein, A Little House, p. 335.

PRUŻANA

Pre-1939: Prużana, town and powiat center, województwo poleskie, Poland; 1939–1941: Pruzhany, raion center, Brest oblast', Belorussian SSR; 1941–1944: Pruschana, Kreis Bielsk, Distrikt Bialystok; post-1991: Pruzhany, raen center, Beras'tse voblasts', Republic of Belarus

Prużana is located about 85 kilometers (53 miles) northeast of Brześć nad Bugiem. The number of Jews in Prużana was 4,152 (65.6 percent of the total population) in 1921. Between mid-September 1939 and June 1941, Prużana was under Soviet rule. Jewish communal bodies were disbanded, most private businesses were nationalized, and Jewish craftsmen were reorganized into cooperatives.

German tanks of Army Group Center entered Prużana on the night of June 23–24, 1941. Jewish survivors recall that local non-Jews welcomed the German invaders, whereas the Jews tried to avoid contact with them. Columns of German troops passed through the town for three weeks. During this period, German soldiers confiscated food supplies left behind by the Soviet authorities, although some were distributed to the local population.¹

A short time after the arrival of German forces, Sonderkommando 7b, a detachment of Einsatzgruppe B, passed through the area, conducting large-scale search and killing operations in Prużana, Różana, Kobryń, and Bielsk Podlaski.² In Prużana, a local Polish police force was formed that arrested a number of Poles, Belorussians, and Jews, allegedly for cooperating with the Soviet regime. German security forces then shot these people, including 18 Jews, even though some had not had anything to do with the Soviet authorities. During the initial weeks of occupation, a German military administration governed the town. Among the first anti-Jewish regulations it issued were the introduction of a yellow badge for Jews and an order prohibiting them from using the sidewalks.³

A remembrance meeting of Prużana (Pruzhany) survivors in the Feldafing displaced-persons camp, 1946. Abraham Shevelevitch (in hat, front row) sits in the front row.

USHMM WS #18412, COURTESY OF MJH/CHS

The German occupation forces soon ordered the Prużana Jewish community to select a Jewish Council (Judenrat). Initially, the council consisted of 5 persons, but later it was increased to 24. The head of the Jewish Council was Yitzchak Janowicz. His deputy was the attorney Ze'ev Schreiberman. Eliezer Schein was responsible for the internal affairs of the ghetto. Zavel Segal served as the intermediary between the council and the German authorities. The distribution of food was the responsibility of Shlomo Yudewicz. Physician Olga Goldfajn, the pre-war head of the Prużana hospital, headed the sanitation department.⁴ A Jewish police force also was established. Its tasks included collecting taxes and other "contributions" from the Jews. It also prevented smuggling and other infringements of German regulations. Most survivors report that Jewish Council members tried to do the best for the community and did not betray the trust placed in them.⁵

The Jewish population of Prużana was placed under a great deal of financial pressure. For example, soon after the start of the occupation the Germans ordered the Jews to deliver over half a million rubles, 2 kilograms (4.4 pounds) of gold, 10 kilograms (22 pounds) of silver, all furs, and 100 pairs of boots, within 24 hours. More demands followed for blankets, pillows, and other household goods.⁶

The German authorities immediately limited Jewish residence in Prużana by forbidding Jews from living on certain streets, including Dr. Pacewicz Street and May 3rd Street. Those living there were forced to move.

On September 22 or 25, 1941, the Jews were ordered to resettle into the designated ghetto area, which included Dąbrowski and Kobryń Streets as far as the bridge, Brześć Street up to Szereszów Street, and all the intervening streets. The ghetto was partly surrounded by a barbed-wire fence and partly by a solid wall, which the Jews were forced to erect. The ghetto had two entrances, which were guarded from the outside by the auxiliary police. Its main gate lay between the Judkowski (or Yudkowski) house and a line of stores.⁷ Subsequently, the area of the ghetto was reduced in size.

From mid-August to mid-September 1941, approximately 2,000 Jews were removed to Prużana from the Białowieża Forest communities of Hajnówka, Kamieniec Litewski, Linowo, Narew, and other places.⁸ Because German security forces had executed all or a part of the men of these communities and local German authorities in some cases also demanded that male craftsmen be held back from the deportations, the refugee population was composed mainly of the elderly, women, and children. A number of women and children from Szereszów also evaded deportation to Kobryń, shortly after August 15, by seeking refuge in Prużana. A handful of men from Szereszów also fled there to avoid forced marches to Antopol and Drohiczyn, which claimed the lives of many of these prisoners.

German authorities also used the Prużana ghetto to relieve population pressure on the Białystok ghetto, by ordering 5,000 to 8,000 Białystok Jews expelled there, in groups of about 500 people, between September 17 and October 19, 1941. Officially, the Białystok prisoners came from the unskilled, unemployed, and homeless populations. This group included many widows and families of the victims of the Black Saturday (or Black Sabbath) executions, on July 12, with the former known as di shabbesdike (Sabbath widows), and those whose homes were burned to the ground on the first day of the German occupation of Białystok. However, many skilled workers also volunteered for expulsion to Prużana, because they believed conditions would be better there. Some volunteers also came from the small group of Jews who had fled to Białystok to evade arrest for Soviet-era collusion with Communist authorities. They thought that volunteering for Prużana might enable them to escape German searches for them in the Białystok ghetto.⁹

Additional Jewish refugees arrived in Prużana during 1941 and 1942, having escaped the anti-Jewish violence and the liquidation of entire Jewish communities in Reichskommissariat Ukraine, including from Bereza Kartuska and Kobryń, Linowo, Małecz, and Sielec, where the Germans had murdered almost all Jews by December 1942. Among the Kobryń refugees were a substantial number of women and children from the Białowieża Forest communities of Białowieża and Narewka, deported there between August 13 and 15, 1941.¹⁰ Eyewitnesses note that Jews from more than 22 different communities were inmates of the Prużana ghetto.

The refugees likely brought the Prużana ghetto population to 10,000, though some survivors note its population crested at between 15,000 and 18,000.¹¹ However, about 1,500 of the Białystok deportees are believed to have made their way back home. Up to another 6,000 Prużana ghetto inmates likely perished from disease, exposure, or as a result of anti-Jewish violence. Another eyewitness reports that an official SS population count, conducted on December 10, 1942, in the midst of a typhus epidemic, placed the ghetto population at 12,000 people.¹²

The daily ration made available by German authorities to the ghetto was sparse: 200 grams (7 ounces) of bread and a few potatoes per person. Meat was almost never supplied. However, the Jewish Council received a onetime 100,000 ruble payment and an additional monthly sum of 50,000 rubles (about 5,000 Reichsmark [RM]) from the Białystok Jewish Council to aid its refugees. It used the sum to provide the ghetto's inhabitants with potatoes and bread at low prices. Because the small amount of money the Germans paid it to compensate forced laborers did not cover expenses, it also imposed taxes on the ghetto inhabitants. The council established a bakery in the ghetto to produce bread, and it was involved in smuggling food into the ghetto.

Accommodation was a problem in the ghetto. Owing to the resettlement of native Jews and the arrival of thousands of refugees, the Prużana Jewish Council assigned each family a single room in the houses in the ghetto. Overcrowding was severe, particularly after the ghetto area was reduced, at which point each resident was assigned 2 square meters (21.5 square feet) of living space.¹³ Fuel for heating was in short supply. To meet this need, the Judenrat secured permission from German authorities to send workers to dig out the roots of felled trees to use as firewood in the ghetto.¹⁴

The Jewish Council fulfilled German demands for forced labor by assigning the ghetto inhabitants to specific work details. About 200 people were sent to pave a highway; many more worked outside the ghetto for six-week stints at forest camps, to fell trees; others worked at a German military base, established at a pre-war cavalry training ground.¹⁵ In the ghetto, several workshops were established to produce mostly clothes and furniture. Some Jewish craftsmen engaged in carpentry, tailoring, and shoemaking. Others knitted or worked in the households of German families.¹⁶

Demands for contributions and other material items continued throughout the ghetto's existence. The Germans ordered ghetto residents to part with their beds and bedding. They also insisted that the Judenrat provide 100 pieces of tin sheeting to repair roofs on houses designated for German resettlement.

The Jewish Council organized a certain level of medical aid for the poor. It established a hospital in a former Polish secondary school building, under the direction of Professor Shtrieher. The hospital received some deliveries of medicine. The ghetto's doctors attempted to conceal an outbreak of typhus, as they feared the German authorities might use it as a pretext to liquidate the ghetto. Under the supervision of Wela Laref Janowicz, the Jewish Council organized a school for small children. Cultural and religious activities continued in the ghetto, with Jews praying in private houses, because the synagogues were full of refugees.¹⁷

Plans to establish a fighting organization, to dig bunkers, or to escape to the forests were widely discussed. A large number of mostly young Jews did not trust the Jewish Council, and some escaped to join the partisans. Several underground groups were organized. A secret radio and bunkers existed in the ghetto. Some Jews who worked in an ammunition factory managed to steal the parts needed to make weapons.¹⁸ Yosel

Unterszul and his wife were the first people to flee the ghetto and join the partisans. However, the Judenrat opposed such escapes, as it feared German retribution if people were discovered to be missing.¹⁹

At sunrise on November 1, 1942, German units surrounded the Prużana ghetto. Police forces armed with machine guns were positioned at 15-meter (49-foot) intervals, and nobody was allowed to leave the ghetto area. Faced with this tense situation, a group of intellectuals—physicians, teachers, and attorneys—resolved to commit suicide. The poison did not work in all cases; an additional attempt at asphyxiation—by blocking the chimney of Velvel Schreiber's house—was interrupted, and many of the people were resuscitated.²⁰ However, as German authorities liquidated almost all of the other provincial ghettos in the Białystok region and deported their inhabitants to extermination camps via transit camps, the siege of the Prużana ghetto was lifted after a few days, and food supplies were restored. Although the Prużana Jews were given a brief reprieve, they nonetheless recognized that the ghetto's days were numbered.

In mid-December 1942, Heinrich Himmler issued orders for the remaining 30,000 Jews in the provinces of the Białystok region, including the Jews of the Prużana ghetto, to be sent to the Auschwitz extermination camp. On January 27, 1943, the German authorities arrested 7 members of the Jewish Council, allegedly for having contacts with the partisans; however, the arrests more likely were to forestall possible resistance to the ghetto's impending liquidation.²¹ The next day, German officials informed the remaining members of the Jewish Council that the inhabitants of the ghetto would be deported to a labor camp in Silesia. The Germans permitted the Jews to bring with them up to 50 kilograms (110 pounds) of luggage. The ghetto was liquidated in four successive large transports of about 2,500 Jews each, over four days from January 29 to February 1, 1943.²² The Jews were transported on peasants' sleds to the railway station at Linowo, where up to 150 people were crammed into each freight car. Out of the approximately 9,161 Prużana ghetto inmates deported to Auschwitz, only 1,675 people—1,183 men and 492 women—were held back as prisoners of the Auschwitz concentration camp. The remaining 7,486 people were gassed on arrival.²³

Only 200 to 300 of the selected Jews from the Prużana ghetto survived their ordeals in Auschwitz and other labor camps. At least 100 Jews managed to evade the ghetto roundup or jumped from the transports. Among them was Olga Goldfajn, who was assisted by a Catholic nun. Subsequently she joined a group of partisans that conducted operations around Wołkowysk.²⁴

SOURCES There are several yizkor books for Prużana and the surrounding towns, including, in Hebrew, Joseph Friedlaender, ed., Pinkas Prużani yeha-sevivah: (Tol) dot ye-zikaron le-kehillot she-bushmedu ba-sho'ah (Tel Aviv: Irgun yots'e Prużani yeha-sevivah be-Yisrael uve-Artsot ha-Berit, 1983), which—although it contains some original material—is a condensed version of the earlier yizkor book edited by Mordechai Wolf Bernstein, Pinkes fun finf fartilikte kehiles: Prużshene, Bereze, Maltsh, Sheshev, Selts: Zeyer oyfkum, geshikte un umkum

(Buenos Aires: Aroysgegebn fun Landslayt-fareyn fun Pruzshene, Bereze, Małtsh, Shershev un umgegnt in Argentine, 1958); and Dov Kirschner and David Forer, eds., Hurbn Pruzshene (Buenos Aires: Aroysgegebn fun Landslayt fareyn fun Pruzshene, Bereze, Małtsh, Shershev un umgegnt in Argentine, 1974). English translations of the table of contents of both books appear on the Children of Pruzany and the Surrounding Area (CPSA) Web site at <http://cpsa.info>, under the Pruzany link, with some of the chapters on the early history of Pruzana from the 1983 book and the Szereszów chapters from the 1958 book also translated there.

Other relevant memoirs and works include Moishe Kantorowitz, My Mother's Bequest: From Shershev to Auschwitz to Newfoundland (Canada: Moishe Kantorowitz, 2004), with earlier testimonies from the same author available as Meishke Kantorovich, Shershev: Agony and Death of a Shtetl: In Memoriam, which, in turn, originally formed chapters 16–18 of Jacob Auerbach, The Undying Spark (Long Beach, NY: J. Auerbach, between 1976 and 1992), with the last also cited below as RG-02.113; Avraham Harshalom, Alive from the Ashes (Tel Aviv: Hotsa'at Milo, 1990); and Moris Sorid, One More Miracle: The Memoirs of Moris Sorid (Jonathan Sorid, 2007).

The testimony “The Story of Olga Goldfajn,” in Ilya Ehrenburg and Vasily Grossman, eds., The Black Book: The Ruthless Murder of Jews by German-Fascist Invaders Throughout the Temporarily-Occupied Regions of the Soviet Union and in the Death Camps of Poland During the War of 1941–1945, trans. John Glad and James S. Levine (New York: Holocaust Library, 1981), pp. 206–212, covers a part of the below-cited AŽIH, 301/1380, testimony of Olga Goldfajn, by a physician employed prior to the war in the Pruzana hospital. Goldfajn's story of survival, including the assistance she received by Sister Genofewa (née and later Genofewa Czubak, as she was defrocked for sheltering Goldfajn), of the Order of St. Ignatius of Loyola, is retold in English by Mordecai Paldiel, The Path of the Righteous: Gentile Rescuers of Jews during the Holocaust (Hoboken, NJ: Ktav, 1993), pp. 213–215.

An interview with Fania Krawczak, originally from Szereszów, by Pia-Kristina Svenhard, appears on the Web site of the Pruzhany Uyezd Research Organization, at www.pruzhanydistrict.com.ar/people_sub/fania.htm; and two interviews with Aida Brydbord, by Collette Krause and Rachel Licht, appear on Judy Cohen's Web site “Women of Valor, Partisans and Resistance Fighters,” www3.sympatico.ca/mighty1/valor/aida.htm. Though published by his family posthumously as a biography, also valuable is Mildred C. Nitzberg and Marilyn M. Segal, I Chose Life: A Survivor's Search for Peace (Bloomington, IN, 2007), the biography of survivor Saul I. Nitzberg.

Historians disagree over which Einsatzgruppe detachment was responsible for the executions of the 18 Jews (and an unknown number of Polish and Belorussian victims) in Pruzana in July 1941, in part because so many different units are known to have passed through Pruzana on their way to Minsk. Historians most frequently cite the presence in Pruzana of Einsatzkommando 7b, a detachment of Einsatzgruppe B, because documentation, including the Tätigkeitsbericht des Chefs der Einsatzgruppe B für die Zeit vom 23.6.1941 bis zum 13.7.1941, in Peter Klein, ed., Die Einsatzgruppen in der besetzten Sowjetunion 1941/42. Die Tätigkeits- und Lageberichte des Chefs der Sicherheitspolizei und des SD (Berlin: Hentrich, 1997), p. 377, places it in Pruzana, Rożana, Kobryń, and Bielsk Podlaski between June 29 and July 2. However, Andrzej Żbikowski, in U genezy Jedwabnego: Żydzi na kresach północno-wschodnich II Rzeczypospolitej, wrzesień 1939–lipiec 1941 (Warsaw: ŻIH, 2006), has suggested that survivor accounts, specifically the previously cited Goldfajn testimony (AŽIH, 301/1380), which dates the executions to July 10, 1941, indicate that they occurred after Einsatzgruppe 7b had passed through Pruzana; they therefore were more likely the work of the Einsatzkommando led by SS-Untersturmführer Wolfgang Birkner.

The deportation and in some instances the escape of Jews from the Białowieża Forest communities to the Pruzana ghetto is described in several of the memoirs and testimonies detailed above; a brief summary of the expulsions can be found in Christian Gerlach, Kalkulierte Morde: Die deutsche Wirtschafts- und Vernichtungspolitik in Weissrussland 1941 bis 1944 (Hamburg: HIS, 1999), pp. 535–536 (Hajnówka).

The issue of the removal of Białystok refugees to the Pruzana ghetto is covered in a large number of archival and memoir sources, including the memoirs by Michel Mielnicki, Białystok to Birkenau: The Holocaust Journey of Michel Mielnicki, ed. John A. Munro (Vancouver, Canada: Ronsdale Press, 2000). There also is much coverage of the deportations and their impact on the Białystok ghetto community in Sara Bender, The Jews of Białystok during World War II and the Holocaust, trans. Yaffa Murciano (Waltham, MA: Brandeis University Press, 2008), pp. 108–112, 172, 283.

Documents relating to the Pruzana ghetto and the annihilation of the Jewish population of the town can be found in the following archives: AŽIH (301 [511, 984, 1269, 1380, 1849, 2000, 2256, 2604, and 3521]); BA-L (e.g., B 162/14223); FVA (HVT [232, 962, 1269, 2889, 2903, 3072, 3147]); IPN (SAWr 16-18); IPN-Bi (S-105/67); NARA (T-175, reel 233); NARB (378-1-784; 861-1-3); USHMM (RG-02.113; RG-50.030*0040; RG-50.030*0390, RG-50.106*0020, and RG-50.120*0182); VHF (# 2162, 9046, 8303, 12392, 20198, 31918, 36941); and YVA.

Katrin Reichelt, Laura Crago, and Martin Dean

NOTES

1. Friedlaender, Pinkas Pruz'ani, p. 91.
2. Tätigkeitsbericht des Chefs der Einsatzgruppe B für die Zeit vom 23.6.1941 bis zum 13.7.1941, in Klein, Die Einsatzgruppen, p. 377.
3. Friedlaender, Pinkas Pruz'ani, pp. 91–92; Harshalom, Alive p. 37.
4. Friedlaender, Pinkas Pruz'ani, p. 92; and Harshalom, Alive, pp. 40–41.
5. Pinkas Pruz'ani, p. 92; USHMM, RG-50.030*0390, testimony of Joseph Elman, p. 32 (transcript).
6. Harshalom, Alive, p. 42.
7. Ibid. “The Story of Olga Goldfajn,” p. 207, dates the establishment of the ghetto on October 25, 1941.
8. Harshalom, Alive, p. 43; NARB, 861-1-3, p. 36; Nahman Blumental, Darko shel Yudenrat (Jerusalem: Yad Vashem, 1961–1962), p. 278.
9. Mielnicki, Białystok to Birkenau.
10. AŽIH, 301/1970, testimony of Symcha Bursztajn (Białowieża); 301/1072, testimony of Josef Blinder (Białowieża); 301/1849, testimony of Szymon Kamiński (Narewka);

301/2212, testimony of Benjamin Wolf (Narewka), p. 4; Berl Blustein, "The Destruction of Lineve," in Friedlaender, Pinkas Pruz'ani, pp. 151–153.

11. AZIH, 301/138.

12. Ibid.

13. Ibid.

14. Friedlaender, Pinkas Pruz'ani, p. 95.

15. Harshalom, Alive, p. 44.

16. Friedlaender, Pinkas Pruz'ani, p. 95.

17. Ibid., pp. 95–96.

18. Ibid., pp. 100–101.

19. Ibid., pp. 102–103; and USHMM, RG-50.030*0390, pp. 36–37.

20. Harshalom, Alive, pp. 47–48; "The Story of Olga Goldfayn," p. 208, notes that 47 people took poison and died.

21. BA-L, B 162/14223 (II 205 AR-Z 226/60, Verdict of LG-Biel on April 14, 1967, in the case of Dr. Wilhelm Altenloh and others), pp. 57–77.

22. NARB, 378-1-784, pp. 2–9 and reverse, daily reports of the Oranczyce station to the Reich Transport Office (Reichsverkehrsdirektion) in Minsk, January 29–February 1, 1943. The four transports carried 2,612, 2,450, 2,835, and 1,265 persons, respectively. See also Gerlach, Kalkulierte Morde, p. 729.

23. Harshalom, Alive, pp. 52–54.

24. "The Story of Olga Goldfayn," pp. 206–212.

RADZIŁÓW

Pre-1939: Radziłów (Yiddish: Radzilovo), village, Szczuczyn powiat, Białystok województwo, Poland; 1939–1941: Radzilov (from 1940 Edvabne raion) Belostok oblast', Belorussian SSR; 1941–1944: Radzilow, Kreis Grajewo, Distrikt Białystok; post-1998: Radziłów, Grajewo powiat, województwo podlaskie, Poland

Radziłów lies 60 kilometers (38 miles) northwest of Białystok. Its 1937 population of 2,500 included 650 Jews. The Germans occupied Radziłów from September 7, 1939, but soon turned the village over to Soviet forces. Controversial official statistics from 1940 note a population for the Radziluv sel'sovet of 2,865, including 500 Jews.

The Germans reoccupied Radziłów on June 23, 1941. On June 27, they named Józef Mordasiewicz and Leon Kosmaczewski the heads of a local collaborationist administration. Stanisław Grzymkowski was named the secretary. Aleksander Dołęgowski, the priest, served in the administration. They appointed an auxiliary police force, commanded by Konstanty Kiluk.¹ At least 10 policemen, including Kiluk, had been released from People's Commissariat of Internal Affairs (NKVD) prisons because of the war.

Over the course of the next few weeks, the Jews of Radziłów, as well as refugees from other villages, suffered violence and depredations at the hands of Wehrmacht troops, SS units, and Poles. They forced Jews to desecrate their holy texts; beat and robbed them; raped Jewish women; forced Jews to perform hard labor; and murdered many hundreds of them. The violence reached a peak on July 7 when local Poles, acting under SS encouragement or orders (accounts vary), forced Jews into a barn and set it on fire. Anyone trying to escape was shot, while later captives were thrown into the flames alive. The hunt for fugitives continued for three days. Estimates of the number killed range from 600 to 2,000. Only about 30 survived, some with the help of local Poles.

In early August, the Jews were commanded to report to a ghetto. When they failed to appear, Kiluk, on August 7 or 14, 1941, ordered them rounded up and locked in the synagogue, the site of the first Radziłów ghetto. Stanisław Ramotowski notes "a few families" resided there. Menachem Finkelsztejn places the ghetto population at 18.² The Polish police daily led the inmates out under armed guard to remove heavy boulders from the stream for construction of a bridge. A bribe to Kiluk enabled the Jews to move after three weeks to a house on Kościelna Street. In this period, the police likely ordered the Jews to dismantle the Bet Midrash.

With the establishment of a Gendarmerie post in Radziłów, most likely in September, under the command of Otto Wider, the Germans assigned the Jews somewhat lighter labor, including street cleaning. Gendarmes permitted Mojżesz Dorogoj to return to his home and workshop. They permitted others, including Chaja Finkelsztejn's family, to live on the farms of Poles for whom they worked. The Gendarmes arrested some surviving Jews, including Benjomin Kruk, Szabsaj Maraszewski, and a few others, denounced by local Poles. The men perished in unknown circumstances.³

On June 1, 1942, the Gendarmes deported most of the ghetto inmates to Milewo (Szczuczyn gmina and powiat) for labor on the Milbo estate, the property of the Grajewo Kreiskommissar. Perhaps as few as 10 Radziłów Jews were sent there. They included 5 members of Rachela Finkelsztejn's family, including her mother, sister, and nephews, and likely also Dora Dorogoj's mother and younger brother. Some Jews, including the Finkelsztejns, either went into hiding to avoid deportation or were permitted to continue working for local Poles.

On November 2, 1942, the Germans deported the Jews in Milewo to a transit camp located just north of Grajewo, in Bogusze village, near the railway station in Prostken, East Prussia. Jews still working near Radziłów also were transported to the Bogusze transit camp.⁴ About three weeks later, the SS sent the Radziłów Jews at the transit camp to their deaths at the Treblinka extermination camp.

About nine people, including the Finkelsztejn family and Rachela Finkelsztejn-Ramotowska, evaded the deportation and survived the war hiding in villages near Radziłów. Also counted as survivors are Berek Wasersztejn and Chemia Suraski, postfire refugees to the Białystok ghetto, and Fruma Dorogoj, who on June 22, 1941, fled to Latvia. On January 28, 1945, five days after the Red Army liberated Radziłów, the former auxiliary policemen Józef and Antoni Kosmaczewski murdered survivors Mojżesz Dorogoj and his son Akiwa.

Of the eight perpetrators tried after the war in Poland, two were found guilty and sentenced to prison terms of four and six years for murdering the Jews of Radziłów. During the criminal investigations, Antoni Kosmaczewski mentioned he already was serving a 15-year prison term for murdering two Jews, but the documentation to confirm whether he and Józef were convicted of murdering the Dorogojns is not available. SS-Obersturmführer Hermann Schaper was never tried for the Radziłów murders. In 1976, he received a six-year prison term for the killings of other Jewish and Polish civilians. It was overturned on appeal. His health was declared too fragile for a new trial. In 2002, a special prosecutor from the Commission for the Prosecution of Crimes against the Polish Nation (a division of IPN) (KŚZpNP-IPN) questioned Schaper about the Radziłów murders. The 91-year-old Schaper, citing his failing memory, refused to answer any questions.

In March 2001, the KŚZpNP-IPN in Białystok reopened its 1978 investigation of the murders on July 7, 1941, in Radziłów. A detailed study is expected, though the investigation is still under way at this writing.

SOURCES The pogrom in Wąsosz and the murder of the Radziłów Jewish community form parts of an extremely controversial series of events that also involved the Jedwabne massacre. See Szymon Datner, “Eksterminacja ludności żydowskiej w Okręgu Białostockim,” BŻIH, no. 60 (1966): 3–29; Jan T. Gross, Neighbors: The Destruction of the Jewish Community in Jedwabne, Poland (Princeton, NJ: Princeton University Press, 2001), pp. 57–69; Paweł Machcewicz and Krzysztof Persak, eds., Wokół Jedwabnego (Warsaw: KŚZpNP-IPN, 2002), vol. 2, Studia. Also important are the diaries and compilation of press coverage about Radziłów originally published in Gazeta Wyborcza by Anna Bikont, My z Jedwabnego (Warsaw: Prószyński i S-ka, 2004), including the interview with Stanisław and Marianna (Rachela Finkelsztejn) Ramotowski. A number of Polish-language accounts discuss Stanisław Ramotowski, named by Yad Vashem in 1990 as Righteous Among the Nations, with the most accessible English-language account in Israel Gutman and Sara Bender, eds., The Encyclopedia of the Righteous Among the Nations, vol. 2, Poland, 2 pts. (Jerusalem: Yad Vashem, 2004), pt. 2, p. 674.

Some of the more important press coverage on the destruction of the Radziłów Jewish community appears in English translation on José Gutstein’s Jewish community of Radziłów Web site and the Fundacja Pogranicze Web site page “Voices on the Jedwabne Tragedy,” at www.pogranicze.sejny.pl/archiwum/english/jedwabne. Still pertinent are the older entries in Abraham Wein, ed., Pinkas ha-kehillot. Encyclopaedia of Jewish Communities: Poland, vol. 4, Warsaw and Its Region (Jerusalem: Yad Vashem, 1989), pp. 422–423 (Radziłów) and pp. 187–188 (Wąsosz). A polished English translation of the Radziłów entry appears on the Web site of the Jewish community of Radziłów at www.radzilow.com/pinkas.htm.

Archival documentation pertaining to the Radziłów Jewish community during World War II includes APB (e.g., WSRB, Sr 386/47); APSuOE (e.g., SOE [V K 139/48, V K 154/48, V K 790/47]); AŻIH (e.g., Ankiety [unnumbered], 301/78, 301/974, 301/1284, 301/1846); BA-L (e.g., B 162/5863 [AR-Z 13/62]); IPN (e.g., SAB [86, 179], SWB [142, 179, 183]); VHF (e.g., # 10378); and YVA (e.g., 03/033-2636/255). Among the most valuable of these sources is the 306-page testimony, at YVA, by Chaja Finkelsztejn. It forms the basis for this entry. In addition to the Finkelsztejn testimony, the only other known coverage of Wąsosz is provided in the above-cited AŻIH, 301/1846, testimony by Chaja’s son, Menachem Finkelsztejn, who unfortunately was not an eyewitness. AŻIH, 301/1993, a secondary account about Wąsosz by Szymon Datner, is based on Menachem’s testimony.

A large part of the primary documentation listed above is available in a variety of other forms and languages, including in George Gorin et al., eds., Graveyard yisker bukh (New York: United Graveyard Relief Committee, 1950), pp. 228–231 (AŻIH 301/78, in Yiddish), pp. 232–234 (AŻIH 301/1846, in Polish); and Gross, Neighbors, pp. 57–69 (AŻIH, 301/974, in English). The above documentation also is found in English translation on José Gutstein’s Jewish community of Radziłów Web site. The Web site includes an English translation of the August 16, 1966, interview, included in YVA, 03/033-2636/255. In addition to Polish-language versions of the same documentation, additional source material can be found in Polish in the IPN source companion Wokół Jedwabnego, vol. 2, Dokumenty, pp. 156–166, 195–199, pp. 246–247 (AŻIH, 301/78), pp. 249–257 (AŻIH, 301/974), pp. 260–262 (AŻIH, 301/1846), pp. 263–317, 318–325 (YVA, 03/033-2636/255, pp. 1–15 [interview]); with additional sources including pp. 169–178 (BA-L, B 162/5863 [AR-Z 13/62]), pp. 258–259 (AŻIH, 301/1284), pp. 263–317 (YVA, 03/033-2636/255, excerpt), pp. 359–360 (AŻIH, 301/1993), and pp. 872–983 (dispersed throughout excerpts of Polish court documentation for postwar trials at APB, WSRB, Sr 386/47; APSuOE, SOE [e.g., V K 139/48 and V K 154/48 (old 790/47)]; and IPN [e.g., SAB (86, 179), SWB (e.g., 142, 179, 183)]. Andrzej Żbikowski and Sylwia Szymańska, the editors of the survivor testimonies in the volume, include in a footnote in the above-cited AŻIH, 301/1846, testimony a transcription of the ŻIH Ankiety documentation for Milewo.

Laura Crago

NOTES

1. APB, WSRB, Sr 386/47, pp. 15–19 (deposition, Berek Wasersztejn).
2. Quoted in Bikont, My, p. 60; and AŻIH, 301/974, pp. 6–7 (typescript).
3. AŻIH, 301/1846, pp. 1–2.
4. Ibid., 301/1284, testimony of Chana Finkelsztejn (Ann Walters), pp. 1–2.

RAJGRÓD

Pre-1939: Rajgród (Yiddish: Raigrod), town, Szczuczyn powiat, Białystok województwo, Poland; 1939–1941: Raigorod, Graevo raion, Belostok oblast’, Belorussian SSR; 1941–1945: Rajgrad, Kreis Grajewo, Distrikt Białystok; post-1998: Rajgród, Szczuczyn powiat, województwo podlaskie, Poland

Rajgród is located 18.8 kilometers (11.7 miles) north-northeast of Grajewo and 72 kilometers (44.7 miles) north-northwest of Białystok. It lies on a peninsula on Lake Rajgród. Its 1937 population of 2,400 included 600 Jews. At the start of World War II, the Germans occupied the town initially but turned it over to Soviet military authorities at the end of September 1939.

More than a week after the initial German invasion of the Soviet Union on June 22, 1941, Rajgród again was occupied briefly by a Wehrmacht unit. A small SS contingent, of 2 to 10 men, arrived there in early July. Because they came from Augustów, some historians suspect the men belonged to a special command from the State Police in Tilsit, known to have been deployed along the former German-Lithuanian border area from June 24, or to its subordinate, the Sudauen (in Polish, Suwałki) border unit, also attributed with the executions, on July 3, of a part of the Jewish community in Augustów.¹ The SS commander recruited several Poles as collaborators, including Antoni Len, a teacher of German, and Jan Turoń, known to have robbed three Jewish stores and the Soviet border guard headquarters during the German invasion.

On the command of the SS, the collaborators rounded up and drove to the market square about 100 Jews, alleged sympathizers of the former Communist regime. They beat those who refused to comply. Some of the accused, including the store owner Finkelsztejn, appear to have been unlikely Soviet allies. The prisoners were ordered to parade in their underwear through the streets of Rajgród, singing Soviet songs. The Polish guards surrounding the column threw the captives' clothes to Poles gathered along the marching route.² After a Polish bystander claimed that one of the prisoners was responsible for the arrest, in the Soviet period, of a family member and described how People's Commissariat of Internal Affairs (NKVD) interrogators had permanently disabled him, the Poles along the route may have attacked the Jews in the column. The SS and the Polish guards reportedly reassembled only some of the captives. Taken 2 kilometers (1.2 miles) outside of Rajgród, to the "Choinki" Forest, at least 30 of the Jews were shot by the SS and by some of the Polish guards.³

Before leaving Rajgród, an SS member supposedly told the collaborators that they would not be held responsible if more Jews perished as long as they maintained an outward civility so as not to attract the attention of the Wehrmacht. Three days later, German military authorities in Grajewo appointed Len the mayor of Rajgród and ordered him to form an auxiliary police force. He named Toruń its commander. The Polish auxiliaries, particularly Adamcewicz, plundered Jewish homes and raped Jewish women.⁴ Many Jews fled to other towns, including Grajewo.

When two SS officers arrived in Rajgród in late July to oversee the creation of a ghetto, they ordered Len and the Polish auxiliary police to find the escapees. To secure their return, the SS and the Polish auxiliaries held 20 Jewish women captive in a basement. They warned the rabbi of Rajgród that the women would be hanged if he failed to prevail on the Jews to return. The rabbi set off for Grajewo personally at 11:00 p.m., returning two days later with about 20 Jews. Over the next few days, Polish auxiliary policemen Feliks Bęćko and Adamcewicz, acting on German orders, murdered as many as 50 Jews. The victims included mainly the elderly, handicapped, sick, and the wealthy. The Jews were murdered at Góra Rykowa in two separate Aktions.⁵

Located on Pacowski Street, the Rajgród ghetto occupied an area of 600 square meters (0.2 acres) in a neighborhood around the Bet Midrash. Bounded on a second side by the market square, it was encircled by water on its two remaining sides. The ghetto was enclosed by a barbed-wire fence. Between 550 and 800 Jews, including people from villages near Rajgród, were concentrated there. The head of the Judenrat was Szyja Grodzieński, an illiterate 44-year-old chauffeur. Turoń initially oversaw the ghetto. With the establishment of a German civil administration in Rajgród, on September 5, 1941, authority for the ghetto passed to the German police, assigned to the Gendarmerie post established there and to the Grajewo Amtskommissar, Hans Pogoda.⁶

The ghetto was overcrowded, with a few dozen people occupying each house. Food rations were insufficient. Although some inmates smuggled food into the ghetto, many others died there from starvation. The rabbi was forbidden to leave the ghetto. The remaining residents were required to perform forced labor. Some labor gangs worked on road construction projects, which required the conscripts to bring all the Jewish gravestones (matzevot) from the Jewish cemetery in Okoniówek to use for paving underlayment on the road to Barszcze village. Women and children deepened the fish ponds in Wojdy village, about 3 kilometers (1.9 miles) southwest of Rajgród. Local Poles could pay the German Arbeitsamt 3 Reichsmark (RM) daily for a Jewish conscript to assist in agricultural work.⁷

Local German authorities occasionally entered the Rajgród ghetto to harass and beat Jews to death, including Berl Lewintin, murdered in 1942. When Lewintin's father sought permission to bury his son, the German authorities ordered him harnessed to a cart to bring the body to Orzechówka village, about 12 kilometers (7.5 miles) from Rajgród. After the father placed his son's body in the grave, the Germans ordered him to stone the corpse. They then reharnessed Lewintin to the cart and ordered him to return it to its owner in Rajgród.⁸

The Rajgród ghetto was liquidated on October 25, 1942, the date its inmates were deported to the Grajewo ghetto. Two butchers, the Jaków brothers, Mosze Pinchas, and Icek Cukierbaum perished resisting the expulsion order.⁹ The Rajgród Jews lived in Grajewo for six days before being deported, on November 2, along with the remaining inmates of the Grajewo ghetto, to a transit camp located in Bogusze, a war-devastated village 4.8 kilometers (3 miles) north of Grajewo, near the railway station in Prostken, East Prussia.

The Rajgród Jews lived in the Bogusze transit camp for 3 to 10 weeks together with 5,000 to 8,000 Jews from other nearby localities. The Germans sent them, mostly to their deaths, in two deportations. In the first, about 3,000 to 5,000 camp inmates were told on December 15, 1942, that they were being sent to a labor camp in Silesia. The Germans shot about 200 of the Jews the next day on the muddy road to the Prostken railway station. From there, the survivors were sent to the Treblinka extermination camp. The 2,000 or so Jews in the final deportation from Bogusze were expelled on January 3, 1943, to the Auschwitz extermination camp. Upon arriving at Auschwitz II-Birkenau on January 7, 1943, at midnight, 1,489 of the passengers in the transport were gassed. Another 511 Jews—296 men and 215 women—became concentration camp inmates. The incomplete records from Auschwitz indicate at least 5 of the 296 men were from Rajgród. By the end of January, at least 2 of these men had perished.

After the Jews were deported from Rajgród, Pogoda and the Gendarmes searched the Rajgród ghetto for valuables, confiscating what they could find, including pianos. The Germans blew up the synagogue, the Jewish hospitality house, and the Bet Midrash. Some local Polish authorities turned in Jews who had evaded the deportation to Grajewo. The village administrator (sołtys) of Woźnawieś, about 11.6 kilometers by road (7.2 miles) southeast of Rajgród, denounced Luba Lewintin for living there under forged identity papers. Lewintin was shot.¹⁰

No more than 10 Rajgród Jews survived the war. They include the sisters Shayna (Szejna) and Sonia Stolnicka, hidden by a Polish family, though Sonia died of tuberculosis shortly after liberation; and Moshe (Mosze) Kruszewski, a fisherman, who had secured false papers and volunteered as a Pole for forced labor in the Reich.¹¹ Steven Guzik fled with his brothers from Rajgród as the Germans arrived there, moving through a number of regional ghettos and a labor camp, in Zielona (Brzostowica Wielka gmina, Grodno powiat) before fleeing to Białystok and surviving the liquidation of the ghetto there.¹²

After the war, seven Polish collaborators, including Len, Toruń, and Bęćko, were tried for a number of war crimes, including the murder of Jews in Rajgród. For participating in the murder of at least 15 Jews, among them the Tajba family, Bęćko was sentenced to death on June 7, 1952. The sentence subsequently was commuted to life imprisonment.¹³ Only part of the documentation from the other three investigations has been located.¹⁴

SOURCES Important secondary accounts include the relevant entries in Avraham Wein, ed., Pinkas ha-kehillot. Encyclopaedia of Jewish Communities: Poland, vol. 4, Warsaw and Its District (Jerusalem: Yad Vashem, 1989), pp. 419–421; its English-language counterpart, Arnon Rubin, The Rise and Fall of Jewish Communities in Poland and Their Relics Today, vol. 1, District Białystok (Tel Aviv: Tel Aviv University Press, 2006), pp. 162–165; and Andrzej Żbikowski, “Pogromy i mordy ludności żydowskiej w Łomżyńskim i na Białostocczyźnie latem 1941 roku w świetle relacji ocalałych Żydów i dokumentów sądowych,” in Machcewicz and Persak, Wokół Jedwabnego, vol. 1, Studia, pp. 184–186. The Rubin work contains a rough English translation of a part of the Żbikowski text.

Archival documentation pertaining to the history of the Rajgród Jewish community under German occupation during World War II includes AŻIH (e.g., 301/2600, 301/3149); IPN (e.g., SOE 29, SWB 111, 186, 187); IPN-Bi (e.g., 1/674, 1/1028); USHMM (e.g., RG-15.019M [IPN], 46/115); and VHF (e.g., # 18378). AŻIH, 301/2600, is available in a Polish translation, by Sylwia Szymańska, in Paweł Machcewicz and Krzysztof Persak, eds., Wokół Jedwabnego, vol. 2, Dokumenty (Warsaw: IPN and KŚZpNP, 2002), pp. 326–327. Its author, Lejb Lewintin, collected the documentation by interviewing Christian eyewitnesses upon his repatriation to Poland.

Laura Crago and Monika Tomkiewicz

NOTES

1. Żbikowski, “Pogromy,” p. 184.
2. IPN, SWB 187, cited in ibid.; and AŻIH, 301/2600, testimony of Lejb Lewintin, p. 1.
3. IPN, SWB 187, cited in Żbikowski, “Pogromy,” p. 185.
4. Ibid.
5. Ibid., pp. 185–187; and AŻIH, 301/3149, testimony of Lejb (Lewintin) Lewinsztajn, p. 1.
6. USHMM, RG-15.019M (IPN), ASG, reel 14, 46/115; and AŻIH, 301/2600, pp. 1–2.
7. AŻIH, 301/2600, pp. 1–2; and IPN-Bi, 1/1028, p. 405 (deposition, Halina Przastko Masztalerz).
8. AŻIH, 301/2600, p. 1.
9. IPN-Bi, 1/674, p. 8 (deposition, Jan Blando); and AŻIH, 301/2600, p. 2.
10. AŻIH, 301/2600, pp. 1–2.
11. List of survivors in ibid., pp. 1–2.
12. VHF, # 18378, testimony of Steven Guzik.
13. IPN, SWB 111.
14. IPN, SOE 29; and SWB 186–187.

RÓŻANA

Pre-1939: Różana (Yiddish: Rozhanoi or Rozbinoi), town, Iwacewicz powiat, województwo poleskie, Poland; 1939–1941: Ruzhany, raion center, Brest oblast', Belorussian SSR; 1941–1944: Rozana, Kreis Wolkowysk, Distrikt Białystok; post-1991: Ruzhany, Pruzhany raen, Bera's'tse voblasts', Republic of Belarus

Różana lies 120 kilometers (75 miles) northwest of Brześć nad Bugiem. By World War II, when Różana came under Soviet occupation after September 17, 1939, the Jewish community numbered about 3,500. About 3,000 Jews lived in Różana and another 500 lived in two neighboring agricultural colonies, Pawłowo and Konstantynowo, which, in 1921, had Jewish populations, respectively, of 292 and 217, about 97 and 95 percent of their overall populations.

The Germans occupied Różana on June 24, 1941. They immediately executed about 25 Jews.¹ A German commander of a mostly Austrian force soon arrived to oversee a local provisional military administration. He appointed a local Belorussian as mayor and established an auxiliary police force. The force likely was ethnically mixed, as survivors divide over whether Belorussians or Poles predominated.² In September, a Gendarmerie post was established in Różana as a first step to creating a German civilian administration. In early October, Amtskommissariat Rozana was incorporated into Kreis Wolkowysk, in Distrikt Białystok.

By then, regional military authorities already had issued a series of anti-Jewish decrees, including orders requiring Jews to wear round yellow patches, on their chests and backs, and to establish Jewish Councils (Judenräte). The Różana Judenrat chair, Epstein, was a 75-year-old communal leader. The Różana Jews also were subjected to German violence. Either on July 12 or 14, 1941, an SS unit broke into many Jewish homes and, after robbing and beating their residents, drove about 1,000 men to the marketplace.³ Of these, 15 intellectuals, mostly recent arrivals from war-devastated Wołkowysk, were executed. Two days later, the SS executed 17 Różana Jews, including 3 women, and one Pole for Communist subversion.

Exterior of a synagogue in Różana, 1986.
USHMM WS #97256, COURTESY OF JACK KAGAN

Shortly before Yom Kippur, on October 1, 1941, the Germans ordered an open ghetto established in Różana on just a few streets around the market square. On the resettlement day, hundreds of families rushed to move in there, as the Amtskommissar had ordered executed all Jews found outside of the ghetto the next day. The 78 Jewish families from Pawłowo also were moved to the ghetto.⁴ However, the Konstantynowo Jews were not, reportedly because the pre-war civil administrator (wójt), remembered only by his first name, Mordechai-Eshia, had lavished the local Belorussian village administrator (sołtys), a pre-war friend, with bribes and personally had appealed for him to plead with local German authorities to suspend the expulsion orders.⁵ Some survivors of anti-Jewish violence in the fall of 1941 in Słonim and Kosów Poleski also entered the ghetto.⁶ These transfers brought the ghetto population to about 3,500.⁷

Overcrowding posed a problem in the Różana ghetto, as about 30 to 40 people were crammed into each house. On Yom Kippur 1941, a group of Germans entered the ghetto, raided the synagogue, murdered some of those they found at services, and stormed houses to rob and beat up their inhabitants.⁸ After the initial terror, the Jews mostly were permitted to continue working in their pre-war trades as tanners, spinners, and weavers. The Judenrat was required to fill a daily forced labor quota, largely for road construction projects, but the local Belorussian foremen permitted Jewish conscripts to leave work upon completing specific assignments. The relatively lax labor discipline combined with the open nature of the ghetto created possibilities for Jews to avoid German-ordered assemblies by seeking short-term refuge in other villages and to supplement meager rations by bartering with Christians.⁹

However, the outlets created by an open ghetto were constricted after an SS unit arrived in the spring of 1942 to search for Russian partisans. The search rendered the forest (an important refuge particularly for survivors of the June 1942 liquidation of the Słonim ghetto) inaccessible. After the SS rounded up several villages of Belorussian peasants and executed them in Łysków, a village about 20 kilometers (12.4 miles) west-southwest of Różana, many Jews feared they would be the next victims. A Polish auxiliary policeman's discovery of an armed Jewish forest fugitive staying temporarily with family in the Różana ghetto increased these fears, even though the Judenrat had paid a bribe to secure the release of 50 captives that the Germans had threatened to execute in retribution.¹⁰ The SS joined the local German administration in a wholesale expropriation of Jewish property. A group of SS also chained the pre-war Konstantynowo civil administrator and his son to the back of a car and dragged them to death through the streets of Różana.

The Różana Gendarmerie commander also imposed harsh punishments on Jews (and on local Christians suspected of contacts with Jews). Beginning in the spring of 1942, he strolled through the ghetto every evening, taking the opportunity to beat unconscious those he believed had violated prohibitions of Jewish-Christian trade, including, for example, the mother of a child that he found eating buttered bread. He hanged another Jew, the Gendarmerie's only translator, for a minor offense. The commander also humiliated the Judenrat chair, ordering him to serve as a waiter at a party for the security forces stationed in Różana and concluding the festivities by beating him nearly to death.

By then, some Jews, particularly those without family in Różana, had fled to other nearby communities and ghettos. Many Słonim fugitives arranged false identity papers (as Białystok ghetto residents) and moved to Wołkowysk, where a few Białystok Jews worked as forced laborers. Izaak Harshaw, a Różana-born Wołkowysk physician permitted to establish a medical practice in Różana and to live outside the ghetto in Konstantynowo, obtained permission in the early spring of 1942 to transfer his practice and a part of his family to Łysków, a village with about 640 Jews, where the Amtskommissar reportedly refused to condone either beatings of Jews or "unjust" seizures of Jewish property.¹¹ Those without official possibilities to secure transfers fled to the Mosty or the Piaski ghettos because the German authorities there reportedly were less coercive and the local populations less terrorized and therefore more willing to assist Jews.¹²

The Germans liquidated the Różana ghetto on November 2, 1942. An SS contingent, on horses, joined by Belorussian and Polish auxiliary policemen, took the Jews of Różana and Konstantynowo to a meadow outside of Podorosc, about 25 kilometers (15.5 miles) northwest of Różana. There, they joined almost all the Jewish communities from the southern and southeastern parts of Kreis Wolkowysk also marched that same day from their villages, including from Łysków and Podorosc, home to about 50 Jews. Surrounded by SS guards, the approximately 4,500 to 5,500 Jews spent a terror-filled night as the Germans periodically fired over their heads and shot dead about 100 captives. Believing they would be executed the next morning, some Jews committed suicide. Another 500 either were shot or trampled (by the SS's horses) to death during the forced march to Podorosc or on a second 25-kilometer (15.5-mile) march the next day to a transit camp, which the SS had established just outside of Wołkowysk on the grounds of a former Polish military garrison.

Because they were the last of the about 20,000 Jews from Kreis Wolkowysk to arrive at the transit camp, the Różana prisoners received the worst accommodations, eight former horse stables and underground storage facilities for animal fodder. Even after the Łysków and Podorosc communities were transferred to other barracks, a large part of the remaining inmates in the Różana barracks still had to sleep standing up. Because of the resulting unsanitary conditions, the three communities also suffered the greatest death toll, with about 20 Jews from the Różana bunkers perishing daily in a typhus epidemic that struck the camp. Perhaps for these reasons, the Różana, Konstantynowo, and Pawłowo communities were the first Jews sent from the transit camp, likely on November 28, 1942, to the Treblinka extermination camp. (The Łysków and Podorosc Jews were sent either on the second transport to Treblinka, on December 2, or on the third transport, which also included the Jewish community of Izabelin, on December 10.)¹³ They were all gassed on arrival.

Only a handful of Różana Jews survived the war, mostly refugees who had reunited earlier at the transit camp with family from Wołkowysk. Among the native Różana-area survivors were Konstantynowo resident Michla Pomeraniec (or Pomerantz, later Miriam Weissman) and her cousin, the physician Harshaw. Excluded from the Treblinka deportations to help contain a typhus epidemic at the camp, the two were among the final group of 1,700 to 2,000 Wołkowysk inmates sent on January 26, 1943, to the Auschwitz extermination camp and among the handful of survivors from the 350 people who were held back from the transport as prisoners of the concentration camp. Pomeraniec's brother, Shlomo, among at least 10 Różana Jews who had fled to the forests during the expulsion to Podorosc, is believed to have been 1 of just 3 survivors from the group. He joined the Red Army after Różana was liberated in June 1944 and perished in combat.

Little is known about the Jewish communities of Podolsk and Izabelin. A few lines in the Goldberg memoir suggest that some type of German anti-Jewish violence occurred in Podolsk and detail the fates of its physician and his wife, among the Wołkowysk transit camp's Auschwitz deportees consigned immediately to death. The lack of sources for documenting Jewish life under the German occupation in Izabelin makes it impossible to determine if a ghetto existed there.

SOURCES The following published sources contain information about the ghetto: Me'ir Segev (or Sokolovski), ed., Rozinoi: Sefer zikaron li-kehillat Rozinoi veba-sevivah (Tel Aviv: Irgun yots'e Rozinoi be-Yisrael, 1957) (a supplement "Once there was a Shtetl" is available online at www.jewishgen.org/Yizkor/ruzhany/Ruz001.html); and Izaak Goldberg, The Miracles versus Tyranny: The Fight for Life and Death between the Jewish People and the Nazis (New York: Philosophical Library, Inc., 1979). Moses Einhorn, ed., Volkovisker Yisker-Bukh (New York, 1949) is available in an English translation as "What Happened in Liskovo," in Sefer zikaron Volkovisk. The Volkovysk Memorial Book, translation by Jacob Solomon Berger (Mahwah, NJ: J.S. Berger, 2000), pp. 291–297.

Useful, too, are the relevant entries in Pinkas ha-kehillot. Encyclopaedia of Jewish Communities: Poland, vol. 5, Volhynia and Polesie, ed. Shmuel Spector (Jerusalem: Yad Vashem, 1990), pp. 275–276 (Pawłowo), p. 310 (Konstantynowo), pp. 315–318 (Różana); and vol. 8, Vilna, Białystok, Nowogródek, ed. Spector and Bracha Freundlich (Jerusalem: Yad Vashem, 2005), pp. 123–124 (Izabelin) and pp. 397–400 (Łysków).

Documentation on the fates of the Różana, Konstantynowo, Pawłowo, Łysków, Podolsk, and Izabelin Jewish communities in World War II, under the German occupation, includes: AŻIH (e.g., 301/1973, 2114, and 4938); GARF (7021-83-22, pp. 4, 26); VHF (# 3986 and 35581); and YVA (e.g., M-33/711 [GARF]).

Laura Crago and Alexander Kruglov

NOTES

1. Shimon Huberband, Kiddush Hashem: Jewish Religious and Cultural Life in Poland during the Holocaust (New York: Yeshiva University Press, 1987), p. 373.

2. Compare VHF, #35581, testimony of Michael Jourdan-Lichtenstein; and AŻIH, 301/2114, testimony of Hanka Szpiler-Wołk, pp. 1–3.

3. Different dates in AŻIH, 301/2114, p. 1; and Goldberg, The Miracles, pp. 46–47.

4. GARF, 7021-83-22, p. 4.

5. Goldberg, The Miracles, pp. 54–56, 90.

6. AŻIH, 301/1973, testimony of Anna Wincygysztern-Rybałowska, p. 1.

7. GARF, 7021-83-22, p. 26.

8. Goldberg, The Miracles, p. 57.

9. VHF, # 35581.

10. AŻIH, 301/1973, p. 3; and Goldberg, The Miracles, pp. 89–90, 99.

11. Goldberg, The Miracles, p. 86.

12. VHF, # 35581; and Maxime Rafailovitch, "The End of the Piaski Community," on the Lida ShtetLinks homepage, at jewishgen.org.

13. Compare Einhorn, "Destruction of Wolkovisk," in Einhorn, Volkovisker Yisker-Bukh, p. 921; and Goldberg, The Miracles, pp. 133–138.

SIEMIATYCZE

Pre-1939: Siemiatycze (Yiddish: Semyatits), town, Bielsk Podlaski powiat, Białystok województwo, Poland; 1939–1941: Semiatichi, raion center, Brest oblast', Belorussian SSR; 1941–1944: Siemiatycze, Kreis Bielsk, Distrikt Białystok; post-1998: powiat center, województwo podlaskie, Poland

Siemiatycze lies 82 kilometers (51 miles) south-southwest of Białystok. Its pre-war 1939 population of 8,138 included 4,303 Jews.

The Germans occupied Siemiatycze briefly, from September 11 to September 21, 1939, before ceding it to Soviet occupation. Under Soviet rule, the Jewish population rose to 7,000 to 8,000, including 2,000 refugees from German-occupied Poland. With Siemiatycze's inclusion in the spring of 1940 in a border security zone, local authorities ordered most refugees to move and deported others to the Soviet interior. They permitted local refugees, expelled from the border zone in April, to remain. Among the latter were 1,100 to 1,200 Jews from Drohiczyn, Mielnik, and Niemirów.

The Germans shelled Siemiatycze from 4:00 A.M., on June 22, 1941, before occupying the town the next day. A local military commander immediately established an open ghetto by ordering all Jews to return to Siemiatycze and forbidding them from leaving the town without permission. He required Jews to mark the outside of their houses with yellow signs and to wear similar identifying marks.¹

In late June, German soldiers held the able-bodied male population captive at the Melba Factory. German guards asked the Polish prisoners to identify which Jews were Communists. A Pole nicknamed "Rudy," perhaps, as the yizkor book suggests, for his surname Rudnicki, picked 10 to 23 mostly non-Communist Jews. Before releasing the men, the Germans murdered up to 23 of the alleged "Communists."²

On July 4–5, local Poles robbed Jewish homes and beat, raped, and murdered their residents. Survivors divide over whether the Germans participated in the attacks, which claimed

The Siemiatycze ghetto fence, only months after its inhabitants were murdered at Treblinka, February 1943.

COURTESY OF GŁOS SIEMIATYCZ (ARCHIVE OF ANTONI NOWICKI); AND VIRTUAL SHTETL, HTTP://WWW.SHTETL.ORG.PL

at least nine lives.³ Most likely on July 10, a small SS unit ordered the entire local population assembled to watch members of a local Polish guard compel Jewish communal leaders to tear down the Lenin statue and to hold a mock burial for it. Survivors disagree about whether Ignacy Gilewski, a teacher, or Tadeusz Rudnicki, brother of the future commander of the auxiliary police, led the guard.⁴ The collaborators beat and threw some "funeral marchers" into the Kamionka River. Glazier Moishe Kozudrowicz perished in the violence.

The violence continued with the German appointment of a Polish administration, led by Mayor Gilewski, and a Polish auxiliary police force, commanded by Józef Rudnicki.⁵ In one account, the new authorities encouraged the local population to plunder Jewish property and to murder Jews. Only the establishment of a Gendarmerie post in early August, followed by the arrival that same month of a German-appointed mayor, brought the Jews security.⁶

On August 10, 1941, the Gendarmerie commander ordered Rabbi Gerstein to form a 12-person Jewish Council (Judenrat). Izrael Rozencajg (Rosenzweig) was its chair. The council organized a 12-man Jewish police force, commanded by Aleksander Wajnberg. The Gendarmerie commander also in August demanded the Judenrat pay a "contribution" or "fine" of 140,000 to 250,000 rubles.⁷

In August 1941, the German authorities reinforced the open ghetto in Siemiatycze by ordering Jews living in Christian neighborhoods to relocate to the Jewish neighborhood. A curfew was imposed. Jews not officially at work could appear on the streets only between 1:00 P.M. and 3:00 P.M. The Gendarmes and Polish police beat Jews, in two instances to death, found outside beyond curfew.⁸

In the late summer, officials expelled to Siemiatycze Jews from most nearby localities, including 18 people from Markarki village and the rest of the Mielnik community (about 400 people in September 1939). The Niemirów refugees are believed to have been ordered to remain in Siemiatycze because their village had been razed in the Soviet period. However, documentation for the community is sparse. Jews from Drohiczyn were permitted to return home. About half did so.

The Gendarmes and the Schutzpolizei in Siemiatycze ordered hundreds of Jews conscripted to clean up the town's war devastation. Other Jews repaired damaged rail lines. In May 1942, the Judenrat conscripted 50 men for labor on the Białystok-to-Minsk road construction project. After the men did not return, the Judenrat refused to assign additional workers to the project. To fill a new quota, local authorities rounded up men arbitrarily from the streets.⁹ Women cleaned the houses and offices of German officials. Others carried steel rails and wooden ties as railway work gang members.

In the spring of 1942, Landrat Tubenthal, Kreiskommissar of Bielsk, ordered closed ghettos established throughout the Kreis, including in Siemiatycze. In June, the Judenrat sought a ghetto area of 1.95 square meters (21 square feet) per future resident, but Polish appeals to German authorities reduced the area to 0.95 square meters (10.2 square feet).¹⁰ The ghetto was located across the Kamionka River, in the Zamość neighborhood. Its area included Słowczyńska, Górna, Wysoka, and Koszarowa Streets. Its wooden fence was topped with barbed wire. There was one gate. Postwar Polish documentation notes the “Ghetto Commissar” was a Gendarme nicknamed “Rudy.” Whether the documentation is mistaken and “Rudy” was instead the local Polish auxiliary police commander or perhaps Wilhelm Rudolph, a member of the Schutzpolizei mentioned by another survivor, is unknown.¹¹

On August 1, 1942, the Jews were relocated to the ghetto. When they arrived, they were ordered to camp for three days in a field in order for the non-Jewish occupants of houses in the ghetto to have more time to move out and to enable a thorough inspection of the goods the Jews had brought with them.

The Siemiatycze ghetto population stood at 5,000 to 6,000. Severe overcrowding in the ghetto forced its inmates to transform barns and sheds into living quarters. Because many people had transferred foodstuffs to the ghetto, the population did not starve. A Jewish bakery outside the ghetto supplied the daily 120-gram (4.2-ounce) ration allotted to laborers and half rations for the unemployed. The Judenrat organized a public kitchen to distribute 1,500 meals, three times a day. Because of the poor diet, the stress, and the complete absence of medical care, mortality was high, with about 10 people perishing daily.¹²

Since the Germans had ordered all Jewish religious activities suspended, only a few prayer groups met clandestinely at considerable risk. The Judenrat paid a bribe to allow most Jews to stay home from work on the first day of Rosh Hashanah, on September 12, 1942, to privately observe the holiday. That day, the Germans, and perhaps the Polish auxiliaries, stormed the ghetto. At an assembly, they subjected religious Jews to beatings before commanding barbers to shear off the beards and payot (side locks) of all male inmates. An unknown number of women were raped and murdered.¹³

After several conscripts at the railway yards encountered a train of Dutch Jews headed for the Treblinka extermination camp, some ghetto residents built bunkers in which to hide, should the Siemiatycze community also be expelled.¹⁴ On November 1, 1942, the Judenrat likely received two warnings of the ghetto’s impending liquidation. Rudolph, from the Schutzpolizei, mentioned to Rozenwajg that something soon would happen to the Jews.¹⁵ A local Polish Home Army (AK) commander also may have informed the Judenrat chair of the liquidation and provided tools to cut the ghetto fence.¹⁶

The next day, on November 2, 1942, at 4:00 A.M., the Germans surrounded the ghetto to organize its final liquidation. Rozenwajg called out: “Children save yourselves! Have faith in G-d.”¹⁷ He then fled through a hole cut in the ghetto’s fence. About 300 to 500 people followed him. The Germans and Polish auxiliary police shot dead some 200 escapees, including Rozenwajg, and ordered the guard around the fence reinforced.¹⁸ Likely that same day, the Germans expelled to the ghetto the Jewish communities of Drohiczyn, Grodzisk and Siemiony.

On either November 4 or 8, 1942, the Germans drove 2,450 people from the Siemiatycze ghetto to the railway sta-

Jewish survivors and Polish workers exhume bodies of Jews murdered during the liquidation of the Siemiatycze ghetto, so that they may be properly reburied at the entrance to the Jewish cemetery, 1947–1950. Pictured is Yehoshua Kejles (in business suit with fedora), whose father, Efraim, was among those murdered.

USHMM WS #57741, COURTESY OF SIDNEY JOSHUA ZOLTAK

tion and ordered them onto trains destined for Treblinka. In the final expulsion, on November 10, approximately 3,200 Jews were expelled to Treblinka.¹⁹ During the expulsions, 50 to 70 people were shot.²⁰ Because the second Treblinka deportation train was composed partly of passenger wagons, many deportees jumped from the cars’ unlocked windows.²¹

At Treblinka, about 5,498 people from the two Siemiatycze transports were gassed on arrival. Some 152 men were held back from the second transport for labor at the Treblinka I camp. Kalman Krawiec (Saul Kuperhand) escaped from the camp in September 1943, made his way back to the Siemiatycze area, and was sheltered by the Jagiełło family in Bryki (Bielsk powiat) village. Benyamin Rock, the only other Siemiatycze survivor of Treblinka, was shot and left for dead as the Germans abandoned the camp.²²

Near Siemiatycze, Poles sheltered at least 40 of the 100 to 200 ghetto escapees. The family of veterinarian Bolesław Leszczyński, in Bocianka colony, Kajanka village, hid 15 members of the Feldman and Grodziski families. In Krynki-Sobole village, Stanisława Kryńska’s family sheltered 6 fugitives, including Chaim Brzeziński and 4 members of the Żółtak (or Zochtak) family. However, at least 54 Jews had perished by early 1943 as the result of denunciations, Russian thieves murdering Jews hidden in forest bunkers, and a number of Polish aid-givers murdering those they had promised protection. To prevent further loss of life, Herz Szabbes (Herschel Shabbes) established a self-defense organization that helped 70 Siemiatycze and Drohiczyn Jews survive the war.²³

In 1949, the former auxiliary policeman Józef Fleks was sentenced to death for murdering Kozudrowicz in 1941 and about another 40 Jews during the Siemiatycze ghetto liquidation. He died in prison in 1950.²⁴ Approximately 13 Polish civilians were tried for denouncing or handing over to German authorities Jews who had fled from the ghetto. At least 1 was convicted. He received a 15-year prison term.²⁵

SOURCES Published primary sources include two testimonies published jointly by Miriam Kuperhand and Saul Kuperhand, Shadows of Treblinka (Urbana: University of Illinois Press, 1998), with the second testimony, by S. Kuperhand, “Escape from Treblinka,” an expanded version of AŻIH, 301/4086 (cited below), by the same author; the yizkor book, Eliezer Tash, ed., Ḳehilat Semyatits’ (Tel Aviv: Irgun yots’e Semyatits’ be-Yisrael ye-Artsot ha-Berit, 1965), which includes an English overview, also includes survivor testimonies. R.K., in Isaiah Trunk, Jewish Responses to Nazi Persecution: Collective and Individual Behavior in Extremis (New York: Stein and Day, 1979), pp. 98–99, offers a description of the ghetto; “Sydney [Jehoszua] Żółtak—spotkanie z przeszłością—Nigdy nie zapomnimy,” Głos Siemiatycz, October 31, 2003, an interview with a survivor, is available online (www.siemiatycze.com.pl); correspondence between the Kuperhands and the Łeszczyński families is translated into English at the virtual photography exhibit “And I Still See Their Faces: The Vanished World of Polish Jews,” on the Web site of the Simon Wiesenthal Center (www.wiesenthal.com), under the section “There Were Seven Children—Weddings.” Also valuable for the fate of the Makarki community is an interview with Maria Kopiec, an aid-giver to Siemiatycze survivor Cwi Kramer and to his future wife, a fugitive of the liquidation of the ghetto in Drohiczyn, by Iwona Sawicka, “Bóg wciąż mi to wynagradza. Rozmowa z Marią Kopiec z Makark—odznaczoną medalem Sprawiedliwy Wśród Narodów Świata za ratowanie w czasie wojny ludzkiego życia,” at the Web site of Stowarzyszenie Ruch na Rzecz Ziemi (www.nawschodzie.pl), on the part of the Web site devoted to the Podlascy Żydzi.

Some of the documentary material appears in Polish translation in Paweł Machcewicz and Krzysztof Persak, eds., Wokół Jedwabnego, 2 vols. (Warsaw: IPN-KSzpNP, 2002), vol. 2, Dokumenty, pp. 185–186 (AŻIH, 301/973), pp. 334–336 (AŻIH, 301/1463); the virtual Archiwum Etnograficzne includes AŻIH, 301/2592, at www.archiwumetnograficzne.edu.pl/readarticle.php?article_id=35. English-language excerpts of some testimonies are in Arnon Rubin, The Rise and Fall of Jewish Communities in Poland and Their Relics Today, vol. 1, District Białystok (Tel Aviv: Tel Aviv University Press, 2006), pp. 176–177 (AŻIH, 301/973, 301/1463, testimony of Rachel Keils [or Kejles] Kisogorski, in Tash, Ḳehilat Semyatits’, pp. 201–207).

Also useful are the relevant entries in Shmuel Spector and Bracha Freundlich, eds., Pinkas ha-kehillot. Encyclopaedia of Jewish Communities: Poland, vol. 8, Vilna, Białystok, Nowogrodek (Jerusalem: Yad Vashem, 2005), pp. 414–415 (Mielnik), p. 449 (Niemirów), pp. 614–620 (Siemiatycze); Rubin, The Rise, vol. 1, p. 132 (Mielnik), p. 140 (Niemirów), pp. 170–176 (Siemiatycze); Israel Gutman and Sara Bender, eds., The Encyclopedia of the Righteous among the Nations: Rescuers of Jews during the Holocaust, vol. 2, Poland, 2 pts. (Jerusalem: Yad Vashem, 2004), pt. 1, p. 452, pt. 2, pp. 738–739; and in Polish, Szymon Datner, “Ratownictwo na Białostocczyźnie,” in Władysław Bartoszewski and Zofia Lewinówna, eds., Ten jest z ojczyzny mojej. Polacy z pomocą Żydom, 1939–1945, 3rd ed. (Warsaw: Świat Książki, 2007), p. 532; and Waldemar Monkiewicz, “Za cenę życia. O ratowaniu Żydów w Białostockiem w okresie okupacji niemieckiej,” Białostoccy Żydzi 2 (1997): 187 ff. Andrzej W. Ołędzki, “Hersz Szebes—morderstwa w Czartajewie—marzec 1944, oraz podobne w Miłkowicach, Maćkach i Kłyzówce,” which originally appeared in Głos Siemiatycz and is available online, includes physical descriptions of the Siemiatycze ghetto and its liquidation but reaches controversial conclusions about Szabbes and therefore is better read together with the relevant parts of Kuperhand and Monkiewicz.

Documentation pertaining to the history of the Siemiatycze Jewish community during World War II includes AŻIH (e.g., 204 [i.e., YVA, M-11/B146], 301 [e.g., 107, 283, 973, 1463, 2592, 4086]); IPN (e.g., ASG [1/154-55, 1/157, 46/54], SAB [17, 160, 231], SOB [293, 331, 416], SWB [72, 152, 174, 194]); IPN-Bi (e.g., 1/236, Ko [38/88, 70/88, 73/88, 100/94, 177/88], S-183/68); USHMM (e.g., RG-15.019M [IPN], 1/154-55, 1/157, 46/54); VHF (e.g., # 1194, 2245, 5184, 7089, 7427, 7713, 9967, 11175, 12112, 13985, 14564, 15406, 16434, 16542, 17287, 21468, 22924, 24839, 25084, 26576, 28499, 29056, 30115, 31534, 33917, 34353, 34915, 35500, 37064, 38838, 39922, 41157, 44194, 50632, 51387); and YVA (e.g., M-11/B146, M-49-E [e.g., 1257, 1463, 2592], O-3 [e.g., 3887, 5093, 7531], O-16/415, O-22/54). About two thirds of the VHF testimonies are by Jewish refugees from German-occupied Poland, deported by Soviet authorities in the spring of 1940 to the Russian interior.

Samuel Fishman, Martin Dean, and Laura Crago

NOTES

1. Testimonies of Miriam and Saul Kuperhand, in Shadows, pp. 19–20, 94–97, respectively; VHF, # 50632, testimony of Miriam Kuperhand.

2. Low and high figures, respectively, in AŻIH, 301/1463, testimony of Jehoszua (Joszua) Kejles, in Machcewicz and Persak, Wokół Jedwabnego, 2:334; Tash, Ḳehilat Semyatits’, p. iii.

3. Compare AŻIH, 301/1463, in Machcewicz and Persak, Wokół Jedwabnego, 2:334–335, and testimony of Rachel Kisogorski, in Tash, Ḳehilat Semyatits’, p. 202, with M. Kuperhand, in Shadows, p. 21, for German participation; victim estimate from AŻIH, 301/973, testimony of Wolf Wiśnia (Zev Vishnia), p. 1.

4. AŻIH, 301/1463, in Machcewicz and Persak, Wokół Jedwabnego, 2:335; Kisogorski, in Tash, Ḳehilat Semyatits’, p. 202, respectively, for the two collaborators.

5. Kisogorski, in Tash, Ḳehilat Semyatits’, p. 202.

6. AŻIH, 301/1463, in Machcewicz and Persak, Wokół Jedwabnego, 2:334–335.

7. Kisogorski, in Tash, Ḳehilat Semyatits’, p. 203; R.K., in Trunk, Jewish Responses, p. 98.

8. AŻIH, 301/1463, in Machcewicz and Persak, Wokół Jedwabnego, 2:335.

9. Kisogorski, in Tash, Ḳehilat Semyatits’, pp. 204, 207; AŻIH, 301/1463, in Machcewicz and Persak, Wokół Jedwabnego, 2:335.

10. AŻIH, 301/1463, in Machcewicz and Persak, Wokół Jedwabnego, 2:335.

11. USHMM, RG-15.019M, reel 14, 46/54, pp. 1–2; AŻIH, 301/1463, in Machcewicz and Persak, Wokół Jedwabnego, 2:355.

12. M. Kuperhand, in Shadows, p. 29; R.K., in Trunk, Jewish Responses, p. 98.

13. Tash, Ḳehilat Semyatits’, p. v; M. Kuperhand, in Shadows, p. 29.

14. Kisogorski, in Tash, Ḳehilat Semyatits’, p. 205; M. Kuperhand, in Shadows, pp. 32–34.

15. AŻIH, 301/4086, testimony of Kalman Krawiec, p. 1 (Polish trans.), 301/1463, in Machcewicz and Persak, Wokół Jedwabnego, 2:335.

16. Olędzki, “Hersz Szebes.”

17. AŻIH, 301/4086, p. 1.

18. Ibid., AŻIH, 301/283, testimony of Etkā Żółtak, p. 1, respectively, for low and high escapee figures; dead at USHMM, RG-15.019M, reel 1, 1/155, pp. 1–2.

19. Deportation figures from AŻIH, 301/4086, p. 1; S. Kuperhand, in Shadows, p. 105, notes the second transport left the station the next day.

20. USHMM, RG-15.019M, reel 1, 1/154, pp. 1–2; and high victim range from grave-site plaque.

21. VHF, # 7089, testimony of Regina (Gruskin) Kugler.

22. S. Kuperhand, in Shadows, pp. 104–142, 173–174; VHF, # 7713, testimony of Benyamin Rock.

23. AŻIH, 301/1463, p. 3, for number of survivors.

24. IPN, SAB 17.

25. Ibid., SWB 194.

SKIDEL

Pre-1939: Skidel (Yiddish: Skidel), town, Grodno powiat, Białystok województwo, Poland; 1939–1941: Skidel', raion center, Belostok oblast', Belorussian SSR; 1941–1944: Skidel, Kreis Grodno, Distrikt Białystok; post-1991: Skidzel', Hrodna raen, Hrodna voblasts', Republic of Belarus

Skidel lies on the Skidelka (Belarusian: Skidzel'ka) River 30 kilometers (18.6 miles) east-southeast of Grodno and 78 kilometers (48.5 kilometers) east-northeast of Lida. On the eve of World War II, Jews comprised just over 80 percent (2,800) of Skidel's population, with Poles, Belorussians, and Tatars making up the remainder of its residents.

On June 24, 1941, during Germany's invasion of the Soviet Union, Skidel sustained massive aerial shelling, which destroyed much of the settlement. German armed forces occupied Skidel on June 27. By July 12, the Germans had appointed a civilian administration and an auxiliary police force. Little is known about Skidel's collaborationist civilian leaders, who were quickly subordinated to a German civil administration, under the leadership of Amtskommissar Plotz.¹ The Germans also established a large Gendarmerie post in Skidel early on, which in turn was subordinated to the Gendarmerie-Kreisführer in Grodno. In 1941, it was commanded first by Leutnant Müller and subsequently by Hauptwachtmeister (from 1943, Meister) Padberg.² The auxiliary police were subordinated to the Gendarmerie, working there as Schutzmänner. The Schutzmänner at Skidel's post were of Polish, Tatar, and Belorussian nationality.

The Germans and their collaborators immediately harassed Jews and instituted anti-Jewish measures in Skidel. The German military commander's first decree required Skidel's Jewish population to assemble at the main square to watch German soldiers use a tank to overturn the Lenin statue. The Germans then commanded the Jews to break the statue into small pieces, collect the rubble in their hands, form a column, and give the statue a mock burial in the Skidelka River. According to one historian, the auxiliary police played a leading role in humiliating and severely beating the Jews during the “burial rite.” A Jewish survivor, Efrim Lozovskii, claims that after observing the Germans brutally beating several prominent Jews during the burial procession, he fled to Minsk, where he entered the city's ghetto. After the humiliations, the Germans ordered the Skidel Jews to wear yellow distinguishing marks, in the shape of a Star of David. They also ordered the appointment of a Jewish Council (Judenrat). Little is known about its composition. In June 1942, its secretary was surnamed Auszberg (or Auschberg). In addition, the Germans forbade the Jews to leave the boundaries of Skidel.³

The Germans also expropriated Skidel's Jewish-owned factories in the summer of 1941. But it seems likely that they distanced themselves from ongoing anti-Jewish violence there, even as they continued to condone it by permitting the auxiliary police to terrorize the Jews. According to an account by a Jewish woman who had fled the Wilno ghetto and stayed overnight in Skidel, the Germans “treated the Jews of Skidel very well.” They permitted them to work at their trades and even allowed a Jew, surnamed Shulman, to administer his former factory on their behalf. However, she noted that local Poles “torture[d]” the Jews “at every opportunity,” and as a result, they had “suffer[ed] many hardships.”⁴

In late 1941, all the Jews of Skidel were forced to move into a ghetto. It was located near the Jewish cemetery, at the former Soviet military air base. It seems likely the ghetto was enclosed by a fence in August 1942. Jews in the Skidel ghetto undoubtedly worked at a variety of tasks, but the extant documentation confirms only their labor in the spring and summer of 1942 on road construction crews, organized to cobble and pave roads in Skidel and from Skidel to Grodno.⁵

Conditions in the ghetto were miserable, in part because the six, two-story wooden buildings at the air base could not accommodate even a small part of the Jewish community. To create additional residential space, many ghetto residents dug earthen pits and built lean-to structures on the ghetto's grounds. The diet was poor, with the Germans providing few or perhaps no rations to its residents. Undernourished and exposed to the cold and the elements, many Skidel Jews suffered from illnesses in the winter of 1941–1942. The death rate was high. The Jews continued to be subject to robbery and beatings by the local auxiliary police. According to one source, inebriated auxiliary policemen, including Konstantin Mozolevskii, randomly entered the ghetto to shoot indiscriminately at its residents, particularly women and children.

The Skidel ghetto was liquidated on November 2, 1942. Its children and less able-bodied were loaded onto carts. The remaining members of the Jewish community followed on foot, contained behind ropes held by the Jews on the perimeter of the procession. The Skidel Jewish community, about 1,230 people, was expelled to the Kielbasin transit camp, south of Grodno.⁶ At Kielbasin, the Skidel community joined Jews from about 22 other communities (about 22,000 to 28,000 people) also deported there from November 2 to November 5, 1942. The Skidel Jews were the first community driven by the Germans from Kielbasin to the Łosośna railway station, for deportation to the region's extermination camps. The first transport carrying much of the Jewish community of Skidel arrived at the Auschwitz extermination camp on November 9, 1942. Either there or somewhere earlier in transit, some Skidel Jews likely were forced to sign postcards, addressed to the Kielbasin transit camp, in which they attested that they had arrived safely and noted that the conditions in the new camp were better than at the transit camp. A survivor from Krynki recalled that upon receipt of the Skidel Jews' postcards, Karl Rinzler, Kielbasin's commander, had ordered that each of the remaining inmates receive 50 grams (less than 2 ounces) of sausage, known as the Skidel sausage, as a further demonstration that the expulsions and deportations supposedly heralded better times.⁷ In the meantime, at Auschwitz, the Germans had held back as prisoners of the concentration camp just 190 men and 104 women from the first (Skidel) transport. The remaining Jews in the transport, at least 706 people, were gassed on their arrival. A large number of Skidel Jews also were on a second transport, officially of 1,500 Jews, which arrived at Auschwitz on November 14, 1942. The Germans chose as prisoners 282 men and 379 women from the Skidel, Druskieniki, and Grodno I ghettos and from Korycin and Sidra. The remaining 839 people on the transport were gassed on arrival.⁸

After the deportation, the German administration in Skidel sold off the remaining Jewish property there, including from the ghetto. It collected 23,236.50 Reichsmark (RM) in proceeds.⁹

There were almost no Jewish survivors from Skidel. Most of the male Skidel prisoners at Auschwitz, for instance, already had perished or been consigned to death by the end of January 1943.

SOURCES Secondary accounts include the Skidel entries in Shmuel Spector and Bracha Freundlich, eds., Pinkas ha-kehillot. Encyclopaedia of Jewish Communities: Poland, vol. 8, Vilna, Białystok, Nowogródek (Jerusalem: Yad Vashem, 2005), pp. 512–515; I.A. Borisov, “Skidzel,” in Pamiats’. Historyka-dakumental’naia khronika Hrodzenskaha raiona (Minsk: Belaruskaja Entsyklapedyia, 1993), pp. 32–33; and the appropriate sections in Skidzel’: 500 hod historyi (Hrodna: Hrodzenskaia drukarnia, 2008). A partial English translation of the first appears in the larger work by Linda Hugle, “Skidel History,” and the second, in a complete translation, by Larry Cannon, as Il’ya Aleksandrovich Borisov, “The Tragic Fate of the Skidelian Jews,” on the Skidel ShtetLinks site at www.shtetlinks.jewishgen.org/skidel/skidel.html.

Documentation regarding the Jews of Skidel under German occupation in World War II includes: GAGO (e.g., 1-1-54, 335, 365, and 512); GARF (7021-86-40); IPN (SWOI 71-74); NARB (845-1-8); USHMM (e.g., RG-53.004M [GAGO], reels 1, 4, and 5); and YVA. Some materials above have been published in Serge Klarsfeld, ed., Documents Concerning the Destruction of the Jews of Grodno 1941–1944, 6 vols. (New York: Beate Klarsfeld Foundation, 1985–1992).

Alexander Kruglov and Laura Crago

NOTES

1. USHMM, RG-53.004M (GAGO), reel 3, 1-1-280, p. 6; and 1-1-312, pp. 75–78.
2. Ibid., reel 3, 1-1-280, p. 7.
3. VHF, # 37395; and USHMM, RG-53.004M, reel 5, 1-1-512, p. 163.
4. “Vilna and Environs. The Wartime Experience of a Twenty-Two-Year-Old Jewish Woman,” in Shimon Huberband, Kiddush Hashem: Jewish Religious and Cultural Life in Poland during the Holocaust (New York: Yeshiva University Press, 1987), p. 359.
5. USHMM, RG-53.004M, reel 5, 1-1-512.
6. GARF, 7021-86-40, p. 4; and also in GAGO, 1-1-54, p. 38.
7. Feivel Wolf, “After the Departure for Treblinka,” in Dov Rabin, ed., Pinkas Krynki (Tel Aviv: Former Residents of Krynki in Israel and the Diaspora, 1970), p. 286.
8. Stanisław Mączka, ed., Żydzi polscy w KL Auschwitz: wykazy imienne. Polish Jews in KL Auschwitz: Name Lists (Warsaw: ŻIH, 2004), pp. 99–100, 103–104.
9. USHMM, RG-53.004M, reel 4, 1-1-335, pp. 77–79.

ŚNIADOWO

Pre-1939: Śniadowo (Yiddish: Shnadova), village, Łomża powiat, Białystok województwo, Poland; 1939–1941: Sniadowo, raion center, Belostok oblast’, Belorussian SSR; 1941–1944: Sniadowo, Kreis Lomscha, Distrikt Białystok; post-1998: Śniadowo, Łomża powiat, województwo podlaskie, Poland

Śniadowo lies 12.5 kilometers (7.8 miles) from the southern outskirts of Łomża. In 1931, 503 Jews lived in the large Śniadowo gmina.

In World War II, the Germans occupied Śniadowo for about three weeks in September 1939. They deported an unknown number of male Jews and Christians to a forced labor camp in East Prussia before evacuating Śniadowo to make way for the Red Army.

Located just 20 kilometers (12.4 miles) from the new Soviet-German border, Śniadowo flooded with Jewish refugees from neighboring German-occupied Poland. Because the recently established Sniadowo raion shared a 50-kilometer (31-mile) border with German-occupied Poland, Soviet authorities in the spring of 1940 declared it a border security zone and ordered its refugees to move to the interior. War-time territorial divisions nonetheless brought an expansion in the local Jewish population, as Soviet authorities incorporated into the raion the southwestern Piski and Troszyn gminy as well as parts of the pre-war Jasienica and Komorowo gminy, which had belonged, respectively, to the Ostrołęka and Ostrów Mazowiecka powiaty, which mostly came under German occupation. In the south, the Szumowo and Lubotyń gminy, from the pre-war Łomża powiat, were joined to the raion. The raion was the permanent home in February 1940 to 33,856 Poles, 2,614 Jews, and 159 Belorussians.

Shortly after reoccupying Śniadowo on June 22, 1941, a sergeant in command of a small contingent left behind to establish a military administration in the settlement demanded a group of older, outwardly more devout Jews take apart a statue of Lenin, erected in the Soviet period, and bury it at the Jewish cemetery, because, as he explained, Lenin “had been a Jew.” Some local Poles forced the Jews to participate in the burial ritual as the Germans photographed the humiliating spectacle. On the way home, the Jews feared they would be murdered, but the sergeant refused to allow them further harm. Several days later, another group of Germans, in several cars, stopped by Śniadowo on their way to Łomża. After forcing Bencyjon Drzewak, a Jewish tailor, to indicate where the Jews resided, the unit rounded up about 50 mostly male Jews and shot them in a forest on the road to Ostrów Mazowiecka. On another evening, an SS unit executed the rabbi of Śniadowo. Another German, Krohl, went from home to home appropriating whatever he wanted from the Jews’ possessions. He subsequently ordered the Jewish Council, likely established in July, to turn over the remainder of the Jews’ valuables.¹

The Germans altered preexisting residential patterns in a series of decrees that ultimately established the Śniadowo ghetto. A July decree, probably designed to separate Christians and Jews, required Jews to move from homes on Śniadowo’s main streets to residences on its smaller ones. On August 1 or October 1, 1941, the Germans established a more formal ghetto by limiting Jewish residence to Łomża Street.² The ghetto was not fenced. It remained open throughout its existence. Polish postwar court documentation lists the ghetto population as 217.³ Szymon Datner gives a much larger number, 600 to 650, but provides no source for the estimate.

Widespread German violence in the summer of 1941 makes it difficult to determine which, if any, Jews from the former Sniadowo raion survived to be consolidated in the ghetto. From mid-July to August 1941, the Germans, likely the same SS unit responsible for executing the Jewish community of Kolno, murdered almost all the Jewish communities in the south and southwest of the former Sniadowo raion.⁴ Among the victims were the Jews of the pre-war Szumowo, Lubotyń, and Jasienica gminy. These included, in the first case, the communities of Szumowo Nowe, Szumowo-Górze, and Koskowo villages; in the second case, the Jews of Lubotyń Stary and Podbiele; and in the third, the community of Paproć Duża (Königshold) and a portion of the Prosienica community. The Germans held the Szumowo and Lubotyń victims prisoner in Szumowo Nowe village, about 16.5 kilometers (10.3 miles) south-southeast of Śniadowo, before executing them in small groups in Soviet-era antitank ditches in the Rząśnik (or Klonowo) Forest, part of the larger forest of Czerwony Bór.⁵ Some Jews may have sought refuge in Śniadowo. Others, from the northern part of the former raion, may have survived and been consolidated subsequently in the Śniadowo ghetto.

The inmates of the Śniadowo ghetto were conscripted for forced labor. Some remained at their pre-war shoemaking and tailoring trades but labored in workshops for the Germans.

Others reported to the railway station to unload wagons full of property confiscated on the Eastern Front; to sort the merchandise at the station, which the Germans had transformed into a storage warehouse for this purpose; and to reload the sorted goods onto trains destined for the German interior. Some inmates worked in a nearby forest, hewing trees. Still others were conscripted for agricultural labor, including repairing farm machinery.

Violence at times marked ghetto life. After discovering, on a Friday, that a 33-year-old Gendarme had been having an affair with a ghetto resident, surnamed Lis, local German authorities ordered the woman’s entire family to report on Monday for labor at the railway depot. When the members of the family did not return with the other conscripts, the other Jews presumed they had been murdered.⁶ In 1941, a Jew surnamed Drzewak was executed.⁷

The ghetto was liquidated on November 2, 1942. At dawn, the Judenrat was told that the Jews would be evacuated. They were given a half hour to pack no more than 25 kilograms (55.1 pounds) of belongings and to report to the market square. Some who attempted to evade the evacuation were shot. The survivors were transported, via Łomża, to a transit camp in Zambrów. They were soon joined by others from Śniadowo who had evaded the deportation. Denied anything more than a day or two of shelter by local Christians, the fugitives had been forced to hide in local forests, where they became subjects of two large forest sweeps, organized by the Gendarmes, with the assistance of Ukrainian auxiliaries. At least 12 Śniadowo Jews perished during the searches, including an uncle of then-11-year-old Noemi Centnerschwer (Centnerszer). Those who surrendered voluntarily, such as Centnerschwer’s sister, aunt, and several cousins, were brought to the Zambrów transit camp.⁸

At Zambrów, the Śniadowo community joined 17,500 to 20,000 Jews deported there from other nearby localities. The Germans began liquidating the transit camp, around January 10, 1943, by ordering more than 2,000 inmates assembled, for deportation on sleds, to the Czyżewo train station. Deported to the train station on January 15, along with Jews from Czyżewo and Łomża, the Śniadowo Jews were loaded onto train wagons destined for the Auschwitz extermination camp. They arrived at Auschwitz II-Birkenau on January 17, 1943. Of the approximately 2,000 Jewish men, women, and children in the transport, about 1,775 were gassed on arrival. Another 225 men were held back for labor at the concentration camp. Only a handful of the prisoners were from Śniadowo. They included the brother of Noemi Centnerschwer, who likely perished in January 1943.⁹ Only 1 Śniadowo Jew, Jacob Bandymer, is known to have survived as an inmate of first Auschwitz and later the Dachau concentration camp.

Only a handful of Jews survived the war hiding near Śniadowo. Noemi Centnerschwer found long-term shelter masquerading as a Christian, working for the Jasiński family, in Szabły village. David Rozenberg survived with a group of Jewish fugitives hidden in a bunker located closer to Ostrów Mazowiecka.

SOURCES Useful secondary accounts include the Śniadowo entries in Avraham Wein, ed., Pinkas ha-kehillot. Encyclopaedia of Jewish Communities: Poland, vol. 4, Warsaw and Its Region (Jerusalem: Yad Vashem, 1986), pp. 441–442; Arnon Rubin, The Rise and Fall of the Jewish Communities in Poland and Their Relics Today, vol. 1, District Białystok (Tel Aviv: Tel Aviv University Press, 2006), pp. 212–213; and on Polin, the Heritage of Jews of Poland Web site, www.zchor.org; and Szymon Datner, “Eksterminacja ludności żydowskiej w Okręgu Białostockim,” BŻIH, no. 60 (1966): 45 (tab. 6).

Archival documentation for the Śniadowo Jewish community under German occupation during World War II includes AŻIH (i.e., 301 [2750, 4407]); IPN (e.g., Ankiety); IPN-Bi (S-582/71); USHMM (RG-15.019M [IPN], reel 14, 46/76); VHF (# 16888); and YVA.

Laura Crago and Vincent Slatt

NOTES

1. AŻIH, 301/2750, testimony of Noemi Centnerschwer, p. 1; and VHF, # 16888, testimony of Jacobo Bandrymer, in which Krohl is described several times as a German “mail-man,” in a “brown uniform” and as “not a military man, but, mobilized . . . in charge.”

2. For August, VHF, # 16888; for October 1939 [sic.], USHMM, RG-15.019M, reel 14, 46/76, pp. 1–2, with the month perhaps significant.

3. USHMM, RG-15.019M, reel 14, 46/76, pp. 1–2.

4. On the connections between the Kolno and Śniadowo executions, see the testimony collected by Jan Żaryn, “Przez pomyłkę. Ziemia łomżyńska w latach 1939–1945. Rozmowa z Ks. Kazimierzem Łupińskim,” Biuletyn IPN, nos. 8–9 (19–20) (August–September 2003): 112–113, 117 fn.5.

5. Ibid., for the murder of the Szumowo and Prosiénica Jewish communities; USHMM, RG-15.019M (IPN), reel 1, 2/191, pp. 1–2, noting Rzaśnik as the execution site of 1,500 Jews from the town of Zambrów and from the Lubotyń and Andrzejewo gminy; for the Koskowo Jewish community, AŻIH, 301/4407, testimony of Dawid Rozenberg, p. 2 (Polish trans.); Rejestr miejsc i faktów zbrodni popełnionych przez okupanta hitlerowskiego na ziemiach polskich w latach 1939–1945. Województwo ostrołęckie (Warsaw: GKBZHwP and IPN, 1985), p. 74, for executions of the Podbiele community.

6. VHF, # 16888.

7. Rejestr miejsc, p. 220, with no first name mentioned to indicate whether the victim was the same Drzewak mentioned earlier in the entry.

8. AŻIH, 301/4407, p. 2.

9. According to ITS records, the last record for Centnerschwer (Centnerschwer), a prisoner at Auschwitz-Buna, is a hospital list of inmates with typhus transferred back to the main Auschwitz camp on January 29, 1943, at USHMM, ITS, 1.1.2.1, folder 149, doc. 529843.

SOKÓŁKA

Pre-1939: Sokółka, town, powiat center, Białystok województwo, Poland; 1939–1941: Sokulka, raion center, Belostok oblast', Belorussian SSR; 1941–1944: Sokolka, Kreis center, Distrikt Białystok; 1944: Sokółka, Sokółka powiat, Białystok

województwo, Poland; post-1999: województwo podlaskie, Poland

Sokółka lies 42 kilometers (26 miles) north-northeast of Białystok and 36 kilometers (22.4 miles) south-southwest of Grodno. Its 1936 population of 19,392 included 3,232 Jews.

In World War II, the Germans occupied Sokółka initially but soon evacuated it to make way for the arrival of Soviet forces on September 22–23, 1939. That month, 56,600 native inhabitants resided in the larger Sokółka area, including 34,000 Poles, 15,300 Belorussians, 6,200 Jews, and 1,100 others. By late 1939, refugees from German-occupied Poland had swelled the Jewish population in Sokółka proper to 8,000 (70 percent of the population). In early 1940, Soviet authorities ordered a large part of the refugee population to vacate Sokółka; in May, they rounded up almost all the remaining refugees and deported them, via Grodno, to the Russian interior.¹ Many sources nonetheless note that 8,000 Jews resided in Sokółka on the eve of the German invasion of the Soviet Union on June 22, 1941.

A Wehrmacht unit retook Sokółka on June 28, 1941. The soldiers immediately broke into a Bet Midrash, on Szkolna Street, and profaned the Holy Books. The German military command that same day established a local collaborationist administration, led by a mayor, and recruited an auxiliary police force. A German officer called together Jewish communal leaders and ordered a list of the Jewish inhabitants of Sokółka. Members of the auxiliary police force used lists provided by Jewish (and Polish) authorities to identify and arrest former Communist administrators, including two Jews. The prisoners were executed. By early July, the Germans had appointed a six-member Jewish Council (Judenrat). Sources divide over whether Friedburg, an attorney, or Sonnabend, a physician, headed the council.²

By June 30, the German military commander had ordered all Sokółka Jews assembled to hear a list of anti-Jewish decrees, including prohibitions on contact with Christians, mandates to wear yellow markings, requirements for daily forced labor by all adult Jews, and directives to surrender bicycles and radios. Soldiers rounded up Jews to clean barracks and houses recently seized by German authorities, to weed public spaces, and to work at the train station. The soldiers humiliated and then shot dead a man they discovered studying Torah. In mid-July, 25 Jews rounded up for labor were taken instead to a prison in Białystok. The men disappeared two months later.³ The German military command also ordered Sokółka Jews to surrender jewelry as well as bedding, furniture, and other items to provision the apartments of German officials.

From the early summer of 1941, Sokółka swelled with Jewish refugees fleeing violence and coercion in Dąbrowa Białostocka, Kuźnica Białostocka, Krynki, Korycin, Czyżewo, and Zaręby Kościelne. In September 1941, many Jews from Janów Sokólski and Kuźnica fled to Sokółka to avoid deportation to larger, more distant ghettos. By the fall of 1941, the Sokółka Jewish population may have included 1,500 local refugees.⁴

With the establishment of a German civilian administration in late September 1941, the new authorities, likely the Sokółka Kreiskommissar, Landrat Amman, and the Amtskommissar, ordered a ghetto established in the old Jewish neighborhood in the southwestern third of the town. The ghetto encompassed an area spanning in the north from the southern side of Białystok Street to Kolejowa Street in the south. Its western border was the eastern side of 3 Maja Street. Some sources place the eastern border along the western side of Warszawa Street, also the location of the main gate. They note the ghetto was composed of three main streets: Szkolna, Sienna, and Kwiatowa. Others describe a ghetto area composed of several streets past Warszawa Street, including Krótka Street, and also Rzemieślnicza and Fabryczna Streets.⁵ It took several months to construct a 3-meter-high (9.8-foot-high) wooden fence and to brick over the doorways and windows along the perimeter of the ghetto. Jewish fugitives from Lithuania, who passed through Sokółka, described the ghetto as completely sealed off from the remainder of the town.

Just after the Sukkot holiday, on October 14, 1941, the Sokółka community was ordered relocated to the ghetto. At the gate, the members of the Sokółka Gendarmerie, including Gendarmes and members of the Polish police, inspected the items the Jews were moving in there and usually confiscated some of them. Figures for the ghetto population vary, with sources claiming that anywhere from between 3,500 and 8,000 Jews resided there.⁶ The small size of the Sokółka Judenrat perhaps narrows the figures, as the Germans generally ordered the establishment of 6-member councils in places with Jewish populations below 5,000.

A German “ghetto commander” named Schneider oversaw the Sokółka ghetto. He likely was appointed by the Sokółka Kreiskommissar. He issued orders to the Jewish Council for the payment of ransoms, confiscations, and forced labor quotas. A Jewish police force, commanded by Paltiel Szejn (or Stein), assisted the Judenrat to carry out the orders. The Polish police, including Bolesław Iracewicz and Alfons Czecko, guarded the ghetto from the outside.⁷

Conditions in the ghetto were poor. Because each inmate was accorded 2 square meters (21.5 square feet) of residential space, as many as 16 people lived in a single room, even with the Bet Midrash used as housing. The inmates relied on barter and bribery to supplement the 300-gram (10.6-ounce) daily ration of rye bread. Some Christians remember Antoni Sawicki, a local Pole, using a torrential downpour before Passover 1942 to drive a 500-kilogram (1,100-pound) steer through the fence of the ghetto. Likely, ritual slaughterers (shochtim) paid him to deliver the animal, as survivors mention the widespread illegal smuggling of meat into the ghetto.⁸ Donations enabled the Judenrat to provide butter and eggs to the sick. The poor sanitary conditions (from overcrowding) nonetheless led to a typhus epidemic. The Judenrat transformed the Yavne Hebrew School into a hospital and smuggled medicines into the ghetto. The Judenrat opened a new cemetery in the ghetto to bury the dead.

The Jews were ordered assembled outside the ghetto at least three times and subjected there to humiliations and beatings by German police and security forces. One day, members of the Gendarmerie rounded up 25 young men and shot them outside town. In March 1942, the rabbi of Sokółka, Yitzhak Halevi Schuster, was arrested, imprisoned in Białystok, and shot.

In the spring of 1942, hundreds of ghetto conscripts dug trenches for an underground sanitation system and constructed the Sokółka reservoir. Other conscripts widened and paved the road to Dąbrowa Białostocka. They worked on the 14.2-kilometer (8.8-mile) stretch, from Sokółka to Makowlany. A third group constructed a road to Odelsk, through Drahle village. The Germans ordered tailoring and shoemaking workshops created in the ghetto. The largest, a factory to produce felt boots for the Wehrmacht, was established at the pre-war Fajenberg tannery on Sienna Street. The workshop employed 300 to 400 people.

On November 2, 1942, an SS unit ordered the Sokółka ghetto sealed. That day, the Janów Sokółski Jewish community was expelled to the ghetto. On November 5, at 5:00 A.M., the SS ordered all the Jews assembled by the main gate. There, they learned that only 200 employees of the felt-boot factory and 200 others from communities consolidated in the ghetto would remain in Sokółka. The other inmates were to be expelled that day to a new work site, located in Kielbasin, a former estate south of Grodno.

In reality, Kielbasin was a transit camp in which the Germans consolidated about 22,000 to 28,000 Jews from 23 communities in Kreis Sokółka and Kreis Grodno to facilitate their deportation to the extermination camps. The Sokółka Jews remained at Kielbasin until the middle of December, when they were expelled from the transit camp and sent to the Treblinka extermination camp. They were gassed on arrival.

On January 23, 1943, almost all the surviving Jews in Sokółka were sent to the Auschwitz extermination camp on a transport that also carried Jews from the Krynki and Jasionówka ghettos. Two days later at Auschwitz II-Birkenau, the Germans gassed 2,107 people from the transport. They held back, as concentration camp prisoners, 193 people—161 men and 32 women. Until March 1943, when they were sent to Auschwitz, 20 specialist workers—10 from Sokółka and 10 from Krynki—remained in Sokółka.

A few Sokółka Jews evaded the expulsion. Sonnabend reportedly was transferred from Kielbasin to the Białystok ghetto, where he served as the head of the Labor Department in the Białystok Judenrat.⁹ Benjamin Kotler jumped from a deportation train.

SOURCES As well as archival documentation, the entry also is based on the testimonies of several survivors, including Aleksander (or Abraham) Kantorowski, Chaja Lea Kaplan, Benjamin (or Icchak) Kotler, and Rachel Malski-Tykociński, which appear in the Sokółka yizkor book, Ester Mishkinski, ed., Sefer Sokółka. Dos bukh fun Sokółke (‘a.y. Irgun yots’e Sokółka be-Yisrael) (Jerusalem: Entsiklopedyah shel galuyot, 1968). Two anonymous testimonies, published in Shimon Huberband, Kiddush Hashem: Jewish Religious and Cultural Life in Poland during the Holocaust (New York: Yeshiva University Press, 1987), pp. 359–360, 365–366, provide brief, albeit important, mentions of Sokółka during the war.

Secondary sources include the relevant entries in Shmuel Spector and Bracha Freundlich, eds., Pinkas ha-kehillot. Encyclopaedia of Jewish Communities: Poland, vol. 8, Vilna, Białystok, Nowogródek (Jerusalem: Yad Vashem, 2005), pp. 475–481; and Arnon Rubin, The Rise and Fall of Jewish Communities in Poland and Their Relics Today, vol. 1, District Białystok (Tel Aviv: Tel Aviv University Press, 2006), pp. 180–186. Still relevant, particularly for demographic changes, is Szymon Datner, “Eksterminacja Żydów w Okręgu Białostockim,” BŻIH, no. 60 (1966): 9, 48 (tab. 7). Electronic resources include an interview, from January 2006, with Mikołaj Talarczyk, “Za łapówkę do Kłajpedy,” about the Sokółka ghetto, on the Web site of the town of Sokółka, www.sokolka.pl/; and “Sokółscy Żydzi,” on the Nasza Sokółka Web site, <http://naszasokolka.wordpress.com>.

Documentation about the World War II history of the Sokółka Jewish community under German occupation and the partisans who operated near Dworzysk includes AŻIH (Ankiety [GRN Sokółka and Dąbrowa], and 301/2121 and 2965); IPN-Bi (1/1966, 15/438, and old numeration, Ko-205/88 [Dworzysk], S-12/79, S-48/68, S-70/67, S-132/69); USHMM (RG-15.019M [IPN], reel 14, 48/88); VHF (# 8661 and 38590); and YVA.

Laura Crago

NOTES

1. VHF, # 8661, testimony of Abram Morenstein; and Huberband, Kiddush Hashem, pp. 365–366.
2. Compare “Sokółka,” in Rubin, Rise, p. 185; and AŻIH, 301/2121, testimony of Fania Jesielewska, p. 1.
3. AŻIH, 301/2965, testimony of Abraham Gołdacki, p. 1.
4. AŻIH, Ankiety (GRN Sokółka and Dąbrowa), cited in Datner, “Eksterminacja,” p. 9.
5. Compare Mishkinski, Sefer Sokółka, p. 349; and Talarczyk, “Za łapówkę.”
6. USHMM, RG-15.019M (IPN), ASG, reel 14, 48/88, pp. 1–2, for low figure; and AŻIH, 301/2965, p. 1, for high figure.
7. USHMM, RG-15.019M, reel 14, 48/88, p. 2.
8. Compare Talarczyk, “Za łapówkę”; and Mishkinski, Sefer Sokółka, p. 350.
9. AŻIH, 301/2121, p. 1.

SOKOŁY

Pre-1939: Sokoly (Yiddish: Sokoli), town, Wysokie Mazowieckie powiat, Białystok województwo, Poland; 1939–1941: Sokoly, Lapy raion, Belostok oblast', Belorussian SSR; 1941–1944: Kreis Białystok, Distrikt Białystok; post-1998: Sokoly, Wysokie Mazowieckie powiat, województwo podlaskie, Poland

Sokoły lies 38 kilometers (23.6 miles) southwest of Białystok. Its 1937 population of 2,100 included 1,400 Jews.

A Wehrmacht unit occupied Sokoły on September 10, 1939. That evening, the Germans set fire to two Jewish residential streets and shot 4 Jews, probably in retaliation for the murder of three soldiers in Truskolasy-Lachy village. On September 17, German soldiers set Wysokie Mazowieckie ablaze and expelled about 600 Jewish arson victims to Sokoły. On September 23, the Germans ceded Sokoły to Soviet occupation.

Under Soviet rule, Sokoły swelled with Jewish refugees from German-occupied Poland. In April 1940, local authorities declared the refugees to be security risks and ordered them to move to localities east of Białystok. In August 1940, the Jewish population stood at 2,015, as some 500 Wysokie Mazowieckie refugees had settled permanently in Sokoły.

On June 24, 1941, the Germans recaptured Sokoły. On July 2, Wagner, the local military commander, immediately ordered all Jews to wear white armbands. This regulation was later changed to yellow markings, on the chest and arm. Wagner appointed a Polish collaborationist mayor and a 10-person auxiliary police force. The latter was commanded by Józef Janeczko. On a Sunday, German soldiers and the local police humiliated Rabbi Josef Rosenblum in front of the Roman Catholic Church. Wagner ordered Jewish houses searched for evidence of Communist sedition; 17 Jews were arrested.

However, a local translator, known as “Marszałek” (the Marshal), convinced Wagner of many Jews’ innocence. In late July 1941, Wagner appointed Marszałek mayor and accepted his proposal for the Jewish community to pay a “fine” to release the imprisoned “Communists.”¹ Because of its relative lack of terror, some survivors of anti-Jewish violence in Nowogród (Łomża powiat), Radziłów, Jedwabne, Tykocin, Rutki-Kossaki, and Kobylin found shelter in Sokoły.²

In early July, Wagner imposed the death penalty on Jews found without permission outside Sokoły. That same week, he ordered that a 12-person Jewish Council (Judenrat) be established, under the chairmanship of Alter Ginzberg. Its main responsibilities were to raise taxes and contributions demanded by the authorities and to organize workers for forced labor, made compulsory of all Jews under 42 years of age the moment the Germans arrived in Sokoły.

In September 1941, the Germans established a civil administration for Sokoły. That month, on the Shabbat of Penitence, the newly arrived German Gendarmes, or perhaps an SS unit from Łomża, and Polish policemen executed the former Jewish residents of a rest home in Mazury village. The Sokoły Jewish community had cared for the 25 to 30 victims, physically and mentally handicapped Jews from Białystok, from June 22, 1941.³

In late September 1941, Amtskommissar Wassel ordered a closed ghetto established in Sokoły. The Judenrat bribed him to suspend the order. When Wassel several more times threatened to establish a closed ghetto, the Judenrat interpreted the calls as demands for further monetary compensation.⁴

Local German authorities instead established an open ghetto, by restricting Jewish movement to Sokoły and concentrating Jews in fewer houses. They expropriated the houses of the wealthiest Jews to distribute to German and Polish officials. Wassel ordered additional Jewish houses demolished to construct a Gendarmerie post. Polish civilians expropriated

Jewish-owned businesses and workshops. Because they most often were located in the owners' homes, the families had little choice but to move. The expropriations resulted in extended Jewish families living in a single room in the remaining Jewish houses; other families moved into barns and storage sheds.⁵

The Amtskommissar, the Gendarmes, several German railway officials, a German dairy manager, the local mayor, and the Polish auxiliary police demanded furnishings, household items, and exorbitant gifts from the Judenrat. Wassel ordered all Jewish-owned cows confiscated. The Gendarmerie required the Judenrat to cover material losses some local Poles claimed to have sustained from several Jews in the Soviet period.

However, most Sokoły Jews flouted the anti-Jewish measures binding them to Sokoły. Young Jews left daily mostly to barter merchandise for food with local Poles. Radio technician Moshe Maik (Majek) established and maintained a clandestine radio for a Polish Home Army (AK) unit in Brzuzewo village. Because of the Gendarmerie construction project, about 300 craftsmen received exemptions from forced labor obligations. They worked directly for the Germans or for local Poles. On Passover 1942, almost all the 200 Jews conscripted to unload and load materials and to repair track beds at an SS-supervised railway and locomotive car facility in Łapy secured medical certificates to excuse them officially from forced labor obligations during the holidays.

An SS officer from the Łapy facility arrived in Sokoły on a Passover festival day to flog publicly and then arrest the entire Judenrat for the breach in labor discipline. A bribe secured their release. But Wassel warned the death sentence would be imposed on any Jew subsequently found circumventing German law.⁶ Seven weeks later, Wassel ordered (Dov) Beryl Kruszewski publicly hanged for hoarding goods, ignoring orders limiting Jews to Sokoły, and buying a substitute to fulfill his labor obligation in Łapy.⁷

In the fall of 1942, the Germans doubled forced labor obligations, ordering the Judenrat to send about 400 laborers daily to Łapy and another 80 each to a telegraph cabling project in the Budziska Forest and to a quarry in Jeżewo. The Judenrat conscripted all men, aged 42 to 60, twice weekly for forced labor. It mobilized women to lay cable, pulverize stone, and run the quarry's kitchen.

In the fall of 1942, a Polish train engineer told Sokoły laborers at Łapy that he twice had deported Jews from the Warsaw ghetto to a camp named Treblinka, where they had disappeared.⁸ In late October, several fugitives from the liquidations of the ghettos in Siedlce and Węgrów recounted jumping from transports taking them to the Treblinka extermination camp. The Jews began planning resistance. But, on November 1, a week before the insurgents were to purchase arms, local Poles warned they had been ordered to bring 400 wagons to Sokoły the next morning. About three quarters of the Sokoły Jewish community fled to local forests.⁹

An SS unit that arrived in Sokoły on November 2, 1942, to expel the Jewish community to a transit camp in southern Białystok discovered no more than 300 to 500 Jews there. Pursued in the forests by the Gendarmes and by gangs of Polish and Belorussian thieves, many fugitives accepted an "amnesty" offered by German authorities to all Jews who reported to the Bet Midrash.¹⁰ Around November 15–20, the Germans transported about 400 Bet Midrash captives to the Białystok transit camp. The Białystok Judenrat transferred to its ghetto the rabbi of Sokoły, his wife, and eldest daughter. The rest of the Sokoły inmates, about 850 people, were sent between November 16 and December 15 to Treblinka.¹¹ They were gassed on arrival.

In Sokoły, in late December 1942 or early January 1943, German authorities transferred another approximately 650 Jews to "safe haven" in the Białystok ghetto.¹² Most transfer-ees were deported during the first liquidation Aktion in February 1943. About 50 to 60 others were expelled during the final liquidation Aktion in August. A handful of the latter, deported to a number of concentration camps, survived the war.¹³

About 25 Jews from Sokoły received shelter from local Poles. Stanisław Kalinowski, in Brzuzewo, sheltered five Jews including Maik, his radio operator. In September 1943, Gendarmes from Tykocin surrounded the Waniewo farm of Władysław and Stanisława Krysiwicz, aid-givers to eight Sokoły ghetto fugitives. The Germans set fire to their house, shot dead the fugitives as they fled the blaze, and murdered the aid-givers.¹⁴

Denied shelter by local Poles, the hundreds of others who built forest bunkers suffered greater losses. As SS, SS auxiliaries, and Gendarmes embarked on sweeps of the region's forests in 1943, more than 100 were killed. Others were murdered by thieves or local farmers or denounced by Poles. Fewer than 20 Sokoły forest fugitives survived the war.¹⁵

After Sokoły's liberation on August 11, 1944, tragedy struck the survivors. On February 17, 1945, armed Poles from the AK, the anti-Communist underground, burst into a party and murdered 7 of the 24 Jewish survivors there. The dead included the engineer David Żółty, 4-year-old Tolka Żytawer, 12-year-old Jehoszua Litwak, and David Kruszewski, a survivor of the Majdanek and Auschwitz extermination camps.¹⁶

In 1949, Janeczko, the former commander of the Sokoły auxiliary police, was found not guilty of the murders of 25 to 30 Jews from the Mazury rest home and of Kruszewski.

SOURCES Published testimonies can be found in Moisheh Grosman, ed., Sefer zikaron li-kedoshe Sokoli (Tel Aviv, 1962), which has appeared in a Hebrew translation by its editor, Shemu'el Kalisher, ed., Sokoli ba-ma'avak le-bayim (Tel Aviv: Irgun yots'e Sokoli be-Yisrael, 1975). An almost complete English translation, from the Hebrew, is available at jewishgen.org. The one account not yet available there has been published in English translation as Avigdor Ben-Dov, ed., Deliverance: The Diary of Michael Maik. A True Story, trans. Laia Ben-Dov (Kedumim, Israel: Keterpress, 2004).

Valuable secondary accounts include the relevant entries in Avraham Wein, ed., Pinkas ha-kehillot. Encyclopaedia of Jewish Communities: Poland, vol. 4, Poland: Warsaw and Its Region (Jerusalem:

Yad Vashem, 1989), pp. 323–325; Arnon Rubin, The Rise and Fall of Jewish Communities in Poland and Their Relics Today, vol. 1, District Białystok (Tel Aviv: Tel Aviv University Press, 2006), pp. 177–179; and Andrzej Żbikowski, “Pogromy i mordy ludności żydowskiej w Łomżyńskim i na Białostocczyźnie latem 1941 roku w świetle relacji ocalałych Żydów i dokumentów sądowych,” in Paweł Machcewicz and Krzysztof Persak, eds., Wokół Jedwabnego (Warsaw: IPN-KŚZpNP, 2002), vol. 1, Studia, pp. 219–220. Also valuable are Janusz Gwardiak, “Żydzi w Sokołach. Z dziejów gminy żydowskiej,” in Michał Gnатовski, ed., Żydzi i stosunki polsko-żydowskie w regionie łomżyńskim w XIX i XX wieku (Łomża: Łomżyńskie Towarzystwo Naukowe im. Wagów, 2002), pp. 105–110; and Anna Pyżewska, “Tragedia w Sokołach—17 lutego 1945,” BIPN, no. 12 (2005): 76–80.

Documentation remains so sparse about the specific fate of the Nowogród Jewish community, which numbered 521 people in 1921, that some scholars believe none of its members survived the Holocaust. However, Luba Wróbel Goldberg (VHF, # 18687) fled from Nowogród after the Germans set it afire in June or July 1941. Unfortunately, the extant documentation makes it impossible to determine whether a ghetto subsequently was established in Nowogród.

Documentation pertaining to the Sokoły Jewish community during the Holocaust includes AŻIH (e.g., 301/390, 391, 977, 1263, 3155); FVA (# 186); IPN (e.g., SAB 233-233a, SOŁ 114, SWB 16, WSRW 216/53); IPN-Bi (e.g., 1/1158, S [19/69, 74/68, 75/68, 76/68, 77/67, 116/68, 224/68, 279/68, 296/69, 298/68, 311/68, 317/68, 323/68]); USHMM (e.g., RG-15.019M [IPN] [2/272, 46/131]; RG-50.120*0070; Acc.1995.A.839; RG-02.202); VHF (# 13078, 15557, 15747, 30390, 32394, 33349, 37463, 47869, 48616); and YVA.

Laura Crago

NOTES

1. Kalisher, Sokoli, p. 163 (Chaim Goldberg testimony); Maik, Deliverance, pp. 25–28.
2. VHF, # 18687, testimony of Luba (Wróbel) Goldberg; Maik, Deliverance, pp. 37–40, 75.
3. Maik, Deliverance, pp. 41–42, and IPN, SOŁ 114, cited by Żbikowski, “Pogromy,” pp. 219–220 (depositions, Jakub Plut and Wolf Gryczak), for Gendarmes; Klisher, Sefer zikaron li-kedoshe Sokoli, p. 164 (Goldberg), for SS.
4. Maik, Deliverance, p. 56.
5. Ibid., pp. 27, 32–35, 46–47, 50–56, 67–70.
6. Ibid., pp. 29–31, 43–46, 55–66, 80.
7. Ibid., pp. 70–75.
8. VHF, # 18687.
9. Kalisher, Sokoli, p. 165 (Goldberg); Maik, Deliverance, pp. 87–98.
10. Kalisher, Sokoli, pp. 208–209 (Issur Wondolowicz testimony).
11. Ibid., p. 224 (Yosef Rosenblum testimony).
12. VHF, # 30390, testimony of Saul Platt; Kalisher, Sokoli, p. 224, p. 185 (Goldberg), p. 148 (Avraham Kalifowitz testimony).
13. Kalisher, Sokoli, p. 185; USHMM, RG-02.202, testimony of Sara (Majzler) Lew; VHF, # 15557, 15747, 13078, testimonies of Esther (Wondolowicz) Goldman, Motłel Tservonits, and Mala Sonnabend.

14. In 1993, Yad Vashem recognized Władysław and Stanisława Krysiwicz as Righteous Among the Nations.

15. Klisher, Sokoli, pp. 178–179, 183, 186 (Kalifowitz), pp. 209–211 (Wondolowicz).

16. Jerzy Zieleniewski, Raporty wywiadu AK-AKO-WiN Obwodu Wysokie Mazowieckie w Okręgu Białystok, 1944–1947 (Białystok, 2001), 1:64; IPN, WSRW 216/53.

SOPOĆKINIE

Pre-1939: Sopoćkinie (Yiddish: Sopotkin), village, Białystok województwo, Poland; 1939–1941: Sopotskin, raion center, Belostok oblast', Belorussian SSR; 1941–1944: Sopotzkin, Kreis Grodno, Distrikt Białystok; post-1991: Sapotskin, Hrodna raen and voblasts', Republic of Belarus

Sopoćkinie lies 26 kilometers (about 16 miles) northwest of Grodno. On the eve of World War II, the Jewish population there may have numbered about 1,300 people.¹

Because of its location on the border between Soviet- and German-occupied Poland, Sopoćkinie was among the early localities attacked on June 22, 1941, the first day of the German invasion of the Soviet Union. Shortly after 2:00 A.M., shelling from German border guards set Sopoćkinie ablaze. At 9:00 A.M., regular German soldiers entered Sopoćkinie to leave behind a small military contingent to establish a civil administration. The members of the military administration immediately ordered the settlement's Jewish residents to return home. As they watched the settlement burn to the ground, the Germans also compelled the Jews to dig mass graves and to extricate and then bury the dead. Jews were the overwhelming number of the hundreds of fire victims.

Within the first week of occupying the settlement, the German soldiers asked local Poles, most likely the members of a newly appointed Polish auxiliary police force, to identify the Jews who had collaborated with the former Soviet administration. The Poles took a broad view of the order, in part because they had witnessed the Polish military incur significant losses from the Red Army just outside Sopoćkinie during the September 1939 campaign and believed that some young local Jewish Communists had abetted the Soviet seizure of Sopoćkinie.² They rounded up a large number of Jews, including the rabbi of Sopoćkinie and several other distinguished communal leaders. The Germans executed the Jews outside Sopoćkinie in an antitank ditch by the Augustów Canal.

Because of the fire devastation, the soldiers immediately established a ghetto for the surviving Jews. Since there were no habitable structures in Sopoćkinie, they located the ghetto in Teolin, a settlement located immediately to the west. The ghetto occupied a Roman Catholic convent school (for a time a Russian Orthodox monastery), one of the only four structures in Teolin. Others mention the ghetto was located in a meeting hall and cinema, likely because during the Soviet occupation the authorities had confiscated the property to use for this purpose. The ghetto was fenced, though the date the fence was erected is unknown.

The German military command also issued a number of anti-Jewish decrees. These required Jews throughout the Białystok Distrikt to wear yellow markings on their chests and backs, prohibited contact with Christians, and forbade Jews from leaving their places of residence. By late July, military authorities in Łomża also had ordered the Jews to establish a Jewish Council (Judenrat).

Material conditions in the Sopoćkinie ghetto were poor. Five or six families crowded into a single cell of the former convent. Sanitation facilities were inadequate. Although the Jews were brought daily from Teolin to Sopoćkinie to clear away the fire destruction, the ghetto lacked access to water and soap. Initially, the Germans provided the Jews no food. To procure sustenance, they snuck out of the ghetto at night to beg. The unsanitary conditions and poor diet, coupled with a contaminated source of water, led to an outbreak of cholera.

As rumors circulated that the Germans had prepared some antitank ditches outside the town for a mass execution, the Jews in the ghetto lived in fear and hopelessness.³ Moreover, some local Christians brought news of the executions, on November 3, 1941, of other nearby Lithuanian Jewish communities. The German Amtskommissar, most likely a man surnamed Beeskow, announced that because of the overcrowding, poor sanitation, and recent epidemic in the ghetto, the elderly and less able-bodied would be moved to a place with better conditions. When the transferees were not heard from again, the Jews presumed they had been murdered in the antitank ditches.

The Germans again reduced the size of the Sopoćkinie ghetto population in June 1942, this time conscripting for forced labor almost all of its remaining men. Taken to a labor camp in Starosielce, today a part of Białystok, Poland, the men worked on construction of a train depot and on extending and repairing rail lines. The Amtskommissar held back a few craftsmen to assist in the rebuilding of Sopoćkinie.

Sometime after the deportations, the Jews were relocated to another ghetto in Sopoćkinie. The new ghetto was composed of a few fire-damaged homes on pre-war Bolesław I Chrobry (the Brave or Valiant) Street, also known as Osoczniki Street. This ghetto, too, was surrounded by a barbed-wire fence. In addition to work on ongoing reconstruction projects, the Jews in this period also were hired by local Christians for agricultural labor. The Christians contracted for their work through the German labor office in Sopoćkinie.

On November 2, 1942, the Germans liquidated the Sopoćkinie ghetto. Beeskow informed the Jews that they were to be sent to the Ukraine for labor. He permitted them to bring with them only work clothes, one pair of shoes, and a small piece of hand luggage. After the Jews had gathered their belongings, the less able-bodied were ordered onto the wagons of local peasants. The remaining Jews were instructed to march behind the wagons. The Sopoćkinie Jews, about 537 people, were brought to the Kiełbasin transit camp, south of Grodno.⁴ They may have been the first Jews to arrive there, though other accounts suggest the Skidel community was there earlier. At Kiełbasin, the Sopoćkinie Jews were soon joined by Jews from about 22 other communities (about 22,000 to 28,000 people) in the Grodno and Sokółka regions also deported there between November 2 and 5. Housed in subterranean barracks, known as dugouts, for more than a month and a half, they lived in terrible conditions, with little food, subjected to the brutality of the camp's commandant, Karl Rinzler, and his staff. Many perished of diseases related to exposure, the poor diet, and inadequate sanitation.

However, the Sopoćkinie Jews were not among the communities deported from the transit camp to the region's extermination camps. They were still at Kiełbasin when, shortly after December 21, 1942, the Germans liquidated the camp and sent its remaining 2,000 to 3,500 Jewish inmates to the Grodno I ghetto.⁵ A few Sopoćkinie Jews escaped from the ghetto. Alter and Rachel Biblowicz, and their daughter Luba, for example, made their way home to Sopoćkinie. They survived the war sheltered by the Falczyk and Bykowski families in Kadysz-Hołówieńczyce and Nowosady villages.⁶

The remaining Sopoćkinie Jews in the Grodno I ghetto were deported to the Auschwitz extermination camp about a month later, during the Aktion of January 18–22, 1943. At least three Sopoćkinie Jews, for example, were on the Grodno ghetto transport that arrived at Auschwitz on January 20; others, including Masha Chalef and her stepmother, arrived there on January 24. From the second transport, the Germans held back Chalef and at least one other Sopoćkinie Jew, Jankiel Obalski, as prisoners of the concentration camp. Almost all the remaining Sopoćkinie Jews, including Chalef's stepmother, were gassed on their arrival at Auschwitz.⁷ The Sopoćkinie men at Starosielce are believed to have been sent, on November 19, 1942, to the Treblinka extermination camp.⁸ After the deportations, the German administration in Sopoćkinie sold off the remaining Jewish property there. It deposited 6,172.59 Reichsmark (RM) in proceeds into a trustee account of the Landratsamt in Grodno.⁹

SOURCES Several published and Internet-based works are useful: Alexander Manor (or Menchinsky), ed., Korot 'ayarah abah; megilat ha-sigšug ve-ha-burban shel kehillat Sopotkin (Tel Aviv: Irgun 'ole Sopotkin be-Yisrael, 1960), an English translation of which appears at Jewishgen, at www.jewishgen.org/yizkor/Sopotskin/Sopotskin.html#TOC-C6; Yitshak Yezhezki'eli, ed., Kol adam ve-zikhrone: 'Ayarah, peribatah ve-burbanah, hayeba, demuyoteha ve-tipusehah: Sopotkin nikra otab (Tel Aviv, 1964); and Parnas Hager, ed., Sopotskin: Toldot imuts 'ayarah abah (Kiryat Yam, Israel: Bet-ha-sefer ha-tikhon hamakif'a. sh. Rodman, 1973). A testimony by Judy (Kramlat) Goldman also appears in Alfred Neil Kramer, ed., The Kramer Family Tree, 3 pts. (Have de Grace, MD: Alfred Neil Kramer, 2008), pt. 2, pp. 1026–1034; see also www.kramerlaw.com/Sopockin.htm and his articles including "Sopockin: An Overview, pts. 1 & 2," Landsmen 9:4 (November 1999) and 10:1–2 (June 2000).

Valuable, too, is the Sopoćkinie entry in Avraham Wein, ed., Pinkas ha-kehillot. Encyclopaedia of Jewish Communities: Poland, vol. 4, Warsaw and Its Region (Jerusalem: Yad Vashem, 1989), pp. 320–323. An English translation, by Rachel Kapen (Ivashkovsky), is available on the Kramer Konnections Web site, at www.kramerlaw.com/Sopockin2.htm.

Documentary sources for the study of the Jewish community of Sopoćkinie under German occupation during World War II include GAGO (e.g., 1-1-54, pp. 37–38; 1-1-150, pp. 18, 33–34; 1-1-335, pp. 45, 80–82; and 1-1-365, pp. 37–38); GARF (e.g., 7021-86-40, pp. 4, 56, 58); NARB (845-1-8, p. 31); USHMM (RG-22.002M [GARF], e.g., reel 13, pp. 4, 56, 58; and RG-53.004M [GAGO], e.g., reel 1, 1-1-54, pp. 37–38, reel 2, 1-1-150, pp. 18, 33–34, and reel 4, 1-1-335, pp. 45, 80–82, and 1-1-365, pp. 10–14); VHF (# 3978); and YVA (e.g., O-16/5432 and O-3/3930). Some of the materials cited above have been published in Serge Klarsfeld, ed., Documents Concerning the Destruction of the Jews of Grodno 1941–1944, 6 vols. (New York: Beate Klarsfeld Foundation, 1985–1992), 6: 170, 210.

Laura Crago

NOTES

1. VHF, # 3978, testimony of Masha (Chalef) Markovitch.
2. IPN, S-6/02/Zk; and Marek Wierzbicki, Polacy i Żydzi w zaborze sowieckim (Warsaw: Stowarzyszenie Kulturalne Fronda, 2001), pp. 56, 91–92.
3. VHF, # 3978.
4. USHMM, RG-53.004M (GAGO), reel 1, 1-1-54, p. 38; also at GARF, 7021-86-40, p. 4.
5. Manor, Korot 'ayarah ahat, p. 119.
6. In 1978 Yad Vashem recognized two members of the Falczyk family and in 1990 five members of the Bykowski family as Righteous Among the Nations.
7. Stanisław Mączka, ed., Żydzi polscy w KL Auschwitz: wykazy imienne (Warsaw: ŻIH, 2004), pp. 155–157.
8. Mikhael-Meir Yezursky (or Jezierski), “In the Horrible Years,” in Yosef Kohen-Tsedek Sefer zikaron li-kehilt Ostrin, Sbts'uts'n, Vasilishki, Novidvor, Roz'ankah (Tel Aviv: Hotsa'ah nifredet shel Irgun yotse Ostrin be-Yisrael, 1966), pp. 357–361.
9. USHMM, RG-53.004M, reel 4, 1-1-335, pp. 80–82.

STAWISKI

Pre-1939: Stawiski (Yiddish: Stavisk), town, Szczuczyn powiat, Białystok województwo, Poland; 1939–1941: Stavishki, Kol'no raion, Belostok oblast', Belorussian SSR; 1941–1944: Stawiski, Kreis Lomscha, Distrikt Białystok; post-1998: Kolno powiat, województwo podlaskie, Poland

Stawiski lies 24.5 kilometers (15.2 miles) north-northeast of Łomża. On the eve of World War II, its population of 3,150 included 1,700 to 2,000 Jews.

A Wehrmacht unit from the 21st Infantry Division briefly occupied Stawiski for about three weeks in September 1939. The soldiers raped Jewish women and plundered Jewish stores. Ordered to supervise Jewish labor brigades, some local Poles humiliated the conscripted workers. A Stawiski priest blamed the Jews for the murder of some soldiers. In retaliation, the Germans executed several Jews, burned the small synagogue, or perhaps a Bet Midrash, and set part of Stawiski on fire.¹ The Germans deported a group of able-bodied male Jews (and Christians) to forced labor camps in East Prussia before turning over Stawiski to Soviet forces.

The Germans returned to Stawiski on June 27, 1941.² The Wehrmacht initially posted a Feldgendarmarie unit, composed of eight men, in Stawiski to maintain order. German authorities recruited an auxiliary Polish police force to assist the Feldgendarmarie.³ Its commander likely was Józef Wiczorek.⁴ The local recruits mostly had been released from People's Commissariat of Internal Affairs (NKVD) prisons as a result of the war. The Germans ordered the Jews to organize a Jewish Council (Judenrat). Its primary responsibility was to turn over valuables to the military authorities.

With the return of the Germans, violence against the Jews again reached a peak. The Germans, along with Polish collaborators, plundered and destroyed Jewish property, set the Jews to forced labor, and beat and often murdered them.

Beginning on August 17, 1941, the Germans executed almost the entire Stawiski Jewish community. The able-bodied, about 900 people, perished in an antitank ditch outside Mściwuje village, the execution site also of the women and children of the Kolno community and the Jewish residents of Mały Płock. Another approximately 700 Stawiski victims, mostly infants, the elderly, and the handicapped, were executed in the Płaszczatka (or Stawiski) Forest.⁵ Postwar Polish investigators initially held German Gendarmes assigned to the Stawiski and Kolno regions responsible for the execution of the Jewish communities there.⁶ Most Polish historians now believe the Stawiski executions were the work of an SS unit from the Płock (Schröttersburg) substation of the Zichenau Gestapo, under the command of SS-Obersturmführer Hermann Schaper.⁷

The Germans held back 60 Stawiski Jews from execution, for a remnant ghetto, likely established on the same day as the executions. The survivors included local medical personnel, a single representative of each skilled trade, and their families. Among the tradesmen were a tailor, a blacksmith, a wheelwright, and a locksmith.

Initially located near the synagogue, the ghetto was moved subsequently to the northern outskirts of Stawiski. The second ghetto was located on parts of Furmańska and Krzywe Koło Streets, behind the houses formerly inhabited by the Jeleniewicz (or Woliniewicz), Wilamowski, and Zalman Leibel families. It consisted of a few homes on about 4,000 square meters (almost 1 acre) of land. Though surrounded by a fence, the ghetto was not guarded from either side. After surviving Jews from Grabowo and other nearby villages were consolidated there, the ghetto population stood at about 105.⁸

Jews who had survived the mass execution in hiding were not permitted to reside in the Stawiski ghetto. After the war, local Polish authorities in Jedwabne claimed that about 100 Jews from Stawiski, presumably the fugitives, had been consolidated in the short-lived Jedwabne ghetto. However, no Stawiski survivors recall ever having been ordered to Jedwabne. Rather, they describe either seeking refuge in the ghetto in Łomża or hiding for many months, until the Germans permitted them to work as agricultural laborers for local Poles and to live on the farmsteads at which they labored.⁹

The Stawiski ghetto residents mostly provided labor to the Stawiski Gendarmerie (Order Police). Some cut wood for the Gendarmerie, and others cleared rubble from the town. Craftsmen at times worked for Poles in villages outside Stawiski. There, the Polish perpetrators of anti-Jewish violence threatened them. Wieczorek stoned three Jewish laborers to death in Skroda Mała village.¹⁰

On November 2, 1942, the Germans liquidated the Stawiski ghetto, driving its residents along with the Stawiski Jews who had lived outside the ghetto to a transit camp in Bogusze, a village located 4.8 kilometers (about 3 miles) north of Grajewo, near the railway station in Prostken, East Prussia). The Stawiski community joined about 5,000 to 9,000 Jews from nearby localities also expelled to the Bogusze transit camp. The Germans liquidated the transit camp in two deportations. In the first and largest, the SS drove about 2,500 to 5,000 inmates to the railway station on December 15–16, 1942, and sent them from there to the Treblinka extermination camp. During the second deportation, on January 3, 1943, about 2,000 inmates were sent to the Auschwitz extermination camp. Shortly after midnight, on January 7, about 1,489 Jews from the transport were gassed on arrival. Another 296 men and 215 women became concentration camp prisoners. The only Stawiski prisoner from the deportation believed to have survived the war is Rivka Jaffa (Yaffa).¹¹

As many as 50 Stawiski Jews had evaded the Prostken deportation, but most were found in subsequent German searches. On November 2, 1942, 2 Jews were shot by Gendarmes on Żródlowa Street immediately after the ghetto's liquidation. Fajwel Chonkowicz and his family, also ghetto escapees, were sheltered by Antoni Rydzewski, a farmer in Budy Stawiskie village, but in 1943, another Pole denounced their hiding places. Gendarmes shot dead the 11 Jews they discovered on the Rydzewski property, including the Chonkowiczs, and their Polish aid-giver. Another denunciation in August 1943 likely led Stawiski Gendarmes to burn down an abandoned school in Wysokie Małe village in which 5 to 10 Stawiski Jews were hiding. The Jews perished in the blaze.¹² In 1944, at least another 11 Jews, including 6 members of the Rozensztejn family, reportedly were murdered by local Poles in the Mały Płock gmina.¹³

There were no more than seven survivors among the fugitives. Herzl Cheslok, a former inmate of the Białystok ghetto, also is counted as a Stawiski survivor.

In 1947, criminal investigators examined allegations that Piotr Mrozicki, a local Pole, had participated in the murders, in July 1941, of the Całcki family and of another miller's family in Poryte village but decided to try Mrozicki instead for extricating four Jews from hiding places during the mass execution of the Stawiski community and turning three over to German authorities and murdering the fourth, a man named Goldberg. In 1948, Mrozicki received a four-year sentence.¹⁴

SOURCES Some of the archival sources below appear in Polish translation in Paweł Machcewicz and Krzysztof Persak, eds., Wokół Jedwabnego, 2 vols. (Warsaw: IPN-KŚZpNP, 2002), vol. 1, Studia, p. 470 (AŻIH, Ankiety, Jedwabne ghetto inquiry); vol. 2, Dokumenty, p. 145 (AAN, 303/III-7/1), pp. 242–243 (AŻIH, 301/1860), pp. 246–248 (AŻIH, 301/78), pp. 337–339 (AŻIH, 301/1858); and in the original Yiddish in George Garin et al., eds., Grayeve yisker bukh (New York: United Grayever Relief Committee, 1950), pp. 226–227 (AŻIH, 301/1860).

Published testimonies by Jewish survivors can be found in Yosef Rubin, ed., Stavisk: Sefer zikaron (Tel Aviv: Irgun yots'e Štavisk be-Yisrael, 1973). There also is a yizkor book for the Kolno Jewish community, Aizik Rembah and Benyamin Halevi, eds., Sefer zikaron le-kehillat Kolno (Tel Aviv: Irgun yots'e Kōlnah ve-Sifriyat-po'alim, 1971). English translations of both are available at jewishgen.org.

Useful secondary accounts include Avraham Wein, ed., Pinkas ha-kehillot. Encyclopaedia of Jewish Communities: Poland, vol. 4, Warsaw and Its Region (Jerusalem: Yad Vashem, 1986), pp. 325–330 (Stawiski), pp. 411–415 (Kolno). Its English-language counterpart, Arnon Rubin, The Rise and Fall of the Jewish Communities in Poland and Their Relics Today, vol. 1, District Białystok (Tel Aviv: Tel Aviv University Press, 2006), pp. 110–113 (Kolno), pp. 186–191 (Stawiski), includes translations of parts of the relevant entries from Andrzej Żbikowski, “Pogromy i mordy ludności żydowskiej w Łomżyńskim i na Białostocczyźnie latem 1941 roku w świetle relacji ocalałych Żydów i dokumentów sądowych,” in Machcewicz and Persak Wokół Jedwabnego, vol. 1, pp. 167–168 (Kolno), pp. 168–169 (Stawiski). Almost all the other contributions to the first volume of Wokół Jedwabnego include some discussion of the Stawiski and Kolno Jewish communities.

Archival documentation pertaining to the history of the Jewish communities of Stawiski and Kolno during the World War II German occupation includes AAN (303/III-7/1/7-8); AŻIH (i.e., Ankiety, 301 [78, 1858, 1860, 1997]); IPN (e.g., ASG, SOŁ 93); IPN-Bi (e.g., S [1/71, 99/68, 101/68, 25/67/1-2]); USHMM (RG-15.019M [IPN], 2/177-78, 2/187, 46/77); VHF (# 21241); and YVA (e.g., O-3/3714, M-11 [260, B-219]).

Laura Crago and Elżbieta Rojowska

NOTES

1. Rivka Zilbersztejn testimony and Chaim Wilamowski account, in Rubin, Stavisk, respectively, pp. 318–323, 301.

2. AŻIH, 301/1858, testimony of Fajgel Gołabek (or Golombek), in Machcewicz and Persak, Wokół Jedwabnego, 2:337–339.

3. BA-MA, M819, SF-02 (37615), p. 17 (Kommandostab Reichsführer-SS, Ic, Tätigkeitsbericht Nr. 4, July 7, 1941), cited in Machcewicz and Persak, Wokół Jedwabnego, 1:336–337.

4. Yehuda Chiwicho, in Rubin, Stavisk, p. 335, describes Wieczorek only as “the chief of the antisemites and the head of the ruffians of Stawiski.”

5. USHMM, RG-15.019M, reel 1, 2/177, pp. 1–2, 2/187, pp. 1–2. See also AAN, 303/III-7, vol. 1, pp. 7–8.

6. IPN-Bi, S-171.

7. Suspicions based in part on AŻIH, 301/78, testimony of Menachem Finkelsztejn, pp. 1–4.

8. USHMM, RG-15.019M, reel 14, 46/77, pp. 1–2.

9. Chiwicho and Fuks, in Rubin, Stavisk, respectively, pp. 336–338, 352–361.

10. AŻIH, 301/1858, in Machcewicz and Persak, Wokół Jedwabnego, 2:338.
11. Ibid., 2:339.
12. Ibid.; IPN-Bi, S-1/71, depositions, S. Borawski and J. Blusiewicz; Chiwicho, in Rubin, Stavisk, pp. 336–343.
13. AŻIH, 301/1858, in Machcewicz and Persak, Wokół Jedwabnego, 2:339; Fuks, in Rubin, Stavisk, pp. 353–362.
14. IPN, SOŁ 93, cited by Żbikowski, “Pogromy,” p. 169.

SUCHOWOLA

Pre-1939: Suchowola (Yiddish: Sukhovola), town, Sokółka powiat, Białystok województwo, Poland; 1939–1941: Sukhovoly, Sokolka raion, Belostok oblast, Belorussian SSR; 1941–1944: Suchowola, Kreis Sokolka, Distrikt Białystok; post-1998: Sokółka powiat, województwo podlaskie, Poland

Suchowola lies 58 kilometers (36 miles) north of Białystok. In 1931, its Jewish population stood at 1,521. During World War II, it first came under Soviet occupation shortly after September 17, 1939.

A Wehrmacht unit occupied Suchowola within days of the German invasion of the Soviet Union on June 22, 1941. A

Pre-war portrait of two children of Aaron Shmuel Shlachter. Both were murdered in Treblinka after being held in the Suchowola ghetto. USHMM WS #89919, COURTESY OF SARAH HOLSTEIN MASLOW military commandant's post (Ortskommandantur) controlled the town until mid-August, when a Gendarmerie post, commanded by Weiss, was established. Amtskommissar Hans Urban arrived in late August. An auxiliary police force was recruited likely from the Polish ranks of a 12-person Christian-Jewish civilian guard, appointed on June 23 by the Roman Catholic priest and the rabbi of Suchowola, Zvi Kalir, to police Suchowola after the evacuation of Soviet authorities. Its initial commander, Sieńko, was from Wólka (Suchowola gmina, Sokółka powiat). Józef Snarski, the first village administrator (sołtys), also was an auxiliary policeman. A tailor, Mikulski (or Miłkulski), was named mayor.¹

The SS and the Polish guardsmen engaged in anti-Jewish violence in Suchowola as many as three times in July 1941. (The number of occasions and the timing of events vary in the sources.) During the first visit, likely on Sunday, July 6, the SS men and the Polish guardsmen rounded up Communist sympathizers and drove the Jews to the market square. At the assembly, about 35 Jews, 30 Christians, and 2 Red Army soldiers were forced to run a gauntlet of SS and Polish collaborators armed with clubs and shovels. At least 5 Jews perished during the beatings.²

The SS returned to Suchowola on July 12, 1941, a day Jewish survivors remember as “Black Saturday.” At another assembly, the SS commander ordered the Polish collaborators, a group that perhaps included local villagers, to incarcerate most of the Jewish community in buildings across town. Jewish craftsmen were interned for several weeks until a ghetto was established.³ Other prisoners were subjected to violence. Young women, imprisoned in the synagogue, were raped and beaten by their Polish guards. Other guardsmen beat up Jewish religious leaders, including Kalir, interned in the Tarbut school. The SS made the prisoners collect and burn the community's religious texts. After the SS invited visiting German dignitaries and photographers to observe from a bridge, the Polish police drove a group of Bet Midrash prisoners into a pond. The police, joined by the SS, beat and drowned at least 12 Jews. They drove other prisoners, likely elderly business leaders, into a house and set it on fire. Policemen forced escapees back into the building. About 70 people perished in the blaze.⁴

The SS may have returned again to Suchowola on July 19 to organize and photograph additional violence, targeted at about 80 Jewish captives, reportedly former Komsomol members. The Polish police made the Jews hold a mock funeral for Soviet leader Josef Stalin. Whether a bribe of butter and eggs to the SS commander halted the procession before it reached the pond is unclear.⁵

A ghetto was established after the last July 1941 visit of the SS to Suchowola. Released from their makeshift prisons under armed guard, the craftsmen constructed a wooden fence around the ghetto, the shoemaker enclave on Janów Street. Its only gate was by the Kramer house. Once the fence was erected, German military authorities ordered the remaining captives released to move belongings there. Many prisoners discovered that their homes had been plundered.⁶ The initial ghetto population of around 2,000 included refugees from anti-Jewish violence and property destruction in Augustów, Jasionówka, and Dąbrowa Białostocka.

Conditions in the ghetto were poor. Although kehillah leaders had paid the military commander a substantial bribe to expand the ghetto to include a well, water was rationed. Four to five extended families lived in a single dwelling. Disputes between residents forced kehillah administrators to reorder residential arrangements, so that wealthier families lived together. Some Poles burned down a Jewish residence on Kasprowicz Street and blamed the arson on Jews seeking revenge for being confined to the ghetto. The Polish auxiliary police arrested the homeowner and his sister. Communal leaders distributed $25 bribes, including to the newly appointed Polish mayor, for the charges to be dropped and the prisoners released.⁷

At the end of August, Amtskommissar Urban, on his first day in Suchowola, ordered the establishment of a 12-member Jewish Council (Judenrat). Its chair was Symcha (or Simhah) Lazar. Urban immediately presented the Jewish Council a long list of household items he needed to furnish his house and gave the Judenrat two hours to provide them.⁸

From September 1941, regional authorities ordered expelled to the Suchowola ghetto a large part of the Jewish communities of the northern part of Kreis Sokolka, including 214 people from Sidra and 800 to 1,500 from Janów Sokółski. By December, Jewish refugees to Jasionówka had been deported there. In February 1942, the Judenrat learned of the impending arrival of another 500 to 1,000 people, including 130 from the Nowy Dwór (Nowy Dwór gmina, Sokółka powiat), 400 to 600 from Dąbrowa Białostocka, and additional expellees from Lipsk nad Biebrzą. The deportations ultimately swelled the Suchowola ghetto population to 5,100 to 7,000.

Because the deportations threatened to run dry the only well in the ghetto, the Judenrat appealed to the commander of a Wehrmacht engineering corps stationed in Suchowola to secure a pledge from Urban for a larger ghetto on a piece of land with greater access to water. Urban agreed at the end of February 1942 to establish a new ghetto opposite the Polish public school, on Kościelna and Szkolna Streets. He gave the Jews two weeks to build a 2-meter-high (6.6-foot-high) fence, topped with barbed wire, around the new ghetto and to construct watchtowers near its two gates. Urban reportedly extracted additional compensation for the relocation, confiscating on March 14 all Jewish-owned livestock and light industrial goods. The next day, the Sokolka Kreiskommissar, Landrat Amman, organized a gauntlet of German Gendarmes and Polish auxiliary policemen outside the ghetto entrance. He led and then photographed the German and Polish police beating and stripping the Jews of their belongings as they entered the ghetto.⁹

Because most had lost so many basic material possessions during the moves to the ghettos, the Suchowola Judenrat established a number of workshops to replace items such as tools and household crockery. It built a foundry and toolmaking forge for blacksmiths and established cooperative workshops for tailors and other craftsmen. The Judenrat received permission for traders and craftsmen to travel three times a week to nearby villages to solicit orders (at prices fixed by the Germans) for the finished goods produced in the ghetto workshops and to complete work for Christians. It secured permission to establish a dental clinic outside the ghetto for Christians. The Judenrat retained a part of the profits to cover its administrative costs.

Because the Polish police meticulously searched the approximately 300 residents returning daily from forced labor brigades and routinely meted out 25 lashes to those discovered smuggling as little as one egg, the Judenrat bribed Weiss, likely in February 1942, to replace the Polish auxiliary police commander with Władysław Szkudlarski, the son of a Suchowola shoemaker. Although a Black Saturday perpetrator, the Judenrat considered him less violent than his predecessor.¹⁰

To provide the 100-gram (3.5-ounce) daily bread ration, the Suchowola Judenrat opened a bakery. It ordered vegetable gardens planted on all available plots of land in the ghetto and organized a communal kitchen, to provide 500 daily meals to the most impoverished. It secured permission from Urban to purchase from the state dairy skim milk reserved for pigs. The milk was sold according to a ghetto diary for 9 pfennigs a liter (a quart), of which Urban received 2 pfennigs. With the arrival of the Nowy Dwór refugees in March 1942, bribes to German authorities secured a weekly release of Jews from the ghetto, late on Thursday afternoon market day, to shop.¹¹

The Judenrat worked to improve public health in the ghetto, particularly after Urban, in the spring of 1942, blamed a lice infestation in his house on the ghetto maids assigned to clean it and ordered all women conscripted for labor outside the ghetto shorn bald.¹² When a typhus epidemic erupted, the Judenrat decided not to tell Urban, because of fears he would deprive the community of important sources of revenue by forbidding Jewish traders and craftsmen from leaving the ghetto. Instead, it opened a medical clinic, hired two additional physicians to assist the only doctor, established a pharmacy to produce medicine, and mandated periodic bathing at a public bathhouse it opened. Though many died, the epidemic was controlled.¹³

After the Sokolka Kreiskommissar in the spring of 1942 appointed Gendarme Anton Lange as the Suchowola “ghetto commander,” the Judenrat discovered its authority undermined. When it refused an order to send 100 male conscripts to work on the Janów-to-Sokółka road construction project, Lange ordered an assembly at which the Gendarmes beat up about 30 people, as he randomly chose another 100 for the assignment. The Judenrat ultimately established a labor registry to meet more equitably German demands for 200 more laborers for road construction projects and another 100 for forestry labor. A relief committee supplemented the 100-gram bread rations of the conscripts and provided shoes and clothing to them. But bribes failed to secure an exchange of exhausted workers. Most Suchowola conscripts perished at the labor camps.¹⁴

Lange ordered the wooden synagogue to be burned along with the adjoining Bet Midrash and most houses in the old ghetto. He commanded ghetto laborers remove matzevot (gravestones) from the cemetery and demolish its stone wall to use for paving underlayment. He arbitrarily ordered houses in the new ghetto razed. He visited the ghetto inebriated to shoot randomly at Jews he found there. He replaced the Polish police commander with Aleksander Borowski. Under Borowski's watch, policeman Zygmunt Zieniuk shot Icchak Polak for craning his neck beyond the ghetto fence. The Judenrat closed all ghetto enterprises and organized an elaborate funeral procession to protest police violence.¹⁵

In the late summer of 1942, Mordecai Tenenbaum (or Tenenboim), the halutz (pioneer) underground head in the Białystok ghetto, had alerted the Suchowola community, through Tamara Sznajderman (also Tema Schneiderman), about the deportation of Jews to the Treblinka extermination camp. At the High Holidays (mid-September 1942), the community observed the days with prayer, aware that it likely was its last celebration.¹⁶

On November 1, 1942, an SS unit, led by a commander from Białystok, assumed control of the Suchowola ghetto, ordered it sealed, and organized local Gendarmes, the Polish auxiliary police, and civilian employees of the German administration to patrol its fence. On November 2, 700 to 1,000 Jews from Korycin, located 15 kilometers (9.3 miles) south of Suchowola, were driven to the ghetto.¹⁷ At 4:00 A.M., on November 5, the commander ordered the Jews, including about 2,280 Suchowola Jews, 1,720 expellees, and the Korycin community, loaded on several hundred horse-drawn carts. (The sick and elderly were shot later in Suchowola.) Just outside the town, the SS commanded adults to march on foot for the remaining 55 kilometers (34.2 miles) to a transit camp located in Kiełbasin, south of Grodno (now Hrodna).¹⁸

The Germans began sending the 23,000 to 28,000 Jews concentrated at Kiełbasin to the Auschwitz and Treblinka extermination camps on November 9, 1942, with the last transport leaving the Łosośna train station on December 20 or 21, 1942. The Germans expelled the Jews by community, with the Sidra and Korycin communities a part of a much larger transport, which arrived in Auschwitz on November 14. A Łunna survivor remembers the Janów Jews being sent, on December 5, along with his community, to Auschwitz, though most others note they were expelled to Treblinka. The Dąbrowa and Nowy Dwór Jews were sent in mid-December to Treblinka. The Suchowola Jews were still at Kiełbasin at the end of December, when the SS closed the camp and sent its remaining 2,000 to 3,500 inmates to the Grodno I ghetto. Entire Suchowola families perished there from diseases contracted at Kiełbasin. The survivors were deported to Auschwitz a month later, during the Grodno ghetto liquidation Aktion of January 18–22, 1943.¹⁹

Only a few Suchowola Jews fled the expulsion. Several families in Jatwież village, including Adolf and Hanna Kisło, sheltered Lazar and three other Suchowola Jews.

The communities of the Suchowola ghetto were not reconstituted. No Jews from Sidra are believed to have survived the war. The 23 Suchowola survivors, a figure that also includes those who spent the war in the Soviet interior, immigrated. They settled mainly in the United States, Mexico, and Israel.

After the war, 13 former auxiliary policemen from Suchowola were tried in Białystok for a number of war crimes. At the first trial, in October 1949, eight of the men were convicted of four main charges, including murdering Jews and Christians in July 1941 and guarding Jews confined to a ghetto. They initially received the stiffest sentences handed down at a collective Polish war crimes trial for collaboration. Four, including Snarski, received life sentences. Szkudlarski, Borowski, and two others received 15-year sentences. However, the supreme court overturned the verdicts, in April 1950, on a procedural issue. The case was undermined further in February 1951, when the state's main witness, former policeman Jan Wasilewski, was tried for drowning Jews in Suchowola in July 1941, and he retracted his previous testimony. Wasilewski and four others were acquitted. Among the latter was Zieniuk, tried for the murder of Polak. (Christian witnesses had claimed that Lange had shot Polak.) In spite of much documentation to suggest otherwise, the original eight defendants, tried again in June 1951, were found not guilty.

SOURCES Eyewitness testimonies are included in the Suchowola yizkor books, with the first, by survivor Simhah Lazar, Khurbn Sukhovolye; lezikorn fun a yidish shtetl tsvishn Bialystok un Grodne (Mexico: A Grupe Sukhovolier Landslayt in Meksike, 1947), available in an English translation, The Destruction of Suchowola (in Memory of a Jewish Town between Bialystok and Grodno) (Mexico: Drichanski Bros., 2000), and also at Jewishgen, at www.jewishgen.org/Yizkor/suchowola1/suchowola1.html; Hanah Pribulsky Steinberg et al., eds., Sefer Subovolab (Jerusalem: Entsiklopedyah shel galuyot, 1957); and Le-zekher kehilat Subovolab: Asor le-hantsabat ha-kehilah (Jaffa, Israel: Bet sefer Urim, 1982). The chronology of events presented in the entry, particularly for July 1941, is drawn from these accounts and from VHF testimonies cited below, in which Jewish survivors mention the SS several times visiting Suchowola.

During postwar criminal investigations into the auxiliary police in Suchowola, a Polish court, in June 1951, determined the events occurred on a single day, July 6, 1941. The trials and the various ways they were compromised are discussed by Andrzej Żbikowski, "Pogromy i mordy ludności żydowskiej w Łomżyńskim i na Białostocczyźnie latem 1941 roku w świetle relacji ocalałych Żydów i dokumentów sądowych," in Paweł Machcewicz and Krzysztof Persak, eds., Wokół Jedwabnego, vol. 1, Studia (Warsaw: IPN-KŚZpNP, 2002), pp. 194–200.

Documentation for the Jewish communities of Sidra and Nowy Dwór remains sparse; therefore it is difficult to ascertain whether ghettos were established in either place. Testimonies of Christian eyewitnesses, summarized by Sidra researcher Jerry Levit—in an April 26, 2006, entry on a travel blog, "Wandering Who?"—suggest that some Sidra Jews may have been held back from the Suchowola expulsions (www.jerrylevit.typepad.com/wandering_who/2006/04/return_to_stasz.html). In Nowy Dwór, German authorities retained about 120 Jewish craftsmen, holding them in the Bet Midrash, in what IPN investigators maintain was a labor camp but also may have been a remnant ghetto. The remaining Jews were deported in the spring of 1942 to the Suchowola and Grodno ghettos.

Also useful are the relevant entries in Shmuel Spector and Bracha Freundlich, eds., Pinkas ha-kehillot. Encyclopaedia of Jewish Communities: Poland, vol. 8, Vilna, Białystok, Nowogródek (Jerusalem: Yad Vashem, 2005), pp. 244–246 (Dąbrowa Białostocka), pp. 369–371 (Janów), pp. 444–445 (Nowy Dwór), pp. 464–468 (Suchowola), and pp. 489–490 (Sidra); and in Arnon Rubin, The Rise and Fall of Jewish Communities in Poland and Their Relics Today, vol. 1, District Białystok (Tel Aviv: Tel Aviv University Press, 2006), pp. 62–65 (Dąbrowa Białostocka), pp. 85–87 (Janów Sokółski), pp. 168–170 (Sidra), and pp. 191–197 (Suchowola).

Documentation pertaining to the Jewish communities of Suchowola, Sidra, Nowy Dwór, and Korycin during the World War II German occupation can be found in the following archives: AŻIH (e.g., 301/1143, 1251, and 1847); IPN (e.g., SAB 214 and SWB 31-37); IPN-Bi (e.g., old numeration, S-6/71 and S-80/67 [Nowy Dwór], S-13/82 [Sidra], S-271/68 [Suchowola], S-433/71 [Lipsk nad Biebrzą], and S-609/71 [Korycin]); USHMM (RG-15.019M [ASG], reel 14, 46/86); VHF (e.g., # 15809 and 18378); and YVA.

Laura Crago, Samuel Fishman, and Monika Tomkiewicz

NOTES

1. Compare Lazar, Destruction, pp. 6–7, 8–9; and IPN, SWB 31-38, in Żbikowski, “Pogromy,” pp. 195, 197–198 (Teofilski deposition).

2. Sarah Ivri-Tikotsky, “The Shoah,” in Steinberg et al., Sefer Subovolab, pp. 236–238; VHF, # 18378; and IPN, SWB 31-37 and SAB 214, in Żbikowski, “Pogromy,” pp. 194–200.

3. IPN, SWB 31-37, in Żbikowski, “Pogromy,” p. 196 (Marchel depositions).

4. Note differences in ages and places of incarceration between drowning and fire victims in Ivri-Tikotsky, “The Shoah,” pp. 236–238; Lazar, Destruction, pp. 4–5; “Suchowola,” in Spector and Freundlich, Pinkas ha-kehillot, 8:489–490; and depositions, cited in Żbikowski, “Pogromy,” pp. 194–200.

5. Note ambiguity in Lazar, Destruction, pp. 6–7.

6. Ibid., p. 12; Ivri-Tikotsky, “The Shoah,” p. 238; and Marchel depositions, in Żbikowski, “Pogromy,” p. 196.

7. Lazar, Destruction, pp. 8–9.

8. Ibid., pp. 9–10.

9. VHF, # 15809, testimony of Jeanette (Chena Fajenberg) Geldwert; Lazar, Destruction, pp. 15–16; and Lazar testimony, in Steinberg et al., Sefer Subovolab, p. 518. In May 1942, the Landrat organized a similar gauntlet for the arrival of the Nowy Dwór Jews.

10. Lazar, Destruction, pp. 13–14; and VHF, # 15809.

11. Lazar, Destruction, pp. 17–19.

12. VHF, # 15809.

13. Lazar, Destruction, p. 18.

14. Ibid., pp. 13–14; and VHF, # 15809.

15. Lazar, Destruction, pp. 14–17; and IPN, SWB 36 and SAB 214, in Żbikowski, “Pogromy,” respectively, p. 196, and pp. 199–200.

16. Masha Fisher-Bagner, “The Female ‘Contact’ in the Underground,” in Steinberg et al., Sefer Subovolab, pp. 252–254.

17. Lazar, Destruction, p. 19.

18. VHF, # 15809; Lazar, Destruction, pp. 18–20; and Ivri-Tikotsky, “The Shoah,” pp. 240–243.

19. Ivri-Tikotsky, “The Shoah,” pp. 242–243; and Lazar, Destruction, p. 25.

ŚWISŁOCZ

Pre-1939: Świsłocz (Yiddish: Sislevich), town, Wołkowysk powiat, Białystok województwo, Poland; 1939–1941: Svisloch', raion center, Belostok oblast', Belorussian SSR; 1941–1944: Świsłocz, Kreis Wołkowysk, Distrikt Białystok; post-1991: Svislach, raen center, Hrodna voblasts', Republic of Belarus

Świsłocz lies 38 kilometers (23.6 miles) west-southwest of Wołkowysk.

In World War II, Świsłocz first came under Soviet occupation. Between September 1939 and October 1940, the Jewish population in the Svisloch' raion increased—from 2,700 to 3,200 (5.9 to 7 percent)—as refugees from German-occupied Poland settled there. The Jews almost all lived in Świsłocz proper. Resettlement and nationality reclassifications in this period brought a decline in the number of Poles, from 12,900 to 4,700 (28.2 to 10 percent), and an increase in Belorussians, from 29,300 to 38,700 (64.1 to 84 percent, respectively, of the 45,700 and then 46,000 inhabitants of the raion).

The Germans occupied Świsłocz on June 26, 1941. Before they arrived, several Jews had fled to the Soviet interior.¹ The German military commander appointed a local civilian administration and an auxiliary police force. Both are presumed to have been composed of Poles.² In the fall of 1941, a German civilian administration replaced the local military command. It was headed by an Amtskommissar surnamed Odenbach. A Gendarmerie post also was established.

At the outset of the occupation, German soldiers executed many Świsłocz residents accused of collaborating with the former Soviet regime. The Germans are believed to have targeted mostly Jews, in retaliation for the Świsłocz community having sheltered the parents of Herschel Grynszpan, whose assassination of Ernst von Rath, on November 7, 1938, had served as the pretext for Kristallnacht. (The Grynszpans had fled to the Soviet Union, where they survived the war). Some Poles also narrowly interpreted the orders to round up Communist sympathizers because they held local Jewish Communists responsible for the murder of five Polish officials before the arrival of the Red Army and Jews, more generally, for assisting the People's Commissariat of Internal Affairs (NKVD) in deporting their co-nationals to the Soviet interior. Albin Horbin, the head of the Roman Catholic Church, sheltered several prominent Jews, including Alexander Bronowski, a lawyer and outspoken critic of Nazism.³

German soldiers in Świsłocz rounded up Jews for heavy, physical labor and plundered their property. The anti-Jewish persecution intensified with the arrival, on July 1, 1941, of a new military commander. The regional military command issued several anti-Jewish decrees, including June orders requiring Jews to wear a white armband with a blue Star of David. (The order was changed a few days later in Świsłocz to a circular, yellow patch.) Decrees forbade Jews from contact with the Christian population and required the formation of a Jewish Council (Judenrat). Schlechter, the Jewish school director, chaired the Świsłocz Judenrat.

In July 1941, the German authorities ordered a ghetto created in the old Jewish neighborhood, in the northwest of Świsłocz. Its southern border was across from the municipal gardens, at Warsaw Street. Parts of Grodno Street, including the Jewish houses south of the Russian Orthodox cemetery, formed its eastern interior boundary. The western border ran near the Świsłocz River. In the north, the ghetto included the homes just past the Minc tannery. The date the ghetto was fenced is unknown. On the day that the Jews reported there, they were required to surrender their horses and other livestock.

The German authorities consolidated in the Świsłocz ghetto the Jews from other communities, including about 100 people from Mścibów and five families from Michałki.

The Germans continued to demand various “contributions” of the ghetto inhabitants. They usually gave the Jewish Council two hours to secure the items before entering the ghetto to beat its members and to steal whatever they desired. The Amtkommissar likely ordered the Judenrat to establish workshops to tan hides and to produce finished leather goods. The Judenrat also organized a daily quota of conscripts for forced labor. In the spring of 1942, most of the men were ordered to a labor camp, east of Wołkowysk, to widen and pave the road from Wołkowysk to Baranowicze. When the German overseers of the project beat some of the Świsłocz laborers to death, the Judenrat bribed officials to ease conditions. Unfortunately, the officials intensified their violence periodically to extract additional contributions from the Judenrat. Suffering from exhaustion and typhus, many of the men perished after they were returned to the ghetto in October 1942.

On November 2, 1942, the ghetto was liquidated. The Jews were ordered to assemble at the market square for deportation to a labor camp. They were joined there by about 500 Jews from Jałówka. The SS officer in charge sent part of the assembled Jews, including 1,200 to 3,000 from Świsłocz, by train to the Wołkowysk transit camp. At least 8 Świsłocz Jews are known to have evaded the deportation or to have fled from the transit camp. The remaining Jews were executed in the Wiśnik Forest, just outside Świsłocz. In one version, the executions targeted about 300 of the old and sick. Other accounts note that the Germans held back for execution some 1,563 Jews, including the elderly, the sick, mothers and their children, and a small group of men, ordered to collect and bury the dead.⁴ After the executions, the Gendarmes executed 10 Christians for looting Jewish property in the ghetto.⁵

At the Wołkowysk transit camp, located on the grounds of the former garrison of the 7th Polish Cavalry Brigade, the Jews sent from Świsłocz joined about 15,000 to 19,000 people from other nearby Jewish communities imprisoned there on November 2–3, 1942. The Germans began expelling the inmates to the Treblinka extermination camp in late November. The Jałówka and Mścibów Jews were among the 3,000 to 5,000 people on the second Wołkowysk transport to Treblinka, which likely left on December 2. All but 60 to 70 men, held back as prisoners of the Treblinka labor camp, were gassed on arrival. The only survivor, Leib Aronzon, from Jałówka, fled to the Białystok ghetto after being left for dead near a mass grave outside the camp.⁶ The Świsłocz Jews were still in Wołkowysk when SS officials announced the deportation of all but 1,700 to 2,000 young, able-bodied inmates and medical personnel. About 200 Świsłocz Jews are believed to have surrendered to the Germans some hides and finished leather goods to remain in Wołkowysk. Several Jałówka-born Jews, perhaps residents of either Świsłocz or Wołkowysk, also secured dispensations. The remaining 4,000 to 6,000 Jews, including most of the Świsłocz community, were sent on two or three transports, likely between December 6 and 8, to the Treblinka extermination camp, where they all perished.⁷

On January 26, 1943, the 1,700 to 2,000 remaining Jews were deported to the Auschwitz extermination camp. Two days later, at Auschwitz II-Birkenau, the Germans gassed between 1,341 and 1,641 people from the transport and held back just 280 men and 79 women as prisoners of the concentration camp. It is impossible to determine from extant records how many of the original prisoners were from Świsłocz. Only 3 Świsłocz Jews are believed to have survived Auschwitz.⁸

About half of those known to have sought shelter closer to home also perished. Among the dead were brothers Hersz and Szmuel Lis. Cyna (or Tzeitl) Slapak, sheltered by a Pole, Wiktor Szerszenowicz, and four others, who joined the partisans, survived.

At two trials, in 1952 and 1953, in Białystok, Poland, Tadeusz Kłęk, a former Polish auxiliary policeman from Świsłocz, was found guilty of several wartime crimes, including escorting the Jews to the Wiśnik execution site. He received a death sentence, likely commuted to life in prison, and a six-year prison term.

SOURCES Alexander Bronowski, They Were Few (New York: Peter Lang, 1991), covers the first weeks of the German occupation in Świsłocz. The Svisloch ShtetLinks page, by Nancy Holden, at jewishgen.org, contains some unique sources, including correspondence with a local Christian describing the ghetto. Also useful are Hayim Rubin, ed., Kehilat Svislots, pelekħ grodna: Yizkor le-kehillat svislots (Tel Aviv: Hotsa’at ‘Ole Svislots be-Yisrael, 1961); and Yerahmi’el Lifshits, ed., Sefer Svislots 2: Mikbats te’udi, perakim nivharim, reshimat bate-av, ma’amarim, ‘eduyot, temunot u-mismakhim (Netanyah: Irgun yots’e Svislots be-Yisrael, 1984). Particularly strong for identifying the fates of Świsłocz prisoners of Auschwitz II-Birkenau is the memoir by the Wołkowysk native and Łysków survivor Izaak Goldberg, The Miracles versus Tyranny: The Fight for Life and Death between the Jewish People and the Nazis (New York: Philosophical Library, Inc., 1979).

The second Wołkowysk yizkor book, Moses Einhorn, ed., Volkovisker Yisker-Bukh (New York, 1949), includes two chapters by Abraham Ain; the first on the pre-World War I history of the Świsłocz Jewish community, is an abbreviated version of his landmark study “Swislocz: Portrait of a Jewish Community in Eastern Europe,” YIVO Annual of Jewish Social Science 4 (1949): 86–114; and the second is about its destruction. The abbreviated form of the first and the less familiar second chapter, “The Destruction of Svislucz,” appear in English translation in Sefer zikaron Volkovysk. The Volkovysk Memorial Book, trans. Jacob Solomon Berger (Mahwah, NJ: J.S. Berger, 2000), pp. 302–305. Świsłocz survivors’ understandings of the Judenrat form a part of the discussion of the first appendix in Isaiah Trunk, Judenrat: The Jewish Councils in Eastern Europe under Nazi Occupation (New York: Macmillan, 1972), pp. 584–585. Helpful, too, is the Świsłocz entry in Shmuel Spector and Bracha Freundlich, eds., Pinkas ha-kehillot. Encyclopaedia of Jewish Communities: Poland, vol. 8, Vilna, Białystok, Nowogródek (Jerusalem: Yad Vashem, 2005), pp. 460–465.

Archival documentation on the fate of the Świsłocz Jewish community in World War II, under the German occupation, includes AŻIH (211 [e.g., old numeration 6-7] and 301/5388); GARF (7021-86-46, pp. 24–30); IPN (i.e., SOB 4 and SWB 83); USHMM (e.g., RG-22.002M); YIVO (RG-336); and YVA (e.g., M-11/5).

Laura Crago and Alexander Kruglov

NOTES

1. VHF, # 1608, testimony of Emmanuel Goldberg.
2. Bykowski to Ruthberg, August 4, 1944, in English trans. on the Svisloch ShtetLinks page, at jewishgen.org.
3. Tadeusz Krahel, Doświadczeni zniewoleniem: Duchowni archidiecezji wileńskiej represjonowani w latach okupacji sowieckiej (1939–1945) (Białystok: Polskie Towarzystwo Historyczne, Oddział w Białymstoku, 2005), pp. 45–46, 209.
4. Compare AŻIH, 210/6-7, as cited by Szymon Datner, “Eksterminacja ludności żydowskiej w Okręgu Białostockim,” BŻIH, no. 60 (1966): tab. 8; with GARF, 7021-86-46, p. 5; and AŻIH, 301/5388, testimony of Szyja Rakowicki, pp. 1–2, noting 3,000 executed.
5. AŻIH, 301/5388, p. 3.
6. BLH, testimony of Leib Aronzon, in an English trans. on the Jałówka homepage of the www.avotaynu.com Web site.
7. Einhorn, Volkovisker Yisker-Bukh, pp. 914–923.
8. Stanisław Mączka, ed., Żydzi polscy w KL Auschwitz: wykazy imienne (Warsaw: ŻIH, 2004), pp. 162–163.

SZCZUCZYN (BIAŁOSTOCKI)

Pre-1939: Szczuczyn (Yiddish: Shutsutshin), town, powiat center, Białystok województwo, Poland; 1939–1941: Shchuchin, Graevo raion, Belostok oblast', Belorussian SSR; 1941–1944: Shchutschschin, Kreis Grajewo, Distrikt Białystok; post-1998: Szczuczyn, Grajewo powiat, województwo podlaskie, Poland

Szczuczyn lies on the Wissa River 75 kilometers (47 miles) northwest of Białystok and 15 kilometers (9.3 miles) southwest of Grajewo. Its 1939 population of 5,300 included 3,000 Jews.

Shortly after occupying Szczuczyn on September 8, 1939, the Germans deported 250 to 300 Jewish men to a labor camp in the Reich. Released in January 1940, almost four months after Szczuczyn came under Soviet occupation on September 27, 1939, the conscripts almost all perished at the border when German soldiers fired on them as they stepped off the train. About 30 returned to Szczuczyn.

On June 22, 1941, the Germans bombarded Szczuczyn, setting it afire and killing many people including a large number of Jews.¹ A Wehrmacht unit appeared briefly, on June 23. German authorities appointed a local blacksmith, Stanisław Peniuk, mayor. Kosmowski, a pre-war Szczuczyn postal worker, from Świdry-Awissa village, was named commander of an auxiliary police force.² An ongoing Polish Institute for National Memory (IPN) investigation has documented that from October 1940, Mieczysław Kosmowski (one of three brothers from the village, who may or may not have been the Kosmowski mentioned above) was a paid agent of the Security Police in Allenstein. He arrived with German forces, most likely to incite local Poles to anti-Jewish violence.³

On June 27–28, 1941, Kosmowski, his two brothers, and Peniuk organized a pogrom in which about 200 Poles plundered the houses of the richest Jewish families and brutally murdered 300 to 400 Jews.⁴ The local priest and Polish intellectuals refused to intervene in the violence. The arrival the next evening of 30 Wehrmacht soldiers enabled Jewish women to pay the unit commander soap and coffee to patrol Szczuczyn to end the collaborators’ attacks.

The Szczuczyn auxiliary police made forced labor obligatory for all adult Jews. Each household was required to send one to three laborers daily to the town square to tear out grass between its cobblestones. Policemen Wincenty Rung and Antoni Gardocki used canes and clubs to bludgeon the laborers.⁵

On Monday, July 14 or 28, 1941, Polish officials, acting on the command of an SS officer, mobilized almost every adult male Pole from the Szczuczyn area to participate in anti-Jewish violence.⁶ Polish youth, armed with clubs, drove the approximately 2,500 Jews outside Szczuczyn to the Jewish cemetery. As a Polish guard, led by Gardocki, held the Jews captive, other Poles joined the SS to plunder their houses and to set fire to the new Bet Midrash on Nowy Świat and Wąsosz Streets. The fire engulfed many Jewish homes. That evening, all but 100 men were released. The captives likely were held hostage pending receipt of a payment demanded by the Germans; 3 additional men were freed; the Polish police murdered 97 others.⁷

The Szczuczyn ghetto was established the following Friday, either July 18 or August 1, 1941. That day, after the Jews had been assembled at the market square, a small SS contingent arrived to give the local police instructions. Similarities between events surrounding the establishment of the ghettos in Szczuczyn and Augustów suggest the Germans were from an operational unit of the Tilsit State Police or from its subordinate, the Sudauen (in Polish, Suwałki) border command. Four auxiliary policemen rode on bicycles to nearby villages to order Jews there to Szczuczyn. They killed a Jewish farmer in Lipnik (Szczuczyn gmina and powiat) for refusing to accompany them.⁸ Other policemen searched houses in Szczuczyn and extricated Jews from hiding places, beating them severely. At the square, still other policemen ordered almost all the men and working-aged single women incarcerated in various outbuildings on the Biblowicz property. A large group of local Poles brought rolls of barbed wire and began constructing a fence for the ghetto.⁹ Upon its completion that evening, the Polish police marched the women and children at the square through the Biblowicz courtyard, into the ghetto.

The ghetto was located on Krzywa Street, near the Biblowicz home. It included a handful of Jewish houses, from the Lopian to the Orniasz family homes. Because its area encompassed several fields east of the Biblowicz property, abutting the Wissa River, it spanned an area of 20,000 square meters (almost 5 acres).

Almost all the men, about 600 people, remained imprisoned, guarded by local police and German soldiers. They were brought in small groups to the Jewish cemetery over the course of the next six days and executed by the Germans. The Jewish patients of the public hospital and 4 women captives also were among the murdered.¹⁰ Late that same week, about 40 to 80 female prisoners and some conscripts from the Szczuczyn ghetto were murdered by local Poles. In the most well-documented killing, about 20 Jewish women sent for agricultural labor to an estate in Bzury were brought to the Bećkowo (Boczowski) Forest by six Polish policemen and civilians, including Stanisław Zalewski. The men raped the women before bludgeoning them to death. The murders likely did not have German authorization.¹¹

About 100 male craftsmen and young teenagers were released to the Szczuczyn ghetto. Another 10 to 15 were spared from execution to form a 6-member Jewish Council (Judenrat) or to serve in its institutions. Jona Lewinowicz was appointed council chair. A 4-member Jewish police force included Izrael Goldfarb and Michał Kruszniański. Two physicians, Wertman and Gertz, oversaw a 2-person sanitation force and directed the local hospital. The anti-Jewish violence makes it difficult to ascertain the number of people confined to the ghetto. Survivors suggest the figure of 2,000, listed on the Polish Ankiety Sądów Grodzkich (ASG) documentation, overestimates the population by 1,400.¹² Survivor Basia Kacper notes that only 500 women and children resided in the ghetto, bringing its total population to around 600.

The local police continued to supervise the ghetto after a German civilian administration was established in Szczuczyn in late August. The new German authorities named Rung the “ghetto commander.” He and Dominik Gaszewski, another policeman, roused the inmates from their homes between 3:00 A.M. and 4:00 A.M. to form forced labor brigades. The conscripts, mostly 14- and 15-year-old boys, cleaned out and then razed the remains of the burned-out houses and dug antitank ditches in Niećkowo.

On Mondays and Thursdays, the Judenrat raised “contributions” for the German mayor, the Gendarmes, and the Polish police. To secure them, they ordered the Jewish Police to confiscate leather, cloth, silks, and other goods from ghetto inmates.

Conditions in the Szczuczyn ghetto were poor. About 25 to 50 people lived in a single apartment. Wood and peat were unobtainable to heat homes. Food was scarce. The two cows assigned to its residents did not produce enough milk for the children. Typhus and dysentery epidemics killed a quarter of its residents, particularly children. The mostly women inmates initially squabbled but ultimately banded together. They cut a hole in the ghetto fence, near the Wissa River, to sneak out at night to secure milk from local Poles and to remove wood from their former homes to use for heating fuel.¹³

The Szczuczyn ghetto was liquidated on November 2, 1942. Its residents were driven to a transit camp located 4.8 kilometers (about 3 miles) north of Grajewo, in Bogusze village, near the railway station in East Prussia, at Prostken. Several families who had evaded the deportation were rounded up, brought to Bogusze, and executed in front of the Szczuczyn Jews. On December 15, the SS deported 2,500 to 5,000 inmates of the Bogusze transit camp to the Treblinka extermination camp. The remaining inmates were sent to the Auschwitz extermination camp on a transport that arrived there on January 7. Because the documentation from Auschwitz does not show a single person from Szczuczyn as being held back as a concentration camp prisoner, the community likely was among those sent to Treblinka and gassed on arrival.

Less than 10 Szczuczyn Jews survived the war. Most did so by fleeing to the Białystok ghetto. Basia Kacper, an exception, was sheltered by a Christian in Grajewo. Also counted among the survivors is Sonia Denemark, who left Białystok on June 22, 1941, with a group of 50 Jewish strangers and walked for five months before finding refuge in Kislovodsk, Russia.¹⁴

At least 16 Poles were investigated after the war for a large number of war crimes, including murdering Jews in the summer of 1941. Of these, 14, including Peniuk, Rung, Gaszewski, and Zalewski, were prosecuted at six trials between 1946 and 1951.¹⁵ Zalewski, the only person found guilty, was sentenced to death.¹⁶

SOURCES Some of the archival materials listed below and other relevant documentation can be found in Polish translations in Paweł Machcewicz and Krzysztof Persak, eds., Wokół Jedwabnego, 2 vols. (Warsaw: IPN-KSzpNP, 2002), vol. 2, Dokumenty, pp. 340–342 (AŻIH, 301/1958), pp. 263–316 (excerpts, YVA below), and pp. 164–165 (221 Security Division Report). The Golding-Sojka letter, a part of the larger USHMM, RG-02.002*22, collection cited below, differs substantially from another letter by the same author, in George Garin, Hayman Blum, and Sol Fischbein, eds., Grajewo Memorial Book (New York: United Grayever Relief Committee, 1950), pp. 218–231. Though not directly touching on the ghetto, also important are the testimonies found in the Szczuczyn yizkor book Hurban kehillat Shetsotsin (Tel Aviv: Irgun yots’e Shetsotsin Ye-Kupat gemilut hasadim a. sh. kedoshe Shtsotshin be-Yisrael, 1954).

Szymon Datner relied on the below-cited AŻIH testimony of Basia Kacper to date the establishment of the Szczuczyn ghetto to July 20, 1941, and to name it the earliest ghetto created in Dystrykt Białystok, in “Eksterminacja ludności żydowskiej w Okręgu Białostockim,” BŻIH, no. 60 (1966): 13. Andrzej Żbikowski, in “Pogromy i mordy ludności żydowskiej w Łomżyńskim i na Białostocczyźnie latem 1941 roku w świetle relacji ocalałych Żydów i dokumentów sądowych,” in Machcewicz and Persak, Wokół Jedwabnego, vol. 1, Studia, pp. 172–180, imbues the Kacper testimony with additional weight in citing several depositions, including by eyewitness Józef Mroczkowski, from the below-mentioned IPN, SWB 53, in which the dates are nearly identical to Kacper’s. However, historians in Israel depend more on the Golding-Sojka testimony; as a result, their works note the Szczuczyn ghetto was established in early August, including in the Szczuczyn entries in Avraham Wein, ed., Pinkas ha-kehillot. Encyclopaedia of Jewish Communities: Poland, vol. 4, Warsaw and Its District (Jerusalem: Yad Vashem, 1989), pp. 445–448; and its English-language counterpart, Arnon Rubin, The Rise and Fall of Jewish Communities in Poland and Their Relics Today, vol. 1, District Białystok (Tel Aviv: Tel Aviv University Press, 2006), pp. 206–212. The August date falls more within the chronological parameters for other ghettos established in Kreis Grajewo, all of which appear to have been ordered created over a two-week period by members of a German operational unit that traveled from locality to locality.

English translations of the Kacper testimony and the Golding-Sojka letter, both from the Grajewo yizkor book, the Szczuczyn yizkor book, and the Pinkas ha-kehillot entry, have been made available by José Gutstein, at the Jews of Szczuczyn memorial Web site, www.szczuczyn.com/index.htm.

Archival documentation about the destruction of the Szczuczyn Jewish community includes AŻIH (e.g., 301/1958); IPN (e.g., ASG, SAB 134-35, SOE 22 [26, 84, 115], and SWB [53, 167]); IPN-Bi (e.g., 1 [1030, 1034, 1516]); USHMM (e.g., RG-02.002*22, RG-15.019M [IPN], 2/247, 46/120); and YVA (e.g., 03/3033-2636/255).

Laura Crago

NOTES

1. YVA, O-3/3033-2636/255, in Machcewicz and Persak, Wokół Jedwabnego, 2:277–278.
2. IPN, SOE 84, M. Zyskowski deposition, cited by Żbikowski, “Pogromy,” p. 174.
3. “Kosmowski pseudonim ‘Gienek,’” Nasz Dziennik, July 13, 2009.
4. BA-MA, RH 26-211/84, p. 1; and IPN, SOE 84, SWB 167, 53.
5. USHMM, RG-02.002*22, Golding-Sojka to Szymon [Kayman], August 30–31, 1945, p. 4.
6. IPN, SOE 84, 115, SAB 135, and SWB 53, particularly in the latter, the J. Zyskowski and J. Mroczkowski depositions, cited by Żbikowski, “Pogromy,” pp. 174–177.
7. High figure in USHMM, RG-02.002*22, pp. 4–5; and low figure and ransom in IPN, SAB 135, S. Bubrowski and J. Marcinkiewicz depositions, cited by Żbikowski, “Pogromy,” p. 177.
8. IPN, SAB 135.
9. USHMM, RG-02.002*22, p. 6.
10. Ibid., RG-15.019M (IPN), reel 1, 2/247, pp. 1–2.
11. IPN, SAB 134.
12. USHMM, RG-15.019M, reel 14, 46 /120, pp. 1–2.
13. Ibid., RG-02.002*22, pp. 7–9.
14. VHF, # 34379, testimony of Sonia Denemark-Kaufman.

15. IPN, SAB 135, SOE 26, 84, 115, SWB 53, 167.

16. Ibid., SAB 134.

TRZCIANNE

Pre-1939: Trzciannie (Yiddish: Trestiny), village, Białystok powiat and województwo, Poland; 1939–1941: Trostiany, Mon’ki raion, Belostok oblast’, Belorussian SSR; 1941–1944: Trzciannie, Kreis Białystok, Distrikt Białystok; post-1998: Mońki powiat, województwo podlaskie, Poland

Trzciannie lies 40 kilometers (35 miles) northwest of Białystok and almost 21 kilometers (13 miles) west-northwest of Knyszyn. Its 1921 Jewish population stood at 1,401, about 90 percent of the total population.

The Germans occupied Trzciannie on September 14, 1939, but soon evacuated it to make way for Soviet forces. As a Jewish delegation prepared to greet the Red Army, a Polish ublan (cavalry) detachment still engaged in military operations arrived outside of Trzciannie. The soldiers charged the delegation, headed by the rabbi, destroyed an arch erected to welcome the Soviet military, and then rode into Trzciannie to smash the windows on several Jewish stores. A unit commander threatened to burn Trzciannie to the ground and to murder the Jews to revenge uprisings against Polish authority in Grodno and Skidel. The violence and threats claimed the first Jewish war victim in Trzciannie, when the rabbi’s daughter died of a heart attack.

About a week after Germany invaded the USSR, a small German SS unit appeared in Trzciannie, most likely on June 28, 1941. According to a Jewish survivor, after Malecki, the local priest, informed its commander that Jews comprised the majority of the residents, he ordered his men to set Trzciannie on fire. Another survivor recalls that the commander issued the order because local Poles had denounced all of the Jews as Communists.¹ One historian believes the German unit may have been a part of Einsatzkommando 8. However, similar arsons in several localities in Distrikt Białystok, including in Dąbrowa Białostocka, Kuźnica Białostocka, and Sidra, may indicate that a small German operational group was tasked with burning down settlements with overwhelmingly Jewish populations.

The Germans enlisted the help of the Polish members of a civil guard, established by a local Polish schoolteacher after the Soviet evacuation, to chase Jews escaping the fire to the neighboring village of Zubole, about 1.25 kilometers (0.8 mile) west of Trzciannie. There, the Germans beat some of the young adults, forced them to dig their own graves, and buried them alive. The remaining Jews were held captive in a pit, near the mill. The Polish guard searched for and brought there Jews who had found refuge in several nearby villages, including Zucielec, about 1.2 kilometers (0.75 miles) northeast of Trzciannie.

The German unit, which departed Trzciannie either late in the evening or early the next day, left behind one person, described in most Jewish accounts as a 19-year-old soldier and in non-Jewish accounts as a 30-year-old SS officer.² Over the course of the next eight days, the German, assisted by the Polish guard members and other local collaborators, held the Jews captive, first at the pit and later at a barn, depriving them of food and water. The guard members forced some captives to “clean up” after the fire by dragging large boulders through Trzcianne under the force of heavy blows. Some died from the beatings. Another 500 to 800 prisoners were executed in small groups.³ Fiszal Kuszner and Meir Markowicz hold the young German solely responsible for the executions; another Jewish eyewitness notes the Polish collaborators shot a large number of the victims.⁴ In depositions taken during the postwar criminal investigation of some of the Polish collaborators, Christian eyewitnesses claimed the German soldier permitted the accused to shoot a small number of victims.

After the Jews were released, the Polish collaborators continued to organize nightly raids to attack and, in some instances, murder the surviving Jews.⁵ Exposed to nightly terror, most survivors fled to Knyszyn, Tykocin, or Suchowola or found refuge with sympathetic local Poles.

With the establishment of a Gendarmerie post in the early autumn of 1941, the Germans ordered all Jews back to Trzcianne and commanded them to reside in the few Jewish houses that the SS had left standing to establish a firebreak to protect the small Christian neighborhood. The houses in the open ghetto were barely habitable because Poles had looted and destroyed them while the Jews were being held prisoner and killed. At least one house had its front doors and windows pried off.

Although the ghetto was not enclosed with a fence, Jews were prohibited, under threat of death, from leaving Trzcianne. The Gendarmes assumed ultimate responsibility for enforcing the prohibitions on Jewish movement. Several Jews did risk leaving Trzcianne to search for family in other ghettos or to ask local Christians for milk or bread. They dressed as Polish peasants and traveled at night. Gendarmes shot at least one Jew found outside Trzcianne.⁶ Little is known of the forced labor obligations of the Jews. A young survivor notes only that they worked for the Germans.⁷

Because of the executions and mass flight of Jews from Trzcianne, it is difficult to estimate its Jewish population. Historians have suggested that 1,200 Jews resided there after June 1941. However, the estimate seems high in light of a survivor’s testimony, which notes that in October 1942 about 15 people lived in each of the handful of houses designated for Jews, making it more likely that the Trzcianne Jewish population stood at 150 to 200.⁸

On November 2, 1942, the Germans deported the Trzcianne Jews to a transit camp located in Bogusze, a war-devastated village located 4.8 kilometers (about 3 miles) north of Grajewo, near the railway station of Prostken, East Prussia. Forewarned by local Poles about the expulsion order, many Jews fled to prearranged hiding places. One eyewitness notes the Germans transported just 85 Trzcianne Jews to the transit camp.⁹

The Trzcianne Jews lived at the Bogusze transit camp for 3 to 10 weeks with about 5,000 to 9,000 Jews from other nearby localities. The Germans expelled the Jews from the camp in two separate deportations. In the first, on December 16, 1942, 3,000 to 5,000 camp inmates were removed to the Prostken railway station and most likely sent to the Treblinka extermination camp. (Accounts of the expulsion vary. One Trzcianne survivor recalls the SS executing the Jews outside of Bogusze after the train failed to arrive as scheduled.¹⁰ Another account, in the Grajewo yizkor book, maintains the SS murdered about 200 people on the way to Prostken.) In the second and final deportation, on January 3, 1943, the Germans sent the remaining 2,000 Bogusze inmates to the Auschwitz extermination camp. Upon arrival on January 7, at midnight, 1,489 of the passengers were gassed. Another 511—296 men and 215 women—became concentration camp inmates. Of the 5 women from Trzcianne taken prisoner at Auschwitz, Eva Kostre is believed to be the only one to have survived the war.

Less is known about the fates of the Jews hidden in bunkers around Trzcianne. Survivors from this second group include the family of Efraim and Rachela Rzotkiewicz (or Zutkovitz) and 6 of the 12 members of the Markowicz family (3 members of the Markowicz family died from illnesses in June 1944 in a bunker on the property of their Polish aid-givers; another 3 perished from illness two weeks after the Red Army liberated Trzcianne on August 12, 1944). The approximately 25 Trzcianne survivors emigrated from Poland, settling mainly in the United States and Israel.

After the war, nine Poles from in and around Trzcianne were tried at three trials, including for extricating Jews from hiding places in Zucielec and Zabule on June 28, 1941, driving them to the execution site, and murdering them. In 1950, five former civil guardsmen were found not guilty.¹¹ At the two trials, in 1967, of the remaining men, the former auxiliary policeman Bronisław Michniewicz (or Jan Cyrylewicz) was found guilty of murdering at least 12 people from Trzcianne during the war, including 7 Jews, some of whom he had extricated from hiding places after the liquidation of the ghetto. He was sentenced to death.¹²

SOURCES Several of the AŻIH testimonies cited below have appeared in Mariusz Nowik, Zagłada Żydów na ziemi łomżyńskiej (Warsaw: Dom Wydawniczy Bellona, 2004), pp. 6–7 (301/1264, excerpted Polish trans.); and in Polish translation in Paweł Machcewicz and Krzysztof Persak, eds., Wokół Jedwabnego, 2 vols. (Warsaw: IPN-KŚZpNP, 2002), vol. 2, Dokumenty, pp. 342–344 (301/150) and p. 345 (301/983), with the second publication including several testimonies invaluable to tracking the flight of Trzcianne survivors after the mass execution, including to Knyszyn, pp. 238–239 (301/3959), and Tykocin, p. 349 (301/1971). Information for Suchowola can be found in the below-cited VHF, # 43626. The testimony of Czesław Borowski, describing the attack on the Trzcianne Jewish community in September 1939, is quoted extensively by Tomasz Strzembosz, “Przemilczana kolaboracja,” Rzeczpospolita, January 27–28, 2001, available in an English translation in, among others, “Collaboration Passed over in Silence,” in Antony Polonsky and Joanna B. Michlic, eds., The Neighbors Respond: The Controversy over the Jedwabne Massacre in Poland (Princeton, NJ: Princeton University Press, 2004), pp. 233–234. As the title suggests, Strzembosz uses the example conversely. An online testimony by Pole Mieczysław Kirejczyk, recalling the executions and the subsequent German orders for the Jews to return to Trzcianne, is best searched by its title, “Wyszowate—mały fragment do wielkiej historii” (see www.historia.wyszowaty.pl).

Violence in July 1941 and the postwar trials for Trzcianne are discussed in Andrzej Żbikowski, “Pogromy i mordy ludności żydowskiej w Łomżyńskim i na Białostocczyźnie latem 1941 roku w świetle relacji ocalałych Żydów i dokumentów sądowych,” in Machcewicz and Persak Wokół Jedwabnego, vol. 1, Studia, pp. 211–212. Żbikowski suggests the German perpetrators may have been members of Einsatzkommando 8, in chapter 5 of U genezy Jedwabnego. Żydzi na kresach północno-wschodnich II Rzeczypospolitej, wrzesień 1939–lipiec 1941 (Warsaw: ŻIH, 2006), based on a trial of a unit member, mentioned by Ralf Ogorreck, Die Einsatzgruppen und die “Genesis der Endlösung” (Berlin: Metropol, 1996), p. 121 fn. 51, accused of participating in the execution of around 50 Jewish men in some locality along the unit’s march, between the 1941 German-Soviet border and Białystok. Szymon Datner, “Eksterminacja ludności żydowskiej w Okręgu Białostockim,” BŻIH, no. 60 (1966): tab. 2, remains important for its statistical and demographic information.

Documentation on the fate of the Trzcianne Jewish community under German occupation during World War II can be found in AŻIH (e.g., 301/150, 301/983, 301/1264, 301/2124); IPN (e.g., SAB 166, SWB 268-270a); IPN-Bi (1/1209 [Ko-266/88], 65/1720 [K-48/58], 258/4 [II Ds. 57/67], S [22/67, 36/72]); USHMM (e.g., RG-15.019M); VHF (e.g., # 43624); and YVA.

Laura Crago

NOTES

1. Compare AŻIH, 301/150, testimony of Fiszel Kuszner, p. 1; and VHF, # 43624, testimony of Eva Kostre (Gielczyńska).
2. AŻIH, 301/150, pp. 1–2.
3. With 500 victims listed at USHMM, RG-15.019M (IPN), reel 1, 2/ 92, pp. 1–2; and a “handful” of survivors, all escapees, in AŻIH, 301/2124, testimony of Fania Lipińska, pp. 1–7.
4. Compare AŻIH, 301/150, p. 1, and 301/983, testimony of Meir Markowicz, p. 1; with VHF, # 43624.
5. VHF, # 43624; and AŻIH, 301/1264, testimony of Gołda Żutkiewicz, pp. 1–8, in Nowik, Zagłada Żydów, p. 61.
6. VHF, # 43624.
7. AŻIH, 301/983, p. 1.
8. VHF, # 43624.
9. Ibid.
10. Ibid.
11. See IPN, SAB 166, SOB 328, and SWB 102.
12. See ibid., SWB 268-270a; and IPN-Bi, 65/1720.

WASILKÓW

Pre-1939: Wasilków, town, Białystok województwo, Poland; 1939–1941: Vasil’kov, Belostok raion and oblast’, Belorussian SSR; 1941–1944: Wasilkow, Kreis Białystok, Distrikt Białystok; post-1998: Wasilków, województwo podlaskie, Poland

Wasilków is located 8 kilometers (5 miles) northwest of Białystok in Poland. In 1921, the Jewish population was 950. The Jews resided mostly around the market area in the northern part of the town and along Białystok Street. In September 1939, the Jewish population was probably around 950 people out of a total population of some 5,000.

On September 1, 1939, Wasilków witnessed the massive flight of civilians along Białystok Street ahead of the advancing German forces. Amid the uncertainty of the first days of war, including massive looting of abandoned military warehouses, the Polish army unit in the town encouraged local residents to resist the Germans with homemade bombs. These plans came to nothing as the Polish forces hastily fled once the Germans approached. In the ensuing brief interregnum, a committee representing both Polish and Jewish residents maintained order, wearing white armbands to demonstrate their neutrality. Soon after entering Wasilków, German security forces locked up a number of Jews in the Russian Orthodox Church, with no food or water. Rabbi Israel Halperin’s petition for their release was rejected, but the Russian Orthodox priest, who objected to their being held in a place of worship, successfully obtained their release. After five days of looting by the Wehrmacht, not only of private homes and businesses but also of the town’s textile factories, the Germans departed, leaving the town in Soviet hands.¹

When the Soviets established control over eastern Poland, Wasilków was rapidly “Sovietized,” involving the nationalization of all private enterprises and the establishment of co-operatives in place of small craft shops. Soviet party officials from Minsk exerted heavy-handed control, persecuting class enemies (i.e., nationalists, officers, wealthy entrepreneurs, and their families) and deporting them into the heartland territories of the Soviet Union. The impact of the Soviet occupation on the Jewish population of Wasilków was ambiguous: on the one hand, many Jews suffered from the policy of economic nationalization alongside the Poles. On the other hand, the Soviets were successful, if not in eliminating antisemitism altogether then at least in making it less publicly visible.

Following the news of the German invasion on June 22, 1941, Wasilków witnessed another mass evacuation, this time by the Soviet army, which fled to the east along with many civilian refugees from the border areas. The Germans entered Wasilków on June 27, 1941, and the attacks on Jews commenced shortly afterwards. The German administration recruited local Polish residents into an auxiliary police force. As the Wehrmacht moved eastward with the offensive, only a small German garrison stayed behind, consisting, according to one testimony, of only six elderly Germans.² As the Germans relaxed their grip on the town, if only temporarily, the local mob felt emboldened to launch a series of pogroms against the Jews, plundering houses and attacking their owners, leaving many killed and wounded behind (17 dead on the night of the first pogrom alone).³ Witnesses recall a certain Feliks Zawadski who led the gang that terrorized Jewish homes around Yakimer Street.⁴ During another less spontaneous and better organized attack, the crowd gathered after Sunday Mass and was fired up by a young priest who shouted, “Death to the Christ killers!”⁵ Poles armed with sticks and clubs studded with nails chased Jews out of their houses along Białystocka Street and down to the bridge over the Supraśl River, in which they wanted to drown all the Jews. On this occasion the Jews were saved by the intervention of the Germans, who chased the crowd away, sensing that the anarchy of a pogrom would undermine their authority. The entire event was filmed for propaganda purposes to record how “orderly Germans stopped the barbaric and violent Poles.”

Sources differ on when the ghetto was set up and whether it was enclosed by a fence. According to the historian Przemysław Czyżewski, the Germans established a ghetto in Wasilków in August 1941 between Rynek, Białostok, and Wojtachowska Streets. It was surrounded by a wooden fence with barbed wire. It held up to 1,200 Jews, not only from Wasilków but also from Czarna Wieś Kościelna, Choroszcz, Łomża, and Warsaw.⁶ The Wasilkower Memorial Book, however, dates the creation of the ghetto about six months into the German occupation. The Jews were concentrated into 38 houses in the area adjacent to the synagogues, and some had to live in the main synagogue itself due to the overcrowding. A typical Jewish home in the ghetto, consisting of only one or two rooms and a kitchen, had to house between 20 and 40 people. Jews had to wear yellow stars or patches, but some did so only on leaving the ghetto for work or to do business in town. The ghetto was administered internally by Pesach Abramov and David Weiss. At the beginning, the Germans permitted the Jews to leave the ghetto to buy or barter food from Polish peasants; later it was forbidden. The situation was particularly grim for the older and poorer inhabitants of the ghetto, who had no valuables they could exchange for food, but Abramov tried to ensure that they still received something.⁷

Under the supervision of the Polish police, the residents of the ghetto were made to perform forced labor in the peat bogs and at the local stone quarry; they also worked on repairing roads, loading timber in the shunting yards, and loading trains with other plundered goods for the Germans. Random terror was practiced, with some Jews killed at the whim of the police chief or even by local residents. Jews who escaped from the ghetto either before or during its liquidation encountered difficulties surviving in the surrounding countryside. In addition to German searches and denunciations by local peasants, most groups of the Polish Home Army (AK) operating in the region did not allow them to join, chasing them away or even killing them.

The SS carried out a large massacre of the Jews before the liquidation of the ghetto, assisted by the local police. One night they brought a group of Jews, randomly assembled from various places, to the yard of Trillings Textile Factory and killed them all. Several dozen other people (including two local Poles) were murdered elsewhere in town. According to official postwar Polish statistics, the number of people murdered was at least 39, including 15 children.⁸

On the eve of November 2, 1942, German security forces surrounded the ghetto. Abramov announced to the Jews that they would be transferred to a labor camp and that they could take only their most essential belongings with them. Although Abramov himself was offered the possibility of avoiding deportation, he refused, choosing to share the fate of his community. The next morning more than 1,000 inmates of the ghetto were loaded onto peasant horse carts and taken first to a transit camp some 10 kilometers (6 miles) away, near the city of Białystok. Almost all the ghettos of the surrounding area were cleared simultaneously at this time. The Wasilków ghetto inmates were transferred to the military barracks of the Polish 10th Cavalry Regiment. With no food supplies and in appalling hygienic conditions, the Jews had to spend from 7 to 15 days waiting for the train transport that would take them to the Treblinka extermination camp. Many died of starvation and exposure in the transit camp. The Wasilkower Jews were sent off to the extermination camp at Treblinka on November 19, 1942, and were all gassed on their arrival.⁹ Of the entire Jewish community of Wasilków, only a few people survived the Holocaust.

Several men were tried after the war by Polish courts for crimes committed in and around Wasilków during the Nazi occupation, including participation in the arrest and murder of Jews.¹⁰

SOURCES The two main published sources on the fate of the Jews of Wasilków during the Holocaust are Leon Mendelewicz, The Wasilkower Memorial Book: Memories of Our Town Wasilkow, Which Has Been Annihilated by the Nazis, trans. Mark Langsam and Bene Gothajner (Melbourne, 1990); and Michel Mielnicki, Białystok to Birkenau: The Holocaust Journey of Michel Mielnicki, ed. John Munro (Vancouver: Ronsdale Press, 2000).

Archival documentation can be found in the following locations: AŻIH (301/1266); IPN (SAB 177, SOB 337); IPN-Bi (e.g., S-506/71, Ds 83/68, S-84/68); and YVA.

Ksenia Krimer

NOTES

1. Mendelewicz, The Wasilkower Memorial Book, pp. 90–92.
2. AŻIH, 301/1266, testimony of Mendel (Michel) Mielnicki, November 9, 1945; Mendelewicz, The Wasilkower Memorial Book, pp. 108–114.
3. Mielnicki, Białystok to Birkenau, p. 103.
4. Mendelewicz, The Wasilkower Memorial Book, p. 99.
5. Mielnicki, Białystok to Birkenau, p. 104.
6. See http://wasilkow.polska.pl/miastodawniej/article_Podczas_II_wojny_swiatowej,id,307808.htm.
7. Mendelewicz, The Wasilkower Memorial Book, pp. 97–100.
8. Ibid., p. 100.
9. The Wasilkower Memorial Book claims that the Jews spent a week in the military camp, while according to the date of deportation to Treblinka mentioned in other sources, the stay in the camp was probably longer. Yitzhak Arad, Belzec, Sobibor, Treblinka: The Operation Reinhard Death Camps (Bloomington: Indiana University Press, 1987), p. 396, gives the figure of 1,180 Jews from Wasilków deported to Treblinka from the Białystok transit camp between November 10 and December 15, 1942.

10. See, for example, IPN, SAB 177, SOB 337; and IPN-Bi, Ds 83/68.

WOŁKOWYSK

Pre-1939: Wołkowysk (Yiddish: Volkovisk), town and powiat center, Białystok województwo, Poland; 1939–1941: Volkovysk, raion center, Grodno oblast', Belorussian SSR; 1941–1944: Wołkowysk, Kreis Wołkowysk, Distrikt Białystok; post-1991: Vaukavysk, Vaukavysk raen center, Hrodna voblasts', Republic of Belarus

Wołkowysk lies 94 kilometers (58.4 miles) east of Białystok. In January 1939, its population of 17,254 included 8,627 Roman Catholics, 6,901 Jews, 1,208 Russian Orthodox followers, and 518 of other faiths. During World War II, after the area came under Soviet occupation on September 20, about 3,000 Jewish refugees from German-occupied Poland settled there. Prior to Germany's invasion of the USSR on June 22, 1941, 9,000 to 10,000 Jews lived in Wołkowysk.

Between June 23 and 27, 1941, Luftwaffe bombardment destroyed 75 percent of Wołkowysk, including almost all of its central and southern Jewish neighborhoods. About 1,000 to 1,500 people, mostly Jews, were killed. Several hundred Jews fled elsewhere, including to Grodno, Konstantynowo, Łysków, Różana, and Świsłocz, in Distrikt Białystok; and to Lida, Słonim, and Zdzięcioł, in Generalkommissariat Weissruthenien.

After occupying Wołkowysk on June 28, 1941, Wehrmacht soldiers robbed and humiliated Jews. Provocations by local Poles led the SS, likely members of Einsatzkommando 8, a detachment of Einsatzgruppe B, to execute, on July 3, several dozen Jews for communism. In mid-July, another SS unit executed about 200 Jews, mostly from the professional and business elite and the physically and mentally handicapped.¹

The German military administration issued a series of anti-Jewish decrees, including prohibitions on leaving Wołkowysk and mandates to wear yellow patches on the chest and back. In early July, an SS commander, likely the head of the Einsatzkommando 8 detachment, appointed Icchak Weinberg, the public hospital medical director, chair of a 12-person Jewish Council (Judenrat). Noach Fuchs was the vice chair. Weinberg's closest council associate was pediatrician Jakub Siedlicki. A Jewish police force was established. Its first commander was Kantow (Kantof). Galatz (or Glat), a Soviet-era refugee from pre-war southern Poland, succeeded him.

From July 1941, refugees fleeing anti-Jewish violence in Generalkommissariat Weissruthenien arrived in Wołkowysk, including from Kosów Poleski, Słonim, and Dereczyn. Their numbers were significant enough for the Judenrat to establish a committee to assist them. They brought the Jewish population to around 7,000.

Whether a ghetto was established in Wołkowysk remains debated. The majority of survivors note the city's physical destruction made it impossible for the Germans to concentrate the Jews into a ghetto or to establish a single Jewish quarter. However, another survivor mentions that the war devastation resulted in a ghetto emerging "naturally," as thousands of homeless Jews moved in with those whose residences remained intact.²

Upon arriving in Wołkowysk in the fall of 1941, German civil authorities formalized the concentration of the Jews into an open ghetto. Labor officials ordered brigades of Jewish labor conscripts to raze war-devastated Jewish dwellings. Women scraped salvaged bricks of mortar. German municipal officials confiscated the building materials, auctioning some of them to local Christians. It is unknown if the confiscations resulted from a separate decree or were a part of another group of decrees issued by Wołkowysk Kreiskommissar Landrat Pfeifer in the early spring of 1942 that expropriated all Jewish-owned land and structures.³

The expropriations combined with orders forbidding Jews from living in houses owned by Christians or together with Christians maintained the Jewish community's concentration on a few streets in three areas of Wołkowysk. In town, the Jews lived mostly along the northern part of Nowa Street, the location also of the Judenrat headquarters, and on the less-devastated part of Tatarska and Chołodowski Streets. In the southern Za Mostem neighborhood, they were concentrated on Kolejowa Street. The less-destroyed eastern Karczyczna district, a pre-war Jewish neighborhood, was the third residential area. Because of the housing shortage, a Judenrat committee assigned living space, with 5 to 10 families crowded into each residence. The German administration required the Jews to install yellow signs above the doors of their houses.⁴

Questions about the existence of a ghetto nonetheless remain because survivors disagree over the degree of compulsion used to bind the Jewish community to Wołkowysk. Refugees from Generalkommissariat Weissruthenien, in particular, note that because Wołkowysk belonged to Distrikt Białystok, which the Germans treated as a part of the Reich, municipal authorities did not impose the death penalty on Jews found violating German decrees; instead, they issued monetary fines, corporal punishment, and short-term prison sentences. The wide-scale corruption of local officials, including Winter, the German mayor, and the auxiliary police, also established formal bribery channels, giving refugees the impression that the Wołkowysk community enjoyed greater freedoms, including occasional travel to Białystok, than its members officially were permitted.⁵

However, survivors in Wołkowysk from the outset of the German occupation describe the auxiliary police daily patrolling the streets of Jewish neighborhoods and raiding houses to conduct searches for violations of the anti-Jewish decrees. They note that Jews found illegally outside Wołkowysk or failing to report for work were subject to the death penalty and mention that the commander of the Gendarmerie routinely resolved the problem of prison overcrowding by ordering its Jewish inmates executed.⁶

The Wołkowysk Jews were conscripted by the German municipal administration and the Wehrmacht, including the German Red Cross (DRK), for demolition and construction projects. In the spring of 1942, hundreds of Jewish conscripts began construction of a DRK rest-and-relaxation facility for Wehrmacht soldiers in Pietraszowce, just southwest of Wołkowysk. So great was the demand for Jewish labor that a group of 200 to 360 women conscripts were brought from the Białystok ghetto in September 1942 to harvest potatoes to permit Jewish construction crews to continue working uninterrupted. Because the Germans only sometimes compensated forced labor, the Jews illicitly bartered coins and jewelry to secure the sustenance to survive.⁷ Some Jews, including Zvi Roitman and Weinberg, the Judenrat chair, established contact with a group of Soviet partisans, respectively, repairing a radio and treating a wounded partisan.

In the late summer of 1942, the SS arrested all 15 of Wołkowysk's physicians, dentists, pharmacists, radio technicians, and an engineer on suspicion of aiding the partisans. Under pressure from German employers deprived of skilled workers and a Christian populace without dental care, the SS released the 3 radio technicians and 2 women dentists.⁸ After the Jewish community paid a bribe, the SS commander agreed to free the remaining prisoners but executed them instead on October 14, 1942. Physicians and engineers from the Białystok ghetto were ordered to Wołkowysk to fill the positions of those executed.

The Germans liquidated the Wołkowysk ghetto on November 2, 1942. Fuchs, the new Judenrat chair, walked through the downtown Jewish quarter, ordering its residents to assemble by noon outside the pre-war cavalry garrison. An SS commander explained that a closed ghetto was to be established there for the Wołkowysk Jews.⁹ Some people resisted the expulsion orders. At least 7 were shot dead for breaking through the cordon of guards; another 16 subsequently discovered hiding in bunkers met the same fate, as did a group of elderly too feeble to walk to the garrison.

In reality, the ghetto was a transit camp in which the SS concentrated all the approximately 20,000 Jews of Kreis Wolkowysk to facilitate their deportation to the Treblinka death camp. For the first three weeks, the Wołkowysk Jews lived in the same deplorable conditions as the other inmates, on starvation rations, crowded into underground bunkers, subjected to the strict orders of the camp commander, Lieutenant Tsirka (or Zirka), and his men. At least 300 of the thousands of Wołkowysk inmates who contracted typhus from the unsanitary conditions died. Communal leader Shlomo Gallin was badly beaten and then executed by Tsirka for purchasing gasoline from a Christian acquaintance to light a fire in the communal kitchen.

However, pressure exerted for the return to work of 2,000 inmates from Wołkowysk and another 300 from Świsłocz led the SS to exclude the two communities from the initial deportations to Treblinka, between November 29 and December 10, 1942. Appeals and bribes by Fuchs to German labor officials at the DRK facility to establish a closed ghetto for the remaining Jews were partly successful. On December 20, Wehrmacht officials announced they would transform a part of the transit camp into a closed ghetto for 1,700 to 2,000 Jews, under 50 years of age. They further limited residence in the ghetto to specific categories of "essential" male workers whose labor was required to complete unfinished construction projects. These included Wehrmacht and DRK employees, certain municipal workers, those with professions and trades underrepresented in the Christian population, and 250 Świsłocz railway laborers. The Judenrat negotiated successfully to include 100 women within the quota.¹⁰ Those assigned to the remnant ghetto were ordered to reside in a separate block fenced off from the rest of the camp.

The remaining Wołkowysk Jews, approximately 4,600 to 5,250 people, including almost all of the community's women and children (a handful of the latter were smuggled into the ghetto), were sent along with all but 250 to 300 Świsłocz Jews to the Treblinka extermination camp in several transports at the end of December 1942. After the Jewish physicians at the medical clinic, relocated to the area designated for the ghetto, refused to euthanize 80 people, mostly elderly and young children left behind from the transports, they met the same fate as the Jews sent earlier to Treblinka.¹¹ The SS gassed them to death, though with the sulfur it used to delouse vacated bunkers.

A relatively large number of Wołkowysk Jews evaded the deportations. At the end of November, Ephraim Barash, the head of the Białystok Judenrat, arranged to transfer approximately 500 Wołkowysk inmates to his ghetto, including the 200 to 360 women laborers. The Białystok underground also may have organized the escape of about 27 pre-war Polish military officers and soldiers with the weapons experience necessary to plan the ghetto insurrection there, though the transfers may also have involved a German owner of a plumbing company in Białystok—or perhaps the latter also organized similar transfers for several dozen Wołkowysk Jews. For a 1,000 Reichsmark (RM) fare, Gendarmes from Białystok ferried to the ghetto there at least two more truckloads of Wołkowysk inmates. Other escapees fled to the local forests. Among them were several women who cut their hair and dressed in men's clothing to disguise themselves as male laborers, the only inmates, aside from a female dentist, permitted to leave the camp.

On January 26, 1943, the Germans liquidated the ghetto, sending the approximately 1,700 to 2,000 remaining Jews to the Auschwitz extermination camp. Two days later, at Auschwitz II-Birkenau, the Germans held back 280 men and 79 women as prisoners of the concentration camp. The other 1,341 to 1,641 people were gassed on arrival.

At least 70 Wołkowysk Jews survived the war, including 12 men and 3 women imprisoned at Auschwitz and approximately 30 people in the Soviet interior at the time of the German invasion; most of the rest had joined local partisan units.

SOURCES The three Wołkowysk yizkor books are available in a single English translation, Sefer zikaron Volkovysk. The Volkovysk Memorial Book, trans. Jacob Solomon Berger (Mahwah, NJ: J.S. Berger, 2000). With the exception of the English-language Einhorn contribution in the second, or 1949, yizkor book, all other citations in the notes to the yizkor books are from the Berger translation in which the 1949 yizkor book comprises part 1; the earlier published 1946 yizkor book, part 2; and the 1988 yizkor book, part 3.

See also the memoir by Izaak Goldberg, a Wołkowysk resident until the end of July 1941, The Miracles versus Tyranny: The Fight for Life and Death between the Jewish People and the Nazis (New York: Philosophical Library, Inc., 1979); and Chaika Grossman [Haika Grosman], The Underground Army: Fighters of the Białystok Ghetto, trans. Shmuel Beeri, ed. Sol Lewis (New York: Holocaust Library, 1987).

A partial list of the prisoners held back from the Wołkowysk deportation to Auschwitz is available in Stanisław Mączka, ed., Żydzi polscy w KL Auschwitz: wykazy imienne (Warsaw: ŻIH, 2004), pp. 162–163.

Documentation about the history of the Wołkowysk Jewish community under German occupation in World War II includes AŻIH (e.g., 301/37, 1252, 1283, 1830, 1855, 1973, 2002, 2114, 2214, 2596, and 302/36); GAGO (e.g., 1029-1-31, p. 62); GARF (7021-86-37, pp. 4–24 and 82–95); IPN (e.g., S-54/67 [old numeration], SAGd 23, SOB 262 and 372, SOSz 58 and 59, SSK-Gd 125, SWB 205-207, SWGd 41, and SWWr 113-15); IPN-Bi (e.g., 3/138 [formerly, W-1237/51 (i.e., IPN, SWB 205-207)] and Ko [old numeration] 71/86 and 124/92); NARB (845-1-8, p. 31, and 861-1-7, pp. 63 and 67); USHMM (RG-22.002M, reel 13 [7021-86-37]); VHF (# 3986, 4296, 8170, 40793, and 50720); and YVA.

Laura Crago and Monika Tomkiewicz

NOTES

1. Goldberg, The Miracles, pp. 26–28, 30–31; Zui Roitman, “The Destruction,” p. 4; and Shayna Lifschitz, “Memories,” p. 62.
2. Compare Roitman, “The Destruction,” p. 3; and “The Tribulations,” p. 56.
3. Roitman, “The Destruction,” p. 12.
4. Noah Kaplinsky, “Volkovysk,” p. 32; and IPN-Bi, S-53/01-Zn, pp. 13–15, and S-211/71, pp. 39–40.
5. Kaplinsky, “Volkovysk,” p. 33.
6. Roitman, “The Destruction,” p. 6; and Yitzhak Tchopper, “The Tragic Fate,” p. 415.
7. On compensation, compare Roitman, “The Destruction,” pp. 4, 12; and “The Tribulations,” p. 4.
8. Roitman, “The Destruction,” p. 10; and Moses Einhorn, “The Destruction,” p. 935.
9. Roitman, “The Destruction,” p. 14.
10. “The Tribulations,” pp. 142–143; and Kaplinsky, “Volkovysk,” pp. 41–42.
11. Kaplinsky, “Volkovysk,” pp. 43–44.

WOŁPA

Pre-1939: Wołpa (Yiddish: Volp), town, Grodno powiat, Białystok województwo, Poland; 1939–1941: Volpa, Volkovysk raion,

Grodno oblast’, Belorussian SSR; 1941–1944: Wołpa, Kreis Volkowysk, Distrikt Bialystok; post-1991: Vaupa, Vaukavysk raen, Hrodna voblasts’, Republic of Belarus

Wołpa is located 11 and 28 kilometers (6.8 and 17.4 miles) north-northwest of Roś and Wołkowysk, respectively. Survivors estimate the Jewish population stood at 1,000 to 1,500 when the Soviets occupied the town on September 21, 1939.

On June 25, 1941, the fourth day of the German invasion of the USSR, Luftwaffe bombardment targeted at the local airfield set Wołpa ablaze. The fire destroyed all the structures in the Jewish neighborhood.

The Germans had occupied Wołpa by July 1, 1941. Information is scarce about the establishment of the German military and civil administrations there. Wołpa likely served as a regional administrative center (Amstkommissariat). The Germans also appointed a local collaborationist administration and an auxiliary police force.

In July, the regional German military administration issued a series of anti-Jewish decrees, including prohibitions on Jews leaving the places where they resided and orders to wear identifying marks on clothing. By late August, Jews throughout Distrikt Bialystok were required to wear yellow patches on the chest and back. By mid-July, the Germans also had ordered that a Jewish Council (Judenrat) be established in Wołpa. Either Szlomo Bajerski (or Bojarski) or Fishel (or Fiszel) Rubinson was named its chair.¹

Soon after arriving in Wołpa, likely by the fall of 1941, local German authorities established an open ghetto by declaring the village’s Jewish inhabitants no longer residents of Wołpa. It is not clear if the declaration resulted in the formal expulsion of the Jews to a discrete living area outside Wołpa or if local German officials redrew Wołpa’s boundaries to remove the Jewish neighborhood from the town and then ordered all the Jews concentrated there. The only source mentioning the decree notes only that “the Jews were declared to be outside of the settlement.”²

Additional decrees by local German officials in Wołpa suggest the latter was more likely the case. The decrees required the Jews to raze their fire-devastated homes and to carry all the salvageable building materials (mostly bricks) several kilometers to a construction site. Jewish forced laborers were ordered to use the bricks to construct buildings for the local German administration, beginning with an office for the Amstkommissar. The razing of the houses left Jewish residents little option but to reside in the holes left in the ground, where their basements had once stood. Because the Kreiskommissar in Wołkowysk, Landrat Pfeifer, refused to permit Jews to rebuild homes lost to war devastation and then in the spring of 1942 expropriated all Jewish residences and arable property, the Jews who had not previously lived in the neighborhood and those former residents without basements had few options but to dig pits in which to live.

Because of the fire, many Wołpa Jews initially suffered from hunger. Only some Christians from nearby villages helped them to procure food. Many other Christians were hostile, with some locals, including an auxiliary policeman, Litwinowicz, threatening the lives of prominent communal leaders. Two German Gendarmes beat and tortured the rabbi of Wołpa, Mordechaj Segal.

By the spring of 1942, German officials eased living conditions in the Wołpa ghetto by permitting local Christians in nearby villages to hire its inmates as laborers. The Jews lived on the property of the Christians but were forbidden to reside in the same residence. (They usually slept in barns or in the craft workshops at which they were employed.) A survivor portrays such labor as a form of servitude, akin to serfdom, in which the Christians were the “owners,” or the “masters,” of the Jews, perhaps in part because the Jews received no compensation, as the Christians were required to pay the wages of the Jewish laborers to the German labor office.³

On November 1, 1942, local German authorities in Wołpa ordered the Judenrat to assemble all the Jews the next morning at the market square for resettlement to a labor camp. That morning, about 30 Germans, including police and soldiers, surrounded the Jewish quarter in Wołpa. The German in charge of the expulsion required the Jews to leave all their hand luggage behind. He separated from the assembly 34 to 60 of the advanced elderly and infirm, supposedly because an old-age home was to be established for them in Wołpa.⁴ Young children were loaded into a limited number of peasant carts. The remaining Jews were ordered to march to Wołkowysk on foot. After the Jews had departed, in the Jewish ritual bath (mikveh) the Germans executed the Jews ordered to stay behind along with 3 to 6 others who had evaded the deportation. Reportedly, because of the traditions and practices associated with the Christian holiday popularly known as Zadzuszki, or Dzień Zaduszny (All Souls’ Day), the Belorussian grave diggers refused the German order to strip the corpses of clothing.⁵

The Wołpa prisoners were ordered to stop in Roś to add the Jewish community there to the deportation. Because the authorities responsible for the expulsion of the Roś Jews had permitted them to bring with them whatever they could carry, the Wołpa Jews assisted them in transporting some food-stuffs, including flour and potatoes, and firewood to their destination, a transit camp located in a pre-war Polish cavalry garrison in eastern Wołkowysk.

At the transit camp, where the SS consolidated the approximately 20,000 Jews of Kreis Wolkowysk to facilitate their expulsion to the extermination camps, the Wołpa and Roś communities lived together for almost a month in deplorable conditions in an internally fenced-off block within the camp, crowded together in underground bunkers, deprived access to adequate sanitation facilities, and provided with only starvation rations. Many perished there in a typhus epidemic. The Wołpa and Roś Jews were sent on December 2, 1942, two days before the start of Hanukkah, to the Treblinka extermination camp. They were all gassed on arrival.

At least 10 Wołpa Jews (and about half as many from Roś) evaded the Treblinka deportation; 6 people sheltered by local Christians reportedly were denounced subsequently by their purported rescuers and executed by the Gendarmes in Wołpa.⁶ Others, including Icchak Wodowoz, Aaron the hat maker (kapelusznik), and a young man surnamed Solkis, were among the dozens of inmates smuggled out of the transit camp on the daily burial wagon, usually for a fee, by the former hardware merchant Epstein, the head of the Chevra Kadisha Society, and Jankiel Paltes, in charge of the burial detail. Extended shelter initially by Kazimierz Grabicki, Wodowoz’s former Christian employer, the 3 men later joined a partisan unit. Aaron, Solkis, and Maks Bursztejn, another Wołpa transit camp escapee, died during partisan military operations.⁷

Wodowoz, the only known survivor of the German occupation of Wołpa, joined a partisan group of 8 to 15 Christian fugitives, initially led by Seweryn (or Siewek) Strok, from Bobry village. The unit, which included several Red Army soldiers, joined Wodowoz in taking revenge on those in Wołpa responsible for the persecution and expulsion of the Jews. The group burned to the ground all of the German residences in Wołpa and murdered Litwinowicz and the two Gendarmes responsible for torturing the rabbi. In July 1943, they raided a German distillery in Czerlona, across the Niemen River from Łunna. A Roś survivor attributes Wodowoz with derailing 10 German troop and supply trains.⁸

After the war, Soviet authorities sentenced the head of the local Wołpa civilian administration to 10 years in prison.⁹ In 1947, the auxiliary policeman Napoleon Truszyński, from the Skidel Gendarmerie, was tried in Poland for capturing civilians from Łunna suspected of abetting the Czerlona distillery raid. Sentenced to 2 years in prison, he was released in March 1949.¹⁰

SOURCES The second Wołkowysk yizkor book includes a contribution by Zvi (Herschel) Kaplan, “Incidents in Volp,” in Moses Einhorn, ed., Volkovisker Yisker-Bukh (New York, 1949). It is available in an English translation in Sefer zikaron Volkovisk. The Volkovysk Memorial Book, trans. Jacob Solomon Berger (Mahwah, NJ: J.S. Berger, 2000), pt. 1, pp. 309–312.

Because documentation for the World War II history of the Jewish community of Roś is sparse, it is difficult to determine if a ghetto existed there. Survivors from Wołkowysk mention that the aerodrome in Roś was among the first places in the region bombed by the Germans in June 1941, but AŻIH, 301/2002, cited below, testimony of Jasza Klin notes that the Roś Jews lived “completely peacefully, without any persecution, until the final liquidation of the Białystok province, on November 2, 1942.” It also mentions that the second Roś survivor, Wolf Janowski, was hidden by a local peasant.

Useful, too, are the summary accounts, “Volpa Jews during World War II,” on the Volpa ShtetLinks page at jewishgen.org; and the relevant entries in Shmuel Spector and Bracha Freundlich, eds., Pinkas ha-kehillot. Encyclopaedia of Jewish Communities: Poland, vol. 8, Vilna, Białystok, Nowogródek (Jerusalem: Yad Vashem, 2005), pp. 295–298 (Wołpa), and pp. 595–596 (Roś).

Documentation for the Jewish communities of Wołpa and Roś under German occupation in World War II is sparse and focuses mostly on the experiences of the handful of Jews who joined the partisans. It includes: AŻIH (301/2002); GAGO

(also at USHMM [RG-53.004M, reel 3], 1-1-295, pp. 50–64); GARF (e.g., 7021-86-37, pp. 110–111); IPN (e.g., SOOl 26); and YVA (e.g., O-3/342). An English translation of YVA, O-3/342, testimony of Yitzhak Vodovoz (or Wodowoz), is available on the Volpa ShtetLinks page at Jewishgen, www.shtetlinks.jewishgen.org/volpa/Volpa-vodovoz-testimony.html.

Laura Crago

NOTES

1. Compare YVA, O-3/342; and Kaplan, “Incidents,” p. 309.
2. Kaplan, “Incidents,” p. 309.
3. YVA, O-3/342.
4. For low number, see GARF, 7021-86-37, pp. 110–111; and YVA, O-3/342, for high number.
5. Kaplan, “Incidents,” p. 310.
6. Ibid.
7. AŽIH, 301/2002, p. 1.
8. YVA, O-3/342; USHMM, RG-53.004M (GAGO), reel 3, 1-1-295, pp. 50–64; and AŽIH, 301/2002, p. 1.
9. Kaplan, “Incidents,” p. 310.
10. IPN, SOOl 26, case of Napoleon Truszyński.

WYSOKIE LITEWSKIE

Pre-1939: Wysokie Litewskie (Yiddish: Vysoka di Lita), village, Brześć nad Bugiem powiat, województwo poleskie, Poland; 1939–1941: Vysokoe, raion center, Brest oblast', Belorussian SSR; 1941–1944: Wisokie-Litowsk, Kreis Bielsk, Distrikt Bialystok; post-1991: Vysokae Kamianets raen, Beras'tse voblasts', Republic of Belarus

Between the two world wars, Wysokie Litewskie was located 50 kilometers (31 miles) southeast of Bielsk Podlaski and 38 kilometers (23.6 miles) north-northwest of Brześć nad Bugiem. In 1921, its population stood at 2,395, including among others 1,994 Jews, 121 Russian Orthodox followers, and 77 Roman Catholics. An additional 132 Jews resided in the Wysokie Litewskie gmina, including 89 in the unincorporated areas just outside the borders of Wysokie and another 3 near the train station. By 1925, the Jewish population in the town had expanded to 2,875 (about 89.7 percent of the overall population).

On June 23, 1941, the second day of Germany's invasion of the USSR, a Wehrmacht unit occupied the town. Little is known about the establishment of German military or civil institutions there or about the appointment of a local auxiliary police force. The Germans instituted a number of anti-Jewish decrees, including orders for all Jews to wear yellow patches on their backs and chests.

German authorities also immediately ordered a ghetto established for the Jews of Wysokie Litewskie. Located on what in Yiddish was known as Bod Street, the ghetto likely was on the same street as the Jewish ritual bath (mikveh). Initially an open ghetto, its inmates were confined to the homes in which they were concentrated and not permitted to appear in public on the street.¹ The ghetto was fenced, likely in the late spring of 1942, as the result of an order issued by the Bielsk Podlaski Kreiskommissar, Landrat Tubenthal, requiring the closure of all ghettos in the Kreis. Another Jewish eyewitness suggests that the ghetto was much larger, noting that when local German authorities ordered the Jews to fence the ghetto, they insisted it be divided in half to prevent disrupting traffic along the major thoroughfare through Wysokie. Houses on either side of the main street comprised the outermost borders of the two different parts of the enclosed ghetto.²

Little is known about life in the Wysokie Litewskie ghetto. Overcrowding was a problem; three families shared a single room in the houses in the ghetto. Housing conditions deteriorated further after refugees, escaping partial liquidation Aktions in the summer of 1942 in the neighboring Reichskommissariat Ukraine, including in Wołczyn and Kobryń, sought shelter in the Wysokie ghetto.³ Inmates were conscripted for forced labor, including at a bog outside of Wysokie to dig peat for heating fuel. Local German authorities randomly entered the ghetto to round up Jews for forced labor and to raid homes.

Arbitrary violence was a problem from the inception of the Wysokie Litewskie ghetto. One survivor recalled by name 9 people shot dead by the Germans in the ghetto but attributed the Germans with actually killing many more Jews there. Because the Germans forbade the Jews from burying the dead at the cemetery outside the ghetto, a cemetery was established in the ghetto.⁴ On June 22, 1942, the Germans executed 70 Jews in Ogrodniki village (pre-war Wysokie Litewskie gmina, Brześć nad Bugiem powiat). Because only 4 Jews had lived in Ogrodniki in 1921, the majority of the victims are believed to have been from the Wysokie ghetto.⁵

The Wysokie Litewskie ghetto population likely numbered 2,500 on the eve of the ghetto's liquidation. Some scholars have suggested that Jews from other communities in the pre-war Wysokie Litewskie gmina, including from Raśna (Brześć nad Bugiem powiat), a small town with a 1921 Jewish population of 17, were concentrated in the Wysokie ghetto. Although it seems likely, the extant sources do not reveal whether Jews from other communities were resettled in the ghetto or if they were imprisoned there only briefly before November 12, 1942, the date on which German police records indicate that the Jewish communities in this part of Kreis Bielsk were liquidated.⁶

On November 12, 1942, members of the 5th Battalion of Police Regiment II (known before July 29 as the 1st Company of Reserve Police Battalion 13) liquidated the Wysokie Litewskie ghetto. At 5:30 A.M., the unit's commander gave the Wysokie Jews 30 minutes to assemble at the main market square. After separating men from women and placing children in another group, the police marched the groups separately to the Wysokie train station, where they forced them onto freight wagons. By noon the Wysokie Jews had been loaded onto the train, which likely did not depart the station until other members of the same police unit had marched 2,500 Jews from Kamieniec Litewski to Wysokie, a distance of 31 kilometers (19.3 miles). David Wolf, a Wysokie survivor, who jumped from the train just before it arrived at its destination, the Treblinka extermination camp, recalled that it did not arrive until late evening.⁷ All the Jews in the Wysokie Litewskie deportations were gassed on arrival at Treblinka.

A large number of Wysokie Jews are known to have evaded the deportation. Some, including Adam Kamiński (subsequently, Adams), procured false identity papers, enabling them to live outside the ghetto. Paweł Korzec, a survivor of the Białystok ghetto, also recalled that in October 1942 he briefly joined a self-defense organization of Wysokie Jews already living in the nearby forests.⁸

However, none of the forest fugitives are believed to have survived the war, as most were caught in systematic searches of the forest. On November 26, 1942, a rear group (Nachkommando) of the 5th Battalion of Police Regiment II arrived in Wysokie Litewskie to assist the Gendarmes there to execute 61 Jews apprehended since the ghetto's liquidation.⁹ Of the 400 people shot by German authorities in Wysokie between 1942 and 1943, at least a third are believed to have been Jews fleeing the liquidation of their communities, though Soviet documentation records the names of just 37 Jewish victims from Wysokie. Most of the executed were buried in a mass grave, near the center of town.¹⁰

The Wysokie Litewskie Jews who survived the war living under the German occupation received assistance from a handful of local Christians. After jumping from the deportation train, Wolf made his way back to the Wysokie area and was sheltered there by a local Polish family.¹¹ Kamiński, a Kobryń refugee with false identity papers, was visiting family in the ghetto on the day of its liquidation. He fled to the local forests after his papers came into question but ultimately returned to Wysokie, where a family friend arranged for a guide and the documents necessary for him to travel to Warsaw. There, he used his new identity papers to volunteer for forced labor and was sent to Riga, Latvia. Also counted among Wysokie survivors are the immediate family members of lawyer Aaron Wirszubski. Deported in the Soviet period from Wysokie to Hajnówka (Bielsk Podlaski powiat), Wirszubski perished during the liquidation, most likely in early August 1941, of the 600-person Jewish community and its expulsion to Prużana. Lidia (or Lidka) Michnowska, a friend and a sister of Wysokie Litewskie's wartime Polish mayor, arranged for Wirszubski's wife Eugenia and two daughters to be aided and sheltered in Narew by the Roman Catholic priests Jakubowski and Kardasz.¹²

Schutz Männer employed at the Wysokie Litewskie Gendarmerie post were tried after the war in Poland for participating in roundups and executions of at least 60 Jewish partisans. In 1967, Jan Charyton was found guilty of participating in actions against the partisans. He received a prison term of 5 years and 6 months but was released conditionally in 1971. In 1970, another six Poles were convicted in two separate trials for participating in the killing of civilians and taking actions against the partisans: Jan and Józef Lichota, Antoni Mazur, Wincenty Wojewódzki, Mieczysław Chrostowski, and Piotr Dziekan. The men received prison sentences ranging from 5 years and 1 month to 10 years, with the longest sentence reduced to 7 years on review by Poland's Supreme Court. All of the men had been released conditionally by 1974.

SOURCES Significant published and Internet sources include Yizkor! Gevidmet dem beyligen ondenk fun di kdoysbim fun Visoka-Litovsk un Voltsbin (New York: United Wisoko-Litowsker and Woltchiner Relief, 1948) (an English translation is available on jewishgen.org, at www.jewishgen.org/yizkor/vysokoye/vysokoye.html); "Vysokoye History," at www.brest-belarus.org.

Also useful is the Wysokie Litewskie entry in Shmuel Spector, ed., Pinkas ha-kehillot. Encyclopaedia of Jewish Communities: Poland, vol. 5, Volhynia and Polesie (Jerusalem: Yad Vashem, 1990), pp. 249–250; and the entry for Anna Paszkiewicz in Israel Gutman and Sara Bender, eds., The Encyclopedia of the Righteous among the Nations: Rescuers of Jews during the Holocaust, vol. 2, Poland, 2 pts. (Jerusalem: Yad Vashem, 2004), pt. 2, pp. 596–597.

The handful of archival sources documenting the history of the Jewish community of Wysokie Litewskie under the German occupation in World War II includes GARF (7021-83-12, pp. 4, 7, and 7021-148-186); IPN (e.g., SWB [251, 275-78, and 288-90]); IPN-Bi (e.g., 3/128, 130, 139, 143-44); USHMM (RG-22.014M [e.g., GARF, 7021-148-186], reel 18, pp. 165, 167); VHF (# 17696, 28531, and 45233); and YVA (e.g., O-3/6180).

Laura Crago and Alexander Kruglov

NOTES

1. David Wolf, "Two Letters," Yizkor!, www.jewishgen.org/yizkor/vysokoye/vysokoye.html.
2. VHF, # 17696, testimony of Adam Adams.
3. Ibid.
4. Wolf, "Two Letters," p. 22.
5. GARF, 7021-83-12, p. 7.
6. "Wysokie Litewskie," in Spector, Pinkas ha-kehillot, 5:250; and USHMM, RG-22.014M (e.g., GARF, 7021-148-186), reel 18, p. 165 (War Diary, 1st Company, Reserve Police Battalion 13, November 12, 1942).
7. Wolf, "Two Letters," pp. 22–23.
8. YVA, O-3/6180, pp. 48–53, in Sarah Bender, The Jews of Białystok during World War II and the Holocaust, Yaffa Murci-ana, trans. (Waltham, MA: Brandeis University Press, 2008), pp. 126–127.
9. USHMM, RG-22.014M, reel 18, p. 167 (November 26, 1942).
10. Wolf, "Two Letters," p. 23, notes 120 Jews executed for hiding in and around Wysokie; and GARF, 7021-83-12, p. 4, for low figure.
11. Wolf, "Two Letters," and "Second Letter," respectively, p. 23 and pp. 24–25.
12. VHF, # 28351 and 45233, testimonies of Sara (Wirszubka) Szymańska and Adela (Wirszubka) Boddy.

WYSOKIE MAZOWIECKIE

Pre-1939: Wysokie Mazowieckie, town and powiat center, Białystok województwo, Poland; 1939–1941: Wysokie, Chizbeva raion, Belostok oblast', Belorussian SSR; 1941–1944: Wysokie Mazowieckie, Kreis Lomscha, Distrikt Białystok; post-1998: powiat center, województwo podlaskie, Poland

Wysokie Mazowieckie is located 50 kilometers (31 miles) southwest of Białystok, not far from the main railway line to Warsaw. According to the 1921 census, there were 1,898 Jews living in Wysokie Mazowieckie, comprising 59.1 percent of the total population.¹ In 1936 there was a pogrom against the Jews of the town in which many Jewish houses were looted and more than 20 people were injured.² In 1939, on the eve of World War II, there were probably around 1,900 Jews residing in Wysokie Mazowieckie.

German armed forces captured the town on September 10, 1939. On September 12, all Jewish and Polish men older than 17 years of age were arrested, about 1,000 people in total. Two days later, they were taken away to perform compulsory labor in Zambrów. From there around 800 men were transported to a labor camp in East Prussia. During their brief occupation the Germans also burned to the ground as much as 90 percent of the town. In connection with the fire, on September 19, 1939, the Germans ordered the Jews to leave the town within 24 hours. The Germans shot 4 Jews and drowned 1 as they drove the Jews from the town. Apart from those taken away earlier, most sought refuge in neighboring towns, including about 600 Jews who fled to Sokół.³ Others made their way to Białystok. On September 26, 1939, the Red Army took over the town in accordance with the terms of the Molotov-Ribbentrop Pact, and the Jews were allowed to return. Almost half of them came back over the following weeks, bringing the Jewish population of the town together with some refugees up to around 1,000.⁴

On June 24, 1941, the town was again captured by German forces, two days after their invasion of the Soviet Union. Immediately, Germans accompanied by local Poles began to loot Jewish homes and shops.⁵ The Germans then introduced a number of anti-Jewish measures. A Jewish Council (Judenrat) comprising 13 members was established, and a man named Alter Zack was appointed at its head. Jews were registered and marked with the Star of David, they were forbidden to perform kosher slaughtering, and they were obliged to perform forced labor (including women and older children). Shortly after the start of the occupation, the Germans arrested a few Jews as suspected Communists, including Shmuel Grinberg, who was sent to Białystok to be shot.⁶

In July 1941, a German military commandant briefly controlled the town. In August 1941, authority was transferred to the German civil administration. Wysokie Mazowieckie was incorporated into Kreis Lomscha, in Distrikt Białystok. The senior German official in the town was the Amtskommissar.

In July or August 1941, the German authorities ordered the Jews to assemble for a medical inspection with the exception of a small group of Jewish craftsmen who were exempted. As it turned out, the inspectors did not arrive, as they were busy elsewhere, but rumors of the expulsion and murder of Jews from other towns spread fear among the Jews in Wysokie. According to the yizkor book, "[T]his first Aktion, plus reports from other places that life was more secure in the ghettos, influenced the heads of the Jewish community to request the authorities to set up a ghetto." It was thought that this might provide some protection from pogroms by local non-Jews.⁷ After some local negotiations, a ghetto was created in Wysokie Mazowieckie by the end of August 1941, in an area mostly occupied by Jews before. The ghetto was located around the market square and on the nearby Dolna, Mysłkowska, Kościuszkowa, Jagiellońska, and Długa Streets, with Polna Street forming its southeastern border. The main gate was on the side of the market square.⁸ Over the following weeks, several hundred Jews from neighboring villages, including Kulesze Kościelne, Jabłonka Kościelna, Dąbrówka Kościelna, Szepietowo, Rosochate Kościelne, and others, were resettled into the ghetto, which was surrounded by barbed wire. In the fall of 1941, the Judenrat, assisted by the Jewish Police, had to meet a demand for a "contribution" of 20,000 rubles.⁹

The Jews from the ghetto were taken out every day to perform forced labor on road construction and on the surrounding large estates. Their wages, in the form of potatoes and other agricultural products, were passed on to the Judenrat, which divided them up among the Jewish population. Craftsmen (tailors, cobblers, and watchmakers) who were still able to earn their own living were exempted from forced labor in return for a payment to the Judenrat. Using these funds, the Judenrat also organized a soup kitchen, which provided two hot meals a day for those in need, especially those brought in from the villages. As winter approached, the Jews were sent out to collect firewood for the Germans from the forests. At the same time they were permitted to dig up tree roots for the Judenrat to distribute among the Jews for their own heating and cooking needs.¹⁰

The ghetto was guarded by the Jewish Police on the inside and Polish police on the outside. Smuggling food in from the "Aryan" side became increasingly more dangerous over time. In the overcrowded ghetto, the elderly, the poor, and some of those without family were placed in the fire department building, where they survived on the charity provided by the community. To avoid excessive overcrowding there, some solitary individuals were placed in other homes. Despite these precautions, at least one outbreak of typhus was recorded in the ghetto, and there were a number of deaths from hunger and disease.¹¹

Throughout the spring and summer of 1942, there were no major Aktions in Wysokie Mazowieckie, but tension in the ghetto increased as a number of refugees from the liquidation of the smaller ghettos in Distrikt Warchau (Generalgouvernement) arrived in the town. The anti-Jewish regulations were strictly enforced; for example, one Jew was shot for illegally purchasing an animal for slaughter.¹²

On Sunday, November 1, 1942, about 300 horse-drawn wagons came into Wysokie. Together with other indications, such as Germans reclaiming unfinished items sent for repair, this warned many Jews of an impending Aktion, and several hundred fled the ghetto into the woods. Then on November 2, German and Polish police surrounded the ghetto and rounded up the remaining inmates (about 1,500 men, women, and children), transporting them without their possessions by wagon to the transit camp in Zambrów (although one account indicates that some may have been deported directly to the extermination camps from the Czyżewo railway station). The Germans shot those people who were too sick to be transported. Many non-Jews from the area also came into town on this day in hope of gaining some of the Jewish property.

In Zambrów, some 17,500 to 20,000 Jews from the surrounding ghettos were concentrated in overcrowded conditions with very little to eat. Scores of Jews died every day of starvation. On January 15, 1943, the Germans started to deport most of the remaining Jews from Zambrów to the extermination camp Auschwitz II-Birkenau, where the majority was gassed on arrival.¹³ Many of those who had successfully fled the ghetto were eventually caught by patrols or fell into German hands following reports by Polish informers. Some received help from local Poles, often in return for payment, but only a handful remained alive when the town was recaptured by the Red Army in the summer of 1944.

SOURCES Information about the extermination of the Jews in Wysokie Mazowieckie can be found in the following publications: Y. Rubin, ed., Visoke-Mazovyetsk yizkor-bukh (Tel Aviv: Visoke-Mazovyetsker landslayt-farayn in Yisrael, 1975); Avraham Wein, ed., Pinkas ha-kehillot. Encyclopaedia of Jewish Communities: Poland, vol. 4, Warsaw and Its Region (Jerusalem: Yad Vashem, 1989), pp. 190–193; and Avigdor Ben-Dov, ed., Deliverance. The Diary of Michael Maik. A True Story, trans. Laia Ben-Dov (Kedumim, Israel: Keterpress, 2004).

Documents regarding the persecution and extermination of the Jews in Wysokie Mazowieckie can be found in the following archives: AŻIH (301/969, 2248-49, 2614, and 3590); IPN-Bi (e.g., S-283/68, S-255/69/1-2, S-292/69, Ko-55/88, Ko-178/87, Ko-90/88); USHMM (RG-15.019M); VHF; and YVA.

Alexander Kruglov and Martin Dean
trans. Steven Seegel

NOTES

1. Wein, Pinkas ha-kehillot, 4:190.
2. “The Pogrom at Wysokie Mazowieckie in 1936,” in Rubin, Visoke-Mazovyetsk yizkor-bukh, pp. 86–98.
3. Mosheh Grosman, ed., Sefer zikaron li-kedoshe Sokoli (Tel Aviv: Former Residents of Sokoly, 1962), pp. 159–160, 224–228.
4. Rubin, Visoke-Mazovyetsk yizkor-bukh, pp. 274–275; AŻIH, 301/969. Other sources indicate, however, that probably less than 1,000 Jews returned.
5. AŻIH, 301/3590, testimony of Złatka Gutman.
6. Ibid., 301/969.
7. Rubin, Visoke-Mazovyetsk yizkor-bukh, p. 274.

8. AŻIH, 301/3590; Ministerstwo Sprawiedliwości, Główna Komisja Badania Zbrodni Hitlerowskich w Polsce, Rejestr miejsc i faktów zbrodni popełnionych przez okupanta hitlerowskiego na ziemiach polskich w latach 1939–1945: Województwo łomżyńskie (Warsaw, 1985), p. 229.

9. AŻIH, 301/969 and 2248, testimony of Abraham Berl Sokal. In 1921, 185 Jews were living in Kulesze Kościelne, 157 in Jabłonka Kościelna, and 55 in Dąbrówka Kościelna; see Blackbook of Localities Whose Jewish Population Was Exterminated by the Nazis (Jerusalem: Yad Vashem, 1965), Poland, pp. 2–6.

10. Rubin, Visoke-Mazovyetsk yizkor-bukh, p. 273.

11. Ibid., p. 272; USHMM, RG-15.019M, reel 14, “Białostockie,” pp. 133 and reverse.

12. AŻIH, 301/969.

13. Rubin, Visoke-Mazovyetsk yizkor-bukh, pp. 270–272; Wein, Pinkas ha-kehillot, 4:190–193; AŻIH, 301/2614, testimony of Towia Groll.

ZABŁUDÓW

Pre-1939: Zabłudów (Yiddish: Zablodov), town, Białystok powiat and województwo, Poland; 1939–1941: Zabłudov, raion center, Belostok oblast', Belorussian SSR; 1941–1944: Zabłudow, Kreis Białystok, Distrikt Białystok; post-1998: Zabłudów, Białystok powiat, województwo podlaskie, Poland

Zabłudów lies about 18 kilometers (11.2 miles) southeast of Białystok. Its 1939 pre-war population of 3,500 included 1,952 Jews.

During World War II, the Germans occupied Zabłudów for about a week in September 1939 before ceding it to Soviet occupation.

On June 23, 1941, German aerial bombardment destroyed a nearby airport and sparked a fire in Zabłudów. Scores of Jews perished in the attacks before a small Wehrmacht unit briefly occupied the town that day. On June 26, another small unit, composed of about four soldiers, burned the rest of Zabłudów to the ground. Many Jews perished in the blaze; others were shot. On June 30 the survivors either fled voluntarily or were driven from Zabłudów by drunken German soldiers and local Polish and Belorussian peasants.¹ The Jews fled to Białystok, Bielsk Podlaski, Gródek Białostocki, Michałowo, Narewka Mała, and Orla. About 300 people either followed the rabbi of Zabłudów or were expelled with him to Narew. Many Zabłudów refugees in Białystok and all the Narew refugees were deported in the fall of 1941 to the ghetto in Prużana.

In the meantime, in Zabłudów, German military authorities had appointed a collaborationist local administration. Its formal head was Jerzy Manteuffel-Szoegge, whose family had owned Zabłudów since 1856. Andrzej Kuczyński was named mayor, and Franciszek Teofilewicz became the civil administrator (wójt). The Germans recruited a local auxiliary police force. In late July or August 1941, they established a Gendarmerie post. The Gendarmerie commander, named Franzek, often is misidentified in documentation as Piłat, the nickname

A narrow street in Zabłudów, 1916.
USHMM WS #05927, COURTESY OF JERZY TOMASZEWSKI

(from Pontius Pilate) local Poles gave him.² Other Gendarmes included Dembowski, Krejbus, Hettig, Sommer, and Beckmann. An Amtskommissariat was established for Zabłudów-Słomianka, under the leadership of an East Prussian named Olech. Employees of the Amtskommissariat were local Poles and Belorussians.³

Shortly after July 12, 1941, the Germans and their local collaborators subjected Jewish men who had returned to Zabłudów to violence. They compelled them to behead a statue of Lenin and to bury it at the Jewish cemetery. The Germans and local police shattered the legs and crushed the skulls of several Jews, including Szymon Lewin and Jakub Kapliński. A Polish policeman seized Benjamin Felgrund, accused him of communism, and killed him.⁴

From late July 1941, many Jews, mostly refugees in Białystok, began returning to Zabłudów. Some left the city to avoid entering the Białystok ghetto, established on August 1. Others, in October, accepted travel passes offered to refugees by the Białystok Judenrat to return to their hometowns. The number of Zabłudów returnees varies in the sources. One survivor notes 500 Jews lived in Zabłudów. Another places its population at 600. A third suggests it far exceeded 750.⁵ Drawing on these survivors' accounts, historian Szymon Datner concluded the Zabłudów Jewish population registered a decline of about 70 percent (to around 586 people). However, in the same work, he cites a much larger figure, of 1,400, more reflective of the 1,200 to 1,400 population noted in Polish postwar documentation for Zabłudów.⁶

Fire damage, combined with German military orders issued in early July 1941 that forbade Jews throughout Distrikt Białystok from leaving the towns in which they lived, effectively created an open ghetto in Zabłudów. Initially, the returnees lived together in the Bielsk Street Bet Midrash, one of the few Jewish-owned buildings not destroyed in the fire. Though a few lived illicitly in the barns of non-Jews, later arrivals mostly moved into several (formerly) Jewish-owned tannery factories in southeastern Zabłudów.

There was little to eat and no soap. Posters throughout Zabłudów forbade Christian-Jewish contact.⁷ Members of the Gendarmerie ordered the Jews to wear yellow identifying marks on the left arm and back and ordered a Judenrat established. Its chair was Szymon Wysocki (Weissotsky). The Judenrat organized a Jewish police force. It was commanded by Judel Packstein. The Judenrat organized labor conscription. It collected whatever material items the German authorities demanded, including valuables, clothing, and furniture.

Authorities enforced the orders that had established the open ghetto. Butcher Shalom Epstein, found outside of Zabłudów, was shot dead. At least 6 other Jews were murdered by German authorities.⁸ Others were beaten severely for sneaking out even momentarily at night from the factory buildings in which they lived. In the autumn of 1941, Polish policeman Zygmunt Kozłowski arrested Paltiel Łopata for leaving his home without wearing yellow identifying markings. After Łopata punched Kozłowski and fled to Białystok, the Gendarmes ordered almost all the Jews, perhaps 750 people, held hostage to secure his return. The next day, after Łopata could not be located, the Judenrat paid a large bribe to free the hostages.⁹

Shortly before Passover 1942, likely in January, the authorities ordered the Zabłudów Jews concentrated into a more formal ghetto. The ghetto was located on the grounds of the Białostocki, Hertz, and Judelmann tannery factories, between one of the Jewish and the Russian Orthodox cemeteries. Most Jews already lived there. The others were required to relocate to the ghetto, which probably was surrounded by a fence.

In the spring of 1942, the Germans ordered 10 Zabłudów Jews conscripted for weeklong stints on crews repairing and expanding the road from Białystok to Wołkowysk; 10 other Jews daily hewed trees, and another 10 worked at a nearby quarry. Locally, the Gendarmes conscripted Jews to remove Jewish gravestones (matzevot) and the stone wall from the cemetery. They were used as paving underlayment on the road construction project. The Judenrat rotated almost all men through the forced labor assignments, even those employed under German supervision at local workshops to manufacture leather goods or as blacksmiths and tailors.¹⁰ Conscripts assigned to labor outside Zabłudów collected clothing from others to barter for food with farmers near their work sites. Some Jews also sneaked off to Białystok, smuggling themselves into the ghetto there to exchange agricultural goods secured around Zabłudów for homemade necessities, including soap.

The SS, local Gendarmes, and the Polish police liquidated the Zabłudów ghetto on November 2, 1942. Only about 70 Jews managed to hide, in part because many believed they were being transferred to the Prużana ghetto, where many former Jews from Zabłudów already resided.¹¹ The authorities drove the rest of the Zabłudów Jews to a transit camp located in southern Białystok. The Białystok Judenrat secured the transfer of several Zabłudów Jews, including Wysocki, to the Białystok ghetto. Fritz Friedel, the official in charge of Jewish affairs (Judenreferent) of the Commanding Officer of the Security Police and SD (KdS) Białystok and the head of the Białystok transit camp, shot the remaining members of the Zabłudów Judenrat. On November 10, 1942, the Zabłudów inmates were sent to the Treblinka extermination camp.¹² They were all gassed on arrival.

Some of the Jews who had evaded deportation to the Białystok transit camp were shot dead during searches for escapees following the Zabłudów ghetto liquidation. Yitzhak Herschel and Abrahamel Fajnman (Feinman) were among the early victims. Children reported the hiding place of Abram Tajchman to authorities. He was shot dead by the Gendarme, or perhaps Schutzmann, Tyberski.¹³

Most Zabłudów fugitives sought shelter in the Białystok ghetto. They almost all were deported to a number of death camps during the liquidation of the ghetto in 1943; only a small number fled. Józef Lewin (Josel Levine) and his son Szymon were sheltered by Belorussian farmers in Gneciuki village. Łopata, Kapliński, Moshe Flikier, and Izrael Bramzon received assistance from the Daniluk family, also Belorussians, in Solniki village. The aid-giver of David Levine reportedly murdered him near the war's end.¹⁴

On May 9, 1945, tragedy struck the less than 10 Jewish survivors from Zabłudów. That day, an armed Polish gang, including former auxiliary policeman Zygmunt Kozłowski, opened fire on a party held by the Daniluk family to celebrate the Allied victory. Seven people, including Flikier and two aid-givers, Włodzimierz and Luba Daniluk, were killed.¹⁵

In 1949, Friedel was tried in Poland for numerous war crimes related to his administration of the Białystok ghetto and transit camp, including for personally murdering 2,000 Jews, among them the Zabłudów Judenrat members, and for sending 13,000 Jews from the Białystok transit camp to their deaths. Found guilty, he was sentenced to death and executed in 1952. In 1947, Kozłowski was tried for serving as an auxiliary policeman. The state sought the death penalty, but supposedly because a Jewish survivor testified on his behalf, the court sentenced him to an eight-month prison term.¹⁶

SOURCES A small portion of the memoir From Białystok to Birkenau: The Holocaust Journey of Michel Mielnicki (Vancouver: Ronsdale Press and Vancouver Holocaust Education Center, 2000) covers the early part of the 1941 German occupation in Zabłudów. The memoir is based on the author's AŻIH, 301/1266, testimony (see below), which also appears in Polish translation in Paweł Machcewicz and Krzysztof Persak, eds., Wokół Jedwabnego, 2 vols. (Warsaw: IPN-KŚZpNP, 2002), vol. 2, Dokumenty, pp. 356–358.

Testimonies from survivors and some Polish postwar documentation are in Shemu'el Tsesler et al., eds., Zabludove Yizkor-Bukh (Buenos Aires: Aroysgegebn fun dem Yizkor-Bukh-Komitet tsum tsyantsikstn yortog fun di ershte Yidishe korbone's fun hurbn-Zabludove, 1961), with a partial Hebrew translation in Nechama Shmueli-Schmusch, ed., Zabludow: Dapim mi-tokh yisker-bukh (Israel: Yots'e Zabludov be-Yisrael, 1987). An English translation of the book's Holocaust sections is available on the Zabludow memorial Web site, at www.zabludow.com. Tilford Bartman, the author of the site, includes English translations of several documents cited below, such as USHMM (IPN) ASG and AŻIH, 301/3602, and provides many unique materials, including correspondence with officials at OKZBH-Bi (IPN-Bi) and Yad Vashem documentation.

Secondary accounts include the relevant entries in Shmuel Spector and Bracha Freundlich, eds., Pinkas ha-kehillot. Encyclopaedia of Jewish Communities: Poland, vol. 8, Vilna, Białystok, Nowogródek (Jerusalem: Yad Vashem, 2005), pp. 331–335; Arnon Rubin, The Rise and Fall of Jewish Communities in Poland and Their Relics Today, vol. 1, District Białystok (Tel Aviv: Tel Aviv University Press, 2006), pp. 230–235; and Andrzej Żbikowski, “Pogromy i mordy ludności żydowskiej w Łomżyńskim i na Białostocczyźnie latem 1941 roku w świetle relacji ocalałych Żydów i dokumentów sądowych,” in Machcewicz and Persak, Wokół Jedwabnego, vol. 2, Studia, pp. 208–209. Also valuable is Szymon Datner, “Eksterminacja ludności żydowskiej w Okręgu Białostockim,” BŻIH, no. 60 (1966): 9, 11, tab. 2; and Grzegorz Pietrowski, “Zabłudów okresu międzywojennego i czasu II wojny światowej,” available on an APB sponsored Web site, at <http://zabludow.polska.pl/historia/article,,id,304270.htm>.

Archival documentation pertaining to the Jewish community of Zabłudów during the Holocaust includes AŻIH (e.g., 301/1266, 2416, 2417, 3598, 3602, 3604); IPN (SAB [20, 35], SOB 135); IPN-Bi (e.g., 1/921, 292/20, S [87/68/1-2]); USHMM (RG-15.019M [IPN], 46/33); VHF (e.g., # 1303, 5984, 14990, 25431, 32893, 35777); and YVA (e.g., M-11/4 [120, 122], M-11/267, M-11B/199, M-49Q/263, M-49E [AŻIH, 301] [2426, 3535, 3604, 3958]).

Laura Crago and Monika Tomkiewicz

NOTES

1. Pinie (Paul) Chorowski testimony, in Tsesler et al., Zabludove, pp. 366–367, for flight; AŻIH, 301/1266, testimony of Mendel Melnicki, in Machcewicz and Persak, Wokół Jedwabnego, 2:357; Ephraim Rubins testimony, in Tsesler et al., Zabludove, p. 402, for expulsion.

2. Zabłudów memorial Web site, Tilford Bartman, introduction to English trans. of USHMM, RG-15.019M (ASG), reel 14, 46/33, pp. 1–2.

3. IPN-Bi, 1/921, vol. 1, p. 49 (deposition, Józef Żyłkowski, April 20, 1973).

4. AŻIH, 301/2417, testimony of Szymon Lewin, p. 1.

5. Respectively, AŻIH, 301/2416, p. 1; Rubins, in Tsesler et al., Zabludove, p. 402; AŻIH, 301/3602, testimony of Paltiel Łopata, p. 1.

6. USHMM, RG-15.019M, reel 14, 46/33, pp. 1–2; Datner, “Eksterminacja ludności żydowskiej w Okręgu Białostockim.

7. AŻIH, 301/2416, testimony of Szymon Lewin, p. 1.

8. YVA, M-11/4/120, in Tsesler et al., Zabludove, p. 395.

9. AŻIH, 301/3602, p. 1.

10. Chorowski, in Tsesler et al., Zabludove, pp. 373–374.

11. AŻIH, 301/3598, testimony of Józef Lewin, pp. 2–3; Chorowski, in Tsesler et al., Zabludove, p. 377.

12. Chorowski, in Tsesler et al., Zabludove, p. 377.

13. AŻIH, 301/2417, pp. 2–3; IPN-Bi, 1/921, p. 92.

14. AŻIH, 301/2417, pp. 1–2.
15. Ibid., 301/3602, pp. 2–4. In 2003, Yad Vashem recognized the four-member Daniluk family as Righteous Among the Nations.
16. Ibid., p. 4; IPN, SOB 135.

ZAMBRÓW

Pre-1939: Zambrów (Yiddish: Zembrove), town, Łomża powiat, Białystok województwo, Poland; 1939–1941: Zambrov, raion center, Belostok oblast', Belorussian SSR; 1941–1944: Zambrow, Kreis Lomscha, Distrikt Bialystok; post-1998: Zambrów, powiat center, województwo podlaskie, Poland

Zambrów lies on the Jabłonka River about 26 kilometers (16.2 miles) south-southeast of Łomża. Its 1937 population of 7,620 included 3,330 Jews.

From September 1, 1939, scores of Jews were killed as Zambrów sustained German aerial bombardment, and then the garrison became engulfed, from September 10–13, by the Battle of Zambrów. After the German XIX Army Corps, commanded by General Heinz Wilhelm Guderian, transformed the garrison's training grounds into a makeshift prison for about 1,200 captured Polish soldiers (Christians and Jews), Wehrmacht soldiers daily robbed Jewish stores and homes. About 50 Jewish civilians were executed before the Germans turned Zambrów over to Soviet forces at the end of September.¹

The Germans reoccupied Zambrów on June 22, 1941. They immediately invited local Poles to help them identify and round up Jews for forced labor. Together the Germans and their Polish collaborators demolished Jewish-owned stalls at the market square. A few days later, an SS unit appeared to humiliate outwardly religious Jews. The Germans invited local Poles to help them rob Jewish property.² By July 20, the German military administration had ordered Jews to wear a yellow Star of David on an armband, forbade Jews from leaving Zambrów without permission, and made forced labor compulsory for all adult Jews. A Jewish Council (Judenrat) also was ordered established. Its chair was Gershon Srebrowicz. The Germans demanded Zambrów Jews pay a large contribution, in cash and valuables, threatening to execute the new council members if it was not forthcoming.

The German military appointed a local administration and an auxiliary police force. Little is known about their composition or subsequent activities. By August 1941, the German military authorities had been supplanted by a German civil administration, headed regionally by Zambrów Amtskommissar Rohr. The Polish auxiliary police was subordinated, as Schutzmannen, to the German Gendarmerie, established in August.

From late July, the SS used labor assignments in the forest of Czerwony Bór as a guise to murder more than a third of the Zambrów Jewish community. The first group of 30 Jews returned safely. A subsequent group of 50 to 90 people was murdered. The largest mass killing occurred on August 19,

1941, when a detachment of Security Police, likely from the Schröttersburg subsection of the Zichenau Gestapo, led by SS-Hauptsturmführer Hermann Schaper, organized 700 to 1,000 Jews supposedly for a “labor detail” near Szumowo Nowe village but instead executed the “laborers” in the part of the forest known as Rząśnik (or Klonowo).³ The Jews in Zambrów learned almost immediately of the killings, as several Poles told some prominent members of the Jewish community, who in turn informed the Judenrat.⁴

The executions likely provoked a confrontation between the Judenrat and German authorities. The Germans dismissed the Judenrat and appointed a more compliant 10-person council under the leadership of Glicksman, a refugee from Łódź. They ordered a Jewish police force established. Eli Hirsch Siniak was its commander.

After the Rząśnik execution, the Germans announced the establishment of a ghetto. One eyewitness mentions the ghetto was established two weeks after the executions at Rząśnik in July (sic), another notes a date of late July or early August 1941, and still others suggest dates in September and October.⁵ The ghetto occupied a quarter of the downtown area. It encompassed at least five streets, including Świętokrzyska, Bóznicza, and a part of Tadeusz Kościuszko, and extended to the Jabłonka River. Initially, the ghetto was not fenced.

The ghetto population officially stood at about 2,000, with its actual census likely twice that, as many Jews sought shelter there from anti-Jewish violence in nearby localities. The Germans also expelled to the ghetto Jews from smaller communities, including Prosiénica. The latter either had been held back from or had evaded the German mass execution of their community in August 1941, also at Rząśnik.⁶

The refusal of a few “Polish hooligans” to vacate their houses to make way for the ghetto may have provoked another mass execution in Zambrów.⁷ On September 6, 1941, an SS unit arrived to offer lighter work to about 300 elderly and less fit Jews, a group including pregnant women. The Jews were brought behind the railroad station, in Kołaki Kościelne village, and executed together with three quarters of the Jews (about 450 people) of Rutki-Kossaki village and likely too the small Jewish community in Kołaki.⁸

After the killing, the ghetto was fenced and the violence abated, most likely in exchange for a payment of 100,000 Reichsmark (RM) and a kilogram (2.2 pounds) in gold. The Jews worked mostly on rebuilding barracks at the garrison, used by the Germans from January 1942 as a Soviet prisoner-of-war (POW) camp, Stammlager (Stalag) XII E Zambrow. Jewish laborers cleaned the barracks and houses of camp personnel. In the spring of 1942, forced laborers worked on the Białystok-to-Ostrów Mazowiecka road construction project. They likely were not guarded.⁹ Other Jews worked officially for local farmers as agricultural laborers.

Initially, material conditions were not that difficult in the ghetto, as it was only lightly guarded, providing Jews working outside the ghetto opportunities to bring food back. Farmers also entered the ghetto once a week to barter their goods for the Jews' possessions, though the types of products that they could offer were restricted. Overcrowding posed the largest problem, as six families, about half of them unregistered, typically lived together in a small apartment. The resulting sanitation problems provoked a typhus epidemic. The Judenrat chair, Glicksman, supposedly did little to assist the sick and impoverished; instead, he used the institutions of the Jewish Council to protect Jews with black market wealth. Local Poles continued to denounce Jews as Communists, usually those with whom they wanted to settle scores or financial accounts. The arrested are believed to have been murdered.¹⁰

On the night of November 1–2, 1942, members of the SS and the Gendarmerie, including local Schutzmannen, surrounded the ghetto in preparation for its liquidation. On November 2, the Jews were expelled to the garrison, a part of which the Germans had transformed into a transit camp to imprison about 17,500 to 20,000 Jews from nearby localities. Although a large number of Zambrów Jews initially evaded the expulsion order, almost all the fugitives, perhaps as many as 2,000 people, either reported voluntarily to the garrison when they could not locate shelter or were rounded up in searches, organized on German orders by local Polish officials, and brought to the Zambrów transit camp.¹¹

The SS began liquidating the transit camp around January 10, 1943, by ordering more than 2,000 inmates expelled to the train station in Czyżewo for transport to the Auschwitz extermination camp. The Zambrów Jews were some of the first and last transit camp inmates sent to Auschwitz. They arrived at Auschwitz II-Birkenau in two separate transports, on January 15 and 19, each of which carried about 2,000 people. From the first transport, the Germans held back 217 men and 21 women as prisoners of the camp. From the second transport, which also included Jews from Łomża, the Germans chose as camp inmates 164 men and 134 women. The remaining Jews in the two transports, about 3,500 people, were gassed on arrival.

Few Zambrów Jews lived to see the war's end. Under 10 of the Auschwitz prisoners survived. Another 10 to 15 people were sheltered by Christians or hid in bunkers outside Zambrów. Among them were 3 Stupnik brothers. In Czerwony Bór village when the region's ghettos were liquidated, they eventually forged a small partisan organization composed of about 12 Jews from that village and from Gać village and several Poles. However, the Poles soon turned on the Jews, murdering about half of them. The Stupniks and 3 other survivors retreated to a bunker on the property of a Christian family in Milewo (Szczytyn gmina and powiat).¹² Also counted among Zambrów survivors is Hersz (or Grzegorz) Smolar, the leader of the resistance in the Mińsk ghetto and the commander of a partisan unit in the Kojdanów (or Nalibocka) Forest.

SOURCES A useful source of published survivor testimonies is the yizkor book, Yom-Tov Levinski, ed., Sefer Zambrov: Zembrove: Zikaron li-kehillat ha-kodesh she-bushmedab (Tel Aviv: Ha-Irgunim shel yots'e [Zambrov] be-Artsot hu-Berit, Argentina be-Yisrael, 1963). An English-language translation, sponsored by the United Zembrover Association, is scheduled to appear on the Museum of Family History Web site, www.museumoffamilyhistory.com. Several memoirs by survivors from other places touch on Jewish life in Zambrów under the German occupation, including Rivka Teyer and Israel Teyer, The Red Forest, narrator Izhak Shumowitz, trans. Rachel Luzan (Ra'anana, Israel: Docostory, 2005); Martin Gray, with Max Gallo, For Those I Loved, trans. Anthony White (Boston: Little, Brown, 1972).

Secondary accounts include Avraham Wein, ed., Pinkas ha-kehillot. Encyclopaedia of Jewish Communities: Poland, vol. 4, Warsaw and Its Region (Jerusalem: Yad Vashem, 1986), pp. 209–216; its English-language counterpart in Arnon Rubin, The Rise and Fall of the Jewish Communities in Poland and Their Relics Today, vol. 1, District Białystok (Tel Aviv: Tel Aviv University Press, 2006), pp. 235–240; Andrzej Zawistowski, "A Short History of Zambrów," on the Museum of Family History Web site; and in Polish, Józef Stanisław Mroczek, Zambrów. Zarys dziejów (Białystok: Ośrodek Badań Naukowych w Białymstoku i Łomżyńskie Towarzystwo Naukowe im. Wągów, 1992); Tomasz Wiśniewski, "Dzieje Gminy Żydowskiej w Zambrowie," Wiadomości Zambrowskie, nos. 5–6 (1991): 3–7; and Andrzej Zawistowski, "Zagłada," Wiadomości Zambrowskie, no. 2 (38) (1996): 19.

Survivors of the September executions likely were sent to a labor camp established in Łapy, as discussed in Avigdor Ben-Dov, ed., Deliverance. The Diary of Michael Maik. A True Story, trans. Laia Ben-Dov (Kedumim, Israel: Keterpress, 2004).

Archival documentation about the fate of the Zambrów Jewish community under German occupation in World War II includes AŻIH (e.g., Ankiety, 301 [1258, 2959, 3159, 3160, 3520, 3533, 3592]); BA-L (e.g., B 162/5863 [205 AR-Z 13/62]); IPN-Bi (56/6-7, S-104/68/1-2, S-500/71); USHMM (e.g., Acc.2000.173, RG-15.079M [AŻIH] [Ring I/899], RG-15.019M [IPN] [2 (172, 191), 14 (46, 81)]); VHF (# 2599, 8605, 11868, 17320, 18137, 32038, 41637, 49409); YVA (e.g., M-1E/1434, M-11/188, M-49E [874, 3159], O-3/10957, O-16 [970, 1258, 1265, 1850, 2249, 2353, 2959, 3159, 3160]).

Some of the material above appears in Polish translation in Paweł Machcewicz and Krzysztof Persak, eds., Wokół Jedwabnego, 2 vols. (Warsaw: IPN-KŚZpNP, 2002), vol. 2, Dokumenty, pp. 367–369 (AŻIH, 301/1258), pp. 169–174, 175–177 (BA-L, B 162/5863 [205 AR-Z 13/62]), pp. 156–166, 195–199.

Laura Crago

NOTES

1. Moshe Lewinsky testimony, in Levinski, Sefer Zambrov, pp. 168–170; AŻIH, 301/1258, testimony of Icchak Stupnik, pp. 1–2, in Machcewicz and Persak, Wokół Jedwabnego, 2:367.
2. VHF, # 18137, testimony of Morris Baker (Piekarewicz); AŻIH, 301/3159, testimony of Fajwel Słowik, pp. 1–2.
3. Date from Zawistowski, "Zagłada," p. 19, because the date of August 23, 1941, cited for the "Black Thursday" executions in Levinski, Sefer Zambrov, pp. 122–123, 159–164, fell on a Saturday. For suspicions about Schaper's unit, see BA-L, B 162/5863 (205 AR-Z 13/62, Sta. Hamburg 141 Js 223/64).
4. Teyer, The Red Forest, p. 81.
5. See AŻIH, 301/1258, in Machcewicz and Persak, Wokół Jedwabnego, 2:367–368; BA-L, B 162/5863 (205 AR-Z 13/62), pp. 156–166 (Sosnowska deposition); Lewinsky testimony, in Levinski, Sefer Zambrov, pp. 173–177; VHF, # 5872, testimony of Leon Rzepka.

6. Compare Sosnowska and Łupiński testimonies, respectively, at BA-L, B 162/5863 (205 AR-Z 13/62), pp. 156–166; and Jan Żaryn, “Przez pomyłkę. Ziemia łomżyńska w latach 1939–1945. Rozmowa z Ks. Kazimierzem Łupińskim,” Biuletyn IPN, nos. 8–9 (19–20) (August–September 2003): 113.

7. AŻIH, 301/1258, in Machcewicz and Persak, Wokół Jedwabnego, 2:368.

8. USHMM, RG-15.019M (IPN), reel 1, 2/172, pp. 1–2; RG-15.079M (AŻIH), Ring I/899, pp. 1–5, notes 450 Rutki Jews and 300 Zambrów Jews executed.

9. Gray, For Those, pp. 162–163.

10. VHF, # 18137, 5872; Yitzchak Golombek testimony, in Levinski, Sefer Zambrov, pp. 126–128.

11. AŻIH, 301/2959, testimony of Fajwel Słowik, pp. 2–4; VHF, # 5872.

12. Teyer, The Red Forest, pp. 169–172, 174.

ZELWA

Pre-1939: Zelwa, village, Wołkowysk powiat, Białystok województwo, Poland; 1939–1941: Zel’va, raion center, Grodno oblast’, Belorussian SSR; 1941–1944: Zelwa, Kreis Wołkowysk, Distrikt Białystok; post-1991: Zel’va, raen center, Hrodna voblasts’, Republic of Belarus

Zelwa lies on the Zelwianka River about 28 kilometers (17.4 miles) east of Wołkowysk. In World War II, immediately after the Red Army occupied the region in September 1939, the Zel’va raion counted 34,500 native inhabitants, including among others 23,800 Belorussians, 9,300 Poles, and 1,300 Jews. Almost all the Jews resided in Zelwa. Of the 7,000 Jewish refugees from German-occupied Poland who subsequently passed through Zelwa, as many as 1,500 may have settled there.¹

On June 23, 1941, the second day of the German invasion of the USSR, heavy German aerial bombardment set Zelwa ablaze and resulted in the deaths of 80 to 300 Jews.² Before the Germans occupied Zelwa on June 27, many Jews fled to places with less extensive devastation, including Dereczyn (and Kolonia Synajska). The remaining Jews crowded together in the only three Jewish houses to have survived the fire.³

A unit composed of about 20 SS soldiers, likely from either Sonderkommando 7b, led by SS-Sturmbannführer Günther Rausch; or Sonderkommando 8, commanded by Hauptsturmführer Erich Engels, arrived in Zelwa on July 8 or 11, 1941, to appoint a local collaborationist administration.⁴ The SS commander named a group of young Polish men to a Jugendpolizei, an auxiliary police force, and charged them with maintaining order in the Jewish community. At an assembly of Jews, he named the rabbi of Zelwa, “Abba” Poupko, the Jewish elder (Judenältester) and sole representative of the Zelwa Jewish community. Upon arriving in Zelwa in the fall of 1941, the Amtskommissar retained these institutions and practices. As a result, neither a Jewish police force nor a Judenrat was established in Zelwa.⁵

At an assembly, the SS commander issued a series of anti-Jewish decrees, including the wearing of yellow markings, on the back and chest, and then chose a man and a woman from among the Jews to demonstrate the punishments for violating the decrees. After flogging the man to death, members of the SS unit publicly gang-raped the woman before beating her to death. The commander next ordered the community’s educated members to come forward. He may have added 15 better-dressed Jews to the group. Before executing the 18 to 33 Jews in the Bereszko Forest, the Germans, joined by the newly appointed Polish police, beat and chased the remaining Jews back to Zelwa.⁶

The fire damage contributed to the establishment of an open ghetto in Zelwa. When German civil administrators, including members of the Gendarmerie, arrived in Zelwa, they expelled the Jews from their houses and ordered them to reside instead in the basements of some of the fire-devastated structures.⁷ The Zelwa Jews were concentrated together, with several families residing in a single basement. It is unknown if the concentration was a consequence of the fire, with perhaps only a limited number of basements surviving intact, or the result of anti-Jewish decrees, which either had established a distinct Jewish quarter or had ordered war-devastated Jewish houses expropriated and razed for their usable building materials.

Zelwa’s location as the easternmost outpost of Distrikt Białystok, separated from the Generalkommissariat Weissruthenien only by the Zelwianka River, reinforced the open ghetto, as the local German authorities rigidly enforced decrees limiting the Jews to Zelwa. For example, when a ghetto was established in Dereczyn around February 1942, the Gelman family returned to Zelwa but discovered it impossible to remain there, as the Germans closely monitored the Jewish population as part of the search for fugitives from Generalkommissariat Weissruthenien. For this reason, the family fled to Wołkowysk.⁸ Other Dereczyn fugitives note that the Zelwa Jews were “hiding in their basements,” a point that suggests the imposition of a curfew or some other type of order that limited Jewish movement within Zelwa.⁹

The Amtskommissar also publicly enforced German decrees on Jewish movement beyond Zelwa. Survivors most remember him for organizing the hanging of seven Jews found outside Zelwa, including five refugees and two native-born butchers, David Vishnivisky and Joshua Niznitsky. He ordered both Jews and Christians to construct the gallows together and then made attendance obligatory for both communities. At the hanging, he announced it was his obligation to execute all Jews found illegally beyond Zelwa’s borders. Perhaps because Zelwa was in Distrikt Białystok, which the Germans treated more as a part of the Reich, the Amtskommissar simultaneously emphasized the legality of his actions by insisting that the condemned confessed to having violated German decrees. The Amtskommissar may have added Poupko to those slated for execution, though another account notes that the Judenältester committed suicide after being forced to participate in the hangings.¹⁰

The Germans conscripted the Zelwa Jews for forced labor. These workers likely razed fire-damaged structures. By the spring of 1942, many Zelwa Jews worked on the Wołkowysk-to-Słonim road construction project at tasks such as crushing stone for paving underlayment. Jewish craftsmen labored for the local German administration. At work, some Jews organized for future resistance by stealing arms and ammunition and burying them in the nearby forest.

On November 2, 1942, an SS commander ordered the Zelwa Jews to assemble for deportation by train to a closed ghetto in Wołkowysk. Some 10 to 15 resistance activists fled to the nearby forest. Another approximately 40 Jews—those too infirm to make the trip or found in hiding—were executed. At the railway station, the Zelwa Jews were joined by other nearby Jewish communities, including the approximately 70 residents of the Krzemienica Kościelna Amtskommissariat driven there by local Gendarmes and auxiliary policemen. Whether the approximately 75 to 90 Jewish inhabitants of the pre-war Międzyrzecz gmina, on the southeastern border of Kreis Wołkowysk, were among these prisoners is unknown. It seems likely, as one survivor noted, that 2,400 Jews from Zelwa and other nearby localities were transferred to SS control at the Zelwa train station.¹¹

In Wołkowysk, the Zelwa deportees were imprisoned in a transit camp established by the SS at a former Polish cavalry garrison together with the approximately 17,500 other Jews from Kreis Wołkowysk. They lived in deplorable conditions there for about a month until being deported, likely either on November 26 or December 2, 1942, on the second Wołkowysk transport to the Treblinka extermination camp.¹² They all were gassed on arrival.

Most of the Zelwa Jews who had evaded the deportation joined the Pobeda (Victory) Soviet partisan unit. The unit's members, mostly Jewish fugitives from Dereczyn, Piaski, and Wołkowysk, won military distinctions for wartime attacks on German troop trains, supply convoys, and police encampments.¹³ Although 80 percent of its approximately 360 Jews were killed in the course of military action, 6 Zelwa partisans survived. Also among the Zelwa survivors are a number of wartime residents of other communities, including several people who fled to still Russian-occupied territory in the first weeks of the 1941 war and at least 8 others who were inmates of other ghettos under the German occupation.

SOURCES Published accounts include Sefer zikaron Zelva ([Israel]: Irgun yots'e Zelyah be-Yisrael, 1984), in an English translation as Yerahmiel Moorstein, ed., Zelva Memorial Book (Mahwah, NJ: J.S. Berger, 1992); Moses Einhorn, ed., Volkovisker Yisker-Bukh (New York, 1949); Noah Kaplinsky, "Volkovysk in Its Death Throes," in Hurban Volkovisk be-Milhemet ha-'olam ha-sheniyah, 1939/1945 (Tel Aviv: Vaad irgun yots'e Volkovisk be-Erets-Yisrael, 1946); Katri'el Lashovits, ed., Volkovisk: Sipurah shel kebilah Yehudit-Tsiyonit bushmedab ba-Sho'ah (Tel Aviv: K. Lashovits, 1988). The three yizkor books are available in English in the Wołkowysk yizkor book trilogy Sefer zikaron Volkovisk. The Volkovysk Memorial Book, trans. Jacob Solomon Berger (Mahwah, NJ: J.S. Berger, 2000).

Also useful is the Zelwa entry in Shmuel Spector and Bracha Freundlich, eds., Pinkas ha-kebilot. Encyclopaedia of Jewish Communities: Poland, vol. 8, Vilna, Bialystok, Nowogrodek (Jerusalem: Yad Vashem, 2005), pp. 346–350.

Archival documentation for the Zelwa community in World War II under German occupation includes AŽIH (301/627 and 667); YVA (e.g., O-16/435); and two lists of Zelwa Jews known to have perished under the German occupation in GARF (7021-86-41, pp. 8, 66), with microfilmed copies available at USHMM (RG-22.002M, reel 13) and YVA (M-33).

Laura Crago

NOTES

1. Yitshak Resnik, "Krzemienica," in Einhorn, Volkovisker Yisker-Bukh, p. 317.

2. Compare Alta Gelman and Emphraim Gelman, "A Family among the Partisans," and Shmuel Yarnivsky, "The Destruction of Zelva," in Moorstein, Zelva, respectively, pp. 77 and 104.

3. Shimon Huberband, Kiddush Hashem: Jewish Religious and Cultural Life in Poland during the Holocaust (New York: Yeshiva University Press, 1987), p. 371.

4. With dates of July 6, 8, and 11, 1941, provided, respectively, in Gelman and Gelman, "A Family," p. 77; AŽIH 301/627, testimony of Mojżesz and Kasriel (or Moshe and Katriel) Ślucky, p. 3 (MSS); and Huberband, Kiddush Hashem, p. 374.

5. Alta Gelman and Emphraim Gelman, "The Liquidation of Zelva," in Moorstein, Zelva, p. 108.

6. Huberband, Kiddush Hashem, p. 374; and Gelman and Gelman, "A Family," p. 77.

7. Gelman and Gelman, "The Liquidation," p. 108.

8. Alta Gelman and Emphraim Gelman, "My Family," in Moorstein, Zelva, pp. 108–109.

9. Moses Einhorn, "Destruction," in Einhorn, Volkovisker, p. 952.

10. Compare Mordechai Loshovitz, "Alone in the Forest," with Yerahmiel Moorstein, "The Suicides," in Moorstein, Zelva, respectively, pp. 79 and 102.

11. Resnik, "Krzemienica," p. 317.

12. Cited dates, respectively, in Sefer zikaron Volkovisk, pt. 3, p. 81; and BLH, Aronzon; with December 5–7, 1942, also mentioned by Yarnivsky, "The Destruction," p. 104.

13. Moses Slutsky, "The Partisans," in Moorstein, Zelva, pp. 71–76.

